INTRODUCTION

The mission of this work is to supply a universal need, which is felt by the multitude of busy men and women of to-day, who, while eager to be initiated into the society of the great masters of literature, find it impossible to devote the time necessary to such studies as would accomplish that result. One to whom books are as strangers has not yet learned to live. He is a solitary, though he dwell amid a vast population. On the other hand, he to whom books are as friends possesses a Key to the Garden of Delights, where the purest pleasures are open for his entertainment, and where he has for his companions the master minds of all the ages.

Coleridge, writing nearly a century ago, asked: "Why are not more gems from our great authors scattered over the country? Great books are not in everybody's reach; and though it is better to know them thoroughly than to know them only here and there, yet it is a good work to give a little to those who have neither the time nor the means to get more."

In Forty Thousand Quotations, the busy man of affairs, the teacher and preacher, the public speaker, lawyer and writer, the man or woman who desires to make a creditable figure in conversation, correspondence or debate, in fact, the reader and student of either sex and any age, may turn at will to the choicest and most striking passages of the illustrious authors, orators and thinkers of all time, from the classic age to the present day. It will open, as with a magic key, the gateways of literature, and the realm of books will no longer be a terra incognita, since here are to be found the literary treasures of the ripest scholarship and the finest culture the world has ever known.

In making a collection of such magnitude, and from so many diverse sources, care has been exercised to render the indices, classification and general arrangement so simple that they can be mastered at a glance. One thousand four hundred topics are treated, covering almost the entire range of thought and emotion.

Famous classic, medieval and modern writers have contributed their quota. Here we have the loftiest strains of the poets, the highest flights of the orators, the keenest logic of the essayists, the strongest situations of the dramatists, the brightest bons mots of the humorists. Here are the flashes of genius that have stirred the souls of men, the famous epigrams, maxims, aphorisms, adages, similes and other utterances that have excited the world's admiration or amusement. A noted author once remarked that a dozen lines from a writer's works, familiar to the people after twenty years, constituted literary immortality. This volume is a Pantheon of Immortals in splendid array—rank upon rank of the novelists, poets, orators, philosophers, wits, sages, historians, scientists, statesmen, represented by utterances wherewith they have inspired and delighted men and women of every age.

There are many ways in which a work of this character can be made of great value to the reader and student, whatever may be his or her vocation in life. Take the best thoughts on the topic selected; read them; write them down; repeat them; make them your own, and they will become a part of your life and an influence on your career. You will find unconsciously that your mental horizon will be widened, your address enriched, and even your letters will acquire a polish which would be unattainable through other means. The art of apt quotation, happy simile, and pleasing witticism, is within your reach. Grace and power in writing and speaking do not consist in the employment of commonplace phrase and adjective, but come by studying the best models, and so also do the flexibility, range of expression and felicitous illustration which hold the ear, while they carry force and conviction to the mind.

George Eliot calls such a collection as this "The flowers of all books," and never was description more felicitous. Joubert, writing on the same subject, said "The coin of wisdom is its great thoughts, its eloquent flights, its proverbs and pithy sentences." That coin, struck at the mint of genius, is here in abundant measure.

This new and revised edition of Forty Thousand Quotations was first published as Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts.

A bility

Ability is of little account without opportunity.—Napoleon I.

Ability is a poor man's wealth.—Matthew Wren.

Ability in a man is knowledge which emanates from divine light.—Zoroaster.

Ability involves responsibility. Power to its last particle is duty.—Maclaren.

The winds and waves are always on the side of the ablest navigators.—Gibbon.

Consider well what your strength is equal to, and what exceeds your ability.—Horace.

Ability wins us the esteem of the true men; luck that of the people.—La Rochefoucauld.

Exigencies create the necessary ability to meet and to conquer them.—Wendell Phillips.

An able man shows his spirit by gentle words and resolute actions.—Chesterfield.

Every person is responsible for all the good within the scope of his abilities, and for no more.—Gail Hamilton.

The art of using moderate abilities to advantage wins praise, and often acquires more reputation than actual brilliancy.—La Rochefoucauld.

As we advance in life we learn the limits of our abilities.—Froude.

The wicked are always surprised to find ability in the good.—Vauvenargues.

Men, like bullets, go farthest when they are smoothest.—Jean Paul Richter.

I pride myself in recognizing and upholding ability in every party and wherever I meet it.—Beaconsfield.

To become an able man in any profession, there are three things necessary,—nature, study, and practice.—Aristotle.

We judge ourselves by what we feel capable of doing, while others judge us by what we have already done.—Longfellow.

You are a devil at everything, and there is no kind of thing in the 'versal world but what you can turn your hand to.—Cervantes.

Who does the best his circumstance allows, Does well, acts nobly; angels could no more.—Young.

Men who undertake considerable things, even in a regular way, ought to give us ground to presume ability.—Burke.

The measure of capacity is the measure of sphere to either man or woman.—Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

The possession of great powers no doubt carries with it a contempt for mere external show.—James A. Garfield.

Natural ability can almost compensate for the want of every kind of cultivation; but no cultivation of the mind can make up for the want of natural ability.—Schopenhauer.

Read my little fable:
He that runs may read.
Most can raise the flowers now,
For all have got the seed.
—Tennyson.

To the very last, he [Napoleon] had a kind of idea; that, namely, of la carrière ouverte aux talents—the tools to him that can handle them.—Sir Walter Scott.

No man is without some quality, by the due application of which he might deserve well of the world; and whoever he be that has but little in his power should be in haste to do that little, lest he be confounded with him that can do nothing.—Dr. Johnson.

He could raise scruples dark and nice,
And after solve 'em in a trice;
As if Divinity had catch'd
The itch, on purpose to be scratch'd.
—Butler.

There's in him stuff that puts him to these ends;
For being not propped up by ancestry whose grace
Chalks successors their way; nor called upon
For high feats done to the crown; neither allied
To eminent assistants; but, spider-like,
Out of his self-drawing web, he gives us note;
The force of his own merit makes his way;
A gift that heaven gives for him, which buys
A place next to a king. —Shakespeare.

Absence

Conspicuous by his absence.—Tacitus.

Absence makes the heart grow fonder;
Isle of Beauty, fare thee well!
—T. H. Bayley.

Judicious absence is a weapon.—Charles Reade.

Thinking of thee, still thee, till thought grew pain.—Moore.

I dote on his very absence.—Shakespeare.

Absence is all love's crime.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

It is absence that tries fidelity.—Mrs. J. Hunter.

The absent feel and fear every ill.—Cervantes.

Achilles absent, was Achilles still.—Homer.

I believe absence is a great element of charm.—Beaconsfield.

Short absence quickens love; long absence kills it.—Mirabeau.

In the hope to meet
Shortly again, and make our absence sweet.
—Ben Jonson.

Authors and lovers always suffer some infatuation, from which only absence can set them free.—Dr. Johnson.

Where'er I roam, whatever realms to see,
My heart, untravell'd, fondly turns to thee.—Goldsmith.

There's little pleasure in the house
When our gudeman's awa.
—W. J. Mickle.

Ever absent, ever near;
Still I see thee, still I hear;
Yet I cannot reach thee, dear!
—Francis Kazinczy.

'Tis sweet to know there is an eye
Will mark our coming, and look brighter
When we come.—Byron.

Wives in their husbands' absences grow
subtler,
And daughters sometimes run off with the butler. —Byron.

Thou art gone from my gaze like a beautiful dream,
And I seek thee in vain by the meadow and stream. —George Linley.

The joys of meeting pay the pangs of absence,
Else who could bear it? —Rowe.

As contraries are known by contraries, so is the delight of presence best known by the torments of absence.—

Alcibiades.

All days are nights to see till I see thee,
And nights bright days when dreams do show thee me. —Shakespeare.

Condemned whole years in absence to deplore,
And image charms he must behold no more.
—Pope.

Your absence of mind we have borne, till your presence of body came to be called in question by it.—Charles Lamb.

'Tis said that absence conquers love;
But oh! believe it not.
I've tried, alas! its power to prove,
But thou art not forgot.
—Frederick W. Thomas.

Days of absence, sad and dreary;
Clothed in sorrow's dark array,—
Days of absence, I am weary;
She I love is far away.
—Rousseau.

I have this while with leaden thoughts been press'd;
But I shall, in a more continue time,
Strike off this score of absence.
—Shakespeare.

Oft in the tranquil hour of night
When stars illumine the sky,
I gaze upon each orb of light,
And wish that thou wert by.
—George Linley.

Ye flowers that droop forsaken by the spring;
Ye birds that left by summer cease to sing;
Yet trees that fade when autumn heats remove,
Say, is not absence death to those who love? —Pope.

Where'er I roam, whatever realms to see,
My heart untravell'd, fondly turns to thee;
Still to my brother turns, with ceaseless
pain,
And drags at each remove a lengthening chain. —Goldsmith.

How like a winter hath my absence been
From thee, the pleasure of the fleeting year!
What freezings have I felt, what dark days
seen!
What old December's bareness everywhere.

Not to understand a treasure's worth till time has stole away the slighted good, is cause of half the poverty we feel, and makes the world the wilderness it is.—Cowper.

O thou who dost inhabit in my breast,
Leave not the mansion so long tenantless;
Lest growing ruinous the building fall,
And leave no memory of what it was.
—Shakespeare.

What shall I do with all the days and hours
That must be counted ere I see thy face?
How shall I charm the interval that lowers Between this time and that sweet time of grace?
—Frances Anne Kemble.

In my Lucia's absence
Life hangs upon me, and becomes a burden;
I am ten times undone, while hope, and
fear,
And grief, and rage and love rise up at once,
And with variety of pain distract me.
—Addison.

What! keep a week away? seven days and nights?
Eight score hours? and lovers' absent hours.
More tedious than the dial eight score times?
O weary reckoning! —Shakespeare.

Absence extinguishes small passions and increases great ones, as the wind will blow out a candle and blow in a fire.—La Rochefoucauld.

With what a deep devotedness of woe
I went thy absence—o'er and o'er again
Thinking of thee, still thee, till thought grew pain,
And memory, like a drop that, night and
day,
Falls cold and ceaseless, wore my heart away! —Moore.

Since you have waned from us,
Fairest of women!
I am a darkened cage
Songs cannot hymn in.
My songs have followed you,
Like birds the summer;
Ah! bring them back to me,
Swiftly, dear comer!
Seraphim,
Her to hymn,
Might leave their portals;
And at my feet learn
The harping of mortals!
—Francis Thompson.

Absent

Absent in body, but present in spirit, —St. Paul.

Absolution

No man taketh away sins (which the law, though holy, just and good could not take away), but He in whom there is no sin.—Bede.

It appertaineth to the true God alone to be able to loose men from their sins.—St. Cyril.

He alone can remit sins who is appointed our Master by the Father of all; He only is able to discern obedience from disobedience.—St. Clement of Alexandria.

Neither angel, nor archangel, nor yet even the Lord Himself (who alone can say "I am with you"), can, when we have sinned, release us, unless we bring repentance with us.—St. Ambrose.

It is not the ambassador, it is not the messenger, but the Lord Himself that saveth His people. The Lord remaineth alone, for no man can be partner with God in forgiving sins; this office belongs solely to Christ, who taketh away the sins of the world.—St. Ambrose.

Abstinence

Abstinence is approved of God.—Chaucer.

Abstinence is the surety of temperance.—Plato.

Too much is a vanity; enough is a feast.—Quarles.

Abstinence is the great strengthener and clearer of reason.—South.

Abstinence is many times very helpful to the end of religion.—Tillotson.

Abstaining is favorable both to the head and the pocket.—Horace Greeley.

Abstaining so as really to enjoy, is the epicurism, the very perfection, of reason.—Rousseau.

The more a man denies himself, the more shall he obtain from God.—Horace.

By forbearing to do what may innocently be done, we may add hourly new vigor to resolution.—Dr. Johnson.

Abstinence is as easy to me as temperance would be difficult.—Samuel Johnson.

Abstinence is whereby a man refraineth from anything which he may lawfully take.—Elyot.

Against diseases here the strongest fence is the defensive virtue, abstinence.—Herrick.

To set the mind above the appetites is the end of abstinence, which one of the Fathers observes to be, not a virtue, but the groundwork of a virtue.—Johnson.

A rich man cannot enjoy a sound mind nor a sound body without exercise and abstinence; and yet these are truly the worst ingredients of poverty.—Lord Kames.

His life is parallel'd
E'en with the stroke and line of his great justice;
He doth with holy abstinence subdue
That in himself which he spurs on his power
To qualify in others. —Shakespeare.

We read of a fountain in Arabia upon whose basin is inscribed, "Drink, and away;" but how delicious is that hasty draught, and how long and brightly the thought of its transient refreshment dwells in the memory.—Tuckerman.

Never add artificial heat to thy body by wine or spice until thou findest that time hath decayed thy natural heat.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Abstract

Brief abstract and record of tedious days.—Shakespeare.

They are the abstracts, and brief chronicles of the time.—Shakespeare.

Absurdity

Absurdity refutes itself.—Bartholin.

Do not sanction an absurdity.—Mme. de Genlis.

The greater absurdities are, the more strongly they evince the falsity of that supposition from whence they flow.—Atterbury.

Absurdities die of self-strangulation.—Haliburton.

Every absurdity has a champion to defend it.—Goldsmith.

Absurdities are great or small in proportion to custom or insuetude.—Landor.

Of all the authorities to which men can be called to submit, the wisdom of our ancestors is the most whimsically absurd.—Jeremy Taylor.

Abundance

In abundance prepare for scarcity.—Mencius.

Abundance changes the value of things.—Terence.

Abundance without discretion is plain penury.—Matteo Gribaldi.

Not what we have, but what we enjoy, constitutes our abundance.—J. Petit-Senn.

For out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh.—Matthew, chap. xii, 34.

Great abundance of riches cannot be gathered and kept by any man without sin.—Erasmus.

Abundance consists not alone in material possession, but in an uncovetous spirit.—Selden.

If I have enough for myself and family, I am steward only for myself; if I have more, I am but a steward of that abundance for others.—George Herbert.

Abuse

Abuse is the weapon of the vulgar.—Goodrich.

It is better a man should be abused than forgotten.—Dr. Johnson.

The weak resort of cowardice.—Colton.

The bitter clamour of two eager tongues.—Shakespeare.

It is the wit, the policy, of sin to hate those men whom we have abused.—Sir W. Davenant.

A calumnious abuse, too often repeated, becomes so familiar to the ear as to lose its effect.

There is a time when the hoary head of inveterate abuse will neither draw reverence nor obtain protection.—Burke.

Abuse is often of service. There is nothing so dangerous to an author as silence. His name, like a shuttlecock, must be beat backward and forward, or it falls to the ground.—Johnson.

Nor aught so good but strained from that fair use,
Revolts from true birth stumbling on abuse,
—Shakespeare.

There are more people abusive to others than lie open to abuse themselves; but the humor goes round, and he that laughs at me to-day will have somebody to laugh at him to-morrow.—Seneca.

I never yet heard man or woman much abused, that I was not inclined to think the better of them; and to transfer any suspicion or dislike to the person who appeared to take delight in pointing out the defects of a fellow-creature.—Jane Porter.

Remember that it is not he who gives abuse or blows who affronts, but the view we take of these things as insulting. When, therefore, any one provokes you, be assured that it is your own opinion which provokes you.—Epictetus.

It has been shrewdly said, that when men abuse us we should suspect ourselves, and when they praise us, them. It is a rare instance of virtue to despise censure which we do not deserve; and still more rare to despise praise which we do.—Colton.

Acacia

Light-leaved acacias, by the door,
Stood up in balmy air,
Clusters of blossomed moonlight bore,
And breathed a perfume rare.
—George MacDonald.

Our rocks are rough, but smiling there
Th' acacia waves her yellow hair,
Lonely and sweet, nor loved the less
For flow'ring in a wilderness.
—Moore.

A great acacia, with its slender trunk
And overpoise of multitudinous leaves, (In which a hundred fields might spill their dew

And intense verdure, yet find room enough)
Stood reconciling all the place with green.
—E. B. Browning.

The slender acacia would not shake
One long milk-bloom on the tree;
The white lake-blossom fell into the lake
As the pimpernel dozed on the lea;
But the rose was awake all night for your sake,
Knowing your promise to me;
The lilies and roses were all awake,
They sighed for the dawn and thee.
—Tennyson.

Pluck the acacia's golden balls,
And mark where the red pomegranate falls.
—Julia C. R. Dorr.

Accent

Accent is the soul of language: it gives to it feeling and truth.—Rousseau.

Accent and emphasis are the pith of reading; punctuation is but secondary.—Disraeli.

Accidents

The accident of an accident.—Lord
Thurlow.

Chapter of accidents.—Burke.

Moving accidents by flood and field.
—Othello.

By many a happy accident.—Thomas Middleton.

There is no such thing as accident;
it is fate misnamed.—Napoleon I.

Nothing with God can be accidental.
—Longfellow.

What men call accident is God's own part.—Bailey.

Promptly improve your accidents.—
Napoleon I.

Nothing under the sun is accident.
—Lessing.

Accident is simply unforeseen order.
—Novalis.

The Orientals have another word for accident; it is "kismet,"—fate.—
Macaulay.

The just season of doing things must be nicked, and all accidents improved.—L'Estrange.

The chapter of accidents is the longest chapter in the book.—Attributed to John Wilkes.

To what happy accident is it that we owe so unexpected a visit?—Goldsmith.

Our wanton accidents take root, and grow
To vaunt themselves God's laws.
—Charles Kingsley.

Sometimes there are accidents in our lives the skillful extrication from which demands a little folly.—La Rochefoucauld.

There are no accidents so unfortunate from which skillful men will not draw some advantage, nor so fortunate that foolish men will not turn them to their hurt.—La Rochefoucauld.

Accommodated

That is, when a man is, as they say, accommodated: or where a man is—being—whereby—he may be thought to be accommodated, which is an excellent thing.—Shakespeare.

Accountability

Moral conduct includes every thing in which men are active and for which they are accountable. They are active in their desires, their affections, their designs, their intentions, and in every thing they say and do of choice; and for all these things they are accountable to God.—Emmons.

When illusions are over, when the distractions of sense, the vagaries of fancy, and the tumults of passion have dissolved even before the body is cold, which once they so thronged and agitated, the soul merges into intellect, intellect into conscience, conscience into the unbroken, awful solitude of its own personal accountability; and though the inhabitants of the universe were within the spirit's ken, this personal accountability is as strictly alone and unshared, as if no being were throughout immensity but the spirit and its God.—Henry Giles.

Accusation

Give me good proofs of what you have alleged:

'Tis not enough to say—in such a bush
There lies a thief—in such a cave a beast;
But you must show him to me ere I shoot,
Else I may kill one of my straggling sheep.
—Shakespeare.

To vouch this is no proof
Without more certain and more overt tests
Than these thin habits and poor likelihoods
Of modern seeming do prefer against him.
—Shakespeare.

Aces

On the four aces doom'd to roll.—
Churchill.

We gentlemen, whose charlots roll only upon the four aces, are apt to have a wheel out of order.—Sir John Vanbrugh.

Aches

Up start as many aches in his bones, as there are ouches in his skin.—
George Chapman.

Can by their pangs and aches find
All turns and changes of the wind.
—Butler.

If thou neglect'st, or dost unwillingly
What I command, I'll rack thee with old cramps;
Fill all thy bones with aches; make thee
roar
That beasts shall tremble at thy din.
—Shakespeare.

Acknowledgments

What makes false reckoning, as regards gratitude, is that the pride of the giver and the receiver cannot agree as to the value of the benefit.—La Rochefoucauld.

Acquaintances

Make few acquaintances.—Rothschild.

Acquaintance softens prejudice.—
Æsop.

Slight acquaintance breeds distrust.—
Viera.

A long novitiate of acquaintance should precede the vows of friendship.
—Bolingbroke.

It is good discretion not to make too much of any man at the first; because one cannot hold out that proportion.—
Bacon.

Should auld acquaintance be forgot,
And never brought to min'?
Should auld acquaintance be forgot,
And days o' auld lang syne?
—Burns.

If a man does not make new acquaintances, as he advances through life, he will soon find himself left alone. A man should keep his friendship in constant repair.—Johnson.

Make the most of the day, by determining to spend it on two sorts of acquaintances only—those by whom something may be got, and those from whom something may be learned.—
Colton.

There is a wide difference between general acquaintance and companionship. You may salute a man and exchange compliments with him daily, yet know nothing of his character, his inmost tastes and feelings.—Wm. Matthews.

Acquirements

That good sense which nature affords us is preferable to most of the knowledge that we can acquire.— Comines.

We shall at all times chance upon men of recondite acquirements, but whose qualifications, from the incommunicative and inactive habits of their owners, are as utterly useless to others as though the possessors had them not.—Colton.

That which we acquire with the most difficulty we retain the longest; as those who have earned a fortune are usually more careful of it than those who have inherited one.—Colton.

Acting

All the world's a stage.—Shakespeare.

All the world practices the art of acting.—Petronius Arbitr.

Come, sit down, every mother's son, and rehearse your parts.—Shakespeare.

Lo, where the Stage, the poor, degraded Stage, Holds its warped mirror to a gaping age!
—Charles Sprague.

Who teach the mind its proper face to scan,
And hold the faithful mirror up to man.
—Robert Lloyd.

The play's the thing
Wherein I'll catch the conscience of the king.
—Shakespeare.

A fool cannot be an actor, though an actor may act a fool's part.—Sophocles.

The part was aptly fitted and naturally performed.—Shakespeare.

An actor should take lessons from a painter and a sculptor.—Goethe.

Where they do agree on the stage, then unanimity is wonderful.—Sheridan.

They wear the livery of other men's fortunes; their very thoughts are not their own.—Hazlitt.

The concealment of art by the actor is as great a mark of genius as it is in the painter.—François Delsarte.

Let those that play your clowns speak no more than is set down for them.—Shakespeare.

To see Kean act was like reading

Shakespeare by flashes of lightning.—Coleridge.

Let gorgeous Tragedy, in sceptred pall, come sweeping by.—Milton.

Comedians are not actors; they are only imitators of actors.—Zimmerman.

On the stage he was natural, simple, affecting,
'Twas only that when he was off, he was acting.
—Goldsmith.

The world's a theatre, the earth a stage,
Which God and Nature do with actors fill.
—Thomas Heywood.

The drama's laws, the drama's patrons give.
For we that live to please, must please to live.
—Samuel Johnson.

And what the actor could effect,
The scholar could presage.
—Thomas Campbell.

Even kings but play; and when their part is done, some other, worse or better, mounts the throne.—Dryden.

See, how these rascals use me!
They will not let my play run; and yet they steal my thunder.—John Dennis.

To-day kings, to-morrow beggars, it is only when they are themselves that they are nothing.—Hazlitt.

The most difficult character in comedy is that of the fool, and he must be no simpleton that plays that part.—Cervantes.

God is the author, men are only the players. These grand pieces which are played upon earth have been composed in heaven.—Balzac.

A long, exact, and serious comedy;
In every scene some moral let it teach,
And, if it can, at once both please and preach.
—Pope.

The play bill which is said to have announced the tragedy of Hamlet, the character of the Prince of Denmark being left out.—Scott.

The stage is a supplement to the pulpit, where virtue, according to Pla-to's sublime idea, moves our love and affection when made visible to the eye.—Disraeli.

In really good acting we should be able to believe that what we hear and see is of our own imagining; it should seem to us as a charming dream.—Joubert.

I can counterfeit the deep tragedian; Speak and look back, and pry on every side, Tremble and start at wagging of a straw, Intending deep suspicion.—Shakespeare.

Is it not a noble farce wherein kings, republics, and emperors have for so many ages played their parts, and to which the vast universe serves for a theatre?—Montaigne.

Everybody has his own theatre, in which he is manager, actor, prompter, playwright, sceneshifter, boxkeeper, doorkeeper, all in one, and audience into the bargain.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

As in a theatre, the eyes of men, After a well-grac'd actor leaves the stage, Are idly bent on him that enters next, Thinking his prattle to be tedious.—Shakespeare.

In other things the knowing artist may judge better than the people; but a play, (Made for delight, and for no other use) If you approve it not, has no excuse.—Edmund Waller.

I have seen no men in life loving their profession so much as painters, except, perhaps, actors, who, when not engaged themselves, always go to the play.—Thackeray.

It is their province to make the public weep and smile, tremble and resent, and to light all the passions of the human breast in their enthusiastic audiences.—G. A. Sala.

Who rant by note, and through the gamut rage; in songs and airs express their martial fire; combat in trills, and in a fugue expire.—Addison.

Notwithstanding all that Rousseau has advanced so very ingeniously upon plays and players, their profession is, like that of a painter, one of the imitative arts, whose means are pleasure, and whose end is virtue.—Shenstone.

Johnson told Garrick that he and his profession were mutually indebted to each other. "Your profession," said the doctor, "has made you rich; and you have made your profession respectable."—Colton.

It is with some violence to the imagination that we conceive of an actor belonging to the relations of private life, so closely do we identify these persons in our mind with the characters which they assume upon the stage.—Lamb.

The actor is in the capacity of a steward to every living muse, and of an executor to every departed one: the poet digs up the ore; he sifts it from the dross, refines and purifies it for the mint; the actor sets the stamp upon it, and makes it current in the world.—Cumberland.

Few men of any modern nation have a proper sense of an æsthetical whole: they praise and blame by parts; they are charmed by passages. And who has greater reason to rejoice in this than actors, since the stage is ever but a patched and piecemeal matter?—Goethe.

Players, sir! I look upon them as no better than creatures set upon tables and joint-stools to make faces and produce laughter, like dancing dogs.—But, sir, you will allow that some players are better than others?—Yes, sir; as some dogs dance better than others.—Dr. Johnson.

Remember that you are but an actor, acting whatever part the Master has ordained. It may be short or it may be long. If he wishes you to represent a poor man, do so heartily; if a cripple, or a magistrate, or a private man, in each case act your part with honor.—Epictetus.

Victor Hugo makes one of his heroines—an actress—say, "My art endows me with a searching eye, a knowledge of the soul and the soul's workings; and, spite of all your skill, I read you to the depths." This is a truth more or less powerful, as one is more or less gifted by the good God.—Charlotte Cushman.

And, like a strutting player, whose conceit Lies in his hamstring, and doth think it rich
To hear the wooden dialogue and sound
'Twixt his stretch'd footing and the scaffoldage
—Shakespeare.

Is it not monstrous that this player here,
But in a fiction, in a dream of passion,
Could force his soul so to his own conceit
That from her working all his visage wann'd.
—Shakespeare.

A play there is, my lord, some ten words
long,
Which is as brief as I have known a play;
But by ten words, my lord, it is too long,
Which makes it tedious. —Shakespeare.

There is one way by which a strolling player may be ever secure of success; that is, in our theatrical way of expressing it, to make a great deal of the character. To speak and act as in common life is not playing, nor is it what people come to see; natural speaking, like sweet wine, runs glibly over the palate, and scarcely leaves any taste behind it; but being high in a part resembles vinegar, which grates upon the taste, and one feels it while he is drinking.—Goldsmith.

What's Hecuba to him, or he to Hecuba,
That he should weep for her? What would he do.
Had he the motive and the cue for passion
That I have? He would drown the stage with tears. —Shakespeare.

To wake the soul by tender strokes of art,
To raise the genius, and to mend the heart;
To make mankind, in conscious virtue bold, Live o'er each scene, and be what they behold—
For this the tragic Muse first trod the stage.
—Pope.

It's very hard! Oh, Dick, my boy,
It's very hard one can't enjoy
A little private spouting;
But sure as Lear or Hamlet lives,
Up comes our master, Bounce! and gives
The tragic Muse a routing.
—Hood.

Good, my lord, will you see the players well bestowed? Do you hear, let them be well used; for they are the abstract and brief chronicles of the time: after your death you were better have a bad epitaph than their ill report while you live.—Shakespeare.

I have heard
That guilty creatures sitting at a play,
Have, by the very cunning of the scene,
Been struck so to the soul that presently
They have proclaim'd their malefactions;
For murder, though it have no tongue, will speak
With most miraculous organ.
—Shakespeare.

O, there be players that I have seen play, and heard others praise, and that highly, not to speak it profanely, that, neither having the accent of Christians nor the gait of Christian, pagan, nor man, have so strutted and bellowed that I have thought some of nature's journeymen had made men and not made them well, they imitated humanity so abominably.—Shakespeare.

The play is done; the curtain drops,
Slow falling to the prompter's bell:
A moment yet the actor stops,
And looks around, to say farewell.
It is an irksome word and task:
And, when he's laughed and said his say,
He shows, as he removes the mask,
A face that's anything but gay.
—Thackeray.

Like hungry guests, a sitting audience looks:
Plays are like suppers; poets are the cooks.
The founder's you: the table is this place:
The carvers we: the prologue is the grace.
Each act, a course, each scene, a different dish,
Though we're in Lent, I doubt you're still for flesh.
Satire's the sauce, high-season'd, sharp and rough.
Kind masks and beaux, I hope you're pepper-proof?
Wit is the wine; but 'tis so scarce the true
Poets, like vintners, balderdash and brew.
Your surly scenes, where rant and bloodshed join,
Are butcher's meat, a battle's a sirloin:
Your scenes of love, so flowing, soft and chaste,
Are water-gruel without salt or taste.
—George Farquhar.

I think I love and reverence all arts equally, only putting my own just above the others; because in it I recognize the union and culmination of my own. To me it seems as if wher

God conceived the world, that was Poetry; He formed it, and that was Sculpture; He colored it, and that was Painting; He peopled it with living beings, and that was the grand, divine, eternal Drama.—Charlotte Cushman.

Speak the speech, I pray you, as I pronounced it to you, trippingly on the tongue; but if you mouth it, as many of your players do, I had as lief the town-crier spoke my lines. Nor do not saw the air too much with your hand, thus, but use all gently; for in the very torrent, tempest, and, as I may say, the whirlwind of passion, you must acquire and beget a temperance that may give it smoothness.—Shakespeare.

Action

Let us do or die.—Campbell.

Push on,—keep moving.—Thomas Morton.

There is only one proof of ability,—action.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

To the valiant actions speak alone.—Smollett.

Action, so to speak, is the genius of nature.—Blair.

We cannot all do all things.—Virgil.

The food of hope is meditative action.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Strong reasons make strong actions.—Shakespeare.

Time is short; your obligations are infinite.—Massillon.

Put his shoulder to the wheel.—Burton.

A bold onset is half the battle.—Garibaldi.

The act of God injures no one.—Juvenal.

Be great in act, as you have been in thought.—Shakespeare.

What the Puritans gave the world was not thought, but action.—Wendell Phillips.

And all may do what has by man been done.—Young.

Awake, arise, or be forever fall'n! —Milton.

Gentle in method, resolute in action.—From the Latin.

It is well to think well: it is divine to act well.—Horace Mann.

It is better to wear out than to rust out.—Bishop Cumberland.

Do well and right, and let the world sink.—Herbert.

It is praiseworthy even to attempt a great action.—La Rochefoucauld.

Do not do what is already done.—Terence.

Heaven ne'er helps the men who will not act.—Sophocles.

The thing done avails, and not what is said about it.—Emerson.

The Lord is a God of knowledge, and by Him actions are weighed.—I Samuel ii. 3

Never do an act of which you doubt the justice or propriety.—Latin.

Our actions are our own; their consequences belong to Heaven.—Francis.

Only the actions of the just Smell sweet and blossom in the dust,
—James Shirley.

How much easier do we find it to commend a good action than to imitate it.—Anon.

Of every noble action the intent
Is to give worth reward—vice punishment
—Beaumont and Fletcher.

I profess not talking: only this,
Let each man do his best.
—Shakespeare

The end of man is an action, and not a thought, though it were the noblest.—Carlyle.

Activity is the presence of function,
—character is the record of function.
—Greenough.

The flighty purpose never is o'ertook
unless the deed go with it.—Shakespeare.

All power appears only in transition.
Permanent power is stuff.—Novalis.

Remember that in all miseries lamenting becomes fools, and action, wise folk.—Sir P. Sidney.

Our acts make or mar us,—we are the children of our own deeds.—Victor Hugo.

A stirring dwarf we do allowance give before a sleeping giant.—Shakespeare.

The only true method of action in this world is to be in it, but not of it.
—Madame Swetchine.

Our actions are like the terminations of verses, which we rhyme as we please.—Rochefoucauld.

Speak out in acts; the time for words has passed, and deeds alone suffice.—Whittier.

When we cannot act as we wish,
we must act as we can.—Terrence.

To be active is the primary vocation of man.—Goethe.

Our actions must clothe us with an immortality loathsome or glorious.—Colton.

Be slow in considering, but resolute in action.—Bias.

Nothing is more terrible than to see ignorance in action.—Goethe.

'T is human actions paint the chart of time.—Montgomery.

Men do less than they ought unless they do all that they can.—Carlyle.

Action is the parent of results; dormancy,
the brooding mother of discontent.—Miss Mulock.

Action is happiness here; and without action there can be no heaven.—Voss.

The life of action is nobler than the life of thought.—Miss Mulock.

Living requires but little life; doing requires much.—Joubert.

The best way to keep good acts in memory is to refresh them with new.
—Cato.

Action is eloquence, and the eyes of the ignorant are more learned than their ears.—Shakespeare.

The manly part is to do with might and main what you can do.—Emerson.

Active natures are rarely melancholy.
Activity and melancholy are incompatible.—Bovee.

Our acts, our angels are, or good or ill,
Our fatal shadows that walk by us still.
—John Fletcher.

So much one man can do,
That does both act and know.
—Andrew Marvell.

Think that day lost whose (low) descending
Sun
Views from thy hand no noble action done.
—Jacob Bobart.

A great mind is a good sailor, as a great heart is.—Emerson.

For good or evil must in our actions meet;
Wicked is not much worse than indiscreet.
—Donne.

How my achievements mock me!
I will go meet them.
—Shakespeare.

Not always actions show the man; we find
Who does a kindness is not therefore kind.
—Pope.

Action is transitory, a step, a blow,
The motion of a muscle—this way or that.
—Wordsworth.

Action may not always bring happiness.

ness; but there is no happiness without action.—Beaconsfield.

So smile the Heavens upon this holy act
That after hours with sorrow chide us not!
—Shakespeare.

He is at no end of his actions blest
Whose ends will make him greatest and not best.
—George Chapman.

If it were done, when 'tis done, then 'twere well
It were done quickly. —Shakespeare.

Celerity is never more admired than by the negligent.—Shakespeare.

Act well at the moment, and you have performed a good action to all eternity.—Lavater.

Attempt the end, and never stand to doubt:
Nothing's so hard but search will find it out.
—Herrick.

That action which appears most conducive to the happiness and virtue of mankind.—Frances Hutcheon.

When desperate ills demand a speedy cure,
Distrust is cowardice, and prudence folly.
—Samuel Johnson.

Attack is the reaction; I never think I have hit hard unless it rebounds.—Sam'l Johnson.

I have always thought the actions of men the best interpreters of their thoughts.—Locke.

Deliberate with caution, but act with decision; and yield with graciousness, or oppose with firmness.—Colton.

The firefly only shines when on the wing; so is it with the mind; when once we rest, we darken.—Bailey.

Men's actions to futurity appear but as the events to which they are conjoined do give them consequence.—Joanna Baillie.

It is vain to expect any advantage from our profession of the truth, if we be not sincerely just and honest in our actions.—Archbishop Sharpe.

Thought and theory must precede all action that moves to salutary purposes. Yet action is nobler in itself than either thought or theory.—Wordsworth.

Hast thou not Greek enough to understand thus much: the end of man is an action and not a thought, though it were of the noblest.—Carlyle.

Toil, feel, think, hope. A man is sure to dream enough before he dies without making arrangements for the purpose.—Sterling.

Action is the highest perfection and drawing forth of the utmost power, vigor, and activity of man's nature.—South.

Advise well before you begin, and when you have maturely considered, then act with promptitude.—Sallust.

With devotion's visage,
And pious action, we do sugar o'er
The devil himself. —Shakespeare.

Idlers cannot even find time to be idle, or the industrious to be at leisure. We must always be doing or suffering.—Zimmermann.

We must not stint
Our necessary actions, in the fear
To cope malicious censurers.
—Shakespeare.

Those graceful acts,
Those thousand decencies that daily flow
From all her words and actions.
—Milton.

Our grand business undoubtedly is, not to see what lies dimly at a distance, but to do what lies clearly at hand.—Carlyle.

Prodigious actions may as well be done
By weaver's issue, as by prince's son.
—Dryden.

Theirs not to make reply,
Theirs not to reason why,
Theirs but to do and die.
—Tennyson.

Although men flatter themselves with their great actions, they are not so often the result of a great design as of chance.—La Rochefoucauld.

Every man feels instinctively that all the beautiful sentiments in the world weigh less than a single lovely action.—Lowell.

What is there that you enter upon so favorably as not to repent of the undertaking and the accomplishment of your wish?—Juvenal.

For strong souls,
Live like fire-hearted suns; to spend their strength
In furthest striving action.

—George Eliot.

All our actions take Their hues from the complexion of the heart,
As landscapes their variety from light.
—W. T. Bacon.

Statesman, yet friend to truth! of soul sincere,
In action faithful, and in honour clear;
Who broke no promise, served no private end.
—Pope.

How slow the time to the warm soul, that, in the very instant it forms, would execute a great design!—Thomson.

We should often be ashamed of our very best actions, if the world only saw the motives which caused them.—
La Rochefoucauld.

A contemplative life has more the appearance of a life of piety than any other; but it is the Divine plan to bring faith into activity and exercise.
—Cecil.

I have lived to know that the secret of happiness is never to allow your energies to stagnate.—Adam Clarke.

Life is a short day; but it is a working-day. Activity may lead to evil; but inactivity cannot be led to good.—Hannah More.

Man is an animal that cannot long be left in safety without occupation;
the growth of his fallow nature is apt to run into weeds.—Hillard.

When our souls shall leave this dwelling, the glory of one fair and virtuous action is above all the 'scutch-eons on our tomb, or silken banners over us.—J. Shirley.

Suit the action to the word, the word to the action, with this special observance, that you o'erstep not the modesty of nature.—Shakespeare.

This world is but the vestibule of an immortal life. Every action of our lives touches on some chord that will vibrate in eternity.—Chapin.

There is no secret of the heart which our actions do not disclose.—Molière.

There is no action so slight or so mean but it may be done to a great purpose, and ennobled thereby.—Ruskin.

Deeds always overbalance; and downright practice speaks more plainly than the fairest profession.—South.

No two things differ more than hurry and despatch. Hurry is the mark of a weak mind; despatch of a strong one.—Colton.

Press on! for in the grave there is no work and no device. Press on!
while yet you may.—N. P. Willis.

Let thy mind still be bent, still plotting,
where,
And when, and how thy business may be
done,
Slackness breeds worms; but the sure traveller,
Though he alights sometimes, still goeth on.
—Herbert.

Let us then be up and doing,
With a heart for any fate;
Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labor and to wait.
—Longfellow.

Remember you have not a sinew whose law of strength is not action;
you have not a faculty of body, mind, or soul whose law of improvement is not energy.—E. B. Hall.

There is no action of man in this life which is not the beginning of so long a chain of consequences, as that no human providence is high enough to give us a prospect to the end.—
Thomas of Malmesbury.

To live is not merely to breathe: it is to act; it is to make use of our organs, senses, faculties,—of all those parts of ourselves which give us the feeling of existence.—Rousseau.

The life of man is made up of action and endurance; and life is fruitful in the ratio in which it is laid out in noble action or in patient perseverance.—H. P. Liddon.

Those who labor to make human actions harmonize, find great difficulty in piecing them together; for, in general, they contradict each other.—Montaigne.

It is hard to personate and act a part long; for where Truth is not at the bottom, Nature will always be endeavoring to return, and will peep out and betray herself one time or other.—Tillotson.

Man, being essentially active, must find in activity his joy, as well as his beauty and glory; and labor, like everything else that is good, is its own reward.—Whipple.

Judge not of actions by their mere effect; Dive to the centre, and the cause detect; Great deeds from meanest springs may take their course, And smallest virtues from a mighty source.—Pope.

Let's take the instant by the forward top; for we are old, and on our quickest decrees, the inaudible and noiseless foot of time steals, ere we can effect them.—Shakespeare.

That low man seeks a little thing to do,
Sees it and does it;
This high man, with a great thing to pursue,
Dies ere he knows it.
—Robert Browning.

Rightness expresses of actions, what straightness does of lines; and there can no more be two kinds of right action than there can be two kinds of straight line.—Herbert Spencer.

I do not say the mind gets informed by action, bodily action; but it does get earnestness and strength by it, and that nameless something that gives a man the mastership of his faculties.—Mountford.

Unselfish and noble acts are the most radiant epochs in the biography of souls. When wrought in earliest youth, they lie in the memory of age like the coral islands, green and sunny, amidst the melancholy waste of ocean.—Rev. Dr. Thomas.

It is not to taste sweet things, but to do noble and true things, and vindicate himself under God's heaven as a God-made man, that the poorest son of Adam dimly longs. Show him the way of doing that, the dullest day-drudge kindles into a hero.—Carlyle.

It is good policy to strike while the iron is hot; it is still better to adopt Cromwell's procedure, and make the iron hot by striking. The master-spirit who can rule the storm is great, but he is much greater who can both raise and rule it.—E. L. Magoon.

Do not be afraid because the community teems with excitement. Silence and death are excruciating. The rush of life, the vigor of earnest men, the conflict of realities, invigorate, cleanse, and establish the truth.—Beecher.

All the means of action—the shapeless masses, the materials—lie everywhere about us; what we need is the celestial fire to change the flint into transparent crystal, bright and clear.—Longfellow.

Let us, if we must have great actions, make our own so. All action is of infinite elasticity, and the least admits of being inflated with celestial air, until it eclipses the sun and moon.—Emerson.

What a man knows should find its expression in what he does. The value of superior knowledge is chiefly in that it leads to a performing manhood.—Bovee.

Actions rare and sudden do commonly proceed from fierce necessity, or else from some oblique design, which is ashamed to show itself in the public road.—Sir W. Davenant.

With a double vigilance should we watch our actions, when we reflect that good and bad ones are never childless, and that in both cases the offspring goes beyond the parent,—every good begetting a better, every bad a worse.—Chatfield.

You had that action and counter-action which in the natural and in the political world, from the reciprocal struggle of discordant powers, draws out the harmony of the universe.—Edmund Burke.

Every event that a man would master must be mounted on the run, and no man ever caught the reins of a thought except as it galloped by him.—Holmes.

Indolence is a delightful but distressing state; we must be doing something to be happy. Action is no less necessary than thought to the instinctive tendencies of the human frame.—Hazlitt.

Better that we should err in action than wholly refuse to perform. The storm is so much better than the calm, as it declares the presence of a living principle. Stagnation is something worse than death. It is corruption also.—Simms.

To do an evil action is base; to do a good action, without incurring danger, is common enough; but it is the part of a good man to do great and noble deeds, though he risks everything.—Plutarch.

Action hangs, as it were, "dissolved" in speech, in thoughts whereof speech is the shadow; and precipitates itself therefrom. The kind of speech in a man betokens the kind of action you will get from him.—Carlyle.

If you think you can temper yourself into manliness by sitting there over your books, it is the very silliest fancy that ever tempted a young man to his ruin. You cannot dream yourself into a character: you must hammer and forge yourself one.—Froude.

The activity of the young is like that of rail cars in motion,—they tear along with noise and turmoil, and leave peace behind them. The quietest nooks, invaded by them, lose their quietude as they pass, and recover it only on their departure. Time's best gift to us is serenity.—Bovee.

"There is nothing so terrible as activity without insight," says Goethe "I would open every one of Argus' hundred eyes before I used one of Briareus' hundred hands," says Lord Bacon. "Look before you leap," says John Smith, all over the world.—Whipple.

Allowing the performance of an honorable action to be attended with labor, the labor is soon over, but the honor is immortal; whereas, should even pleasure wait on the commission of what is dishonorable, the pleasure is soon gone, but the dishonor is eternal.—John Stewart.

A slender acquaintance with the world must convince every man that actions, not words, are the true criterion of the attachment of friends; and that the most liberal professions of good-will are very far from being the surest marks of it.—George Washington.

Man is born for action; he ought to do something. Work, at each step, awakens a sleeping force and roots out error. Who does nothing, knows nothing. Rise! to work! If thy knowledge is real, employ it; wrestle with nature; test the strength of thy theories; see if they will support the trial; act!—Aloysius.

Not alone to know, but to act according to thy knowledge, is thy destination,—proclaims the voice of my inmost soul. Not for indolent contemplation and study of thyself, nor for brooding over emotions of piety,—no, for action was existence given thee; thy actions, and thy actions alone, determine thy worth.—Fichte.

Act! the wise are known by their actions; fame and immortality are ever their attendants. Mark with deeds the vanishing traces of swift-rolling time. Let us make happy the circle around us,—be useful as much as we may. For that fills up with soft rapture, that dissolves the dark clouds of the day!—Salis.

Words are good, but there is something better. The best is not to be explained by words. The spirit in which we act is the chief matter. Action can only be understood and represented by the spirit. No one knows what he is doing while he is acting rightly, but of what is wrong we are always conscious.—Goethe.

Newton's great generalization, which he called the "third law of motion," was that "Action and reaction are always equal to each other;" and that law has been one of the most pregnant of all truths about the mystery of force,—one of the brightest windows through which modern eyes have looked into the world of Nature.—Phillips Brooks.

Wouldst thou know the lawfulness of the action which thou desirest to undertake, let thy devotion recommend it to Divine blessing: if it be lawful, thou shalt perceive thy heart encouraged by thy prayer; if unlawful, thou shalt find thy prayer discouraged by thy heart. That action is not warrantable which either blushes to beg a blessing, or, having succeeded, dares not present a thanksgiving.—Quarles.

The only things in which we can be said to have any property are our actions. Our thoughts may be bad, yet produce no poison; they may be good, yet produce no fruit. Our riches may be taken away by misfortune, our reputation by malice, our spirits by calamity, our health by disease, our friends by death. But our actions must follow us beyond the grave; with respect to them alone, we cannot say that we shall carry nothing with us when we die, neither that we shall go naked out of the world.—Colton.

There are three sorts of actions: those that are good, those that are bad, and those that are doubtful; and we ought to be most cautious of those that are doubtful; for we are in most danger of these doubtful actions, because they do not alarm us; and yet they insensibly lead to greater transgressions, just as the shades of twilight gradually reconcile us to darkness.—A. Reed.

Not enjoyment, and not sorrow,
Is our destined end or way;
But to act, that each to-morrow
Finds us farther than to-day.

Trust no Future, howe'er pleasant!
Let the dead Past bury its dead!
Act, act, in the living Present!
Heart within, and God o'erhead!
—Longfellow.

There is no word or action but may be taken with two hands,—either with the right hand of charitable construction, or the sinister interpretation of malice and suspicion; and all things do succeed as they are taken. To construe an evil action well is but a pleasing and profitable deceit to myself; but to misconstrue a good thing is a treble wrong,—to myself, the action, and the author.—Bishop Hall.

Acuteness

The keen spirit
Seizes the prompt occasion—makes the thought
Start into instant action, and at once
Plans and performs, resolves and executes.
—Hannah More.

Adam

Adam, the goodliest man of men since born
His sons, the fairest of her daughters Eve.
—Milton.

Adaptation

To wade in marshes and sea margins is the destiny of certain birds, and they are so accurately made for this that they are imprisoned in those places. Each animal out of its habitat would starve. To the physician, each man, each woman, is an amplification of one organ. A soldier, a locksmith, a bank-clerk, and a dancer could not exchange functions. And thus we are victims of adaptation.—Emerson.

Address

Address makes opportunities; the want of it gives them.—Bovee.

Brahmā once asked of Force, "Who is stronger than thou?" She replied, "Address."—Victor Hugo.

Give a boy address and accomplishments, and you give him the mastery of palaces and fortunes where he goes. He has not the trouble of earning or owning them; they solicit him to enter and possess.—Emerson.

A man who knows the world will not only make the most of everything he does know, but of many things that he does not know; and will gain more credit by his adroit mode of hiding his ignorance than the pedant by his awkward attempt to exhibit his erudition.—Colton.

There is a certain artificial polish, a commonplace vivacity acquired by perpetually mingling in the beau monde, which, in the commerce of the world, supplies the place of natural suavity and good-humor, but is purchased at the expense of all original and sterling traits of character.—Washington Irving.

Adieu

I take a long, last, lingering view;
Adieu! my native land, adieu!

—Logan.

Adieu, adieu! my native shore
Fades o'er the waters blue.

—Byron.

Admiration

Fools admire, but men of sense approve.—Pope.

Distance is a great promoter of admiration!—Diderot.

Few men are admired by their servants.—Montaigne.

Admiration is the basis of ignorance.—Balthasar Gracian.

Season your admiration for awhile.
—Shakespeare.

Admiration and familiarity are strangers.—George Sand.

We live by admiration, hope, and love.—Wordsworth.

For her own person, it begged all description.—Shakespeare.

Admiration begins where acquaintance ceases.—Dr. Johnson.

None knew thee but to love thee, nor named thee but to praise.—Fitz-Greene Halleck.

Admiration is a youthful fancy which scarcely ever survives to mature years.—H. W. Shaw.

All things are admired either because they are new or because they are great.—Bacon.

We always love those who admire us, and we do not always love those whom we admire.—La Rochefoucauld.

The king himself has follow'd her,
When she has walk'd before.
—Goldsmith.

There is a long and wearisome step between admiration and imitation.—Richter.

Those who are formed to win general admiration are seldom calculated to bestow individual happiness.—Lady Blessington.

When we view elevated ideas of Nature, the result of that view is admiration, which is always the cause of pleasure.—Dryden.

Amid the most mercenary ages it is but a secondary sort of admiration that is bestowed upon magnificence.—Shenstone.

That which astonishes, astonishes once; but whatever is admirable becomes more and more admired.—Joubert.

No nobler feeling than this of admiration for one higher than himself dwells in the breast of man.—Carlyle.

Not to be lost in idle admiration is the only sure means of making and of preserving happiness.—Horace.

Admiration is a forced tribute; and to extort it from mankind, envious and ignorant as they are, they must be taken unawares.—James Northcote.

The beauty that addresses itself to the eyes is only the spell of the moment: the eye of the body is not always that of the soul.—George Sand.

Admiration must be continued by that novelty which first produces it; and how much soever is given, there must always be reason to imagine that more remains.—Johnson.

To cultivate sympathy you must be among living creatures, and thinking about them; and to cultivate admiration, you must be among beautiful things and looking at them.—Ruskin.

It may be laid down as a general rule, that no woman who hath any great pretensions to admiration is ever well pleased in a company where she perceives herself to fill only the second place.—Fielding.

The love of admiration leads to fraud, much more than the love of commendation; but, on the other hand, the latter is much more likely to spoil our good actions by the substitution of an inferior motive.—Bishop Whately.

It is better in some respects to be admired by those with whom you live, than to be loved by them; and this not on account of any gratification of vanity, but because admiration is so much more tolerant than love.—Arthur Helps.

Admiration is a very short-lived passion, that immediately decays upon growing familiar with its object, unless it be still fed with such discoveries, and kept alive by a new perpetual succession of miracles rising up to its view.—Addison.

There is a wide difference between admiration and love. The sublime, which is the cause of the former, always dwells on great objects and terrible; the latter on small ones and pleasing; we submit to what we admire, but we love what submits to us: in one case we are forced, in the other we are flattered, into compliance.—Burke.

Admonition

It must descend, as the dew, upon the tender herb, or like melting flakes of snow; the softer it falls, the longer it dwells upon, and the deeper it sinks into the mind.—Seed.

Adoption

Faith unites us to Christ, and acquiesces in the redemption purchased by Him as the meritorious cause of our adoption.—Fisher's Catechism.

'Tis often seen
Adoption strives with nature; and choice breeds
A native slip to us from foreign lands.
—Shakespeare.

Adoption is an act of God's free grace, whereby we are received into the number, and have a right to all the privileges of the sons of God.—Westminster Catechism.

We need a spirit of adoption to take us out of the foundling hospital of the world, and to put us into the celestial family.—G. D. Boardman.

Adore

Adored through fear, strong only to destroy.
—Cowper.

We bear it calmly, though a ponderous woe,
And still adore the hand that gives the blow.
—Pomfret.

Led like a victim, to my death I'll go,
And, dying, bless the hand that gave the blow.
—Dryden.

Adorn

She came adorned hither like sweet May.
—Shakespeare.

Th' adorning thee with so much art
Is but a barbarous skill;
'Tis like the poisoning of a dart,
Too apt before to kill.
—Cowley.

A poet, naturalist and historian, who scarcely left any style of writing untouched and touched nothing that he did not adorn.—Dr. Johnson.

Advent

The night is far spent, the day is at hand.—Bible.

Be ye therefore ready also: for the Son of man cometh at an hour when ye think not.—Bible.

I die in the faith of the speedy accomplishment of those glorious things which are spoken concerning the city of God and of the kingdom of Christ. "Amen. Even so, Lord Jesus! Come quickly."—Increase Mather.

What, then, is meant by the coming of the Lord Jesus? In answering it, the heart and mind must be exercised. First of all, the King of Zion is sometimes spoken of as coming in His grace, in His spirit, not in a visible way. He had promised "to come" to all believers in spirit to comfort them.—John Hall, D.D.

Great God, what do I see and hear!

The end of things created!

The Judge of mankind doth appear

On clouds of glory seated!

The trumpet sounds; the graves restore

The dead which they contained before;

Prepare, my soul, to meet Him!

—Martin Luther.

It is a very remarkable fact, that God's prophecies respecting the Advent of His Son seem to have spread athwart the whole habitable globe, and in the shape of traditional echoes to have been dispersed over all the world. The great promise of a Messiah, which was the grand truth that the Jew clung to in his most desperate fortunes, found itself translated into heathen tongues, and accepted even by heathen men.—French.

If I were but sure that I should live to see the coming of the Lord, it would be the joyfulest tidings in the world. O that I might see His kingdom come! It is the characteristic of His saints to love His appearing, and to look for that blessed hope. "The Spirit and the bride say, Come." "Even so, come, Lord Jesus."—Richard Baxter.

There is a time appointed in the history of our world, when that very

Jesus who appeared on earth, "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief," shall reappear with all the circumstances of majesty and power, "King of kings and Lord of lords." We are led to expect a day when Christ shall find a home in the remotest hearts and families, and the earth in all its circumference be covered with the knowledge and the power of the Lord.—H. Melville, D.D.

But though that great day is far away, the heart asserts, and truly, that when there is deepest night over nations and the world and men, a day of the Lord is at hand; that a dawn is coming—not the last day nor the final dawn, but the uprising of Christ in light, deliverance, knowledge and love. The belief is born not only out of our natural hatred of evil and suffering and the desire to be free, but out of actual experience.

Earth, thou grain of sand on the shore of the Universe of God; thou Bethlehem, amongst the princely cities of the heavens; thou art, and remainest, the Loved One amongst ten thousand suns and worlds, the Chosen of God! Thee will He again visit, and then thou wilt prepare a throne for Him, as thou gavest Him a manger cradle; in His radiant glory wilt thou rejoice, as thou didst once drink His blood and tears, and mourn His death! On thee has the Lord a great work to complete.—Pressel.

There is an account come of the arrival of King George II. and a great rejoicing for it in Edinburgh. I see the fires and illuminations of that city reflected on the skies. O, how will the heavens reflect and shine with illuminations, when the King of kings, and Lord of lords, shall erect His tribunal in the clouds, and come in His own glory, and His Father's glory, and in the glory of the holy angels! O, what a heartsome day will that be! When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall we appear with Him in glory. We shall then lift up our heads with joy, because it shall be a time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord.—Ebenezer Erskine.

The last words of the pious Henry Holmes, of Boston, were, "Lord Jesus, come quickly." In their primary sense, as referring to Christ's personal and glorious advent, these words have often dropped from the lips and pens of earnest believers. In a somewhat desponding mood, Martin Luther broke out, "May the Lord Jesus come at once! Let Him cut the whole matter short with the Day of Judgment; for there is no amendment to be expected." The martyr Ridley wrote: "The world, without doubt—this I do believe, and therefore say it—draws toward an end. Let us, with John, the servant of God, cry in our hearts unto our Savior, Christ, 'Come, Lord Jesus, come.'"—Dr. A. C. Thompson.

No man rightly desires Christ's coming, but he that hath assurance of benefit at His coming. To him the day of Christ is as the day of harvest to the husbandman; as the day of deliverance to the prisoner; as the day of coronation to the king; the day of wedlock to the bride; a day of triumph and exultation, a day of freedom and consolation, a day of rest and satisfaction. To him the Lord Jesus is all sweetness, as wine to the palate, and ointment to the nostrils, saith Solomon; honey to the mouth, saith St. Bernard; music in the ear, and a jubilee in the heart. Get assurance of Christ's coming, as a ransom to redeem you, as a conqueror to subdue all your enemies under you, as a friend to comfort you, as a bridegroom to marry you, and then shall you with boldness and confidence, with joy and gladness, with vehement and holy longings, say, "Come, Lord Jesus."—Grosse.

Adventure

Some bold adventurers disdain
The limits of their little reign,
And unknown regions dare descry.
—Gray.

* * * and now expecting Each hour their great adventurer, from the search
Of foreign worlds. —Milton.

Adversary

Oh that mine adversary had written a book.—Job.

And do as adversaries do in law:
Strive mightily, but eat and drink as friends. —Shakespeare.

Adversity

He that has no cross deserves no crown.—Quarles.

Adversity is the first path to truth.
—Byron.

Remember to be calm in adversity.
—Horace.

Adversity's sweet milk, philosophy.

There is healing in the bitter cup.
—Southey.

There is no education like adversity.—Beaconsfield.

Adversity reminds men of religion.
—Livy.

Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth.—Hebrews.

'The fire of my adversity has purged
the mass of my acquaintance.—Boling-broke.

Afflictions are but conductors to immortal life and glory.—Aughey.

Brave men ought not to be cast down by adversity.—Silius Italicus.

Adversity makes men, and prosperity makes monsters.—Victor Hugo.

If thou faint in the day of adversity, thy strength is small.—Proverbs.

Adversity borrows its sharpest sting from our impatience.—Bishop Horne.

In adversity and difficulties arm yourself with firmness and fortitude.
—From the Latin.

Great men rejoice in adversity just as brave soldiers triumph in war.—
Seneca.

God's corrections are our instructions; His lashes our lessons, and His scourges our schoolmasters.—Aughey

As adversity leads us to think properly of our state, it is most beneficial to us.—Johnson.

It is not affliction itself, but affliction rightly borne, that does us good.—Aughey.

God brings men into deep waters, not to drown them, but to cleanse them.—Aughey.

God strikes not as an enemy, to destroy; but as a father, to correct.—Aughey.

He that has never known adversity is but half acquainted with others or himself.—Aughey.

In the adversity of our best friends we often find something which does not displease us.—Rochevoucauld.

Little minds are tamed and subdued by misfortunes; but great minds rise above them.—Washington Irving.

Adversity, which makes us indulgent to others, renders them severe towards us.—J. Petit-Senn.

The Good are better made by Ill,
As odors crushed are sweeter still.
—Sam'l Roger.

Then know, that I have little wealth to lose;
A man I am cross'd with adversity.
—Shakespeare.

'Tis good for men to love their present
pains
Upon example; so the spirit is eased.
—Shakespeare.

In this wild world the fondest and the best
Are the most tried, most troubled and distress'd.
—Crabbe.

In all cases of heart-ache, the application of another man's disappointment draws out the pain and allays the irritation.—Lytton.

Heaven oft in mercy smites, even when the blow severest is.—Joanna Baillie.

Know how sublime a thing it is to suffer and be strong.—Longfellow.

Much dearer be the things which come through hard distress.—Spenser.

Prosperity is no just scale; adversity is the only balance to weigh friends.—Plutarch.

Through danger safety comes—through trouble rest.—John Marston.

In the wounds our sufferings plough immortal love sows sovereign seed.—
Massey.

Half the ills we hoard within our hearts are ills because we hoard them.
—Barry Cornwall.

A noble heart, like the sun, showeth its greatest countenance in its lowest estate.—Sir P. Sidney.

Let me embrace these sour adversities, for wise men say it is the wisest course.—Shakespeare.

He that has never known adversity is but half acquainted with others, or with himself.—Colton.

Clouds are the veil behind which the face of day coquettishly hides itself, to enhance its beauty.—Richter.

Prosperity is a great teacher; adversity is a greater. Possession pampers the mind; privation trains and strengthens it.—Hazlitt.

The winter's frost must rend the burr of the nut before the fruit is seen. So adversity tempers the human heart, to discover its real worth.—
Balzac.

The most affluent may be stripped of all, and find his worldly comforts, like so many withered leaves, dropping from him.—Sterne.

Those who have suffered much are like those who know many languages; they have learned to understand and be understood by all.—Madame Swetchine.

Adversity is the trial of principle.
Without it a man hardly knows whether he is honest or not.—Fielding

Mr. Bettenham said that virtuous men were like some herbs and spices, that give not out their sweet smell till they be broken or crushed.—Bacon.

On every thorn delightful wisdom grows;
In every rill a sweet instruction flows.
—Dr. Young.

Heaven is not always angry when he strikes,
But most chastises those whom most he likes.
—Pomfret.

In the day of prosperity we have many refuges to resort to; in the day of adversity only one.—Horatius Bonar.

Constant success shows us but one side of the world; adversity brings out the reverse of the picture.—Colton.

Adversity has the effect of eliciting talents, which, in prosperous circumstances, would have lain dormant.—Horace.

It is easy in adversity to despise death; he has real fortitude who dares to live and be wretched.—Mar-tial.

When reduced by adversity, a man forgets the lofty tone and supercilious language of prosperity.

It is noble and so regarded both among nations and individuals to keep faith in adversity.—Silius Italicus.

Adversity is sometimes hard upon a man; but for one man who can stand prosperity, there are a hundred that will stand adversity.—Carlyle.

As every mercy is a drop obtained from the ocean of God's goodness, so every affliction is a drachm weighed out in the wisdom of God's providence.—Aughey.

Adversity tries men, and virtue strives for glory through adverse circumstances, undeterred by hard obstacles.—Silius Italicus.

The brightest crowns that are worn in heaven have been tried and smelted and polished and glorified through the furnace of tribulation.—Chapin.

As the ant does not wend her way to empty barns, so few friends will be found to haunt the place of departed wealth.

Adversity, sage useful guest,
Severe instructor, but the best,
It is from thee alone we know
Justly to value things below.
—Somerville.

Sweet are the uses of adversity;
Which, like the toad, ugly and venomous,
Wears yet a precious jewel in his head.
—Shakespeare.

His overthrow heap'd happiness upon him;
For then, and not till then, he felt himself,
And found the blessedness of being little.
—Shakespeare.

The firmest friendships have been formed in mutual adversity, as iron is most strongly welded by the fiercest fire.

Thou tamer of the human breast,
Whose iron scourge and tort'ring hour
The bad affright, afflict the best!—Gray.

Love is maintain'd by wealth: when all is spent,
Adversity then breeds the discontent.
—Herrick.

Remember that there is nothing stable in human affairs; therefore avoid undue elation in prosperity, or undue depression in adversity.—Isocrates.

By adversity are wrought the greatest works of admiration, and all the fair examples of renown, out of distress and misery are grown.—Daniel.

Affliction is the wholesome soil of virtue, where patience, honor, sweet humanity, calm fortitude, take root and strongly flourish.—Mallet.

In adversity be spirited and firm, and with equal prudence lessen your sail when filled with a too fortunate gale of prosperity.—Horace.

Affliction is the good man's shining scene; prosperity conceals his brightest rays; as night to stars, woe lustre gives to man.—Young.

Genuine morality is preserved only in the school of adversity, and a state of continuous prosperity may easily prove a quicksand to virtue.—Schiller.

Adversity has ever been considered as the state in which a man most easily becomes acquainted with himself, particularly being free from flatterers.—Johnson.

Prosperity is too apt to prevent us from examining our conduct, but as adversity leads us to think properly of our state, it is most beneficial to us.—Johnson.

It is often better to have a great deal of harm happen to one than a little; a great deal may rouse you to remove what a little will only accustom you to endure.—Greville.

Our dependence upon God ought to be so entire and absolute that we should never think it necessary, in any kind of distress, to have recourse to human consolations.—Thomas à Kempis.

God kills thy comforts from no other design but to kill thy corruptions; wants are ordained to kill wantonness, poverty is appointed to kill pride, reproaches are permitted to destroy ambition.—John Flavel.

There is strength deep-bedded in our hearts, of which we reck but little till the shafts of heaven have pierced its fragile dwelling. Must not earth be rent before her gems are found?—Mrs. Hemans.

He that can heroically endure adversity will bear prosperity with equal greatness of soul; for the mind that cannot be dejected by the former is not likely to be transported with the latter.—Fielding.

The truly great and good, in affliction, bear a countenance more princely than they are wont; for it is the temper of the highest hearts, like the palm-tree, to strive most upwards when it is most burdened.—Sir P. Sidney.

Men think God is destroying them because he is tuning them. The violinist screws up the key till the tense cord sounds the concert pitch; but it is not to break it, but to use it tune-fully, that he stretches the string upon the musical rack.—Beecher.

Prosperity is the blessing of the Old Testament, adversity is the blessing of the New, which carrieth the greater benediction, and the clearer revelation of God's favor.—Bacon.

Such a house broke!
So noble a master fallen! All gone and not
One friend to take his fortune by the arm
And go along with him. —Shakespeare.

Adversity, if for no other reason, is of benefit, since it is sure to bring a season of sober reflection. Men see clearer at such time. Storms purify the atmosphere.—Beecher.

Aromatic plants bestow
No spicy fragrance while they grow;
But crush'd or trodden to the ground.
Diffuse their balmy sweets around.
—Goldsmith.

When Providence, for secret ends
Corroding cares, or sharp affliction, sends
We must conclude it best it should be so.
And not desponding or impatient grow.
—Pomfret.

A wretched soul, bruin'd with adversity
We bid be quiet when we hear it cry;
But were we burden'd with like weight of pair,
As much, or more, we should ourselves complain. —Shakespeare.

All is well as long as the sun shines and the fair breath of heaven gently wafts us to our own purpose;
but if you will try the excellency and feel the work of faith, place the man in a persecution.—Jeremy Taylor.

Bold adversity
Cries out for noble York and Somerset,
To beat assailing death from his weak legions.
And whiles the honorable captain there Drops bloody sweat from his war-wearied limbs. —Shakespeare.

If adversity hath killed his thousands, prosperity hath killed his ten thousands; therefore adversity is to be preferred. The one deceives, the other instructs; the one miserably

happy, the other happily miserable.—Burton.

Times of great calamity and confusion have ever been productive of the greatest minds. The purest ore is produced from the hottest furnace, and the brightest thunderbolt is elicited from the darkest storm.—Colton.

As the flint contains the spark, unknown to itself, which the steel alone can awaken to life, so adversity often reveals to us hidden gems, which prosperity or negligence would forever have hidden.—H. W. Shaw.

Adversity is a medicine which people are rather fond of recommending indiscriminately as a panacea for their neighbors. Like other medicines, it only agrees with certain constitutions. There are nerves which it braces, and nerves which it utterly shatters.—Justin McCarthy.

The gods in bounty work up storms about us, that give mankind occasion to exert their hidden strength, and throw out into practice virtues that shun the day, and lie concealed in the smooth seasons and the calms of life.—Addison.

One month in the school of affliction will teach thee more than the great precepts of Aristotle in seven years; for thou canst never judge rightly of human affairs, unless thou hast first felt the blows, and found out the deceptions of fortune.—Fuller.

The willow which bends to the tempest often escapes better than the oak, which resists it; and so, in great calamities, it sometimes happens that light and frivolous spirits recover their elasticity and presence of mind sooner than those of a loftier character.—Walter Scott.

There are minerals called hydropathous, which are not transparent till they are immersed in water, when they become so; as the hydropthane, a variety of opal. So it is with many a Christian. Till the floods of adversity have been poured over him, his character appears marred and clouded by selfishness and worldly influences. But trials clear away the obscurity, and give distinctness and beauty to his piety.—Professor Hitchcock.

The lessons of adversity are often the most benignant when they seem the most severe. The depression of vanity sometimes ennobs the feeling. The mind which does not wholly sink under misfortune rises above it more lofty than before, and is strengthened by affliction.—Chenevix.

And these vicissitudes come best in youth;
For when they happen at a riper age,
People are apt to blame the Fates, forsooth.
And wonder Providence is not more sage.
Adversity is the first path to truth:

He who hath proved war, storm or woman's rage,
Whether his winters be eighteen or eighty,
Has won the experience which is deem'd so weighty. —Byron.

The wisdom of God appears in afflictions. By these He separates the sin which He hates, from the son whom He loves. By these thorns He keeps him from breaking over into Satan's pleasant pastures, which would fatten him indeed, but only to the slaughter.—Aughey.

Present suffering is not enjoyable, but life would be worth little without it. The difference between iron and steel is fire, but steel is worth all its costs. Iron ore may think itself senselessly tortured in the furnace, but when the watch-spring looks back, it knows better. David enjoyed pain and trouble no more than we do, but the time came when he admitted that they had been good for him. Though the aspect of suffering is hard, the prospect is hopeful, and the retrospect will start a song, if we are "the called according to his purpose," in suffering.—Maltbie Babcock.

Advertisements

The great art in writing advertisements is the finding out a proper method to catch the reader's eye; without, a good thing may pass over unobserved, or be lost among commissions of bankrupt.—Addison.

The advertisements in a newspaper are more full of knowledge in respect to what is going on in a State or community than the editorial columns are.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Advice

The worst men often give the best advice.—Bailey.

Necessity is the only successful adviser.—Charles Reade.

Agreeable advice is seldom useful advice.—Massillon.

We ask advice, but we mean approbation.—Colton.

Good counsels observed are chains to grace.—Fuller.

Good counsel has no price.—Mazzini.

Many receive advice, only the wise profit by it.—Publius Syrus.

Men give away nothing so liberally as their advice.—Rochefoucauld.

We give advice, but we do not inspire conduct.—La Rochefoucauld.

Do not take a blind guide nor a bad adviser.

Bad advice is often most fatal to the adviser.—Flaccus.

A fop sometimes gives important advice.—Boileau.

Hazard not your wealth on a poor man's advice.—Manuel Conde Lucanor.

Whatever advice you give, be short.—Horace.

One can advise comfortably from a safe port.—Schiller.

Superfluous advice is not retained by the full mind.—Horace.

We give advice by the bucket, but take it by the grain.—W. R. Alger.

It is not advice, but approval, which we crave.—Boufflers.

The greatest trust between man and man is the trust of giving counsel.—Bacon.

He who was taught only by himself had a fool for a master.—Ben Jonson.

We all, when we are well, give good advice to the sick.—Terence.

To attempt to advise conceited people is like whistling against the wind.—Hood.

If you would convince a person of his mistake, accost him not when he is ruffled.—Dr. Watts.

Downright admonition, as a rule, is too blunt for the recipient.—Beecher.

I do not like giving advice: it is incurring an unnecessary responsibility.—Beaconsfield.

Advice is like kissing: it costs nothing and is a pleasant thing to do.—H. W. Shaw.

Before giving advice we must have secured its acceptance, or, rather, have made it desired.—Amiel.

Any one can give advice, such as it is, but only a wise man knows how to profit by it.—Colton.

When a wise man gives thee better counsel, give me mine again.—Shakespeare.

Begin nothing without considering what the end may be.—Lady M. W. Montague.

Advice is seldom welcome. Those who need it most like it least.—Johnson.

He who can take advice is sometimes superior to him who can give it.—Von Knebel.

Advice is seldom welcome; and those who want it the most always like it the least.—Chesterfield.

Even the ablest pilots are willing to receive advice from passengers in tempestuous weather.—Cicero.

Know when to speak, for many times it brings Danger to give the best advice to kings.
—Herrick.

Do not give to thy friends the most agreeable counsels, but the most advantageous.—Tuckerman.

How is it that even castaways can give such good advice?—Ninon de Lenclos.

Admonish your friends privately, but praise them openly.—Publius Syrus.

The greatest trust between man and man is the trust of giving counsel.—Bacon.

Wait for the season when to cast good counsels upon subsiding passion.—Shakespeare.

Mishaps are mastered by advice discreet, and counsel mitigates the greatest smart.—Spenser.

Let no man value at a little price a virtuous woman's counsel.—George Chapman.

The pride of men will not often suffer reason to have any scope until it can be no longer of service.—Burke.

Let no man presume to give advice to others that has not first given good counsel to himself.—Seneca.

How is it possible to expect that mankind will take advice when they will not so much as take warning.—Swift.

Those who give bad advice to the prudent, both lose their pains and are laughed to scorn.—Phædrus.

Every man, however wise, requires the advice of some sagacious friend in the affairs of life.—Plautus.

Harsh counsels have no effect; they are like hammers which are always repulsed by the anvil.—Helvetius.

He had only one vanity; he thought he could give advice better than any other person.—Samuel L. Clemens.

And may you better reckon the rede,
Than ever did th' adviser. —Burns.

'Twas good advice, and meant,
"My son, be good."
—George Crabbe.

Bosom up my counsel,
You'll find it wholesome.
—Shakespeare.

Be niggards of advice on no pretense;
For the worst avarice is that of sense.
—Pope.

For women with a mischief to their kind
Pervert with bad advice our better mind.
—Dryden.

Here comes a man of comfort, whose advice
Hath often still'd my brawling discontent.
—Shakespeare.

It is always safe to learn even from our enemies, seldom safe to instruct even our friends.—Colton.

Advice is like snow: the softer it falls, the longer it dwells upon, and the deeper it sinks into, the mind.—Coleridge.

I pray thee cease thy counsel,
Which falls into mine ears as profitless
As water in a sieve. —Shakespeare.

Who will ever give counsel, if the counsel be judged by the event, and if it be not found wise, shall therefore be thought wicked?—Sir P. Sidney.

Remember this: they that will not be counselled cannot be helped. If you do not hear Reason, she will rap your knuckles.—Franklin.

There is nearly as much ability requisite to know how to profit by good advice as to know how to act for one's self.—Rochefoucauld.

It has been well observed that few are better qualified to give others advice than those who have taken the least of it themselves.—Goldsmith.

Counsel and conversation is a good second education, that improves all the virtue and corrects all the vice of the former, and of nature itself.—Clarendon.

Let no man value at a little price
A virtuous woman's counsel; her wing'd spirit
Is feather'd oftentimes with heavenly words. —George Chapman.

In order to convince it is necessary to speak with spirit and wit; to advise, it must come from the heart.—D'Aguesseau.

When we feel a strong desire to thrust our advice upon others, it is usually because we suspect their weakness; but we ought rather to suspect our own.—Colton.

Ah, gentle dames! it gars me greet,
To think how many counsels sweet,
How many lengthened, sage advices,
The husband frae the wife despises.
—Burns.

Direct not him, whose way himself will choose;
'Tis breath thou lack'st, and that breath
wilt thou lose. —Shakespeare.

I forget whether advice be among the lost things which Ariosto says are to be found in the moon: that and time ought to have been there.—Swift.

She had a good opinion of advice,
Like all who give and eke receive it gratis,
For which small thanks are still the market
price,
Even when the article at highest rate is.
—Shakespeare.

Advice, as it always gives a temporary appearance of superiority, can never be very grateful, even when it is most necessary or most judicious; but, for the same reason, every one is eager to instruct his neighbors.—Johnson.

He who calls in the aid of an equal understanding doubles his own; and he who profits by a superior understanding raises his powers to a level with the height of the superior understanding he unites with.—Burke.

Vanity is so frequently the apparent motive of advice, that we, for the most part, summon our powers to oppose it without any very accurate inquiry whether it is right.—Dr. Johnson.

There is nothing of which men are more liberal than their good advice, be their stock of it ever so small; because it seems to carry in it an intimation of their own influence, importance, or worth.—Young.

He that gives good advice builds with one hand; he that gives good counsel and example builds with the other; but he that gives good admonition and bad example builds with one hand and pulls down with the other.—Bacon.

No man is so foolish but he may give another good counsel sometimes, and no man so wise but he may easily err, if he takes no other counsel than his own. He that was taught only by himself had a fool for a master.—Ben Jonson.

A man takes contradiction and advice much more easily than people think, only he will not bear it when violently given, even though it be well founded. Hearts are flowers; they remain open to the softly falling dew, but shut up in the violent downpour of rain.—Richter.

There is as much difference between the counsel that a friend giveth and that a man giveth himself, as there is between the counsel of a friend and of a flatterer; for there is no such flatterer as a man's self, and there is no such remedy against flattery of a man's self as the liberty of a friend.—Bacon.

No one was ever the better for advice: in general, what we called giving advice was properly taking an occasion to show our own wisdom at another's expense; and to receive advice was little better than tamely to afford another the occasion of raising himself a character from our defects.—Lord Shaftesbury.

If to do were as easy as to know what were good to do, chapels had been churches, and poor men's cottages, princes' palaces. It is a good divine that follows his own instructions: I can easier teach twenty what were good to be done, than be one of the twenty to follow mine own teaching.—Shakespeare.

Love all, trust a few,
Do wrong to none; be able for thine enemy Rather in power than use; and keep thy friend
Under thine own life's key; be checked for silence,
But never taxed for speech.

—Shakespeare.

It was the maxim, I think, of Alphonsus of Aragon, that dead counsellors are safest. The grave puts an end to flattery and artifice, and the information we receive from books is pure from interest, fear, and ambition. Dead counsellors are likewise most instructive, because they are heard with patience and with reverence.—Johnson.

Give thy thoughts no tongue,
Nor any unproportioned thought his act.
Be thou familiar, but by no means vulgar.
The friends thou hast, and their adoption tried,
Grapple them to thy soul with hooks of steel;
But do not dull thy palm with entertainment
Of each new-hatched, unfledged comrade.
Beware
Of entrance to a quarrel; but, being in,
Bear it that the opposer may beware of thee;
Give every man thine ear, but few thy voice.
Take each man's censure, but reserve thy judgment.
Costly thy habit as thy purse can buy,
But not expressed in fancy; rich, not gaudy;
For the apparel oft proclaims the man.
Neither a borrower nor a lender be,
For loan oft loses both itself and friend;
And borrowing dulls the edge of husbandry.
This above all: To thine own self be true;
And it must follow, as the night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man.
—Shakespeare.

It would truly be a fine thing if men suffered themselves to be guided by reason, that they should acquiesce in the true remonstrances addressed to them by the writings of the learned and the advice of friends. But the greater part are so disposed that the words which enter by one ear do incontinently go out of the other, and begin again by following the custom. The best teacher one can have is necessity.—Francois la Nöne.

I lay very little stress either upon asking or giving advice. Generally speaking, they who ask advice know what they wish to do, and remain firm to their intentions. A man may allow himself to be enlightened on various points, even upon matters of expediency and duty; but, after all, he must determine his course of action for himself.—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

Advice is offensive, not because it lays us open to unexpected regret, or convicts us of any fault which has escaped our notice, but because it shows us that we are known to others as well as ourselves; and the officious monitor is persecuted with hatred, not because his accusation is false, but because he assumes the superiority which we are not willing to grant him, and has dared to detect what we desire to conceal.—Johnson

Affectation

Affectation is the product of falsehood.—Carlyle.

There is a pleasure in affecting affectation.—Lamb.

Die of a rose in aromatic pain.—Popè.

Affectation hides three times as many virtues as charity does sins.—Horace Mann.

Affectation is a greater enemy to the face than the small-pox.—St. Evremond.

All affectation is the vain and ridiculous attempt of poverty to appear rich.—Lavater.

Affectation is as necessary to the mind as dress is to the body.—Hazlitt.

Great affectation and great absence of it are at first sight very similar.—Whately.

On the rich quilt sinks with becoming woe,
Wrapt in a gown, for sickness and for show.—Pope.

We are never so ridiculous from the habits we have as from those we affect to have.—La Rochefoucauld.

There affectation, with a sickly mien,
Shows in her cheek the roses of eighteen.—Pope.

By giving sixty-five's pale wither'd mien,
The blooming roses of sixteen.—Wolcot.

All affectation; 'tis my perfect scorn;
Object of my implacable disgust.—Cowper.

Affectation discovers sooner what one is than it makes known what one would fain appear to be.—Stanislaus.

Affectation is the wisdom of fools, and the folly of many a comparatively wise man.

'Tis too much proved that with devotion's visage and pious action we do sugar o'er the devil himself.—Shakespeare.

Hearts may be attracted by assumed qualities, but the affections are only to be fixed by those that are real.—De Moy.

Affectation endeavors to correct natural defects, and has always the laudable aim of pleasing, though it always misses it.—Locke.

It is remarkable that great affectation and great absence of it (unconsciousness) are at first sight very similar; they are both apt to produce singularity.—Bishop Whately.

Affectation is certain deformity; by forming themselves on fantastic models, the young begin with being ridiculous, and often end in being vicious.—Blair.

Great vices are the proper objects of our detestation, smaller faults of our pity, but affectation appears to be the only true source of the ridiculous.—Fielding.

Affectation in any part of our carriage is lighting up a candle to see our defects, and never fails to make us taken notice of, either as wanting sense or sincerity.—Locke.

Avoid all affectation and singularity. What is according to nature is best, and what is contrary to it is always distasteful. Nothing is graceful that is not our own.—Jeremy Collier.

In all the professions every one affects a particular look and exterior, in order to appear what he wishes to be thought; so that it may be said the world is made up of appearances.—Rochefoucauld.

Affectation is an awkward and forced imitation of what should be genuine and easy, wanting the Beauty that accompanies what is natural.—Locke.

Among the numerous stratagems by which pride endeavors to recommend folly to regard, there is scarcely one that meets with less success than affectation, or a perpetual disguise of the real character by fictitious appearances.—Johnson.

Paltry affectation, strained allusions, and disgusting finery are easily attained by those who choose to wear them; they are but too frequently the badges of ignorance or of stupidity, whenever it would endeavor to please.—Goldsmith.

Affectation naturally counterfeits those excellences which are placed at the greatest distance from possibility of attainment, because, knowing our own defects, we eagerly endeavor to supply them with artificial excellence.—Johnson.

When Cicero consulted the oracle at Delphos, concerning what course of studies he should pursue, the answer was, "Follow Nature." If every one would do this, affectation would be almost unknown.—J. Beaumont.

Almost every man wastes part of his life in attempts to display qualities which he does not possess, and to gain applause which he cannot keep; so that scarcely can two persons meet but one is offended or diverted by the ostentation of the other.—Dr. Johnson.

There is a false gravity that is a very ill symptom; and it may be said that as rivers, which run very slowly, have always the most mud at the bottom, so a solid stiffness in the constant course of a man's life is a sign of a thick bed of mud at the bottom of his brain.—Saville.

Affectation is to be always distinguished from hypocrisy, as being the art of counterfeiting those qualities, which we might with innocence and safety, be known to want. Hypocrisy is the necessary burden of villany; affectation part of the chosen trappings of folly.—Johnson.

Affectation proceeds from one of these two causes,—vanity or hypocrisy; for as vanity puts us on affecting false characters, in order to purchase applause; so hypocrisy sets us on an endeavor to avoid censure, by concealing our vices under an appearance of their opposite virtues.—Fielding.

I will not call vanity and affectation twins, because, more properly, vanity is the mother, and affectation is the darling daughter. Vanity is the sin, and affectation is the punishment; the first may be called the root of self-love, the other the fruit. Vanity is never at its full growth till it spreadeth into affectation, and then it is complete.—Sir H. Saville.

Affection

Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth.—Colossians, chap. iii.

No decking sets forth anything so much as affection.—Sir P. Sidney.

Entire affection hateth nicer hands.—Spencer.

Affection is the broadest basis of good in life.—George Eliot.

A loving heart is the truest wisdom.—Dickens.

Loving souls are like paupers. They live on what is given them.—Madame Swetchine.

Alas! our young affections run to waste, Or water but the desert.—Byron.

One touch of nature makes the whole world kin.—Shakespeare.

It is sweet to feel by what fine-spun threads our affections are drawn together.—Sterne.

Our happiness in this world depends on the affections we are enabled to inspire.—Duchesse de Praslin.

How cling we to a thing our hearts have nursed.—Mrs. C. H. W. Esling.

I have given suck, and know how tender it is to love the babe that milks me.—Shakespeare.

It is comparatively easy to leave a mistress, but very hard to be left by one.—Thackeray.

No affections and a great brain,—these are the men to command the world.—Beaconsfield.

Affection, mistress of passion, sways it to the mood of what it likes or loathes.—Shakespeare.

Such affection and unbroken faith as temper life's worst bitterness.—Shelley.

Dear as the light that visits these sad eyes;
Dear as the ruddy drops that warm my heart. —Gray.

Affection is a coal that must be cool'd:
Else, suffer'd, it will set the heart on fire. —Shakespeare.

Of all earthly music, that which reaches the farthest into heaven is the beating of a loving heart.—Beecher.

O you much partial gods! why gave ye men affections, and not power to govern them?—Ludovic Barry.

Love is strong in its passion; affection is powerful in its gentleness.—Michelet.

Of all the tyrants the world affords, our own affections are the fiercest lords.—Earl of Sterling.

If there is anything that keeps the mind open to angel visits, and repels the ministry of ill, it is human love.—Willis.

Our sweetest experiences of affection are meant to be suggestions of that realm which is the home of the heart.—Beecher.

The affections are immortal! they are the sympathies which unite the ceaseless generations.—Bulwer-Lytton.

There are moments of mingled sorrow and tenderness, which hallow the caresses of affection.—Washington Irving.

Affections injured by tyranny, or rigor of compulsion, like tempest-threatened trees, unfirmly rooted, never spring to timely growth.—John Ford.

The poor wren, the most diminutive of birds, will fight, her young ones in her nest, against the owl.—Shakespeare.

The affection of young ladies is of as rapid growth as Jack's beanstalk, and reaches up to the sky in a night.—Thackeray.

The affections are the children of ignorance; when the horizon of our experience expands, and models multiply, love and admiration imperceptibly vanish.—Beaconsfield.

There comes a time when the souls of human beings, women more even than men, begin to faint for the atmosphere of the affections they are made to breathe.—Holmes.

There are few mortals so insensible that their affections cannot be gained by mildness, their confidence by sincerity, their hatred by scorn or neglect.—Zimmermann.

Even children follow'd with endearing wile,
And pluck'd his gown, to share the good
man's smile. —Goldsmith.

Generous as brave,
Affection, kindness, and the sweet officer
Of love and duty, were to him as needful
As his daily bread. —Rogers.

If the deepest and best affections which God has given us sometimes brood over the heart like doves of peace,—they sometimes suck out our life-blood like vampires.—Mrs. Jameson.

Universal love is a glove without fingers, which fits all hands alike, and none closely; but true affection is like a glove with fingers, which fits one hand only, and sits close to that one.—Richter.

There is so little to redeem the dry mass of follies and errors from which the materials of this life are composed that anything to love or to reverence becomes, as it were, the Sabbath for the mind.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The objects that we have known in better days are the main props that sustain the weight of our affections, and give us strength to await our future lot.—Wm. Hazlitt.

Hearts may be attracted by assumed qualities, but the affections are only to be fixed by those that are real.—De Moy.

I may not to the world impart
The secret of its power,
But treasured in my inmost heart
I keep my faded flower.
—Ellen C. Howarth.

The heart will commonly govern the head, and it is certain that any strong passion, set the wrong way, will soon infatuate even the wisest of men. therefore the first part of wisdom is to watch the affections.—Dr. Waterland.

Affection is a garden, and without it there would not be a verdant spot on the surface of the globe.

Fathers alone a father's heart can know
What secret tides of still enjoyment flow
When brothers love, but if their hate succeeds,
They wage the war, but 'tis the father bleeds.
—Young.

Who have not saved some trifling thing
More prized than jewels rare,
A faded flower, a broken ring,
A tress of golden hair.
—Ellen C. Howarth.

Caresses, expressions of one sort or another, are necessary to the life of the affections as leaves are to the life of a tree. If they are wholly restrained love will die at the roots.—Hawthorne.

How often a new affection makes a new man! The sordid, cowering soul turns heroic. The frivolous girl becomes the steadfast martyr of patience and ministration, transfigured by deathless love. The career of bounding impulses turns into an anthem of sacred deeds.—Chapin.

How sacred, how beautiful, is the feeling of affection in pure and guileless bosoms! The proud may sneer at it, the fashionable may call it fable, the selfish and dissipated may affect to despise it; but the holy passion is surely of heaven, and is made evil by the corruptions of those whom it was sent to bless and to preserve.—Mordaunt.

A solitary blessing few can find,
Our joys with those we love are intertwined,
And he whose wakeful tenderness removes
The obstructing thorn that wounds the breast he loves,
Smooths not another's rugged path alone,
But scatters roses to adorn his own.

Let the foundation of thy affection be virtue, then make the building as rich and as glorious as thou canst; if the foundation be beauty or wealth, and the building virtue, the foundation is too weak for the building, and it will fall: happy is he, the palace of whose affection is founded upon virtue, walled with riches, glazed with beauty, and roofed with honor.—Quarles.

Talk not of wasted affection, affection never was wasted;
If it enrich not the heart of another, its waters, returning
Back to their springs, like the rain, shall fill them full of refreshment;
That which the fountain sends forth returns again to the fountain.
—Longfellow.

Why doth Fate, that often bestows thousands of souls on a conqueror or tyrant, to be the sport of his passions, so often deny to the tenderest and most feeling hearts one kindred one on which to lavish their affections? Why is it that Love must so often sigh in vain for an object, and Hate never?—Richter.

Affliction

Affliction is but the shadow of God's wing.—George Macdonald.

Man is born unto trouble, as the sparks fly upward.—Job v. 7.

Afflictions clarify the soul.—Quarles.

Calamity is man's true touchstone.—Fletcher.

'Tis a physic that is bitter to sweet end.—Shakespeare.

Sanctified afflictions are spiritual promotions.—Matthew Henry.

There is healing in the bitter cup.—Southey.

I am a feather for each wind that blows.—Shakespeare.

Afflictions are but as a dark entry into our Father's house.—Thomas Brooks.

Night brings out stars as sorrow shows us truths.—P. J. Bailey.

What region of the earth is not full of our calamities?—Virgil.

It is the best thing for a stricken heart to be helping others.—A. H. K.

We only see clearly when we have reached the depths of woe.—Ouida.

He who tenders doubtful safety to those in trouble refuses it.—Seneca.

The afflictions to which we are accustomed, do not disturb us.—Claudianus.

Distress is virtue's opportunity: we only live to teach us how to die.—Southern.

Affliction, like the iron-smith, shapes as it smites.—Bovee.

In time of affliction, a vow; in the time of prosperity, an increase of wickedness.—Hebrew Proverb.

Heaven gives us friends to bless the present scene;
Resumes them, to prepare us for the next.—Young.

The Lord gets his best soldiers out of the highlands of affliction.—Spurgeon.

Corn is cleaned with wind, and the soul with chastening.—George Herbert.

Affliction's sons are brothers in distress;
A brother to relieve, how exquisite the bliss! —Burns.

Affliction is not sent in vain—
From that good God who chastens whom He loves! —Southey.

Heaven is not always angry when he strikes,
But most chastises those whom most he likes. —Pomfret.

If you would not have affliction visit you twice, listen at once to what it teaches.—Burgh.

Patience cannot remove, but it can always dignify and alleviate, misfortune.—Laurence Sterne.

As threshing separates the corn from the chaff, so does affliction purify virtue.—Bacon.

With the wind of tribulation God separates in the floor of the soul, the chaff from the corn.—Molinos.

Oft the cloud that wraps the present hour serves but to brighten all our future days.—Wm. Browne.

Affliction is enamored of thy parts,
And thou art wedded to calamity. —Shakespeare.

It is from the remembrance of joys we have lost that the arrows of affliction are pointed.—Mackenzie.

We bleed, we tremble, we forget, we smile—
The mind turns fool, before the cheek is dry. —Young.

When sorrows come, they come not single spies, but in battalions.—Shakespeare.

How blunt are all the arrows of thy quiver in comparison with those of guilt!—Blair.

What seem to us but dim funereal tapers may be heaven's distant lamps. —Longfellow.

The good are better made by ill, as odors crushed are sweeter still!—Rogers.

Amid my list of blessings infinite stands this the foremost, "That my heart has bled."—Young.

Thy pleasure points the shaft, and bends the bow;
The cluster blasts, or bids it brightly glow. —Dr. Young.

Affliction is a school of virtue: it corrects levity, and interrupts the confidence of sinning.—Atterbury.

The loss of a beloved connection awakens an interest in heaven before unfelt.—Bovee.

The eternal stars shine out as soon as it is dark enough.—Carlyle.

Affliction is the school in which great virtues are acquired, in which great characters are formed.—Hannah More.

As sure as God ever puts His children into the furnace, He will be in the furnace with them.—C. H. Spurgeon.

We should be more anxious that our afflictions should benefit us than that they should be speedily removed from us.—Robert Hall.

Christ leads me through no darker rooms
Than He went through before.
—Richard Baxter.

Grace will ever speak for itself and be fruitful in well-doing; the sanctified cross is a fruitful tree.—Rutherford.

Affliction of itself does not sanctify any body, but the reverse. I believe in sanctified afflictions, but not in sanctifying afflictions.—C. H. Spurgeon.

Extraordinary afflictions are not always the punishment of extraordinary sins, but sometimes the trial of extraordinary graces.—Matthew Henry.

Affliction is the wholesome soul of virtue;
Where patience, honor, sweet humanity,
Calm fortitude, take root, and strongly flourish.
—Mallet and Thomson.

Believe me, the gods spare the afflicted, and do not always oppress those who are unfortunate.—Ovid.

God afflicts with the mind of a father, and kills for no other purpose but that he may raise again.—South.

God sometimes washes the eyes of His children with tears in order that they may read aright His providence and His commandments.—T. L. Cuyler.

Alas by some degree of woe,
We every bliss must gain;
The heart can ne'er a transport know,
That never feels a pain.
—Lord Lyttleton.

Most of the grand truths of God have to be learned by trouble; they must be burned into us by the hot iron of affliction, otherwise we shall not truly receive them.—C. H. Spurgeon.

Thou art never at any time nearer to God than when under tribulation; which He permits for the purification and beautifying of thy soul.—Miguel Molinos.

Afflictions clarify the soul,
And like hard masters, give more hard directions,
Tutoring the non-age of uncurbed affections.
—Quarles.

With every anguish of our earthly part the spirit's sight grows clearer; this was meant when Jesus touched the blind man's lids with clay.—Lowell.

The cup which my Saviour giveth me, can it be anything but a cup of salvation?—Alexander Maclaren.

Affliction is the good man's shining scene;
Prosperity conceals his brightest ray,
As night to stars, woe lustre gives to man.
—Young.

The very afflictions of our earthly pilgrimage are presages of our future glory, as shadows indicate the sun.—Richter.

Perfumes, the more they are chafed, the more they render their pleasant scents; and so affliction expreseth virtue fully.—John Webster.

The furnace of affliction refines us from earthly drossiness, and softens us for the impression of God's own stamp.—Bayle.

Incessant falls teach men to reform, and distress rouses their strength. Life springs from calamity, and death from ease.—Mencius.

Nothing can occur beyond the strength of faith to sustain, or, transcending the resources of religion, to relieve.—Binney.

It is the crushed grape that gives out the blood-red wine: it is the suffering soul that breathes the sweetest melodies.—Gail Hamilton.

The mind which does not wholly sink under misfortune rises above it more lofty than before, and is strengthened by affliction.—Richard Chenevix.

Affliction is a sort of moral gymnasium in which the disciples of Christ are trained to robust exercise, hardy exertion, and severe conflict.—Hannah More.

Henceforth I'll bear
Affliction till it do cry out itself,
Enough, enough, and die.
—Shakespeare.

Thou art a soul in bliss; but I am bound
Upon a wheel of fire; that mine own tears
Do scald like molten lead.—Shakespeare.

With silence only as their benediction,
God's angels come
Where in the shadow of a great affliction,
The soul sits dumb! —Whittier.

Every man deems that he has precisely the trials and temptations which are the hardest of all for him to bear; but they are so, because they are the very ones he needs.—Richter.

And this is the course of Nature: there is nothing like suffering to enlighten the giddy brain, widen the narrow mind, improve the trivial heart.—Charles Reade.

If aught can teach us aught, Affliction's looks,
Making us pry into ourselves so near,
Teach us to know ourselves, beyond all books,
Or all the learned schools that ever were.
—John Davies.

Aromatic plants bestow
No spicy fragrance where they grow;
But crushed and trodden to the ground,
Diffuse their balmy sweets around.
—Goldsmith.

God is now spoiling us of what would otherwise have spoiled us. When God makes the world too hot for His people to hold, they will let it go.—T. Powell.

When Providence for secret ends,
Corroding cares, or sharp affliction, sends;
We must conclude it best it should be so,
And not despondent or impatient grow.
—Pomfret.

Are afflictions aught
But mercies in disguise? th' alternate cup,
Medicinal though bitter, and prepar'd
By love's own hand for salutary ends.
—Mallet.

The great, in affliction, bear a countenance more princely than they are wont; for it is the temper of the highest heart, like the palm-tree, to strive most upward when it is most burdened.

—Sir P. Sidney.

Affliction appears to be the guide to reflection; the teacher of humility; the parent of repentance; the nurse of faith; the strengthener of patience, and the promoter of charity.

The truest help we can render an afflicted man is not to take his burden from him, but to call out his best energy, that he may be able to bear the burden.—Phillips Brooks.

No man ever stated his griefs as lightly as he might. For it is only the finite that has wrought and suffered; the infinite lies stretched in smiling repose.—Emerson.

Afflictions are the medicine of the mind. If they are not toothsome, let it suffice that they are wholesome. It is not required in physic that it should please, but heal.—Bishop Henshaw.

No chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous: nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby.—Hebrews xii. 11.

There will be no Christian but what will have a Gethsemane, but every praying Christian will find that there is no Gethsemane without its angel!—Rev. T. Binney.

Now let us thank th' eternal power, convince'd
That heaven but tries our virtue by affliction;
That off the cloud which wraps the present hour,
Serves but to brighten all our future days!
—John Brown.

Every man will have his own criterion in forming his judgment of others. I depend very much on the effect of affliction. I consider how a man comes out of the furnace; gold will lie for a month in the furnace without losing a grain.—Richard Cecil.

Human character is never found "to enter into its glory," except through the ordeal of affliction. Its force cannot come forth without the offer of resistance, nor can the grandeur of its free will declare itself, except in the battle of fierce temptation.—James Martineau.

What He tells thee in the darkness,
Weary watcher for the day,
Grateful lip and heart should utter
When the shadows flee away.
—F. R. Havergal.

The damps of autumn sink into the leaves and prepare them for the necessity of their fall; and thus insensibly are we, as years close around us, detached from our tenacity of life by the gentle pressure of recorded sorrow.—W. S. Landor.

However bitter the cup we have to drink, we are sure it contains nothing unnecessary or unkind; and we should take it from His hand with as much meekness as we accept of eternal life with thankfulness.—William Goodell.

Tears and sorrows and losses are a part of what must be experienced in this present state of life: some for our manifest good, and all, therefore, it is trusted, for our good concealed;—for our final and greatest good.—Leigh Hunt.

It is a great thing, when our Gethsemane hours come, when the cup of bitterness is pressed to our lips, and when we pray that it may pass away, to feel that it is not fate, that it is not necessity, but divine love for good ends working upon us.—Chapin.

Fairer and more fruitful in spring the vine becomes from the skilful pruning of the husbandman; less pure had been the gums which the odorous balsam gives if it had not been cut by the knife of the Arabian shepherd.—Metastasio.

That which thou dost not understand when thou redest, thou shalt understand in the day of thy visitation; for many secrets of religion are not perceived till they be felt, and are not felt but in the day of a great calamity.

—Jeremy Taylor.

As they lay copper in aquafortis before they begin to engrave it, so the Lord usually prepares us by the searching, softening discipline of affliction for making a deep, lasting impression of himself upon our hearts.—J. T. Nottidge.

The bread of bitterness is the food on which men grow to their fullest stature; the waters of bitterness are the debatable ford through which they reach the shores of wisdom; the ashes boldly grasped and eaten without faltering are the price that must be paid for the golden fruit of knowledge.—Ouida.

Afflictions sent by Providence melt the constancy of the noble-minded, but confirm the obduracy of the vile. The same furnace that hardens clay liquefies gold; and in the strong manifestations of divine power Pharaoh found his punishment, but David his pardon.—Colton.

Be still, sad heart, and cease repining,
Behind the clouds the sun is shining;
Thy fate is the common fate of all;
Into each life some rain must fall,—
Some days must be dark and dreary.
—Longfellow.

God washes the eyes by tears until they can behold the invisible land where tears shall come no more. O love! O affliction! ye are the guides that show us the way through the great airy space where our loved ones walked; and, as hounds easily follow the scent before the dew be risen, so God teaches us, while yet our sorrow is wet, to follow on and find our dear ones in heaven.—Beecher.

As the most generous vine, if it is not pruned, runs out into many superfluous stems, and grows at last weak and fruitless; so doth the best man, if he be not cut short of his desires and pruned with afflictions. If it be painful to bleed, it is worse to wither. Let me be pruned, that I may grow, rather than be cut up to burn.—Bishop Hall.

In a great affliction there is no light either in the stars or in the sun; for when the inward light is fed with fragrant oil; there can be no darkness though the sun should go out. But when, like a sacred lamp in the temple, the inward light is quenched, there is no light outwardly, though a thousand suns should preside in the heavens.—Beecher.

The cloud which appeared to the prophet Ezekiel carried with it winds and storms, but it was environed with a golden circle, to teach us that the storms of afflictions, which happen to God's children, are encompassed with brightness and smiling felicity.—N. Caussin.

Had it pleased Heaven
To try me with affliction; had he rain'd
All kinds of sores and shames on my bare head;
Steep'd me in poverty to the very lips;
Given to captivity me and my utmost hopes;
I should have found in some place of my soul
A drop of patience. —Shakespeare.

There is an elasticity in the human mind, capable of bearing much, but which will not show itself until a certain weight of affliction be put upon it; its powers may be compared to those vehicles whose springs are so contrived that they get on smoothly enough when loaded, but jolt confoundedly when they have nothing to bear.—Colton.

In thy silent wishing, thy voiceless, unuttered prayer, let the desire be not cherished that afflictions may not visit thee; for well has it been said, "Such prayers never seem to have wings. I am willing to be purified through sorrow, and to accept it meekly as a blessing. I see that all the clouds are angels' faces, and their voices speak harmoniously of the everlasting chime."—Mrs. L. M. Child.

The truth is, when we are under any affliction we are generally troubled with a malicious kind of melancholy; we only dwell and pore upon the sad and dark occurrences of Providence, but never take notice of the more benign and bright ones. Our way in this world is like a walk under a row of trees, checkered with light and shade; and because we cannot all along walk in the sunshine, we therefore perversely fix only upon the darker passages, and so lose all the comfort of our comforts. We are like froward children who, if you take one of their playthings from them, throw away all the rest in spite.—Bishop Hopkins.

Oh, when we are journeying through the murky night and the dark woods of affliction and sorrow, it is something to find here and there a spray broken, or a leafy stem bent down with the tread of His foot and the brush of His hand as He passed; and to remember that the path He trod He has hallowed, and thus to find lingering fragrance and hidden strength in the remembrance of Him as "in all points tempted like as we are," bearing grief for us, bearing grief with us, bearing grief like us.—Alexander MacLaren.

Affront

Am I to set my life upon a throw,
Because a bear is rude and surly? No—
A moral, sensible, and well-bred man,
Will not affront me, and no other can.
—Cowper.

After

After me the deluge.—Madame de Pompadour.

After the war, aid.—Greek Proverb.

After death the doctor.—English Proverb.

When I am dead, may earth be mingled with fire! Ay, said Nero, and while I am living, too.—From a Greek Tragedian.

Good old age.—Genesis xv. 15.

Slow, consuming age.—Gray.

Crabbed age and youth cannot live together.—Shakespeare.

Few people know how to be old.—La Rochefoucauld.

Age either transfigures or petrifies.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

It is difficult to grow old gracefully.
—Madame de Staël.

Begin to patch up thine old body for heaven.—Shakespeare.

The clock of his age had struck fifty-eight.—Cellini.

An old man is twice a child.—
Shakespeare.

When the age is in, the wit is out.—
Shakespeare.

Mellowed by the stealing hours of time.—Shakespeare.

No wise man ever wished to be younger.—Swift.

Old age is an incurable disease.—
Seneca.

The evening of life brings with it its lamps.—Joubert.

'T is the sunset of life gives us mystical lore.—Campbell.

Age is suspicious, but is not itself often suspected.—Zimmermann.

Nor age so eat up my invention.—
Shakespeare.

Men shut their doors against a setting sun.—Shakespeare.

O good gray head which all men knew.—Tennyson.

Age and man sit smiling at the gate.
—Pope.

Thyself no more deceive, thy youth bath fled.—Petrarch.

The silver livery of advised age.—
Shakespeare.

They say women and music should never be dated.—Goldsmith.

The Grecian ladies counted their age from their marriage, not their birth.—Homer.

As I approach a second childhood, I endeavor to enter into the pleasures of it.—Lady Montagu.

Age * * * is is a matter of feeling, not of years.—George William Curtis.

Stronger by weakness, wiser men become,
As they draw near to their eternal home.
—Edmund Waller.

His cheek the map of days outworn.
—Shakespeare.

Time's chariot-wheels make their carriage-road in the fairest face.—
Rochevoucauld.

Age too, shines out, and garrulous recounts the feats of youth.—Thomson.

Have a care lest the wrinkles in the face extend to the heart.—Marguerite de Valois.

White hairs are the crests of foam which cover the sea after the tempest.
—Elizabeth, Queen of Roumania.

What makes old age so sad is, not that our joys, but that our hopes, cease.—Richter.

Old age is a tyrant, which forbids the pleasures of youth on pain of death.—Rochevoucauld.

We are to seek wisdom and understanding only in the length of days.—
Robert Hall.

The silver-leaved birch retains in its old age a soft bark; there are some such men.—Auerbach.

Some smack of age in you, some relish of the saltness of time.—Shakespeare.

Your date is better in your pie and your porridge than in your cheek.—
Shakespeare.

The defects of the mind, like those of the face, grow worse as we grow old.—Rochevoucauld.

Every man desires to live long; but no man would be old.—Swift.

His hair just grizzled as in a green old age.—Dryden.

Years steal fire from the mind as vigor from the limb.—Byron.

Years do not make sages; they only make old men.—Madame Swetchine.

As the evening twilight fades away, the sky is filled with stars, invisible by day.—Longfellow.

The enthusiasm of old men is singularly like that of infancy.—Gerard de Nerval.

As we grow old we become more foolish and more wise.—Rochefoucauld.

Nature, as it grows again toward earth, is fashioned for the journey, dull and heavy.—Shakespeare.

We do not count a man's years until he has nothing else to count.—Emerson.

As you are old and reverend, you should be wise.—Ibid.

An old age serene and bright, and lovely as a Lapland night, shall lead thee to thy grave.—Wordsworth.

A youthful age is desirable, but aged youth is troublesome and grievous.—Chilo.

How many persons fancy they have experience simply because they have grown old!—Stanislaus.

For my own part, I had rather be old only a short time than be old before I really am so.—Cicero.

As we advance in life the circle of our pains enlarges, while that of our pleasures contracts.—Madame Swetchine.

We see time's furrows on another's brow; how few themselves, in that just mirror, see!—Young.

What folly can be ranker? Like our shadows, our wishes lengthen as our sun declines.—Young.

Cautious age suspects the flattering form, and only credits what experience tells.—Johnson.

At twenty years of age, the will reigns; at thirty, the wit; and at forty, the judgment.—Grattan.

To the old, long life and treasure;
To the young, all health and pleasure.
—Ben Jonson.

The best is yet to be,
The last of life, for which the first was made.
—Browning.

I love everything that's old,—old friends, old times, old manners, old books, old wine.—Goldsmith.

Forty is the old age of youth; fifty is the youth of old age.—Victor Hugo.

To be happy, we must be true to nature, and carry our age along with us.—Hazlitt.

Men, like peaches and pears, grow sweet a little while before they begin to decay.—Holmes.

Age, that lessens the enjoyment of life, increases our desire of living.—Goldsmith.

When men once reach their autumn, sickly joys fall off apace, as yellow leaves from trees.—Young.

You see me here,—a poor old man,
As full of grief as age; wretched in both!
—Shakespeare.

Thou shalt go to thy fathers in peace, thou shalt be buried in a good old age.—Genesis.

Youth changes its tastes by the warmth of its blood; age retains its tastes by habit.—La Rochefoucauld.

Age is rarely despised but when it is contemptible.—Johnson.

As you are old and reverend, you should be wise.—Shakespeare.

Age bears away with it all things,
even the powers of the mind.—Virgil.

Care keeps his watch in every old man's eye.—Shakespeare.

These are the effects of doting age, —vain doubts and idle cares and over-caution.—Dryden.

Borne on the swift, tho' silent wings of time, Old age comes on apace, to ravage all the clime. —Beattie.

Childhood itself is scarcely more lovely than a cheerful, kindly, sunshiny old age.—Mrs. L. M. Child.

A healthy old fellow, who is not a fool, is the happiest creature living.—
Steele.

Whatever poet, orator, or sage
May say of it, old age is still old age.
—Longfellow.

Old wood best to burn, old wine to drink, old friends to trust, and old authors to read.—Bacon.

Youth is a blunder; Manhood a struggle; Old Age a regret.—Disraeli (Earl Beaconsfield).

Why will you break the Sabbath of my days?
Now sick alike of envy and of praise.
—Pope.

Superfluity comes sooner by white hairs, but competency lives longer.—
Shakespeare.

Age is a tyrant, who forbids, at the penalty of life, all the pleasures of youth.—La Rochefoucauld.

A time there is when like a thricetold tale long-rifled life of sweets can yield no more.—Young.

Age makes us not childish, as some say; it finds us still true children.—
Goethe.

Thirst of power and of riches now bear sway,
The passion and infirmity of age.
—Frowde.

Age is frequently beautiful, wisdom appearing like an aftermath.—Beaconsfield.

Old age has deformities enough of its own; do not add to it the deformity of vice.—Cato.

Boys must not have th' ambitious care of
men,
Nor men the weak anxieties of age.
—Horace.

Gray hairs seem to my fancy like the light of a soft moon, silvering over the evening of life.—Richter.

The sunshine fails, the shadows grow more dreary,
And I am near to fall, infirm and weary.
—Longfellow.

The most dangerous weakness of old people who have been amiable is to forget they are no longer so.—
Roche foucauld.

What should we speak of
When we are old as you? When we shall hear
The rain and wind beat dark December.
—Shakespeare.

When he's forsaken,
Wither'd and shaken,
What can an old man do but die?
—Hood.

Beauty and ugliness disappear equally under the wrinkles of age; one is lost in them; the other hidden.—J.
Petit-Senn.

There is nothing more disgraceful than that an old man should have nothing to produce as a proof that he has lived long except his years.—Seneca.

Nature is full of freaks, and now puts an old head on young shoulders, and then a young heart beating under fourscore winters.—Emerson.

And the bright faces of my young companions
Are wrinkled like my own, or are no more.
—Longfellow.

Tell me what you find better, or more honorable than age. Is not wisdom entailed upon it? Take the pre-eminence of it in everything; in an old friend, in old wine, in an old pedigree.—Shakerly Marmion.

Most long lives resemble those threads of gossamer, the nearest approach to nothing unmeaningly prolonged, scarce visible pathways of some worm from his cradle to his grave.—Lowell.

Time has laid his hand upon my heart gently, not smiting it; but as a harper lays his open palm upon his harp, to deaden its vibrations.—Longfellow.

The tendency of old age, say the physiologists, is to form bone. It is as rare as it is pleasant, to meet with an old man whose opinions are not ossified.—J. F. Boyse.

There are three classes into which all the women past seventy years of age, that ever I knew, were to be divided: 1. That dear old soul; 2. That old woman; 3. That old witch.—Coleridge.

O sir, you are old; nature in you stands on the very verge of her confine; you should be ruled and led by some discretion, that discerns your fate better than you yourself.—Shakespeare.

Last scene of all, that ends this strange, eventful history, is second childishness, and mere oblivion; sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans everything.—Shakespeare.

'Tis the sunset of life gives us mystical lore,
And coming events cast their shadows before.
—Campbell.

Thou shalt come to thy grave in a full age, like a shock of corn cometh to his season.—Job v. 26.

I feel I am growing old for want of somebody to tell me that I am looking as young as ever. Charming falsehood! There is a vast deal of vital air in loving words.—Landor.

The heart never grows better by age;

I fear rather worse; always harder. A young liar will be an old one; and a young knave will only be a greater knave as he grows older.—Chesterfield.

On his bold visage middle age
Had slightly press'd its signet sage.
—Scott.

At your age,
The hey-day in the blood is tame, it's humble,
And waits upon the judgment.
—Shakespeare.

We hope to grow old and we dread old age; that is to say, we love life and we flee from death.—La Bruyère.

The tree that bears no fruit deserves no name; the man of wisdom is the man of years.—Young.

We must not take the faults of our youth into our old age; for old age brings with it its own defects.—Goethe.

It is only necessary to grow old to become more indulgent. I see no fault committed that I have not committed myself.—Goethe.

Set is the sun of my years;
And over a few poor ashes,
I sit in my darkness and tears.
—Gerald Massey.

And his big manly voice,
Turning again toward childish treble, pipes
And whistles in his sound.
—Shakespeare.

How far the gulf-stream of our youth
May flow into the Arctic region of our lives,
Where little else than life itself survives.
—Longfellow.

Some one has said of a fine and honorable old age, that it was the childhood of immortality.—Pindar.

When a noble life has prepared old age, it is not the decline that it reveals, but the first days of immortality.—Madame de Staël.

The easiest thing for our friends to discover in us, and the hardest thing for us to discover in ourselves, is that we are growing old.—H. W. Shaw.

There is nothing against which an old man should be so much upon his guard as putting himself to nurse.—Dr. Johnson.

In an aged man appears ripeness of wisdom: it is the oldest sandal-tree which emits the most fragrance.—Sataka.

Old men's lives are lengthened shadows; their evening sun falls coldly on the earth, but the shadows all point to the morning.—Richter.

Age and youth look upon life from the opposite ends of the telescope; it is exceedingly long,—it is exceedingly short.—Beecher.

Old age was naturally more honored in times when people could not know much more than what they had seen.—Joubert.

Only when the sap is dried up, only when age comes on, does the sun shine in vain for man and for the tree.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Age is not all decay; it is the ripening, the swelling, of the fresh life within, that withers and bursts the husk.—George MacDonald.

The Disappointment of Manhood succeeds to the delusion of Youth; let us hope that the heritage of Old Age is not Despair.—Disraeli.

For we are old, and on our quick'st decrees
The inaudible and noiseless foot of Time
Steals ere we can effect them.
—Shakespeare.

That which is usually called dotage is not the weak point of all old men, but only of such as are distinguished by their levity.—Cicero.

Next to the very young, I suppose the very old are the most selfish. Alas! the heart hardens as the blood ceases to run.—Thackeray.

An aged Christian, with the snow of time on his head, may remind us that those points of earth are whitest which are nearest heaven.—Chapin.

If wrinkles must be written upon our brows, let them not be written upon the heart. The spirit should not grow old.—James A. Garfield.

In age to wish for youth is full as vain
As for a youth to turn a child again.

—Denham.

The surest sign of age is loneliness. While one finds company in himself and his pursuits, he cannot be old, whatever his years may be.—Alcott.

Old age takes from the man of intellect no qualities save those that are useless to wisdom.—Joubert.

Thus pleasures fade away;
Youth, talents, beauty, thus decay,
And leave us dark, forlorn, and gray.
—Scott.

Superfluous lags the veteran on the stage,
Till pitying Nature signs the last release,
And bids afflicted worth retire to peace.
—Samuel Johnson.

* * * Years steal

Fire from the mind, as vigor from the limb;
And life's enchanted cup but sparkles near the brim.
—Byron.

Each departed friend is a magnet that attracts us to the next world, and the old man lives among graves.—Richter.

Up to forty a woman has only forty springs in her heart. After that age she has only forty winters.—Arsène Houssaye.

When men grow virtuous in their old age, they are merely making a sacrifice to God of the devil's leavings.—Swift.

We grizzle every day. I see no need of it. Whilst we converse with what is above us, we do not grow old, but grow young.—Emerson.

Down his neck his reverend lockes
In comelye curls did wave;
And on his aged temples grewe
The blossomes of the grave.
—Old Ballad.

Depend upon it, a man never experiences such pleasure or grief after fourteen years as he does before, unless in some cases, in his first love-making, when the sensation is new to him.—Charles Kingsley.

To resist with success the frigidity of old age, one must combine the body, the mind, and the heart; to keep these in parallel vigor, one must exercise, study, and love.—Bonstetten.

As sailing into port is a happier thing than the voyage, so is age happier than youth; that is, when the voyage from youth is made with Christ at the helm.—Rev. J. Pulsford.

Thus fares it still in our decay,
And yet the wiser mind
Mourns less for what age takes away
Than what it leaves behind.
—Wordsworth.

The vine produces more grapes when it is young, but better grapes for wine when it is old, because its juices are more perfectly concocted.—Bacon.

My days are in the yellow leaf;
The flowers and fruits of love are gone;
The worm, the canker, and the grief
Are mine alone!
—Byron.

Natures that have much heat, and great and violent desires and perturbations, are not ripe for action till they have passed the meridian of their years.—Bacon.

Backward, flow backward, O tide of the years!
I am so weary of toil and of tears,—
Toil without recompense, tears all in vain—
Take them and give me my childhood again!
—Elizabeth Akers Allen.

The vices of old age have the stiffness of it, too; and as it is the unfittest time to learn in, so the unfitness of it to unlearn will be found much greater.—South.

I am much beholden to old age, which has increased my eagerness for conversation in proportion as it has lessened my appetites of hunger and thirst.—Tully.

Throughout the whole vegetable, sensible, and rational world, whatever makes progress towards maturity, as soon as it has passed that point, begins to verge towards decay.—Blair.

He who would pass the declining years of his life with honor and comfort, should when young, consider that he may one day become old, and remember, when he is old, that he has once been young.—Addison.

Age imprints more wrinkles in the mind, than it does in the face, and souls are never, or very rarely seen, that in growing old do not smell sour and musty. Man moves all together, both towards his perfection and decay.
—Montaigne.

So life's year begins and closes;
Days, though short'ning, still can shine;
What though youth gave love and roses,
Age still leaves us friends and wine.
—Moore.

Though now this grained face of mine be hid
In sap-consuming winter's drizzled snow,
And all the conduits of my blood froze up,
Yet hath my night of life some memory.
—Shakespeare.

For age is opportunity no less
Than youth itself, though in another dress,
And as the evening twilight fades away
The sky is filled with stars, invisible by day.
—Longfellow.

Though sinking in decrepit age, he prematurely falls whose memory records no benefit conferred on him by man. They only have lived long who have lived virtuously.—Sheridan.

Old age is never honored among us, but only indulged, as childhood is; and old men lose one of the most precious rights of man,—that of being judged by their peers.—Goethe.

Remote from cities liv'd a Swain,
Unvex'd with all the cares of gain;
His head was silver'd o'er with age,
And long experience made him sage.
—Gay.

Our life much resembles wine: when there is only a little remaining, it becomes vinegar; for all the ills of human nature crowd to old age as if it were a workshop.—Antiphanes.

Life grows darker as we go on, till only one pure light is left shining on it; and that is faith. Old age, like solitude and sorrow, has its revelations.—Madame Swetchine.

O, roses for the flush of youth,
And laurel for the perfect prime;
But pluck an ivy branch for me
Grown old before my time.

—Christina G. Rossetti.

Thus aged men, full loth and slow,
The vanities of life forego,
And count their youthful follies o'er,
Till memory lends her light no more.

—Scott.

Venerable men! you have come down to us from a former generation. Heaven has bounteously lengthened out your lives, that you might behold this joyous day.—Daniel Webster.

There cannot live a more unhappy creature than an ill-natured old man, who is neither capable of receiving pleasures nor sensible of doing them to others.—Sir W. Temple.

The mental powers acquire their full robustness when the cheek loses its ruddy hue, and the limbs their elastic step; and pale thought sits on manly brows, and the watchman, as he walks his rounds, sees the student's lamp burning far into the silent night.—Dr. Guthrie.

The damps of autumn sink into the leaves and prepare them for the necessity of their fall; and thus insensibly are we, as years close round us, detached from our tenacity of life by the gentle pressure of recorded sorrows.—Landor.

Like a morning dream, life becomes more and more bright the longer we live, and the reason of everything appears more clear. What has puzzled us before seems less mysterious, and the crooked paths look straighter as we approach the end.—Richter.

A comfortable old age is the reward of a well-spent youth; therefore instead of its introducing dismal and melancholy prospects of decay, it should give us hopes of eternal youth in a better world.—Palmer.

Age and sufferings had already marked out the first incisions for death, so that he required but little effort to cut her down; for it is with men as with trees, they are notched long before felling, that their life-sap may flow out.—Richter.

Old age is a lease nature only signs as a particular favor, and it may be, to one only in the space of two or three ages; and then with a pass to boot, to carry him through all the traverses and difficulties she has strewed in the way of his long career.—Montaigne.

What is it to grow old?
Is it to lose the glory of the form,
The lustre of the eye?
Is it for Beauty to forego her wreath?

Yes; but not this alone.

—Matthew Arnold.

Winter, which strips the leaves from around us, makes us see the distant regions they formerly concealed; so does old age rob us of our enjoyments, only to enlarge the prospect of eternity before us.—Richter.

We should provide for our age, in order that our age may have no urgent wants of this world to absorb it from the meditation of the next. It is awful to see the lean hands of dotage making a coffer of the grave!—Bulwer-Lytton.

Alike all ages; dames of ancient days
Have led their children thro' the mirthful maze.
And the gay grandsire, skill'd in gestic lore,
Has frisk'd beneath the burthen of three-score.

—Goldsmith.

Fate seem'd to wind him up for fourscore years;
Yet freshly ran he on ten winters more;
Till like a clock worn out with eating time,
The wheels of weary life at last stood still.

—Dryden.

One's age should be tranquil, as one's childhood should be playful; hard work, at either extremity of human existence, seems to me out of place; the morning and the evening should be alike cool and peaceful; at midday the sun may burn, and men may labor under it.—Dr. Arnold.

O blest retirement! friend to life's decline—
Retreats from care, that never must be mine
How blest is he who crowns, in shades like these,

A youth of labour with an age of ease;
—Goldsmith.

I think that to have known one good old man—one man, who, through the chances and mischances of a long life, has carried his heart in his hand, like a palm-branch, waving all discords into peace—helps our faith in God, in ourselves, and in each other more than many sermons.—G. W. Curtis.

I venerate old age; and I love not the man who can look without emotion upon the sunset of life, when the dusk of evening begins to gather over the watery eye, and the shadows of twilight grow broader and deeper upon the understanding.—Longfellow.

Come forth, old man,—thy daughter's side
Is now the fitting place for thee:
When time has quell'd the oak's bold pride,
The youthful tendril yet may hide.
The ruins of the parent tree, —Scott.

So may'st thou live, till like ripe fruit thou drop Into thy mother's lap, or be with ease
Gather'd, not harshly pluck'd, for death mature.
—Milton.

Learn to live well, or fairly make your will;
You've play'd, and lov'd, and ate, and drank your fill;
Walk sober off, before a sprightlier age
Comes titt'ring on, and shoves you from the stage.
—Pope.

What is the worst of woes that wait on age?
What stamps the wrinkle deeper on the brow?
To view each loved one blotted from life's page,
And be alone on earth as I am now.
—Byron.

Vanity in an old man is charming. It is a proof of an open nature. Eighty winters have not frozen him up, or taught him concealments. In a young person it is simply allowable; we do not expect him to be above it.—Bovee.

The smile upon the old man's lip, like the last rays of the setting sun, pierces the heart with a sweet and sad emotion. There is still a ray, there is still a smile; but they may be the last.—Madame Swetchine.

Is it that Nature, attentive to the preservation of mankind, increases our wishes to live, while she lessens our enjoyments, and as she robs the senses of every pleasure, equips imagination in the spoil?—Goldsmith.

If the memory is more flexible in childhood, it is more tenacious in mature age; if childhood has sometimes the memory of words, old age has that of things, which impress themselves according to the clearness of the conception of the thought which we wish to retain.—De Bonstetten.

An age that melts with unperceived decay,
And glides in modest innocence away;
Whose peaceful Day benevolence endears,
Whose Night congratulating conscience cheers;
The general favourite as the general friend:
Such age there is, and who shall wish its end?
—Dr. Johnson.

True wisdom, indeed, springs from the wide brain which is fed from the deep heart; and it is only when age warms its withering conceptions at the memory of its youthful fire, when it makes experience serve aspiration, and knowledge illumine the difficult paths through which thoughts thread their way into facts,—it is only then that age becomes broadly and nobly wise.—Whipple.

Age, when it does not harden the heart and sour the temper, naturally returns to the milky disposition of infancy. Time has the same effect upon the mind as on the face. The predominant passion, the strongest feature, becomes more conspicuous from the others retiring.—Lady Montagu.

Some persons resemble certain trees, such as the nut, which flowers in February and ripens its fruit in September; or the juniper and the arbutus; which take a whole year or more to perfect their fruit; and others, the cherry, which takes between two and three months.—Whately.

Old age brings us to know the value of the blessings which we have enjoyed, and it brings us also to a very thankful perception of those which yet remain. Is a man advanced in life? The ease of a single day, the rest of a single night, are gifts which may be subjects of gratitude to God.—Paley.

Old age is not one of the beauties of creation, but it is one of its harmonies. The law of contrasts is one of the laws of beauty. Under the conditions of our climate, shadow gives light its worth; sternness enhances mildness; solemnity, splendor. Varying proportions of size support and subserve one another.—Madame Swetchine.

Remember that some of the brightest drops in the chalice of life may still remain for us in old age. The last draught which a kind Providence gives us to drink, though near the bottom of the cup, may, as is said of the draught of the Roman of old, have at the very bottom, instead of dregs, most costly pearls.—W. A. Newman.

Behold where age's wretched victim lies,
See his head trembling, and his half-closed eyes,
Frequent for breath his panting bosom heaves;
To broken sleep his remnant sense he gives,
And only by his pains, awaking, finds he lives.
—Prior.

The course of my long life hath reached at last,
In fragile bark o'er a tempestuous sea,
The common harbor, where must rendered be,
Account of all the actions of the past.
—Longfellow.

Weak withering age no rigid law forbids,
With frugal nectar, smooth and slow with balm,
The sapless habit daily to bedew,
And give the hesitating wheels of life
Glibber to play.
—John Armstrong.

Old age likes to dwell in the recollections of the past, and, mistaking the speedy march of years, often is inclined to take the prudence of the winter time for a fit wisdom of midsummer days. Manhood is bent to the passing cares of the passing moment, and holds so closely to his eyes the sheet of "to-day," that it screens the "to-morrow" from his sight.—Kossuth.

There is a quiet repose and steadiness about the happiness of age, if the life has been well spent. Its feebleness is not painful. The nervous system has lost its acuteness. But, in mature years we feel that a burn, a scald, a cut, is more tolerable than it was in the sensitive period of youth.—Hazlitt.

Me let the tender office long engage
To rock the cradle of reposing age;
With lenient arts extend a mother's breath,
Make languor smile, and smooth the bed of death;
Explore the thought, explain the asking eye!
And keep awhile one parent from the sky.
—Pope.

Old age is courteous—no one more:
For time after time he knocks at the door,
But nobody says, "Walk in, sir, pray!"
Yet turns he not from the door away,
But lifts the latch, and enters with speed,
And then they cry, "A cool one, indeed."
—Goethe.

I'm growing fonder of my staff;
I'm growing dimmer in the eyes;
I'm growing fainter in my laugh;
I'm growing deeper in my sighs;
I'm growing careless of my dress;
I'm growing frugal of my gold;
I'm growing wise; I'm growing,—yes,—
I'm growing old.
—Saxe.

The careful cold bath nipt my rugged rind,
And in my face deep furrows eld hath plighted;
My head bespren with hoary frost I find,
And by mine eye the crow his claw doth bright;
Delight is laid abed, and pleasure past;
No sun now shines, clouds have all overcast.
—Spenser.

Can man be so age-stricken that no faintest sunshine of his youth may revisit him once a year? It is impossible. The moss on our time-worn mansion brightens into beauty; the good old pastor, who once dwelt here, renewed his prime and regained his boyhood in the genial breeze of his ninetieth spring. Alas for the worn and heavy soul, if, whether in youth or age, it has outlived its privilege of springtime sprightliness!—Hawthorne.

Old age doth in sharp pains abound;
We are belabored by the gout,
Our blindness is a dark profound,
Our deafness each one laughs about.
Then reason's light with falling ray
Doth but a trembling flicker cast.
Honor to age, ye children pay!
Alas! my fifty years are past!

—Beranger.

My way of life
Is fallen into the sear, the yellow leaf
And that which should accompany old age,
As honor, love, obedience, troops of friends,
I must not look to have; but, in their stead,
Curses not loud, but deep, mouth-honor,
breath,
Which the poor heart would fain deny, and dare not.

—Shakespeare.

His silver hairs
Will purchase us a good opinion,
And buy men's voices to commend our
deeds;
It shall be said his judgment rul'd our hands;
Our youths and wildness shall no whit appear,
But all be buried in his gravity.

—Shakespeare.

These old fellows have
Their ingratitude in them hereditary;
Their blood is caked, 'tis cold, it seldom flows;
'Tis lack of kindly warmth, they are not kind,
And nature, as it grows toward earth,
Is fashion'd for the journey—dull and heavy.

—Shakespeare.

It is noticeable how intuitively in age we go back with strange fondness to all that is fresh in the earliest dawn of youth. If we never cared for little children before, we delight to see them roll in the grass over which we hobble on crutches. The grandsire turns wearily from his middle-aged, care-worn son, to listen with infant laugh to the prattle of an infant grandchild. It is the old who plant young trees; it is the old who are most saddened by the autumn, and feel most delight in the returning spring.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Agree

Agreeing to differ.—Ovid.

The character in conversation which commonly passes for agreeable is made up of civility and falsehood.—Swift.

Nature never says one thing, Wisdom another.—Juvenal.

Agreement exists in disagreement.—Lucan.

If you wish to appear agreeable in society you must consent to be taught many things which you know already.—Lavater.

Most arts require long study and application; but the most useful art of all, that of pleasing, requires only the desire.—Chesterfield.

We may say of agreeableness, as distinct from beauty, that it consists in a symmetry of which we know not the rules, and a secret conformity of the features to each other, and to the air and complexion of the person.—Rochefoucauld.

The art of being agreeable frequently miscarries through the ambition which accompanies it. Wit, learning, wisdom,—what can more effectually conduce to the profit and delight of society? Yet I am sensible that a man may be too invariably wise, learned, or witty to be agreeable; and I take the reason of this to be, that pleasure cannot be bestowed by the simple and unmixed exertion of any one faculty or accomplishment.—Cumberland.

Nature has left every man a capacity of being agreeable, though not of shining in company; and there are a hundred men sufficiently qualified for both who, by a very few faults, that they might correct in half an hour, are not so much as tolerable.—Swift.

Agriculture

The farmers are the founders of civilization.—Daniel Webster.

The divine chemistry works in the subsoil.—Hawthorne.

Time spent in the cultivation of the fields passes very pleasantly.—Ovid.

He who owns the soil, owns up to the sky.—Juvenal.

Here Ceres' gifts in waving prospect stand,
And nodding tempt the joyful reaper's hand.
—Pope.

Command large fields, but cultivate small ones.—Virgil.

A field becomes exhausted by constant tillage.—Ovid.

He that sows his grain upon marble will have many a hungry belly before his harvest.—Arbuthnot.

Earth is here so kind, that just tickle her with a hoe and she laughs with a harvest.—Douglas Jerrold.

Methinks I have a great desire to a bottle of hay: good hay, sweet hay, hath no fellow.—Shakespeare.

In ancient times, the sacred plough employed the kings, and awful fathers of mankind.—Thomson.

Praise a large domain, cultivate a small state.—Virgil.

Smoothly and lightly the golden seed by the furrow is covered.—Goethe.

Agriculture engenders good sense, and good sense of an excellent kind.—Joubert.

The life of the husbandman,—a life fed by the bounty of earth and sweetened by the airs of heaven.—Douglas Jerrold.

When weary reapers quit the sultry field,
And, crown'd with corn, their thanks to Ceres yield.
—Pope.

And the maize-field grew and ripened,
Till it stood in all the splendor
Of its garments green and yellow.
—Longfellow.

An agricultural life is one eminently calculated for human happiness and human virtue.—Josiah Quincy.

The first farmer was the first man, and all historic nobility rests on possession and use of land.—Emerson.

Let the farmer forevermore be honored in his calling; for they who labor in the earth are the chosen people of God.—Thomas Jefferson.

He who would look with contempt upon the farmer's pursuit is not worthy the name of a man.—Beecher.

The sun, which ripens the corn and fills the succulent herb with nutriment, also pencils with beauty the violet and the rose.—J. C. Abbott.

The frost is God's plough, which He drives through every inch of ground in the world, opening each clod, and pulverizing the whole.—Fuller.

If we estimate dignity by immediate usefulness, agriculture is undoubtedly the first and noblest science.—Dr. Johnson.

The cattle are grazing,
Their heads never raising:
There are forty feeding like one!
—Wordsworth.

Adam, well may we labor, still to dress
This garden, still to tend plant, herb, and flower.
—Milton.

Where grows?—where grows it not? If vain our toil,
We ought to blame the culture, not the soil.
—Pope.

Trade increases the wealth and glory of a country; but its real strength and stamina are to be looked for among the cultivators of the land.—Lord Chatham.

Heap high the farmer's wintry hoard!
Heap high the golden corn!
No richer gift has Autumn poured
From out her lavish horn!
—Whittier.

But let the good old corn adorn
The hills our fathers trod;
Still let us, for His golden corn,
Send up our thanks to God!
—Whittier.

The first three men in the world were a gardener, a ploughman, and a grazier: and if any man object that the second of these was a murderer, I desire he would consider that as soon as he was so, he quitted our profession and turned builder.—Cowley.

"Agriculture, for an honorable and high-minded man," says Xenophon, "is the best of all occupations and arts by which men procure the means of living."—Alcott.

God Almighty first planted a garden; and indeed it is the purest of human pleasures: it is the greatest refreshment to the spirits of man.—Bacon.

Ye rigid ploughmen! bear in mind
Your labor is for future hours.
Advance! spare not! nor look behind!
Plough deep and straight with all your Powers! —Richard Hengist Horne.

Agriculture is the noblest of all alchemy; for it turns earth, and even manure, into gold, conferring upon its cultivator the additional reward of health.—Chatfield.

Oft did the harvest to their sickle yield:
Their furrow oft the stubborn glebe has
broke:

How jocund did they drive their team
a-field!

How bow'd the woods beneath their sturdy stroke! —Gray.

Look up! the wide extended plain
Is billowy with its ripened grain,
And on the summer winds are rolled
Its waves of emerald and gold.
—Wm. Henry Burleigh.

In the age of acorns, antecedent to Ceres and the royal ploughman Triptolemus, a single barley-corn had been of more value to mankind than all the diamonds that glowed in the mines of India.—H. Brooke.

Our rural ancestors, with little blest,
Patient of labor when the end was rest, Indulg'd the day that hous'd their annual grain,
With feasts, and off'rings, and a thankful strain. —Pope.

And he gave it for his opinion, that whoever could make two ears of corn, or two blades of grass, to grow upon a spot of ground where only one grew before, would deserve better of mankind, and do more essential service to his country, than the whole race of politicians put together.—Swift.

It is not known where he that invented the plough was born nor where he died; yet he has effected more for the happiness of the world than the whole race of heroes and of conquerors who have drenched it with tears and manured it with blood, and whose birth, parentage, and education have been handed down to us with a precision precisely proportionate to the mischief they have done.—Colton.

E'en in mid-harvest, while the jocund swain Pluck'd from the brittle stalk the golden grain,
Oft have I seen the war of winds contend,
And prone on earth th' infuriate storm descend, Waste far and wide, and by the roots
upturn,
The heavy harvest sweep through ether borne,
As the light straw and rapid stubble fly
In dark'ning whirlwinds round the wintry sky. —Virgil.

In ancient times, the sacred Plough employed

The Kings and awful Fathers of mankind:
And some, with whom compared your insect-tribes

Are but the beings of a summer's day,
Have held the Scale of Empire, ruled the Storm
Of mighty War; then, with victorious hand,
Disdaining little delicacies, seized
The Plough, and, greatly independent scorned

All the vile stores corruption can bestow.
—Thomson.

In a moral point of view, the life of the agriculturist is the most pure and holy of any class of men; pure, because it is the most healthful, and vice can hardly find time to contaminate it; and holy, because it brings the Deity perpetually before his view, giving him thereby the most exalted notions of supreme power, and the most fascinating and endearing view of moral benignity.—Lord John Russell.

Alchemy

I have always looked upon alchemy in natural philosophy to be like enthusiasm in divinity, and to have troubled the world much to the same purpose.—Sir W. Temple.

It is an art without art, which has its beginning in falsehood, its middle in toil, and its end in poverty.—From the Latin.

If by fire
Of sooty coal th' empiric alchymist
Can turn, or holds it possible to turn,
Metals of drossest ore to perfect gold.
—Milton.

The glorious sun
Stays in his course and plays the alchemist,
Turning with splendor of his precious eye
The meager cloddy earth to glittering gold.
—Shakespeare.

Alchemy may be compared to the man who told his sons he had left them gold buried somewhere in his vineyard; where they by digging found no gold, but by turning up the mould, about the roots of their vines, procured a plentiful vintage. So the search and endeavors to make gold have brought many useful inventions and instructive experiments to light.
—Bacon.

Alienation, Evils of

Nothing presents a more mournful aspect than a family divided by anger and animosity. Unhappily, however, this is not a very rare occurrence. We even behold at times, brothers themselves so indifferent towards each other, so wanting in affection, or even in a state of such hostility among themselves that they appear as if they had been cherished by the same fond heart only to be divided by their tastes and manner of thinking. Often they are less obliging to one another than they are to persons whom they know not.—Zachokke.

Allegory

Allegory dwells in a transparent palace.—Le Mierre.

A man conversing in earnest, if he watch his intellectual processes, will find that a material image, more or less luminous, arises in his mind, contemporaneous with every thought, which furnishes the vestment of the thought. Hence, good writing and brilliant discourse are perpetual allegories.—Emerson.

Allegories, when well chosen, are like so many tracks of light in a discourse, that make everything about them clear and beautiful.—Addison.

Almond

With a bee in every bell,
Almond bloom, we greet thee well.
—Edwin Arnold.

Blossom of the almond trees,
April's gift to April's bees.
—Edwin Arnold.

White as the blossoms which the almond tree,
Above its bald and leafless branches bears.
—Margaret J. Preston.

Like to an almond tree ymounted hye
On top of greene Selinis all alone,
With blossoms brave bedecked daintily;
Whose tender locks do tremble every one,
At everie little breath, that under heaven is blowne.
—Spenser.

Almond blossom, sent to teach us
That the spring days soon will reach us.
—Edwin Arnold.

Alms

Charity is the perfection and ornament of religion.—Addison.

Where there is plenty, charity is a duty, not a courtesy.—Feltham.

We may cover a multitude of sins with the white robe of charity.—Beecher.

Are we not to pity and supply the poor, though they have no relation to us? No relation? That cannot be. The Gospel styles them all our brethren.—Thomas Sprat.

Those good men who take such pleasure in relieving the miserable for Christ's sake, would not have been less forward to minister unto Christ Himself.—Atterbury.

Shall we repine at a little misplaced charity, we who could no way foresee the effect, when an all-knowing, all-wise Being showers down every day His benefits on the unthankful and undeserving?—Atterbury.

Alone

It is not good that man should be alone.—Genesis ii. 18.

They are never alone that are accompanied with noble thoughts.—Sir Philip Sidney.

The time never lies heavy upon him; it is impossible for him to be alone.—Addison.

When musing on companions gone,
We doubly feel ourselves alone.
—Scott.

Alone!—that worn-out word,
So idly spoken, and so coldly heard;
Yet all that poets sing, and grief hath known,
Of hopes laid waste, knells in that word—Alone.
—Lytton.

Amaranth

Bid amaranthus all his beauty shed,
And daffodillies fill their cups with tears,
To strew the laureate hearse where Lycid lies.
—Milton.

Nosegays! leave them for the waking,
Throw them earthward where they grew
Dim are such, beside the breaking Amaranth he looks unto.
Folded eyes see brighter colors than the open ever do. —E. B. Browning.

Amaranthus such as crown the maids
That wander through Zamara's shades.
—Moore.

Immortal amaranth, a flower which once
In Paradise, fast by the Tree of Life,
Began to bloom, but soon for Man's offence,
To heav'n remov'd, where first it grew,
there grows,
And flow'rs aloft shading the fount of life.
—Milton.

Ambassador

An ambassador is an honest man sent to lie abroad for the commonwealth.—Sir H. Wotton.

Ambition

Ambition is the mind's immodesty.—
Davenant.

Ambition's cradle oftenest is its grave.—Longfellow.

By that sin angels fell.—Shake-
speare.

The glorious frailty of the noble mind.—Hoole.

The noblest spirit is most strongly attracted by the love of glory.—Cicero.

Ambition has no rest!—Bulwer-
Lytton.

Men would be angels, angels would be gods.—Pope.

The path of glory leads but to the grave.—Gray.

Ambition, like a torrent, never looks back.—Ben Jonson.

Vaulting ambition, which overleaps itself.—Shakespeare.

Ambition is not a vice of little people.—Montaigne.

I charge thee, fling away ambition:
By that sin fell the angels.
—Shakespeare.

No man is born without ambitious worldly desires.—Carlyle.

All may have, if they dare try, a glorious life or grave.—Herbert.

Ambition is like love, impatient both of delays and rivals.—Denham.

Though ambition in itself is a vice,
yet it is often the parent of virtues.—
Quintilian.

If you wish to reach the highest, begin at the lowest.—Syrus.

Fatal ambition! say what wondrous charms
Delude mankind to toil for thee in arms?
—Rowe.

Ambition is but the evil shadow of aspiration.—George Macdonald.

You have greatly ventured, but all must do so who would greatly win.—
Byron.

When once ambition has passed its natural limits, its progress is boundless.—Seneca.

Nothing is too high for the daring of mortals: we storm heaven itself in our folly.—Horace.

Ambition is like hunger; it obeys no law but its appetite.—H. W. Shaw.

He who surpasses or subdues mankind must look down on the hate of those below.—Byron.

The highest and most lofty trees have the most reason to dread the thunder.—Rollin.

Ambition hath one heel nail'd in hell,
Though she stretch her fingers to touch the heavens. —Lilly.

They that stand high, have many blasts to shake them;
And if they fall, they dash themselves to pieces. —Shakespeare.

Ambition breaks the ties of blood, and forgets the obligations of gratitude.—Sir W. Scott.

Think not ambition wise, because 't is brave.—Sir W. Davenant.

Too low they build who build beneath the stars.—Young.

What is ambition but desire of greatness?
And what is greatness but extent of power? —Higgons.

Beware ambition; heaven is not reached with pride, but with submission.—Middleton.

Who soars too near the sun, with golden wings, melts them.—Shakespeare.

How like a mounting devil in the heart
Rules the unreined ambition! —Willis.

Take away ambition and vanity, and where will be your heroes and patriots?—Seneca.

It is the constant fault and inseparable ill quality of ambition never to look behind it.—Seneca.

Ah! curst ambition! to thy lures we owe
All the great ills that mortals bear below. —Teckell.

Blood only serves to wash Ambition's hands.—Byron.

Remarkable places are like the summits of rocks; eagles and reptiles only can get there.—Madame Necker.

Ambition hath but two steps; the lowest, blood; the highest, envy.—Lilly.

We frequently pass from love to ambition, but one seldom returns from ambition to love.—Rochefoucauld.

—there is a fire and motion of the soul,
But once kindled, quenchless evermore. —Byron.

Most people would succeed in small things if they were not troubled with great ambitions.—Longfellow.

Proud-crested fiend, the world's worst foe, ambition.—Bloomfield.

Ambition thinks no face so beautiful as that which looks from under a crown.—Sir P. Sidney.

Ambition is the germ from which all growth of nobleness proceeds.—T. D. English.

It is by attempting to reach the top at a single leap that so much misery is produced in the world.—Cobbett.

Ambition often puts men upon doing the meanest offices; so climbing is performed in the same posture with creeping.—Swift.

The tallest trees are most in the power of the winds, and ambitious men of the blasts of fortune.—William Penn.

One may easily enough guard against ambition till five-and-twenty. It is not ambition's day.—Shenstone.

Ambition, like love, can abide no lingering; and ever urgeth on his own successes, hating nothing but what may stop them.—Sir P. Sidney.

Neither love nor ambition, as it has often been shown, can brook a division of its empire in the heart.—Bovee.

It is observed by Cicero, that men of the greatest and most shining parts are most actuated by ambition.—Addison.

The cheat ambition, eager to espouse

dominion, courts it with a lying show, and shines in borrowed pomp to serve a turn.—Jeffrey.

The ambitious deceive themselves when they propose an end to their ambition; for that end, when attained, becomes a means.—Rochefoucauld.

Ambition is an idol, on whose wings great minds are carried only to extreme,—to be sublimely great, or to be nothing.—Southern.

What is ambition? It is a glorious cheat! Angels of light walk not so dazlingly the sapphire walls of heaven.—Willis.

Our natures are like oil; compound us with anything,
Yet will we strive to swim to the top.
—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Ambition is a lust that's never quenched,
Grows more inflamed, and madder by enjoyment.
—Otway.

Ambition has but one reward for all:
A little power, a little transient fame,
A grave to rest in, and a fading name!
—William Winter.

Uncurbed ambition, unresisting sloth,
And base dependence, are the fiends accursed.
—Mason.

Ambition sufficiently plagues her proselytes, by keeping themselves always in show, like the statue of a public place.—Montaigne.

In the world there are only two ways of raising one's self, either by one's own industry or by the weakness of others.—Bruyère.

Unruly ambition is deaf, not only to the advice of friends, but to the counsels and monitions of reason itself.—L'Estrange.

To wish is of little account; to succeed you must earnestly desire; and this desire must shorten thy sleep.—Ovid.

When you are aspiring to the highest place, it is honorable to reach the second or even the third rank.—Cicero.

The object of ambition, unlike that of love, never being wholly possessed, ambition is the more durable passion of the two.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Ambition is an idol, on whose wings Great minds are carried only to extreme; To be sublimely great or to be nothing.
—Southey.

For my part, I had rather be the first man among these fellows than the second man in Rome.—Cæsar.

Dream after dream ensues,
And still they dream that they shall still succeed,
And still are disappointed.
—Cowper.

A slave has but one master; the ambitious man has as many masters as there are persons whose aid may contribute to the advancement of his fortune.—Bruyère.

Like dogs in a wheel, birds in a cage, or squirrels in a chain, ambitious men still climb and climb, with great labor, and incessant anxiety, but never reach the top.—Burton.

Be always displeased at what thou art, if thou desire to attain to what thou art not; for where thou hast pleased thyself, there thou abidest.—Quarles.

Every one has before his eyes an end which he pursues till death; but for many that end is a feather which they blow before them in the air.—Nicol.

Ambition is a rebel both to the soul and reason, and enforces all laws, all conscience; treads upon religion, and offers violence to nature's self.—Ben Jonson.

But what will not ambition and revenge Descend to? who aspires must down as low As high he soar'd, obnoxious first or last To basest things.
—Milton.

There is a native baseness in the ambition which seeks beyond its desert that never shows more conspicuously than when, no matter how, it temporarily gains its object.—Simms.

The modesty of certain ambitious persons consists in becoming great without making too much noise; it may be said that they advance in the world on tiptoe.—Voltaire.

Wisdom is corrupted by ambition, even when the quality of the ambition is intellectual. For ambition, even of this quality, is but a form of self-love.—Henry Taylor.

I begin where most people end, with a full conviction of the emptiness of all sorts of ambition, and the unsatisfactory nature of all human pleasures.—Pope.

Ambition's like a circle on the water,
Which never ceases to enlarge itself,
'Till by broad spreading it disperse to nought. —Shakespeare.

Talents angel-bright,
If wanting worth are shining instruments
In false ambition's hand, to finish faults Illustrious, and give infamy renown.
—Young.

We should be careful to deserve a good reputation by doing well; and when that care is once taken, not to be over anxious about the success.—Rochester.

O cursed ambition, thou devouring bird,
How dost thou from the field of honesty
Pick every grain of profit or delight,
And mock the reaper's toil! —Havard

All my ambition is, I own,
To profit and to please unknown;
Like streams supplied from springs below,
Which scatter blessings as they go.
—Dr. Cotton.

If love and ambition should be in equal balance, and come to jostle with equal force, I make no doubt but that the last would win the prize.—Montaigne.

Where ambition can be so happy as to cover its enterprises even to the person himself, under the appearance of principle, it is the most incurable and inflexible of all human passions.—Hume.

Most natures are insolvent; cannot satisfy their own wants, have an ambition out of all proportion to their practical force, and so do lean and beg day and night continually.—Emerson.

Ambition! deadly tyrant! inexorable master! what alarms, what anxious hours, what agonies of heart, are the sure portion of thy gaudy slaves?—Mallet.

A hop and skip shall raise the son of a cobbler, well underlaid with pieces, to the government of a prince, till over-much ambitious cutting wears him to his last.—Nabbes.

It is not for man to rest in absolute contentment. He is born to hopes and aspirations, as the sparks fly upward, unless he has brutified his nature, and quenched the spirit of immortality, which is his portion.—Southey.

Ambition makes the same mistake concerning power that avarice makes concerning wealth. She begins by accumulating power as a mean to happiness, and she finishes by continuing to accumulate it as an end.—Colton.

Moderation cannot have the credit of combating and subduing ambition,—they are never found together. Moderation is the languor and indolence of the soul, as ambition is its activity and ardor.—Rochefoucauld.

Ambition is but avarice on stilts, and masked. God sometimes sends a famine, sometimes a pestilence, and sometimes a hero, for the chastisement of mankind; none of them surely for our admiration.—Landor.

Who knows but He, whose hand the lightning forms,
Who heaves old ocean, and who wings the storms,
Pours fierce ambition in a Caesar's mind.
—Pope.

Dreams, indeed, are ambition; for the very substance of the ambitious is merely the shadow of a dream. And I hold ambition of so airy and light a quality, that it is but a shadow's shadow.—Shakespeare.

Ambition is like cholera, which is a humor that maketh men active, earnest, full of alacrity, and stirring, if it be not stopped, but if it be stopped, and cannot have its way, it becometh fiery, and thereby malign and venomous.—Bacon.

We should reflect that whatever tempts the pride and vanity of ambitious persons is not so big as the smallest star which we see scattered in disorder and unregarded on the pavement of heaven.—Jeremy Taylor.

Ambition is a spirit in the world
That causes all the ebbs and flows of nations, Keeps mankind sweet by action; without that,
The world would be a filthy, settled mud.
—Crown.

Aspiring to nothing but humility, the wise man will make it the height of his ambition to be unambitious. As he cannot effect all that he wishes, he will only wish for that which he can effect.—Chatfield.

Ambition is to the mind what the cap is to the falcon; it blinds us first, and then compels us to tower, by reason of our blindness. But alas! when we are at the summit of a vain ambition, we are also at the depth of misery.—Colton.

Ill-weaved ambition, how much art thou shrunk! when that this body did contain a spirit, a kingdom for it was too small a bound; but now, two paces of the vilest earth is room enough.—Shakespeare.

When ambitious men find an open passage, they are rather busy than dangerous; and if well watched in their proceedings, they will catch themselves in their own snare, and prepare a way for their own destruction.—Quarles.

If not for that of conscience, yet at least for ambition's sake, let us reject ambition, let us disdain that thirst of honor and renown, so low and mendicant, that it makes us beg it of all sorts of people.—Montaigne.

Nothing can be more destructive to ambition, and the passion for conquest, than the true system of astronomy. What a poor thing is even the whole globe in comparison of the infinite extent of nature!—Fontenelle.

Don Quixote thought he could have made beautiful bird-cages and tooth-picks if his brain had not been so full of ideas of chivalry. Most people would succeed in small things if they were not troubled with great ambitions.—Longfellow.

Be not with honor's gilded baits beguild,
Nor think ambition wise, because 'tis
brave;
For though we like it, as a forward child,
'Tis so unsound, her cradle is the grave.
—Davenant.

Ambition's monstrous stomach does increase
By eating, and it fears to starve, unless
It still may feed, and all it sees devour;
Ambition is not tir'd with toil nor cloy'd with power.
—Davenant.

Oh, sons of earth! attempt ye still to rise,
By mountains pil'd on mountains to the skies?
Heav'n still with laughter the vain toil
surveys,
And buries madmen in the heaps they raise.
—Pope.

Ambition is a gilded misery, a secret poison, a hidden plague, the engineer of deceit, the mother of hypocrisy, the parent of envy, the original of vices, the moth of holiness, the blinder of hearts, turning medicines into maladies, and remedies into diseases.—Thomas Brooks.

Hard, withering toil only can achieve a name; and long days and months and years must be passed in the chase of that bubble, reputation, which, when once grasped, breaks in your eager clutch into a hundred lesser bubbles, that soar above you still.—Mitchell.

Ambition is frequently the only refuge which life has left to the denied or mortified affections. We chide at the grasping eye, the daring wing, the soul that seems to thirst for sovereignty only, and know not that the flight of this ambitious bird has been from a bosom or home that is filled with ashes.—Simms.

We must distinguish between felicity and prosperity; for prosperity leads often to ambition, and ambition to disappointment; the course is then over, the wheel turns round but once, while the reaction of goodness and happiness is perpetual.—Landor.

What's all the gaudy glitter of a crown?
What but the glaring meteor of ambition,
That leads the wretch benighted in his errors,
Points to the gulf and shines upon destruction.
—Brooke.

Ambition is torment enough for an enemy; for it affords as much discontentment in enjoying as in want, making men like poisoned rats, which, when they have tasted of their bane, cannot rest till they drink, and then can much less rest till they die.—Bishop Hall.

Ambition becomes displeasing when it is once satiated; there is a reaction; and as our spirit, till our last sigh, is always aiming toward some object, it falls back on itself, having nothing else on which to rest; and having reached the summit, it longs to descend.—Corneille.

To be ambitious of true honor, of the true glory and perfection of our natures, is the very principle and incentive of virtue; but to be ambitious of titles, of place, of ceremonial respects and civil pageantry, is as vain and little as the things are which we court.—Sir. P. Sidney.

Lowliness is young ambition's ladder,
Whereto the climber-upward turns his face;
And when he once obtains the upmost round,
He then unto the ladder turns his back,
Looks in the clouds, scorning the base degrees
By which he did ascend. —Shakespeare.

Lives there the man with soul so dead as to disown the wish to merit the people's applause, and having uttered words worthy to be kept by cedar oil to latest times, to leave behind him rhymes that dread neither herrings nor frankincense.—Persius.

A noble man compares and estimates himself by an idea which is higher than himself, and a mean man by one which is lower than himself. The one produces aspiration; the other, ambition. Ambition is the way in which a vulgar man aspires.—Beecher.

Ambition, that high and glorious passion, which makes such havoc among the sons of men, arises from a proud desire of honor and distinction; and when the splendid trappings in which it is usually caparisoned are removed, will be found to consist of the mean materials of envy, pride, and covetousness.—Burton.

It is the nature of ambition to make men liars and cheats, and hide the truth in their breasts, and show, like jugglers, another thing in their mouths; to cut all friendships and enmities to the measure of their interest, and to make a good countenance without the help of a good will.—Sallust.

If at great things thou would'st arrive,
Get riches first, get wealth, and treasure heap,
Not difficult, if thou hearken to me;
Riches are mine, fortune is in my hand,
They whom I favor thrive in wealth again,
While virtue, valor, wisdom, sit in want.
—Milton.

The man who seeks one thing in life, and but one,
May hope to achieve it before life be done;
But he who seeks all things, wherever he goes,
Only reaps from the hopes which around him he sows
A harvest of barren regrets.
—Owen Meredith.

Man was mark'd
A friend in his creation to himself,
And may, with fit ambition, conceive
The greatest blessings, and the highest honors
Appointed for him, if he can achieve them
The right and noble way. —Massinger.

If we look abroad upon the great multitude of mankind, and endeavor to trace out the principles of action in every individual, it will, I think, seem highly probable that ambition runs through the whole species, and that every man, in proportion to the vigor of his complexion, is more or less actuated by it.—Thomas Hughes.

Those that were up themselves, kept others low;
Those that were low themselves, held others hard;
He suffered them to ryse or greater grow;
But every one did strive his fellow down to throw.
—Spenser.

I am as one
Who doth attempt some lofty mountain's height,
And having gained what to the upcast eye
The summit's point appear'd, astonish'd sees
Its cloudy top, majestic and enlarged,
Towering aloft, as distant as before.
—Joanna Baillie.

Say what we will, you may be sure that ambition is an error; its wear and tear of heart are never recompensed—it steals away the freshness of life,—it deadens its vivid and social enjoyments,—it shuts our souls to our own youth,—and we are old ere we remember that we have made a fever and a labor of our raciest years.—Bulwer-Lytton.

There is no greater unreasonable-ness in the world than in the designs of ambition; for it makes the present certainly miserable, unsatisfactory, troublesome, and discontented, for the uncertain acquisition of an honor which nothing can secure; and, besides, a thousand possibilities of miscarrying, it relies upon no greater certainty than our life; and when we are dead all the world sees who was the fool.—Jeremy Taylor.

Farewell, a long farewell, to all my greatness!
This is the state of man. To-day he puts forth
The tender leaves of hope; to-morrow blossoms,
And bears his blushing honors thick upon him;
The third day comes a frost, a killing frost.
—Shakespeare.

It is a true observation of ancient writers, that as men are apt to be cast down by adversity, so they are easily satiated with prosperity, and that joy and grief produce the same effects. For whenever men are not obliged by necessity to fight they fight from ambition, which is so powerful a passion in the human breast that however high we reach we are never satisfied.—Machiavelli.

The cheat ambition, eager to espouse
Dominion, courts it with a lying show,
And shines in borrow'd pomp to serve a turn;
But the match made, the farce is at an end;
And all the hireling equipage of virtues,
Faith, honor, justice, gratitude and friendship, Discharg'd at once.
—Jeffreys.

The wondrous architecture of the world,
And measure every wandering planet's course,
Still climbing after knowledge infinite,
And always moving as the restless spheres,
Will us to wear ourselves, and never rest
Until we reach the ripest fruit of all,
That perfect bliss and sole felicity,
The sweet fruition of a heavenly crown.
—Marlowe.

The shadow, wheresoever it passes, leaves no track behind it; and of the greatest personages of the world, when they are once dead, then there remains no more than if they had never lived. How many preceding emperors of the Assyrian monarchy were lords of the world as well as Alexander! and now we remain not only ignorant of their monuments, but know not so much as their names. And of the same great Alexander, what have we at this day except the vain noise of his fame?—Jeremy Taylor.

On the summit see,
The seals of office glitter in his eyes;
He climbs, he pants, he grasps them! At his heels,
Close at his heels, a demagogue ascends,
And with a dexterous jerk soon twists him down,
And wins them, but to lose them in his turn.
—Cowper.

Ambition is, of all other, the most contrary humor to solitude; and glory and repose are so inconsistent that they cannot possibly inhabit one and the same place; and for so much as I understand, those have only their arms and legs disengaged from the crowd.

their mind and intention remain engaged behind more than ever.—Montaigne.

There is a kind of grandeur and respect which the meanest and most insignificant part of mankind endeavor to procure in the little circle of their friends and acquaintance. The poorest mechanic, nay, the man who lives upon common alms, gets him his set of admirers, and delights in that superiority which he enjoys over those who are in some respects beneath him. This ambition, which is natural to the soul of man, might, methinks, receive a very happy turn; and, if it were rightly directed, contribute as much to a person's advantage, as it generally does to his uneasiness and disquiet.—Addison.

This raging, vehement desire,
Of sovereignty no satisfaction finds;
But in the breasts of men doth ever roll
The restless stone of Sisyph, to torment
them,
And as his heart, who stole the heav'nly fire,
The vulture gnaws, so doth that monster
rent them;
Had they the world, the world would not content them. —Earl of Sterling.

America

Child of the earth's old age.—Miss Langdon.

The home of the homeless all over the earth.—Street.

America, — half-brother of the world!—Bailey.

America is rising with a giant's strength. Its bones are yet but cartilages.—Fisher Ames.

I was born an American; I live an American; I shall die an American.—Daniel Webster.

America is a fortunate country. She grows by the follies of our European nations.—Napoleon.

Sail on, O Ship of State!
Sail on, O Union, strong and great.
—Longfellow.

The enterprise of America precedes that of Europe, as the industry of England precedes that of the rest of Europe.—Beaconsfield.

America has begun her career at the culminating point of life, as Adam did at the age of thirty.—Mme. Swetchine.

Earth's biggest country's gut her soul
An' risen up earth's greatest nation.
—Lowell.

Down to the Plymouth Rock, that had been to their feet as a doorstep
Into a world unknown—the corner-stone of a nation! —Longfellow.

America has furnished to the world the character of Washington! And if our American institutions had done nothing else, that alone would have entitled them to the respect of mankind.—Daniel Webster.

Columbia, Columbia, to glory arise,
The queen of the world and the child of the
skies!
Thy genius commands thee; with rapture
behold,
While ages on ages thy splendors unfold.
—Timothy Dwight.

England, our mother's mother! Come and see
A greater England here! O come and be At home with us, your children, for there runs
The same blood in our veins as in your sons;
The same deep-seated love of liberty
Beats in our hearts. We speak the same good tongue;
Familiar with all songs your bards have sung,
Those large men, Milton, Shakespeare,
both are ours. —Stoddard.

Cease to brag to me of America, and its model institutions and constitutions. America, too, will have to strain its energies, crack its sinews, and all but break its heart, as the rest of us have had to do, in thousand-fold wrestle with the Pythonous and mud-demons, before it can become a habitation for the gods.—Carlyle.

Young man, there is America—which at this day serves for little more than to amuse you with stories of savage men and uncouth manners; yet shall, before you taste of death, show itself equal to the whole of that commerce which now attracts the envy of the world.—Burke.

Lo! body and soul!—this land!
Mighty Manhattan, with spires, and
The sparkling and hurrying tides, and the ships;
The varied and ample land—the South
And the North in the light—Ohio's shores, and flashing Missouri,
And ever the far-spreading prairies, covered with grass and corn.

—Walt Whitman.

Our country, whether bounded by the St. John's and the Sabine, or however otherwise bounded or described, and be the measurement more or less, —still our country, to be cherished in all our hearts, to be defended by all our hands.—Robert C. Winthrop.

Amiability

Amiability shines by its own light.
—Horace.

Amiability is the redeeming quality of fools.—Miss Braddon.

How easy it is to be amiable in the midst of happiness and success!—Madame Swetchine.

We ought to regard amiability as the quality of woman, dignity that of man.—Cicero.

Amiability is very often a weakness, but the most unobjectionable one as a rule.—Lady Morgan.

Amiable people, while they are more liable to imposition in casual contact with the world, yet radiate so much of mental sunshine that they are reflected in all appreciative hearts.—Madame Deluzy.

That constant desire of pleasing, which is the peculiar quality of some, may be called the happiest of all desires in this, that it scarcely ever fails of attaining its ends, when not disgraced by affectation.—Fielding.

The amiable is a duty most certainly, but must not be exercised at the expense of any of the virtues. He who seeks to do the amiable always, can only be successful at the frequent expense of his manhood.—Simms.

Amnesty

Amnesty, that noble word, the genuine dictate of wisdom.—Æschines.

Amusement

No man is a hypocrite in his pleasures.—Dr. Johnson.

Encourage innocent amusement.—Addison.

The real character of a man is found out by his amusements.—Sir Joshua Reynolds.

Pastime passing excellent, if it be husbanded with modesty.—Shakespeare.

Amusement, to an observing mind, is study.—Beaconsfield.

A clear fire, a clean hearth, and the rigor of the game.—Lamb.

I am a great friend to public amusements; for they keep people from vice.—Samuel Johnson.

There is no such sport as sport by sport o'erthrown.—Shakespeare.

Any pleasure which takes and keeps the heart from God is sinful, and unless forsaken, will be fatal to the soul.—Richard Fuller.

Recreation is not the highest kind of enjoyment; but in its time and place it is quite as proper as prayer.—S. Irenæus Prime.

Cards were at first for benefits designed, Sent to amuse, not to enslave the mind.
—Garrick.

People should be guarded against temptation to unlawful pleasures by furnishing them means of innocent ones.—Channing.

The mind ought sometimes to be amused, that it may the better return to thought, and to itself.—Phædrus.

Amusement allures and deceives us, and leads us down imperceptibly in thoughtlessness to the grave.—Pascal.

You can't live on amusement. It is the froth on water,—an inch deep, and then the mud!—George MacDonald.

When I play with my cat, who knows whether I do not make her more sport than she makes me?—Moutaigne.

With spots quadrangular of diamond form, Ensanguined hearts, clubs typical of strife, And spades, the emblems of untimely graves. —Cowper.

They are to religion like breezes of air to the flame,—gentle ones will fan it, but strong ones will put it out.—Rev. Dr. Thomas.

By sports like these are all their cares beguiled, The sports of children satisfy the child. —Goldsmith.

So good things may be abused, and that which was first invented to refresh men's weary spirits.—Burton.

If those who are the enemies of innocent amusements had the direction of the world, they would take away the spring, and youth, the former from the year, the latter from human life.—Balzac.

The Eastern monarch who proclaimed a reward to him who should discover a new pleasure, would have deserved well of mankind had he stipulated that it should be blameless.—Whately.

Locke, whom there is no reason to suspect of being a favorer of idleness or libertinism, has advanced that whoever hopes to employ any part of his time with efficacy and vigor must allow some of it to pass in trifles.—Dr. Johnson.

We have all our playthings. Happy are they who are contented with those they can obtain; those hours are spent in the wisest manner that can easiest shade the ills of life, and are the least productive of ill consequences.—Lady Montagu.

Hail, blest Confusion! here are met
All tongues, and times, and faces;
The Lancers flirt with Juliet,
The Brahmin talks of races.
—Præd.

It is exceedingly deleterious to withdraw the sanction of religion from amusement. If we feel that it is all injurious we should strip the earth of its flowers and blot out its pleasant sunshine.—Chapin.

Let the world have their May-games, wakes, whetsunales, their dancings and concerts; their puppet-shows, hobby horses, tabors, bagpipes, balls, barley-breaks, and whatever sports and recreations please them best, provided they be followed with discretion.—Burton.

To find recreation in amusements is not happiness; for this joy springs from alien and extrinsic sources, and is therefore dependent upon and subject to interruption by a thousand accidents, which may minister inevitable affliction.—Pascal.

The habit of dissipating every serious thought by a succession of agreeable sensations is as fatal to happiness as to virtue; for when amusement is uniformly substituted for objects of moral and mental interest, we lose all that elevates our enjoyments above the scale of childish pleasures.—Anna Maria Porter.

Whatever amuses, serves to kill time, to lull the faculties, and to banish reflection. Whatever entertains, usually awakens the understanding or gratifies the fancy. Whatever diverts, is lively in its nature, and sometimes tumultuous in its effects.—Crabbe.

Analogy

The instincts of the ant are very unimportant, considered as the ant's; but the moment a ray of relation is seen to extend from it to man, and the little drudge is seen to be a monitor, a little body with a mighty heart, then all its habits, even that said to be recently observed, that it never sleeps, become sublime.—Emerson.

Anarchy

In a state of anarchy power is the measure of right.—Lucan.

Anarchy is the sure consequence of tyranny; for no power that is not limited by laws can ever be protected by them.—Milton.

The choking, sweltering, deadly, and killing rule of no rule; the consecration of cupidity and braying of folly, and dim stupidity and baseness, in most of the affairs of men. SlopsHIRTS attainable three-halfpence cheaper by the ruin of living bodies and immortal souls.—Carlyle.

Bad as any government may be, it is seldom worse than anarchy.—Æsop.

Anatomy

It is shameful for man to rest in ignorance of the structure of his own body, especially when the knowledge of it mainly conduces to his welfare, and directs his application of his own powers.—Melancthon.

Ancestry

By blood a king, in heart a clown.—Tennyson.

Breed is stronger than pasture.—George Eliot.

Some men by ancestry are only the shadow of a mighty name.—Lucan.

He who boasts of his lineage boasts of that which does not properly belong to him.—Seneca.

Whoever serves his country well has no need of ancestors.—Voltaire.

I am no herald to inquire of men's pedigrees; it sufficeth me if I know their virtues.—Sir P. Sidney.

Pride, in boasting of family antiquity, makes duration stand for merit.—Zimmermann.

People will not look forward to posterity, who never look backward to their ancestors.—Burke.

He who boasts of his descent, praises the deeds of another.—Seneca.

What is birth to a man if it shall be a stain to his dead ancestors to have left such an offspring?—Sir P. Sidney.

It is, indeed, a blessing, when the virtues of noble races are hereditary; and do derive themselves from the imitation of virtuous ancestors.—Nabb.

Philosophy does not regard pedigree; she did not receive Plato as a noble, but she made him so.—Seneca.

It is of no consequence of what parents any man is born, so that he be a man of merit.—Horace.

The man who has nothing to boast of but his illustrious ancestry is like a potato,—the only good belonging to him is underground.—Sir Thomas Overbury.

Great families of yesterday we show,
And lords whose parents were the Lord knows who. —Daniel De Foe.

From yon blue heaven above us bent,
the grand old gardener and his wife smile at the claims of long descent.—
Tennyson.

Our ancestors are very good kind of folks; but they are the last people I should choose to have a visiting acquaintance with.—Sheridan.

What can they see in the longest kingly line in Europe, save that it runs back to a successful soldier?—
Walter Scott.

When real nobleness accompanies that imaginary one of birth, the imaginary seems to mix with real, and becomes real too.—Lord Greville.

It is better to be the builder of our own name than to be indebted by descent for the proudest gifts known to the books of heraldry.—Hosea Ballou

He that boasts of his ancestors, the founders and raisers of a family, doth confess that he hath less virtue.—Jeremy Taylor.

The pride of ancestry is a superstructure of the most imposing height, but resting on the most flimsy foundation.—Colton.

They that on glorious ancestors enlarge, Produce their debt, instead of their discharge.—Young.

Pedigrees seldom improve by age; the grandson is too often a weak infringement on the grandsire's patent.—H. W. Shaw.

If it is fortunate to be of noble ancestry, it is not less so to be such as that people do not care to be informed whether you are noble or ignoble.—Bruyère.

It is a shame for a man to desire honor because of his noble progenitors, and not to deserve it by his own virtue.—St. Chrysostom.

Nobility of birth is like a cipher; it has no power in itself, like wealth or talent; but it tells with all the power of a cipher when added to either of the other two.—J. F. Boyes.

We are very fond of some families because they can be traced beyond the Conquest, whereas indeed the farther back, the worse, as being the nearer allied to a race of robbers and thieves.—De Foe.

The happiest lot for a man as far as birth is concerned, is that it should be such as to give him but little occasion to think much about it.—Whately.

I am one who finds within me a nobility that spurns the idle pratings of the great, and their mean boasts of what their fathers were, while they themselves are fools effeminate.—Percival.

Birth and ancestry, and that which we have not ourselves achieved, we can scarcely call our own.—Ovid.

Some decent, regulated pre-eminence, some preference (not exclusive appropriation) given to birth, is neither unnatural nor unjust nor impolitic.—Burke.

Those who depend on the merits of their ancestors may be said to search in the roots of the tree for those fruits which the branches ought to produce.—Barrow.

He that to ancient wreaths can bring no more
From his own worth, dies bankrupt on the score.—Cleveland.

I have no urns, no dusty monuments;
No broken images of ancestors,
Wanting an ear, or nose; no forged tales
Of long descents, to boast false honors from.—Ben Jonson.

It is a revered thing to see an ancient castle not in decay; how much more to behold an ancient family which have stood against the waves and weathers of time!—Bacon.

High birth is a thing which I never knew any one to disparage except those who had it not; and I never knew any one to make a boast of it who had anything else to be proud of.—Bishop Warburton.

The origin of all mankind was the same; it is only a clear and good conscience that makes a man noble, for that is derived from heaven itself.—Seneca.

I make little account of genealogical trees. Mere family never made a man great. Thought and deed, not pedigree, are the passports to enduring fate.—General Skobeleff.

It has long seemed to me that it would be more honorable to our ancestors to praise them in words less, but in deeds to imitate them more.—Horace Mann.

Title and ancestry render a good man more illustrious, but an ill one more contemptible. Vice is infamous, though in a prince, and virtue honorable, though in a peasant.—Addison.

Pride of origin, whether high or low, springs from the same principle in human nature; one is but the positive, the other the negative, pole of a single weakness.—Lowell.

People who take no pride in the noble achievements of remote ancestors will never achieve anything worthy to be remembered with pride by remote descendants.—Macaulay.

The nobility of the Spencers has been illustrated and enriched by the trophies of Marlborough; but I exhort them to consider the "Faerie Queene," as the most priceless jewel of their coronet.—Gibbon.

It is with antiquity as with ancestry, nations are proud of the one, and individuals of the other; but if they are nothing in themselves, that which is their pride ought to be their humiliation.—Colton.

Of all vanities of fopperies, the vanity of high birth is the greatest. True nobility is derived from virtue, not from birth. Titles, indeed, may be purchased, but virtue is the only coin that makes the bargain valid.—Burton.

The generality of princes, if they were stripped of their purple and cast naked on the world, would immediately sink to the lowest rank of society, without a hope of emerging from their obscurity.—Gibbon.

The glory of ancestors sheds a light around posterity; it allows neither their good nor bad qualities to remain in obscurity.—Sallust.

Let him speak of his own deeds, and not of those of his forefathers. High birth is mere accident, and not virtue; for if reason had controlled birth, and given empire only to the worthy, perhaps Arbaces would have been Xerxes, and Xerxes Arbaces.—Metastasio.

Those who have nothing else to recommend them to the respect of others but only their blood, cry it up at a great rate, and have their mouths perpetually full of it. They swell and vapor, and you are sure to hear of their families and relations every third word.—Charron.

Being well satisfied that, for a man who thinks himself to be somebody, there is nothing more disgraceful than to hold himself up as honored, not on his own account, but for the sake of his forefathers. Yet hereditary honors are a noble and splendid treasure to descendants.—Plato.

He that boasts of his ancestors confesses that he has no virtue of his own. No person ever lived for our honor; nor ought that to be reputed ours, which was long before we had a being; for what advantage can it be to a blind man to know that his parents had good eyes? Does he see one whit the better?—Charron.

Though you be sprung in direct line from Hercules, if you show a low-born meanness, that long succession of ancestors whom you disgrace are so many witnesses against you; and this grand display of their tarnished glory but serves to make your ignominy more evident.—Boileau.

In the founders of great families, titles or attributes of honor are generally correspondent with the virtues of the person to whom they are applied; but in their descendants they are too often the marks rather of grandeur than of merit. The stamp and denomination still continue, but the intrinsic value is frequently lost.—Addison.

The character of the reputed ancestors of some men has made it possible for their descendants to be vicious in the extreme, without being degenerate; and there are some hereditary strokes of character by which a family may be as clearly distinguished as by the blackest features of the human face.—Junius.

It is only shallow-minded pretenders who either make distinguished origin a matter of personal merit, or obscure origin a matter of personal reproach. Taunt and scoffing at the humble condition of early life affect nobody in America but those who are foolish enough to indulge in them, and they are generally sufficiently punished by the published rebuke. A man who is not ashamed of himself need not be ashamed of his early condition.—Daniel Webster.

It was the saying of a great man, that if we could trace our descents, we should find all slaves to come from princes, and all princes from slaves; and fortune has turned all things topsy-turvy in a long series of revolutions; beside, for a man to spend his life in pursuit of a title, that serves only when he dies to furnish out an epitaph, is below a wise man's business.—Seneca.

Take the title of nobility which thou hast received by birth, but endeavor to add to it another, that both may form a true nobility. There is between the nobility of thy father and thine own the same difference which exists between the nourishment of the evening and of the morrow. The food of yesterday will not serve thee for to-day, and will not give thee strength for the next.—Jamakchari.

There may be, and there often is, indeed, a regard for ancestry which nourishes only a weak pride; as there is also a care for posterity, which only disguises an habitual avarice, or hides the workings of a low and groveling vanity. But there is also a moral and philosophical respect for our ancestors, which elevates the character and improves the heart.—Daniel Webster.

If there be no nobility of descent, all the more indispensable is it that there should be nobility of ascent,—a character in them that bear rule so fine and high and pure that as men come within the circle of its influence they involuntarily pay homage to that which is the one pre-eminent distinction,—the royalty of virtue.—Bishop Henry C. Potter.

The pride of ancestry is a superstructure of the most imposing height, but resting on the most flimsy foundation. It is ridiculous enough to observe the hauteur with which the old nobility look down on the new. The reason of this puzzled me a little, until I began to reflect that most titles are respectable only because they are old; if new, they would be despised, because all those who now admire the grandeur of the stream would see nothing but the impurity of the source.—Colton.

No man is nobler born than another, unless he is born with better abilities and a more amiable disposition. They who make such a parade with their family pictures and pedigrees, are, properly speaking, rather to be called noted or notorious than noble persons. I thought it right to say this much, in order to repel the insolence of men who depend entirely upon chance and accidental circumstances for distinction, and not at all on public services and personal merit.—Seneca.

The power of perpetuating our property in our families is one of the most valuable and interesting circumstances belonging to it, and that which tends the most to the perpetuation of society itself. It makes our weakness subservient to our virtue; it grafts benevolence even upon avarice. The possession of family wealth and of the distinction which attends hereditary possessions (as most concerned in it), are the natural securities for this transmission.—Burke.

We sometimes see a change of expression in our companion, and say, his father or his mother comes to the windows of his eyes, and sometimes a remote relative. In different hours, a man represents each of several of his ancestors, as if there were seven or eight of us rolled up in each man's skin,—seven or eight ancestors at least,—and they constitute the variety of notes for that new piece of music which his life is.—Emerson.

Ancients

We derive all that is pardonable in us from ancient fountains.—Dryden.

The sages of old live again in us, and in opinions there is a metempsychosis.

—Glanvill.

The moderns cannot reach their beauties, but can avoid their imperfections.—Addison.

Those whom we call the ancients were in truth novices in all things, and properly constituted the infancy of mankind.—Prescott.

In taste and imagination, in the graces of style, in the arts of persuasion, in the magnificence of public works, the ancients were at least our equals.—Macaulay.

They left a great deal for the industry and sagacity of after ages.—Locke.

Anemone

Anemone, so well
Named of the wind, to which thou art all free.
—George MacDonald.

From the soft wing of vernal breezes shed,
Anemones, auriculas, enriched
With shining meal o'er all their velvet leaves.
—Thomson.

Anemones and seas of gold,
And new-blown lilies of the river,
And those sweet flow'rets that unfold
Their buds on Camadera's quiver.
—Moore.

Thy subtle charm is strangely given,
My fancy will not let thee be—
Then poise not thus 'twixt earth and heaven,
O white anemone! —Elaine Goodale.

Within the woods,
Whose young and half transparent leaves scarce cast
A shade, gray circles of anemones
Danced on their stalks. —Bryant.

Angels

Angels and ministers of grace defend us!—Shakespeare.

Fools rush in where angels fear to tread.—Pope.

Like angel visits, few and far between.—Campbell.

We are never like angels till our passion dies.—Thomas Decker.

And flights of angels sing thee to thy rest!—Shakespeare.

Angels are bright still, though the brightest fell.—Shakespeare.

Millions of spiritual creatures walk the earth unseen, both when we sleep and when we wake.—Milton.

Angels boast ethereal vigor, and are formed from seeds of heavenly birth.
—Virgil.

White wing'd angels meet the child
On the vestibule of life.
—Mrs. E. Oakes Smith.

Angels contented with their face in heaven.
Seek not the praise of men. —Milton.

A guardian angel o'er his life presiding,
Doubling his pleasures, and his cares dividing.
—Samuel Rogers.

So dear to heaven is saintly chastity,
That when a soul is found sincerely so
A thousand liveried angels lackey her.
—Milton.

If you woo the company of the angels in your waking hours, they will be sure to come to you in your sleep.
—G. D. Prentice.

We cannot let our angels go; we do not see that they only go out that archangels may come in.—Emerson.

The helmed Cherubim,
And sworded Seraphim,
Are seen in glittering ranks with wings display'd.
—Milton.

In this dim world of clouding cares,
We rarely know, till 'wildered eyes
See white wings lessening up the skies,
The angels with us unawares.
—Gerald Massey.

How sweetly did they float upon the wings
Of silence through the empty-vaulted night,
At every fall smoothing the raven down
Of darkness till it smiled! —Milton.

The angels may have wider spheres of action, may have nobler forms of duty; but right with them and with us is one and the same thing.—Chapin.

The guardian angel of life sometimes flies so high that man cannot see it; but he always is looking down upon us, and will soon hover nearer to us.

—Richter.

O, though oft oppressed and lonely,
All my fears are laid aside,
If I but remember only
Such as these have lived and died!
—Longfellow.

Sweet souls around us watch us still,
Press nearer to our side;
Into our thoughts, into our prayers,
With gentle helpings glide.
—Harriet Beecher Stowe.

For God will deign
To visit oft the dwellings of just men
Delighted, and with frequent intercourse
Thither will send his winged messengers
On errands of supernal grace. —Milton.

But all God's angels come to us disguised:
Sorrow and sickness, poverty and death,
One after other lift their frowning masks,
And we behold the Seraph's face beneath,
All radiant with the glory and the calm
Of having looked upon the front of God.
—Lowell.

Around our pillows golden ladders rise,
And up and down the skies,
With winged sandals shod,
The angels come, and go, the messengers of God!
Nor, though they fade from us, do they depart—
It is the childly heart:
We walk as heretofore,
Adown their shining ranks, but see them
nevermore. —R. H. Stoddard.

Compare a Solomon, an Aristotle, or an Archimedes, to a child that newly begins to speak, and they do not more transcend such a one than the angelical understanding exceeds theirs, even in its most sublime improvements and acquisitions.—South.

Man hath two attendant angels,
Ever waiting by his side,
With him wheresoe'er he wanders,
Wheresoe'er his feet abide;
One to warn him when he darkleth,
And rebuke him if he stray;
One to leave him to his nature,
And so let him go his way.
—Prince.

The accusing spirit, which flew up to heaven's chancery with the oath, blushed as he gave it in; and the recording angel, as he wrote it down, dropped a tear upon the word and blotted it out forever.—Sterne.

There are two angels that attend unseen
Each one of us, and in great books record
Our good and evil deeds. He who writes down
The good ones, after every action closes
His volume, and ascends with it to God.
The other keeps his dreadful day-book open Till sunset, that we may repent; which doing,
The record of the action fades away,
And leaves a line of white across the page.
Now if my act be good, as I believe it,
It cannot be recalled. It is already Sealed up in heaven, as a good deed accomplished.
The rest is yours. —Longfellow.

Anger

Let not the sun go down upon your wrath.—Bible.

Temperate anger well becomes the wise.—Philemon.

Anger is practical awkwardness.—
Colton.

Anger is a short madness.—Horace.

A temperate anger has virtue in it.—
Haliburton.

Men in rage strike those that wish them best.—Shakespeare.

Abused patience turns to fury.—
Quarles.

Anger manages everything badly.—
Stadius.

Never anger made good guard for itself.—Shakespeare.

Anger is self-immolation.—Phillips
Brooks.

Keep cool, and you command everybody.—St. Just.

Their rage supplies them with weapons.—Virgil.

Like fragile ice anger passes away
in time.—Ovid.

He that will be angry for anything will be angry for nothing.—Sallust.

Nursing her wrath to keep it warm.
—Burns.

When anger rushes, unrestrained, to action.—Savage.

He that would be angry and sin not must not be angry with anything but sin.—Secker.

Men often make up in wrath what they want in reason.—W. R. Alger.

People hardly ever do anything in anger, of which they do not repent.—Richardson.

To be in anger is impiety, but who is man that is not angry?—Shakespeare.

Anger is like a ruin, which, in falling upon its victim, breaks itself to pieces.—Seneca.

Whatsoever is worthy of their love is worth their anger.—Sir J. Denham.

There is no affectation in passion, for that putteth a man out of his precepts.—Bacon.

Anger is a transient hatred; or at least very like it.—South.

You may forgive, and so will I; but I will not forget, though I control my anger.—Colton.

Anger begins with folly, and ends with repentance.—Pythagoras.

When angry, count ten before you speak; if very angry, a hundred.—Jefferson.

Anger is like a full hot horse; who, being allowed his way, self-mettle tires him.—Shakespeare.

Anger is like rain which breaks itself whereon it falls.—Seneca.

And to be wroth with one we love
Doth work like madness in the brain.
—Coleridge.

An angry woman is vindictive beyond measure, and hesitates at nothing in her bitterness.—J. Petit-Senn.

Anger causes us often to condemn in one what we approve of in another.—Pasquier Quesnel.

Anger's my meat; I sup upon myself
And so shall starve with feeding.
—Shakespeare.

When a man is wrong and won't admit it, he always gets angry.—Haliburton.

He is a fool who cannot be angry; but he is a wise man who will not.—Seneca.

He best keeps from anger who remembers that God is always looking upon him.—Plato.

A countenance more in sorrow than in anger.—Shakespeare.

Heaven hath no rage like love to hatred turned, nor hell a fury like a woman scorned.—Congreve.

To be angry, is to revenge the fault of others upon ourselves.—Pope.

An angry man opens his mouth and shuts up his eyes.—Cato.

To abandon yourself to rage is often to bring upon yourself the fault of another.—Agapet.

To rule one's anger is well; to prevent it is better.—Edwards.

When anger rises, think of the consequences.—Confucius.

Violence in the voice is often only the death-rattle of reason in the throat.—J. F. Boyes.

Anger is one of the sinews of the soul.—Fuller.

The angriest person in a controversy is the one most liable to be in the wrong.—Tillotson.

Anger is not only the prevailing sin of argument, but its greatest stumbling-block.—Gladstone.

Anger has some claim to indulgence, and railing is usually a relief to the mind.—Junius.

An angry man is again angry with himself when he returns to reason.—Publius Syrus.

When one is in a good sound rage, it is astonishing how calm one can be.—Bulwer-Lytton.

It is he who is in the wrong who first gets angry.—William Penn.

A fit of anger is as fatal to dignity as a dose of arsenic is to life.—J. G. Holland.

A man deep-wounded may feel too much pain to feel much anger.—George Eliot.

Anger is blood, poured and perplexed into froth; but malice is the wisdom of our wrath.—Sir W. Davenant.

What most increases anger is the feeling that one is in the wrong.—Richter.

Anger turns the mind out of doors and bolts the entrance.—Plutarch.

Weak men are easily put out of humor. Oil freezes quicker than water.—Auerbach.

A woman moved is like a fountain troubled, muddy, ill-seeming, thick, bereft of beauty.—Shakespeare.

Convulsive anger storms at large; or pale and silent, settles into full revenge.—Thomson.

He submits himself to be seen through a microscope, who suffers himself to be caught in a fit of passion.—Lavater.

Our passions are like convulsion fits, which make us stronger for the time, but leave us weaker forever after.—Dean Swift.

The proud man hath no God; the envious man hath no neighbor; the angry man hath not himself.—Bishop Hall.

Scarce can I speak, my choler is so great. Oh! I could hew up rocks, and fight with flint.—Shakespeare.

He that contemns a shrew to the degree of not descending to words with her does worse than beat her.—L'Estrange.

Check and restrain anger. Never make any determination until you find it has entirely subsided.—Lord Colingwood.

If anger is not restrained, it is frequently more hurtful to us, than the injury that provokes it.—Seneca.

The elephant is never won by anger; nor must that man who would reclaim a lion take him by the teeth.—Dryden.

Have you not love enough to bear with me, when that rash humor which my mother gave me makes me forgetful.—Shakespeare.

Lamentation is the only musician that always, like a screech-owl, alights and sits on the roof of any angry man.—Plutarch.

He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit, than he that taketh a city.—Bible.

Anger is a noble infirmity, the generous failing of the just, the one degree that riseth above zeal, asserting the prerogative of virtue.—Tupper.

Anger is uneasiness or discomposure of the mind upon the receipt of any injury, with a present purpose of revenge.—Locke.

Give not reins to your inflamed passions; take time and a little delay; impetuosity manages all things badly.—Statius.

Anger is the most impotent passion that accompanies the mind of man; it effects nothing it goes about; and hurts the man who is possessed by it more than any other against whom it is directed.—Clarendon.

The most phlegmatic dispositions often contain the most inflammable spirits, as fire is struck from the hardest flints.—Hazlitt.

Anger ventilated often hurries towards forgiveness; anger concealed often hardens into revenge.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Must I give way and room to your rash choler? Shall I be frightened when a madman stares?—Shakespeare.

In the same degree in which a man's mind is nearer to freedom from all passion, in the same degree also is it nearer to strength.—Marcus Antoninus.

Bad temper is its own scourge. Few things are bitterer than to feel bitter. A man's venom poisons himself more than his victim.—Charles Buxton.

My rage is not malicious; like a spark
Of fire by steel inforced out of a flint
It is no sooner kindled, but extinct.
—Goffe.

Anger wishes all mankind had only one neck: love, that it had only one heart; grief, two tear-garlands; pride, two bent knees.—Richter.

If anger proceeds from a great cause, it turns to fury; if from a small cause, it is peevishness; and so is always either terrible or ridiculous.—Jeremy Taylor.

There is not in nature
A thing that makes a man so deform'd, so beastly,
As doth intemperate anger. —Webster.

O that my tongue were in the thunder's mouth!
Then with a passion would I shake the world. —Shakespeare.

Those passionate persons who carry their heart in their mouth are rather to be pitied than feared; their threatenings serving no other purpose than to forearm him that is threatened.—Fuller.

I was angry with my friend:
I told my wrath, my wrath did end.
I was angry with my foe;
I told it not, my wrath did grow.
—Wm. Blake

Anger requires that the offender should not only be made to grieve in his turn, but to grieve for that particular wrong which has been done by him.—Whately.

You are yoked with a lamb,
That carries anger as the flint bears fire;
Who, much enforced, shows a hasty spark,
And straight is cold again.—Shakespeare.

An angry man who suppresses his passions thinks worse than he speaks; and an angry man that will chide speaks worse than he thinks.—Bacon.

Anger blows out the lamp of the mind. In the examination of a great and important question, every one should be serene, slow-pulsed, and calm.—R. G. Ingersoll.

When anger rushes unrestrained to action, like a hot steed, it stumbles on its way. The man of thought strikes deepest and strikes safely.—Savage.

To be angry about trifles is mean and childish; to rage and be furious is brutish; and to maintain perpetual wrath is akin to the practice and temper of devils.—Dr. Watts.

Are you angry? Look at the child who has erred, he suspects no trouble, he dreams of no harm; you will borrow something of that innocence, you will feel appeased.—Chateaubriand.

There is no way but to meditate and ruminate well upon the effects of anger,—how it troubles man's life; and the best time to do this is to look back upon anger when the fit is thoroughly over.—Bacon.

The "last word" is the most dangerous of infernal machines; and the husband and wife should no more fight to get it than they would struggle for the possession of a lighted bomb-shell.—

Douglas Jerrold.

The intoxication of anger, like that of the grape, shows us to others, but hides us from ourselves, and we injure our own cause, in the opinion of the world, when we too passionately and eagerly defend it.—Colton.

Angry and choleric men are as ungrateful and unsociable as thunder and lightning, being in themselves all storm and tempest; but quiet and easy natures are like fair weather, welcome to all.—Clarendon

As a conquered rebellion strengthens a government, or as health is more perfectly established by recovery from some diseases; so anger, when removed, often gives new life to affection.—Fielding.

Anger is like the waves of a troubled sea; when it is corrected with a soft reply, as with a little strand, it retires, and leaves nothing behind but froth and shells,—no permanent mischief.—Jeremy Taylor.

Anger is the most impotent passion that accompanies the mind of man. It effects nothing it goes about; and hurts the man who is possessed by it more than any other against whom it is directed.—Clarendon.

If a man meets with injustice, it is not required that he shall not be roused to meet it; but if he is angry after he has had time to think upon it, that is sinful. The flame is not wrong, but the coals are.—Beecher.

The round of a passionate man's life is in contracting debts in his passion, which his virtue obliges him to pay. He spends his time in outrage and acknowledgment, injury and reparation.—Johnson.

Never forget what a man has said to you when he was angry. If he has charged you with anything, you had better look it up. Anger is a bow that will shoot sometimes where another feeling will not.—Beecher.

Had I a careful and pleasant companion that should show me my angry face in a glass, I should not at all take it ill; to behold man's self so unnaturally disguised and dishonored will conduce not a little to the impeachment of anger.—Plutarch.

Anger and the thirst of revenge are a kind of fever; fighting and lawsuits, bleeding,—at least, an evacuation. The latter occasions a dissipation of money; the former, of those fiery spirits which cause a preternatural fermentation.—Shenstone.

For pale and trembling anger rushes in
With faltering speech, and eyes that wildly stare,
Fierce as the tiger, madder than the seas,
Desperate and armed with more than human strength. —Armstrong.

I never work better than when I am inspired by anger. When I am angry I can write, pray, and preach well; for then my whole temperament is quickened, my understanding sharpened, and all mundane vexations and temptations depart.—Luther.

Anger is implanted in us as sort of sting, to make us gnash with our teeth against the devil, to make us vehement against him, not to set us in array against each other.—Savage.

But curb thou the high spirit in thy breast,
For gentle ways are best. —Homer.

Anger is an affected madness, compounded of pride and folly, and an intention to do commonly more mischief than it can bring to pass; and, without doubt, of all passions which actually disturb the mind of man, it is most in our power to extinguish, at least, to suppress and correct, our anger.—Clarendon.

Full many mischiefs follow cruel wrath;
Abhorred bloodshed and tumultuous strife
Unmanly murder and unthrifty scath,
Bitter despite, with rancor's rusty knife,
And fretting grief the enemy of life;
All these and many evils more, haunt ire. —Spenser.

Be ye angry, and sin not; therefore all anger is not sinful; I suppose because some degree of it, and upon some occasions, is inevitable. It becomes sinful, or contradicts, however, the rule of Scripture, when it is conceived upon slight and inadequate provocation, and when it continues long.—Paley.

Alas! they had been friends in youth;
But whispering tongues can poison truth,
And constancy lives in realms above;
And life is thorny, and youth is vain;
And to be wroth with one we love
Doth work like madness in the brain.
—Coleridge.

There is no passion that so much transports men from their right judgments as anger. No one would demur upon punishing a judge with death who should condemn a criminal upon the account of his own choler; why then should fathers and pedants be any more allowed to whip and chastise children in their anger? It is then no longer correction but revenge. Chastisement is instead of physic to children; and should we suffer a physician who should be animated against and enraged at his patient?—Montaigne.

When I myself had twice or thrice made a resolute resistance unto anger, the like befell me that did the Thebans; who, having once foiled the Lacedæmonians (who before that time had held themselves invincible), never after lost so much as one battle which they fought against them.—Plutarch.

Angling

Angling is an innocent cruelty.—George Parker.

Idle time not idly spent.—Sir Henry Wotton.

Angling is somewhat like poetry; men are to be born so.—Izaak Walton.

Everything appertaining to the angler's art is cowardly, cruel, treacherous, and cat-like.—Chatfield.

The pleasantest angling is to see the fish cut with her golden oars the silver stream, and greedily devour the treacherous bait.—Shakespeare.

Doubt not but angling will prove to be so pleasant, that it will prove to be, like virtue, a reward to itself.—Izaak Walton.

I have known a very good fisher angle diligently four or six hours for a river carp, and not have a bite.—Izaak Walton.

We really cannot see what equanimity there is in jerking a lacerated carp out of the water by the jaws, merely because it has not the power of making a noise; for we presume that the most philosophic of anglers would hardly delight in catching shrieking fish.—Leigh Hunt.

But should you lure
From his dark haunt, beneath the tangled roots
Of pendent trees, the monarch of the brook,
Behooves you then to ply your finest art.
—Thomson.

The first men that our Saviour dear
Did choose to wait upon Him here,
Blest fishers were; and fish the last
Food was, that He on earth did taste:
I therefore strive to follow those,
Whom He to follow Him hath chose.
—Izaak Walton.

O! the gallant fisher's life,
It is the best of any:
'Tis full of pleasure, void of strife
And 'tis beloved by many.
Other joys
Are but toys;
Only this,
Lawful is;
For our skill
Breeds no ill,
But content and pleasure.
—Izaak Walton.

Though no participator in the joys of more vehement sport, I have a pleasure that I cannot reconcile to my abstract notions of the tenderness due to dumb creatures, in the tranquil cruelty of angling. I can only palliate the wanton destructiveness of my amusement by trying to assure myself that my pleasure does not spring from the success of the treachery I practise toward a poor little fish, but rather from that innocent revelry in the luxuriance of summer life which only anglers enjoy to the utmost.—Bulwer-Lytton.

In genial spring, beneath the quiv'ring shade,
Where cooling vapors breathe along the mead,
The patient fisher takes his silent stand,
Intent, his angle trembling in his hand;
With looks unmoved, he hopes the scaly breed,
And eyes the dancing cork and bending reed.
—Pope.

We may say of angling as Dr. Boteiler said of strawberries, "Doubtless God could have made a better berry, but doubtless God never did;" and so, if I might be judge, God never did make a more calm, quiet, innocent recreation than angling.—Izaak Walton.

Animal

Animals are such agreeable friends; they ask no questions, pass no criticisms.—George Eliot.

If 't were not for my cat and dog, I think I could not live.—Ebenezer Elliott.

They rejoice each with their kind, lion with lioness, so fitly them in pairs thou hast combined.—Milton.

Let cavillers deny
That brutes have reason; sure 'tis something more,
'Tis heaven directs, and stratagems inspires
Beyond the short extent of human thought.
—Somerville.

There is in every animal's eye a dim image and gleam of humanity, a flash of strange light through which their life looks out and up to our great mystery of command over them, and claims the fellowship of the creature if not of the soul.—Ruskin.

Annihilation

Annihilation, as regards matter, is simply impossible.—Hosea Ballou.

Annihilation is an absurdity in terms.—Palissy.

Nothing whatever is annihilated; matter, like an eternal, still rolls on without any diminution.—Roucher.

Anticipation

Anticipation and Hope are born twins.—Rousseau.

The anticipation of evil courts evil.—Mme. Deluzy.

Nothing is so good as it seems beforehand.—George Eliot.

Troubles forereckoned are doubly suffered.—Bovee.

It is worse to apprehend than to suffer.—Bruyère.

Experience finds few of the scenes that lively hope designs.—Crabbe.

Oft expectation fails, and most oft there where most it promises.—Shakespeare.

We expect everything, and are prepared for nothing.—Madame Swetchine.

Thou tremblest before anticipated ills, and still bemoanest what thou never lovest.—Goethe.

He who foresees calamities suffers them twice over.—Porteus.

All things that are, are with more spirit chased than enjoyed.—Shakespeare.

It is a great obstacle to happiness to expect too much.—Fontenelle.

Anticipate the difficult by managing the easy.—Lao-Tze.

The craving for a delicate fruit is pleasanter than the fruit itself.—Herder.

Suffering itself does less afflict the senses than the apprehension of suffering.—Quintilian.

What need a man forestall his date of grief, and run to meet what he would most avoid?—Milton.

I know that we often tremble at an empty terror; yet the false fancy brings a real misery.—Schiller.

Nothing is so great an adversary to those who make it their business to please as expectation.—Cicero.

All earthly delights are sweeter in expectation than enjoyment; but all spiritual pleasures more in fruition than expectation.—Feltham.

We can but ill endure, among so many sad realities, to rob anticipation of its pleasant visions.—Henry Giles.

It is expectation makes a blessing dear; heaven were not heaven if we knew what it were.—John Suckling.

There is nothing so wretched or foolish as to anticipate misfortunes. What madness is it in expecting evil before it arrives?—Seneca.

I would not anticipate the relish of any happiness, nor feel the weight of any misery, before it actually arrives.—Spectator.

I am giddy; expectation whirls me 'round. The imaginary relish is so sweet That it enchants my sense.

—Shakespeare.

We part more easily with what we possess, than with our expectations of what we wish for; because expectation always goes beyond enjoyment.—Henry Home.

Whatever advantage we snatch beyond a certain portion allotted us by nature, is like money spent before it is due, which, at the time of regular payment, will be missed and regretted.—Johnson.

To despond is to be ungrateful beforehand. Be not looking for evil. Often thou drainest the gall of fear while evil is passing by thy dwelling.—Tupper.

With every one, the expectation of a misfortune constitutes a dreadful punishment. Suffering then assumes the proportions of the unknown, which is the soul's infinite.—Balzac.

The events we most desire do not happen; or, if they do, it is neither in the time nor in the circumstances when they would have given us extreme pleasure.—Bruyère.

The problem is, whether a man constantly and strongly believing that such a thing shall be, it don't help anything to the effecting of the thing.—Bacon.

There are many things that are thorns to our hopes until we have attained them, and envenomed arrows to our hearts when we have.—Mirabeau.

There would be few enterprises of great labor or hazard undertaken, if we had not the power of magnifying the advantages which we persuade ourselves to expect from them.—Johnson.

Drawing near her death, she sent most pious thoughts as harbingers to heaven, and her soul saw a glimpse of happiness through the chinks of her sickness-broken body.—Thomas Fuller.

Things temporal are sweeter in the expectation, things eternal are sweeter in the fruition; the first shames thy hope, the second crowns it; it is a vain journey, whose end affords less pleasure than the way.—Quarles.

A man's desires always disappoint him; for though he meets with something that gives him satisfaction, yet it never thoroughly answers his expectation.—Rochefoucauld.

All fear is in itself painful, and when it conduces not to safety, is painful without use. Every consideration, therefore, by which groundless terrors may be removed adds something to human happiness.—Dr. Johnson.

The hours we pass with happy prospects in view are more pleasing than those crowned with fruition. In the first instance, we cook the dish to our own appetite; in the latter, Nature cooks it for us.—Goldsmith.

Such is the uncertainty of human affairs, that security and despair are equal follies; and as it is presumption and arrogance to anticipate triumphs, it is weakness and cowardice to prognosticate miscarriages.—Dr. Johnson.

It has been well said that no man ever sank under the burden of the day. It is when to-morrow's burden is added to the burden of to-day that the weight is more than a man can bear.—George Macdonald.

Men spend their lives in anticipations, in determining to be vastly happy at some period or other, when they have time. But the present time has one advantage over every other, it is our own.—Colton.

The pilot who is always dreading a rock or a tempest must not complain if he remain a poor fisherman. We must at times trust something to fortune, for fortune has often some share in what happens.—Metastasio.

In all worldly things that a man pursues with the greatest eagerness and intention of mind imaginable, he finds not half the pleasure in the actual possession of them, as he proposed to himself in the expectation.—South.

By anticipation we suffer misery and enjoy happiness before they are in being. We can set the sun and stars forward, or lose sight of them by wandering into those retired parts of eternity when the heavens and earth shall be no more.—Addison.

In proportion as our cares are employed upon the future, they are abstracted from the present, from the only time which we can call our own, and of which, if we neglect the apparent duties to make provision against visionary attacks, we shall certainly counteract our own purpose.—Dr. Johnson.

We are apt to rely upon future prospects, and become really expensive while we are only rich in possibility. We live up to our expectations, not to our possessions, and make a figure proportionable to what we may be, not what we are.—Addison.

Whichever way we look the prospect is disagreeable. Behind, we have left pleasures we shall never enjoy, and therefore regret; and before, we see pleasures which we languish to possess, and are consequently uneasy till we possess them.—Goldsmith.

Antiquity

Rich with the spoils of time.—Gray.

The rubbish of the past.—Mme. Louise Colet.

Antiquity is the aristocracy of history.—Dumas, Pere.

The great men of antiquity were poor.—Lacordaire.

Antiquity! I like its ruins better than its reconstructions.—Joubert.

The sacred rust of twice ten hundred years.—Pope.

It is one proof of a good education, and of true refinement of feeling, to respect antiquity.—Mrs. Sigourney.

Time consecrates; and what is gray with age becomes religion.—Schiller.

Those we call the ancients were really new in everything.—Pascal.

Age shakes Athena's tower, but spares gray Marathon.—Byron.

Antiquity is a species of aristocracy with which it is not easy to be on visiting terms.—Madame Swetchine.

Nor rough, nor barren, are the winding ways
Of hoar Antiquity, but strewn with flowers.
—Thomas Warton.

The pyramids, dotting with age, have forgotten the names of their founders.
Fuller.

Cities, unlike human creatures, may grow to be so old that at last they will become new.—William Winter.

Those old ages are like the landscape that shows best in purple distance, and verdant and smooth, and bathed in mellow light.—Chapin.

How cunningly Nature hides every wrinkle of her inconceivable antiquity under roses and violets and morning dew!—Emerson.

We have a mistaken notion of antiquity, calling that so which in truth is the world's nonage.—Glanvill.

Some persons can never relish the full moon, out of respect for that venerable institution, the old one.—Douglas Jerrold.

It is with antiquity as with ancestry; nations are proud of the one, and individuals of the other.—Colton.

It is looked upon as insolence for a man to adhere to his own opinion against the current stream of antiquity.—Locke.

Time's gradual touch has mouldered into beauty many a tower, which when it frowned with all its battlements was only terrible.—Mason.

All those things that are now held to be of the greatest antiquity were at one time new; what we to-day hold up by example will rank hereafter as precedent.—Tacitus.

We have a maxim in the House of Commons, and written on the walls of our houses, that old ways are the safest and surest ways.—Sir E. Coke.

If the seal of time were to be the signet of truth, there is no absurdity, oppression, or falsehood that might not be revived as gospel; while the gospel itself would want the more ancient warrant of paganism.—Chatfield.

A thorough-paced antiquary not only remembers what all other people have thought proper to forget, but he also forgets what all other people think is proper to remember.—Colton.

When ancient opinions and rules of life are taken away, the loss cannot possibly be estimated. From that moment we have no compass to govern us; nor can we know distinctly to what port to steer.—Burke.

What subsists to-day by violence continues to-morrow by acquiescence, and is perpetuated by tradition; till at last the hoary abuse shakes the gray hairs of antiquity at us, and gives itself out as the wisdom of ages.—Edward Everett.

The volumes of antiquity, like medals, may very well serve to amuse the curious; but the works of the moderns, like the current coin of a kingdom, are much better for immediate use.—Goldsmith.

I do by no means advise you to throw away your time in ransacking, like a dull antiquarian, the minute and unimportant parts of remote and fabulous times. Let blockheads read what blockheads wrote.—Chesterfield.

History fades into fable; fact becomes clouded with doubt and controversy; the inscription moulders from the tablet; the statue falls from the pedestal. Columns, arches, pyramids,—what are they but heaps of sand; and their epitaphs but characters written in the dust?—Washington Irving.

Consider, for example, and you will find that almost all the transactions in the time of Vespasian differed little from those of the present day. You there find marrying and giving in marriage, educating children, sickness, death, war, joyous holidays, traffic, agriculture, flatterers, insolent pride, suspicions, laying of plots, longing for the death of others, newsmongers, lovers, misers, men canvassing for the consulship and for the kingdom; yet all these passed away, and are nowhere.—Marcus Antoninus.

Those were good old times, it may be thought, when baron and peasant feasted together. But the one could not read, and made his mark with a sword-pommel, and the other was held as dear as a favorite dog. Pure and simple times were those of our grandfathers, it may be. Possibly not so pure as we may think, however, and with a simplicity ingrained with some bigotry and a good deal of conceit.—Chapin.

Antiquity, what is it else (God only excepted) but man's authority born some ages before us? Now for the truth of things time makes no alteration; things are still the same they are, let the time be past, present, or to come.

Those things which we reverence for antiquity what were they at their first birth? Were they false?—time cannot make them true. Were they true?—time cannot make them more true. The circumstances therefore of time in respect of truth and error is merely impertinent.—John Hales.

Antiquity! thou wondrous charm, what art thou? that, being nothing, art everything! When thou wert, thou wert not antiquity,—then thou wert nothing, but hadst a remoter antiquity, as thou calledst it to look back to with blind veneration; thou thyself being to thyself flat, jejune, modern! What mystery lurks in this retroversion? or what half Januses are we, that cannot look forward with the same idolatry with which we forever revert! The mighty future is as nothing, being everything! The past is everything, being nothing!—Lamb.

Anxiety

Over-confidence is as evil as undue anxiety.—Haliburton.

Anxiety never yet successfully bridged over any chasm.—Ruffini.

Nobody should ever look anxious except those who have no anxiety.—Beaconsfield.

Generally we obtain very surely and very speedily what we are not too anxious to obtain.—Rousseau.

Among those evils which befall us, there are many which have been more painful to us in the prospect than by their actual pressure.—Addison.

Better to be despised for too anxious apprehensions than ruined by too confident a security.—Burke.

Nothing in life is more remarkable than the unnecessary anxiety which we endure and generally occasion ourselves.—Beaconsfield.

O foolish anxiety of wretched man, how inconclusive are the arguments which make thee beat thy wings below!—Dante.

Anxiety is the poison of human life. It is the parent of many sins, and of more miseries. In a world where everything is doubtful, where you may be disappointed, and be blessed in disappointment, what means this restless stir and commotion of mind? Can your solicitude alter the cause or unravel the intricacy of human events?—Blair.

Almost all men are over-anxious. No sooner do they enter the world than they lose that taste for natural and simple pleasures so remarkable in early life. Every hour do they ask themselves what progress they have made in the pursuit of wealth or honor; and on they go as their fathers went before them, till, weary and sick at heart, they look back with a sigh of regret to the golden time of their childhood.—Rogers.

Anxiety has no place in the life of one of God's children. Christ's serenity was one of the most unmistakable signs of His filial trust. He was tired and hungry and thirsty and in pain; but we cannot imagine Him anxious or fretful. His mind was kept in perfect peace because it was stayed on God. The life lived by the faith of the Son of God will find His word kept: "My peace give I unto you."—Maltbie Babcock.

It is not work that kills men; it is worry. Work is healthy; you can hardly put more upon a man than he can bear. Worry is rust upon the blade. It is not the revolution that destroys the machinery, but the friction. Fear secretes acids; but love and trust are sweet juices.—Beecher.

Apathy

A sort of living oblivion.—Horace Greeley.

In this sullen apathy neither true wisdom nor true happiness can be found.—Hume.

According to the Stoics, apathy meant the extinction of the passions by the ascendancy of reason.—William Fleming.

There are some men formed with feelings so blunt that they can hardly be said to be awake during the whole course of their lives.—Burke.

Aphorism

Collect as pearls the words of the wise and virtuous.—Abd-el-Kader.

An epigram often flashes light into regions where reason shines but dimly.—Whipple.

Books are the beehives of thought; laconics the honey taken from them.—James Ellis.

Exclusively of the abstract sciences, the largest and worthiest portion of our knowledge consists of aphorisms; and the greatest and best of men is but an aphorism.—Coleridge.

I fancy mankind may come in time to write all aphoristically, except in narration; grow weary of preparation and connection and illustration, and all those arts by which a big book is made.—Dr. Johnson.

If these little sparks of holy fire which I have thus heaped up together do not give life to your prepared and already enkindled spirit, yet they will sometimes help to entertain a thought, to actuate a passion, to employ and hallow a fancy.—Jeremy Taylor.

Apology

No sensible person ever made an apology.—Emerson.

A very desperate habit; one that is rarely cured. Apology is only egotism wrong side out. Nine times out of ten, the first thing a man's companion knows of his short-comings is from his apology.—Holmes.

Apology is only egotism wrong side out.—O. W. Holmes.

There are occasions on which all apology is rudeness.—Dr. Johnson.

Apologies only account for the evil which they cannot alter.—Disraeli.

Apostacy

The kiss of the apostate was the most bitter earthly ingredient in the agonies which Christ endured.—E. L. Magoon.

Apostate, still thou err'st, nor end wilt find Offering, from the paths of truth remote.—Milton.

Apothegm

Proverbs are potted wisdom.—Charles Buxton.

Apothegms form a short cut to much knowledge.—Hood.

All generalizations are dangerous, even this one.—Dumas, Fils.

The Sibyl, speaking with inspired mouth, sends her voice to remotest ages.—Heraclitus.

Quotations are best brought in to confirm some opinion controverted.—Swift.

Proverbs are, for the most part, rules of morals, and as such are often effective.—Rev. Dr. Sharp.

Aphorisms are portable wisdom, the quintessential extracts of thought and feeling.—W. R. Alger.

Apothegms are the most infallible mirror to represent a man truly what he is.—Plutarch.

The genius, wit, and spirit of a nation are discovered by their proverbs.—Bacon.

Short, isolated sentences were the mode in which ancient wisdom delighted to convey its precepts for the regulation of human conduct.—Bishop Warburton.

Apothegms are, in history, the same as the pearls in the sand, or the gold in the mine.—Erasmus.

What gems of painting or statuary are in the world of art, or what flowers are in the world of Nature, are gems of thought to the cultivated and thinking.—O. W. Holmes.

It is astonishing the influence foolish apothegms have upon the mass of mankind, though they are not unfrequently fallacies.—Sydney Smith.

Aphorisms, representing a knowledge broken, do invite men to inquire further; whereas methods carrying the show of a total do secure men, as if they were at furthest.—Bacon.

Out of monuments, names, words, proverbs, traditions, private records and evidences, fragments of stories, passages of books, and the like, we do save and recover somewhat from the deluge of time.—Bacon.

The little and short sayings of nice and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds.—Tillotson.

A man of maxims only is like a Cyclops with one eye, and that eye placed in the back of his head.—Coleridge.

He that lays down precepts for the governing of our lives, and moderating our passions, obliges humanity not only in the present, but in all future generations.—Seneca.

Thoughts take up no room. When they are right, they afford a portable pleasure, which one may travel with, without any trouble or encumbrance.—Jeremy Collier.

I am of opinion that there are no proverbial sayings which are not true, because they are all sentences drawn from experience itself, who is the mother of all sciences.—Cervantes.

We content ourselves to present to thinking minds the original seeds from whence spring vast fields of new thought, that may be further cultivated, beautified, and enlarged.—Chevalier Ramsay.

Few of the many wise apothegms which have been uttered, from the time of the seven sages of Greece to that of poor Richard, have prevented a single foolish action.—Macaulay.

The excellence of aphorisms consists not so much in the expression of some rare or abstruse sentiment, as in the comprehension of some useful truth in few words.—Johnson.

Under the veil of these curious sentences are hid those germs of morals which the masters of philosophy have afterwards developed into so many volumes.—Plutarch.

Ethical maxims are bandied about as a sort of current coin of discourse, and, being never melted down for use, those that are of base metal are never detected.—Bishop Whately.

A maxim is the exact and noble expression of an important and indisputable truth. Sound maxims are the germs of good; strongly imprinted in the memory, they nourish the will.—Joubert.

Abstracts, abridgments, summaries, etc., have the same use with burning-glasses,—to collect the diffused rays of wit and learning in authors, and make them point with warmth and quickness upon the reader's imagination.—Swift.

An epigram often flashes light into regions where reason shines but dimly. Holmes disposed of a bigot at once, when he compared his mind to the pupil of the eye,—the more light you let into it the more it contracts.—Whipple.

He may justly be numbered among the benefactors of mankind who contracts the great rules of life into short sentences, that may be easily impressed on the memory, and taught by frequent recollection to recur habitually to the mind.—Johnson.

A few words worthy to be remembered suffice to give an idea of a great mind. There are single thoughts that contain the essence of a whole volume, single sentences that have the beauties of a large work, a simplicity so finished and so perfect that it equals in merit and in excellence a large and glorious composition.—Joubert.

The wise men of old have sent most of their morality down to the stream of time in the light skiff of apothegm or epigram; and the proverbs of nations, which embody the common sense of nations, have the brisk concussion of the most sparkling wit.—Whipple.

Apparel

Let thy attyre bee comely, but not costly.—Lyly.

Costly thy habit as thy purse can buy,
But not express'd in fancy; rich, not gaudy;
For the apparel oft proclaims the man.
—Shakespeare.

She's adorned
Amplly, that in her husband's eye looks lovely—
The truest mirror that an honest wife
Can see her beauty in! —John Tobin.

Dress drains our cellar dry,
And keeps our larder lean; puts out our fires.
And introduces hunger, frost, and woe,
Where peace and hospitality might reign.
—Cowper.

Through tatter'd clothes small vices do appear;
Robes and furr'd gowns hide all. Plate sin with gold,
And the strong lance of justice hurtless breaks;
Arm it in rags, a pigmy's straw doth pierce it. —Shakespeare.

Her polish'd limbs,
Veil'd in a simple robe, their best attyre;
Beyond the pomp of dress; for Loveliness
Needs not the foreign aid of ornament,
But is, when unadorn'd, adorn'd the most.
—Thomson.

He that is proud of the rustling of his silks, like a madman, laughs at the rattling of his fetters. For indeed, Clothes ought to be our remem-brancers of our lost innocency.—

Fuller.

So for thy spirit did devise
Its maker seemly garniture,
Of its own essence parcel pure—
From grave simplicities a dress,
And reticent demureness,
And love encinctured with reserve;
Which the woven vesture would subserve.
For outward robes in their ostents
Should show the soul's habiliments.
Therefore I say—thou'rt fairer even so,
But better Fair I use to know.
—Francis Thompson.

Apparitions

A dagger of the mind, a false creation,
Proceeding from the heat-oppressed brain?
—Shakespeare.

So many ghosts, and forms of fright,
Have started from their graves to-night,
They have driven sleep from mine eyes
away;
I will go down to the chapel and pray.
—Longfellow.

Who gather round, and wonder at the tale
Of horrid apparition, tall and ghastly,
That walks at dead of night, or takes his stand O'er some new-open'd grave; and (strange to tell!)
Evanishes at crowing of the cock.
—Blair.

Now it is the time of night,
That the graves, all gaping wide,
Every one lets forth its sprite,
In the church-way paths to glide.
—Shakespeare.

My people too were scared with eerie
sounds,
A footstep, a low throbbing in the walls;
A noise of falling weights that never fell,
Weird whispers, bells that rang without a hand,
Door-handles turn'd when none was at the door,
And bolted doors that open'd of themselves;
And one betwixt the dark and light had seen
Her, bending by the cradle of her babe.
—Tennyson.

Appearance

We take less pains to be happy than to appear so.—Rochefoucauld.

There is in us more of the appearance of sense and virtue than of the reality.—Marguerite de Valois.

A man may smile, and smile, and be a villain.—Shakespeare.

A miser grows rich by seeming poor; an extravagant man grows poor by seeming rich.—Shenstone.

There is no vice so simple, but assumes some mark of virtue on its outward parts.—Shakespeare.

Polished brass will pass upon more people than rough gold.—Chesterfield.

A man of the world must seem to be that he wishes to be.—Bruyère.

Men are like Geneva watches with crystal faces, which expose the whole movement.—Emerson.

Tangible language, which often tells more falsehoods than truths.—Abraham Lincoln.

Thy plain and open nature sees mankind
But in appearance, not what they are.
—Froude.

Even when the bird walks one feels that it has wings.—Lemierre.

Behavior is a mirror in which every one shows his image.—Goethe.

To succeed in the world, we must be foolish in appearance, but really wise.—Montesquieu.

How little do they see what is, who frame their hasty judgments upon that which seems!—Southey.

She looks as if butter wouldn't melt in her mouth.—Swift.

That gloomy outside, like a rusty chest, contains the shining treasure of a soul resolved and brave.—Dryden.

He has, I know not what
Of greatness in his looks, and of high fate
That almost awes me.
—Dryden.

O place! O form, how often dost thou with thy case, thy habit, wrench awe from fools, and tie the wiser souls to thy false seeming!—Shakespeare.

There are no greater wretches in the world than many of those whom people in general take to be happy.—Seneca.

Appearances deceive
And this one maxim is a standing rule:
Men are not what they seem.—Havard.

An emperor in his nightcap will not meet with half the respect of an emperor with a crown.—Goldsmith.

Some men, like modern shops, hang everything in their show windows; when one goes inside, nothing is to be found.—Auerbach.

Men in general judge more from appearances than from reality. All men have eyes, but few have the gift of penetration.—Macchiavelli.

Weeds grow sometimes very much like flowers, and you can't tell the difference between true and false merely by the shape.—Paxton Hood.

He had a head which statuaries loved to copy, and a foot the deformity of which the beggars in the streets mimicked.—Macaulay.

We understood
Her by her sight; her pure and eloquent blood
Spoke in her cheeks, and so distinctly wrought.
That one might almost say her body thought.
—Donne.

Within the oyster's shell uncouth
The purest pearl may hide,
Trust me you'll find a heart of truth
Within that rough outside.
—Mrs. Osgood.

'Tis not the fairest form that holds
The mildest, purest soul within;
'Tis not the richest plant that holds
The sweetest fragrance in. —Dawes.

A sweet attractive kinde of grace,
A full assurance given by looks,
Continuall comfort in a face
The lineaments of gospel bookes.
—Matthew Royden.

By a kind of fashionable discipline, the eye is taught to brighten, the lip to smile, and the whole countenance to emanate with the semblance of friendly welcome, while the bosom is unwarmed by a single spark of genuine kindness and good-will.—Washington Irving.

In all professions every one affects a particular look and exterior, in order to appear what he wishes to be thought; so that it may be said the world's made up of appearances.—La Rochefoucauld.

Why should the sacred character of virtue Shine on a villain's countenance? Ye powers!

Why fix'd you not a brand on treason's front
That we might know t' avoid perfidious mortals. —Dennis.

In the condition of men, it frequently happens that grief and anxiety lie hid under the golden robes of prosperity; and the gloom of calamity is cheered by secret radiations of hope and comfort; as in the works of nature, the bog is sometimes covered with flowers, and the mine concealed in the barren crags.—Johnson.

Surely you will not calculate any essential difference from mere appearances; for the light laughter that bubbles on the lip often mantles over brackish depths of sadness, and the serious look may be the sober veil that covers a divine peace. You know that the bosom can ache beneath diamond brooches; and how many blithe hearts dance under coarse wool!—Chapin.

It is not every man that can afford to wear a shabby coat; and worldly wisdom dictates to her disciples the propriety of dressing somewhat beyond their means, but of living somewhat within them,—for every one sees how we dress, but none see how we live, except we choose to let them. But the truly great are, by universal suffrage, exempted from these trammels, and may live or dress as they please.—Colton.

In civilized society external advantages make us more respected. A man with a good coat upon his back meets with a better reception than he who has a bad one. You may analyze this and say, What is there in it? But that will avail you nothing, for it is a part of a general system.—Johnson.

Appetite

Hunger is never delicate.—Dr. Johnson.

Good cheer is no hindrance to a good life.—Aristippus.

Who can cloy the hungry edge of appetite?—Shakespeare.

A dinner lubricates business.—Lord Stowell.

Fat paunches have lean pates.—Shakespeare.

Reason should direct and appetite obey.—Cicero.

Turtle makes all men equal.—Beaconsfield.

Appetite comes with eating, says Angeston.—Rabelais.

If you are surprised at the number of our maladies, count our cooks.—Seneca.

It is difficult to speak to the belly because it has no ears.—Plutarch.

Hunger makes everything sweet except itself, for want is the teacher of habits.—Antiphanes.

Choose rather to punish your appetites than to be punished by them.—Tyrius Maximus.

Animals feed, man eats; the man of intellect alone knows how to eat.—Brillat-Savarin.

Who rises from a feast with that keen appetite that he sits down?—Shakespeare.

And gazed around them to the left and right
With the prophetic eye of appetite.
—Byron.

All philosophy in two words,—sustain and abstain.—Epictetus.

The table is the only place where we do not get weary during the first hour.—Brillat-Savarin.

Here is neither want of appetite nor mouths,
Pray heaven we be not scant of meat or mirth. —Scott.

Govern well thy appetite, lest Sin
Surprise thee, and her black attendant
Death. —Milton.

Now good digestion wait on appetite,
And health on both! —Shakespeare.

Some men are born to feast, and not to fight; whose sluggish minds, even in fair honor's field, still on their dinner turn.—Joanna Baillie.

Doth not the appetite alter? A man loves the meat in his youth that he cannot endure in his age.—Shakespeare.

The destiny of nations depends upon the manner in which they feed themselves.—Brillat-Savarin.

The chief pleasure in eating does not consist in costly seasoning or exquisite flavor, but in yourself. Seek you for sauce in sweating.—Horace.

The stomach is a slave that must accept everything that is given to it, but which avenges wrongs as slyly as does the slave.—Emile Souvestre.

There are men whose stomachs are the clamorous creditors that sooner or later throw them into bankruptcy.—J. L. Basford.

The pleasures of eating deal with us like Egyptian thieves, who strangle those whom they embrace.—Seneca.

Oh cookery, cookery! that kills more than weapons, guns, wars, or poisons, and would destroy all, but that physic helps to make away some.—Anthony Brewer.

The ancients had a significant and truthful saying, that hunger was the best sauce for supper.—Rowland Hill.

For the sake of health, medicines are taken by weight and measure; so ought food to be, or by some similar rule.—Skelton.

A relish bestowed upon the poorer classes, that they may like what they eat; while it is seldom enjoyed by the rich, because they may eat what they like.—Chatfield.

Hunger is a cloud out of which falls a rain of eloquence and knowledge; when the belly is empty, the body becomes spirit; when it is full, the spirit becomes body.—Saadi.

These appetites are very humiliating weaknesses. That our grace depends so largely upon animal condition is not quite flattering to those who are hyper-spiritual.—Beecher.

No man's body is as strong as his appetites, but Heaven has corrected the boundlessness of his voluptuous desires by stinting his strength and contracting his capacities.—Tillotson.

Our appetites, of one or another kind, are excellent spurs to our reason, which might otherwise but feebly set about the great ends of preserving and continuing the species.—Lamb.

His thirst he slakes at some pure neighboring brook,
Nor seeks for sauce where Appetite stands cook. —Churchill.

Seest thou how pale the sated guest rises from supper, where the appetite is puzzled with varieties? The body, too, burdened with yesterday's excess, weighs down the soul, and fixes to the earth this particle of the divine essence.—Horace.

The youth who follows his appetites too soon seizes the cup, before it has received its best ingredients, and by anticipating his pleasures, robs the remaining parts of life of their share, so that his eagerness only produces a manhood of imbecility and an age of pain.—Goldsmith.

There are so few invalids who are invariably and conscientiously un-temptable by those deadly domestic enemies, sweetmeats, pastry, and gravies, that the usual civilities at a meal are very like being politely assisted to the grave.—Willis.

Applause

I would applaud thee to the very echo, that should applaud again.—Shakespeare.

A slowness to applaud betrays a cold temper or an envious spirit.—Hannah More.

The applause of a single human being is of great consequence.—Johnson.

A universal applause is seldom less than two thirds of a scandal.—L'Estrange.

O popular applause! what heart of man is proof against thy sweet, seducing charms?—Cowper.

Applause is the spur of noble minds, the end and aim of weak ones.—C. C. Colton.

You may fail to shine, in the opinion of others, both in your conversation and actions, from being superior as well as inferior to them.—Greville.

The praise we give to new comers into the world arises from the envy we bear to those who are established.—La Rochefoucauld.

Praise from the common people is generally false, and rather follows vain persons than virtuous ones.—Bacon.

When the million applaud you, seriously ask yourself what harm you have done; when they censure you, what good!—Colton.

The silence that accepts merit as the most natural thing in the world, is the highest applause.—Emerson.

Neither human applause nor human censure is to be taken as the test of truth; but either should set us upon testing ourselves.—Bishop Whately.

Flattery of the verbal kind is gross. In short, applause is of too coarse a nature to be swallowed in the gross, though the extract or tincture be ever so agreeable.—Shenstone.

They threw their caps
As they would hang them on the horns o'
the moon,
Shouting their emulation. —Shakespeare.

Applause waits on success: the fickle multitude, like the light straw that floats along the street, glide with the current still, and follow fortune.—Franklin.

Such a noise arose as the shrouds make at sea in a stiff tempest, as loud and to as many tunes,—hats, cloaks, doublets, I think, flew up; and had their faces been loose, this day they had been lost.—Shakespeare.

Apple

The apple blossoms' shower of earl,
Though blent with rosier hue,
As beautiful as woman's blush,
As evanescent, too. —L. E. Landon.

What plant we in this apple tree?
Sweets for a hundred flowery springs
To load the May-wind's restless wings,
When, from the orchard-row, he pours
Its fragrance through our open doors;
A world of blossoms for the bee,
Flowers for the sick girl's silent room,
For the glad infant sprigs of bloom,
We plant with the apple tree.

—Bryant.

And what is more melancholy than the old apple-trees that linger about the spot where once stood a homestead, but where there is now only a ruined chimney rising out of a grassy and weed-grown cellar? They offer their fruit to every wayfarer—apples that are bitter-sweet with the moral of time's vicissitude.—Nath. Hawthorne.

Appreciation

By appreciation we make excellence in others our own property.—Voltaire.

The applause of a single human being is of great consequence.—Dr. Johnson.

Were she perfect, one would admire her more, but love her less.—Grattan.

Give tribute, but not oblation, to human wisdom.—Sir. P. Sidney.

It is only by loving a thing that you can make it yours.—George Macdonald.

Men should allow others' excellences, to preserve a modest opinion of their own.—Barrow.

To appreciate the noble is a gain which can never be torn from us.—Goethe.

To love her (Lady Elizabeth Hastings) was a liberal education.—Steele.

Men prize the thing ungained more than it is.—Shakespeare.

No man ever thought too highly of his nature or too meanly of himself.—Young.

It often happens that those of whom we speak least on earth are best known in heaven.—Caussin.

It is common, to esteem most what is most unknown.—Tacitus.

Neither the praise nor the blame is our own.—Cowley.

To praise great actions with sincerity may be said to be taking part in them.—Rochefoucauld.

It is a matter of the simplest demonstration, that no man can be really appreciated but by his equal or superior.—Ruskin.

He is a fool who is not for love and beauty. I speak unto the young, for I am of them and always shall be.—Bailey.

We are very much what others think of us. The reception our observations meet with gives us courage to proceed or damps our efforts.—Hazlitt.

You may fail to shine, in the opinion of others, both in your conversation and actions, from being superior, as well as inferior to them.—Greville.

It is with certain good qualities as with the senses; those who are entirely deprived of them can neither appreciate nor comprehend them.—Rochefoucauld.

Our companions please us less from the charms we find in their conversation than from those they find in ours.—Greville.

You think much too well of me as a man. No author can be as moral as his works, as no preacher is as pious as his sermons.—Richter.

Next to invention is the power of interpreting invention; next to beauty, the power of appreciating beauty.—Margaret Fuller Ossoli.

The silence that accepts merit as the most natural thing in the world is the highest applause.—Emerson.

There is no surer mark of the absence of the highest moral and intellectual qualities than a cold reception of excellence.—S. Bailey.

Contemporaries appreciate the man rather than the merit; posterity will regard the merit rather than the man.—Buxton.

We never know a greater character until something congenial to it has grown up within ourselves.—Channing.

He is incapable of a truly good action who knows not the pleasure in contemplating the good actions of others.—Lavater.

I do not know at first what it is that charms me. The men and things of to-day are wont to be fairer and truer in to-morrow's memory.—Thoreau.

Those who, from the desire of our perfection, have the keenest eye for our faults generally compensate for it by taking a higher view of our merits than we deserve.—J. F. Boyes.

In no time whatever can small critics entirely eradicate out of living men's hearts a certain altogether pecular reverence for Great Men—genuine admiration, loyalty, adoration.—Carlyle.

Men are seldom underrated; the mercury in a man finds its true level in the eyes of the world just as certainly as it does in the glass of a thermometer.—H. W. Shaw.

Were not the eye made to receive the rays of the sun, it could not behold the sun; if the peculiar power of God lay not in us, how could the godlike charm us?—Goethe.

In an audience of rough people a generous sentiment always brings down the house. In the tumult of war both sides applaud an heroic deed.—T. W. Higginson.

Whatever the benefits of fortune are, they yet require a palate fit to relish and taste them; it is fruition, and not possession, that renders us happy.—Montaigne.

We are accustomed to see men deride what they do not understand; and snarl at the good and beautiful because it lies beyond their sympathies.—Goethe.

We must never undervalue any person. The workman loves not that his work should be despised in his presence. Now God is present everywhere, and every person is His work.—De Sales.

Praise is a debt we owe unto the virtues of others, and due unto our own from all whom malice hath not made mutes or envy struck dumb.—Sir Thomas Browne.

No good writer was ever long neglected; no great man overlooked by men equally great. Impatience is a proof of inferior strength, and a destroyer of what little there may be.—Landor.

I pity the man who can travel from Dan to Beersheba, and cry, "T is all barren!" And so it is, and so is all the world to him who will not cultivate the fruits it offers.—Sterne.

The more enlarged is our own mind, the greater number we discover of men of originality. Your commonplace people see no difference between one man and another.—Pascal.

In this world there is one godlike thing, the essence of all that ever was or ever will be of godlike in this world,—the veneration done to human worth by the hearts of men.—Carlyle.

To guard the mind against the temptation of thinking that there are no good people, say to them: "Be such as you would like to see others, and you will find those who resemble you."—Bossuet.

People do not always understand the motives of sublime conduct, and when they are astonished they are very apt to think they ought to be alarmed. The truth is none are fit judges of greatness but those who are capable of it.—Jane Porter.

It is very singular how the fact of a man's death often seems to give people a truer idea of his character, whether for good or evil, than they have ever possessed while he was living and acting among them.—Hawthorne.

Every man stamps his value on himself. The price we challenge for ourselves is given us. There does not live on earth the man, be his station what it may, that I despise myself compared with him. Man is made great or little by his own will.—Schiller.

Sometimes a common scene in nature—one of the common relations of life—will open itself to us with a brightness and pregnancy of meaning unknown before. Sometimes a thought of this kind forms an era in life. It changes the whole future course. It is a new creation.—Channing.

The charming landscape which I saw this morning is indubitably made up of some twenty or thirty farms. Miller owns this field, Locke that, and Manning the woodland beyond. But none of them owns the landscape. There is a property in the horizon which no man has but he whose eye can integrate all the parts, that is, the poet. This is the best part of these men's farms, yet to this their warranty-deeds give no title.—Emerson.

To feel, to feel exquisitely, is the lot of very many; it is the charm that lends a superstitious joy to fear. But to appreciate belongs to the few; to one or two alone, here and there, the blended passion and understanding that constitute in its essence worship.—Elizabeth Sheppard.

Nature and books belong to the eyes that see them. It depends on the mood of the man, whether he shall see the sunset or the fine poem. There are always sunsets, and there is always genius; but only a few hours so serene that we can relish nature or criticism. The more or less depends on structure or temperament. Temperament is the iron wire on which the beads are strung. Of what use is fortune or talent to a cold and defective nature?—Emerson.

We commend a horse for his strength, and sureness of foot, and not for his rich caparisons; a greyhound for his share of heels, not for his fine collar; a hawk for her wing, not for her jesses and bells. Why, in like manner, do we not value a man for what is properly his own? He has a great train, a beautiful palace, so much credit, so many thousand pounds a year, and all these are about him, but not in him.—Montaigne.

April

Oh, the lovely fickleness of an April day!
—W. H. Gibson.

Old April wanes, and her last dewy morn
Her death-bed steeps in tears; to hail the
May
New blooming blossoms 'neath the sun are born,
And all poor April's charms are swept away.
—Clare.

The children with the streamlets sing,
When April stops at last her weeping;
And every happy growing thing
Laughs like a babe just roused from sleeping.
—Lucy Larcom.

There is no glory in star or blossom
Till looked upon by a loving eye;
There is no fragrance in April breezes
Till breathed with joy as they wander by.
—Bryant.

Again the blackbirds sing; the streams
Wake, laughing, from their winter dreams,
And tremble in the April showers
The tassels of the maple flowers.
—Whittier.

When April winds
Grew soft, the maple burst into a flush
Of scarlet flowers. The tulip tree, high up,
Opened in airs of June her multitude
Of golden chalices to humming birds
And silken-wing'd insects of the sky.
—Bryant.

Sweet April! many a thought
Is wedded unto thee, as hearts are wed;
Nor shall they fail, till, to its autumn brought,
Life's golden fruit is shed.
—Longfellow.

Every tear is answered by a blossom,
Every sigh with songs and laughter blent,
Apple-blossoms upon the breezes toss them,
April knows her own, and is content.
—Susan Coolidge.

Arbor Day (see Trees)

Arbor Day has fostered love of country.—B. G. Northrop.

It has been wisely suggested that each State should choose its own tree, which in every case should be one that will thrive best in its soil.—N. Y. Evangelist.

In all thickly peopled countries the forests no longer supply the necessities for wood by natural production.—Christian Work.

The opportunity should not be lost, which is afforded by the occasion, for illustrating and enforcing the thought that the universe, its creation, its arrangement, and all of its developing processes, are not due to human planning or oversight, but to the infinite wisdom and power of God.—A. S. Draper.

Arbor Day has brought about a revolution in American taste. From tree destroying we have come back to tree planting.—Johnhaired Wilson.

The tree of the field is man's life. "Then shall all the trees of the wood rejoice before the Lord." "The trees of the Lord are full of sap, the cedars of Lebanon which he hath planted; where the birds make their nests; as for the stork, the fir trees are her house."—Bible.

Woodman, spare that tree!
 Touch not a single bough!
 In youth it sheltered me,
 And I'll protect it now.
 'Twas my forefather's hand
 That placed it near his cot,
 There, woodman, let it stand;
 Thy ax shall harm it not.
 —George P. Morris.

What a noble gift to man are the Forests! What a debt of gratitude and admiration we owe to their beauty and their utility! How pleasantly the shadows of the wood fall upon our heads when we turn from the glitter and turmoil of the world of man!—Cooper.

The school children of New York State planted more than 200,000 trees within ten years from the time Arbor Day was recognized. Few similar efforts in years have been more thoroughly commendable than the effort to get our people practically to show their appreciation of the beauty and usefulness of trees.—A. S. Draper.

What earnest worker, with hand and brain for the benefit of his fellow-men, could desire a more pleasing recognition of his usefulness than the monument of a tree, ever growing, ever blooming, and ever bearing wholesome fruit?—Irving.

The great object to be attained through the observance of Arbor Day is the cultivation of a love for nature among children, with the confident expectation that thereby the needless destruction of the forests will be stayed, and the improvement of grounds about school buildings and residences will be promoted—A. S. Draper.

We know that our forests are in danger of being decimated by the ruthless strokes of the woodchopper's ax, and we know that to prevent that crisis, children, in the West especially, have been encouraged on this holiday to plant some tree or shrub to provide for future use and beauty.—Christian at Work.

Tree Planting on Arbor Day for economic purposes in the great West has given to the prairie States many thousand acres of new forests, and inspired the people with a sense of their great value, not only for economic purposes, but for climatic and meteorological purposes as well.—Warren Highley.

There is something nobly simple and pure in a taste for the cultivation of forest trees. It argues, I think, a sweet and generous nature to have this strong relish for the beauties of vegetation, and this friendship for the hardy and glorious sons of the forest. He who plants a tree looks forward to future ages, and plants for posterity. Nothing could be less selfish than this.—Irving.

The primary purpose of the Legislature in establishing "Arbor Day," was to develop and stimulate in the children of the Commonwealth a love and reverence for Nature as revealed in trees and shrubs and flowers. In the language of the statute, "to encourage the planting, protection and preservation of trees and shrubs" was believed to be the most effectual way in which to lead our children to love Nature and reverence Nature's God, and to see the uses to which these natural objects may be put in making our school grounds more healthful and attractive.—A. S. Draper.

So remarkable have been the results of Arbor Day in Nebraska, that its originator is gratefully recognized as the great benefactor of his State. Proofs of public appreciation of his grand work are found throughout the State. It glories in the old misnomer of the geographies, "The Great American Desert," since it has become so habitable and hospitable by cultivation and tree planting. Where, twenty years ago, the books said trees would not grow, the settler who does not plant them is the exception.—B. G. Northrop.

The Bible is full of trees; from the time when Adam and Eve sat under their shadow in Eden, on to that splendid vision of the New Jerusalem, where the tree of life bears twelve manner of fruits and its leaves are for the healing of the nations. Absalom's oak, and Elijah's juniper, and Jonah's gourd, and the sycamore which hoisted little Zaccheus into notice, are all familiar to every Sunday school scholar. Our Lord hung one of His most solemn parables on the boughs of a barren fig tree, and drew one of His most apt illustrations of the growth of His kingdom from the mustard which becomes tall enough for the birds to nestle in its branches.—Dr. Cuyler.

An eminent educator says: "Any teacher who has no taste for trees, shrubs, or flowers is unfit to be placed in charge of children." Arbor Day has enforced the same idea, especially in those States in which the pupils have cast their ballots on Arbor Day in favor of a State tree and State flower. Habits of observation have thus been formed which have led youth in their walks, at work or play, to recognize and admire our noble trees, and to realize that they are the grandest products of nature and form the finest drapery that adorns the earth in all lands.—B. G. Northrop.

In the olden times trees were planted about the home to commemorate events in the family. Grandfather's and grandmother's maple trees still stand in front of the old homestead gate. They were planted on their wedding day—~~many~~ years ago. Large, grand trees they are now, and they have been the homes of generations of birds who have been reared amid their branches and taught how to use their wings, and each summer time they seem to increase in number. A new tree was planted when each little child came to gladden the home. They were called birthday trees. Here and there on the homestead grounds stand the memorial trees, planted when some of the loved ones went away from the home on earth to the Father's home above.—New York Evangelist.

Arbor Day has taken its place, and will no doubt hold its own among the holidays of the American people. It has done a wonderful work among the children, not only in its influence as a practical factor in the beautifying of the yards and streets about the school buildings; but best of all has been the impetus given by it to the study of nature. The very fact that once every year the youth of our country may prepare for a day devoted to trees, has aroused them to observe and ask questions, and the coming generation will know more about them than did their fathers and mothers.—Churchman.

Let the people lay aside for a season the habitual activity of the day and devote sufficient time thereof to plant a forest, fruit or ornamental tree along the public highways and streams, in private and public parks, about the public schoolhouses and on the college grounds, in gardens and on the farms, thus promoting the pleasure, profit, and prosperity of the people of the State, providing protection against floods and storms, securing health and comfort, increasing that which is beautiful and pleasing to the eye, comforting to physical life, and elevating the mind and heart, and by associations and meetings excite public interest and give encouragement to this most commendable work.—Governor of Pennsylvania, Arbor Day Proclamation.

It appears that the woodland of the United States now covers 450,000,000 acres, or about twenty-six per cent of the whole area. Of this not less than 25,000,000 acres are cut over annually, a rate of destruction that will bring our forests to an end in eighteen years if there is no replanting. It is also stated that while the wood growing annually in the forests of the United States amounts to 12,000,000,000 cubic feet, the amount cut annually is 24,000,000,000 feet, and this does not include the amount destroyed by fire

The country's supply of timber, therefore, is being depleted at least twice as fast as it is being reproduced, and it is easy to see that unless this process is soon checked, it will not be many years before the country is suffering from a decrease in rainfall, and the consequent drying up of the streams.—Forestry Congress.

There's something in a noble tree—
 What shall I say? a soul?
 For 'tis not form, or aught we see
 In leaf, or branch or bole.
 Some presence, tho' not understood,
 Dwells there always, and seems
 To be acquainted with our mood,
 And mingles in our dreams.
 I would not say that trees at all
 Were of our blood and race,
 Yet, lingering where their shadows fall,
 I sometimes think I trace
 A kinship, whose far-reaching root
 Grew when the world began,
 And made them best of all things mute
 To be the friends of man.

Children may not be able to understand the importance of trees in their aggregation as forests; however, they will, if allowed to assemble in a grove or park, be inspired with the idea that trees are one of the grandest products of God when they hear that without them the earth could never have produced the necessities of life, and that with their destruction we could not keep up the sustained growth of the plants that feed man and animals. There is no more suitable subject for practical oral lessons, now common in most of our schools, than the nature of plants, and especially that of trees and the value of tree-planting.—Nicholas Jarchow.

It is encouraging to know that in so many places there is a growing tendency to purchase so-called waste lands and to hold them for the enjoyment of the people. We call to mind another region in Connecticut where the villagers are united in their interest to preserve all the rural charms of the neighborhood. Miles of highway have been purchased with no other purpose than to allow nature to frolic in her own free way by the roadside. Forests have been bought that they might be held for public enjoyment, and the feeling of the community is strong for the preservation of all wild spots which will help to satisfy the desire for beauty and repose.

Forest areas exercise a positive climatic influence upon the surrounding country. They modify the extremes of heat and cold, and render the temperature more equable throughout the year.

The deforesting of large areas of hilly and mountainous country affects to a very large extent the quantity of water that comes from springs and flows in rivers. The more apparent is this when the deforesting occurs on the head waters of important streams. Then the water power is destroyed or greatly impaired, navigation impeded, commerce interfered with, and droughts and floods are more frequent and more severe.

The interests of agriculture and horticulture are greatly subserved by the proper distribution of forest areas through their climatic and hydrographic influence.

A country, embracing within its borders the head waters of all the streams and rivers that interlace it, when stripped of its forest covering becomes a barren waste, incapable of supporting man or beast.—Warren Highley.

Arbor Day in the public schools is doing something toward the replenishing of treeless regions, restoring forest trees to their former habitation, and also toward the extermination of savagery toward all tree growth from the boys of this generation. Heredity from the slayers of trees in their fight with the primeval woods, will require heroic treatment. A boy with a hatchet is still a desolater, and with an axe he is a scourge second only to the forest burner; when he grows to manhood his greed is proof against all sentiment or suggestion of remoter consequences. For centuries now the matchless forests of this country have been faced with the cry of "Kill! Kill!" There has been no mercy and no recourse. Slaughter has waged unhindered and unrebuked. Timber forests, with unlimited supply under care and culture, have been ruined. The waste has been more than the product. For bark, for charcoal and firewood, for fence posts and railroad ties, for lumber and shingles, for spars and ship timbers, for wooden ware, matches, and even toothpicks, the woods have been flayed alive. We have wasted our inheritance until the resulting shame is beginning to show. Forest laws that are sharp and usable as axes are demanded. The ownership of woodland must not carry the right to abuse it. Lands that are important water preserves should be protected the same as public reservoirs. Private ownership which has proved detrimental to public interests should be suppressed by public purchases. All possible restraints must be put on the marauders and incendiaries of the woods. For toleration of this criminal treatment of trees has reached its limit. The sentiment of our people is ready to sustain the hand of justice in the defense of these true friends of man.—Christian Work.

Arbutus

Pure and perfect, sweet arbutus
Twines her rosy-tinted wreath.
—Elaine Goodale.

Now the tender, sweet arbutus,
Trails her blossom-clustered vines,
And the many-fingered cinquefoil
In the shadow hollow twines.
—Dora Read Goodale.

Darlings of the forest!

Like some tall palm the noiseless fabric sprung. —Bishop Heber.

No person who is not a great sculptor or painter can be an architect. If he is not a painter or sculptor, he can only be a builder.—Ruskin.

Houses are built to live in, more than to look on; therefore let use be preferred before uniformity except where both may be had.—Bacon.

Thus when we view some well-proportion'd dome,
* * * * *

No single parts unequally surprise,
All comes united to th' admiring eyes.
—Pope.

If cities were built by the sound of music, then some edifices would appear to be constructed by grave, solemn tones,—others to have danced forth to light fantastic airs.—Hawthorne.

We must note carefully what distinction there is between a healthy and a diseased love of change; for as it was in healthy love of change that the Gothic architecture rose, it was partly in consequence of diseased love of change that it was destroyed.—Ruskin.

An instinctive taste teaches men to build their churches in flat countries with spire-steeple, which, as they cannot be referred to any other object, point as with silent finger to the sky and stars.—Coleridge.

Architecture is the art which so disposes and adorns the edifices raised by man, for whatsoever uses, that the sight of them may contribute to his mental health, power, and pleasure.—Ruskin.

It was stated * * * that the value of architecture depended on two distinct characters:—the one, the impression it receives from human power; the other, the image it bears of the natural creation.—Ruskin.

Better the rudest work that tells a story or records a fact, than the richest without meaning. There should not be a single ornament put upon great civic buildings, without some intellectual intention.—Ruskin.

I would have, then, our ordinary dwelling-houses built to last, and built to be lovely; as rich and full of pleasantness as may be within and without: * * * with such differences as might suit and express each man's character and occupation, and partly his history.—Ruskin.

The hasty multitude
Admiring enter'd, and the work some praise,
And some the architect: his hand was known
In heaven by many a tower'd structure high,
Where scepter'd angels held their residence,
And sat as princes. —Milton.

In designing a house and gardens, it is happy when there is an opportunity of maintaining a subordination of parts; the house so luckily placed as to exhibit a view of the whole design. I have sometimes thought that there was room for it to resemble an epic or dramatic poem.—Shenstone.

The Gothic cathedral is a blossoming in stone, subdued by the insatiable demand of harmony in man. The mountain of granite blooms into an eternal flower, with the lightness and delicate finish as well as the aerial proportions and perspective of vegetable beauty.—Emerson.

Architecture exhibits the greatest extent of the difference from nature which may exist in works of art. It involves all the powers of design, and is sculpture and painting inclusively. It shows the greatness of man, and should at the same time teach him humility.—Coleridge.

The hand that rounded Peter's dome
And groined the aisles of Christian Rome,
Wrought in a sad sincerity:
Himself from God he could not free;
He builded better than he knew;
The conscious stone to beauty grew.
—Emerson.

Möller, in his Essay on Architecture, taught that the building which was fitted accurately to answer its end would turn out to be beautiful, though beauty had not been intended. I find the like unity in human structures rather virulent and pervasive.—Emerson.

Grandeur * * * consists in form, and not in size: and to the eye of the philosopher, the curve drawn on a paper two inches long, is just as magnificent, just as symbolic of divine mysteries and melodies, as when embodied in the span of some cathedral roof.—Charles Kingsley.

Architecture is the printing-press of all ages, and gives a history of the state of the society in which it was erected, from the cromlech of the Druids to those toy-shops of royal bad taste,—Carlton House and the Brighton Pavilion. The Tower and Westminster Abbey are glorious pages in the history of time, and tell the story of an iron despotism, and the cowardice of unlimited power.—Lady Morgan.

Therefore when we build, let us think that we build (public edifices) forever. Let it not be for present delight, nor for present use alone, let it be such work as our descendants will thank us for, and let us think, as we lay stone on stone, that a time is to come when those stones will be held sacred because our hands have touched them, and that men will say as they look upon the labor and wrought substance of them, "See! this our fathers did for us."—Ruskin.

Argument

Let argument bear no unmusical sound.—Ben Jonson.

Neither irony nor sarcasm is argument.—Rufus Choate.

Argument is not always truth.—Kossuth.

Strong and bitter words indicate a weak cause.—Victor Hugo.

Silence is less injurious than a weak reply.—Colton.

I always get the better when I argue alone.—Goldsmith.

Argument should be politic as well as logical.—Lamartine.

In excessive altercation truth is lost.—Publius Syrus.

Keep cool; anger is not argument.—Daniel Webster.

Many can argue; not many converse.—Alcott.

Arguments out of a pretty mouth are unanswerable.—Addison.

In argument similes are like songs in love; they much describe; they nothing prove.—Prior.

Affect not little shifts and subterfuges to avoid the force of an argument.—Dr. Watts.

We are pleased with one who instantly assents to our opinions, but we love a proselyte.—Arthur Helps.

His conduct still right with his argument wrong.—Goldsmith.

Wise men argue causes, and fools decide them.—Anacharsis.

No argument can be drawn from the abuse of a thing against its use.—Latin.

Be calm in arguing; for fierceness makes error a fault, and truth discourtesy.—Herbert.

A man convinced against his will
Is of the same opinion still.

—Butler.

Similes prove nothing, but yet greatly lighten and relieve the tedium of argument.—South.

Arguments, like children, should be like the subject that begets them.—Thomas Decker.

I have found you an argument; but I am not obliged to find you an understanding.—Samuel Johnson.

A knock-down argument; 'tis but a word and a blow.—Dryden.

He that is not open to conviction is not qualified for discussion.—Bishop Whately.

He who establishes his argument by noise and command shows that reason is weak.—Montaigne.

They that are more frequent to dispute be not always the best able to determine.—Hooker.

The devil can quote Scripture for his purpose.—Shakespeare.

One single positive weighs more,
You know, than negatives a score.

—Prior.

In argument with men a woman ever
Goes by the worse, whatever be her cause.

—Milton.

Never argue. In society nothing must be; give only results. If any person differs from you, bow, and turn the conversation.—Beaconsfield.

Insolence is not logic; epithets are the arguments of malice.—R. G. Ingersoll.

Who shall decide when doctors disagree,
And sound casuists doubt like you and me?
—Pope.

Nothing is more certain than that much of the force, as well as grace, of arguments or instructions depends on their conciseness.—Pope.

Gratuitous violence in argument betrays a conscious weakness of the cause, and is usually a signal of despair.—Junius.

In arguing, too, the parson owned his skill,
For even tho' vanquish'd he could argue still.
—Goldsmith.

The first race of mankind used to dispute, as our ordinary people do now-a-days, in a kind of wild logic, uncultivated by rule of art.—Addison.

Academical disputation gives vigor and briskness to the mind thus exercised, and relieves the languor of private study and meditation.—Dr. Watts.

There is no arguing with Johnson; for if his pistol misses fire, he knocks you down with the butt end of it.—Goldsmith.

Argument, as usually managed, is the worst sort of conversation; as it is generally in books the worst sort of reading.—Swift.

She hath prosperous art
When she will play with reason and discourse,
And well she can persuade.
—Shakespeare.

As the scale of the balance must give way to the weight that presses it down, so the mind must of necessity yield to demonstration.—Cicero.

The skilful disputant well knows that he never has his enemy at more advantage than when, by allowing the premises, he shows him arguing wrong from his own principles.—Warburton.

There is no good in arguing with the inevitable. The only argument available with an east wind is to put on your overcoat.—Lowell.

Like doctors thus, when much dispute has past,
We find our tenets just the same at last.
—Pope.

No deeply rooted tendency was ever extirpated by adverse judgment. Not having originally been founded on argument, it cannot be destroyed by logic.—G. H. Lewes.

The soundest argument will produce no more conviction in an empty head than the most superficial declamation, as a feather and a guinea fall with equal velocity in a vacuum.—Colton.

Passionate expression and vehement assertion are no arguments, unless it be of the weakness of the cause that is defended by them, or of the man that defends it.—Chillingworth.

Examples I could cite you more;
But be contented with these four;
For when one's proofs are aptly chosen
Four are as valid as four dozen.
—Prior.

Reproachful speech from either side
The want of argument supplied;
They rail, reviled; as often ends
The contests of disputing friends.
—Gay.

An academical education, sir, bids me tell you, that it is necessary to establish the truth of your first proposition before you presume to draw inferences from it.—Junius.

Weak arguments are often thrust before my path; but although they are most unsubstantial, it is not easy to destroy them. There is not a more difficult feat known than to cut through a cushion with a sword.—Whately.

It is an excellent rule to be observed in all disputes, that men should give soft words and hard arguments; that they should not so much strive to vex as to convince each other.—Wilkins.

In a debate, rather pull to pieces the argument of thy antagonists than offer him any of thy own; for thus thou wilt fight him in his own country.—Fielding.

With temper calm and mild,
And words of soften'd tone,
He overthrows his neighbor's cause,
And justifies his own.
—Vicksburg Whig.

There are some people as obtuse in recognizing an argument as they are in appreciating wit. You couldn't drive it into their heads with a hammer.—Douglas Jerrold.

If thou continuest to take delight in idle argumentation, thou mayest be qualified to combat with the sophists, but never know how to love with men.—Socrates.

It is in disputes as in armies; where the weaker side set up false lights, and make a great noise to make the enemy believe them more numerous and strong than they really are.—Swift.

Testimony is like an arrow shot from a long bow, the force of it depends on the strength of the hand that draws it. Argument is like an arrow from a cross-bow, which has equal force though drawn by a child.—Boyle.

Soon their crude notions with each other fought;
The adverse sect denied what this had taught;
And he at length the amplest triumph gain'd,
Who contradicted what the last maintain'd.
—Prior.

Whenever you argue with another wiser than yourself, in order that others may admire your wisdom, they will discover your ignorance. When one imagines a discourse better than yourself, although you may be fully informed, yet do not start objections.—Saadi.

The first the Retort Courteous; the second the Quip Modest; the third the Reply Churlish; the fourth the Reproof Valiant; the fifth the Counter-check Quarrelsome; the sixth the Lie with Circumstance; the seventh the Lie Direct.—Shakespeare.

He'd undertake to prove, by force
Of argument, a man's no horse.
He'd prove a buzzard is no fowl,
And that a lord may be an owl,
A calf an alderman, a goose a justice,
And rooks, committeemen or trustees.
—Butler.

I never love those salamanders that are never well but when they are in the fire of contentions. I will rather suffer a thousand wrongs than offer one. I have always found that to strive with a superior is injurious; with an equal, doubtful; with an inferior, sordid and base; with any, full of unquietness.—Bishop Hall.

When we would show any one that he is mistaken, our best course is to observe on what side he considers the subject,—for his view of it is generally right on this side,—and admit to him that he is right so far. He will be satisfied with this acknowledgment, that he was not wrong in his judgment, but only inadvertent in not looking at the whole case.—Pascal.

Treating your adversary with respect is giving him an advantage to which he is not entitled. The greatest part of men cannot judge of reasoning, and are impressed by character; so that, if you allow your adversary a respectable character, they will think that, though you differ from him, you may be in the wrong. Treating your adversary with respect is striking soft in a battle.—Dr. Johnson.

Be calm in argument; for fierceness makes Error a fault, and truth discourtesy.
Why should I feel another man's mistakes
More than his sicknesses or poverty?
In love I should: but anger is not love,
Nor wisdom neither; therefore gently move.
Calmness is great advantage; he that lets
Another chafe may warm him at his fire,
Mark all his wand'rings and enjoy his frets,
As cunning fencers suffer heat to tire.
—Herbert.

Where we desire to be informed 'tis good to contest with men above ourselves, but to confirm and establish our opinions, 'tis best to argue with judgments below our own, that the frequent spoils and victories over their reasons may settle in ourselves an esteem and confirmed opinion of our own.—Sir Thos. Browne.

Some men at the approach of a dispute neigh like horses. Unless there be an argument, they think nothing is doing. Some talkers excel in the precision with which they formulate their thoughts, so that you get from them somewhat to remember; others lay criticism asleep by a charm. Especially women use words that are not words,—as steps in a dance are not steps,—but reproduce the genius of that they speak of; as the sound of some bells makes us think of the bell merely, whilst the church chimes in the distance bring the church and its serious memories before us.—Emerson.

Aristocracy

An aristocracy is the true support of a monarchy.—Napoleon I.

By blood a king, in heart a clown.—Tennyson.

And lords whose parents were the Lord knows who!—De Foe.

You may depend upon it that there are as good hearts to serve men in palaces as in cottages.—Robert Owen.

I do not understand how an aristocracy can exist, unless it be distinguished by some quality which no other class of the community possesses.—Beaconsfield.

Turbulent, discontented men of quality, in proportion as they are puffed up with personal pride and arrogance, generally despise their own order.—Burke.

Where some think, and others do not, there is developed aristocracy. Where all have come to think we have democracy,—the government of the people by themselves.—Beecher.

Aristocracy has three successive ages,—the age of superiorities, the age of privileges, and the age of vanities;

having passed out of the first, it degenerates in the second, and dies away in the third.—Chateaubriand.

Amongst the masses—even in revolutions—aristocracy must ever exist; destroy it in nobility, and it becomes centred in the rich and powerful Houses of the Commons. Pull them down, and it still survives in the master and foreman of the workshop.—Guizot.

Army

For the army is a school in which the niggardly become generous, and the generous prodigal; and if there are some soldiers misers, they are a kind of monsters, but very rarely seen.—Cervantes.

The army is a good book to open to study human life. One learns there to put his hand to everything, to the lowest and highest things. The most delicate and rich are forced to see living nearly everywhere poverty, and to live with it, and to measure his morsel of bread and draught of water.—Alfred de Vigny.

Arrogance

Arrogance is the obstruction of wisdom.—Bion.

When men are most sure and arrogant, they are commonly the most mistaken, and have then given views to passion, without that proper deliberation and suspense which can alone secure them from the grossest absurdities.—Hume.

When Diogenes came to Olympia and perceived some Rhodian youths dressed with great splendor and magnificence, he said with a smile of contempt, "This is all arrogance." Afterwards some Lacedemonians came in his way, as mean and as sordid in their attire as the dress of the others was rich. "This," said he, "is also arrogance."—Ælian.

A man that loves to be peevish and paramount, and to play the sovereign at every turn, does but blast the blessings of life, and swagger away his own enjoyments; and not to enlarge upon the folly, not to mention the injustice of such a behavior, it is always the sign of a little, unbenevolent temper. It is disease and discredit all over, and there is no more greatness in it, than in the swelling of a dropsy.—Jeremy Collier.

What is so hateful to a poor man as the purse-proud arrogance of a rich one? Let fortune shift the scene, and make the poor man rich, he runs at once into the vice that he declaimed against so feelingly; these are strange contradictions in the human character.—Cumberland.

Art

The perfection of art is to conceal art.—Quintilian.

Art needs no spur beyond itself.—Victor Hugo.

Art does not imitate, but interpret.—Mazzini.

He that sips of many arts drinks of none.—Fuller.

The great artist is the slave of his ideal.—Bovee.

Art, however innocent, looks like deceiving.—Aaron Hill.

The inglorious arts of peace.—Andrew Marvell.

An artist should have more than two eyes.—Lamartine.

What is art? Nature concentrated.—Balzac.

Art is power.—Longfellow.

Unless art deceives, it is not art.—W. L. Reiner.

Every artist was first an amateur.—Emerson.

A picture is a poem without words.—Horace.

Art is the gift of God, and must be used unto His glory.—Longfellow.

Art is not imitation, but illusion.—Charles Reade.

The highest art is artlessness.—F. A. Durivage.

The true artist can only labor con amore.—Victor Hugo.

Art may err, but nature cannot miss.—Dryden.

Art still followed where Rome's eagles flew.—Pope.

It was Homer who gave laws to the artist.—Francis Wayland.

The artist belongs to his work, not the work to the artist.—Novalis.

The first essential to success in the art you practice is respect for the art itself.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Seraphs share with thee knowledge; but art, O man, is thine alone!—Schiller.

Painters and poets have equal license in regard to everything.—Horace.

I think sculpture and painting have an effect to teach us manners, and abolish hurry.—Emerson.

Many persons feel art, some understand it; but few both feel and understand it.—Hillard.

The counterfeit and counterpart
Of Nature reproduced in art.
—Longfellow.

Art must anchor in nature, or it is the sport of every breath of folly.—Hazlitt.

The conscious utterance of thought, by speech or action, to any end, is art.—Emerson.

Beauty is at once the ultimate principle and the highest aim of art.—Goethe.

It is the end of art to inoculate men with the love of nature.—Beecher.

Greater completion marks the progress of art, absolute completion usually its decline.—Ruskin.

For Art is Nature made by Man
To Man the interpreter of God.
—Owen Meredith.

Art is indeed not the bread but the wine of life.—Jean Paul Richter.

Dead he is not, but departed—for the artist never dies.—Longfellow.

An amateur may not be an artist, though an artist should be an amateur.—Disraeli.

The true work of art is but a shadow of the divine perfection.—Michael Angelo.

The highest problem of any art is to cause by appearance the illusion of a higher reality.—Goethe.

In art, to express the infinite one should suggest infinitely more than is expressed.—Goethe.

In the fine arts, as in many other things, we know well only what we have not learned.—Chamfort.

No man can thoroughly master more than one art or science.—Hazlitt.

This is an art which does mend nature,—change it rather; but the art itself is nature.—Shakespeare.

The learned understand the reason of the art, the unlearned feel the pleasure.—Quintilian.

The mission of art is to represent nature, not to imitate her.—W. M. Hunt.

It is only the educated who can produce or appreciate high art.—Marguerite de Valois.

There are certain epochs in art when simplicity is audacious originality.—Achilles Poincelot.

All things are artificial; for nature is the art of God.—Sir Thos. Browne.

In the study of the fine arts, they mutually assist each other.—Beaconsfield.

The object of art is to crystallize emotion into thought, and then to fix it in form.—François Delsarte.

Art is more godlike than science. Science discovers; art creates.—John Opie.

True art is but the anti-type of nature,—the embodiment of discovered beauty in utility.—James A. Garfield.

Art is a jealous thing; it requires the whole and entire man.—Michael Angelo.

There is a great affinity between designing and art.—Addison.

It is not the defects but the beauties which should form our criterion of judgment in all matters of art.—Chapin.

The ordinary true, or purely real, cannot be the object of the arts. Illusion on a ground of truth,—that is the secret of the fine arts.—Joubert.

A true artist should put a generous deceit on the spectators, and effect the noblest designs by easy methods.—Burke.

Art is based on a strong sentiment of religion,—on a profound and mighty earnestness; hence it is so prone to co-operate with religion.—Goethe.

Of every noble work the silent part is best; of all expression, that which cannot be expressed.—W. W. Story.

Art is the child of Nature; yes, her darling child, in whom we trace the features of the mother's face.—Longfellow.

Art, as far as it has ability, follows nature, as a pupil imitates his master; thus your art must be, as it were, God's grandchild.—Dante.

Art needs solitude or misery or passion. Lukewarm zephyrs wilt it. It is a rock-flower flourishing by stormy blasts and in stony soil.—Alex. Dumas.

In the art of design, color is to form what verse is to prose,—a more harmonious and luminous vehicle of the thought.—Mrs. Jameson.

The natural progress of the works of men is from rudeness to convenience, from convenience to elegance, and from elegance to nicety.—Dr. Johnson.

Art is the right hand of Nature. The latter has only given us being, the former has made us men.—Schiller.

Persons famous in the arts partake of the immortality of princes, and are upon a footing with them.—Francis I.

A work of art is said to be perfect in proportion as it does not remind the spectator of the process by which it was created.—Tuckerman.

It is only with the best judges that the highest works of art would lose none of their honor by being seen in their rudiments.—J. F. Boyes.

We speak of profane arts; but there are none properly such; every art is holy in itself; it is the son of Eternal Light.—Tegner.

That which exists in nature is a something purely individual and particular. Art, on the contrary, is essentially destined to manifest the general.—Schlegel.

Many young painters would never have taken their pencils in hand if they could have felt, known, and understood, early enough, what really produced a master like Raphael.—Goethe.

Ah! would that we could at once paint with the eyes! In the long way, from the eye, through the arm to the pencil, how much is lost!—Lessing.

From Egypt arts their progress made to Greece, wrapped in the fable of the golden fleece.—Sir J. Denham.

In old times men used their powers of painting to show the objects of faith; in later times they used the objects of faith that they might show their powers of painting.—Ruskin.

The enemy of art is the enemy of nature; art is nothing but the highest sagacity and exertions of human nature; and what nature will he honor who honors not the human?—Lavater.

Immortal art! where'er the rounded sky
Bends o'er the cradle where thy children lie,
Their home is earth, their herald every tongue. —Holmes.

Artists may produce excellent designs, but they will avail little, unless the taste of the public is sufficiently cultivated to appreciate them.—George C. Mason.

The mother of useful arts is necessity; that of the fine arts is luxury. For father the former has intellect; the latter genius, which itself is a kind of luxury.—Schopenhauer.

All the arts, which have a tendency to raise man in the scale of being, have a certain common band of union, and are connected, if I may be allowed to say so, by blood-relationship with one another.—Cicero.

The highest art is always the most religious; and the greatest artist is always a devout man. A scoffing Raphael or Michael Angelo is not conceivable.—Blackie.

Around the mighty master came
The marvels which his pencil wrought,
Those miracles of power whose fame
Is wide as human thought.
—Whittier.

Artists will sometimes speak of Rome with disparagement or indifference while it is before them; but no artist ever lived in Rome and then left it, without sighing to return.—Hillard.

Rules may teach us not to raise the arms above the head; but if passion carries them, it will be well done; passion knows more than art.—Baron.

The painter is, as to the execution of his work, a mechanic; but as to his conception, his spirit, and design, he is hardly below even the poet in liberal art.—Steele.

In art the Greeks were the children of the Egyptians. The day may yet come when we shall do justice to the high powers of that mysterious and imaginative people.—Beaconsfield.

One of the first principles of decorative art is that in all manufactures ornament must hold a place subordinate to that of utility; and when, by its exuberance, ornament interferes with utility, it is misplaced and vulgar.—G. C. Mason.

In art there is a point of perfection, as of goodness or maturity in nature; he who is able to perceive it, and who loves it, has perfect taste; he who does not feel it, or loves on this side or that, has an imperfect taste.—Bruyère.

The object of science is knowledge; the objects of art are works. In art, truth is the means to an end; in science, it is the only end. Hence the practical arts are not to be classed among the sciences.—Whewell.

The temple of art is built of words. Painting and sculpture and music are but the blazon of its windows, borrowing all their significance from the light, and suggestive only of the temple's use.—J. G. Holland.

The artist is the child in the popular fable, every one of whose tears was a pearl. Ah! the world, that cruel step-mother, beats the poor child the harder to make him shed more pearls.—Heinrich Heine.

Art itself, in all its methods, is the child of religion. The highest and best works in architecture, sculpture and painting, poetry and music, have been born out of the religion of Nature.—James Freeman Clarke.

The misfortune in the state is, that nobody can enjoy life in peace, but that everybody must govern; and in art, that nobody will enjoy what has been produced, but that every one wants to reproduce on his own account.—Goethe.

Art is a severe business; most serious when employed in grand and sacred objects. The artist stands higher than art, higher than the object. He uses art for his purposes, and deals with the object after his own fashion.—Goethe.

Winckelmann wished to live with a work of art as a friend. The saying is true of pen and pencil. Fresh lustre shoots from Lycidas in a twentieth perusal. The portraits of Clarendon are mellowed by every year of reflection.—Willmott.

When the painter wishes to represent an event, he cannot place before us too great a number of personages; but he cannot employ too few when he wishes to portray an emotion.—Joubert.

In sculpture did ever anybody call the Apollo a fancy piece? Or say of the Laocoön how it might be made different? A masterpiece of art has in the mind a fixed place in the chain of being, as much as a plant or a crystal.—Emerson.

All men are in some degree impressed by the face of the world; some men even to delight. This love of beauty is taste. Others have the same love in such excess that, not content with admiring, they seek to embody it in new forms. The creation of beauty is art.—Emerson.

Moral beauty is the basis of all true beauty. This foundation is somewhat covered and veiled in nature. Art brings it out, and gives it more transparent forms. It is here that art, when it knows well its power and resources, engages in a struggle with nature in which it may have the advantage.—Victor Cousin.

The study of art is a taste at once engrossing and unselfish, which may be indulged without effort, and yet has the power of exciting the deepest emotions,—a taste able to exercise and to gratify both the nobler and softer parts of our nature.—Guizot.

The one thing that marks the true artist is a clear perception and a firm, bold hand, in distinction from that imperfect mental vision and uncertain touch which give us the feeble pictures and the lumpy statues of the mere artisans on canvas or in stone.—O. W. Holmes.

Art employs method for the symmetrical formation of beauty, as science employs it for the logical exposition of truth; but the mechanical process is, in the last, ever kept visibly distinct, while in the first it escapes from sight amid the shows of color and the curves of grace.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Art does not imitate nature, but it founds itself on the study of nature,—takes from nature the selections which best accord with its own intention, and then bestows on them that which nature does not possess, viz. the mind and the soul of man.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The only kind of sublimity which a painter or sculptor should aim at is to express by certain proportions and positions of limbs and features that strength and dignity of mind, and vigor and activity of body, which enables men to conceive and execute great actions.—Burke.

The power of painter or poet to describe rightly what he calls an ideal thing depends upon its being to him not an ideal, but a real thing. No man ever did or ever will work well but either from actual sight or sight of faith.—Ruskin.

Art is the effort of man to express the ideas which nature suggests to him of a power above nature, whether that power be within the recesses of his own being, or in the Great First Cause of which nature, like himself, is but the effect.—Bulwer-Lytton.

There are two kinds of artists in this world; those that work because the spirit is in them, and they cannot be silent if they would, and those that speak from a conscientious desire to make apparent to others the beauty that has awakened their own admiration.—Anna Katharine Green.

Whatever may be the means, or whatever the more immediate end of any kind of art, all of it that is good agrees in this, that it is the expression of one soul talking to another, and is precious according to the greatness of the soul that utters it.—Ruskin.

It is a great mortification to the vanity of man that his utmost art and industry can never equal the meanest of Nature's productions, either for beauty or value. Art is only the underworkman, and is employed to give a few strokes of embellishment to those pieces which come from the hand of the master.—Hume.

The summit charms us, the steps to it do not; with the heights before our eyes, we like to linger in the plain. It is only a part of art that can be taught; but the artist needs the whole. He who is only half instructed speaks much and is always wrong; who knows it wholly is content with acting and speaks seldom or late.—Goethe.

I once asked a distinguished artist what place he gave to labor in art. "Labor," he in effect said, "is the beginning, the middle, and the end of art." Turning then to another—"And you," I inquired, "what do you consider as the great force in art?" "Love," he replied. In their two answers I found but one truth.—Bovee.

Art is a jealous mistress, and, if a man have a genius for painting, poetry, music, architecture, or philosophy, he makes a bad husband, and an ill provider, and should be wise in season, and not fetter himself with duties which will imbitter his days, and spoil him for his proper work.—Emerson.

Remember always, in painting as in eloquence, the greater your strength, the quieter will be your manner, and the fewer your words; and in painting, as in all the arts and acts of life, the secret of high success will be found, not in a fretful and various excellence, but in a quiet singleness of justly chosen aim.—Ruskin.

The flitting sunbeam has been grasped and made to do man's bidding in place of the painter's pencil. And although Franklin tamed the lightning, yet not until yesterday has its instantaneous flash been made the vehicle of language; thus in the transmission of thought annihilating space and time.—Professor Robinson.

Art neither belongs to religion, nor to ethics; but, like these, it brings us nearer to the Infinite, one of the forms of which it manifests to us. God is the source of all beauty, as of all truth, of all religion, of all morality. The most exalted object, therefore, of art is to reveal in its own manner the sentiment of the Infinite.—Victor Cousin.

Those critics who, in modern times, have the most thoughtfully analyzed the laws of æsthetic beauty concur in maintaining that the real truthfulness of all works of imagination—sculpture, painting, written fiction—is so purely in the imagination, that the artist never seeks to represent the positive truth, but the idealized image of a truth.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Excellence in art is to be attained only by active effort, and not by passive impressions; by the manly overcoming of difficulties, by patient struggle against adverse circumstance, by the thrifty use of moderate opportunities. The great artists were not rocked and dandled into eminence, but they attained to it by that course of labor and discipline which no man need go to Rome or Paris or London to enter upon.—Hillard.

What a conception of art must those theorists have who exclude portraits from the proper province of the fine arts! It is exactly as if we denied that to be poetry in which the poet celebrates the woman he really loves. Portraiture is the basis and the touchstone of historic painting.—Schlegel.

Art is the microscope of the mind, which sharpens the wit as the other does the sight; and converts every object into a little universe in itself. Art may be said to draw aside the veil from nature. To those who are perfectly unskilled in the practice, unimbuéd with the principles of art, most objects present only a confused mass.—Hazlitt.

Art, not less eloquently than literature, teaches her children to venerate the single eye. Remember Matsys. His representations of miser-life are breathing. A forfeited bond twinkles in the hard smile. But follow him to an altar-piece. His Apostle has caught a stray tint from his usurer. Features of exquisite beauty are seen and loved; but the old nature of avarice frets under the glow of devotion. Pathos staggers on the edge of farce.—Willmott.

The perfection of an art consists in the employment of a comprehensive system of laws, commensurate to every purpose within its scope, but concealed from the eye of the spectator; and in the production of effects that seem to flow forth spontaneously, as though uncontrolled by their influence, and which are equally excellent, whether regarded individually, or in reference to the proposed result.—John Mason Good.

Every common dauber writes rascal and villain under his pictures, because the pictures themselves have neither character nor resemblance. But the works of a master require no index. His features and coloring are taken from nature. The impression they make is immediate and uniform; nor is it possible to mistake his characters.—Janius.

It is not so much in buying pictures as in being pictures, that you can encourage a noble school. The best patronage of art is not that which seeks for the pleasures of sentiment in a vague ideality, nor for beauty of form in a marble image, but that which educates your children into living heroes, and binds down the flights and the fondnesses of the heart into practical duty and faithful devotion.—

Ruskin.

Now nature is not at variance with art, nor art with nature; they being both the servants of his providence. Art is the perfection of nature. Were the world now as it was the sixth day, there were yet a chaos. Nature hath made one world, and art another. In brief, all things are artificial; for nature is the art of God.—Sir Thomas Browne.

There is no more potent antidote to low sensuality than the adoration of the beautiful. All the higher arts of design are essentially chaste without respect to the object. They purify the thoughts as tragedy purifies the passions. Their accidental effects are not worth consideration,—there are souls to whom even a vestal is not holy.—Schlegel.

The study of art possesses this great and peculiar charm, that it is absolutely unconnected with the struggles and contests of ordinary life. By private interests, by political questions, men are deeply divided, and set at variance; but beyond and above all such party strifes, they are attracted and united by a taste for the beautiful in art.—Guizot.

Since I have known God in a saying manner, painting, poetry, and music have had charms unknown to me before. I have received what I suppose is a taste for them, or religion has refined my mind and made it susceptible of impressions from the sublime and beautiful. O, how religion secures the heightened enjoyment of those pleasures which keep so many from God, by their becoming a source of pride!—Henry Martyn.

The refining influence is the study of art, which is the science of beauty; and I find that every man values every scrap of knowledge in art, every observation of his own in it, every hint he has caught from another. For the laws of beauty are the beauty of beauty, and give the mind the same or a higher joy than the sight of it gives the senses. The study of art is of high value to the growth of the intellect.—Emerson.

The names of great painters are like passing-bells: in the name of Velasquez you hear sounded the fall of Spain; in the name of Titian, that of Venice; in the name of Leonardo, that of Milan; in the name of Raphael, that of Rome. And there is profound justice in this, for in proportion to the nobleness of the power is the guilt of its use for purposes vain or vile; and hitherto the greater the art, the more surely has it been used, and used solely, for the decoration of pride or the provoking of sensuality.—Ruskin.

Artifices

To know to dissemble is the knowledge of kings.—Richelieu.

Artifice is allowed to deceive a rival; we may employ everything against our enemies.—Richelieu.

The ordinary employment of artifice is the mark of a petty mind; and it almost always happens that he who uses it to cover himself in one place uncovers himself in another.—Rochefoucauld.

Shallow artifice begets suspicion,
And like a cobweb veil, but thinly shades
The face of thy design, alone disguising
What should have ne'er been seen, imperfect mischief. —Congreve.

Nature is mighty. Art is mighty. Artifice is weak. For nature is the work of a mightier power than man. Art is the work of man under the guidance and inspiration of a mightier power. Artifice is the work of mere man, in the imbecility of his mimic understanding.—Hare.

It is sometimes necessary to play the fool to avoid being deceived by cunning men.—La Rochefoucauld.

Ascension Day

Jesus went away not only to prepare a place for us, so that it will be ready for us as one by one we go home, but to prepare us for the place, to fit us for heavenly enjoyments and heavenly service.—Peloubet.

And it came to pass while He blessed them, He was parted from them, and carried up into heaven.—Bible.

So then after the Lord had spoken unto them, He was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God.—Bible.

He is taken up, that He may fulfill His design in dying, and give the work of our salvation its last completing act.—John Flavel.

His ascension is not His separation from His people, but the ascension of His throne and the beginning of His reign as the head of the Church which "is His body, the fulness of Him that filleth all in all."—Rev. Com.

Christ "ascended," not to depart from earth, but to take the throne of His Kingdom on earth. "He sat down at the right hand of God." God's reign does not consist in sitting upon a distant throne! It consists in omnipresent power and authority. To sit at His right hand means to share His Authority and Omnipresence.—Talmadge Root.

Here was a magnificent triumph over the law of gravitation. Here was the royal ascent by which our Solomon went up to the house of the Lord. The everlasting gates lifted up their heads and the King of Glory entered in. It was all of a piece—His life, His death, His resurrection, His ascension, all were triumphs.—Rev. C. P. Eldridge.

The ascension of Elijah may be compared to the flight of a bird, which none can follow; the ascension of Christ is, as it were, a bridge between earth and heaven, laid down for all who are drawn to Him by His earthly existence.—Baumgarten.

When we see the only-begotten Son, clothed in a body like our own, exalted above all the heavens, in that sight we have before us the all-glorious and controlling center of all the spheres, the key which interprets the testimony of prophecy, the gathered first fruits of a new and redeemed world.—W. Pulsford.

Hail the day that sees Him rise,
Ravished from our wistful eyes!
Christ, awhile to mortals given,
Re-ascends His native heaven.
There the glorious triumph waits,
Lift your heads, eternal gates!
Wide unfold the radiant scene,
Take the King of glory in!

—Wesley.

See, the Conqueror mounts in triumph,
See the King in royal state,
Riding on the clouds His chariot
To His heavenly palace-gate;
Hark, the choirs of angel voices
Joyful halleluiahs sing,
And the portals high are lifted,
To receive their heavenly King.

—Wordsworth.

He is gone; a cloud of light
Has received Him from our sight;
High in heaven, where eye of men
Follows not, nor angels' ken;
Through the veils of time and space,
Passed in to the holiest place;
All the toil, the sorrow done,
All the battle fought and won.

—Dean Stanley.

With the ascent of the Saviour into heaven, from which this anniversary day receives its name, He has entered upon the real and undisputed possession of His royal reign, in which from this time on He rules over all things that are in heaven and on earth.—H. Kern.

His Ascension marked a stage in His revelation, but it only brought Him nearer to us. To have lingered among the early disciples would have limited His mission and sequestered Him from the later Church. As the Resurrection opened the grave, the Ascension opened heaven.—Evangelist.

Our first impressions are to consider the Ascension of our Lord as the very greatest event connected with His appearance on earth. To our own mind, undoubtedly, nothing could be so solemn, so exalting, as the changing this life for another; the putting off mortality and putting on immortality; and all this we connect with the thought of the removal from earth to heaven.—Thos. Arnold.

The Ascension was the appropriate bloom and culmination of the Resurrection. Had Christ, after the Resurrection, died a natural death, or had He simply disappeared from view into unknown obscurity, the Resurrection, as a proof of His divine power, and pledge of His undimmed and undiminished existence would have gone for nothing. And the Ascension of our Lord has some most precious lessons for us.—Homiletic Review.

In public, in the daylight, on holy Olivet, the Lord finished with glory the career which He began in obscurity. He finished His earthly career, but not His human life. His ascension perpetuated His incarnation. He did not evacuate His human body, but carried it with Him to the right hand of God—with its nail prints and its thorn scars. Touched with a feeling of our infirmities, our great High-priest has passed into the heavens. There He ever liveth to make intercession for us. With His pierced hands He is able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by Him.—R. S. Barrett.

To ascend on high must have meant for Christ a large increase of His quickening influence, more power to act beneficially on human minds and hearts, to purify and energize, to inspire and elevate, as hitherto He had not been able. That was His supreme ambition, the height for which He sighed; and was it not even thus that He went up gloriously at last from the cross and the grave, mounting from thence to be a greater saving and subliming force than He had ever been before, to beget repentance and remission of sins beyond what He had ever done?—S. A. Tipple.

By the Ascension all the parts of life are brought together in the oneness of their common destination. By the Ascension Christ in His Humanity is brought close to every one of us, and the words "in Christ," the very charter of our faith, gain a present power. By the Ascension we are encouraged to work beneath the surface of things to that which makes all things capable of consecration. Then it is that the last element in our confession as to Christ's work speaks to our hearts. He is not only present with us as Ascended: He is active for us. We believe that He sitteth on the right hand of God the Father Almighty.—Bishop Westcott.

The ascension of Christ added distance to definiteness in worship. Definiteness we must have, as ever craving for a theophany, every instinct of idolatry proves. "Lord, show us the Father and it sufficeth us" is prompted by this feeling. The Incarnation is God's response to this human need. But imagine Jesus living on indefinitely after the resurrection, even under the earthly conditions which obtained during those forty days!

Worship demands the far distances of God; it protests against the little, the near, the material. It must love but it must look up. It cannot live without the note of spirituality and universality, if not mystery. The ascension, the passing of Christ within the veil, answers this need. So does a full-robed Christianity add to definiteness of knowledge the outreach of imagination and home.—Maltbie Babcock.

We celebrate this day the Ascension of our great Judge into heaven, where He sits upon His throne and has all the world before Him; every human soul, with its desires and aims, its thoughts, words, and works, whether they be good or bad. Every man who is running now his mortal race is from first to last before the eye of Him who as on this day ascended with human nature into heaven. Shall we grieve that the Visible Presence is withdrawn, and that there is no longer on earth the mighty and mysterious Personage who put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself and discomfited through dying the enemies of God and man? Not so! There is no reason for sorrow that He quits the earth on the wings of the wind. We could not detain Him below, we would have Him as our Mediator within the veil. This and this only, can secure to us those spiritual assistances through which we ourselves may climb the firmament.—H. Melvill.

Christ is already in that place of peace, which is all in all. He is on the right hand of God. He is hidden in the brightness of the radiance which issues from the everlasting throne. He is in the very abyss of peace, where there is no voice of tumult or distress, but a deep stillness—stillness, that greatest and most awful of all goods which we can fancy; that most perfect of joys, the utter profound, ineffable tranquillity of the Divine Essence. He has entered into His rest. That is our home; here we are on a pilgrimage, and Christ calls us to His many mansions which He has prepared.—J. H. Newman.

Aspiration

I have immortal longings in me.—Shakespeare.

The mere aspiration is partial realization.—Anna Cora Mowatt.

The movement of the species is upward.—Bancroft.

By steps we may ascend to God.—Milton.

O that I had wings like a dove!—Bible.

It is but a base, ignoble mind that mounts no higher than a bird can soar.—Shakespeare.

The heavens are as deep as our aspirations are high.—Thoreau.

No man can ever rise above that at which he aims.—Rev. A. A. Hodge.

A man—be the heavens ever praised!—is sufficient for himself.—Carlyle.

There is not a single heart but has its moments of longing.—Beecher.

Too low they build who build beneath the stars.—Young.

We cannot of ourselves estimate the degree of our success in what we strive for.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Oh for a muse of fire that would ascend the highest heaven of invention!—Shakespeare.

Aspirations after the holy,—the only aspiration in which the human soul can be assured that it will never meet with disappointment.—Maria M'Intosh.

Man ought always to have something which he prefers to life; otherwise life itself will appear to him tiresome and void.—Seume.

There is no sorrow I have thought more about than that,—to love what is great, and try to reach it, and yet to fail.—George Eliot.

O God, Thou art my God; early will I seek Thee; my soul thirsteth for Thee; my flesh longeth for Thee in a dry and thirsty land, where no water is.—Psalms.

It is not to taste sweet things, but to do noble and true things, and vindicate himself under God's heaven as a God-made man, that the poorest son of Adam dimly longs.—Carlyle.

The heart is a small thing, but desireth great matters. It is not sufficient for a kite's dinner, yet the whole world is not sufficient for it.—Quarles.

We learn to treasure what is above this earth; we long for revelation, which nowhere burns more purely and more beautifully than in the New Testament.—Goethe.

Father! forgive the heart that clings

Thus trembling to the things of time,
And bid my soul, on angel's wings

Ascend into a purer clime.

—Jane Roscoe.

It seems to me we can never give up longing and wishing while we are thoroughly alive. There are certain things we feel to be beautiful and good, and we must hunger after them.—George Eliot.

What we truly and earnestly aspire to be, that in some sense we are. The mere aspiration, by changing the frame of the mind, for the moment realizes itself.—Mrs. Jameson.

The negro king desired to be portrayed as white. But do not laugh at the poor African; for every man is but another negro king, and would like to appear in a color different from that with which Fate has bedaubed him.—Heinrich Heine.

There must be something beyond man in this world. Even on attaining to his highest possibilities, he is like a bird beating against his cage. There is something beyond, O deathless soul, like a sea-shell, moaning for the bosom of the ocean to which you belong!—Chapin.

Did you ever hear of a man who had striven all his life faithfully and singly towards an object, and in no measure obtained it? If a man constantly aspires, is he not elevated? Did ever a man try heroism, magnanimity, truth, sincerity, and find that there was no advantage in them,—that it was a vain endeavor?—Thoreau.

Aspiration, worthy ambition, desires for higher good for good ends,—all these indicate a soul that recognizes the beckoning hand of the good Father, who would call us homeward toward Himself.—J. G. Holland.

Assassination

Assassination is not argument.—Castelar.

There are moral as well as physical assassinations.—Voltaire.

Assassination makes only martyrs, not converts.—Lamartine.

If the assassination could trammel up the consequence, and catch, with his surcease, success; that but this blow might be the be-all and the end-all here,—but here, upon this bank and shoal of time, we'd jump the life to come.—Shakespeare.

Murder, like talent, seems occasionally to run in families.—G. H. Lewes.

Assassination has never changed the history of the world.—Beaconsfield.

Assertion

It is an impudent kind of sorcery to attempt to blind us with the smoke without convincing us that the fire has existed.—Junius.

Assertion, unsupported by fact, is nugatory; surmise and general abuse, in however elegant language, ought not to pass for proofs.—Junius.

Associates

A companion of fools shall be destroyed.—Proverbs xiii. 20.

He that walketh with wise men shall be wise.—Solomon.

Frequent the company of your betters.—Thackeray.

Friends are good,—good, if well chosen.—De Foe.

My friends! There are no friends.—Aristotle.

We encourage one another in mediocrity.—Lamb.

For my own part, I shall be glad to learn of noble men.—Shakespeare.

Company, villainous company, hath been the spoil of me.—Shakespeare.

It is a true proverb that if you live with a lame man you will learn to halt.—Plutarch.

It is best to be with those in time that we hope to be with in eternity.—Fuller.

Keep good company, and you shall be of the number.—George Herbert.

A man—be the heavens ever praised!
—is sufficient for himself.—Carlyle.

He that walketh with wise men shall be wise.—Solomon.

We are far more liable to catch the vices than the virtues of our associates.—Diderot.

The company in which you will improve most will be least expensive to you.—Washington.

There are like to be short graces
where the devil plays host.—Lamb.

Choose the company of your superiors whenever you can have it.—Lord
Chesterfield.

Be not deceived; evil communications corrupt good manners.—Bible.

No man can be provident of his time, who is not prudent in the choice of his company.—Jeremy Taylor.

You may depend upon it that he is a good man whose intimate friends are all good.—Lavater.

We make others' judgment our own by frequenting their society.—Thomas
Fuller.

If you always live with those who are lame, you will yourself learn to limp.—From the Latin.

If men wish to be held in esteem, they must associate with those only who are estimable.—Bruyère.

I set it down as a maxim, that it is good for a man to live where he can meet his betters, intellectual and social.—Thackeray.

Costly followers are not to be liked;
lest while a man maketh his train longer, he makes his wings shorter.—
Bacon.

It is meet that noble minds keep company with their likes; for who so firm, that cannot be seduced?—Shakespeare.

A man should live with his superiors as he does with his fire,—not too near, lest he burn; nor too far off, lest he freeze.—Diogenes.

Those who are unacquainted with the world take pleasure in the intimacy of great men; those who are wiser dread the consequences.—
Horace.

It is good discretion not to make too much of any man at the first; because one cannot hold out that proportion.—Bacon.

No man can possibly improve in any company for which he has not respect enough to be under some degree of restraint.—Chesterfield.

What is companionship where nothing that improves the intellect is communicated, and where the larger heart contracts itself to the model and dimension of the smaller?—Lander.

No company is far preferable to bad, because we are more apt to catch the vices of others than their virtues, as disease is far more contagious than health.—Colton.

Nothing is more deeply punished than the neglect of the affinities by which alone society should be formed, and the insane levity of choosing associates by others' eyes.—Emerson.

Constant companionship is not enjoyable, any more than constant eating. We sit too long at the table of friendship, when we outstrip our appetites for each other's thoughts.—
Bovee.

We gain nothing by being with such as ourselves. We encourage one another in mediocrity. I am always longing to be with men more excellent than myself.—Lamb.

He who comes from the kitchen, smells of its smoke; and he who adheres to a sect, has something of its cant; the college air pursues the student; and dry inhumanity him who herds with literary pedants.—Lavater.

It is expedient to have an acquaintance with those who have looked into the world; who know men, understand business, and can give you good intelligence and good advice when they are wanted.—Bishop Horne.

Associate with men of judgment, for judgment is found in conversation, and we make another man's judgment ours by frequenting his company.—Thomas Fuller.

It is certain that either wise bearing or ignorant carriage is caught, as men take disease, one of another; therefore let men take heed of their company.—Shakespeare.

A frequent intercourse and intimate connection between two persons make them so like, that not only their dispositions are moulded like each other, but their very face and tone of voice contract a certain analogy.—Lavater.

When we live habitually with the wicked, we become necessarily either their victim or their disciple; when we associate, on the contrary, with virtuous men, we form ourselves in imitation of their virtues, or, at least, lose every day something of our faults.—Agapet.

In all societies, it is advisable to associate if possible with the highest; not that the highest are always the best, but because, if disgusted there, we can at any time descend; but if we begin with the lowest, to ascend is impossible.—Colton.

A companion that feasts the company with wit and mirth, and leaves out the sin which is usually mixed with them, he is the man; and let me tell you, good company and good discourse are the very sinews of virtue.—Izaak Walton.

He that can enjoy the intimacy of the great, and on no occasion disgust them by familiarity, or disgrace himself by servility, proves that he is as perfect a gentleman by nature as his companions are by rank.—Colton.

It is hard to mesmerize ourselves, to whip our own top; but through sympathy we are capable of energy and endurance. Concert fires people to a certain fury of performance they can rarely reach alone.—Emerson.

Bad company is like a nail driven into a post, which, after the first and second blow, may be drawn out with little difficulty; but being once driven up to the head, the pincers cannot take hold to draw it out, but which can only be done by the destruction of the wood.—St. Augustine.

Be very circumspect in the choice of thy company. In the society of thine equals thou shalt enjoy more pleasure; in the society of thy superiors thou shalt find more profit. To be the best in the company is the way to grow worse; the best means to grow better is to be the worst there.—Quarles.

It is adverse to talent to be consorted and trained up with inferior minds and inferior companions, however high they may rank. The foal of the racer neither finds out his speed nor calls out his powers if pastured out with the common herd, that are destined for the collar and the yoke.—Colton.

Might I give counsel to any young hearer, I would say to him, try to frequent the company of your betters. In books and life is the most wholesome society; learn to admire rightly; the great pleasure of life is that. Note what the great men admire,—they admired great things; narrow spirits admire basely, and worship meanly.—Thackeray.

As there are some flowers which you should smell but slightly to extract all that is pleasant in them, and which, if you do otherwise, emit what is unpleasant and noxious, so there are some men with whom a slight acquaintance is quite sufficient to draw out all that is agreeable; a more intimate one would be unsatisfactory and unsafe.—Landor.

Association

There is no man who has not some interesting associations with particular scenes, or airs, or books, and who does not feel their beauty or sublimity enhanced to him by such connections.—Sir A. Alison.

There's not a wind but whispers of thy name;
And not a flow'r that grows beneath the moon,
But in its hues and fragrance tells a tale
Of thee, my love. —Barry Cornwall.

Association is the delight of the heart, not less than of poetry. Alison observes that an autumn sunset, with its crimson clouds, glimmering trunks of trees, and wavering tints upon the grass, seems scarcely capable of embellishment. But if in this calm and beautiful glow the chime of a distant bell steal over the fields, the bosom heaves with the sensation that Dante so tenderly describes.—Willmott.

He whose heart is not excited upon the spot which a martyr has sanctified by his sufferings, or at the grave of one who has largely benefited mankind, must be more inferior to the multitude in his moral, than he can possibly be raised above them in his intellectual nature.—Southey.

How we delight to build our recollections upon some basis of reality,—a place, a country, a local habitation! how the events of life, as we look back upon them, have grown into the well-remembered background of the places where they fell upon us! Here is some sunny garden or summer lane, beautified and canonized forever with the flood of a great joy; and here are dim and silent places,—rooms always shadowed and dark to us, whatever they may be to others,—where distress or death came once, and since then dwells forevermore.—Washington Irving.

Whatever withdraws us from the power of our senses: whatever makes the past, the distant, or the future, predominate over the present, advances us in the dignity of thinking beings. Far from me, and far from my friends be such frigid philosophy as may conduct us indifferent and unmoved over any ground which has been dignified by wisdom, bravery, or virtue. That man is little to be envied whose patriotism would not gain force upon the plain of Marathon, or whose piety would not grow warmer among the ruins of Ionia.—Johnson

Assurance

Immoderate assurance is perfect licentiousness.—Shenstone.

Assurance never failed to get admission into the houses of the great.—Moore.

Assurance of hope is more than life, It is health, strength, power, vigor, activity, energy, manliness, beauty.—J. C. Ryle.

Assurance and intrepidity, under the white banner of seeming modesty, clear the way to merit that would otherwise be discouraged by difficulties.—Chesterfield.

True assurance makes a man more humble and self-denied, but presumptuous confidence puffs up with spiritual pride and self-conceit; the one excites to the practice of every commanded duty, but the other encourages sloth and indolence.—Fisher's Catechism.

There are believers who by God's grace, have climbed the mountains of full assurance and near communion, their place is with the eagle in his eyrie, high aloft; they are like the strong mountaineer, who has trodden the virgin snow, who has breathed the fresh, free air of the Alpine regions, and therefore his sinews are braced, and his limbs are vigorous; these are they who do great exploits, being mighty men, men of renown.—C. H. Spurgeon.

Let us rise into blest assurance that everywhere and forever we are unfolded, penetrated, guarded, guided, kept by the power of the Father and Friend, who can never forsake us;

and that all spirits who have begun to seek, know, love, and serve the All-Perfect One on earth shall be reunited in a celestial home, and be welcomed together into the freedom of the universe, and the perpetual light of His presence.—W. E. Channing.

Astrology

Astrologers that future fates fore-show.—Pope.

Our jovial star reigned at his birth.
—Shakespeare.

Strange an astrologer should die without one wonder in the sky.—
Swift.

No date prefixed directs me in the starry rubric set.—Milton.

Astrological prayers seem to me to be built on as good reason as the predictions.—Stillingfleet.

I will look on the stars and look on thee, and read the page of thy destiny.—L. E. Landon.

The astrologer who spells the stars, mistakes his globes, and in her bright eye interprets heaven's physiognomies.
—John Cleaveland.

Do not Christians and Heathens, Jews and Gentiles, poets and philosophers, unite in allowing the starry influences?—Sir Walter Scott.

There's some ill planet reigns; I must be patient till the heavens look with an aspect favorable.—Shakespeare.

Figure-fingers and star-gazers pretend to foretell the fortunes of kingdoms, and have no foresight in what concerns themselves.—L'Estrange.

A wise man shall overrule his stars, and have a greater influence upon his own content than all the constellations and planets of the firmament.—Jeremy Taylor.

We speak of persons as jovial, as being born under the planet Jupiter or

Jove, which was the joyfullest star and the happiest augury of all. A gloomy person was said to be saturnine, as being born under the planet Saturn, who was considered to make those who owned his influence, and were born when he was in the ascendant, grave and stern as himself.—Trench.

Astronomy

An undevout astronomer is mad.—
Young.

Astronomy is the science of the harmony of infinite expanse.—Lord John Russell.

And teach me how
To name the bigger light, and how the less,
That burn by day and night.
—Shakespeare.

Ye realms, yet unreveal'd to human sight,
Ye gods who rule the regions of the night,
Ye gliding ghosts permit me to relate
The mystic wonders of your silent state.
—Dryden.

The narrow sectarian cannot read astronomy with impunity. The creeds of his church shrivel like dried leaves at the door of the observatory.—Emerson.

The contemplation of celestial things will make a man both speak and think more sublimely and magnificently when he descends to human affairs.—
Cicero.

These earthly god-fathers of heaven's lights
That give a name to every fixed star
Have no more profit of their shining nights Than those that walk, and wot not what they are. —Shakespeare.

The sun rejoicing round the earth, announced
Daily the wisdom, power and love of God.
The moon awoke, and from her maiden
face,
Shedding her cloudy locks, looked meekly forth,
And with her virgin stars walked in the heavens—
Walked nightly there, conversing as she walked,
Of purity, and holiness, and God.
—Robert Pollok.

Astronomy is one of the sublimest fields of human investigation. The mind that grasps its facts and principles receives something of the enlargement and grandeur belonging to the science itself. It is a quickener of devotion.—Horace Mann.

And God made two great lights, great for their use
To man, the greater to have rule by day,
The less by night, altern. —Milton.

I love to rove amidst the starry height,
To leave the little scenes of earth behind,
And let Imagination wing her flight
On eagle pinions swifter than the wind.
I love the planets in their course to trace;
To mark the comets speeding to the sun,
Then launch into immeasurable space,
Where, lost to human sight, remote they run.
I love to view the moon, when high she rides
Amidst the heav'ns, in borrowed lustre bright;
To fathom how she rules the subject tides,
And how she borrows from the sun her light.
O! these are wonders of th' Almighty hand,
Whose wisdom first the circling orbits planned. —T. Rodd.

It does at first appear that an astronomer rapt in abstraction, while he gazes on a star, must feel more exquisite delight than a farmer who is conducting his team.—Isaac Disraeli.

Atheism

The fool hath said in his heart,
There is no God.—Psalm xiv. 1.

By night an atheist half believes a God.—Young.

No atheist, as such, can be a true friend.—Bentley.

Atheism is rather in the life than in the heart of man.—Francis Bacon.

No one is so much alone in the world as a denier of God.—Richter.

Though a man declares himself an atheist, it in no way alters his obligations.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Ingersoll's atheism can never become an institution; it can never be more than a destitution.—Robert Collyer.

Thank Heaven, the female heart is untenanted by atheism.—Horace Mann.

The thing formed says that nothing formed it; and that which is made is, while that which made it is not! The folly is infinite.—Jeremy Taylor.

An atheist-laugh's a poor exchange
For Deity offended! —Burns.

A little philosophy inclineth man's mind to atheism, but depth in philosophy bringeth men's minds about to religion.—Francis Bacon.

It is a fine observation of Plato, in his Laws, that atheism is a disease of the soul before it becomes an error of the understanding.—Wm. Fleming.

God never wrought miracles to convince atheism, because His ordinary works convince it.—Bacon.

The statements of atheists ought to be perfectly clear of doubt. Now it is not perfectly clear that the soul is material.—Pascal.

Atheism is the result of ignorance and pride, of strong sense and feeble reasons, of good eating and ill living.—Jeremy Collier.

An atheist is one of the most daring beings in creation,—a contemner of God, who explodes His laws by denying His existence.—John Foster.

Men are atheistical because they are first vicious, and question the truth of Christianity because they hate the practice.—South.

As atheism is in all respects hateful, so in this, that it depriveth human nature of the means to exalt itself above human frailty.—Bacon.

There are few men so obstinate in their atheism whom a pressing danger will not reduce to an acknowledgment of the divine power.—Plato.

They that deny a God destroy man's nobility, for certainly man is of kin to the beasts by his body; and if he be not of kin to God by his spirit, ne is a base and ignoble creature.—Francis Bacon.

Nothing enlarges the gulf of atheism more than the wide passage that lies between the faith and lives of men pretending to teach Christianity.—Stillingfleet.

Eyes which the preacher could not school,
By wayside graves are raised;
And lips say, "God be pitiful,"
That ne'er said "God be praised."
—Mrs. Browning.

When men live as if there were no God, it becomes expedient for them that there should be none; and then they endeavor to persuade themselves so.—Tillotson.

Atheism is a system which can communicate neither warmth nor illumination, except from those fagots which your mistaken zeal has lighted up for its destruction.—Colton.

The three great apostles of practical atheism, that make converts without persecuting, and retain them without preaching, are wealth, health, and power.—Colton.

The great atheists are, indeed, the hypocrites, which are ever handling holy things, but without feeling; so as they must need be cauterized in the end.—Bacon.

There is no being eloquent for atheism. In that exhausted receiver the mind cannot use its wings,—the clearest proof that it is out of its element.—Hare.

The owlet atheism, sailing on obscene wings across the noon, drops his blue-fringed lids, and shuts them close, and, hooting at the glorious sun in heaven, cries out, "Where is it?"—Coleridge.

That the universe was formed by a fortuitous concourse of atoms, I will no more believe than that the accidental jumbling of the alphabet would fall into a most ingenious treatise of philosophy.—Dean Swift.

I should like to see a man sober in his habits, moderate, chaste, just in his dealings, assert that there is no God; he would speak at least without interested motives; but such a man is not to be found.—Bruyère.

The footprint of the savage traced in the sand is sufficient to attest the presence of man to the atheist who will not recognize God, whose hand is impressed upon the entire universe.—Hugh Miller.

Whoever considers the study of anatomy, I believe, will never be an atheist; the frame of man's body, and coherence of his parts, being so strange and paradoxical, that I hold it to be the greatest miracle of nature.—Lord Herbert.

These are they
That strove to pull Jehovah from His throne,
And in the place of heaven's Eternal King
Set up the phantom, Chance. —Glynn.

Religion assures us that our afflictions shall have an end; she comforts us, she dries our tears, she promises us another life. On the contrary, in the abominable worship of atheism, human woes are the incense, death is the priest, a coffin the altar, and annihilation the Deity.—Chateaubriand.

Supposing all the great points of atheism were formed into a kind of creed, I would fain ask whether it would not require an infinite greater measure of faith than any set of articles which they so violently oppose.—Addison.

Settle it, therefore, in your minds, as a maxim never to be effaced or forgotten, that atheism is an inhuman, bloody, ferocious system, equally hostile to every useful restraint, and to every virtuous affection: that leaving nothing above us to excite awe, nor round us to awaken tenderness, it wages war with heaven and earth: its first object is to dethrone God, its next to destroy man.—Robert Hall

One would fancy that the zealots in atheism would be exempt from the single fault which seems to grow out of the imprudent fervor of religion. But so it is, that irreligion is propagated with as much fierceness and contention, wrath and indignation, as if the safety of mankind depended upon it.—Addison.

The truly great consider, first, how they may gain the approbation of God, and, secondly, that of their own conscience. Having done this, they would then willingly conciliate the good opinion of their fellow-men. But the truly little reverse the thing. The primary object with them is to secure the applause of their fellow-men; and having effected this, the approbation of God and their own conscience may follow on as they can.—Colton.

Atheism can benefit no class of people; neither the unfortunate, whom it bereaves of hope, nor the prosperous, whose joys it renders insipid, nor the soldier, of whom it makes a coward, nor the woman whose beauty and sensibility it mars, nor the mother, who has a son to lose, nor the rulers of men, who have no surer pledge of the fidelity of their subjects than religion.—Chateaubriand.

Kircher, the astronomer, having an acquaintance who denied the existence of a Supreme Being, took the following method to convince him of his error. Expecting him on a visit, he placed a handsome celestial globe in a part of the room where it could not escape the notice of his friend, who, on observing it, inquired whence it came, and who was the maker.

"It was not made by any person," said the astronomer.

"That is impossible," replied the skeptic; "you surely jest."

Kircher then took occasion to reason with his friend upon his own atheistical principles, explaining to him that he had adopted this plan with a design to show him the fallacy of his skepticism.

"You will not," said he, "admit that this small body originated in mere chance, and yet you contend that those heavenly bodies, to which it bears only a faint and diminutive resemblance, came into existence without author or design."

He pursued this chain of reasoning till his friend was totally confounded, and cordially acknowledged the absurdity of his notions.

Athens

Athens, the eye of Greece, mother of arts
And eloquence. —Milton.

Ancient of days! august Athena! where,
Where are thy men of might? thy grand in soul?

Gone—glimmering though the dream of things that were;

First in the race that led to glory's goal,
They won, and pass'd away—Is this the whole? —Byron.

Attention

I never knew any man cured of In-attention.—Swift.

In the power of fixing the attention lies the most precious of the intellectual habits.—Robert Hall.

Attention is the stuff that memory is made of, and memory is accumulated genius.—Lowell.

It is a way of calling a man a fool when no attention is given to what he says.—L'Estrange.

Lend thy serious hearing to what I shall unfold. —Shakespeare.

It is difficult to instruct children because of their natural inattention:
the true mode, of course, is to first make our modes interesting to them.—
Locke.

Attention makes the genius; all learning, fancy, and science depend upon it. Newton traced back his discoveries to its unwearied employment.
It builds bridges, opens new worlds,
and heals diseases; without it taste is useless, and the beauties of literature are unobserved.—Willmott.

Attractiveness

The poetic element lying hidden in most women is the source of their magnetic attraction.—Victor Hugo.

The first duty of a woman is to be pretty.—Mme. de Girardin.

A poor beauty finds more lovers than husbands.—Geo. Herbert.

That hook of wiving, fairness which strikes the eye.—Shakespeare.

Her very frowns are fairer far than smiles of other maidens are.—Coleridge.

Nothing under heaven so strongly doth allure the sense of man, and all his mind possess, as beauty's love-bait.—Spenser.

Those who are formed to win general admiration are seldom calculated to bestow individual happiness.—Lady Blessington.

No woman can be handsome by the force of features alone, any more than she can be witty only by the help of speech.—Thomas Hughes.

I hold it to be the moral duty of women to make themselves beautiful in all lawful ways.—E. Lynn Linton.

The more sensible a woman is, supposing her not to be masculine, the more attractive she is in her proportionate power to entertain.—Leigh Hunt.

Women and flowers are made to be loved for their beauty and sweetness, rather than themselves to love.—Ninon de Lenclos.

On the attraction between man and woman society is based; but its refined is greater than its gross force, and its weight is like the gravitation of the globe.—Bartol.

A woman's natural quality is to attract, and having attracted to enchain; and how influential she may be for good or evil, the history of every age makes clear.—Mrs. H. R. Haweis.

There are other things besides beauty with which to captivate the hearts of men. The Italians have a saying: "Fair is not fair, but that which pleaseth."—Ninon de Lenclos.

To make the cunning artless, tame the rude, subdue the haughty, shake the undaunted soul; yea, put a bridle in the lion's mouth, and lead him forth as a domestic cur,—these are the triumphs of all-powerful beauty.—Joanna Baillie.

Rarity gives a charm: thus early fruits are most esteemed; thus winter roses obtain a higher price; thus coyness sets off an extravagant mistress: a door ever open attracts no young suitor.—Martial.

A pretty, silly, self-conceited woman will very often be far more courted, and seemingly far more liked and admired, than a woman of infinitely higher charms. All the while the men do not like her a tenth part as well.—Charles Buxton.

She carried about her an indefinable air of having been used to love, or admiration probably, of men as well as women, which the most exquisitely modest women will sometimes wear, and which is unmistakable as it is alluring to the eye.—Elizabeth Stuart Phelps.

Our poor eyes were so enriched as to behold, and our low hearts so exalted as to love, a maid who is such, that as the greatest thing the world can show is her beauty, so the least thing that may be praised in her is her beauty.—Sir P. Sidney.

August

In the parching August wind,
Cornfields bow the head,
Sheltered in round valley depths,
On low hills outspread.
—Christina G. Rossetti.

Dead is the air, and still! the leaves of the locust and walnut
Lazily hang from the boughs, inlaying their intricate outlines Rather on space than the sky—on a tideless expansion of slumber.
—Bayard Taylor.

Authority

Even reproof from authority ought to be grave, and not taunting.—Bacon.

There is no fettering of authority.—
Shakespeare.

Self-possession is the backbone of authority.—Haliburton.

A dog is obeyed in office.—Shakespeare.

Nothing is more gratifying to the mind of man than power of dominion.
—Addison.

Though authority be a stubborn bear, yet he is oft led by the nose with gold.—Shakespeare.

The love of power and the love of liberty are in eternal antagonism.—
J. Stuart Mill.

Every legitimate authority should respect its extent and its limits.—
Joubert.

Authority, though it err like others,
hath yet a kind of medicine in itself,
that skins the vice of the top.—Shakespeare.

A man in authority is but as a candle in the wind, sooner wasted or blown out than under a bushel.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

The reason why the simpler sort are moved by authority is the consciousness of their own ignorance.—Hooker.

God, who prepares His work through ages, accomplishes it, when the hour is come, with the feeblest instruments.—Merle D'Aubigné.

Authority bears of a credent bulk
That no particular scandal once can touch;
But it confounds the breather.
—Shakespeare.

All authority must be out of a man's self, turned * * * either upon an art, or upon a man.—Bacon.

Authority is by nothing so much strengthened and confirmed as by custom; for no man easily distrusts the things which he and all men have been always bred up to.—Sir W. Temple.

There is nothing sooner overthrows
a weak head than opinion of authority, like too strong a liquor for a frail glass.—Sir P. Sidney.

Authority forgets a dying king,
Laid widow'd of the power in his eye
That bow'd the will. —Tennyson.

Three means to fortify belief are experience, reason, and authority. Of these the more potent is authority; for belief upon reason or experience will stagger.—Bacon.

Mankind are apt to be strongly prejudiced in favor of whatever is countenanced by antiquity, enforced by authority, and recommended by custom.—Robert Hall.

Shall remain!
Hear you this Triton of the minnows?
mark you
His absolute "shall"? —Shakespeare.

An argument from authority is but a weak kind of proof,—it being but a topical probation, and an inartificial argument depending on naked asseveration.—Sir T. Browne.

Man, proud man!
Dress'd in a little brief authority:
Most ignorant of what he's most assur'd.
His glassy essence—like an angry ape
Plays such fantastic tricks before high heaven,
As make the angels weep. —Shakespeare.

Meek young men grow up in libraries, believing it their duty to accept the views which Cicero, which Locke, which Bacon have given; forgetful that Cicero, Locke, and Bacon were only young men in libraries when they wrote these books.—Emerson.

Not from gray hairs authority doth flow,
Nor from bald heads, nor from a wrinkled
brow;
But our past life, when virtuously spent,
Must to our age those happy fruits present.
—Denham.

Authority is properly the servant of justice, and political powers are arbitrary and illegitimate if not based upon qualification for that service.
This is the doctrine of the ethical derivation of authority or public power, as opposed to that of an unconditioned and inherent sovereignty.—D. A. Wasson.

Thou hast seen a farmer's dog bark at a beggar,
And the creature run from the cur: There,
There, thou might'st behold the great image of authority;
A dog's obeyed in office. —Shakespeare.

Authority intoxicates,
And makes mere sots of magistrates;
The fumes of it invade the brain,
And make men giddy, proud and vain;
By this the fool commands the wise;
The noble with the base complies;
The sot assumes the role of wit,
And cowards make the base submit.
—Butler.

Most of our fellow-subjects are guided either by the prejudice of education or by a deference to the judgment of those who perhaps in their own hearts disapprove the opinions which they industriously spread among the multitude.—Addison.

Authorship

And choose an author as you choose a friend.—Wentworth Dillon.

Nature's chief masterpiece is writing well.—Sheffield, Duke of Buckingham.

Look, then, into thine heart and write!—Longfellow.

All authors to their own defects are blind.—Dryden.

None but an author knows an author's cares.—Cowper.

All writing comes by the grace of God, and all doing and having.—Emerson.

Of all those arts in which the wise excel,
Nature's chief masterpiece is writing well.
—John Sheffield.

The only happy author in this world is he who is below the care of reputation.—Washington Irving.

I believe that a man may write himself out of reputation when nobody else can do it.—Thomas Paine.

Twenty to one offend more in writing too much than too little.—Roger Ascham.

He who proposes to be an author should first be a student.—Dryden.

Authors, like coins, grow dear as they grow old.—Pope.

Young authors give their brains much exercise and little food.—Joubert.

Satire lies respecting literary men during their life, and eulogy does so after their death.—Voltaire.

No man but a blockhead ever wrote except for money.—Sam'l Johnson.

The chief glory of every people arises from its authors.—Sam'l Johnson.

One hates an author that is all author; fellows in foolscap uniform turned up with ink.—Byron.

Strength is not energy; some authors have more muscles than talent.—Joubert.

Let your literary compositions be kept from the public eye for nine years at least.—Horace.

None but an author knows an author's cares,
Or fancy's fondness for the child she bears.
—Cowper.

Who does not more admire Cicero as an author than as a consul of Rome?—Addison.

The familiar writer is apt to be his own satirist. Out of his own mouth is he judged.—Whipple.

A man may write at any time if he set himself doggedly to it.—Sam'l Johnson.

Sound judgment is the ground of writing well.—Roscommon.

In every author let us distinguish the man from his works.—Voltaire.

There are authors in whose hand the pen becomes a magic wand: but they are few.—Lady Montagu.

The ink of the scholar is more sacred than the blood of the martyr.—Mohammed.

Devise, wit; write, pen; for I am for whole volumes in folio.—Shakespeare.

Authors are partial to their wit, 'tis true, But are not critics to their judgment, too? —Pope.

Authors now find, as once Achilles found, the whole is mortal if a part's unsound.—Young.

No author ever drew a character, consistent to human nature, but what he was forced to ascribe to it many inconsistencies.—Bulwer-Lytton.

We write from aspiration and antagonism, as well as from experience. We paint those qualities which we do not possess.—Emerson.

The two most engaging powers of an author are to make new things familiar, and familiar things new.—Thackeray.

Those authors who appear sometimes to forget they are writers, and remember they are men, will be our favorites.—Disraeli.

It is commonly the personal character of a writer which gives him his public significance.—Goethe.

They who, by speech or writing, present to the ear or eye of modesty any of the indecencies, are pests of society.—Beattie.

A man of moderate Understanding, thinks he writes divinely: A man of good Understanding, thinks he writes reasonably.—De La Bruyère.

Authors must not, like Chinese soldiers, expect to win victories by turning somersets in the air.—Longfellow.

Never write on a subject without having first read yourself full on it:

and never read on a subject till you have thought yourself hungry on it.—Richter.

Nothing is so beneficial to a young author as the advice of a man whose judgment stands constitutionally at the freezing-point.—Douglas Jerrold.

Every author, in some degree, portrays himself in his works even be it against his will.—Goethe.

Successful writers learn at last what they should learn at first,—to be intelligently simple.—H. W. Shaw.

To write much, and to write rapidly, are empty boasts. The world desires to know what you have done, and not how you did it.—George Henry Lewes.

In every work regard the writer's end, Since none can compass more than they intend. —Pope.

A woman who writes, commits two sins: she increases the number of books, and decreases the number of women.—Alphonse Karr.

The writer, like a priest, must be exempted from secular labor. His work needs a frolic health; he must be at the top of his condition.—Emerson.

Perhaps the greatest lesson which the lives of literary men teach us is told in a single word: Wait!—Longfellow.

Peaceable times are the best to live in, though not so proper to furnish materials for a writer.—Addison.

If you once understand an author's character, the comprehension of his writings becomes easy.—Longfellow.

To expect an author to talk as he writes is ridiculous; or even if he did you would find fault with him as a pedant.—Hazlitt.

A man of letters is often a man with two natures,—one a book nature, the other a human nature. These often clash sadly.—Whipple.

Boileau's numbers are excellent, his expressions noble, his thoughts just, his language pure, and his sense close.—Dryden.

There is no author so poor who cannot be of some service, if only for a witness of his time.—Claude Fauchet.

The pen is the tongue of the hand; a silent utterer of words for the eye.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Sallust is indisputably one of the best historians among the Romans, both for the purity of his language and the elegance of his style.—Burke.

Of all unfortunate men one of the unhappiest is a middling author endowed with too lively a sensibility for criticism.—Disraeli.

Let authors write for glory or reward, Truth is well paid, when she is sung and heard.—R. Corbet.

For no man can write anything who does not think that what he writes is, for the time, the history of the world.—Emerson.

He who writes prose builds his temple to Fame in rubble; he who writes verses builds it in granite.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The success of many works is found in the relation between the mediocrity of the authors' ideas and that of the ideas of the public.—Chamfort.

There seems to be a strange affectation in authors of appearing to have done everything by chance.—Johnson.

Subtract from many modern poets all that may be found in Shakespeare, and trash will remain.—Colton.

No fathers or mothers think their own children ugly; and this self-deceit is yet stronger with respect to the offspring of the mind.—Cervantes.

Modern writers are the moons of literature; they shine with reflected light,—with light borrowed from the ancients.—Dr. Johnson.

From the moment one sets up for an author, one must be treated as ceremoniously, that is as unfaithfully, "as a king's favorite or a king."—Pope.

One writer excels at a plan or a title-page; another works away at the body of the book; and a third is a dab hand at an index.—Goldsmith.

Friend, howsoever thou comest by this book, I will assure thee thou wert least in my thoughts when I writ it.—Bunyan.

To write well is to think well, to feel well, and to render well; it is to possess at once intellect, soul, and taste.—Buffon.

Never write anything that does not give you great pleasure; emotion is easily propagated from the writer to the reader.—Joubert.

I have got my spindle and my distaff ready—my pen and mind—never doubting for an instant that God will send me flax.—J. G. Holland.

There is infinite pathos in unsuccessful authorship. The book that perishes unread is the deaf mute of literature.—Holmes.

The memory of other authors is kept alive by their works, but the memory of Johnson keeps many of his works alive.—Macaulay.

It is quite as much of a trade to make a book as to make a clock. It requires more than mere genius to be an author.—Bruyère.

The authors who affect contempt for a name in the world put their names to the books which they invite the world to read.—Cicero.

So idle are dull readers, and so industrious are dull authors, that puffed nonsense bids fair to blow unpuffed sense wholly out of the field.—Colton.

The author who speaks about his own books is almost as bad as a mother who talks about her own children.—Benj. Disraeli.

That writer does the most, who gives his reader the most knowledge, and takes from him the least time.—C. C. Colton.

Bacon is throughout, and especially in his essays, one of the most suggestive authors who ever wrote.—Whately.

People may be taken in once, who imagine that an author is greater in private life than other men.—Johnson.

Clear writers, like clear fountains, do not seem so deep as they are; the turbid looks most profound.—Landor.

A writer who attempts to live on the manufacture of his imagination is continually coquetting with starvation.—Whipple.

There are three difficulties in authorship—to write anything worth the publishing, to find honest men to publish it, and to get sensible men to read it.—Colton.

He that commeth in print because he woulde be knowen, is like the foole that commeth into the Market because he woulde be seen.—Lyly.

Whoever has set his whole heart upon book-making had better be sought in his works, for it is only the lees of his cup of life which he offers, in person, to the warm lips of his fellows.—Tuckerman.

And so I penned
It down, until at last it came to be For length and breadth the bigness which you see. —Bunyan.

The little mind who loves itself, will write and think with the vulgar; but the great mind will be bravely eccentric, and scorn the beaten road, from universal benevolence.—Go'dsmith.

Peace be with the soul of that charitable and courteous author, who, for the common benefit of his fellow-authors, introduced the ingenious way of miscellaneous writing!—Shaftesbury.

This is the highest miracle of genius, that things which are not should be as though they were, that the imaginations of one mind should become the personal recollections of another.—Macaulay.

It is in vain a daring author thinks of attaining to the heights of Parnassus if he does not feel the secret influence of heaven and if his natal star has not formed him to be a poet.—Boileau.

Authorship is, according to the spirit in which it is pursued, an infamy, a pastime, a day-labor, a handicraft, an art, a science, a virtue.—Schlegel.

Every fool describes in these bright days his wondrous journey to some foreign court, and spawns his quarto, and demands your praise.—Byron.

There are both dull correctness and piquant carelessness; it is needless to say which will command the most readers and have the most influence.—Colton.

It was among the ruins of the capitol that I first conceived the idea of a work which has amused and exercised nearly twenty years of my life.—Gibbon.

I have observed that vulgar readers almost always lose their veneration for the writings of the genius with whom they have had personal intercourse.—Sir Egerton Brydges.

Our writings are so many dishes, our readers guests, our books like beauty; that which one admires another rejects; so are we approved as men's fancies are inclined.—Burton.

The most original modern authors are not so because they advance what is new, but simply because they know how to put what they have to say as if it had never been said before.—Goethe.

Herder and Schiller both in their youth intended to study as surgeons; but Destiny said, "No, there are deeper wounds than those of the body,—heal the deeper!" and they wrote.—Richter.

Would a writer know how to behave himself with relation to posterity? Let him consider in old books what he finds that he is glad to know, and what omissions he most laments.—Swift.

Whatever be the motives which induce men to write,—whether avarice or fame,—the country becomes more wise and happy in which they most serve for instructors.—Goldsmith.

Our favorites are few: since only what rises from the heart reaches it, being caught and carried on the tongues of men wheresoever love and letters journey.—Alcott.

The book that he has made renders its author this service in return, that so long as the book survives, its author remains immortal and cannot die.—Richard de Bury.

And, after all, it is style alone by which posterity will judge of a great work, for an author can have nothing truly his own but his style.—Isaac Disraeli.

The men, who labor and digest things most,
Will be much apter to despond than boast;
For if your author be profoundly good,
'Twill cost you dear before he's understood.
—Wentworth Dillon.

Oh! rather give me commentators plain,
Who with no deep researches vex the brain;
Who from the dark and doubtful love to
run,
And hold their glimmering tapers to the sun.
—Crabbe.

It is a doubt whether mankind are most indebted to those who, like Bacon and Butler, dig the gold from the mine of literature. or to those who, like

Paley, purify it, stamp it, fix its real value, and give it currency and utility.—Colton.

The great and good do not die even in this world. Embalmed in books, their spirits walk abroad. The book is a living voice. It is an intellect to which one still listens.—Sam'l Smiles.

True ease in writing comes from art, not chance,
As those move easiest who have learn'd to dance.
—Pope.

The book that a person is beginning to create or design contains within itself half a life, and God only knows what an expanse of futurity also.—Richter.

'Tis hard to say if greater want of skill
Appear in writing or in judging ill;
But, of the two less dang'rous is th' offence
To tire our patience than mislead our sense.
—Pope.

His [Burke's] imperial fancy has laid all nature under tribute, and has collected riches from every scene of the creation and every walk of art.—Robert Hall.

Each change of many-colored life he drew,
Exhausted worlds and then imagined new;
Existence saw him spurn her bounded reign,
And panting Time toil'd after him in vain.
—Samuel Johnson.

Authors are the vanguard in the march of mind, the intellectual back-woodsmen, reclaiming from the idle wilderness new territories for the thought and activity of their happier brethren.—Carlyle.

Dr. Johnson has said that the chief glory of a country arises from its authors. But then that is only as they are oracles of wisdom; unless they teach virtue, they are more worthy of a halter than of the laurel.—Jane Porter.

It is a fine simile in one of Mr. Congreve's prologues which compares a writer to a battering gamester that stakes all his winnings upon one cast, so that if he loses the last throw he is sure to be undone.—Addison.

This is the magnanimity of authorship, when a writer having a topic presented to him, fruitful of beauties for common minds, waives his privilege, and trusts to the judicious few for understanding the reason of his abstinence.—Lamb.

If authors cannot be prevailed upon to keep close to truth and instruction, by unvaried terms, and plain, unsophisticated argument, yet it concerns readers not to be imposed on.—Locke.

That author, however, who has thought more than he has read, read more than he has written, and written more than he has published, if he does not command success, has at least deserved it.—Colton.

But words are things, and a small drop of ink,

Falling, like dew, upon a thought produces

That which makes thousands, perhaps millions think. —Byron.

Whatever an author puts between the two covers of his book is public property; whatever of himself he does not put there is his private property, as much as if he had never written a word.—Gail Hamilton.

It may be glorious to write

Thoughts that shall glad the two or three High souls, like those far stars that come in sight

Once in a century. —Lowell.

Whatever hath been written shall remain, Nor be erased nor written o'er again:

The unwritten only still belong to thee: Take heed, and ponder well what that shall be. —Longfellow.

There are two things which I am confident I can do very well; one is an introduction to any literary work, stating what it is to contain, and how it should be executed in the most perfect manner.—Sam'l Johnson.

Nothing goes by luck in composition; it allows of no trick. The best you can write will be the best you are.

Every sentence is the result of a long probation. The author's character is read from title-page to end.—Thoreau.

Genius now and then produces a lucky trifle. We still read the Dove of Anacreon, and Sparrow of Catullus; and a writer naturally pleases himself with a performance which owes nothing to the subject.—Dr. Johnson.

For works of the mind really great there is no old age, no decrepitude. It is inconceivable that a time should come when Homer, Dante, Shakespeare, should not ring in the ears of civilized man.—Gladstone.

Spero Speroni explains admirably how an author who writes very clearly for himself is often obscure to his readers. "It is," he says, "because the author proceeds from the thought to the expression, and the reader from the expression to the thought."—Chamfort.

O thou who art able to write a book, which once in the two centuries or oftener there is a man gifted to do, envy not him whom they name city-builder, and inexpressibly pity him whom they name conqueror or city-burner.—Carlyle.

There is a natural disposition with us to judge an author's personal character by the character of his works. We find it difficult to understand the common antithesis of a good writer and a bad man.—Whipple.

Those authors into whose hands nature has placed a magic wand, with which they no sooner touch us than we forget the unhappiness in life, than the darkness leaves our soul, and we are reconciled to existence, should be placed among the benefactors of the human race.—Diderot.

Consult the acutest poets and speakers, and they will confess that their quickest and most admired conceptions were such as darted into their minds like sudden flashes of lightning, they know not how nor whence.—South.

There is infinite pathos in unsuccessful authorship. The book that perishes unread is the deaf-mute of literature. The great asylum of Oblivion is full of such, making inaudible signs to each other in leaky garrets and unattainable dusty upper shelves.—O. W. Holmes.

Indeed, unless a man can link his written thoughts with the everlasting wants of men, so that they shall draw from them as from wells, there is no more immortality to the thoughts and feelings of the soul than to the muscles and the bones.—Henry Ward Beecher.

He that writes
Or makes a feast, more certainly invites His judges than his friends; there's not a guest
But will find something wanting or illdrest.
—Sir R. Howard.

An author! 'Tis a venerable name!
How few deserve it, and what numbers claim!
Unblest with sense above their peers
refin'd,
Who shall stand up, dictators to mankind?
Nay, who dare shine, if not in virtue's cause?
That sole proprietor of just applause.
—Young.

There is nothing more dreadful to an author than neglect; compared with which, reproach, hatred, and opposition are names of happiness; yet this worst, this meanest fate, every one who dares to write has reason to fear.—Johnson.

That an author's work is the mirror of his mind is a position that has led to very false conclusions. If Satan himself were to write a book it would be in praise of virtue, because the good would purchase it for use, and the bad for ostentation.—Colton.

For all the practical purposes of life, truth might as well be in a prison as in the folio of a schoolman; and those who release her from her cowed webbed shelf and teach her to live with men have the merit of liberating, if not of discovering, her.—Colton.

Authors may be divided into falling stars, planets, and fixed stars: the first have a momentary effect; the second have a much longer duration; but the third are unchangeable, possess their own light, and work for all time.—Schopenhauer.

For popular purposes, at least, the aim of literary artists should be similar to that of Rubens in his landscapes, of which, without neglecting the minor traits or finishing, he was chiefly solicitous to present the leading effect, or what we may call the inspiration.—W. B. Clulow.

Dear authors! suit your topics to your strength,
And ponder well your subject, and its length;
Nor lift your load, before you're quite aware
What weight your shoulders will, or will not, bear.
—Byron.

The faults of a brilliant writer are never dangerous on the long run; a thousand people read his work who would read no other; inquiry is directed to each of his doctrines; it is soon discovered what is sound and what is false; the sound become maxims, and the false beacons.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The motives and purposes of authors are not always so pure and high, as, in the enthusiasm of youth, we sometimes imagine. To many the trumpet of fame is nothing but a tin horn to call them home, like laborers from the field, at dinner-time, and they think themselves lucky to get the dinner.—Longfellow.

The triumphs of the warrior are bounded by the narrow theatre of his own age; but those of a Scott or a Shakespeare will be renewed with greater and greater lustre in ages yet unborn, when the victorious chieftain shall be forgotten, or shall live only in the song of the minstrel and the page of the chronicler.—Prescott.

I believe that there is much less difference between the author and his works than is currently supposed; & is usually in the physical appearance of the writer,—his manners, his mien, his exterior,—that he falls short of the ideal a reasonable man forms of him—rarely in his mind.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The wickedness of a loose or profane author, in his writings, is more atrocious than that of the giddy libertine or drunken ravisher; not only because it extends its effects wider (as a pestilence that taints the air is more destructive than poison infused in a draught), but because it is committed with cool deliberation.—Johnson.

It is commonly the personal character of a writer which gives him his public significance. It is not imparted by his genius. Napoleon said of Corneille, "Were he living I would make him a king;" but he did not read him. He read Racine, yet he said nothing of the kind of Racine.—Goethe.

How many great ones may remember'd be,
Which in their days most famously did
flourish,
Of whom no word we hear, nor sign
now see,
But as things wip'd out with a sponge do perish,
Because the living cared not to cherish
No gentle wits, through pride or covetize,
Which might their names forever memorize!
—Spenser.

Certain I am that every author who has written a book with earnest forethought and fondly cherished designs will bear testimony to the fact that much which he meant to convey has never been guessed at in any review of his work; and many a delicate beauty of thought, on which he principally valued himself, remains, like the statue of Isis, an image of truth from which no hand lifts the veil.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Every author, indeed, who really influences the mind, who plants in it thoughts and sentiments which take root and grow, communicates his character. Error and immorality—two words for one thing, for error is the immorality of the intellect, and immorality the error of the heart—these escape from him if they are in him, and pass into the recipient mind through subtle avenues invisible to consciousness.—Whipple.

Nature I believe in. True art aims to represent men and women, not as my little self would have them, but as they appear. My heroes and heroines I want not extreme types, all good or all bad; but human, mortal—partly good, partly bad. Realism I need. Pure mental abstractions have no significance for me.—Ouida.

The wonderful fortune of some writers deludes and leads to misery a great number of young people. It cannot be too often repeated that it is dangerous to enter upon a career of letters without some other means of living. An illustrious author has said in these times, "Literature must not be leant on as upon a crutch; it is little more than a stick."—J. Petit-Senn.

As for my labors, if they can but wear one impertinence out of human life, destroy a single vice, or give a morning's cheerfulness to an honest mind—in short, if the world can be but one virtue the better, or in any degree less vicious, or receive from them the smallest addition to their innocent diversions—I shall not think my pains, or indeed my life, to have been spent in vain.—Steele.

Living authors, therefore, are usually bad companions. If they have not gained character, they seek to do so by methods often ridiculous, always disgusting; and if they have established a character, they are silent for fear of losing by their tongue what they have acquired by their pen—for many authors converse much more foolishly than Goldsmith, who have never written half so well.—Colton.

Professed authors who overestimate their vocation are too full of themselves to be agreeable companions. The demands of their egotism are inveterate. They seem to be incapable of that abandon which is the requisite condition of social pleasure; and bent upon winning a tribute of admiration, or some hint which they can turn to the account of pen-craft, there is seldom in their company any of the delightful unconsciousness which harmonizes a circle.—Tuckerman.

We may observe in humorous authors that the faults they chiefly ridicule have often a likeness in themselves. Cervantes had much of the knight-errant in him; Sir George Etherege was unconsciously the Fopling Flutter of his own satire; Goldsmith was the same hero to chambermaids, and coward to ladies that he has immortalized in his charming comedy; and the antiquarian frivolities of Jonathan Oldbuck had their resemblance in Jonathan Oldbuck's creator.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Autumn

Autumn is the harvest of greedy death.—Juvenal.

The year's last, loveliest smile.—Bryant.

The Indian summer—the dead summer's soul!—Mary Clemmer.

Autumn, in his leafless bowers, is waiting for the winter's snow.—Whittier.

Behold congenial Autumn comes,
The Sabbath of the year! —Logan.

When bounteous autumn rears her head, he joys to pull the ripened pear.—Dryden.

Wild is the music of autumnal winds amongst the faded woods.—Wordsworth.

The misty earth below is wan and drear,
The baying winds chase all the leaves away,
As cruel hounds pursue the trembling deer;
It is a solemn time, the sunset of the year.
—R. H. Stoddard.

All-cheering plenty, with her flowing horn,
Led yellow Autumn, wreath'd with nodding corn.
—Burns.

When summer gathers up her robes of glory, and like a dream of beauty glides away.—Sarah Helen Whitman.

The spring, the summer, the chill autumn, angry winter, change their wonted liveries.—Shakespeare.

The teeming autumn, big with rich increase, bearing the wanton burden of the prime.—Shakespeare.

Autumn wins you best by this, its mute
Appeal to sympathy for its decay.
—Robert Browning.

The tints of autumn—a mighty flower garden, blossoming under the spell of the enchanter, Frost.—Whittier.

The year growing ancient,
Nor yet on summer's death, nor on the birth
Of trembling winter. —Shakespeare.

As fall the light autumnal leaves, one still the other following, till the bough strews all its honors.—Dante.

Crown'd with the sickle and the wheaten sheaf,
While Autumn, nodding o'er the yellow plain,
Comes jovial on. —Thomson.

The lands are lit with all the autumn blaze of golden-rod, and everywhere the purple asters nod and bend and wave and flit.—Helen Hunt.

To her bier comes the year, not with weeping and distress, as mortals do; but to guide her way to it, all the trees have torches lit.—Lucy Larcom.

How strange and awful is the synthesis of life and death in the gusty winds and falling leaves of an autumnal day!—Coleridge.

Thrice happy time,
Best portion of the various year, in which Nature rejoiceth, smiling on her works
Lovely, to full perfection wrought.
—Phillips.

It was Autumn, and incessant
Piped the quails from shocks and sheaves,
And, like living coals, the apples
Burned among the withering leaves.
—Longfellow.

However constant the visitations of sickness and bereavement, the fall of the year is most thickly strewn with the fall of human life.—James Martineau.

Boughs are daily rifled
By the gusty thieves,
And the book of Nature
Getteth short of leaves.
—Hood.

The melancholy days are come, the saddest of the year,
Of wailing winds, and naked woods, and meadows brown and sear. —Bryant.

Every season hath its pleasures;
Spring may boast her flowery prime,
Yet the vineyard's ruby treasures
Brighten Autumn's sob'rer time.
—Moore.

The year's in the wane;
There is nothing adorning;
The night has no eve,
And the day has no morning;
Cold winter gives warning!
—Hood.

The pale descending year, yet pleasing still, a gentler mood inspires; for now the leaf incessant rustles from the mournful grove, oft startling such as, studious, walk below, and slowly circles through the waving air.—
Thomson.

Divinest Autumn! who may paint thee best,
Forever changeful o'er the changeful globe?
Who guess thy certain crown, thy favorite crest,
The fashion of thy many-colored robe?
—R. H. Stoddard.

Autumn's earliest frost had given
To the woods below
Hues of beauty, such as heaven
Lendeth to its bow;
And the soft breeze from the west
Scarcely broke their dreamy rest.
—Whittier.

But see the fading, many color'd woods,
Shade deep'ning over shade, the country
round
Imbrown; crowded umbrage, dusk and dun,
Of every hue, from wan declining green
To sooty dark. —Thomson.

Who is there who, at this season, does not feel his mind impressed with a sentiment of melancholy? or who is able to resist that current of thought, which, from such appearances of decay, so naturally leads him to the solemn imagination of that inevitable fate which is to bring on alike the decay of life, of empire, and of nature itself?—

Sir A. Alison.

Season of mists and mellow fruitfulness!
Close bosom-friend of the maturing sun;
Conspiring with him how to load and bless With fruit the vines that round the thatch-eaves run;
To bend with apples the moss'd cottage trees,
And fill all fruit with ripeness to the core.
—Keats.

O Autumn, laden with fruit, and stained
With the blood of the grape, pass not, but sit
Beneath my shady roof; there thou mayst rest
And tune thy jolly voice to my fresh pipe,
And all the daughters of the year shall dance!
Sing now the lusty song of fruits and flowers. —William Blake.

The summer's throbbing chant is done
And mute the choral antiphon;
The birds have left the shivering pines
To sit among the trellised vines,
Or fan the air with scented plumes
Amid the love-sick orange blooms,
And thou art here alone—alone—
Sing, little bird! the rest have flown.
—O. W. Holmes.

Then came the autumn, all in yellow clad,
As though he joy'd in his plenteous store,
Laden with fruits that made him laugh, full glad
That he had banished hunger, which tofore
Had by the belly oft him pinched sore;
Upon his head a wreath that was enrol'd
With ears of corn of every sort, he bore,
And in his hand a sickle did he holde,
To reap the ripened fruit the which the earth had yold. —Spenser.

What visionary tints the year puts on,
When falling leaves falter through motionless air
Or numbly cling and shiver to be gone!
How shimmer the low flats and pastures
bare,
As with her nectar Hebe Autumn fills
The bowl between me and those distant hills,
And smiles and shakes abroad her misty,
tremulous hair! —Lowell.

A moral character is attached to autumnal scenes; the leaves falling like our years, the flowers fading like our hours, the clouds fleeting like our illusions, the light diminishing like our intelligence, the sun growing colder like our affections, the rivers becoming frozen like our lives—all bear secret relations to our destinies.—Chateaubriand.

Yellow, mellow, ripened days,
Sheltered in a golden coating;
O'er the dreamy listless haze,
White and dainty cloudlets floating;
Winking at the blushing trees,
And the sombre, furrowed fallow;
Smiling at the airy ease
Of the southward flying swallow.
Sweet and smiling are thy ways,
Beauteous, golden Autumn days.
—Will Carleton.

However constant the visitations of sickness and bereavement, the fall of the year is most thickly strewn with the fall of human life. Everywhere the spirit of some sad power seems to direct the time; it hides from us the blue heavens, it makes the green wave turbid; it walks through the fields, and lays the damp ungathered harvest low; it cries out in the night wind and the shrill hail; it steals the summer bloom from the infant cheek; it makes old age shiver to the heart; it goes to the churchyard, and chooses many a grave.—James Martineau.

Avarice

The love of money is the root of all evil.—I Timothy vi. 10.

Avarice is the vice of declining years.—George Bancroft.

There is thy gold; worse poison to men's souls.—Shakespeare.

Avarice is always poor.—Dr. Johnson.

If you wish to remove avarice you must remove its mother, luxury.—Cicero.

Avarice, where it has full dominion, excludes every other passion.—Gladstone.

Avarice is insatiable, and is always pushing on for more.—L'Estrange.

A captive fettered at the oar of gain.—Falconer.

To be thankful for what we grasp exceeding our proportion, is to add hypocrisy to injustice.—Lamb.

Poverty is in want of much, but avarice of everything.—Publius Syrus.

Avarice increases with the increasing pile of gold.—Juvenal.

Wealth in the gross is death, but life diffus'd,
As poison heals, in just proportion us'd.
—Pope.

Avarice is the miser's dream, as fame is the poet's.—Hazlitt.

Those who covet much suffer from the want.—Horace.

It is surely very narrow policy that supposes money to be the chief good.—Johnson.

Avarice is more opposite to economy than liberality.—Rochefoucauld.

How quickly nature falls into revolt when gold becomes her object!—Shakespeare.

Some o'erenamor'd of their bags run mad,
Groan under gold, yet weep for want of bread.
—Young.

Avarice is to the intellect what sensuality is to the morals.—Mrs. Jameson.

The avaricious man is kind to no person, but he is most unkind to himself.—John Kyrle.

You despise a man for avarice; but you do not hate him.—Dr. Johnson.

It is natural to covet just what we have not.—Achilles Poincelot.

Poverty wants some, luxury many, and avarice all things.—Cowley.

In plain truth, it is not want, but rather abundance, that creates avarice.—Montaigne.

Avarice is only prudence and economy pushed to excess.—Chatfield.

When money is unreasonably coveted, it is a disease of the mind which is called avarice.—Cicero.

So for a good old-gentlemanly vice,
I think I must take up with avarice.
—Byron.

Avarice is always poor, but poor by her own fault.—Johnson.

The love of pelf increases with the pelf.—Juvenal.

To me avarice seems not so much a vice as a deplorable piece of madness.
—Sir Thomas Browne.

There is no vice which mankind carries to such wild extremes as that of avarice.—Swift.

What must be the wealth that avarice, aided by power, cannot exhaust!—James Otis.

This avarice sticks deeper; grows with more pernicious root than summer-seeding lust.—Shakespeare.

It is but shaping the bribe to the taste, and every one has his price.—Richardson.

Why Mammon sits before a million hearths
Where God is bolted out from every house.
—Bailey.

And in his lap a masse of coyne he told
And turned upside down, to feede his eye
And covetous desire with his huge treasury.
—Spenser.

When all the sins are old in us,
And go upon crutches, covetousness
Does but lie in her cradle. —Decker.

O cursed lust of gold; when for thy sake
The fool throws up his interest in both worlds,
First starved in this, then damn'd in that to come. —Blair.

Some men make fortunes, but not to enjoy them; for, blinded by avarice, they live to make fortunes.—Juvenal.

If, of all vices, avarice is the most generally detested, it is the effect of an avidity common to all men.—Helvetius.

'Tis strange the miser should his cares employ
To gain those riches he can ne'er enjoy.
—Pope.

Expel avarice, the mother of all wickedness, who, always thirsty for more, opens wide her jaws for gold.—Claudianus.

A poor spirit is poorer than a poor purse. A very few pounds a year would ease a man of the scandal of avarice.—Swift.

Some men are called sagacious, merely on account of their avarice; whereas a child can clench its fist the moment it is born.—Shenstone.

Avarice starves its possessor to fatten those who come after, and who are eagerly awaiting the demise of the accumulator.—Greville.

Avarice is the most opposite of all characters to that of God Almighty, whose alone it is to give and not receive.—Shenstone.

The lust of avarice has so totally seized upon mankind that their wealth seems rather to possess them than they possess their wealth.—Pliny.

Many have been ruined by their fortunes; many have escaped ruin by the want of fortune. To obtain it, the great have become little, and the little great.—Zimmermann.

There are two considerations which always imbitter the heart of an avaricious man—the one is a perpetual thirst after more riches, the other the prospect of leaving what he has already acquired.—Fielding.

Because men believe not in Providence, therefore they do so greedily scrape and hoard. They do not believe in any reward for charity, therefore they will part with nothing.—Barrow.

Avarice in old age is foolish; for what can be more absurd than to increase our provisions for the road, the nearer we approach to our journey's end?—Cicero.

He sat amid his bags, and, with a look Which hell might be ashamed of, drove the poor
Away unalmsed; and midst abundance died—
Sorest of evils!—died of utter want.

—Pollok.

All the good things of this world are no further good to us than as they are of use; and whatever we may heap up to give to others, we enjoy only as much as we can use, and no more.—De Foe.

We are at best but stewards of what we falsely call our own; yet avarice is so insatiable that it is not in the power of liberality to content it.—Seneca.

It is by bribing, not so often by being bribed, that wicked politicians bring ruin on mankind. Avarice is a rival to the pursuits of many.—Burke.

It is one of the worst effects of prosperity to make a man a vortex instead of a fountain; so that, instead of throwing out, he learns only to draw in.—Beecher.

Parsimony is enough to make the master of the golden mines as poor as he that has nothing; for a man may be brought to a morsel of bread by parsimony as well as profusion.—Henry Home.

He who is always in a hurry to be wealthy and immersed in the study of augmenting his fortune has lost the arms of reason and deserted the post of virtue.—Horace.

Study rather to fill your mind than your coffers; knowing that gold and silver were originally mingled with dirt, until avarice or ambition parted them.—Seneca.

The avaricious man is like the barren, sandy ground of the desert, which sucks in all the rain and dews with greediness, but yields no fruitful herbs or plants for the benefit of others.—Zeno.

There grows
In my most ill-compos'd affection such
A stanchless avarice, that, were I king,
I should cut off the nobles for their lands.
—Shakespeare.

The objects of avarice and ambition differ only in their greatness. A miser is as furious about a halfpenny as the man of ambition about the conquest of a kingdom.—Adam Smith.

Extreme avarice is nearly always mistaken; there is no passion which is oftener further away from its mark, nor upon which the present has so much power to the prejudice of the future.—La Rochefoucauld.

The character of covetousness is what a man generally acquires more through some niggardliness or ill grace in little and inconsiderable things, than in expenses of any consequence.—Pope.

The avarice of the miser may be termed the grand sepulchre of all his other passions, as they successively decay. But unlike other tombs, it is enlarged by repletion and strengthened by age.—Colton.

In all the world there is no vice
Less prone t' excess than avarice;
It neither cares for food nor clothing;
Nature's content with little—that with nothing.
—Butler.

Avarice has ruined more men than prodigality, and the blindest thoughtlessness of expenditure has not destroyed so many fortunes as the calculating but insatiable lust of accumulation.—Colton.

It may be remarked for the comfort of honest poverty that avarice reigns most in those who have but few good qualities to recommend them. This is a weed that will grow in a barren soil.—Hughes.

Avarice often produces opposite effects; there is an infinite number of people who sacrifice all their property to doubtful and distant expectations; others despise great future advantages to obtain present interests of a trifling nature.—Rochevoucauld.

Avarice begets more vices than Priam did children, and like Priam survives them all. It starves its keeper to surfeit those who wish him dead, and makes him submit to more mortifications to lose heaven than the martyr undergoes to gain it.—Colton.

Avarice is generally the last passion of those lives of which the first part has been squandered in pleasure, and the second devoted to ambition. He that sinks under the fatigue of getting wealth lulls his age with the milder business of saving it.—Dr. Johnson.

Objects close to the eye shut out much larger objects on the horizon; and splendors born only of the earth eclipse the stars. So a man sometimes covers up the entire disc of eternity with a dollar, and quenches transcendent glories with a little shining dust.—Chapin.

Avarice is a uniform and tractable vice; other intellectual distempers are different in different constitutions of mind. That which soothes the pride of one will offend the pride of another, but to the favor of the covetous bring money, and nothing is denied.—Johnson.

It would not be more unreasonable to transplant a favorite flower out of black earth into gold dust than it is for a person to let money-getting harden his heart into contempt, or into impatience, of the little attentions, the merriments and the caresses of domestic life.—Mountford.

The lust of gold succeeds the lust of conquest;
The lust of gold, unfeeling and remorseless!
The last corruption of degenerate man.
—Dr. Johnson.

It is not the nature of avarice to be satisfied with anything but money. Every passion that acts upon mankind has a peculiar mode of operation.

Many of them are temporary and fluctuating; they admit of cessation and variety. But avarice is a fixed, uniform passion.—Thomas Paine.

It is a bitter thought to an avaricious spirit that by and by all these accumulations must be left behind. We can only carry away from this world the flavor of our good or evil deeds.—Beecher.

Riches, like insects, when conceal'd they lie,
Wait but for wings, and in their season fly.
Who sees pale Mammon pine amidst his store,
Sees but a backward steward for the poor;
This year a reservoir, to keep and spare;
The next a fountain, spouting thro' his heir
In lavish streams to quench a country's thirst,
And men and dogs shall drink him till they burst.
—Pope.

The love of gold that meanest rage,
And latest folly of man's sinking age,
Which, rarely venturing in the van of life,
While nobler passions wage their heated strife,
Comes skulking last with selfishness and fear
And dies collecting lumber in the rear!
—Moore.

When a miser contents himself with giving nothing, and saving what he has got, and is in other respects guilty of no injustice, he is, perhaps, of all bad men the least injurious to society; the evil he does is properly nothing more than the omission of the good he might do. If, of all the vices, avarice is the most generally detested, it is the effect of an avidity common to all men; it is because men hate those from whom they can expect nothing. The greedy misers rail at sordid misers.—Helvetius.

Had covetous men, as the fable goes of Briareus, each of them one hundred hands, they would all of them be employed in grasping and gathering, and hardly one of them in giving or laying out, but all in receiving, and none in restoring; a thing in itself so monstrous that nothing in nature besides is like it, except it be death and the grave—the only things I know which are always carrying off the spoils of the world and never making restitution. For otherwise all the parts of the universe, as they borrow of one another, so they still pay what they borrow, and that by so just and well-balanced an equality that their payments always keep pace with their receipts.—Dryden.

It is impossible to conceive any contrast more entire and absolute than that which exists between a heart glowing with love to God, and a heart in which the love of money has cashiered all sense of God—His love, His presence, His glory; and which is no sooner relieved from the mockery of a tedious round of religious formalism than it reverts to the sanctuaries where its wealth is invested, with an intenseness of homage surpassing that of the most devout Israelite who ever, from a foreign land, turned his longing eyes toward Jerusalem.—Richard Fuller.

Aversion

I do not love thee, Doctor Fell,
The reason why, I cannot tell;
But this alone I know full well
I do not love thee, Doctor Fell.
—Tom Brown.

As well the noble savage of the field
Might tamely couple with the fearful ewe;
Tigers might engender with the timid deer;
Wild, muddy boars defile the cleanly ermine,
Or vultures sort with doves; as I with thee.
—Lec.

Awe

A heavenly awe overshadowed and encompassed, as it still ought, and must, all earthly business whatsoever.
—Carlyle.

I cannot tell what you and other men
Think of this life; but for my single self,
I had as lief not be as live to be
In awe of such a thing as I myself.
—Shakespeare.

Awkwardness

Awkwardness is a more real disadvantage than it is generally thought to be; it often occasions ridicule, it always lessens dignity.—Chesterfield.

Not all the pumice of the polish'd town
Can smoothe the roughness of the barnyard clown;
Rich, honor'd, titled, he betrays his race
By this one mark—he's awkward in his face.
—Holmes.

Awkward, embarrassed, stiff, without the skill
Of moving gracefully or standing still,
One leg, as if suspicious of his brother,
Desirous seems to run away from t'other.
—Churchill.

What's a fine person, or a beauteous face,
Unless deportment gives them decent grace?
Blessed with all other requisites to please,
Some want the striking elegance of ease;
The curious eye their awkward movement tires:
They seem like puppets led about by wires.
—Churchill.

B

Babbler

They always talk who never think.—Prior.

Who think too little, and who talk too much.—Dryden.

It is a shame for the tongue to cast itself upon the uncertain pardon of other's ears.—Bishop Hall.

Fie! what a spendthrift he is of his tongue!—Shakespeare.

Those who have few things to attend to are great babblers; for the less men think, the more they talk.—Montesquieu.

Tut! tut! my lord! we will not stand to prate;
Talkers are no good doers, be assured;
We go to use our hands, and not our tongues.—Shakespeare.

Babe — Babyhood

Fragile beginnings of a mighty end.—Mrs. Norton.

Incipient beings.—Carlyle.

A babe is a mother's anchor.—Beecher.

A link between angels and men.—Tupper.

Heaven lies about us in our infancy!—Wordsworth.

Of all the joys that brighten suffering earth, what joy is welcomed like a new-born child?—Mrs. Norton.

As living jewels dropped unstained from heaven.—Pollock.

A tight little bundle of wailing and flannel, Perplex'd with the newly found fardel of life.—Fred. Locker.

A sweet new blossom of humanity, fresh fallen from God's own home to flower on earth.—Gerald Massey.

Bent o'er her babe, her eye dissolved in dew;
The big drops, mingling with the milk he drew.—John Langhorne.

The little babe up in his arms he bent, who with sweet pleasure and hold blandishment 'gan smile.—Spenser.

Sweet babe, in thy face
Soft desires I can trace,
Secret joys and secret smiles,
Little pretty infant wiles.—William Blake.

Hush, my dear, lie still and slumber,
Holy angels guard thy bed!
Heavenly blessings without number
Gently falling on thy head.—Watts.

But what am I?
An infant crying in the night:
An infant crying for the light:
And with no language but a cry.—Tennyson.

A babe in a house is a well-spring of pleasure, a messenger of peace and love, a resting-place for innocence on earth, a link between angels and men.—Tupper.

The coarsest father gains a new impulse to labor from the moment of his baby's birth; he scarcely sees it when awake, and yet it is with him all the time. Every stroke he strikes is for his child. New social aims, new moral motives, come vaguely up to him.—

T. W. Higginson.

Sweet sleep, with soft down
Weave thy brows an infant crown!
Sweet sleep, angel mild,
Hover o'er my happy child.
—William Blake.

It is curious to see how a self-willed, haughty girl, who sets her father and mother and all at defiance, and can't be managed by anybody, at once finds her master in a baby. Her sister's child will strike the rock and set all her affections flowing.—Charles Buxton.

Good Christian people, here lies for you an inestimable loan;—take all heed thereof, in all carefulness employ it;—with high recompense, or else with heavy penalty will it one day be required back.—Carlyle.

When you fold your hands, Baby Louise!
Your hands like a fairy's, so tiny and fair,
With a pretty, innocent, saintlike air,
Are you trying to think of some angel-taught prayer
You learned above, Baby Louise?
—Margaret Eytinge.

Beat upon mine, little heart! beat, beat!
Beat upon mine! you are mine, my sweet!
All mine from your pretty blue eyes to your feet,
My sweet!
—Tennyson.

Suck, baby! suck! mother's love grows by giving:
Drain the sweet founts that only thrive by wasting!
Black manhood comes when riotous guilty living Hands thee the cup that shall be death in tasting.
—Charles Lamb.

Welcome to the parents the puny struggler, strong in his weakness, his little arms more irresistible than the soldier's, his lips touched with persuasion which Chatham and Pericles in manhood had not. His unaffected lamentations when he lifts up his voice on high, or, more beautiful, the sobbing child—the face all liquid grief, as he tries to swallow his vexation—soften all hearts to pity and to mirthful and clamorous compassion.—Emerson.

Her heads while she numbered,
The baby still slumbered,
And smiled in her face, as she bended her knee;
Oh! bless'd be that warning,
My child, thy sleep adorning,
For I know that the angels are whispering with thee.
—Samuel Lover.

O child! O new-born denizen
Of life's great city! on thy head
The glory of the morn is shed,
Like a celestial benison!
Here at the portal thou dost stand,
And with thy little hand
Thou openest the mysterious gate
Into the future's undiscovered land.
—Longfellow.

How lovely he appears! his little cheeks
In their pure incarnation, vying with
The rose leaves strewn beneath them.
And his lips, too,
How beautifully parted! No; you shall not Kiss him; at least not now; he will wake soon—
His hour of midday rest is nearly over.
—Byron.

What is the little one thinking about?
Very wonderful things, no doubt;
Unwritten history!
Unfathomed mystery!
Yet he laughs and cries, and eats and drinks,
And chuckles and crows, and nods and winks,
As if his head were as full of kinks
And curious riddles as any sphinx!
—J. G. Holland.

Look! how he laughs and stretches out his arms,
And opens wide his blue eyes upon thine,
To hail his father; while his little form
Flutters as winged with joy. Talk not of pain!
The childless cherubs well might envy thee
The pleasures of a parent. —Byron.

He smiles and sleeps!—sleep on
And smile, thou little, young inheritor
Of a world scarce less young: sleep on and smile!
Thine are the hours and days when both are cheering
And innocent!
—Byron.

It is well for us that we are born babies in intellect. Could we understand half what mothers say and do to their infants, we should be filled with a conceit of our own importance, which would render us insupportable through life. Happy the boy whose mother is tired of talking nonsense to him before he is old enough to know the sense of it.—Hare.

Babe (Death of)

And thou hast stolen a jewel, Death!
Shall light thy dark up like a star.
A beacon kindling from afar
Our light of love and fainting faith.
—Gerald Massey.

A little soul scarce fledged for earth
Takes wing with heaven again for goal,
Even while we hailed as fresh from birth
A little soul. —Swinburne.

You scarce could think so small a thing
Could leave a loss so large;
Her little light such shadow fling
From dawn to sunset's marge.
In other springs our life may be
In bannered bloom unfurled,
But never, never match our wee
White Rose of all the world.
—Gerald Massey.

When the baby died,
On every side
Rose strangers' voices, hard and harsh and loud.
The baby was not wrapped in any shroud.
The mother made no sound. Her head was bowed
That men's eyes might not see
Her misery. —Helen Hunt.

He seemed a cherub who had lost his way
And wandered hither, so his stay
With us was short, and 'twas most meet
That he should be no delver in earth's clod,
Nor need to pause and cleanse his feet
To stand before his God:
O blest word—Evermore! —Lowell.

When the baby died we said,
With a sudden secret dread;
"Death be merciful and pass;
Leave the other!"—but alas!
While we watched he waited there,
One foot on the golden stair,
One hand beckoning at the gate,
Till the home was desolate.
—Nora Perry.

Those who have lost an infant are never, as it were, without an infant child. Their other children grow up to manhood and womanhood, and suffer all the changes of mortality; but this one alone is rendered an immortal child; for death has arrested it with his kindly harshness, and blessed it into an eternal image of youth and innocence.—Leigh Hunt.

Bachelor

When I said I would die a bachelor,
I did not think I should live till I were married.—Shakespeare.

I have no wife or children, good or bad, to provide for; a mere spectator of other men's fortunes and adventures, and how they play their parts; which, methinks, are diversely presented unto me, as from a common theatre or scene.—Burton.

A man unattached and without wife, if he have any genius at all, may raise himself above his original position, may mingle with the world of fashion, and hold himself on a level with the highest; this is less easy for him who is engaged; it seems as if marriage put the whole world in their proper rank.—Bruyère.

Backsliding

I never yet have heard of a good man having fallen when he was trying to do Christ's will and trusting on Christ's help. Every fall without one exception came from venturing upon sinful ground or from venturing upon self-support.—T. L. Cuyler.

When we read or hear how some professed Christian has turned defaulter, or lapsed into drunkenness, or slipped from the communion table into open disgrace, it simply means that a human arm has broken. The man has forsaken the everlasting arms.—T. L. Cuyler.

The Master will not keep His hand under our arms when we go on forbidden ground. Presumptuous Peter needed a sharp lesson, and he got it. That bitter cry at the foot of the stairs bespoke an awful fall. How many such are rising daily into God's listening ears.—T. L. Cuyler.

Ballads

I knew a very wise man that believed that * * * if a man were permitted to make all the ballads, he need not care who should make the laws of a nation.—Andrew Fletcher.

Vocal portraits of the national mind.
—Lamb.

Ballads are the gypsy children of song, born under green hedgerows, in the leafy lanes and by-paths of literature, in the genial summer-time.—Longfellow.

A well-composed song strikes the mind and softens the feelings, and produces a greater effect than a moral work, which convinces our reason, but does not warm our feelings, nor effect the slightest alteration in our habits.—Napoleon.

I love a ballad but even too well; if it be doleful matter, merrily set down, or a very pleasant thing indeed, and sung lamentably.—Shakespeare.

Ballot

A weapon that comes down as still
As snow-flakes fall upon the sod;
But executes a freeman's will,
As lightning does the will of God;
And from its force, nor doors nor locks
Can shield you—'tis the ballot-box.
—J. Pierpont.

Baptism

Only what coronation is in an earthly way, baptism is in a heavenly way; God's authoritative declaration in material form of a spiritual reality.—F. W. Robertson.

What is baptism but a declaration of our misery by sin, our need of Christ, and a badge of our belonging to Him.—W. D. Paden.

Bargain

A dear bargain is always disagreeable, particularly as it is a reflection upon the buyer's judgment.—Pliny.

The modern craze for bargains has often inflicted great hardships upon a certain class of humble toilers.—Douglas.

What is the disposition which makes men rejoice in good bargains? There are few people who will not be benefited by pondering over the morals of shopping.—Beecher.

I'll give thrice so much land,
To any well deserving friend;
But in the way of bargain, mark me,
I'll cavil on the ninth part of a hair.
—Shakespeare.

Baseness

Some kinds of baseness are nobly undergone.—Shakespeare.

Every base occupation makes one sharp in its practice, and dull in every other.—Sir P. Sidney.

There is a law of neutralization of forces, which hinders bodies from sinking beyond a certain depth in the sea; but in the ocean of baseness, the deeper we get, the easier the sinking.—Lowell.

Bashfulness

The scarlet hue of modesty.—Lafontaine.

Awkwardness in full dress.—Ninon de Lenclos.

A shy face is better than a forward heart.—Cervantes.

Twin sister of awkwardness.—Mrs. Barbauld.

Bashfulness is an ornament to youth, but a reproach to old age.—Aristotle.

Diffidence and awkwardness are antidotes to love.—Hazlitt.

Mere bashfulness without merit is awkwardness.—Addison.

Conceit not so high a notion of any as to be bashful and impotent in their presence.—Fuller.

Modesty is the graceful, calm virtue of maturity; bashfulness the charm of vivacious youth.—Mary Wollstonecraft.

Bashfulness may sometimes exclude pleasure, but seldom opens any avenue to sorrow or remorse.—Dr. Johnson.

Bashfulness is not becoming to maidenhood, though modesty always is. —Marguerite de Valois.

The most curious offspring of shame is shyness.—Sydney Smith.

So sweet the blush of bashfulness
Even pity scarce can wish it less.
—Byron.

A tardiness in Nature, which often leaves the history unspeke, that it intends to do.—Shakespeare.

Bashfulness is more frequently connected with good sense than we find assurance; and impudence, on the other hand, is often the mere effect of downright stupidity.—Shenstone.

She felt his flame; but deep within her breast, in bashful coyness or in maiden pride, the soft return concealed.—Thomson.

We must prune it with care, so as only to remove the redundant branches, and not injure the stem, which has its root in the generous sensitiveness to shame.—Plutarch.

As those that pull down private houses adjoining to the temples of the gods, prop up such parts as are contiguous to them; so, in undermining bashfulness, due regard is to be had to adjacent modesty, good-nature and humanity.—Plutarch.

Bashfulness is a great hindrance to a man, both in uttering his sentiments and in understanding what is proposed to him; 't is therefore good to press forward with discretion, both in discourse and company of the better sort. —Bacon.

There are two distinct sorts of what we call bashfulness; this, the awkwardness of a booby, which a few steps into the world will convert into the pertness of a coxcomb; that, a consciousness, which the most delicate feelings produce, and the most extensive knowledge cannot always remove. —Mackenzie.

Nor do we accept as genuine the person not characterized by this blushing bashfulness, this youthfulness of heart, this sensibility to the sentiment of suavity and self-respect. Modesty is bred of self-reverence. Fine manners are the mantle of fair minds. None are truly great without this ornament.—Alcott.

Women who are the least bashful are not unfrequently the most modest; and we are never more deceived than when we would infer any laxity of principle from that freedom of demeanor which often arises from a total ignorance of vice.—Colton.

Battle — Battlefield

The next dreadful thing to a battle lost is a battle won.—Wellington.

Troops of heroes undistinguished die.—Addison.

As well the soldier dieth who standeth still, as he that gives the bravest onset.—Sir P. Sidney.

When Greeks join'd Greeks, then was the tug of war;
The labor'd battle sweat, and conquest bled.
—Lee.

Hand to hand and foot to foot,
Nothing there save death, was mute;
Stroke and thrust, and flash, and cry
For quarter or for victory,
Mingle there with the volleying thunder.
—Byron.

It was a goodly sight to see the embattled pomp, as with the step of stateliness the barbed steeds came on, to see the pennons rolling their long waves before the gale, and banners, broad and bright, tossing their blazonry.—Southey.

That awful pause, dividing life from death
Struck for an instant on the hearts of men,
Thousands of whom were drawing their last breath!
A moment all will be life again.
* * * one moment more,
The death-cry drowning in the battle's roar.
—Byron.

The cannons have their bowels full of wrath; and ready mounted are they to spit forth their iron indignation against your walls.—Shakespeare.

The fame of a battlefield grows with its years; Napoleon storming the Bridge of Lodi, and Wellington surveying the towers of Salamanca, affect us with fainter emotions than Brutus reading in his tent at Philippi, or Richard bearing down with the English chivalry upon the white armies of Saladin.—Willmott.

This day hath made
Much work for tears in many a English mother,
Whose sons lie scatter'd on the bleeding ground;
Many a widow's husband grovelling lies,
Coldly embracing the discolored earth.
—Shakespeare.

Then after length of time, the labouring swains,
Who turn the turfs of those unhappy plains,
Shall rusty piles from the plough'd furrows take,
And over empty helmets pass the rake;
Amazed at antique titles on the stones,
And mighty relics of gigantic bones.
—Dryden.

Then more fierce
The conflict grew; the din of arms—the yell
Of savage rage—the shriek of agony—
The groan of death, commingled in one sound
Of undistinguish'd horrors; while the sun,
Retiring slow beneath the plain's far verge,
Shed o'er the quiet hills his fading light.
—Southey.

Hark! the death-denouncing trumpet sounds
The fatal charge, and shouts proclaim the onset;
Destruction rushes dreadful to the field,
And bathes itself in blood; havoc let loose
Now undistinguish'd rages all around,
While ruin, seated on her dreary throne,
Sees the plain strewn with subjects truly hers,
Breathless and cold.
—Havard.

Therewith they gan, both furious and fell,
To thunder blowes, and fiercely to assaile
Each other, bent his enemy to quell,
That with their force they perst both plate and maile,
And made wide furrows in their fleshes fraile,
That it would pitv any living eie,
Large floods of blood adowne their sides did raile,
But floods of blood could not them satisfie:
Both hongred after death; both chose to win or die.
—Spenser.

From camp to camp, through the foul wombs of night,
The hum of either army stilly sounds,
That the fixed sentinels almost receive
The secret whispers of each other's watch;
Fire answers fire; and through their paly flames,
Each battle sees the other's umbered face:
Steed threatens steed in high and boastful neighs,
Piercing the night's dull ear; and from the tents,
The armourers accomplishing the knights,
With busy hammers closing rivets up,
Give dreadful note of preparation.
—Shakespeare.

Here you might see
Barons and peasants on th' embattled field,
Slain or half dead, in one huge ghastly heap
Promiscuously amass'd. With dismal groans,
And ejaculation, in the pangs of death,
Some call for aid, neglected; some o'erturn'd
In the fierce shock lie gasping, and expire,
Trampled by fiery coursers: Horror thus,
And wild uproar, and desolation reign'd Unrespected.
—Philips.

Beard

Beard was never the true standard of brains.—Fuller.

Beards, in olden times, were the emblems of wisdom and piety.—Macaulay.

He that hath a beard is more than a youth;
And he that hath none is less than a man.
—Shakespeare.

How many cowards wear yet upon their chins the beards of Hercules and frowning Mars!—Shakespeare.

There is great truth in Alphonse Karr's remark that modern men are ugly because they do not wear their beards.—G. A. Sala.

Beau

A beau is everything of a woman but the sex, and nothing of a man beside it.—Fielding.

Beauty

The fringe of the garment of the Lord.—Bailey.

Accuracy is essential to beauty.—Emerson.

Beauty is an accidental and transient good.—Richardson.

Beauty is its own excuse for being.—Emerson.

Beauty and wisdom are rarely conjoined.—Petronius Arbiter.

Nature was here so lavish of her store,
That she bestow'd until she had no more.
—Brown.

Without the smile from partial beauty won,
O, what were man! a world without a sun!
—Campbell.

Beauty is truth, truth beauty—that is all
Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know.
—Keats.

The mate for beauty should be a man and not a money chest.—Bulwer.

A handsome woman is a jewel; a good woman is a treasure.—Saadi.

I pray Thee, O God, that I may be beautiful within.—Socrates.

Exquisite beauty resides rather in the female form than face, where it is also more lasting.—Lamartine.

'Tis the eternal law,
That first in beauty should be first in might.
—Keats.

It is beauty that begins to please, and tenderness that completes the charm.—Fontenelle.

The essence of the beautiful is unity in variety.—Mendelssohn.

Beauty is the index of a larger fact than wisdom.—O. W. Holmes.

Her overpowering presence made you feel
It would not be idolatry to kneel.
—Byron.

That is the best part of beauty which a picture cannot express.—Bacon.

The criterion of true beauty is that it increases on examination; if false, that it lessens.—Greville.

In days of yore nothing was holy but the beautiful.—Schiller.

Beauty is worse than wine; it intoxicates both the holder and the beholder.—Zimmermann.

Beauty itself is but the sensible image of the Infinite.—Bancroft.

Oesser taught me that the ideal of beauty is simplicity and tranquillity.—Goethe.

Is beauty vain because it will fade?
Then are earth's green robe and heaven's light vain.—Pierpont.

What's true beauty but fair virtue's face,—virtue made visible in outward grace?—Young.

Beauty is like an almanac; if it lasts a year, it is well.—Rev. T. Adam.

There is a self-evident axiom, that she who is born a beauty is half married.—Ouida.

It is seldom that beautiful persons are otherwise of great virtue.—Bacon.

Eyes raised toward heaven are always beautiful, whatever they be.—Joseph Joubert.

The good is always beautiful, the beautiful is good!—Whittier.

Beauty, without virtue, is like a flower without perfume.—From the French.

In the forming of female friendships beauty seldom recommends one woman to another.—Fielding.

Beauty can afford to laugh at distinctions; it is itself the greatest distinction.—Bovee.

Even virtue is more fair when it appears in a beautiful person.—Virgil.

There is no beauty on earth which exceeds the natural loveliness of woman.—J. Petit-Senn.

Beauty can give an edge to the bluntest sword.—Sir P. Sidney.

There is nothing that makes its way more directly to the soul than beauty.—Addison.

The most natural beauty in the world is honesty and moral truth.—Shaftesbury.

Beauty is no local deity, like the Greek and Roman gods, but omnipresent.—Bartol.

There is no more potent antidote to low sensuality than the adoration of beauty.—Schlegel.

Beauty comes, we scarce know how, as an emanation from sources deeper than itself.—Shairp.

Might but the sense of moral evil be as strong in me as is my delight in external beauty!—Dr. Arnold.

For beauty is the bait which with delight doth man allure, for to enlarge his kind.—Spenser.

O, how much more doth beauty beauteous seem, by that sweet ornament which truth doth give!—Shakespeare.

To give pain is the tyranny,—to make happy the true empire of beauty.—Steele.

A lovely being, scarcely formed or moulded,
A rose with all its sweetest leaves yet folded.
—Byron.

In life, as in art, the beautiful moves in curves.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Few have borne unconsciously the spell of loveliness.—Whittier.

Beauty, without kindness, dies unenjoyed and undelighting.—Johnson.

Beauty soon grows familiar to the lover,
Fades in his eye, and palls upon the sense.
—Addison.

Beautiful works do not intoxicate, but they enchant.—Joubert.

Beauties, whether male or female, are generally the most untractable people of all others.—Steele.

Beauty intoxicates the eye, as wine does the body; both are morally fatal if indulged.—J. G. Saxe.

Good nature will always supply the absence of beauty; but beauty cannot supply the absence of good nature.—Addison.

'T is a powerful sex; they were too strong for the first, the strongest, and the wisest man that was.—Howell.

Beauty or unbecomingness is of more force to draw or deter invitation than any discourses which can be made to them.—Locke.

You may keep your beauty and your health, unless you destroy them yourself, or discourage them to stay with you, by using them ill.—Sir W. Temple.

Beauty is nothing else but a just accord and mutual harmony of the members, animated by a healthful constitution.—Dryden.

You may not, cannot, appropriate beauty. It is the wealth of the eye, and a cat may gaze upon a king.—Theodore Parker.

The beautiful is a manifestation of secret laws of Nature, which, but for this appearance, had been forever concealed from us.—Goethe.

The very first discovery of beauty strikes the mind with an inward joy, and spreads a cheerfulness and delight through all its faculties.—Addison.

Beauty and sadness always go together. Nature thought Beauty too rich to go forth upon the earth without a meet alloy.—George MacDonald.

What is really beautiful needs no adorning. We do not grind down the pearl upon a polishing stone.—Sataka.

Man has still more desire for beauty than knowledge of it; hence the caprices of the world.—X. Doudan.

As amber attracts a straw, so does beauty admiration, which only lasts while the warmth continues.—Robert Burton.

Though color be the lowest of all the constituent parts of beauty, yet it is vulgarly the most striking.—Joseph Spence.

Beauty deceives women in making them establish on an ephemeral power the pretensions of a whole life.—Big-nicourt.

Though we travel the world over to find the beautiful, we must carry it with us, or we find it not.—Emerson.

It is the saddest of all things that even one human soul should dimly perceive the beauty that is ever around us, a perpetual benediction.—Mrs. L. M. Child.

Expression is of more consequence than shape; it will light up features otherwise heavy.—Sir C. Bell.

Female beauties are as fickle in their faces as in their minds; though casualties should spare them, age brings in a necessity of decay.—Boyle.

Every trait of beauty may be traced to some virtue, as to innocence, candor, generosity, modesty, and heroism.—St. Pierre.

Do not idolatrise; beauty's a flower, Which springs and withers almost in an hour. —Wm. Smith.

If thou marry beauty, thou bindest thyself all thy life for that which, perchance, will neither last nor please thee one year.—Raleigh.

If virtue accompany it, it is the heart's paradise; if vice associate it, it is the soul's purgatory.—Quarles.

We do love beauty at first sight; and we do cease to love it, if it is not accompanied by amiable qualities.—Lydia Maria Child.

Such harmony in motion, speech and air,
That without fairness, she was more than fair. —Crabbe.

Loveliness
Needs not the foreign aid of ornament,
But is when unadorn'd adorn'd the most. —Thomson.

Beauty is an outward gift which is seldom despised except by those to whom it has been refused.—Gibbon.

Beauty is Nature's coin, must not be hoarded,
But must be current, and the good thereof
Consists in mutual and partaken bliss. —Milton.

The beauty that addresses itself to the eyes is only the spell of the moment; the eye of the body is not always that of the soul.—Georges Sand.

Remember that the most beautiful things in the world are the most useless; peacocks and lilies, for instance. —Ruskin.

The beautiful seems right
By force of beauty, and the feeble wrong
Because of weakness. —E. B. Browning.

There's nothing ill can dwell in such a temple:
If the ill spirit have so fair a house,
Good things will strive to dwell with't. —Shakespeare.

The first distinction among men, and the first consideration that gave one precedence over another, was doubtless the advantage of beauty.—Montaigne.

Naught under heaven so strongly doth allure the sense of man, and all his mind possess, as beauty's love-bait. —Spenser.

Love that has nothing but beauty to keep it in good health is short-lived, and apt to have ague fits.—Erasmus.

A beautiful woman is the hell of the soul, the purgatory of the purse, and the paradise of the eyes.—Fontenelle.

The dower of great beauty has always been misfortune, since happiness and beauty do not agree together.—Calderon.

Where the mouth is sweet and the eyes intelligent, there is always the look of beauty, with a right heart.—Leigh Hunt.

No woman can be handsome by the force of features alone, any more than she can be witty only by the help of speech.—Hughes.

The sense of beauty is intuitive, and beauty itself is all that inspires pleasure without, and aloof from, and even contrarily to interest.—Coleridge.

A beautiful form is better than a beautiful face; it gives a higher pleasure than statues or pictures; it is the finest of the fine arts.—Emerson.

The perception of the beautiful is gradual, and not a lightning revelation; it requires not only time, but some study.—Ruffini.

The very beautiful rarely love at all. Those precious images are placed above the reach of the passions.—Lander.

Beauty is a great gift of heaven; not for the purpose of female vanity, but a great gift for one who loves, and wishes to be beloved.—Miss Edgeworth.

Methinks a being that is beautiful becometh more so as it looks on beauty, the eternal beauty of undying things.—Byron.

Affect not to despise beauty, no one is freed from its dominion; but regard is not a pearl of price, it is fleeting as the bow in the clouds.—Tupper.

Where rivulets dance their wayward round, and beauty born of murmuring sound shall pass into her face.—Wordsworth.

The common foible of women who have been handsome is to forget that they are no longer so.—Rochefoucauld.

Beauty attracts us men, but if, like an armed magnet it is pointed with gold or silver beside, it attracts with tenfold power.—Richter.

What place is so rugged and so homely that there is no beauty, if you only have a sensibility to beauty?—Beecher.

Thus was beauty sent from heaven, the lovely ministrress of truth and good in this dark world.—Akenside.

Beauty, like truth and justice, lives within us; like virtue, and like moral law, it is a companion of the soul.—Bancroft.

That is true beauty which has not only a substance, but a spirit; a beauty that we must intimately know, justly to appreciate.—Colton.

O human beauty, what a dream art thou, that we should cast our life and hopes away on thee!—Barry Cornwall.

Every good picture is the best of sermons and lectures. The sense informs the soul. Whatever you have, have beauty.—Sydney Smith.

Beautiful as sweet! and young as beautiful! and soft as young! and gay as soft! and innocent as gay!—Young.

Beauty hath no lustre save when it gleameth through the crystal web that purity's fine fingers weave for it.—Maturin.

By cultivating the beautiful, we scatter the seeds of heavenly flowers; by doing good, we foster those already belonging to humanity.—Howard.

Lovely sweetness is the noblest power of woman, and is far fitter to prevail by parley than by battle.—Sir P. Sidney.

That which is striking and beautiful is not always good, but that which is good is always beautiful.—Ninon de Lenclos.

To cultivate the sense of the beautiful is but one, and the most effectual, of the ways of cultivating an appreciation of the Divine goodness.—Bovee.

Not more the rose, the queen of flowers,
Outblushes all the bloom of bower,
Than she unrivall'd grace discloses;
The sweetest rose, where all are roses.
—Moore.

Exalt your passion by directing and settling it upon an object the due contemplation of whose loveliness may cure perfectly all hurts received from mortal beauty.—Boyle.

A beautiful face fires our imagination, and we see higher virtue and intelligence in it than we can detect in its owner's head or heart when we descend to calm inspection.—Charles Reade.

There is more or less of pathos in all true beauty. The delight it awakens has an indefinable, and, as it were, luxurious sadness, which is perhaps one element of its might.—Tuckerman.

The greatest truths are wronged if not linked with beauty; and they win their way most surely and deeply into the soul when arrayed in this their natural and fit attire.—Channing.

Yet even this hath this inconvenience in it—that it makes its possessor neglect the furnishing of the mind with nobleness. Nay, it oftentimes is a cause that the mind is ill.—Feltham.

The sense of beauty enters into the highest philosophy, as in Plato. The highest poet must be a philosopher, accomplished like Dante, or intuitive like Shakespeare.—Gladstone.

O, if so much beauty doth reveal
Itself in every vein of life and nature,
How beautiful must be the Source itself,
The Ever Bright One. —Tegner.

Mark her majestic fabric; she's a temple
Sacred by birth, and built by hands divine;
Her soul's the Deity that lodges there;
Nor is the pile unworthy of the God.
—Dryden.

It is only through the morning gate of the beautiful that you can penetrate into the realm of knowledge. That which we feel here as beauty we shall one day know as truth.—Schiller.

A look of intelligence in men is what regularity of features is in women; it is a style of beauty to which the most vain may aspire.—La Bruyère.

There's beauty all around our paths, if but our watchful eyes
Can trace it 'midst familiar things, and through their lowly guise.
—Mrs. Hemans.

There should be, methinks, as little merit in loving a woman for her beauty as in loving a man for his prosperity; both being equally subject to change.—Pope.

Beauty in a modest woman is like fire at a distance, or like a sharp sword; neither doth the one burn, nor the other wound those that come not too near them.—Cervantes.

Every year of my life I grow more convinced that it is wisest and best to fix our attention on the beautiful and good and dwell as little as possible on the dark and the base.—Cecil.

In the true mythology, Love is an immortal child, and Beauty leads him as a guide; nor can we express a deeper sense than when we say, Beauty is the pilot of the young soul.—Emerson.

True beauty dwells in deep retreats,
Whose veil is unremoved
Till heart with heart in concord beats,
And the lover is beloved.
—Wordsworth.

The divine right of beauty is the only divine right a man can acknowledge, and a pretty woman the only tyrant he is not authorized to resist.—Junius.

The useful encourages itself; for the multitude produce it, and no one can dispense with it: the beautiful must be encouraged; for few can set it forth, and many need it.—Goethe.

He who cannot see the beautiful side is a bad painter, a bad friend, a bad lover; he cannot lift his mind and his heart so high as goodness.—Joubert.

Beauty is the mark God sets on virtue. Every natural action is graceful. Every heroic act is also decent, and causes the place and the bystanders to shine.—Emerson.

Something of the severe hath always been appertaining to order and to grace; and the beauty that is not too liberal is sought the most ardently, and loved the longest.—Landor.

Who doth not feel, until his failing sight
Faints into dimness with its own delight,
His changing cheek, his sinking heart confess,

The might—the majesty of Loveliness?
—Byron.

Beauty! thou pretty plaything! dear deceit,
That steals so softly o'er the stripling's heart
And gives it a new pulse unknown before!
—Blair.

He will always see the most beauty whose affections are warmest and most exercised, whose imagination is the most powerful, and who has most accustomed himself to attend to the objects by which he is surrounded.—Lord Jeffrey.

The essence of all beauty, I call love,
The attribute, the evidence, and end,
The consummation to the inward sense
Of beauty apprehended from without,
I still call love. —E. B. Browning.

An agreeable figure and winning manner, which inspire affection without love, are always new. Beauty loses its relish, the graces never, after the longest acquaintance, they are no less agreeable than at first.—Henry Home.

Beauty is as summer fruits, which are easy to corrupt and cannot last; and for the most part it makes a dissolute youth, and an age a little out of countenance; but if it light well, it makes virtues shine and vice blush.—Bacon.

The contemplation of beauty in nature, in art, in literature, in human character, diffuses through our being a soothing and subtle joy, by which the heart's anxious and aching cares are softly smiled away.—Whipple.

Beauty is the true prerogative of women, and so peculiarly their own, that our sex, though naturally requiring another sort of feature, is never in its lustre but when puerile and beardless, confused and mixed with theirs.—Montaigne.

Contrast increases the splendor of beauty, but it disturbs its influence; it adds to its attractiveness, but diminishes its power.—Ruskin.

Beauty is a fairy; sometimes she hides herself in a flower-cup, or under a leaf, or creeps into the old ivy, and plays hide-and-seek with the sunbeams, or haunts some ruined spot, or laughs out of a bright young face.—G. A. Sala.

To make the cunning artless, tame the rude, subdue the haughty, shake the undaunted soul; yea, put a bridle in the lion's mouth, and lead him forth as a domestic cur, these are the triumphs of all-powerful beauty.—Joanna Baillie.

How much wit, good-nature, indulgences, how many good offices and civilities, are required among friends to accomplish in some years what a lovely face or a fine hand does in a minute!—Bruyère.

An Indian philosopher, being asked what were, according to his opinion, the two most beautiful things in the universe, answered: The starry heavens above our heads, and the feeling of duty in our hearts.—Bossuet.

Happily there exists more than one kind of beauty. There is the beauty of infancy, the beauty of youth, the beauty of maturity, and, believe me, ladies and gentlemen, the beauty of age.—G. A. Sala.

No better cosmetics than a severe temperance and purity, modesty and humility, a gracious temper and calmness of spirit; no true beauty without the signature of these graces in the very countenance.—John Ray.

We may say of agreeableness, as distinct from beauty, that it consists in * symmetry of which we know not the rules, and a secret conformity of the features to each other, as also to the air and complexion of the person.—Roche-foucauld.

The most natural beauty in the world is honesty and moral truth. For all beauty is truth. True features make the beauty of a face, and true proportions the beauty of architecture; as true measures that of harmony and music.—Shaftesbury.

In all things that live there are certain irregularities and deficiencies which are not only signs of life, but sources of beauty. No human face is exactly the same in its lines on each side, no leaf perfect in its lobes, no branch in its symmetry.—Ruskin.

How intoxicating is the triumph of beauty, and how right it is to name it queen of the universe! How many courtiers, how many slaves, have submitted to it! But, alas! why must it be that what flatters our senses almost always deceives our souls?—Madame de Surin.

There is no more potent antidote to low sensuality than the adoration of beauty. All the higher arts of design are essentially chaste, without respect of the object. They purify the thoughts, as tragedy, according to Aristotle, purifies the passions.—Schlegel.

Sometimes there are living beings in nature as beautiful as in romance. Reality surpasses imagination; and we see breathing, brightening, and moving before our eyes sights dearer to our hearts than any we ever beheld in the land of sleep.—Jane Austen.

Beauty is a dangerous property, tending to corrupt the mind of the wife, though it soon loses its influence over the husband. A figure agreeable and engaging, which inspires affection, without the ebriety of love, is a much safer choice.—Henry Home.

Beauty has been the delight and torment of the world ever since it began. The philosophers have felt its influence so sensibly that almost every one of them has left some saying or other which intimates that he knew too well the power of it.—Steele.

Beauty too often sacrifices to fashion. The spirit of fashion is not the beautiful, but the wilful; not the graceful, but the fantastic; not the superior in the abstract, but the superior in the worst of all concretes,—the vulgar.—Leigh Hunt.

One of the old philosophers calls beauty a silent fraud, because it imposes upon us without the help of language. But I think Carneades spoke as much like a philosopher as any of them, though more like a lover, when he called it "royalty without force."—Steele.

In ourselves, rather than in material nature, lie the true source and life of the beautiful. The human soul is the sun which diffuses light on every side, investing creation with its lovely hues, and calling forth the poetic element that lies hidden in every existing thing.—Mazzini.

For converse among men, beautiful persons have less need of the mind's commending qualities. Beauty in itself is such a silent orator, that it is ever pleading for respect and liking, and by the eyes of others is ever sending to their hearts for love.—Feltham.

The flower which blossoms to-day and is withered to-morrow,—is it at all more actual than the colors of the rainbow? Or rather are those less actual? Beauty is the most fleeting thing upon earth, yet immortal as the spirit from which it blooms.—De Wette.

Her cheek had the pale pearly pink
Of sea shells, the world's sweetest tint, as though
She lived, one-half might deem, on roses sopp'd
In pearly dew. —Bailey.

Truth is the foundation and the reason of the perfection of beauty, for of whatever stature a thing may be, it cannot be beautiful and perfect, unless it be truly what it should be, and possess truly all that it should have.

—La Rochefoucauld.

Beauty, like ice, our footing does betray;
Who can tread sure on the smooth, slippery way?
Pleased with the surface, we glide swiftly on,
And see the dangers that we cannot shun.
—Dryden.

Give me a look, give me a face,
That makes simplicity a grace;
Robes loosely flowing, hair as free!
Such sweet neglect more taketh me,
Than all the adulteries of art;
That strike mine eyes, but not my heart.
—Ben Jonson.

Beauty, sweet love, is like the morning dew,
Whose short refresh upon tender green,
Cheers for a time, but till the sun doth show,
And straight is gone, as it had never been.
—Daniel.

Beauty is only truly irresistible when it shows us something less transitory than itself: when it makes us dream of that which charms life beyond the fugitive moment which seduces us. It is necessary for the soul to feel it when the senses have perceived it. The soul never wearies; the more it admires, the more it is exalted.—Mme. de Krudener.

Like other beautiful things, in this world, its end (that of a shaft) is to be beautiful; and, in proportion to its beauty, it receives permission to be otherwise useless. We do not blame emeralds and rubies because we cannot make them into heads of hammers.
—Ruskin.

She walks in beauty, like the night
Of cloudless climes and starry skies;
And all that's best of dark and bright
Meet in her aspect and her eyes;
Thus mellow'd to that tender light
Which Heaven to gaudy day denies.
—Byron.

It was a very proper answer to him who asked why any man should be delighted with beauty, that it was a question that none but a blind man could ask; since any beautiful object doth so much attract the sight of all men, that it is in no man's power not to be pleased with it.—Clarendon.

* * * for beauty stands
In the admiration only of weak minds
Led captive. Cease to admire, and all her plumes
Fall flat and shrink into a trivial toy,
At every sudden slighting quite abash'd.
—Milton.

'Twas not the fading charms of face
That riveted Love's golden chain;
It was the high celestial grace
Of goodness that doth never wane—
Whose are the sweets that never pall,
Delicious, pure, and crowning all.
—Abraham Coles.

A thing of beauty is a joy forever;
Its loveliness increases; it will never Pass into nothingness; but still will keep
A bower quiet for us, and a sleep
Full of sweet dreams, and health, and quiet breathing.
—Keats.

Her glossy hair was cluster'd o'er a brow
Bright with intelligence, and fair and smooth;
Her eyebrow's shape was like the aerial bow,
Her cheek all purple with the beam of youth,
Mounting, at times, to a transparent glow,
As if her veins ran lightning. —Byron.

Exquisite beauty resides with God. Unity and simplicity, joined together in different organs, are the principal sources of beauty. It resides in the good, the honest, and in the useful to the highest physical and intellectual degree.—Winkelman.

There is scarcely a single joy or sorrow within the experience of our fellow-creatures which we have not tasted; yet the belief in the good and beautiful has never forsaken us. It has been medicine to us in sickness, richness in poverty, and the best part of all that ever delighted us in health and success.—Leigh Hunt.

What is beauty? Not the show
Of shapely limbs and features. No.
These are but flowers
That have their dated hours
To breathe their momentary sweets, then go.
'Tis the stainless soul within
That outshines the fairest skin.
—Sir A. Hunt.

I am of opinion that there is nothing so beautiful but that there is some thing still more beautiful, of which this is the mere image and expression,—a something which can neither be perceived by the eyes, the ears, nor any of the senses; we comprehend it merely in the imagination.—Cicero.

O, it is the saddest of all things that even one human soul should dimly perceive the beauty that is ever around us, "a perpetual benediction!" Nature, that great missionary of the Most High, preaches to us forever in all tones of love, and writes truth in all colors, on manuscripts illuminated with stars and flowers.—Mrs. L. M. Child.

Take the whole sex together, and you find that those who have the strongest possession of men's hearts are not eminent for their beauty. You see it often happen that those who engage men to the greatest violence are such as those who are strangers to them would take to be remarkably defective for that end.—John Hughes.

Nothing is arbitrary, nothing is insulated in beauty. It depends forever on the necessary and the useful. The plumage of the bird, the mimic plumage of the insect, has a reason for its rich colors in the constitution of the animal. Fitness is so inseparable an accompaniment of beauty, that it has been taken for it.—Emerson.

The human heart yearns for the beautiful in all ranks of life. The beautiful things that God makes are His gift to all alike. I know there are many of the poor who have fine feeling and a keen sense of the beautiful, which rusts out and dies because they are too hard pressed to procure it any gratification.—Mrs. Stowe.

Who has not experienced how, on near acquaintance, plainness becomes beautified, and beauty loses its charm, exactly according to the quality of the heart and mind? And from this cause am I of opinion that the want of outward beauty never disquiets a noble nature or will be regarded as a misfortune. It never can prevent people from being amiable and beloved in the highest degree.—Fredrika Bremer.

Those critics who, in modern times, have the most thoughtfully analyzed the laws of æsthetic beauty, concur in maintaining that the real truthfulness of all works of imagination—sculpture, painting, written fiction—is so purely in the imagination, that the artist never seeks to represent the positive truth, but the idealized image of a truth.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Oh, talk as we may of beauty as a thing to be chiselled from marble or wrought out on canvas, speculate as we may upon its colors and outlines, what is it but an intellectual abstraction, after all? The heart feels a beauty of another kind; looking through the outward environment, it discovers a deeper and more real loveliness.—Whittier.

Gaze not on beauty too much, lest it blast thee; nor too long, lest it blind thee; nor too near, lest it burn thee. If thou like it, it deceives thee; if thou love it, it disturbs thee; if thou hunt after it, it destroys thee. If virtue accompany it, it is the heart's paradise; if vice associate it, it is the soul's purgatory. It is the wise man's bonfire, and the fool's furnace.—Quarles.

No man receives the true culture of a man in whom the sensibility to the beautiful is not cherished; and I know of no condition in life from which it should be excluded. Of all luxuries this is cheapest and the most at hand; and it seems to me to be the most important to those conditions where coarse labor tends to give a grossness to the mind.—Channing.

When I approach
Her loveliness, so absolute she seems,
And in herself complete, so well to know
Her own, that what she wills to do or say,
Seems wisest, virtuousest, discretest, best;
All higher knowledge in her presence falls
Degraded. Wisdom in discourse with her Loses, discount'nanc'd, and like folly shows.
—Milton.

Beauty of form affects the mind, but then it must be understood that it is not the mere shell that we admire; we are attracted by the idea that this shell is only a beautiful case adjusted to the shape and value of a still more beautiful pearl within. The perfect tion of outward loveliness is the soul shining through its crystalline covering.—Jane Porter.

Beauty has so many charms, one knows not how to speak against it; and when it happens that a graceful figure is the habitation of a virtuous soul, when the beauty of the face speaks out the modesty and humility of the mind, and the justness of the proportion raises our thoughts up to the heart and wisdom of the great Creator, something may be allowed it,—and something to the embellishments which set it off; and yet, when the whole apology is read, it will be found at last that beauty, like truth, never is so glorious as when it goes the plainest.—Sterne.

Beauty is an all-pervading presence. It unfolds to the numberless flowers of the spring; it waves in the branches of the trees and the green blades of grass; it haunts the depths of the earth and the sea, and gleams out in the hues of the shell and the precious stone. And not only these minute objects, but the ocean, the mountains, the clouds, the heavens, the stars, the rising and setting sun, all overflow with beauty.—Channing.

Around her shone
The nameless charms unmark'd by her alone.
The light of love, the purity of grace,
The mind, the music breathing from her face,
The heart whose softness harmonized the whole,
And, oh! that eye was in itself a soul.
—Byron.

Not faster in the summer's ray,
The spring's frail beauty fades away,
Than anguish and decay consume,
The smiling virgin's rosy bloom.
Some beauty's snatch'd each day, each hour;
For beauty is a fleeting flower;
Then how can wisdom e'er confide
In beauty's momentary pride?
—Elphinstone.

There is a certain period of the soul-culture when it begins to interfere with some of the characters of typical beauty belonging to the bodily frame, the stirring of the intellect wearing down the flesh, and the moral enthusiasm burning its way out to heaven, through the emaciation of the earthen vessel; and there is, in this indication of subduing the mortal by the immortal part, an ideal glory of perhaps a purer and higher range than that of the more perfect material form. We conceive, I think, more nobly of the weak presence of Paul than of the fair and ruddy countenance of David.

—Ruskin.

What's female beauty but an air divine,
Through which the mind's all gentle graces shine?
They, like the sun, irradiate all between;
The body charms because the soul is seen.
Hence men are often captives of a face—
They know not why—of no peculiar grace;
Some forms, though bright, no mortal man can bear;
Some none resist, though not exceeding fair.
—Young.

Beauty is but a vain and doubtful good,
A shining glass, that fadeth suddenly;
A flower that dies, when first it 'gins to bud;
A brittle glass, that's broken presently;
A doubtful good, a gloss, a glass, a flower,
Lost, faded, broken, dead within an hour.
And as good lost is seld or never found,
As fading gloss no rubbing will refresh,
As flowers dead lie wither'd on the ground,
As broken glass no cement can redress,
So beauty blemish'd once, for ever's lost,
In spite of physic, painting, pain and cost.
—Shakespeare.

Ye tradeful merchants! that with weary toil,
Do seek most precious things to make you gaine,
And both the Indies of their treasures spoil;
What needeth you to seek so far in vain?
For lo! my love doth in herself contain
All this world's riches that may far be found;
If saphyrs, lo! her eyes be saphyrs plain;
If rubies, lo! her lips be rubies sound;
If pearls, her teeth be pearls, both pure and round;
If ivory, her forehead's ivory I ween;
If gold, her locks are finest gold on ground;
If silver, her fair hands are silver sheen;
But that which fairest is, but few behold,
Her mind, adorn'd with virtues manifold.
—Spenser.

Socrates called beauty a short-lived tyranny; Plato, a privilege of nature; Theophrastus, a silent cheat; Theocritus, a delightful prejudice; Carneades, a solitary kingdom; Domitian said, that nothing was more grateful; Aristotle affirmed that beauty was better than all the letters of recommendation in the world; Homer, that 'twas a glorious gift of nature, and Ovid, alluding to him, calls it a favor bestowed by the gods.—From the Italian.

Beauty depends more upon the movement of the face, than upon the form of the features when at rest. Thus a countenance habitually under the influence of amiable feelings, acquires a beauty of the highest order, from the frequency with which such feelings are the originating causes of the movement or expressions which stamp their character upon it.—Mrs. S. C. Hall.

Bed

The bed has become a place of luxury to me! I would not exchange it for all the thrones in the world.—Napoleon I.

O bed! O bed! delicious bed!
That heaven upon earth to the weary head.
—Hood.

Sweet pillows, sweetest bed;
A chamber deaf to noise, and blind to light;
A rosy garland, and a weary head.
—Sir Philip Sidney.

In bed we laugh, in bed we cry;
And born in bed, in bed we die;
The near approach a bed may show
Of human bliss to human woe.
—Isaac De Benzerade.

Oh! thou gentle scene
Of sweet repose; where by th' oblivious draught
Of each sad toilsome day to peace restor'd.
Unhappy mortals lose their woes awhile.
—Thomson.

There should be hours for necessities, not for delights; times to repair our nature with comforting repose, and not for us to waste these times.—Shakespeare.

Night is the time for rest;
How sweet when labours close,
To gather round an aching breast
The curtain of repose;
Stretch the tir'd limbs, and lay the head
Down on our own delightful bed.
—James Montgomery.

It is a delicious moment, certainly, that of being well nestled in bed, and feeling that you shall drop gently to sleep. The good is to come, not past;

the limbs have just been tired enough to render the remaining in one posture delightful; the labor of the day is gone.—Leigh Hunt.

Bed is a bundle of paradoxes; we go to it with reluctance, yet we quit it with regret; and we make up our minds every night to leave it early, but we make up our bodies every morning to keep it late.—Colton.

Bees

Many-colored, sunshine-loving, spring-betokening bee! yellow bee, so mad for love of early-blooming flowers!—Professor Wilson.

How doth the little busy bee
Improve each shining hour,
And gather honey all the day,
From every opening flower.
—Watts.

Even bees, the little alms-men of spring
bowers,
Know there is richest juice in poison-flowers.
—Keats.

Look on the bee upon the wing 'mong flowers;
How brave, how bright his life! then mark
him hiv'd,
Cramp'd, cringing in his self-built, social cell,
Thus it is in the world-hive; most where
men
Lie deep in cities as in drifts. —Bailey.

The pedigree of honey
Does not concern the bee;
A clover, any time, to him
Is aristocracy.
—Emily Dickinson.

His labor is a chant,
His idleness a tune;
Oh, for a bee's experience
Of clovers and of noon!
—Emily Dickinson.

Listen! O, listen!
Here ever hum the golden bees
Underneath full-blossomed trees,
At once with glowing fruit and flowers crowned.
—Lowell.

The bee is enclosed, and shines preserved, in a tear of the sisters of Phaëton, so that it seems enshrined in its own nectar. It has obtained a worthy reward for its great toils; we may suppose that the bee itself would have desired such a death.—Martial.

"O bees, sweet bees!" I said; "that nearest field
Is shining white with fragrant immortelles.
Fly swiftly there and drain those honey wells."
—Helen Hunt.

The wild bee reels from bough to bough
With his furry coat and his gauzy wing,
Now in a lily cup, and now
Setting a jacinth bell a-swing,
In his wandering.
—Oscar Wilde.

Bees work for man, and yet they never bruise
Their Master's flower, but leave it having done,
As fair as ever and as fit to use;
So both the flower doth stay and honey
run.
—Herbert.

The careful insect 'midst his works I view,
Now from the flowers exhaust the fragrant
dew,
With golden treasures load his little thighs,
And steer his distant journey through the skies.
—Gay.

The little bee returns with evening's gloom,
To join her comrades in the braided hive,
Where, housed beside their mighty honeycomb,
They dream their polity shall long survive.
—Charles (Tennyson) Turner.

The honey-bee that wanders all day long
The field, the woodland, and the garden o'er,
To gather in his fragrant winter store,
Humming in calm content his winter song,
Seeks not alone the rose's glowing breast,
The lily's dainty cup, the violet's lips,
But from all rank and noxious weeds he sips
The single drop of sweetness closely pressed Within the poison chalice.
—Anne C. Lynch Botta.

So work the honey-bees;
Creatures, that by a rule in nature teach
The art of order to a peopled kingdom.
They have a king and officers of sorts;
Where some, like magistrates, correct at home;
Others, like merchants, venture trade abroad;
Others, like soldiers, armed in their stings,
Make boot upon the summer's velvet buds;
Which pillage they, with merry march, bring
home,
To the tent royal of their emperor;
Who, busied in his majesty, surveys
The singing masons building roofs of gold;
The civil citizens kneading up the honey;
The poor mechanic porters crowding in
Their heavy burdens at his narrow gate;
The sad-eyed justice, with his surly hum,
Delivering o'er to executors pale
The lazy yawning drone. —Shakespeare.

Beggar

He who begs timidly courts a refusal.—Seneca.

Aspiring beggary is wretchedness it self.—Goldsmith.

Sturdy beggars can bear stout denials.—Colton.

The real beggar is indeed the true and only king.—Lessing.

Better a living beggar than a buried emperor.—La Fontaine.

To get thine ends, lay bashfulness aside;
Who feares to aske, doth teach to be deny'd.
—Herrick.

A beggar that is dumb, you know,
May challenge double pity.
—Sir Walter Raleigh.

The adage must be verified—
That beggars mounted, run their horse to death. —Shakespeare.

Though our donations are made to please ourselves, we insist upon those who receive our alms being pleased with them.—Zimmermann.

Well, whiles I am a beggar I will rail
And say, there is no sin but to be rich;
And being rich, my virtue then shall be
To say, there is no vice but beggary.
—King John.

A beggar through the world am I,
From place to place I wander by,
Fill up my pilgrim's scrip for me,
For Christ's sweet sake and charity.
—Lowell.

He makes a beggar first that first relieves
him;
Not us'rers make more beggars where they live
Than charitable men that use to give.
—Heywood.

His house was known to all the vagrant
train,
He chid their wanderings but reliev'd their
pain;
The long remembered beggar was his guest,
Whose beard descending swept his aged breast. —Goldsmith.

He is never out of the fashion, or limpeth awkwardly behind it. He is not required to put on court mourning,

He weareth all colors, fearing none.
His costume hath undergone less change than the Quaker's. He is the only man in the universe who is not obliged to study appearances.—Lamb.

Beggar!—the only free men of our commonwealth,

Free above scot-free, that observe no laws,
Obey no governor, use no religion,
But what they draw from their own ancient custom,

Or constitute themselves, yet are no rebels.
—Broome.

Art thou a man, and shams't thou not to beg,

To practice such a servile kind of life?
Why, were thy education ne'er so mean,
Having thy limbs, a thousand fairer courses
Offer themselves to thy election.

Either the wars might still supply thy wants,
Or service of some virtuous gentleman,
Or honest labour; nay, what can I name
But would become thee better than to beg?
But men of thy condition feed on sloth,
As doth the beetle on the dung she breeds
in;

Not caring how the metal of your minds
Is eaten with the rust of idleness.

Now, after me, what e'er he be, that should Believe a person of thy quality,
While thou insist in this loose desp'rate
course,

I would esteem the sin not thine, but his.
—Ben Jonson.

In every civilized society there is found a race of men who retain the instincts of the aboriginal cannibal and live upon their fellow-men as a natural food.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Beginnings

What's well begun, is half done.—
Horace.

The principal part of everything is the beginning.—Law Maxim.

Whatever begins, also ends.—Seneca.

The distance is nothing; it is only the first step that costs.—Mme. du Deffand.

The beginnings of all things are small.—Cicero.

Still thou knowest that in the ardor of pursuit men lose sight of the goal from which they start.—Schiller.

Begin whatever you have to do: the beginning of a work stands for the whole.—Ausonius.

Thou beginnest better than thou endest. The last is inferior to the first.—Ovid.

Everything that has a beginning comes to an end.—Quintilian.

Resist beginnings: it is too late to employ medicine when the evil has grown strong by inveterate habit.—
Ovid.

Begin; to begin is half the work.
Let half still remain; again begin this,
and thou wilt have finished.—Ausonius.

Behavior

Behavior is the theory of manners practically applied.—Mme. Necker.

Behavior is a mirror, in which everyone shows his image.—Goethe.

Levity of behavior is the bane of all that is good and virtuous.—Seneca.

Venus herself, if she were bold, would not be Venus.—Apuleius.

Women should be doubly careful of their conduct, since appearances often injure them as much as real faults.—
Abbé Girard.

Wise men read very sharply all of your private history in your look and gait and behavior.—Emerson.

Oddities and singularities of behavior may attend genius; when they do, they are its misfortunes and its blemishes. The man of true genius will be ashamed of them; at least he will never affect to distinguish himself by whimsical peculiarities.—S. W. Temple.

Any man shall speak the better
when he knows what others have said, and sometimes the consciousness of his inward knowledge gives a confidence to his outward behavior, which of all other is the best thing to grace a man in his carriage.—Feltham.

Never put off till to-morrow what you can do to-day.

Never trouble another for what you can do yourself.

Never spend your money before you have it.

Never buy what you do not want because it is cheap.

Pride costs us more than hunger, thirst, and cold.

We seldom repent having eaten too little.

Nothing is troublesome that we do willingly.

How much pain the evils have cost us that have never happened!

Take things always by the smooth handle.

When angry, count ten before you speak; if very angry, a hundred.—Jefferson.

Belief

What ardently we wish we soon believe.—Young.

He who knows most believes the least.—Buckle.

What ardently we wish, we soon believe.—Young.

Now God be praised, that to believing souls, Gives light in darkness, comfort in despair! —Shakespeare.

He that will believe only what he can fully comprehend, must have a very long head, or a very short creed.—C. C. Colton.

Nothing is so firmly believed as what we least know.—Montaigne.

The region of the senses is the unbelieving part of the human soul.—George MacDonald.

You believe that easily which you hope for earnestly.—Terence.

The practical effect of a belief is the real test of its soundness.—Froude.

Men believe that willingly which they wish to be true.—Cæsar.

Being alone when one's belief is firm, is not to be alone.—Auerbach.

Belief consists in accepting the affirmations of the soul; unbelief, in denying them.—Emerson.

When in God thou believest, near God thou wilt certainly be.—C. G. Land.

All I have seen teaches me to trust the Creator for all I have not seen.—Emerson.

We are slow to believe that which if believed would hurt our feelings.—Ovid.

You do not believe, you only believe that you believe.—Coleridge.

The want of belief is a defect which ought to be concealed where it cannot be overcome.—Swift.

The more sincere we are in our belief, as a rule, the less demonstrative we are.—Beecher.

Belief is not a matter of choice, but of conviction.—R. G. Ingersoll.

Happy the man who sees a God employed in all the good and ills that checker life.—Cowper.

Till their own dreams at length deceive 'em, And oft repeating, they believe 'em. —Prior.

Begin by regarding every thing from a moral point of view, and you will end by believing in God.—Dr. Arnold.

And to add greater honours to his age Than man could give him, he died fearing God. —Shakespeare.

'Tis with our judgments as our watches; none Are just alike, yet each believes his own. —Pope.

O thou, whose days are yet all spring, Faith, blighted once, is past retrieving; Experience is a dumb, dead thing; The victory's in believing. —Lowell

Intellectually the difficulties of unbelief are as great as those of belief, while morally the argument is wholly on the side of belief.—Dr. T. Arnold Men ascribe a great value in the sight of God to their barren belief. Why are we so anxious that our neighbor should have our faith and not our practice?—Richter.

For fools are stubborn in their way,
As coins are harden'd by th' alloy;
And obstinacy's ne'er so stiff
As when 'tis in a wrong belief.

—Butler.

If you wish to be assured of the truth of Christianity, try it. Believe, and if thy belief be right, that insight which gradually transmutes faith into knowledge will be the reward of thy belief.—S. T. Coleridge.

It is a singular fact that most men of action incline to the theory of fatalism, while the greater part of men of thought believe in providence.—Balzac.

To believe is to be happy; to doubt is to be wretched. To believe is to be strong. Doubt cramps energy. Belief is power. Only so far as a man believes strongly, mightily, can he act cheerfully, or do any thing that is worth the doing.—F. W. Robertson.

There are three means of believing, —by inspiration, by reason, and by custom. Christianity, which is the only rational institution, does yet admit none for its sons who do not believe by inspiration.—Pascal.

They that deny a God destroy man's nobility; for certainly man is of kin to the beasts by his body; and, if he be not of kin to God by his spirit, he is a base and ignoble creature.—Bacon.

The great desire of this age is for a doctrine which may serve to condense our knowledge, guide our researches, and shape our lives, so that conduct may really be the consequence of belief.—G. H. Lewes.

The man who goes through life with an uncertain doctrine not knowing what he believes, what a poor, powerless creature he is! He goes around through the world as a man goes down through the street with a poor, wounded arm, forever dodging people he meets on the street for fear they may touch him.—Phillips Brooks.

A man may be a heretic in the truth; and if he believe things only because his pastor says so, or the assembly so determines, without knowing other reason, though his belief be true, yet the very truth he holds becomes his heresy.—Milton.

They believed—faith, I'm puzzled—I think I may call

Their belief a believing in nothing at all,
Or something of that sort; I know they all went

For a general union of total dissent.

—Lowell.

When, in your last hour (think of this), all faculty in the broken spirit shall fade away, and sink into inanity, —imagination, thought, effort, enjoyment,—then will the flower of belief, which blossoms even in the night, remain to refresh you with its fragrance in the last darkness.—Richter.

I am not afraid of those tender and scrupulous consciences, who are ever cautious of professing and believing too much; if they are sincerely in the wrong, I forgive their errors, and respect their integrity. The men I am afraid of are the men who believe everything, subscribe to everything, and vote for everything.—Bishop Shipley.

If that impression does not remain on this intrepid and powerful people, into whose veins all nations pour their mingling blood it will be our immense calamity. Public action, without it, will lose the dignity of consecration. Eloquence, without it, will miss what is loftiest, will give place to a careless and pulseless disquisition, or fall to the flatness of political slang. Life, without it, will lose its sacred and mystic charm. Society, without it, will fail of inspirations, and be drowned in an animalism whose rising tides will keep pace with its wealth.—R. S. Storrs.

Bells

For bells are the voice of the church;
They have tones that touch and search
The hearts of young and old.

—Longfellow.

The music highest bordering upon heaven.—Lamb.

Ring out the old, ring in the new,
Ring, happy bells, across the snow.
—Tennyson.

Ring out the darkness of the land,
Ring in the Christ that is to be.
—Tennyson.

That all-softening, overpowering knell,
The tocsin of the soul—the dinner bell.
—Byron.

When o'er the street the morning peal is flung
From yon tall belfry with the brazen tongue,
Its wide vibrations, wafted by the gale,
To each far listener tell a different tale.
—Holmes.

And the Sabbath bell,
That over wood and wild and mountain dell
Wanders so far, chasing all thoughts unholy
With sounds most musical, most melancholy.
—Samuel Rogers.

Those evening bells! those evening bells!
How many a tale their music tells,
Of youth, and home, and that sweet time,
When last I heard their soothing chime!
—Tom Moore.

There is in souls a sympathy with sounds;
How soft the music of those village bells,
Falling at intervals upon the ear
A cadence sweet, now dying all away.
—Cowper.

Bell, thou soundest merrily,
When the bridal party
To the church doth hie!
Bell, thou soundest solemnly,
When, on Sabbath morning,
Fields deserted lie!
—Longfellow.

The bells themselves are the best of preachers,
Their brazen lips are learned teachers,
From their pulpits of stone, in the upper air,
Sounding aloft, without crack or flaw,
Shriller than trumpets under the Law,
Now a sermon and now a prayer.
—Longfellow.

The cheerful Sabbath bells, wherever heard, Strike pleasant on the sense, most like the voice
Of one, who from the far-off hills proclaims tidings of good to Zion. —Charles Lamb.

And this be the vocation fit,
For which the founder fashioned it;
High, high above earth's life, earth's labor
E'en to the heaven's blue vault to soar.
To hover as the thunder's neighbor,
The very firmament explore.
To be a voice as from above
Like yonder stars so bright and clear,
That praise their Maker as they move,
And usher in the circling year.
Tun'd be its metal mouth alone
To things eternal and sublime,
And as the swift wing'd hours speed on May it record the flight of time!—Schiller.

Hear the mellow wedding bells,
Golden bells!
What a world of happiness their harmony
foretells
Through the balmy air of night
How they ring out their delight!
From the molten golden notes,
And all in tune
What a liquid ditty floats
To the turtle-dove that listens while she gloats
On the moon!
—Poe.

Benevolence

Rare benevolence, the minister of God.—Carlyle.

Giving is true having.—Spurgeon.

Learn the luxury of doing good.—
Goldsmith.

Great minds, like heaven, are pleased in doing good.—Rowe.

Our opportunities to do good are our talents.—Dr. Mather.

A noble deed is a step towards heaven.—J. G. Holland.

Honor the Lord with thy substance.

Benevolent people are always cheerful.—Father Taylor.

Try to be of some use to others.—
Bishop Hall.

Be charitable before wealth makes thee covetous.—Sir Thomas Browne.

A benefit is estimated according to the mind of the giver.—Seneca.

You will find people ready enough to do the Samaritan without the oil and twopence.—Sydney Smith.

Whatever we give to the wretched, we lend to fortune.—Seneca.

Carve your name on hearts, and not on marble.—Spurgeon.

When my friends are one-eyed, I look at their profile.—Joubert.

Genuine benevolence is not stationary, but peripatetic. It goeth about doing good.—Nevins.

How quickly a truly benevolent act is repaid by the consciousness of having done it!—Hosea Ballou.

Every charitable act is a stepping stone toward heaven.—Beecher.

The lower a man descends in his love, the higher he lifts his life.—W. R. Alger.

And chiefly for the weaker by the wall,
You bore that lamp of sane benevolence.
—Meredith.

Good, the more communicated, more abundant grows.—Milton.

Benevolence and feeling ennoble the most trifling actions.—Thackeray.

The more we give to others, the more are we increased.—Lao-Tze.

Our hands we open of our own free will, and the good flies, which we can never recall.—Goethe.

Liberality consists less in giving profusely than in giving judiciously.—Bruyère.

We should do good whenever we can and do kindness at all times, for at all times we can.—Joubert.

We should be careful that our benevolence does not exceed our means.—Cicero.

Doing good is the only certainly happy action of a man's life.—Sir P. Sidney.

The office of liberality consisteth in giving with judgment.—Cicero.

The secret pleasure of a generous act, is the great mind's great bribe.—Dryden.

As often as we do good, we offer sacrifice to God.—Aristotle.

A poor man served by thee shall make thee rich.—Mrs. Browning.

He who waits to do a great deal of good at once, will never do anything.—Samuel Johnson.

Men resemble the gods in nothing so much as in doing good to their fellow-creatures.—Cicero.

While selfishness joins hands with no one of the virtues, benevolence is allied to them all.—Goldsmith.

The entire world shall be populous with that action which saves one soul from despair.—Omar Khayam.

Good deeds in this life are coals raked up in embers, to make a fire next day.—Sir T. Overbury.

Being myself no stranger to suffering, I have learned to relieve the sufferings of others.—Virgil.

It is in contemplating man at a distance that we become benevolent.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Better to expose ourselves to ingratitude than fail in assisting the unfortunate.—Du Cœur.

He believed that he was born, not for himself, but for the whole world.—Lucan.

The Romans assisted their allies and friends, and acquired friendships by giving rather than receiving kindness.—Sallust.

If you realize an incentive to do a good thing, an act of benevolence, do it at once: do not put it off until to-morrow.—Henry Horne.

For his bounty, there was no winter in 't; an autumn 't was that grew the more by reaping.—Shakespeare.

A benefit consists not in what is done or given, but in the intention of the giver or doer.—Seneca.

Be generous, and pleasant-tempered, and forgiving; even as God scatters favors over thee, do thou scatter over the people.—Saadi.

There is no use of money equal to that of beneficence; here the enjoyment grows upon reflection.—Mackenzie.

Doubtless that is the best charity which, Nilus-like, hath the several streams thereof seen, but the fountain concealed.—Rev. T. Gouge.

Nothing is so wholesome, nothing does so much for people's looks, as a little interchange of the small coin of benevolence.—Ruffini.

—amid life's quests
That seems but worthy one—to do men good. —Bailey.

The greatest pleasure I know is to do a good action by stealth, and to have it found out by accident.—Lamb.

The best portion of a good man's life,—his little, nameless, unremembered acts of kindness and of love.—Wordsworth.

That is fine benevolence, finely executed, which, like the Nile, comes from hidden sources.—Colton.

Every virtue carries with it its own reward, but none in so distinguished and pre-eminent a degree as benevolence.

There is no beautifier of complexion or form or behavior, like the wish to scatter joy and not pain around us.—Emerson.

Proportion thy charity to the strength of thy estate, lest God proportion thy estate to the weakness of thy charity.—Quarles.

True benevolence is to love all men. Recompense injury with justice, and kindness with kindness.—Confucius.

Every fresh act of benevolence is the herald of deeper satisfaction; every charitable act a stepping-stone towards heaven.—Beecher.

By doing good with his money, a man, as it were, stamps the image of God upon it, and makes it pass current for the merchandise of heaven.—Rutledge.

So quickly sometimes has the wheel turned round, that many a man has lived to enjoy the benefit of that charity which his own piety projected.—Laurence Sterne.

Time is short, your obligations are infinite. Are your houses regulated, your children instructed, the afflicted relieved, the poor visited, the work of piety accomplished?—Massillon.

It is another's fault if he be ungrateful, but is mine if I do not give. To find one thankful man I will oblige a great many that are not so.—Seneca.

When thou seest thine enemy in trouble, curl not thy whiskers in contempt; for in every bone there is marrow, and within every jacket there is a man.—Saadi.

The disposition to give a cup of cold water to a disciple is a far nobler property than the finest intellect. Satan has a fine intellect, but not the image of God.—Howells.

The lessons of prudence have charms,
And slighted, may lead to distress;
But the man whom benevolence warms
Is an angel who lives but to bless.
—Bloomfield.

The only way to be loved is to be and to appear lovely; to possess and display kindness, benevolence, tenderness; to be free from selfishness and to be alive to the welfare of others.—Jay.

God will excuse our prayers for ourselves whenever we are prevented from them by being occupied in such good works as to entitle us to the prayers of others.—Colton.

We know who is benevolent by quite other means than the amount of subscription to soup societies. It is only low merits that can be enumerated.—Emerson.

The paternal and filial duties discipline the heart, and prepare it for the love of all mankind. The intensity of private attachment encourages, not prevents, universal benevolence.—Coleridge.

The benevolent affections owe much of their vigor to the frequency with which they are exercised, and to the pleasure by which they are attended.—Dr. Parr.

The conqueror is regarded with awe, the wise man commands our esteem, but it is the benevolent man who wins our affection.—From the French.

And 'tis not sure so full a benefit
Freely to give as freely to require.
A bounteous act hath glory following it,
They cause the glory that the act desire.
—Lady Carew.

A beneficent person is like a fountain watering the earth, and spreading fertility; it is, therefore, more delightful and more honorable to give than to receive.—Epicurus.

Benevolence is a duty. He who frequently practices it, and sees his benevolent intentions realized, at length comes really to love him to whom he has done good.—Kane.

He that does good to another does good also to himself, not only in the consequence, but in the very act; for the consciousness of well-doing is in itself ample reward.—Seneca.

There is scarcely a man who is not conscious of the benefits which his own mind has received from the performance of single acts of benevolence. How strange that so few of us try a course of the same medicine!—J. F. Boyes.

There cannot be a more glorious object in creation than a human being replete with benevolence, meditating in what manner he might render himself most acceptable to his Creator by doing most good to His creatures.—Fielding.

The poor must be wisely visited and liberally cared for, so that mendicancy shall not be tempted into mendacity, nor want exasperated into crime.—Robert C. Winthrop.

The charities of life are scattered everywhere, enameling the vales of human beings as the flowers paint the meadows. They are not the fruit of study, nor the privilege of refinement, but a natural instinct.—Bancroft.

The great Howard was so fully engaged in works of active benevolence, that, unlike Baxter, whose knees were calcined by prayer, he left himself but little time to pray. Thousands were praying for him.—Colton.

Open your hands, ye whose hands are full! The world is waiting for you! The whole machinery of the Divine beneficence is clogged by your hard hearts and rigid fingers. Give and spend, and be sure that God will send; for only in giving and spending do you fulfill the object of His sending.—J. G. Holland.

Never did any soul do good but it came readier to do the same again, with more enjoyment. Never was love or gratitude or bounty practiced but with increasing joy, which made the practitioner still more in love with the fair act.—Shaftesbury.

No sincere desire of doing good need make an enemy of a single human being; that philanthropy has surely a flaw in it which cannot sympathize with the oppressor equally as with the oppressed.—Lowell.

Poverty is the load of some, and wealth is the load of others, perhaps the greater load of the two. It may weigh them to perdition. Bear the load of thy neighbor's poverty, and let him bear with thee the load of thy wealth. Thou lightenest thy load by lightening his.—St. Augustine.

The opportunity of making happy is more scarce than we imagine; the punishment of missing it is, never to meet with it again; and the use we make of it leaves us an eternal sentiment of satisfaction or repentance.—Rousseau.

Never try to save out of God's cause; such money will canker the rest. Giving to God is no loss; it is putting your substance in the best bank. Giving is true having, as the old grave-stone said of the dead man "What I spent I had, what I saved I lost, what I gave I have."—C. H. Spurgeon.

There is no bounty to be showed to such. As have real goodness: Bounty is A spice of virtue; and what virtuous act Can take effect on them that have no power Of equal habitude to apprehend it?

—Ben Jonson.

As there are none so weak that we may venture to injure them with impunity, so there are none so low that they may not at some time be able to repay an obligation. Therefore, what benevolence would dictate, prudence would confirm.—Colton.

There is nothing that requires so strict an economy as our benevolence. We should husband our means as the agriculturist his manure, which, if he spread over too large a superficies, produces no crop,—if over too small a surface, exuberates in rankness and in weeds.—Colton.

Never lose a chance of saying a kind word. As Collingwood never saw a vacant place in his estate but he took an acorn out of his pocket and popped it in, so deal with your compliments through life. An acorn costs nothing; but it may sprout into a prodigious bit of timber.—Thackeray.

Animated by Christian motives and directed to Christian ends, it shall in no wise go unrewarded: here, by the testimony of an approving conscience: hereafter, by the benediction of our blessed Redeemer, and a brighter inheritance in His Father's house.—Bishop Mant.

The generous pride of virtue, Disdains to weigh too nicely the returns Her bounty meets with—like the liberal gods, From her own gracious nature she bestows, Nor stops to ask reward. —Thomson.

Men are not only prone to forget benefits; they even hate those who have obliged them, and cease to hate those who have injured them. The necessity of revenging an injury, or of recompensing a benefit seems a slavery to which they are unwilling to submit. —La Rochefoucauld.

The true source of cheerfulness is benevolence. The pursuits of mankind are commonly frigid and contemptible, and the mistake comes, at last, to be detected. But virtue is a charm that never fades. The soul that perpetually overflows with kindness and sympathy will always be cheerful.—Parke Godwin.

Rich people who are covetous are like the cypress-tree,—they may appear well, but are fruitless; so rich persons have the means to be generous, yet some are not so, but they should consider they are only trustees for what they possess, and should show their wealth to be more in doing good than merely in having it.—Bishop Hall.

There do remain dispersed in the soil of human nature divers seeds of goodness, of benignity, of ingenuity, which, being cherished, excited, and quickened by good culture, do, by common experience, thrust out flowers very lovely, and yield fruits very pleasant of virtue and goodness.—Barrow.

I have heard of a monk who in his cell had a glorious vision of Jesus revealed to him. Just then a bell rang, which called him away to distribute loaves of bread among the poor beggars at the gate. He was sorely tried as to whether he should lose a scene so inspiring. He went to his act of mercy: and when he came back the vision remained more glorious than ever.—T. L. Cuyler.

Every man who becomes heartily and understandingly a channel of the Divine beneficence is enriched through every league of his life. Perennial satisfaction springs around and within him with perennial verdure. Flowers of gratitude and gladness bloom all along his pathway, and the melodious gurgle of the blessings he bears is echoed back by the melodious waves of the recipient stream.—J. G. Holland.

He is good that does good to others. If he suffers for the good he does, he is better still; and if he suffers from them to whom he did good, he is arrived to that height of goodness that nothing but an increase of his sufferings can add to it; if it proves his death, his virtue is at its summit—it is heroism complete.—Brüyère.

Thy love shall chant itself its own beatitudes, after its own life working. A child-kiss, set on thy sighing lips, shall make thee glad; a poor man, served, by thee, shall make thee rich; a rich man, helped by thee, shall make thee strong; thou shalt be served thyself by every sense of service which thou renderest.—E. B. Browning.

My God, grant that my bounty may be a clear and transparent river, flowing from pure charity, and uncontaminated by self-love, ambition, or interest. Thanks are due not to me, but Thee, from whom all I possess is derived. And what are the paltry gifts for which my neighbor forgets to thank me, compared with the immense blessings for which I have so often forgotten to be grateful to Thee!—Gotthold.

You are so to put forth the power that God has given you; you are so to give, and sacrifice to give, as to earn the eulogium pronounced on the woman, "She hath done what she could." Do it now. It is not a safe thing to leave a generous feeling to the cooling influences of a cold world. If you intend to do a mean thing, wait till tomorrow; if you are to do a noble thing, do it now,—now!—Rev. Dr. Guthrie.

Think not the good,
The gentle deeds of mercy thou hast done,
Shall die forgotten all; the poor, the prisoner,
The fatherless, the friendless, and the widow,
Who daily own the bounty of thy hand,
Shall cry to heav'n and pull a blessing on thee.
—Rowe.

A life of passionate gratification is not to be compared with a life of active benevolence. God has so constituted our nature that a man cannot be happy unless he is, or thinks he is, a means of good. Judging from our own experience, we cannot conceive of a picture of more unutterable wretchedness than is furnished by one who knows that he is wholly useless in the world.—Rev. Erskine Mason.

The difference of the degrees in which the individuals of a great community enjoy the good things of life has been a theme of declaration and discontent in all ages; and it is doubtless our paramount duty, in every state of society, to alleviate the pressure of the purely evil part of this distribution, as much as possible, and, by all the means we can devise, secure the lower links in the chain of society from dragging in dishonor and wretchedness.—Herschel.

Benevolence is a duty. He who frequently practices it, and sees his benevolent intentions realized, at length comes really to love him to whom he has done good. When, therefore, it is said, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," it is not meant, thou shalt love him first and do him good in consequence of that love, but thou shalt do good to thy neighbor; and this thy benevolence will engender in thee that love to mankind which is the fullness and consummation of the inclination to do good.—Kant.

Benevolence is not in word and in tongue, but in deed and in truth. It is a business with men as they are, and with human life as drawn by the rough hand of experience. It is a duty which you must perform at the call of principle; though there be no voice of eloquence to give splendor to your exertions, and no music of poetry to lead your willing footsteps through the bowers of enchantment. It is not the impulse of high and ecstatic emotion. It is an exertion of principle. You must go to the poor man's cottage, though no verdure flourish around it, and no rivulet be nigh to delight you by the gentleness of its murmurs. If you look for the romantic simplicity of fiction you will be disappointed; but it is your duty to persevere in spite of every discouragement. Benevolence is not merely a feeling but a principle; not a dream of rapture for the fancy to indulge in, but a business for the hand to execute.—Chalmers.

Bereavement

A genuine faith lifts us above the bitterness of grief; a sense of Christ's living presence takes away all unbearable loneliness even when we are most alone. In our darkest hours, to know that our lost friend is still living, still loving us, still ours, in the highest and best sense, must be unspeakably consoling.—A. H. K.

Believe me, it is no time for words when the wounds are fresh and bleeding; no time for homilies when the lightning's shaft has smitten, and the man lies stunned and stricken. Then let the comforter be silent; let him sustain by his presence, not by his preaching; by his sympathetic silence, not by his speech.—George C. Lorimer.

Bible

All Scripture is given by inspiration of God.—Bible.

It speaks no less than God in every line.—Dryden.

A noble book! all men's book!—Carlyle.

This book of stars lights to eternal bliss.—George Herbert.

The Bible is common-sense inspired.—R. Howells.

Bibles laid open, millions of surprises.—George Herbert.

What can be nobler than the idea it gives us of the Supreme Being?—Addison.

The Bible stands alone in human literature in its elevated conception of manhood, in character and conduct.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Good, the more communicated, more abundant grows.—Milton.

Out from the heart of Nature rolled the burdens of the Bible old.—Emerson.

Within that awful volume lies
The mystery of mysteries.—Scott.

Like the needle to the north pole, the Bible points to heaven.—R. B. Nichol.

Other books we may read and criticize. To the Scriptures we must bow the entire soul, with all its faculties.—E. N. Kirk.

The Bible is to religion what the Iliad is to poetry.—Joubert.

The help, the guide, the balm of souls perplexed.—Arbutnot.

The history of every man should be a Bible.—Novalis.

Even the style of the Scriptures is more than human.—Steele.

Nobody ever outgrows Scripture; the book widens and deepens with our years.—Spurgeon.

O may my understanding ever read
This glorious volume, which thy wisdom made.—Dr. Young.

If thou desire to profit, read with humility, simplicity, and faithfulness; nor even desire the repute of learning.—Thomas à Kempis.

The books of men have their day and grow obsolete. God's word is like Himself, "the same yesterday, to-day, and forever."—R. Payne Smith.

The Bible is the most thought-suggesting book in the world. No other deals with such grand themes.—Herrick Johnson.

If the Bible is God's word, and we believe it, let us handle it with reverence.—John B. Gough.

A stream where alike the elephant may swim and the lamb may wade.—Gregory the Great.

The word of God tends to make large-minded, noble-minded men.—Henry Ward Beecher.

When you read the sacred Scriptures, or any other book, never think how you read, but what you read.—John Kemble.

The Bible is a window in this prison-world, through which we may look into eternity.—Timothy Dwight.

With the history of Moses no book in the world, in point of antiquity, can contend.—Tillotson.

Every leaf is a spacious plain; every line a flowing brook; every period a lofty mountain.—Hervey.

The best evidence of the Bible's being the word of God is to be found between its covers. It proves itself.—Charles Hodge.

The Scriptures were written, not to make us astronomers, but to make us saints.—Matthew Henry.

The Bible abounds in plain truth, expressed in plain language; in this it surpasses all other books.—Whelpley.

Merely reading the Bible is no use at all without we study it thoroughly, and hunt it through, as it were, for some great truth.—D. L. Moody.

One gem from that ocean is worth all the pebbles from earthly streams.—Robert McCheyne.

Intense study of the Bible will keep any man from being vulgar in point of style.—Coleridge.

A loving trust in the Author of the Bible is the best preparation for a wise study of the Bible.—H. Clay Trumbull.

If God is a reality, and the soul is a reality, and you are an immortal being, what are you doing with your Bible shut?—Herrick Johnson.

And in that charter reads with sparkling eyes,
Her title to a treasure in the skies.
—Cowper.

When you are reading a book in a dark room, and come to a difficult part, you take it to a window to get more light. So take your Bibles to Christ.—Robert McCheyne.

The reason why we find so many dark places in the Bible is, for the most part, because there are so many dark places in our hearts.—A. Tholuck.

The Scripture is to be its own interpreter, or rather the Spirit speaking in it; nothing can cut the diamond but the diamond; nothing can interpret Scripture but Scripture.—Richard Watson.

The grand old Book of God still stands; and this old earth, the more its leaves are turned over and pondered the more it will sustain and illustrate the Sacred word.—James D. Dana.

The English Bible—a book which, if every thing else in our language should perish, would alone suffice to show the whole extent of its beauty and power.—T. B. Macaulay.

If there be any thing in my style of thought to be commended, the credit is due to my kind parents in instilling into my mind an early love of the Scriptures.—Daniel Webster.

The Old and New Testaments contain but one scheme of religion. Neither part of this scheme can be understood without the other.—Richard Cecil.

Let your daughter have first of all the book of Psalms for holiness of heart, and be instructed in the Proverbs of Solomon for her godly life.—St. Jerome.

What other book besides the Bible could be heard in public assemblies from year to year, with an attention that never tires, and an interest that never cloy?—Robert Hall.

There was plainly wanting a divine revelation to recover mankind out of their universal corruption and degeneracy.—Dr. Samuel Clarke.

Here there is milk for babes, whilst there is manna for Angels; truth level with the mind of a peasant, truth soaring beyond the reach of a Seraph.—Rev. Hugh Stowell.

The Bible alone of all the books in the world, instead of uttering the opinions of the successive ages that produced it, has been the antagonist of these opinions.—Stuart Robinson.

The Bible is God's chart for you to steer by, to keep you from the bottom of the sea, and to show you where the harbor is, and how to reach it without running on rocks or bars.—H. W. Beecher.

In the Bible the ignorant may learn all requisite knowledge, and the most knowing may learn to discern their ignorance.—Boyle.

The most learned, acute, and diligent student cannot, in the longest life, obtain an entire knowledge of this one volume.—Sir Walter Scott.

The Scriptures teach us the best way of living, the noblest way of suffering, and the most comfortable way of dying.—Flavel.

There never was found, in any age of the world, either religion or law that did so highly exalt the public good as the Bible.—Bacon.

I call the Book of Job, apart from all theories about it, one of the grandest things ever written with pen.—Carlyle.

It is not simply a theological treatise, a code of laws, a religious homily, but the Bible—the book—while the only book for the soul, the best book for the mind.—Herrick Johnson.

A Bible and a newspaper in every house, a good school in every district—all studied and appreciated as they merit—are the principal support of virtue, morality and civil liberty.—Franklin.

It has God for its author, salvation for its end, and truth, without any mixture of error, for its matter: it is all pure, all sincere, nothing too much, nothing wanting.—Locke.

There are no songs comparable to the songs of Zion, no orations equal to those of the prophets, and no politics like those which the Scriptures teach.—Milton.

Learn the Bible through the Bible, the Old through the New Testament:

either can only be understood by the needs of thy own heart.—John von Müller.

Do you know a book that you are willing to put under your head for a pillow when you lie dying? Very well; that is the book you want to study while you are living. There is but one such book in the world.—Joseph Cook.

I never saw a useful Christian who was not a student of the Bible. If a man neglects his Bible, he may pray and ask God to use him in His work, but God cannot make much use of him, for there is not much for the Holy Ghost to work upon.—D. L. Moody.

Give the Bible the place in your families to which it is justly entitled, and then, through the unsearchable riches of Christ, many a household among you may hereafter realize that most blessed consummation, and appear a whole family in heaven.—H. A. Boardman.

The word of God is solid; it will stand a thousand readings; and the man who has gone over it the most frequently and the most carefully is the surest of finding new wonders there.—James Hamilton.

All that has been done to weaken the foundation of an implicit faith in the Bible, as a whole, has been at the expense of the sense of religious obligation, and at the cost of human happiness.—J. G. Holland.

God in tender indulgence to our different dispositions, has strewed the Bible with flowers, dignified it with wonders, and enriched it with delight.—James Hervey.

It is not hard for any man who hath a Bible in his hand to borrow good words and holy sayings in abundance; but to make them his own is a work of grace only from above.—Milton.

Does not the passage of Moses and the Israelites into the Holy Land yield incomparably more poetic variety than the voyages of Ulysses or Æneas?—Cowley.

Then for the style, majestic and divine,
It speaks no less than God in every line;
Commanding words; whose force is still the same

As the first fiat that produced our frame.
—Dryden.

Whence but from Heaven, could men unskill'd in arts,

In several ages born, in several parts,
Weave such agreeing truths? or how, or why

Should all conspire to cheat us with a lie?
—Dryden.

The increasing influence of the Bible is marvelously great, penetrating everywhere. It carries with it a tremendous power of freedom and justice guided by a combined force of wisdom and goodness.—Mori.

A glory gilds the sacred page,

Majestic like the sun,

It gives a light to every age;

It gives, but borrows none.

—Cowper.

All human discoveries seem to be made only for the purpose of confirming more strongly the truths come from on high, and contained in the sacred writings.—Herschel.

There is no passion that is not finely expressed in those parts of the inspired writings which are proper for divine songs and anthems.—Addison.

As the telescope is not a substitute for, but an aid to, our sight, so revelation is not designed to supersede the use of reason, but to supply its deficiencies.—Whately.

I am heartily glad to witness your veneration for a book which to say nothing of its holiness or authority, contains more specimens of genius and taste than any other volume in existence.—W. S. Landor.

In Job and the Psalms we shall find more sublime ideas, more elevated language, than in any of the heathen verifiers of Greece or Rome.—Dr. Watts.

We glory most in the fact, that Scripture so commends itself to the conscience, and experience so bears out the Bible, that the gospel can go the round of the world, and carry with it, in all its travel, its own mighty credentials.—Henry Melvill.

Wherever public worship has been established and regularly maintained, idolatry has vanished from the face of the earth. There is not now a temple to a heathen god where the word of God is read.—Bishop Simpson.

It is impossible to look into the Bible with the most ordinary attention without feeling that we have got into a moral atmosphere quite different from that which we breathe in the world, and in the world's literature.—Thomas Erskine.

High above all earthly lower happiness the blessedness of the eight Beatitudes towers into the heaven itself. They are white with the snows of eternity; they give a space, a meaning, a dignity to all the rest of the earth over which they brood.—Dean Stanley.

Wherever God's word is circulated, it stirs the hearts of the people, it prepares for public morals. Circulate that word, and you find the tone of morals immediately changed. It is God speaking to man.—Bishop Simpson.

The Bible, as a revelation from God, was not designed to give us all the information we might desire, nor to solve all the questions about which the human soul is perplexed, but to impart enough to be a safe guide to the haven of eternal rest.—Albert Barnes.

A man may read the figure on the dial, but he cannot tell how the day goes unless the sun shines on the dial; we may read the Bible over, but we cannot learn to purpose till the Spirit of God shine into our hearts.—Rev. T. Watson.

As the profoundest philosophy of ancient Rome and Greece lighted her taper at Israel's altar, so the sweetest strains of the pagan muse were swept from harps attuned on Zion's hill.—Bishop Thomson.

The Bible begins gloriously with Paradise, the symbol of youth, and ends with the everlasting kingdom, with the holy city. The history of every man should be a Bible.—Novallis.

Scholars may quote Plato in studies, but the hearts of millions shall quote the Bible at their daily toil, and draw strength from its inspiration, as the meadows draw it from the brook.—Conway.

O Word of God incarnate...

It is the golden casket

Where gems of truth are stored;

It is the heaven-drawn picture

Of Thee, the Living Word.

—William W. How.

So far as I ever observed God's dealings with my soul, the flights of preachers sometimes entertained me, but it was Scripture expressions which did penetrate my heart, and in a way peculiar to themselves.—J. Brown of Haddington.

The Bible is the most betrashed book in the world. Coming to it through commentaries is much like looking at a landscape through garret windows, over which generations of unmolested spiders have spun their webs.—Beecher.

I will answer for it, the longer you read the Bible, the more you will like it: It will grow sweeter and sweeter; and the more you get into the spirit of it, the more you will get into the spirit of Christ.—Romaine.

The Bible is a precious storehouse, and the Magna Charta of a Christian. There he reads of his Heavenly Father's love, and of his dying Saviour's legacies. There he sees a map of his travels through the wilderness, and a landscape, too, of Canaan.—Berridge.

Christianity claims that the supernatural is as reasonable as the natural, that man himself is supernatural as truly as he is natural, and that the Bible is so clearly the word of God by proofs that are unanswerable, that it is unreasonable to disbelieve its divine truths.—A. E. Kittredge.

I have carefully and regularly perused the Holy Scriptures, and am of opinion that the volume contains more sublimity, purer morality, more important history, and finer strains of eloquence, than can be collected from all other books, in whatever language they may have been written.—Sir William Jones.

In the poorest cottage are books,—is one book, wherein for several thousands of years the spirit of man has found light and nourishment and an interpreting response to whatever is deepest in him.—Carlyle.

There are two books laid before us to study, to prevent our falling into error; first, the volume of the Scriptures, which reveal the will of God; then the volume of the Creatures, which express His power.—Bacon.

There is not a book on earth so favorable to all the kind and to all the sublime affections, or so unfriendly to hatred and persecution, to tyranny, injustice, and every sort of malevolence, as the Gospel.—Beattie.

They who are not induced to believe and live as they ought by those discoveries which God hath made in Scriptures would stand out against any evidence whatever, even that of a messenger sent express from the other world.—Atterbury.

Men cannot be well educated without the Bible. It ought, therefore, to hold the chief place in every situation of learning throughout Christendom; and I do not know of a higher service that could be rendered to this republic than the bringing about this desirable result.—Dr. Nott.

It is belief in the Bible, the fruits of deep meditation, which has served me as the guide of my moral and literary life. I have found capital safely invested and richly productive of interest, although I have sometimes made but a bad use of it.—Goethe.

The translators of the Bible were masters of an English style much fitter for that work than any we see in our present writings; the which is owing to the simplicity that runs through the whole.—Swift.

The life-boat may have a tasteful bend and beautiful decoration, but these are not the qualities for which I prize it; it was my salvation from the howling sea! So the interest which a regenerate soul takes in the Bible is founded on a personal application to the heart of the saving truth which it contains.—J. W. Alexander.

For more than a thousand years the Bible, collectively taken, has gone hand in hand with civilization, science, law; in short, with the moral and intellectual cultivation of the species, always supporting and often leading the way.—Coleridge.

The Bible is a book of faith, and a book of doctrine, and a book of morals, and a book of religion, of special revelation from God; but it is also a book which teaches man his own individual responsibility, his own dignity, and his equality with his fellow man.—Daniel Webster.

In morality there are books enough written both by ancient and modern philosophers, but the morality of the Gospel doth so exceed them all that to give a man a full knowledge of true morality I shall send him to no other book than the New Testament.—Locke.

The pure and noble, the graceful and dignified, simplicity of language is nowhere in such perfection as in the Scriptures and Homer. The whole book of Job, with regard both to sublimity of thought and morality, exceeds, beyond all comparison, the most noble parts of Homer.—Pope.

If you are ever tempted to speak lightly or think lightly of it, just sit down and imagine what this world would be without it. No Bible! A wound and no cure, a storm and no covert, a condemnation and no shrift, a lost eternity and no ransom! Alas for us if this were all; alas for us if the ladder of science were the only stair to lead us up to God!—R. R. Meredith.

The Bible is not only the revealer of the unknown God to man, but His grand interpreter as the God of nature. In revealing God it has given us the key that unlocks the profoundest mysteries of creation, the clew by which to thread the labyrinth of the universe, the glass through which to look from nature up to nature's God.—L. J. Halsey.

The Psalms are an everlasting manual to the soul; the book of its immortal wishes, its troubles, its aspirations, and its hopes; sung in every tongue, and in every age; destined to endure while the universe of God has light, harmony, or grandeur, while man has religion or sensibility, while language has sublimity or sweetness.—Henry Giles.

As the moon, though darkened with spots, gives us a much greater light than the stars that seem all-luminous, so do the Scriptures afford more light than the brightest human authors. In them the ignorant may learn all requisite knowledge, and the most knowing may learn to discern their ignorance.—Boyle.

I use the Scriptures, not as an arsenal to be resorted to only for arms and weapons, but as a matchless temple, where I delight to contemplate the beauty, the symmetry, and the magnificence of the structure, and to increase my awe and excite my devotion to the Deity there preached and adored.—Boyle.

My own experience is that the Bible is dull when I am dull. When I am really alive, and set in upon the text with a tidal pressure of living affinities, it opens, it multiplies discoveries, and reveals depths even faster than I can note them. The worldly spirit shuts the Bible: the Spirit of God makes it a fire, flaming out all meanings and glorious truths.—Horace Bushnell.

All flesh is grass, and all the goodliness thereof is as the flower of the field: the grass withereth, the flower fadeth; because the spirit of the Lord bloweth upon it; surely the people is grass. The grass withereth, the flower fadeth, but the word of our God shall stand forever.—Isaiah xl. 6.

Within that awful volume lies
The mystery of mysteries!
Happiest they of human race,
To whom God has granted grace
To read, to fear, to hope, to pray,
To lift the latch and force the way;
And better had they ne'er been born,
Who read to doubt, or read to scorn.
—Scott.

All systems of morality are fine. The Gospel alone has exhibited a complete assemblage of the principles of morality divested of all absurdity. It is not composed, like your creed, of a few commonplace sentences put in bad verse. Do you wish to see that which is really sublime? Repeat the Lord's Prayer.—Napoleon I.

At the time when that odious style which deforms the writings of Hall and of Lord Bacon was almost universal, had appeared that stupendous work, the English Bible,—a book which, if everything else in our language should perish, would alone suffice to show the whole extent of its beauty and power.—Macaulay.

If an uninterested spectator, after a careful perusal of the New Testament, were asked what he conceived to be its distinguishing characteristic, he would reply, without hesitation, "That wonderful spirit of philanthropy by which it is distinguished." It is a perpetual commentary on that sublime aphorism, "God is love."—Robert Hall.

The main condition is that the spiritual ear should be open to overhear and patiently take in, and the will ready to obey that testimony which, I believe, God bears in every human heart, however dull, to those great truths which the Bible reveals. This, and not logic, is the way to grow in religious knowledge, to know that the truths of religion are not shadows, but deep realities.—J. C. Shairp.

How admirable and beautiful is the simplicity of the Evangelists! They never speak injuriously of the enemies of Jesus Christ, of His judges, nor of His executioners. They report the facts without a single reflection. They comment neither on their Master's mildness when He was smitten, nor on His constancy in the hour of His ignominious death, which they thus describe: "And they crucified Jesus."

—Racine.

What is the Bible in your house? It is not the Old Testament, it is not the New Testament, it is not the Gospel according to Matthew, or Mark, or Luke, or John; it is the Gospel according to William; it is the Gospel according to Mary; it is the Gospel according to Henry and James; it is the Gospel according to your name. You write your own Bible.—Beecher.

The Saviour who flitted before the patriarchs through the fog of the old dispensation, and who spake in time past to the fathers by the prophets, articulate but unseen, is the same Saviour who, on the open heights of the Gospel, and in the abundant daylight of this New Testament, speaks to us. Still all along it is the same Jesus, and that Bible is from beginning to end, all of it, the word of Christ.—James Hamilton.

The Bible is a treasure. It contains enough to make us rich for time and eternity. It contains the secret of happy living. It contains the key of heaven. It contains the title-deeds of an inheritance incorruptible, and that fadeth not away. It contains the pearl of great price. Nay, in so far as it reveals them as the portion of us sinful worms, it contains the Saviour and the living God Himself.—James Hamilton.

The Bible is a warm letter of affection from a parent to a child; and yet there are many who see chiefly the severer passages. As there may be fifty or sixty nights of gentle dews in one summer, that will not cause as much remark as one hailstorm of half an hour, so there are those who are more struck by those passages of the Bible that announce the indignation of God than by those that announce His affection.—T. DeWitt Talmage.

The parable of the prodigal son, the most beautiful fiction that ever was invented; our Saviour's speech to His disciples, with which He closed His earthly ministrations, full of the sublimest dignity and tenderest affection, surpass everything that I ever read; and like the spirit by which they were dictated, fly directly to the heart.—Cowper.

This Bible, then, has a mission, grander than any mere creation of God; for in this volume are infinite wisdom, and infinite love. Between its covers are the mind and heart of God; and they are for man's good, for his salvation, his guidance, his spiritual nourishment. If now I neglect my Bible, I do my soul a wrong; for the fact of this Divine message is evidence that I need it.—A. E. Kittredge.

The Bible is the treasure of the poor, the solace of the sick, and the support of the dying; and while other books may amuse and instruct in a leisure hour, it is the peculiar triumph of that book to create light in the midst of darkness, to alleviate the sorrow which admits of no other alleviation, to direct a beam of hope to the heart which no other topic of consolation can reach; while guilt, despair, and death vanish at the touch of its holy inspiration.—Robert Hall.

I cannot look around me without being struck with the analogy observable in the works of God. I find the Bible written in the style of His other books of Creation and Providence. The pen seems in the same hand. I see it, indeed, write at times mysteriously in each of these books; thus I know that mystery in the works of God is only another name for my ignorance. The moment, therefore, that I become humble, all becomes right.—Richard Cecil.

There are many persons of combative tendencies, who read for ammunition, and dig out of the Bible iron for balls. They read, and they find nitre and charcoal and sulphur for powder. They read, and they find cannon. They read, and they make portholes and embrasures. And if a man does not believe as they do, they look upon him as an enemy, and let fly the Bible at him to demolish him. So men turn the word of God into a vast arsenal, filled with all manner of weapons, offensive and defensive.—H. W. Beecher.

Many will say, "I can find God without the help of the Bible, or church, or minister." Very well. Do so if you can. The Ferry Company would feel no jealousy of a man who should prefer to swim to New York. Let him do so if he is able, and we will talk about it on the other shore; but probably trying to swim would be the thing that would bring him quickest to the boat. So God would have no jealousy of a man's going to heaven without the aid of the Bible, or church, or minister; but let him try to do so, and it will be the surest way to bring him back to them for assistance.—Beecher.

The Book, this Holy Book, on every line,
Mark'd with the seal of high divinity,
On every leaf bedew'd with drops of love
Divine, and with the eternal heraldry
And signature of God Almighty stamp'd
From first to last; this ray of sacred light,
This lamp, from off the everlasting throne,
Mercy took down, and in the night of time
Stood, casting on the dark her gracious bow;
And evermore beseeching men with tears
And earnest sighs, to read, believe and live.
—Pollok.

Eighteen centuries have passed since the Bible was finished. They have been centuries of great changes. In their course the world has been wrought over into newness at almost every point. But to-day the text of the Scriptures, after copyings almost innumerable and after having been tossed about through ages of ignorance and tumult, is found by exhaustive criticism to be unaltered in every important particular—there being not a single doctrine, nor duty, nor fact of any grade, that is brought into question by variations of readings—a fact that stands alone in the history of such ancient literature.—E. F. Burr.

We may persuade men that are infidels to receive the Scriptures as the word of God by rational arguments drawn from their antiquity; the heaviness of the matter; the majesty of the style; the harmony of all the parts though written in different ages; the exact accomplishment of prophecies;

the sublimity of the mysteries and matters contained in the word; the efficacy and power of it, in the conviction and conversion of multitudes; the scope of the whole,—to guide men to attain their chief end,—the glory of God in their own salvation; and the many miracles wrought for the confirmation of the truth of the doctrines contained in them.—Fisher's Catechism.

A single book has saved me; but that book is not of human origin. Long had I despised it, long had I deemed it a class-book for the credulous and ignorant, until, having investigated the Gospel of Christ, with an ardent desire to ascertain its truth or falsity, its pages proffered to my inquiries the simplest knowledge of man and nature, and the simplest and at the same time the most exalted system of moral ethics. Faith, hope and charity were enkindled in my bosom; and every advancing step strengthened me in the conviction that the morals of this book are as infinitely superior to human morals as its oracles are superior to human opinions.—M. L. Bautin.

Parents, I urge you to make the Bible the sweetest, the dearest book to your children; not by compelling them to read so many chapters each day, which will have the effect of making them hate the Bible, but by reading its pages with them, and by your tender parental love, so showing them the beauty of its wondrous incidents, from the story of Adam and Eve to the story of Bethlehem and Calvary, that no book in the home will be so dear to your children as the Bible; and thus you will be strengthening their minds with the sublimest truths, storing their hearts with the purest love, and sinking deep in their souls solid principles of righteousness, whose divine stones no waves of temptation can ever move.—A. E. Kittredge.

The Bible has been my guide in perplexity, and my comfort in trouble. It has roused me when declining, and animated me in languor. Other writings may be good, but they want certainty and force. The Bible carries its own credentials along with it, and proves spirit and life to the soul. In other writings I hear the words of a stranger or a servant. In the Bible I hear the language of my Father and my friend. Other books contain only the picture of bread. The Bible presents me with real manna, and feeds me with the bread of life.

You will want a book which contains not man's thoughts, but God's—not a book that may amuse you, but a book that can save you—not even a book that can instruct you, but a book on which you can venture an eternity—not only a book which can give relief to your spirit, but redemption to your soul—a book which contains salvation, and conveys it to you, one which shall at once be the Saviour's book and the sinner's.—John Selden.

Bigotry

Bigotry is chronic dogmatism.—Horace Greeley.

All looks yellow to the jaundiced eye.—Pope.

Bigotry dwarfs the soul by shutting out the truth.—Chapin.

Bigotry murders religion to frighten folks with her ghost.—Colton.

Every sect clamors for toleration when it is down.—Macaulay.

A man who stole the livery of the court of heaven to serve the devil in.—Pollok.

There is no tariff so injurious as that with which sectarian bigotry guards its commodities.—Chapin.

To follow foolish precedents, and wink
With both our eyes is easier than to think.—Cowper.

The superstition in which we were brought up never loses its power over us, even after we understand it.—Lessing.

A proud bigot, who is vain enough to think that he can deceive even God by affected zeal, and throwing the veil of holiness over vices, damns all mankind by the word of his power.—Boileau.

A man must be excessively stupid, as well as uncharitable, who believes there is no virtue but on his own side.—Addison.

The bigot is like the pupil of the eye, the more light you put upon it, the more it will contract.—O. W. Holmes.

Show me the man who would go to heaven alone if he could, and in that man I will show you one who will never be admitted into heaven.—Felt-ham.

Unwillingness to acknowledge what-ever is good in religion foreign to our own has always been a very common trait of human nature; but it seems to me neither generous nor just.—Mrs. L. M. Child.

Mr. T. sees religion, not as a sphere, but as a line, and it is the identical line in which he is moving. He is like an African buffalo,—sees right forward, but nothing on the right hand or on the left.—John Foster.

Persecuting bigots may be compared to those burning lenses which Lenhen-hoeck and others composed from ice; by their chilling apathy they freeze the suppliant; by their fiery zeal they burn the sufferer.—Colton.

Soon their crude notions with each other fought,
The adverse sect deny'd what this had taught,
And he at length the amplest triumph gain'd,
Who contradicted what the last maintain'd.
—Prior.

She has no head, and cannot think; no heart, and cannot feel. When she moves, it is in wrath; when she pauses, it is amid ruin; her prayers are curses—her God is a demon—her communion is death—her vengeance is eter-nity—her decalogue, written in the blood of her victims; and if she stops for a moment in her infernal fight, it is upon a kindred rock, to whet her vulture fang for a more sanguinary desolation.—Daniel O'Connell.

The doctrine which, from the very first origin of religious dissensions, has been held by bigots of all sects, when condensed into a few words and stripped of rhetorical disguise, is simply this: I am in the right, and you are in the wrong. When you are the stronger, you ought to tolerate me, for it is your duty to tolerate truth; but when I am the stronger, I shall perse-cute you, for it is my duty to persecute error.—Macaulay.

Biography

There is properly no history, only biography.—Emerson.

Biography is the best form of his-tory.—H. W. Shaw.

Some one calls biography the home aspect of history.—Beecher.

A true delineation of the smallest man is capable of interesting the great-est man.—Carlyle.

One anecdote of a man is worth a volume of biography.—Channing.

A life that is worth writing at all is worth writing minutely.—Longfellow.

To be ignorant of the lives of the most celebrated men of antiquity is to continue in a state of childhood all our days.—Plutarch.

The great lesson of biography is to show what man can be and do at his best. A noble life put fairly on record acts like an inspiration to others.—Samuel Smiles.

The cabinets of the sick and the closets of the dead have been ransacked to publish private letters and divulge to all mankind the most secret senti-ments of friendship.—Pope.

Our Grub-street biographers watch for the death of a great man like so many undertakers on purpose to make a penny of him.—Addison.

Occasionally a single anecdote opens a character: biography has its com-parative anatomy, and a saying or a sentiment enables the skilful hand to construct the skeleton.—Willmott.

The lives of great men cannot be writ with any tolerable degree of elegance or exactness within a short time after their decease.—Addison.

My advice is to consult the lives of other men as we would a looking-glass, and from thence fetch examples for our own imitation.—Terence.

Rich as we are in biography, a well-written life is almost as rare as a well-spent one; and there are certainly many more men whose history deserves to be recorded than persons willing and able to record it.—Carlyle.

Of all the species of literary composition, perhaps biography is the most delightful. The attention concentrated on one individual gives a unity to the materials of which it is composed, which is wanting in general history.—Robert Hall.

I should dread to disfigure the beautiful ideal of the memories of illustrious persons with incongruous features, and to sully the imaginative purity of classical works with gross and trivial recollections.—Wordsworth.

History can be formed from permanent monuments and records; but lives can only be written from personal knowledge, which is growing every day, less, and in a short time is lost forever.—Dr. Johnson.

Biographies of great, but especially of good men are most instructive and useful as helps, guides, and incentives to others. Some of the best are almost equivalent to gospels,—teaching high living, high thinking, and energetic action, for their own and the world's good.—Samuel Smiles.

Biography, especially the biography of the great and good, who have risen by their own exertions from poverty and obscurity to eminence and usefulness, is an inspiring and ennobling study. Its direct tendency is to reproduce the excellence it records.—Horace Mann.

The parallel circumstances and kindred images to which we readily conform our minds are, above all other writings, to be found in the lives of particular persons, and therefore no species of writing seems more worthy of cultivation than biography.—Dr. Johnson.

As in the case of painters, who have undertaken to give us a beautiful and graceful figure, which may have some slight blemishes, we do not wish them to pass over such blemishes altogether, nor yet to mark them too prominently. The one would spoil the beauty, and the other destroy the likeness of the picture.—Plutarch.

The business of the biographer is often to pass slightly over those performances and incidents which produce vulgar greatness, to lead the thoughts into domestic privacies, and display the minute details of daily life, where exterior appendages are cast aside, and men excel each other only by prudence and virtue.—Dr. Johnson.

Of all studies, the most delightful and the most useful is biography. The seeds of great events lie near the surface; historians delve too deep for them. No history was ever true. Lives I have read which, if they were not, had the appearance, the interest, and the utility of truth.—Landor.

Much that is published as a novel is only anonymous biography. Many a man who is a bore in conversation may have qualities which give indescribable charms to narrative; and the egotist, if he only have the art to conceal his identity, can then hold the reader by the powerful grasp of sympathy.—R. S. Mackenzie.

As it often happens that the best men are but little known, and consequently cannot extend the usefulness of their examples a great way, the biographer is of great utility, as, by communicating such valuable patterns to the world, he may perhaps do a more extensive service to mankind than the person whose life originally afforded the pattern.—Fielding.

Birds

A bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter.—Ecclesiastes.

The little birds have God for their caterer.—Cervantes.

Was never secret history but birds tell it in the bowers.—Emerson.

I was always a lover of soft-winged things.—Victor Hugo.

Hear how the birds, on ev'ry blooming spray,
With joyous musick wake the dawning day!
—Pope.

And hark, how blithe the throstle sings! He, too, is no mean preacher.—Wordsworth.

Teach me, O lark! with thee to greatly rise,
To exalt my soul and lift it to the skies.
—Burke.

Fowls, by winter forced, forsake the floods,
and wing their hasty flight to happier lands.—Dryden.

With sonorous notes
Of every tone, mix'd in confusion sweet,
Our forest rings. —Carlos Wilcox.

A light broke in upon my soul—
It was the carol of a bird;
It ceased—and then it came again
The sweetest song ear eve heard.
—Byron.

The birds, great Nature's nappy commoners, that haunt in woods, in meads,
and flowery gardens, rifle the sweets and taste the choicest fruits.—Rowe.

See the enfranchised bird, who wildly springs,

With a keen sparkle in his glowing eye
And a strong effort in his quivering wings,
Up to the blue vault of the happy sky.
—Mrs. Norton.

Do you ne'er think what wondrous beings these?

Do you ne'er think who made them, and who taught

The dialect they speak, where melodies
Alone are the interpreters of thought?
Whose household words are songs in many keys,

Sweeter than instrument of man e'er caught!
—Longfellow.

The nightingale, if he should sing by day,
when every goose is cackling,
would be thought no better a musician than the wren. How many things by season seasoned are to their right praise and true perfection!—Shakespeare.

Birds, the free tenants of earth, air, and ocean,
Their forms all symmetry, their motions grace,
In plumage delicate and beautiful,
Thick without burthen, close as fish's scales,
Or loose as full blown poppies on the gale;
With wings that seem as they'd a soul within them,
They bear their owners with such sweet enchantment.
—James Montgomery.

Birth — Birthplace

Birth is a shadow. Courage, self-sustained, outlords succession's phlegm, and needs no ancestors.—Aaron Hill.

We forget the origin of a parvenu if he remembers it; we remember it if he forgets it.—J. Petit-Senn.

A noble birth and fortune, though they make not a bad man good, yet they are a real advantage to a worthy one, and place his virtues in a fairer light.—Lillo.

Called to the throne by the voice of the people, my maxim has always been,
A career open to talent without distinction of birth. It is this system of equality for which the European oligarchy detests me.—Napoleon.

While man is growing, life is in decrease;
And cradles rock us nearer to the tomb.
Our birth is nothing but our death begun.
—Young.

No distinction is 'tween man and man,
But as his virtues add to him a glory
Or vices cloud him. —Habbington.

What is birth to a man if it shall be a stain to his dead ancestors to have left such an offspring?—Sir P. Sidney.

When real nobleness accompanies that imaginary one of birth, the imaginary seems to mix with real, and becomes real, too.—Greville.

High birth is a gift of fortune which should never challenge esteem towards those who receive it, since it costs them neither study nor labor.—Bruyère.

Custom forms us all; our thoughts, our morals, our most fixed belief, are consequences of our place of birth.—
Aaron Hill.

Verily, I swear, it is better to be lowly born, and range with humble livers in content, than to be perked up in a glistening grief, and wear a golden sorrow.—Shakespeare.

I've learned to judge of men by their own
deeds;

I do not make the accident of birth
The standard of their merit.—Mrs. Hale.

Whatever strengthens our local attachments is favorable both to individual and national character, our home, our birthplace, our native land. Think for a while what the virtues are which arise out of the feelings connected with these words, and if you have any intellectual eyes, you will then perceive the connection between topography and patriotism.—Southey.

Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting;
The soul that rises with us, our life's Star,
Hath had elsewhere its setting,
And cometh from afar;
Not in entire forgetfulness,
And not in utter nakedness,
But trailing clouds of glory, do we come
From God, who is our home.
Heaven lies about us in our infancy.
* * * * *

At length the man perceives it die away,
And fade into the light of common day.
—Wordsworth.

Those who wish to forget painful thoughts do well to absent themselves for a while from the ties and objects that recall them; but we can be said only to fulfill our destiny in the place that gave us birth.—Hazlitt.

Birthday

Heaven give you many, many merry days!—Shakespeare.

And send him many years of sunshine days!—Shakespeare.

And more such days as these to us befall!—Shakespeare.

This day shall change all griefs and quarrels into love.—Shakespeare.

Oh! be thou blest with all that Heaven can send,
Long health, long youth, long pleasure—
and a friend. —Pope.

Pleas'd to look forward, pleas'd to look behind,
And count each birthday with a grateful mind. —Pope.

The day
For whose returns, and many, all these pray;
And so do I. —B. Jonson.

The birth of a child is the imprisonment of a soul.—Simms.

Is that a birthday? 'tis, alas! too clear;
'Tis but the funeral of the former year.
—Pope.

Yet all I've learnt from hours rife
With painful brooding here,
Is, that amid this mortal strife,
The lapse of every year
But takes away a hope from life,
And adds to death a fear.
—Hoffman.

My birthday!—what a different sound
That word had in my youthful ears;
And how each time the day comes round,
Less and less white its mark appears.
—Moore.

Believing hear, what you deserve to hear,
Your birthday as my own to me is dear.
Blest and distinguish'd days! which we should prize
The first, the kindest bounty of the skies.
But yours gives most; for mine did only lend
Me to the world; yours gave to me a friend.
—Martial.

As this auspicious day began the race
Of ev'ry virtue join'd with ev'ry grace;
May you, who own them, welcome its return,
Till excellence, like yours, again is born.
The years we wish, will half your charms impair;
The years we wish the better half will spare;
The victims of your eyes will bleed no more,
But all the beauties of your mind adore.
—Jeffrey.

Blackbird

The birds have ceased their songs,
All save the blackbird, that from yon tall
ash,
'Mid Pinkie's greenery, from his mellow throat,
In adoration of the setting sun,
Chants forth his evening hymn. —Moir.

O Blackbird! sing me something well:
While all the neighbors shoot thee round,
I keep smooth plats of fruitful ground,
Where thou may'st warble, eat and dwell.
—Tennyson.

Golden Bill! Golden Bill!
Lo, the peep of day;
All the air is cool and still,
From the elm-tree on the bill,
Chant away:
* * *

Let thy loud and welcome lay
Pour away
Few notes but strong.
—Montgomery.

How sweet the harmonies of the afternoon!
The Blackbird sings along the sunny breeze
His ancient song of leaves, and summer
boon;
Rich breath of hayfields streams thro'
whispering trees;
And birds of morning trim their bustling
wings,
And listen fondly—while the Blackbird sings.
—Frederick Tennyson.

Blacksmith

And he sang: "Hurra for my handiwork!"
And the red sparks lit the air;
Not alone for the blade was the bright steel made;
And he fashioned the first ploughshare.
—Chas. Mackay.

Under a spreading chestnut tree
The village smithy stands;
The smith a mighty man is he,
With large and sinewy hands;
And the muscles of his brawny arms
Are strong as iron bands.
—Longfellow.

And the smith his iron measures hammered
to the anvil's chime;
Thanking God, whose boundless wisdom makes the flowers of poesy bloom
In the forge's dust and cinders, in the tissues of the loom. —Longfellow.

Blame

Man only blames himself in order that he may be praised.—La Roche-foucauld.

A man takes contradiction and advice much more easily than people think, only he will not bear it when violently given, even though it be well founded. Hearts are flowers, they remain open to the soft-falling dew, but shut up in the violent downpour of rain.—Richter.

Blandishment

The maiden's blush lights the volcano in the lover's heart.—De Finod.

Charms strike the sight, but merit wins the soul.—Pope.

One only needs to see a smile in a white crape bonnet in order to enter the palace of dreams.—Victor Hugo.

For beauty is the bait which, with delight, doth man allure for to enlarge his kind.—Spenser.

Expression alone can invest beauty with supreme and lasting command over the eye.—Fusell.

Admiration and love are like being intoxicated with champagne; judgment and friendship are like being enlivened.
—Dr. Johnson.

Her eyes, her lips, her cheeks, her shape, her features, seem to be drawn by Love's own hand; by Love himself in love.—Dryden.

Her face had a wonderful fascination in it. It was such a calm, quiet face, with the light of the rising soul shining so peacefully through it.—
Longfellow.

The most fascinating women are those that can most enrich the everyday moments of existence. In a particular and attaching sense, they are those that can partake our pleasures and our pains in the liveliest and most devoted manner. Beauty is little without this; with it she is triumphant.—
Leigh Hunt.

In the age of chivalry it was the beauty of woman alone that wrestled successfully against barbarism. She softened the rude manners of the warriors, and inspired the valorous knight with courage, generosity and honor, thus civilizing by the influence of her charms those whose hearts could not be touched by any other human power.—
Alexander Walker.

Blessedness

True blessedness consisteth in a good life and a happy death.—Solon.

He alone is blessed who never was born.—Prior.

The harvest song of inward peace.—Mrs. Barbauld.

'T is not for mortals, always to be blest.—Armstrong.

Blest is he whose heart is the home of the great dead and their great thoughts.—Bailey.

Blessedness is a whole eternity older than damnation.—Richter.

And let me tell you that every misery I miss is a new blessing.—Izaak Walton.

Blessedness consists in the accomplishment of our desires, and in our having only regular desires.—St. Augustine.

There is in man a higher than love of happiness; he can do without happiness, and instead thereof find blessedness.—Carlyle.

The beloved of the Almighty are the rich who have the humility of the poor, and the poor who have the magnanimity of the rich.—Saadi.

Blessings

Ill blows the wind that profits nobody.—Shakespeare.

Fall silently like dew on roses.—Dryden.

The blessing of the Lord, it maketh rich, and He addeth no sorrow with it.—Proverbs x. 22.

I dimly guess, from blessings known, of greater out of sight.—Whittier.

Blessings star forth forever; but a curse is like a cloud, it passes.—Bailey.

The benediction of these covering heavens fall on their heads like dew.—Shakespeare.

Words are as they are taken, and things are as they are used. There are even cursed blessings.—Bishop Hall.

A man's best things are nearest him, lie close about his feet.—R. M. Milnes.

Our blessings are the least heeded, because the most common events of life.—Hosea Ballou.

We mistake the gratuitous blessings of heaven for the fruits of our own industry.—L'Estrange.

How blessings brighten as they take their flight!—Young.

For blessings ever wait on virtuous deeds, And though a late, a sure reward succeeds.—Congreve.

Blessings on him who invented sleep.—Cervantes.

Reflect upon your present blessings, of which every man has many; not on your past misfortunes, of which all men have some.—Dickens.

To heal divisions, to relieve the oppress'd, In virtue rich; in blessing others, bless'd.—Homer.

Men live best upon a little; Nature has given to all the privilege of being happy, if they but knew how to use their gifts.—Claudianus.

Amid my list of blessings infinite, Stands this the foremost, "That my heart has bled."—Young.

Prosperity is the blessing of the Old Testament; Adversity is the blessing of the New.—Bacon.

Of many imagined blessings it may be doubted whether he that wants or possesses them had more reason to be satisfied with his lot.—Dr. Johnson.

Even the best things ill used become evils; and, contrarily, the worst things used well prove good.—Bishop Hall.

The blessings of fortune are the lowest; the next are the bodily advantages of strength and health; but the superlative blessings, in fine, are those of the mind.—L'Estrange.

The good things of life are not to be had singly, but come to us with a mixture: like a school-boy's holiday, with a task affixed to the tail of it.—Charles Lamb.

Not to understand a treasure's worth,
Till time has stolen away the slightest good,
Is cause of half the poverty we feel,
And makes the world the wilderness it is.
—Cowper.

It is too generally true that all that is required to make men unmindful what they owe to God for any blessing is that they should receive that blessing often enough and regularly enough.
—Bishop Whately.

Blessings we enjoy daily; and for most of them, because they be so common, most men forget to pay their praises; but let not us, because it is a sacrifice so pleasing to Him that made the sun and us, and still protects us, and gives us flowers and showers and meat and content.—Izaak Walton.

Blessings be with them, and eternal praise
Who gave us nobler loves, and nobler cares,
The poets, who on earth have made us heirs
Of truth and pure delight, by heavenly lays.
—Wordsworth.

Nothing raises the price of a blessing like its removal; whereas it was its continuance which should have taught us its value. There are three requisitions to the proper enjoyment of earthly blessings,—a thankful reflection on the goodness of the Giver, a deep sense of our unworthiness, a recollection of the uncertainty of long possessing them. The first would make us grateful: the second, humble; and the third, moderate.—Hannah More.

Heaven may have happiness as utterly unknown to us as the gift of perfect vision would be to a man born blind. If we consider the inlets of pleasure from five senses only, we may be sure that the same Being who created us could have given us five hundred, if He had pleased.—Colton.

Blindness

O loss of sight, of thee I most complain!
Blind among enemies, O worse than chains,
Dungeon, or beggary, or decrepit age!
—Milton.

None so blind as those that will not see.—Mathew Henry.

He that is stricken blind cannot forget
The precious treasure of his eyesight lost.
—Shakespeare.

But love is blind, and lovers cannot see
The pretty follies that themselves commit.
—Shakespeare.

O dark, dark, dark, amid the blaze of noon,
Irrecoverably dark! total eclipse,
Without all hope of day.
—Milton.

He whom nature thus bereaves,
Is ever fancy's favourite child;
For thee enchanted dreams she weaves
Of changeful beauty, bright and wild.
—Mrs. Osgood.

Oh, say! what is that thing called light,
Which I must ne'er enjoy?
What are the blessings of the sight?
Oh, tell your poor blind boy!
—Colley Cibber.

Ye have a world of light,
When love in the loved rejoices;
But the blind man's home is the house of night,
And its beings are empty voices.
—Bulwer.

These eyes tho' clear
To outward view of blemish or of spot,
Bereft of light, their seeing have forgot.
Nor to their idle orbs doth sight appear
Of sun, or moon, or star, throughout the year,
Or man, or woman. Yet I argue not Against Heaven's hand or will, nor have a jot
Of heart or hope; but still bear up and steer Right onward.
—Milton.

O happiness of blindness! now no beauty
Inflames my lust; no other's goods my envy,
Or misery my pity; no man's wealth
Draws my respect; nor poverty my scorn,
Yet still I see enough! man to himself
Is a large prospect, raised above the level
Of his low creeping thoughts; if then I have A world within myself, that world shall be My empire; there I'll reign, commanding freely,
And willingly obey'd, secure from fear
Of foreign forces, or domestic treasons.
—Denham.

The blindness of men is the most dangerous effect of their pride: it seems to nourish and augment it: it deprives them of knowledge of remedies which can solace their miseries and can cure their faults.—La Rochefoucauld.

This fellow must have a rare understanding;
For nature recompenseth the defects
Of one part with redundancy in another;
Blind men have excellent memories, and the tongue
Thus indisposed, there's treasure in the intellect.
—Shirley.

Bliss

The bliss that can be told is but half-bliss.—Bulwer-Lytton.

And for our country 'tis a bliss to die.—Homer.

Every one speaks of it,—who has known it?—Mme. Necker.

Pure felicity is reserved for the heavenly life; it grows not in an earthly soil.—Chapin.

Who falls from all he knows of bliss, cares little into what abyss.—Byron.

The way to bliss lies not on beds of down, And he that had no cross deserves no crown.
—Quarles.

Some place the bliss in action, some in ease, Those call it pleasure, and contentment these.
—Pope.

Though duller thoughts succeed, the bliss e'en of a moment still is bliss.—Joanna Baillie.

Vain, very vain, my weary search to find That bliss which only centres in the mind.
—Goldsmith.

Domestic happiness, thou only bliss Of Paradise, that has survived the fall!
—Cowper.

We may anticipate bliss, but who ever drank of that enchanted cup unalloyed?—Colton.

Condition, circumstance, is not the thing; Bliss is the same in subject or in king.
—Pope.

Health is the vital principle of bliss, And exercise of health.
—Thomson.

The happiest woman sees not gladness alone reflected from her mirror;

its surface will inevitably be sometimes dimmed with sighs.—Mme. Louise Collet.

Alas! by some degree of woe
We every bliss must gain;
The heart can ne'er a transport know,
That never feels a pain.
—Lord Lyttleton.

Bliss in possession will not last;
Remember'd joys are never past;
At once the fountain, stream, and sea,
They were,—they are,—they yet shall be.
—Montgomery.

Blockhead

Heaven and earth fight in vain against a dunce!—Schiller.

A blockhead cannot come in, nor go away, nor sit, nor rise, nor stand, like a man of sense.—Bruyère.

There never was any party, faction, sect, or cabal whatsoever, in which the most ignorant were not the most violent; for a bee is not a busier animal than a blockhead.—Pope.

Blood

Blood is a juice of rarest quality.—Goethe.

There is no caste in blood.—Edwin Arnold.

Blood follows blood.—De Foe.

Some kind of pace may be got out of the veriest jade by the near prospect of oats; but the thoroughbred has the spur in his blood.—Lowell.

Noble blood! bah! What blood is more noble or so pure as that of the lion? And yet he is only a brute. It is merit, education and virtue, not blood, that lift men above the level of the brutes.—Michael le Faucheur.

Bluebell

Oh! roses and lilies are fair to see;
But the wild bluebell is the flower for me.
—Louisa A. Meredith.

Hang-head Bluebell,
Bending like Moses' sister over Moses,
Full of a secret that thou dar'st not tell!
—George MacDonald.

Bluebird

Whither away, Bluebird,
 Whither away?
 The blast is chill, yet in the upper sky,
 Thou still canst find the color of thy wing,
 The hue of May.
 Warbler, why speed thy southern flight? ah,
 why,
 Thou too, whose song first told us of the Spring?
 Whither away?
 —E. C. Stedman.

Bluntness

I have neither wit, nor words, nor worth,
 Nor actions, nor utterance, nor the power of speech,
 To stir men's blood: I only speak right on.
 —Shakespeare.

This is some fellow,
 Who having been prais'd for bluntness, doth affect
 A saucy roughness, and constrains the garb,
 Quite from his nature: he can't flatter, he!
 An honest mind and plain,—he must speak truth!
 And they will take it so; if not he's plain.
 These kind of knaves I know, which in this plainness
 Harbor more craft, and far corrupter ends,
 Than twenty silly, ducking observants,
 That stretch their duty nicely.
 —Shakespeare.

Blushes

The heart's meteors tilting in the face.—Shakespeare.

Blushes are the rainbow of modesty.
 —Mme. Necker.

The sunset glow of self-possession.—
 Chamfort.

Young roses kindled into thought.—
 Moore.

Blushing is the livery of virtue.—
 Bacon.

Blushes are the echo of sensibility.—
 Mme. de Salm.

The glow of the angel in woman.—
 Mrs. Balfour.

Innocence is not accustomed to blush.
 —Molière.

The lily and the rose in her fair face striving for precedence.—N. P. Willis.

Blushes cannot be counterfeited.—
 Marguerite de Valois.

The man that blushes is not quite a brute.—Young.

Do good by stealth, and blush to find it fame.—Pope.

Such war of white and red within her cheeks.—Shakespeare.

The bloom of young desire and purple light of love.—Gay.

A blush is the sign which Nature hangs out to show where chastity and honor dwell.—Gotthold.

Men blush less for their crimes than for their weaknesses and vanity.—La Bruyère.

The lilies faintly to the roses yield.
 As on thy lovely cheek, they struggling vie.
 —Hoffman.

The rose was budded in her cheek
 just opening to the view.—Mallet.

The inconvenience or the beauty of the blush, which is the greater?—
 Madame Necker.

One blushes oftener from the wounds of self-love than from modesty.—Mme.
 Guibert.

The blush is beautiful, but it is some times inconvenient.—Goldoni.

Like the last beam of evening thrown on a white cloud, just seen and gone.—
 Walter Scott.

They teach us to dance; O that they could teach us to blush, did it cost a guinea a glow!—Madame Deluzy.

Playful blushes, that seemed nought
 But luminous escapes of thought.
 —Moore.

The ambiguous livery worn alike by modesty and shame.—Mrs. Balfour.

A blush is no language; only a dubious flag-signal which may mean either of two contradictories.—George Eliot

On her cheek blushes the richness of an autumn sky with ever-shifting beauty.—Longfellow.

Like the faint streaks of light broke loose from darkness, and dawning into blushes.—Dryden.

The rising blushes, which her cheek o'er-spread,
Are opening roses in the lily's bed.

—Gay.

The eloquent blood spoke in her cheeks, and so distinctly wrought, you might have almost said her body thought.—Donne.

The blush is nature's alarm at the approach of sin, and her testimony to the dignity of virtue.—Fuller.

Troubled blood through his pale face was seen to come and go, with tidings from his heart, as it a running messenger had been.—Spenser.

Bid the cheek be ready with a blush, modest as Morning when she coldly eyes the youthful Phæbus.—Shakespeare.

A faint blush melting through the light of thy transparent cheek like a rose-leaf bathed in dew.—Whittier.

From every blush that kindles in thy cheeks,
Ten thousand little loves and graces spring
To revel in the roses. —Nicholas Rowe.

Once he saw a youth blushing, and addressed him, "Courage, my boy; that is the complexion of virtue."—Diogenes Lærtius.

Such a blush
In the midst of brown was born,
Like red poppies grown with corn.

—Hood.

Her cheeks blushing, and withal,
when she was spoken to, a little smiling, were like roses when their leaves are with a little breath stirred.—Sir P.
Sidney.

Had he not long read the heart's hushed secret in the soft, dark eye, lighted at his approach, and on the cheek, coloring all crimson at his lightest look?—L. E. Landon.

The bold defiance of a woman is the certain sign of her shame,—when she has once ceased to blush, it is because she has too much to blush for.—
Talleyrand.

An Arab, by his earnest gaze,
Has clothed a lovely maid with blushes;
A smile within his eyelids plays
And into words his longing gushes.

—Wm. R. Alger.

One day, a daughter of Aristotle,
Pythias by name, was asked what color pleased her most. She replied, "The color with which modesty suffuses the face of simple, inoffensive men."—Joubert.

Give me the eloquent cheek,
When blushes burn and die
Like thine its changes speak,
The spirit's purity. —Mrs. Osgood.

Forgot the blush that virgin fears impart
To modest cheeks, and borrowed one from art

—Cowper.

I pity bashful men, who feel the pain.
Of fancied scorn and undesired disdain,
And bear the marks upon a blushing face,
Of needless shame, and self-impos'd disgrace.

—Cowper.

The blushing cheek speaks modest mind,
The lips befitting words most kind,
The eye does tempt to love's desire,
And seems to say 'tis "Cupid's fire,"

—Harrington.

—the blush is formed—and flies—
Nor owns reflection's calm control;
It comes, it deepens—fades and dies,
A gush of feeling from the soul.

—Mrs. Dinnies.

By noting of the lady I have mark'd
A thousand blushing apparitions
To start into her face, a thousand innocent
shames,
In angel whiteness bear away those blushes,

—Shakespeare.

Who has not seen that feeling born of flame
Crimson the cheek at mention of a name?
The rapturous touch of some divine surprise
Flash deep suffusion of celestial dyes:
When hands clasped hands, and lips to lips
were pressed,
And the heart's secret was at once confessed?

—Abraham Coles.

Girls blush, sometimes, because they are alive,
 Half wishing they were dead to save the shame.
 The sudden blush devours them, neck and
 brow;
 They have drawn too near the fire of life,
 like gnats,
 And flare up bodily, wings and all.

—E. B. Browning.

Though looks and words, by the strong mastery of his practiced will,
 are overruled, the mounting blood betrays an impulse in its secret spring too deep for his control.—Southey.

Blustering

A killing tongue and a quiet sword.
 —Shakespeare.

Splitting the air with noise.—Shakespeare.

The devil may be bullied, but not the Deity.—W. R. Alger.

Loudness is impotence.—Lavater.

Ever the characteristic manners of cowardice.—Edward Everett.

Bold at the council board, but cautious in the field.—Dryden.

The empty vessel makes the greatest sound.—Shakespeare.

They that have voice of lions and act of hares,—are they not monsters?—
 Shakespeare.

Without big words, how could many people say small things?—J. Petit-Senn.

A brave man is sometimes a desperado: a bully is always a coward.—
 Haliburton.

Wine and the sun will make vinegar without any shouting to help them.—
 George Eliot.

True courage scorns to vent her prowess in a storm of words; and to the valiant action speaks alone.—Smollett.

There are braying men in the world, as well as braying asses: for what is loud and senseless talking any other than a way of braying?—L'Estrange.

The insignificant, the empty, is usually the loud; and after the manner of a drum, is louder even because of its emptiness.—Carlyle.

It is with narrow-souled people as with narrow-necked bottles; the less they have in them, the more noise they make in pouring it out.—Pope.

That, of course, they are many in number, or that, after all, they are,
 other than the little, shriveled, meagre, hopping, though loud and troublesome,
 insects of the hour.—Burke.

What art thou? Have not I
 An arm as big as thine? A heart as big?
 Thy words, I grant, are bigger, for I wear not
 My dagger in my mouth. —Shakespeare.

For highest looks have not the highest mind,
 Nor haughty words most full of highest thought;
 But are like bladders blown up with the wind,
 That being prick'd evanish into nought.
 —Spenser.

Because half a dozen grasshoppers under a fern make the field ring with their importunate chink, whilst thousands of great cattle, reposing beneath the shadow of the British oak, chew the cud and are silent, pray do not imagine that those who make the noise are the only inhabitants of the field.—
 Burke.

Those that are the loudest in their threats are the weakest in the execution of them. In springing a mine, that which has done the most extensive mischief makes the smallest report;
 and again, if we consider the effect of lightning, it is probable that he that is killed by it hears no noise; but the thunderclap which follows, and which most alarms the ignorant, is the surest proof of their safety.—Colton.

Boasting

Where boasting ends, there dignity begins.—Young.

The less people speak of their greatness the more we think of it.—Bacon.

No more delay, vain boaster, but begin.—Dryden.

Where there is much pretension, much has been borrowed; nature never pretends.—Lavater.

It will come to pass that every braggart shall be found an ass.—Shakespeare.

The honor is overpaid when he that did the act is commentator.—Shirley.

Commonly they use their feet for defense, whose tongue is their weapon.—Sir P. Sidney.

Fools carry their daggers in their open mouths.—H. W. Shaw.

A gentleman that loves to hear himself talk will speak more in a minute than he will stand in a month.—Shakespeare.

With all his tumid boasts, he's like the sword-fish, who only wears his weapon in his mouth.—Madden.

Self-laudation abounds among the unpolished; but nothing can stamp a man more sharply as ill-bred.—Charles Buxton.

The man that once did sell the lion's skin
While the beast lived, was killed with hunting him.—Shakespeare.

We wound our modesty, and make foul the clearness of our deservings, when of ourselves we publish them.—Shakespeare.

Conceit, more rich in matter than in words, Brags of his substance, not of ornament: They are but beggars that can count their worth.—Shakespeare.

Men of real merit, and whose noble and glorious deeds we are ready to acknowledge, are yet not to be endured when they vaunt their own actions.—Æschines.

Boasting and bravado may exist in the breast even of the coward, if he is successful through a mere lucky hit; but a just contempt of an enemy can alone arise in those who feel that they are superior to their opponent by the prudence of their measures.—Thucydides.

There is this benefit in brag, that the speaker is unconsciously expressing his own ideal. Humor him by all means, draw it all out, and hold him to it.—Emerson.

Lord Bacon told Sir Edward Coke when he boasted, "The less you speak of your greatness, the more I shall think of it." Mirrors are the accompaniments of dandies, not heroes. The men of history were not perpetually looking in the glass to make sure of their own size. Absorbed in their work they did it, and did it so well that the wondering world saw them to be great, and labeled them accordingly.—Rev. S. Coley.

I know them, yea,
And what they weigh, even to the utmost
scruple;
Scambling, out-facing, fashion-mong'ring
boys,
That lie, and cog, and flout, deprave, and slander,
Go antickly, and show outward hideousness,
And speak off half a dozen dangerous words,
How they might hurt their enemies, if they durst;
And this is all. —Shakespeare.

One man affirms that he has rode post a hundred miles in six hours: probably it is a lie; but supposing it to be true, what then? Why, he is a very good post-boy; that is all. Another asserts, and probably not without oaths, that he has drunk six or eight bottles of wine at a sitting; out of charity I will believe him a liar; for, if I do not, I must think him a beast.—Chesterfield.

Bobolink

Modest and shy as a nun is she;
One weak chirp is her only note;
Braggarts and prince of braggarts is he,
Pouring boasts from his little throat.
—Bryant.

Robert of Lincoln's Quaker wife,
Pretty and quiet, with plain brown wings,
Passing at home a patient life,
Broods in the grass while her husband
sings. —Bryant.

When Nature had made all her birds,
 With no more cares to think on,
 She gave a rippling laugh and out
 There flew a bobolink. —C. P. Cranch.

Bobolink! that in the meadow,
 Or beneath the orchard's shadow,
 Keepest up a constant rattle
 Joyous as my children's prattle,
 Welcome to the north again.
 —Thos. Hill.

Out of the fragrant heart of bloom,
 The bobolinks are singing;
 Out of the fragrant heart of bloom
 The apple-tree whispers to the room,
 "Why art thou but a nest of gloom
 While the bobolinks are singing?"
 —W. D. Howells.

Body

What! know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God; and ye are not your own?—Cor. vi. 19.

For of the soul the body form doth take,
 For soul is form, and doth the body make.
 —Spenser.

Our body is a well-set clock, which keeps good time; but if it be too much or indiscreetly tampered with, the alarm runs out before the hour.—
 Bishop Hall.

Every physician knows, though metaphysicians know little about it, that the laws which govern the animal machine are as certain and invariable as those which guide the planetary system, and are as little within the control of the human being who is subject to them.—Priestley.

These limbs,—whence had we them;
 this stormy force; this life-blood, with its burning passion? They are dust and shadow—a shadow system gathered round our me; wherein through some moments or years, the divine essence is to be revealed in the flesh.
 —Carlyle.

God made the human body, and it is by far the most exquisite and wonderful organization which has come to us from the Divine hand. It is a study for one's whole life. If an undevout astronomer is mad, an undevout physiologist is still madder.—Beecher.

Boldness

Fortune befriends the bold.—Dryden.

Fools rush in where angels fear to tread.—Pope.

We make way for the man who boldly pushes past us.—Bovee.

Carried away by the irresistible influence which is always exercised over men's minds by a bold resolution in critical circumstances.—Guizot.

It deserves to be considered that boldness is ever blind, for it sees not dangers and inconveniences. Whence it is bad in council though good in execution. The right use of bold persons, therefore, is that they never command in chief, but serve as seconds, under the direction of others. For in council it is good to see dangers, and in execution not to see them unless they are very great.—Bacon.

Bondage

A bond is necessary to complete our being, only we must be careful that the bond does not become bondage.—
 Mrs. Jameson.

Bondage is hoarse, and may not speak aloud.—Shakespeare.

Books

Books are embalmed minds.—Bovee.

A book is the only immortality.—
 Rufus Choate.

A true book is an inspiration.—
 Alexander H. Everett.

The medicine of the mind.—Dio-dorus.

Books wind into the heart.—Hazlitt.

Law dies; books never.—Bulwer-
 Lytton.

 over the door of the library at Thebes.

The monument of vanished mindes.
—Sir Wm. Davenant.

Books are not seldom talismans and spells.—Cowper.

Go, litel boke! go litel myn tregedie!
—Chaucer.

Books which are no books.—Charles
Lamb.

A book may be as great a thing
as a battle.—Disraeli.

Not many but good books.—Bayard
Taylor.

Books, the children of the brain.—
Swift.

My library was dukedom large enough.—Shakespeare.

Begin by reading thyself rather than books.—Rumi.

Deep versed in books and shallow in himself.—Milton.

Books are a languid pleasure.—Montaigne.

Beware you be not swallowed up in books.—John Wesley.

A multitude of books distracts the mind.—Seneca.

Books are sepulchres of thought.—
Longfellow.

The worth of a book is a matter of expressed juices.—Bovee.

There is no book so poor that it would not be a prodigy if wholly made by a single man.—Johnson.

Learning hath gained most by those books by which printers have lost.—
Fuller.

The last thing that we discover in writing a book is to know what to put at the beginning.—Pascal.

Every man is a volume if you know how to read him.—Channing.

There is nothing so imperishable as a book.—James Hain Friswell.

A good book is the best of friends,
—the same to-day and forever.—Tupper.

Books are the legacies that a great genius leaves to mankind.—Addison.

We prize books, and they prize them most who are themselves wise.—Emerson.

There is no past so long as books shall live.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Next to acquiring good friends, the best acquisition is that of good books.
—Colton.

Great books, like large skulls, have often the least brains.—W. B. Clulow.

Those faithful mirrors, which reflect to our mind the minds of sages and heroes.—Gibbon.

We are as liable to be corrupted by books as by companions.—Fielding.

Books,—lighthouses erected in the great sea of time.—Whipple.

There was a time when the world acted upon books. Now books act upon the world.—Joubert.

It is always easy to shut a book, but not quite so easy to get rid of a lettered coxcomb.—Colton.

A small number of choice books are sufficient.—Voltaire.

Without grace no book can live, and with it the poorest may have its life prolonged.—Horace Walpole.

Books are true friends that will never flatter nor dissemble: be you but true to yourself, . . . and you shall need no other comfort.—Bacon.

Reading maketh a full man, conference a ready man, and writing an exact man.—Bacon.

He hath never fed of the dainties that are bred in a book.—Shakespeare.

No book can be so good, as to be profitable when negligently read.—Seneca.

'Tis pleasant, sure, to see one's name in print;
A book's a book, although there's nothing in 't.—Byron.

A taste for books, which is still the pleasure and glory of my life.—Gibbon.

The burning soul, the burden'd mind,
In books alone companions find.—Mrs. Hale.

It is a sure evidence of a good book if it pleases us more and more as we grow older.—Lichtenberg.

Every great book is an action, and every great action is a book.—Martin Luther.

Books are the best things, well used; abused, among the worst.—Emerson.

Come, and take choice of all my library,
And so beguile thy sorrow.—Shakespeare.

'Tis in books the chief
Of all perfections to be plain and brief.—Butler.

Books cannot always please, however good,
Minds are not ever craving for their food.—Crabbe.

When a new book comes out, I read an old one.—Rogers.

How science dwindles, and how volumes swell!—Young.

A first book has some of the sweetness of a first love.—Willmott.

The true University of these days is a collection of books.—Carlyle.

A book should be luminous, but not voluminous.—Bovee.

Books must follow sciences, and not sciences books.—Bacon.

Wise books for half the truths they hold are honored tombs.—George Eliot.

Books are the ever-burning lamps of accumulated wisdom.—G. W. Curtis.

These hoards of wealth you can unlock at will.—Wordsworth.

Some books are to be tasted, others to be swallowed, and some few to be chewed and digested.—Bacon.

Let every man, if possible, gather some good books under his roof.—Channing.

Books think for me. I can read anything which I call a book.—Lamb.

It is not with the living that we should live, but with the dead.—Chamfort.

Let us digest them; otherwise they enter our memory, but not our minds.—Seneca.

A blessing on the printer's art!—
Books are the mentors of the heart.—Mrs. Hale.

Books that you may carry to the fire, and hold readily in your hand, are the most useful after all.—Johnsoniana.

In proportion as society refines, new books must ever become more necessary.—Goldsmith.

"Books," says my lord Bacon, "should have no patrons but truth and reason."—Colton.

Some said, John, print it, others said, Not so;
Some said, it might do good, others said, No.—Bunyan.

The pleasant books, that silently among our household treasures take familiar places.—Longfellow.

Old wood to burn, old wine to drink, old friends to trust, old books to read.—Alonso of Arragon.

Books bear him up awhile, and make him try to swim with ladders of philosophy.—Rochester.

Come, my best friends, my books! and lead me on.—Cowley.

All the known world, excepting only savage nations, is governed by books.—Voltaire.

The great objection to new books is that they prevent our reading old ones.—Joubert.

I entrench myself in my books, equally against sorrow and the weather.—Leigh Hunt.

That is a good book which is opened with expectation and closed with profit.—Alcott.

Some books are only cursorily to be tasted of.—Fuller.

Books that are books are all that you want, and there are but half a dozen in any thousand.—Thoreau.

The writings of the wise are the only riches our posterity cannot squander.—Landon.

It is nearly an axiom that people will not be better than the books they read.—Dr. Potter.

All books grow homilies by time; they are Temples, at once, and Landmarks.
—Bulwer-Lytton.

In the highest civilization the book is still the highest delight.—Emerson.

"There is no book so bad," said the bachelor, "but something good may be found in it."—Cervantes.

Thou art a plant sprung up to wither never
But, like a laurel, to grow green forever.
—Herrick.

A man will turn over half a library to make one book.—Samuel Johnson.

Books are the immortal sons deifying their sires.—Plato.

The love of books is a love which requires neither justification, apology, nor defence.—Langford.

Every book is, in an intimate sense, a circular-letter to the friends of him who writes it.—R. L. Stevenson.

For books are as meats and viands are; some of good, some of evil substance.—Milton.

Leaving us heirs to amplest heritages
Of all the best thoughts of the greatest sages,
And giving tongues unto the silent dead!
—Longfellow.

No matter what his rank or position may be, the lover of books is the richest and the happiest of the children of men.—Langford.

We call some books immortal! Do they live?
If so, believe me, Time hath made them pure.
In Books, the veriest wicked rest in peace.
—Bulwer-Lytton.

As you grow ready for it, somewhere or other you will find what is needful for you in a book.—George MacDonald.

A good book is fruitful of other books; it perpetuates its fame from age to age, and makes eras in the lives of its readers.—Alcott.

Books, like proverbs, receive their chief value from the stamp and esteem of ages through which they have passed.—Sir W. Temple.

The quantity of books in a library is often a cloud of witnesses of the ignorance of the owner.—Oxenstiern.

Worthy books are not companions, they are solitudes; we lose ourselves in them, and all our cares.—Bailey.

If a book come from the heart, it will contrive to reach other hearts; all art and authorcraft are of small amount to that.—Carlyle.

A book may be compared to the life of your neighbor. If it be good, it cannot last too long; if bad, you cannot get rid of it too early.—H. Brooke.

He who loves not books before he comes to thirty years of age will hardly love them enough afterwards to understand them.—Clarendon.

That wonderful book, while it obtains admiration from the most fastidious critics, is loved by those who are too simple to admire it.—Macaulay.

Some books are drenched sands, on which a great soul's wealth lies all in heaps, like a wrecked argosy.—Alexander Smith.

That book in many's eyes doth share the ^{glory,} that in gold clasps locks in the golden story.—Shakespeare.

Employ your time in improving yourselves by other men's documents: so shall you come easily by what others have labored hard for.—Socrates.

Old books, as you well know, are books of the world's youth, and new books are the fruits of its age.—O. W. Holmes.

The images of men's wits and knowledge remain in books, exempted from the worry of time and capable of perpetual renovation.—Bacon.

All that mankind has done, thought, gained, or been,—it is lying as in magic preservation in the pages of books.—Carlyle.

Strong as man and tender as woman, they welcome you in every mood, and never turn from you in distress.—J. A. Langford.

Pray thee, take care, that tak'st my book in hand,
To read it well; that is to understand.—Ben Jonson.

The foolishhest book is a kind of leaky boat on a sea of wisdom: some of the wisdom will get in anyhow.—O. W. Holmes.

In every man's memory, with the hours when life culminated are usually associated certain books which met his views.—Emerson.

If time is precious, no book that will not improve by repeated readings deserves to be read at all.—Carlyle.

The greatest pleasure in life is that of reading while we are young. I have had as much of this pleasure perhaps as any one.—Hazlitt.

Books should to one of these four ends
conduce,
For wisdom, piety, delight, or use.
—Sir John Denham.

How many books there are whose reputation is made that would not obtain it were it now to make!—Joubert.

Many books owe their success to the good memories of their authors and the bad memories of their readers.—Colton.

Books are the negative pictures of thought, and the more sensitive the mind that receives their images, the more nicely the finest lines are reproduced.—Holmes.

He that studies books alone, will know how things ought to be; and he that studies men will know how things are.—Colton.

We should have a glorious conflagration if all who cannot put fire into their works would only consent to put their works into the fire.—Colton.

In the best books great men talk to us, give us their most precious thoughts, and pour their souls into ours.—Channing.

Books are men of higher stature, and the only men that speak aloud for future times to hear.—Mrs. Browning.

A good book is the precious life-blood of a master spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life.—Milton.

God be thanked for books. They are the voices of the distant and the dead, and make us heirs of the spiritual life of past ages.—Channing.

Here, in the country, my books are my sole occupation: books my sure solace, and refuge from frivolous cares. Books the calmers, as well as the instruction of the mind.—Mrs. Inchbald.

As good almost kill a man as kill a good book; who kills a man kills a reasonable creature, God's image; but he who destroys a good book kills reason itself.—Milton.

It is with books as with men: a very small number play a great part; the rest are confounded with the multitude.—Voltaire.

It is thought and digestion which makes books serviceable, and gives health and vigor to the mind.—Thomas Fuller.

If a book really wants the patronage of a great name, it is a bad book; and if it be a good book, it wants it not.—Colton.

Men often discover their affinity to each other by the mutual love they have for a book.—Samuel Smiles.

A book! oh, rare one! be not, as in this fangled world, a garment nobler than it covers.—Shakespeare.

He who loveth a book will never want a faithful friend, a wholesome counsellor, a cheerful companion, or an effectual comforter.—Barrow.

Books, we know,
Are a substantial world, both pure and good;
Round these, with tendrils strong as flesh
and blood,
Our pastime and our happiness will grow.
—Wordsworth.

The scholar only knows how dear these silent yet eloquent companions of pure thoughts and innocent hours become in the season of adversity.—Washington Irving.

In books lies the soul of the whole Past Time; the articulate audible voice of the Past, when the body and material substance of it has altogether vanished like a dream.—Carlyle.

Books are the legacies that genius leaves to mankind, to be delivered down from generation to generation, as presents to the posterity of those that are yet unborn.—Addison.

It is books that teach us to refine our pleasures when young, and which, having so taught us, enable us to recall them with satisfaction when old.—Leigh Hunt.

Books are necessary to correct the vices of the polite; but those vices are ever changing, and the antidote should be changed accordingly—should still be new.—Goldsmith.

Many books require no thought from those who read them, and for a simple reason,—they made no such demand upon those who wrote them.—Colton.

It is chiefly through books that we enjoy intercourse with superior minds; and these invaluable communications are within the reach of all.—Mme. de Genlis.

If the crowns of all the kingdoms of Europe were laid down at my feet in exchange for my books and my love of reading, I would spurn them all.—Fénelon.

When a book raises your spirit, and inspires you with noble and courageous feelings, seek for no other rule to judge the work by; it is good, and made by a good workman.—Bruyère.

Our favorites are few; since only what rises from the heart reaches it, being caught and carried on the tongues of men wheresoever love and letters journey.—Alcott.

There is a kind of physiognomy in the titles of books no less than in the faces of men, by which a skilful observer will as well know what to expect from the one as the other.—Butler.

Books are the true levellers. They give to all who faithfully use them the society, the spiritual presence, of the best and greatest of our race.—Channing.

The profit of books is according to the sensibility of the reader. The profoundest thought or passion sleeps as in a mine, until an equal mind and heart finds and publishes it.—Emerson.

When self-interest inclines a man to print, he should consider that the purchaser expects a pennyworth for his penny, and has reason to asperse his honesty if he finds himself deceived.—Shenstone.

Do not believe that a book is good, if in reading it thou dost not become more contented with thy existence, if it does not rouse up in thee most generous feelings.—Lavater.

To buy books only because they were published by an eminent printer, is much as if a man should buy clothes that did not fit him, only because made by some famous tailor.—Pope.

The past but lives in words; a thousand ages were blank if books had not evoked their ghosts, and kept the pale, unbodied shades to warn us from fleshless lips.—Bulwer-Lytton.

If the secret history of books could be written, and the author's private thoughts and meanings noted down alongside of his story, how many insipid volumes would become interesting, and dull tales excite the reader.—Thackeray.

Books, to judicious compilers, are useful,—to particular arts and professions absolutely necessary,—to men of real science they are tools; but more are tools to them.—Johnson.

Many a man lives a burden upon the earth; but a good book is the precious life-blood of a master spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose for a life beyond life.—Milton.

Homeliness is almost as great a merit in a book as in a house, if the reader would abide there. It is next to beauty, and a very high art.—Thoreau.

Plays and romances sell as well as books of devotion, but with this difference,—more people read the former than buy them, and more buy the latter than read them.—T. Hughes.

Men love better books which please them than those which instruct. Since their ennui troubles them more than their ignorance, they prefer being amused to being informed.—L'Abbe Dubois.

Most books fail, not so much from a want of ability in their authors, as from an absence in their productions of a thorough development of their ability.—Bovee.

Books are faithful repositories, which may be awhile neglected or forgotten, but when they are opened again, will again impart their instruction.—Jonson.

Without books God is silent, justice dormant, natural science at a stand, philosophy lame, letters dumb, and all things involved in Cimmerian darkness.—Bartholin.

Those who are conversant with books well know how often they mislead us when we have not a living monitor at hand to assist us in comparing practice with theory.—Junius.

I like books. I was born and bred among them, and have the easy feeling when I get in their presence, that a stable-boy has among horses.—O. W. Holmes.

Gentlemen use books as gentlewomen handle their flowers, who in the morning stick them in their heads, and at night strawe them at their heels.—Lyly.

Oh, but books are such safe company! They keep your secrets well; they never boast that they made your eyes glisten, or your cheek flush, or your heart throb.—Mrs. S. P. Parton.

Properly speaking, we learn from those books only that we cannot judge. The author of a book that I am competent to criticise would have to learn from me.—Goethe.

Silent companions of the lonely hour,
Friends, who can alter or forsake,
Who for inconstant roving have no power,
And all neglect, perforce, must calmly take.
—Mrs. Norton.

I have somewhere seen it observed that we should make the same use of a book that the bee does of a flower: she steals sweets from it, but does not injure it.—Colton.

Nothing ought to be more weighed than the nature of books recommended by public authority. So recommended, they soon form the character of the age.—Burke.

No man writes a book without meaning something, though he may not have the faculty of writing consequentially and expressing his meaning.—Addison.

Of all the things which man can do or make here below, by far the most momentous, wonderful, and worthy are the things we call books.—Carlyle.

Be as careful of the books you read as of the company you keep, for your habits and character will be as much influenced by the former as the latter.—Paxton Hood.

I love to lose myself in other men's minds. When I am not walking, I am reading; I cannot sit and think. Books think for me.—Charles Lamb.

The pleasant books, that silently among Our household treasures take familiar places,
And are to us as if a living tongue Spake from the printed leaves or pictured faces! —Longfellow.

In the poorest cottage are Books: is one Book, wherein for several thousands of years the spirit of man has found light, and nourishment, and an interpreting response to whatever is Deepest in him.—Carlyle.

After the pleasure of possessing books there is hardly anything more pleasant than that of speaking of them, and of communicating to the public the innocent richness of thought which we have acquired by the culture of letters.—Nodier.

It is with books as with women, where a certain plainness of manner and of dress is more engaging than that glare of paint and airs and apparel which may dazzle the eye, but reaches not the affections.—Hume.

A book is a friend whose face is constantly changing. If you read it when you are recovering from an illness, and return to it years after, it is changed surely, with the change in yourself.—Andrew Lang.

Books are the true metempsychosis,—they are the symbol and presage of immortality. The dead men are scattered, and none shall find them. Behold they are here! they do but sleep.—Beecher.

He that will have no books but those that are scarce evinces about as correct a taste in literature as he would do in friendship who would have no friends but those whom all the rest of the world have sent to Coventry.—Colton.

There are persons who flatter themselves that the size of their works will make them immortal. They pile up reluctant quarto upon solid folio, as if their labors, because they are gigantic, could contend with truth and heaven! —Junius.

I armed her against the censures of the world; showed her that books were sweet unapproaching companions to the miserable, and that if they could not bring us to enjoy life, they would at least teach us to endure it.—Goldsmith.

To divert at any time a troublesome fancy, run to thy books; they presently fix thee to them, and drive the other out of thy thoughts. They always receive thee with the same kindness.—Fuller.

Mankind are creatures of books, as well as of other circumstances; and such they eternally remain,—proofs, that the race is a noble and believing race, and capable of whatever books can stimulate.—Leigh Hunt.

Some new books it is necessary to read,—part for the information they contain, and others in order to acquaint one's self with the state of literature in the age in which one lives; but I would rather read too few than too many.—Lord Dudley

Nothing can supply the place of books. They are cheering or soothing companions in solitude, illness, affliction. The wealth of both continents would not compensate for the good they impart.—Channing.

The Wise
(Minstrel or Sage), out of their books are clay;

But in their books, as from their graves
they rise,
Angels—that, side by side, upon our way,
Walk with and warn us!

—Bulwer-Lytton.

Many readers judge of the power of a book by the shock it gives their feelings,—as some savage tribes determine the power of their muskets by their recoil; that being considered best which fairly prostrates the purchaser.—Longfellow.

There is this value in books, that they enable us to converse with the dead. There is something in this beyond the mere intrinsic worth of what they have left us.—Brydges.

In looking round me seeking for miserable resource against the heaviness of time, I open a book, and I say to myself, as the cat to the fox: I have only one good turn, but I need no other.—Madame Necker.

A man ought to inquire and find out what he really and truly has an appetite for; what suits his constitution; and that, doctors tell him, is the very thing he ought to have in general. And so with books.—Carlyle.

Learning is more profound
When in few solid authors 't may be found;
A few good books, digested well, do feed
The mind; much cloy, and doth ill humors breed.

—Robert Heath.

In science, read, by preference, the newest works; in literature, the oldest. The classic literature is always modern. New books revive and redecorate old ideas; old books suggest and invigorate new ideas.—Bulwer-Lytton.

What a joy is there in a good book, writ by some great master of thought, who breaks into beauty as in summer the meadow into grass and dandelions and violets, with geraniums and manifold sweetness.—Theodore Parker.

We ought to regard books as we do sweetmeats, not wholly to aim at the pleasantest, but chiefly to respect the wholesomest; not forbidding either, but approving the latter most.—Plutarch.

No man should consider so highly of himself as to think he can receive but little light from books, nor so meanly as to believe he can discover nothing but what is to be learned from them.—Dr. Johnson.

My favorite books have a personality and complexion as distinctly drawn as if the author's portrait were framed into the paragraphs and smiled upon me as I read his illustrated pages.—Alcott.

Books, dear books.
Have been, and are my comforts; morn and
night,
Adversity, prosperity, at home,
Abroad, health, sickness—good or ill report,
The same firm friends; the same refreshment rich,
And source of consolation. —Dr. Dodd.

By cultivating an interest in a few good books which contain the result of the toil or the quintessence of the genius of some of the most gifted thinkers of the world, we need not live on the marsh and in the mists. The slopes and ridges invite us.—T. Starr King.

Some future strain, in which the muse shall tell
How science dwindles, and how volumes swell.
How commentators each dark passage shun,
And hold their farthing candle to the sun.

—Young.

Of many large volumes the index is the best portion and the usefulest. A glance through the casement gives whatever knowledge of the interior is needful. An epitome is only a book shortened; and as a general rule, the worth increases as the size lessens.—Willmott.

One must be rich in thought and character to owe nothing to books, though preparation is necessary to profitable reading; and the less reading is better than more;—book-struck men are of all readers least wise, however knowing or learned.—Alcott.

The books which help you most are those which make you think the most. The hardest way of learning is by easy reading: but a great book that comes from a great thinker—it is a ship of thought, deep freighted with truth and with beauty.—Theodore Parker.

We ought to reverence books, to look at them as useful and mighty things. If they are good and true, whether they are about religion or politics, farming, trade, or medicine, they are the message of Christ, the maker of all things, the teacher of all truth.—Rev. C. Kingsley.

Books are not absolutely dead things, but do contain a progeny of life in them to be as active as that soul was whose progeny they are; nay, they do preserve as in a vial the purest efficacy and extraction of that living intellect that bred them.—Milton.

Good books are to the young mind what the warming sun and the refreshing rain of spring are to the seeds which have lain dormant in the frosts of winter. They are more, for they may save from that which is worse than death, as well as bless with that which is better than life.—Horace Mann.

There are many virtues in books, but the essential value is the adding of knowledge to our stock by the record of new facts, and, better, by the record of intuitions which distribute facts, and are the formulas which supersede all histories.—Emerson.

In a well-written book we are presented with the maturest reflections, or the happiest flights of a mind of uncommon excellence. It is impossible that we can be much accustomed to such companions without attaining some resemblance to them.—William Godwin.

You, O Books, are the golden vessels of the temple, the arms of the clerical militia with which the missiles of the most wicked are destroyed; fruitful olives, vines of Engaddi, fig-trees knowing no sterility; burning lamps to be ever held in the hand.—Richard Aungervyle.

Books, like friends, should be few, and well chosen.

Thou mayst as well expect to grow strong by always eating as wiser by always reading. Too much overcharges nature, and turns more into disease than nourishment. 'Tis thought and digestion which makes books serviceable, and gives health and vigor to the mind.—Fuller.

There is no such thing as a worthless book, though there are some far worse than worthless; no book that is not worth preserving, if its existence may be tolerated: as there may be some men whom it may be proper to hang, but none who should be suffered to starve.—Coleridge.

Books are a part of man's prerogative. In formal ink, they thought and voices hold. That we to them our solitude may give, And make time present travel that of old, Our life fame pieceth longer at the end, And books it farther backward doth extend.
—Sir Thomas Overbury.

They are for company the best friends, in Doubts Counsellors, in Damps Comforters, Time's Prospective, the Home Traveller's Ship or Horse, the busie Man's best Recreation, the Opiate of idle Weariness, the Mindes best Ordinary, Nature's Garden and Seed-plot of Immortality.—Bulstrode Whitelocke.

When I would know thee * * * my thought looks Upon thy well-made choice of friends and books;
Then do I love thee, and behold thy ends
In making thy friends books, and thy books friends.
—Ben Jonson.

If I were to pray for a taste which would stand by me under every variety of circumstances, and be a source of happiness and cheerfulness to me through life, and a shield against its ills, however things might go amiss, and the world frown upon me, it would be a taste for reading.—Herschel.

Many books belong to sunshine, and should be read out of doors. Clover, violets, and hedge roses breathe from their leaves; they are most lovable in cool lanes, along field paths, or upon stiles overhung by hawthorn, while the blackbird pipes, and the nightingale bathes its brown feathers in the twilight copse.—Willmott.

Books are the best of things, well used; abused, among the worst. What is the right use? What is the one end, which all means go to effect? They are for nothing but to inspire. I had better never see a book than to be warped by its attraction clean out of my own orbit, and made a satellite instead of a system.—Emerson.

In comparing men and books, one must always remember this important distinction,—that one can put the books down at any time. As Macaulay says, "Plato is never sullen, Cervantes is never petulant, Demosthenes never comes unseasonably, Dante never stays too long."—Willis.

The silent power of books is a great power in the world; and there is a joy in reading them which those alone can know who read them with desire and enthusiasm. Silent, passive, and noiseless though they be, they may yet set in action countless multitudes, and change the order of nations.—Henry Giles.

Books, as Dryden has aptly termed them, are spectacles to read nature. Æschylus and Aristotle, Shakespeare and Bacon, are priests who preach and expound the mysteries of man and the universe. They teach us to understand and feel what we see, to decipher and syllable the hieroglyphics of the senses.—Hare.

To divert myself from a troublesome fancy, it is but to run to my books: they presently fix me to them, and drive the other out of my thoughts, and do not mutiny to see that I have only recourse to them for want of other more real, natural, and lively conveniences: they always receive me with the same kindness.—Montaigne.

A book becomes a mirror, with the author's face shining over it. Talent only gives an imperfect image,—the broken glimmer of a countenance. But the features of genius remain unruffled. Time guards the shadow. Beauty, the spiritual Venus,—whose children are the Tassos, the Spensers, the Bacoons,—breathes the magic of her love, and fixes the face forever.—Willmott.

In you are sent
The types of Truths whose life is The to Come;
In you soars up the Adam from the fall;
In you the Future as the Past is given—
Ev'n in our death ye bid us hail our birth—
Unfold these pages, and behold the Heaven, Without one grave-stone left upon the Earth.
—Bulwer-Lytton.

Books are delightful when prosperity happily smiles; when adversity threatens, they are inseparable comforters. They give strength to human compacts, nor are grave opinions brought forward without books. Arts and sciences, the benefits of which no mind can calculate, depend upon books.—Richard Aungervyle.

A wise man will select his books, for he would not wish to class them all under the sacred name of friends. Some can be accepted only as acquaintances. The best books of all kinds are taken to the heart, and cherished as his most precious possessions. Others to be chatted with for a time, to spend a few pleasant hours with, and laid aside, but not forgotten.—Langford.

Books are a guide in youth, and an entertainment for age. They support us under solitude, and keep us from becoming a burden to ourselves. They help us to forget the crossness of men and things, compose our cares and our passions, and lay our disappointments asleep. When we are weary of the living, we may repair to the dead, who have nothing of peevishness, pride or design in their conversation.—Jeremy Collier.

As friends and companions, as teachers and consolers, as recreators and amusers, books are always with us, and always ready to respond to our wants. We can take them with us in our wanderings, or gather them around us at our firesides. In the lonely wilderness, and the crowded city, their spirit will be with us, giving a meaning to the seemingly confused movements of humanity, and peopling the desert with their own bright creations.—Langford.

Knowledge of books is like that sort of lantern which hides him who carries it, and serves only to pass through secret and gloomy paths of his own; but in the possession of a man of business it is as a torch in the hand of one who is willing and able to show those who are bewildered the way which leads to their prosperity and welfare.—Steele.

The diffusion of these silent teachers—books—through the whole community is to work greater effects than artillery, machinery, and legislation. Its peaceful agency is to supersede stormy revolutions. The culture which it is to spread, whilst an unspeakable good to the individual, is also to become the stability of nations.—Channing.

What is a great love of books? It is something like a personal introduction to the great and good men of all past time. Books, it is true, are silent as you see them on their shelves; but, silent as they are, when I enter a library I feel as if almost the dead were present, and I know if I put questions to these books they will answer me.—John Bright.

Books, of which the principles are diseased or deformed, must be kept on the shelf of the scholar, as the man of science preserves monsters in glasses. They belong to the study of the mind's morbid anatomy, and ought to be accurately labelled. Voltaire will still be a wit, notwithstanding he is a scoffer; and we may admire the brilliant spots and eyes of the viper, if we acknowledge its venom and call it a reptile.—Willmott.

I have ever gained the most profit, and the most pleasure also, from the books which have made me think the most: and, when the difficulties have once been overcome, these are the books which have struck the deepest root, not only in my memory and understanding, but likewise in my affections.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

Books are faithful repositories, which may be awhile neglected or forgotten, but when they are opened again, will again impart their instruction. Memory, once interrupted, is not to be recalled; written learning is a fixed luminary, which, after the cloud that had hidden it has passed away, is again bright in its proper station. Tradition is but a meteor, which, if it once falls, cannot be rekindled.—Johnson.

Books, says Lord Bacon, can never teach us the use of books; the student must learn by commerce with mankind to reduce his speculations to practice. No man should think so highly of himself as to think he can receive but little light from books; no one so meanly, as to believe he can discover nothing but what is to be learned from them.—Johnson.

Let us consider how great a commodity of doctrine exists in books; how easily, how secretly, how safely they expose the nakedness of human ignorance without putting it to shame. These are the masters who instruct us without rods and ferules, without hard words and anger, without clothes or money. If you approach them, they are not asleep; if investigating you interrogate them, they conceal nothing; if you mistake them, they never grumble; if you are ignorant, they cannot laugh at you.—Richard de Bury.

Golden volumes! richest treasures,
Objects of delicious pleasures!
You my eyes rejoicing please,
You my hands in rapture seize!
Brilliant wits and musing sages,
Lights who beam'd through many ages!
Left to your conscious leaves their story,
And dared to trust you with their glory;
And now their hope of fame achiev'd,
Dear volumes! you have not deceived!
—Isaac Disraeli.

Great books are not in everybody's reach; and though it is better to know them thoroughly, than to know them only here and there; yet it is a good work to give a little to those who have neither the time nor means to get more. Let every book-worm, when, in any fragrant scarce old tome, he discovers a sentence, a story, and illustration that does his heart good, hasten to give it.—Coleridge.

And as for me, though than I konne but lyte,

On bokes for to rede I me delyte,
And to hem yve I feyth and ful credence,
And in myn herte have hem in reverence
So hertely, that ther is game noon,
That fro my bokes maketh me to goon,
But yt be seldome on the holy day.
Save, certeynly, when that the monthe of May

Is comen, and that I here the foules synge,
And that the floures gynnen for to sprynge,
Farwel my boke, and my devocion.

—Chaucer.

We get no good
By being ungenerous, even to a book,
And calculating profits—so much help
By so much reading. It is rather when
We gloriously forget ourselves, and plunge
Soul-forward, headlong, into a book's profound,
Impassioned for its beauty, and salt of truth—

'Tis then we get the right good from a book.

—E. B. Browning.

Books have always a secret influence on the understanding; we cannot at pleasure obliterate ideas: he that reads books of science, though without any desire fixed of improvement, will grow more knowing; he that entertains himself with moral or religious treatises, will imperceptibly advance in goodness; the ideas which are often offered to the mind, will at last find a lucky moment when it is disposed to receive them.—Samuel Johnson.

—The place that does Contain my books, the best companions, is
To me a glorious court, where hourly I
Converse with the old sages and philosophers;

And sometimes for variety, I confer
With kings and emperors, and weigh their counsels;

Calling their victories, if unjustly got,
Unto a strict account; and in my fancy,
Deface their ill-plac'd statutes.

—Fletcher.

It is saying less than the truth to affirm that an excellent book (and the remark holds almost equally good of a Raphael as of a Milton) is like a well-chosen and well-tended fruit tree. Its fruits are not of one season only. With the due and natural intervals, we may recur to it year after year, and it will supply the same nourishment and the same gratification, if only we ourselves return to it with the same healthful appetite.—Coleridge.

Bores

The smaller the calibre of mind, the greater the bore of a perpetually open mouth.—O. W. Holmes.

Society is now one polished borde,
Formed of two mighty tribes, the Bores and Bored. —Byron.

The secret of making one's self tiresome is not to know when to stop.—Voltaire.

Got the ill name of augurs because they were bores.—Lowell.

He says a thousand pleasant things—
But never says "Adieu."—J. G. Saxe.

A tedious person is one a man would leap a steeple from.—Ben Jonson.

The biggest bore of all is he who is overflowing with congratulations.—Hood.

Those wanting wit, affect gravity and go by the name of solid men.—Dryden.

Bores are not to be got rid of except by rough means. They are to be scraped off like scales from a fish.—Bovee.

The bore is the same eating dates under the cedars of Lebanon as over a plate of baked beans in Beacon Street.—O. W. Holmes.

We are almost always wearied in the company of persons with whom we are not permitted to be weary.—Roche foucauld.

The bore is usually considered a harmless creature, or of that class of irrational bipeds who hurt only themselves.—Maria Edgeworth.

There are some kinds of men who cannot pass their time alone; they are the flails of occupied people.—M. de Bonald.

There are few wild beasts more to be dreaded than a communicative man having nothing to communicate.—Bovee.

It is one of the vexatious mortifications of a studious man to have his thoughts disordered by a tedious visit.—L'Estrange.

The symptoms of compassion and benevolence in some people are like those minute-guns which warn you that you are in deadly peril.—Mme. Swetchine.

He will steal himself into a man's favor and for a week escape a great deal of discoveries; but when you find him out, you have him ever after.—Shakespeare.

Never hold any one by the button or the hand in order to be heard out; for if people are unwilling to hear you, you had better hold your tongue.—Chesterfield.

O, he's as tedious
As is a tired horse, a railing wife;
Worse than a smoky house; I had rather live
With cheese and garlic in a windmill, far,
Than feed on cates, and have him talk to me,
In any summer-house in Christendom.
—Shakespeare.

It is to be hoped that, with all the modern improvements, a mode will be discovered of getting rid of bores; for it is too bad that a poor wretch can be punished for stealing your pocket-handkerchief or gloves, and that no punishment can be inflicted on those who steal your time, and with it your temper and patience, as well as the bright thoughts that might have entered into your mind (like the Irishman who lost the fortune before he had got it), but were frightened away by the bore.—Byron.

Borrowing

No remedy against this consumption of the purse; borrowing only lingers and lingers it out, but the disease is incurable.—Shakespeare.

The borrower runs in his own debt.—Emerson.

Debt is a bottomless sea.—Carlyle.

Borrowing from Peter to pay Paul.—Cicero.

Neither a borrower nor a lender be:
For loan oft loses both itself and friend,
And borrowing dulls the edge of husbandry.
—Shakespeare.

Who borrow much, then fairly make it known, and damn it with improvements not their own.—Young.

To forget, or pretend to do so, to return a borrowed article, is the meanest sort of petty theft.—Dr. Johnson.

The reason why borrowed books are so seldom returned to their owners is that it is much easier to retain the books than what is in them.—Montaigne.

If you lend a person any money, it becomes lost for any purpose as one's own. When you ask for it back again, you may find a friend made an enemy by your kindness. If you begin to press still further, either you must part with that which you have intrusted, or else you must lose that friend.—Plautus.

Few have borrowed more freely than Gray and Milton; but with a princely prodigality, they have repaid the obscure thoughts of others, with far brighter of their own—like the ocean, which drinks up the muddy water of the rivers from the flood, but replenishes them with the clearest from the shower.—Colton.

Charles Lamb, tired of lending his books, threatened to chain Wordsworth's poems to his shelves, adding: "For of those who borrow, some read slow; some mean to read, but don't read; and some neither read nor mean to read, but borrow, to leave you an opinion of their sagacity. I must do my money-borrowing friends the justice to say that there is nothing of this caprice or wantonness of alienation in them. When they borrow my money, they never fail to make use of it."—Talfourd.

You should only attempt to borrow from those who have but few of this world's goods, as their chests are not of iron, and they are, besides, anxious to appear wealthier than they really are.—Heinrich Heine.

Boston

Boston State-house is the hub of the solar system. You couldn't pry that out of a Boston man if you had the tire of all creation straightened out for a crow-bar.—O. W. Holmes.

The sea returning day by day
Restores the world-wide mart.
So let each dweller on the Bay
Fold Boston in his heart
Till these echoes be choked with snows
Or over the town blue ocean flows.
—Emerson.

Bounty

From bounty issues power.—Aken-side.

Our bounty, like a drop of water, disappears, when diffus'd too widely. Goldsmith.

The superfluous blossoms on a fruit tree are meant to symbolize the large way God loves to do pleasant things.—Beecher.

O blessed bounty, giving ail content!
The only fautress of all noble arts
That lend'st success to every good intent.
A grace that rests in the most godlike hearts,
By heav'n to none but happy souls infus'd
Pity it is, that e'er thou wast abus'd.
—Drayton.

Boyhood

Ah! happy years! once more who would not be a boy! —Byron.

Ye tiny elves, that guiltless sport,
Like linnets in the bush,
Ye little know the ill ye court,
When manhood is your wish!
The losses, the crosses,
That active men engage;
The fears all, the tears all,
Of dim declining age. —Burns.

Brains

The human brain is the highest bloom of the whole organic metamorphosis of the earth.—Schelling.

When God endowed human beings with brains, He did not intend to guarantee them.—Montesquieu.

Stern men, with empires in their brains.—Lowell.

Oh, rare the headpiece, if but brains were there!—Phædrus.

Not Hercules could have knocked out his brains, for he had none.—Shakespeare.

With curious art the brain, too finely wrought,
Preys on herself, and is destroyed by thought. —Churchill.

An excellent scholar: One that hath a head fill'd with calves' brains without any sage in them.—Webster.

When a strong brain is weighed with a true heart, it seems to me like balancing a bubble against a wedge of gold.—O. W. Holmes.

There are brains so large that they unconsciously swamp all individualities which come in contact or too near, and brains so small that they cannot take in the conception of any other individuality as a whole, only in part or parts.—Mrs. Jameson.

The brain is the palest of all the internal organs, and the heart the reddest. Whatever comes from the brain carries the hue of the place it came from, and whatever comes from the heart carries the heat and color of its birthplace.—Holmes.

Individuals possessing moderate-sized brains easily find their proper sphere, and enjoy in it scope for all their energy. In ordinary circumstances they distinguish themselves, but they sink when difficulties accumulate around them. Persons with large brains, on the other hand, do not readily attain their appropriate place; common occurrences do not rouse or call them forth.—George Combe.

Bravery

God helps the brave.—Schiller.

Fortune favors the brave.—Terence.

A brave soul is a thing which all things serve.—Alex. Smith.

None but the brave deserves the fair.—Dryden.

A brave man may fall but cannot yield.

True bravery is quiet, undemonstrative.—Sir P. Sidney.

The brave man may yield to a braver man.

The brave find a home in every land.—Ovid.

Brave men are brave from the very first.—Corneille.

The brave are parsimonious of threats.—Kossuth.

'Tis late before the brave despair.—Thomson.

Bravery is often too sharp a spur.—Kossuth.

Brave deeds are most estimable when hidden.—Pascal.

General Taylor never surrenders.—Thos. L. Crittenden.

The bravest men are subject most to chance.—Dryden.

That's a valiant flea that dares eat his breakfast on the lip of a lion.—Shakespeare.

A brave man is clear in his discourse, and keeps close to truth.—Aristotle.

A true knight is fuller of gay bravery in the midst than in the beginning of danger.—Sir P. Sidney.

We come to know best what men are, in their worse jeopardies.—Daniel Brave men do not boast nor bluster. Deeds, not words, speak for such.—Rivarol.

Women commiserate the brave, and men the beautiful.—Landor.

Who bravely dares must sometimes risk a fall.—Smollett.

He's truly valiant that can wisely suffer the worst that man can breathe.—Shakespeare.

The best hearts, Trim, are ever the bravest, replied my uncle Toby.—Sterne.

The brave
Love mercy, and delight to save.—Gay.

Come one, come all! this rock shall fly
From its firm base as soon as I.—Scott.

What will not woman, gentle woman, dare when strong affection stirs her spirit up?—Southey.

The truly brave are soft of heart and eyes, and feel for what their duty bids them do.—Byron.

It is besides necessary that whoever is brave should be a man of great soul.—Cicero.

'Tis more brave
To live, than to die.—Lord Lytton.

What's brave, what's noble,
Let's do it after the high Roman fashion,
And make death proud to take us.—Shakespeare.

In adversity it is easy to despise life; he is truly brave who can endure a wretched life.—Martial.

Nature often enshrines gallant and noble hearts in weak bosoms—oftenest, God bless her!—in female breasts.—Dickens.

True bravery is shown by performing, without witnesses, what one might be capable of doing before all the world.—Rochefoucauld.

Life may be given in many ways, and loyalty to truth be sealed as bravely in the closet as the field.—
Lowell.

Who combats bravely is not therefore brave;
He dreads a death-bed like the meanest slave. —Pope.

Dare to do something worthy of transportation and a prison, if you mean to be anybody.—Juvenal.

He is not worthy of the honeycomb
That shuns the hive because the bees have stings. —Shakespeare.

Without a sign his sword the brave man
draws,
And asks no omen but his country's cause.
—Homer.

The brave and bold persist even against fortune; the timid and cowardly rush to despair through fear alone.—Tacitus.

Physical bravery is an animal instinct; moral bravery is a much higher and truer courage.—Wendell Phillips.

No man can be brave who thinks pain the greatest evil; nor temperate, who considers pleasure the highest good.—Cicero.

Bravery is a cheap and vulgar quality, of which the brightest instances are frequently found in the lowest savage.—Chatfield.

Fight valiantly to-day; and yet I do thee wrong to mind thee of it, for thou art framed of the firm truth of valor.
—Shakespeare.

People glorify all sorts of bravery except the bravery they might show on behalf of their nearest neighbors.
George Eliot.

There is no love-broker in the world can more prevail in man's commendation with woman than report of valor.
—Shakespeare.

The brave man, indeed, calls himself lord of the land, through his iron, through his blood.—Arndt.

What valor were it, when a cur doth grin, for one to thrust his hand between his teeth, when he might spurn him with his foot away?—
Shakespeare.

I know not how, but martial men are given to love. I think it is but as they are given to wine; for perils commonly ask to be paid in pleasures.
Bacon.

Song of the brave, how thrills thy tone
As when the organ's music rolls;
No gold rewards, but song alone,
The deeds of great and noble souls.
—Bürger.

That courage which arises from the sense of our duty, and from the fear of offending Him that made us, acts always in a uniform manner, and according to the dictates of right reason.—Addison.

There's a brave fellow! There's a man of pluck!
A man who's not afraid to say his say,
Though a whole town's against him.
—Longfellow.

At the bottom of a good deal of the bravery that appears in the world
there lurks a miserable cowardice.
Men will face powder and steel because they cannot face public opinion.
—Chapin.

The brave man is not he who feels no fear, for that were stupid and irrational; but he whose noble soul its fear subdues, and bravely dares the danger which it shrinks from.—Joanna Baillie.

The heroic example of other days is in great part the source of the courage of each generation; and men walk up composedly to the most perilous enterprises, beckoned onward by the shades of the brave that were.—Arthur Helps.

The bravery founded upon the hope of recompense, upon the fear of punishment, upon the experience of success, upon rage, upon ignorance of dangers, is common bravery, and does not merit the name. True bravery proposes a just end, measures the dangers, and, if it is necessary, the affront, with coldness.—Francis la Noue.

The brave man seeks not popular applause,
Nor, overpower'd with arms, deserts his cause,
Unsham'd, though foil'd, he does the best he can,
Force is of brutes, but honor is of man.
—Dryden.

Cato the elder, when somebody was praising a man for his foolhardy bravery, said "that there was an essential difference between a really brave man and one who had merely a contempt for life."—Plutarch.

O friends, be men; so act that none may feel Ashamed to meet the eyes of other men.

Think each one of his children and his wife,
His home, his parents, living yet or dead.
For them, the absent ones, I supplicate.
And bid you rally here, and scorn to fly.
—Homer.

Intrepidity is an extraordinary strength of soul, which raises it above the troubles, disorders and emotions which the sight of great perils can arouse in it; by this strength heroes maintain a calm aspect and preserve their reason and liberty in the most surprising and terrible accidents.—La Rochefoucauld.

The truly brave,
When they behold the brave oppressed with odds,
Are touched with a desire to shield and save—

A mixture of wild beasts and demi-gods
Are they—now furious as the sweeping wave,
Now moved with pity; even as sometimes nods

The rugged tree unto the summer wind,
Compassion breathes along the savage mind.
—Byron.

Courage is incompatible with the fear of death; but every villain fears death; therefore, no villain can be brave. He may, indeed, possess the courage of the rat, and fight with desperation when driven into a corner.
* * * * * yet the glare of a courage thus elicited by danger, where fear conquers fear, is not to be compared to that calm sunshine which constantly cheers and illuminates the breast of him, who builds his confidence on virtuous principles.—Colton.

Brevity

Brevity is the soul of wit.—Shakespeare.

Concentration alone conquers.—Charles Buxton.

A downright fact may be briefly told.—Ruskin.

I will be brief.—Shakespeare.

A verse may find him whom a sermon flies.—George Herbert.

Brevity is a great praise of eloquence.—Cicero.

The one prudence in life is concentration.—Emerson.

Whatever precepts you give, be short.—Horace.

Aiming at brevity, I become obscure.—Horace.

The fewer words, the better prayer.—Luther.

A parsimony of words prodigal of sense.—Disraeli.

Brevity is the child of silence, and is a credit to its parentage.—H. W. Shaw.

Brevity never fatigues; therefore, brevity is always a welcome guest.—Théophile Gautier.

We must be brief when traitors brave the field.—Shakespeare.

Rather to excite your judgment briefly than to inform it tediously.—Bacon.

Great captains do never use long orations when it comes to the point of execution.—Sir P. Sidney.

Cervantes speaks of potted wisdom as "short sentences drawn from a long experience."—Charles Buxton.

It is safe to make a choice of your thoughts, scarcely ever safe to express them all.—Barrow.

Brevity is very good, when we are, or are not, understood.—Butler.

You may get a large amount of truth into a brief space.—Beecher.

The wisdom of nations lies in their proverbs, which are brief and pithy.—William Penn.

My tongue within my lips I rein,
For who talks much must talk in vain.
—Gay.

The more you say, the less people remember. The fewer the words, the greater the profit.—Fénelon.

The more an idea is developed, the more concise becomes its expression: the more a tree is pruned, the better is the fruit.—Alfred Bougeart.

Generally, downright fact may be told in a plain way; and we want downright facts, at the present, more than anything else.—Ruskin.

If you would be pungent, be brief; for it is with words as with sunbeams—the more they are condensed the deeper they burn.—Southey.

General observations drawn from particulars are the jewels of knowledge, comprehending great store in a little room.—Locke.

A little plot of ground thick sown is better than a great field which, for the most part of it, lies fallow.—Bishop Norris.

Brevity is the best recommendation of a speech, not only in the case of a senator, but in that, too, of an orator.—Cicero.

I saw one excellency was within my reach—it was brevity; and I determined to obtain it.—Jay.

Since brevity is the soul of wit, and tediousness the limbs and outward flourishes—I will be brief.—Shakespeare.

Brevity and conciseness are the parents of conviction. The leaden bullet is more fatal than when multiplied into shot.—Hosea Ballou.

Brevity in writing is what charity is to all other virtues—righteousness is nothing without the one, nor authorship without the other.—Sydney Smith.

I would fain coin wisdom—mould it, I mean, into maxims, proverbs, sentences, that can easily be retained and transmitted.—Joubert.

When a man has no design but to speak plain truth, he may say a great deal in a very narrow compass.—Steele.

It is not a great Xerxes army of words, but a compact Greek ten thousand that march safely down to posterity.—Lowell.

Brevity is the body and soul of wit. It is wit itself, for it alone isolates sufficiently for contrasts; because redundancy or diffuseness produces no distinctions.—Jean Paul Richter.

And there's one rare strange virtue in their speeches,
The secret of their mastery—they are short.
—Halleck.

A sentence well couched takes both the sense and understanding. I love not those cart-rope speeches that are longer than the memory of man can fathom.—Feltham.

Was there ever anything written by mere man that was wished longer by its readers, excepting Don Quixote, Robinson Crusoe and the Pilgrim's Progress?—Dr. Johnson.

With vivid words your just conceptions
grace,
Much truth compressing in a narrow space;
Then many shall peruse, but few complain,
And envy frown, and critics snarl in vain.
—Pindar.

The seven wise men of Greece, so famous for their wisdom all the world over, acquired all that fame, each of them, by a single sentence consisting of two or three words.—South.

The Grecian's maxim would indeed be a sweeping clause in literature; it would reduce many a giant to a pygmy, many a speech to a sentence, and many a folio to a primer.—Colton.

It is the work of fancy to enlarge, but of judgment to shorten and contract; and therefore this must be as far above the other as judgment is a greater and nobler faculty than fancy or imagination.—South.

Talk to the point, and stop when you have reached it. The faculty some possess of making one idea cover a quire of paper is not good for much. Be comprehensive in all you say or write. To fill a volume upon nothing is a credit to nobody; though Lord Chesterfield wrote a very clever poem upon nothing.—John Neal.

It is excellent discipline for an author to feel that he must say all he has to say in the fewest possible words, or his reader is sure to skip them; and in the plainest possible words, or his reader will certainly misunderstand them. Generally, also, a downright fact may be told in a plain way; and we want downright facts at present more than anything else.—Ruskin.

Bribery

All men have their price.—Ascribed to Walpole.

Judges and senates have been bought for gold.—Pope.

The universe would not be rich enough to buy the vote of an honest man.—St. Gregory.

Who thinketh to buy villainy with gold,
Shall ever find such faith so bought—so sold. —Shakespeare.

Our supple tribes repress their patriot throat
And ask no questions but the price of vote.
—Samuel Johnson.

It is a great mistake to suppose that bribery and corruption, although they may be very convenient for gratifying the ambition or the vanity of individuals, have any great effect upon the fortunes or the power of parties. And it is a great mistake to suppose that bribery and corruption are means by which power can either be obtained or retained.—Beaconsfield.

'Tis pleasant purchasing our fellowcreatures;
And all are to be sold, if you consider
Their passions, and are dext'rous; some by features
Are bought up, others by a warlike leader;
Some by a place—as tend their years or natures;
The most by ready cash—but all have prices,
From crowns to kicks, according to their vices. —Byron.

Petitions, not sweetened with gold,
are but unsavory and oft refused: or,
if received, are pocketed, not read.—
Massinger.

Silver, though white,
Yet it draws black lines; it shall not rule
my palm
There to mark forth its base corruption.
—Middleton and Rowley.

Bride

New dressed and blooming as a bridal maid.—Walter Harte.

O, happy youth! for whom thy fate reserved so fair a bride.—Dryden.

Evasive of the bridal day, she gives fond hopes to all, and all with hope deceives.—Pope.

A thin aerial veil is drawn o'er beauty's face, seeming to hide, more sweetly shows the blushing bride.—
Crashaw.

The man who builds and wants wherewith to pay, provides a home from which to run away.—Young.

The bride, lovely herself, and lovely by her side a bevy of bright nymphs, with sober grace came glittering like a star, and took her place.—Dryden.

In ancient Bœotia brides were carried home in vehicles whose wheels were burned at the door, in token that they would never again be needed.
—T. W. Higginson.

He laid him down and slept, and from his side a woman in her magic beauty rose; dazzled and charmed, he called that woman "bride," and his first sleep became his last repose.—Besser.

Up, up, fair bride! and call thy stars from out their several boxes; take thy rubies, pearls, and diamonds forth, and make thyself a constellation of them all.—Donne.

Brooks

Sweet are the little brooks that run
O'er pebbles glancing in the sun,
Singing in soothing tones.

—Hood.

I chatter, chatter, as I flow
To join the brimming river,
For men may come and men may go,
But I go on forever. —Tennyson.

Brook! whose society the poet seeks,
Intent his wasted spirits to renew;
And whom the curious painter doth pursue
Through rocky passes, among flowery creeks,
And tracks thee dancing down thy water-breaks. —Wordsworth.

Thou hastenest down between the hills to meet me at the road,
The secret scarcely lispings of thy beautiful abode

Among the pines and mosses of yonder
shadowy height,
Where thou dost sparkle into song, and fill the woods with light.

—Lucy Larcom.

Brotherhood

Infinite is the help man can yield to man.—Carlyle.

Nature has inclined us to love men.
—Cicero.

Man, man, is thy brother, and thy father is God.—Lamartine.

We must love men, ere to us they will seem worthy of our love.—
Shakespeare.

To live is not to live for one's self alone; let us help one another.—
Menander.

Kings and their subjects, masters and slaves find a common level in two places—at the foot of the cross and in the grave.—C. C. Colton.

However wretched a fellow-mortal may be, he is still a member of our common species.—Seneca.

The universe is but one great city, full of beloved ones, divine and human,
by nature endeared to each other.—
Epictetus.

If we love one another, nothing, in truth, can harm us, whatever mis-chances may happen.—Longfellow.

Give bread to a stranger, in the name of the universal brotherhood which binds together all men under the common father of nature.—Quintilian.

Be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love; in honor preferring one another.—Bible.

The era of Christianity—peace, brotherhood, the Golden Rule as applied to governmental matters—is yet to come, and when it comes, then, and then only, will the future of nations be sure.—Kossuth.

We are members of one great body.
Nature planted in us a mutual love, and fitted us for a social life. We must consider that we were born for the good of the whole.—Seneca.

Enough of good there is in the lowest estate to sweeten life; enough of evil in the highest to check presumption; enough there is of both in all estates, to bind us in compassionate brotherhood, to teach us impressively that we are of one dying and one immortal family.—Henry Giles.

The race of mankind would perish, did they cease to aid each other. From the time that the mother binds the child's head till the moment that some kind assistant wipes the death-damp from the brow of the dying, we cannot exist without mutual help. All therefore, that need aid have a right to ask it from their fellow-mortals;
no one who holds the power of granting can refuse it without guilt.—Walter Scott.

My friends, let us try to follow the Saviour's steps; let us remember all day long what it is to be men; that it is to have every one whom we meet for our brother in the sight of God;
that it is this, never to meet anyone,

however bad he may be, for whom we cannot say: "Christ died for that man, and Christ cares for him still. He is precious in God's eyes, and he shall be precious in mine also."—Charles Kingsley.

God has taught in the Scriptures the lesson of a universal brotherhood, and man must not gainsay the teaching. Shivering in the ice-bound or scorching in the tropical regions; in the lap of luxury or in the wild hardihood of the primeval forest; belting the globe in a tired search for rest, or quieting through life in the heart of ancestral woods; gathering all the decencies around him like a garment, or battling in fierce raid of crime against a world which has disowned him, there is an inner humanness which binds me to that man by a primitive and indissoluble bond. He is my brother, and I cannot dis sever the relationship. He is my brother, and I cannot release myself from the obligation to do him good.—Wm. M. Punshon.

Jesus throws down the dividing prejudices of nationality, and teaches universal love without distinction of race, merit or rank. A man's neighbor, henceforth, was every one who needed help, even an enemy. All men, from the slave to the highest, were sons of one Father in heaven, and should feel and act toward each other, as brethren. No human standard of virtue would suffice; no imitations of the loftiest examples among men. Moral perfection had been recognized alike by heathen and Jews, as found only in likeness to the Divine, and that Jesus proclaims as, henceforth, the one ideal for all humanity. With a sublime enthusiasm and brotherly love for the race, He rises above his age, and announces a common Father of all mankind, and one grand spiritual ideal in resemblance to Him.—J. C. Geikie.

Brute

A singular fact, that, when man is a brute, he is the most sensual and loathsome of all brutes.—Hawthorne.

Notwithstanding that natural love in brutes is much more violent and intense than in rational creatures,

Providence has taken care that it should be no longer troublesome to the parent than it is useful to the young; for so soon as the wants of the latter cease, the mother withdraws her fondness, and leaves them to provide for themselves.—Addison.

Building

Too low they build who build beneath the stars.—Dr. Young.

Old houses mended cost little less than new before they're ended.—Cibber.

All below is strength, and all above is grace.—Dryden.

The building fitted accurately to answer its end will turn out to be admirable.—Möller.

Ah, to build, to build! that is the noblest art of all the arts.—Longfellow.

The man who builds, and wants wherewith to pay,
Provides a home from which to run away.
—Dr. Young.

The Gothic cathedral is a blossoming in stone, subdued by the insatiable demand of harmony in man.—Emerson.

Which of you, intending to build a tower, sitteth not down first and counteth the cost, whether he have sufficient to finish it?—Bible.

Never build after you are five and forty; have five years' income in hand before you lay a brick; and always calculate the expense at double the estimate.—Kett.

Like one who draws the model of a house beyond his power to build it, who, half through, gives o'er, and leaves his part-created cost a naked subject to the weeping clouds.—Shakespeare.

In designing a house and gardens, it is happy when there is an opportunity of maintaining a subordination of parts; the house so luckily placed as to exhibit a view of the whole design.—Shenstone.

When we mean to build,
We first survey the plot, then draw the model;

And when we see the figure of the house,
Then must we rate the cost of the erection;
Which if we find outweighs ability,
What do we then, but draw anew the model
In fewer offices; or, at least, desist
To build at all? —Shakespeare.

Houses are built to live in more than to look on; therefore let use be preferred before uniformity, except where both may be had.—Bacon.

Burlesque

Satire is the right hand of burlesque.—Voltaire.

Cervantes smiled Spain's chivalry away.—Byron.

A burlesque word is often a powerful sermon.—Boileau.

It is a sin to be a mocker.—Shakespeare.

The guerilla weapon of political warfare.—Horace Greeley.

The keenest of political weapons.—Bryant.

Often most telling and often most unfair; stimulated by want of a juster argument.—W. R. Alger.

What caricature is in painting, burlesque is in writing; and in the same manner the comic writer and painter correlate to each other; as in the former, the painter seems to have the advantage, so it is in the latter infinitely on the side of the writer. For the monstrous is much easier to paint than describe, and the ridiculous to describe than paint.—Fielding.

Burns

And Burns—though brief the race he ran,
Though rough and dark the paths he trod,
Lived—died—in form and soul a man,
The image of his God.

—Fitz-Greene Halleck.

Business

Neither above nor below his business.—Tacitus.

Shoemaker, stick to your last.—Pliny.

Avoid as much as possible multiplicity of business.—Bishop Wilson.

Few people do business well who do nothing else.—Chesterfield.

I attend to the business of other people, having lost my own.—Horace.

To business that we love, we rise betimes and go to it with delight.—Shakespeare.

A man who cannot mind his own business is not fit to be trusted with the king's.—Saville.

Every man has business and desire, such as it is.—Shakespeare.

The master looks sharpest to his own business.—Phædrus.

Do you fear to trust the word of a man whose honesty you have seen in business?—Terence.

Hasty and adventurous schemes are at first view flattering, in execution difficult and in the issue disastrous.—Livy.

That which is everybody's business is nobody's business.—Izaak Walton.

Let every one engage in the business with which he is best acquainted.—Propertius.

The most important part of every business is to know what ought to be done.—Columella.

All inconsiderate enterprises are impetuous at first, but soon languish.—Tacitus.

It very seldom happens to a man that his business is his pleasure.—Dr. Johnson.

Business despatched is business well done; but business hurried is business ill done.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Physicians attend to the business of physicians and workmen handle the tools of workmen.—Horace.

The old proverb about having too many irons in the fire is an abominable old lie. Have all in, shovel, tongs, and poker.—Adam Clarke.

Have you so much leisure from your own business that you can take care of other people's that does not at all belong to you?—Terence.

Not because of any extraordinary talents did he succeed, but because he had a capacity on a level for business and not above it.—Tacitus.

Success in business is seldom owing to uncommon talents or original power which is untractable and self-willed, but to the greatest degree of common-place capacity.—Hazlitt.

Men of great parts are often unfortunate in the management of public business, because they are apt to go out of the common road by the quickness of their imagination.—Swift.

Formerly when great fortunes were only made in war, war was a business; but now, when great fortunes are only made by business, business is war.—Bovee.

Never shrink from doing anything which your business calls you to do. The man who is above his business may one day find his business above him.—Drew.

Call on a business man at business times only, and on business, transact your business and go about your business, in order to give him time to finish his business.—Duke of Wellington.

The great secret both of health and successful industry is the absolute yielding up of one's consciousness to the business and diversion of the hour—never permitting the one to infringe in the least degree upon the other.—Sismondi.

Business is the salt of life, which not only gives a grateful smack to it, but dries up those crudities that would offend, preserves from putrefaction and drives off all those blowing flies that would corrupt it.—Feltham.

To men addicted to delights, business is an interruption; to such as are cold to delights, business is an entertainment. For which reason it was said to one who commended a dull man for his application: "No thanks to him; if he had no business, he would have nothing to do."—Steele.

He that attends to his interior self,
That has a heart, and keeps it; has a mind
That hungers, and supplies it; and who seeks
A social, not a dissipated life,
Has business. —Cowper.

It is very sad for a man to make himself servant to a thing, his manhood all taken out of him by the hydraulic pressure of excessive business. I should not like to be merely a great doctor, a great lawyer, a great minister, a great politician—I should like to be also something of a man.—Theodore Parker.

Business in a certain sort of men is a mark of understanding, and they are honored for it. Their souls seek repose in agitation, as children do by being rocked in a cradle. They may pronounce themselves as serviceable to their friends as troublesome to themselves. No one distributes his money to others, but every one therein distributes his time and his life. There is nothing of which we are so prodigal as of those two things, of which to be thrifty would be both commendable and useful.—Montaigne.

Rare almost as great poets, rarer, perhaps, than veritable saints and martyrs, are consummate men of business. A man, to be excellent in this way, requires a great knowledge of character, with that exquisite tact which feels unerringly the right moment when to act. A discreet rapidity must pervade all the movements of his thought and action. He must be singularly free from vanity, and is generally found to be an enthusiast who has the art to conceal his enthusiasm.—Helps.

Business is religion, and religion is business. The man who does not make a business of his religion has a religious life of no force, and the man who does not make a religion of his business has a business life of no character.

The world is God's workshop; the raw materials are His; the ideals and patterns are His; our hands are "the members of Christ," our reward His recognition. Blacksmith or banker, draughtsman or doctor, painter or preacher, servant or statesman, must work as unto the Lord, not merely making a living, but devoting a life. This makes life sacramental, turning its water into wine. This is twice blessed, blessing both the worker and the work.—Maltbie Babcock.

Busybodies

They learn to be idle, wandering about from house to house; and not only idle, but tattlers also, and busybodies, speaking things which they ought not.—Bible.

A person who is too nice an observer of the business of the crowd, like one who is too curious in observing the labor of the bees, will often be stung for his curiosity.—Pope.

He is a treacherous supplanter and underminer of the peace of all families and societies. This being a maxim of an unfailing truth, that nobody ever pries into another man's concerns but with a design to do, or to be able to do him a mischief.—South.

His tongue, like the tail of Samson's foxes, carries firebrands, and is enough to set the whole field of the world on a flame. Himself begins table-talk of his neighbor at another's board, to whom he bears the first news, and adjures him to conceal the reporter; whose choleric answer he returns to his first host, enlarged with a second edition; so as it used to be done in the fight of unwilling mastiffs, he claps each on the side apart, and provokes them to an eager conflict.—Bishop Hall.

Butcher

The butcher in his killing clothes.—Walt Whitman.

Whoe'er has gone thro' London street,
Has seen a butcher gazing at his meat,
And how he keeps
Gloating upon a sheep's
Or bullock's personals, as if his own;
How he admires his halves
And quarters—and his calves,
As if in truth upon his own legs grown.
—Hood.

Buttercup

The buttercups, bright-eyed and bold,
Held up their chalices of gold
To catch the sunshine and the dew.
—Julia C. R. Dorr.

The buttercups across the field
Made sunshine rifts of splendor.
—D. M. Mulock.

All will be gay when noontide wakes anew
The buttercups, the little children's dower.
—Robert Browning.

When buttercups are blossoming,
The poets sang, 'tis best to wed:
So all for love we paired in spring—
Blanche and I—ere youth had sped.
—E. C. Stedman.

And O the buttercups! that field
O' the cloth of gold, where pennons swam—
Where France set up his lilled shield,
His oriflamb,
And Henry's lion-standard rolled:
What was it to their matchless sheen,
Their million million drops of gold
Among the green! —Jean Ingelow.

Butterfly

I'd be a butterfly, born in a bower,
Where roses and lilacs and violets meet.
—Thomas Haynes Bayly.

The gold-barr'd butterflies to and fro
And over the waterside wander'd and wove
As heedless and idle as clouds that rove
And rift by the peaks of perpetual snow.
—Joaquin Miller.

With the rose the butterfly's deep in love,
A thousand times hovering round;
But round himself, all tender like gold,
The sun's sweet ray is hovering found.
—Heine.

Much converse do I find in thee,
Historian of my infancy!
Float near me; do not yet depart!
Dead times revive in thee:
Thou bring'st, gay creature as thou art!
A solemn image to my heart.
—Wordsworth.

C

Calamities

Calamity was ordained for man.—Sir W. Davenant.

Calamity is man's true touchstone.—
Beaumont and Fletcher.

Calamity is the test of integrity.—
Richardson.

Bear calamities with meekness.—
Euripides.

Of some calamity we can have no relief but from God alone; and what would men do, in such a case, if it were not for God?—Tillotson.

How wisely fate ordain'd for human kind
Calamity! which is the perfect glass,
Wherein we truly see and know ourselves.
—Davenant.

When any calamity has been suffered the first thing to be remembered is, how much has been escaped.—
Johnson.

Know, he that foretells his own calamity, and makes events before they come, twice over doth endure the pains of evil destiny.—Sir W. Davenant.

It is from the level of calamities, not that of every-day life, that we learn important and useful lessons.—
Thackeray.

Do not insult calamity:
It is a barb'rous grossness to lay on
The weight of scorn, where heavy misery
Too much already weighs men's fortunes down.
—Daniel.

'Tis only from the belief of the goodness and wisdom of a Supreme Being that our calamities can be borne in that manner which becomes a man.

—Mackenzie.

Differences, we know, are never so effectually laid asleep as by some common calamity; an enemy unites all to whom he threatens danger.—Dr. Johnson.

A vulgar man, in any ill that happens to him, blames others; a novice in philosophy blames himself; and a philosopher blames neither the one nor the other.—Epictetus.

If you tell your troubles to God, you put them into the grave; they will never rise again when you have committed them to Him. If you roll your burden anywhere else, it will roll back again like the stone of Sisyphus.—
Spurgeon.

Times of general calamity and confusion have ever been productive of the greatest minds. The purest ore is produced from the hottest furnace, and the brightest thunderbolt is elicited from the darkest storm.—Colton.

The willow which bends to the tempest, often escapes better than the oak which resists it: and so in great calamities, it sometimes happens that light and frivolous spirits recover their elasticity and presence of mind sooner than those of a loftier character.—
Sir Walter Scott.

Calm

The holy calm that leads to heavenly musing.—Rogers.

The tempest is o'er-blown, the skies are clear,
And the sea charm'd into a calm so still
That not a wrinkle ruffles her smooth face.
—Dryden.

See me, how calm I am.
Ay, people are generally calm at the misfortunes of others. —Goldsmith.

How calm—how beautiful comes on
The stilly hour, when storms have gone,
When warring winds have died away
And clouds, beneath the dancing ray
Melt off and leave the land and sea,
Sleeping in bright tranquillity. —Moore.

'Tis noon—a calm, unbroken sleep
Is on the blue waves of the deep;
A soft haze, like a fairy dream,
Is floating over wood and stream;
And many a broad magnolia flower,
Within its shadowy woodland bower,
Is gleaming like a lovely star.
—George D. Prentice.

Gradual sinks the breeze,
Into a perfect calm; that not a breath
I heard to quiver thro' the closing woods,
Or rustling turn the many twinkling leaves,
Of aspen tall. The uncurling floods dif-
fus'd
In glassy breadth, seen through delusive lapse
Forgetful of their course. 'Tis silence all,
And pleasing expectation. —Thomson.

Calumny

Cutting honest throats by whispers.
—Walter Scott.

Something of calumny always sticks.
—C. Boileau.

Calumny is only the noise of madmen.—Diogenes.

Virtue itself escapes not calumnious strokes.—Shakespeare.

There are calumnies against which even innocence loses courage.—Napoleon.

To persevere in one's duty and to be silent is the best answer to calumny.—Washington.

Back-wounding calumny the whitest virtue strikes.—Shakespeare.

Do you never look at yourself when you abuse another person?—Plautus.

Calumny will sear virtue itself;
these shrugs, these hums and ha's.—
Shakespeare.

Those who ought to be secure from calumny are generally those who avoid it least.—Stanislaus.

Be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny.—Shakespeare.

One triumphs over calumny only by disdaining it.—Mme. de Maintenon.

There are persons always standing ready to believe a scandal.—Ovid.

Nothing is so swift as calumny;
nothing is more easily uttered; nothing more readily received; nothing more widely dispersed.—Cicero.

I never think it necessary to repeat calumnies; they are sparks, which, if you do not blow them, will go out of themselves.—Boerhaave.

Neglected, calumny soon expires;
show that you are hurt, and you give it the appearance of truth.—Tacitus.

False praise can please, and calumny af-fright
None but the vicious, and the hypocrite.
—Horace.

If the calumniator bespatters and belies me, I will endeavor to convince him by my life and manners, but not by being like him.—South.

Calumny is a vice of curious constitution; trying to kill it keeps it alive; leave it to itself and it will die
a natural death.—Thomas Paine.

His calumny is not only the greatest benefit a rogue can confer on us, but the only service he will perform for nothing.—Lavater.

A single seed of fact will produce in a season or two a harvest of calumnies; but sensible men will pay no attention to them.—Froude.

The upright, if he suffer calumny to move him, fears the tongue of man more than the eye of God.—Colton.

He that lends an easy and credulous ear to calumny is either a man of very ill morals or has no more sense and understanding than a child.—Menander.

I am beholden to calumny, that she hath so endeavored and taken pains to belie me. It shall make me set a surer guard on myself, and keep a better watch upon my actions.—Ben Jonson.

A nickname a man may chance to wear out; but a system of calumny, pursued by a faction, may descend even to posterity. This principle has taken full effect on this state favorite.—Isaac Disraeli.

Calumny is like the wasp which worries you, and which it is not best to try to get rid of unless you are sure of slaying it; for otherwise it returns to the charge more furious than ever.—Chamfort.

The men who convey and those who listen to calumnies should, if I could have my way, all hang, the tale-bearers by their tongues, the listeners by their ears.—Plautus.

Calumny crosses oceans, scales mountains and traverses deserts, with greater ease than the Scythian Abaris, and like him, rides upon a poisoned arrow.—Colton.

No might nor greatness in mortality
Can censure 'scape; back-wounding calumny
The whitest virtue strikes : what king so strong
Can tie the gall up in the slanderous tongue?
—Shakespeare.

The calumniator is like the dragon that pursued a woman, but, not being able to overtake her, opened his mouth and threw a flood after her to drown her.—Edward Blunt.

I never listen to calumnies, because if they are untrue I run the risk of being deceived, and if they be true, of hating persons not worth thinking about.—Montesquieu.

The pure in heart are slow to credit calumnies, because they hardly comprehend what motives can be inducements to the alleged crimes.—Jane Porter.

Close thine ear against him that shall open his mouth secretly against another; if thou receive not his words, they fly back and wound the reporter; if thou receive them, they flee forward and wound the receiver.—Quarles.

Calumniators are those who have neither good hearts nor good understandings. We ought not to think ill of any one till we have palpable proof; and even then we should not expose them to others.—Colton.

Like the tiger, that seldom desists from pursuing man after having once preyed upon human flesh, the reader who has once gratified his appetite with calumny makes ever after the most agreeable feast upon murdered reputations!—Goldsmith.

The celebrated Boerhaave, who had many enemies, used to say that he never thought it necessary to repeat their calumnies. "They are sparks," said he, "which, if you do not blow them, will go out of themselves."—Disraeli.

It is like the Greek fire used in ancient warfare, which burnt unquenched beneath the water; or like the weeds which, when you have extirpated them in one place, are sprouting forth vigorously in another spot, at the distance of many hundred yards; or, to use the metaphor of St. James, it is like the wheel which catches fire as it goes, and burns with fiercer conflagration as its own speed increases.—F. W. Robertson.

Calumny is a monstrous vice: for, where parties indulge in it, there are always two that are actively engaged in doing wrong, and one who is subject to injury. The calumniator inflicts wrong by slandering the absent; he who gives credit to the calumny before he has investigated the truth is equally implicated. The person traduced is doubly injured—first by him who propagates, and secondly by him who credits the calumny.—Herodotus.

Canary

Bird of the amber beak,
Bird of the golden wing!
Thy dower is thy carolling;
Thou hast not far to seek
Thy bread, nor needest wine
To make thy utterance divine;
Thou art canopied and clothed
And unto Song betrothed.
—E. C. Stedman.

Sing away, ay, sing away,
Merry little bird,
Always gayest of the gay,
Though a woodland roundelay
You ne'er sung nor heard;
Though your life from youth to age
Passes in a narrow cage.
—D. M. Mulock.

Thou should'st be carolling thy Maker's
praise,
Poor bird! now fetter'd, and here set to draw,
With graceless toil of beak and added claw,
The meager food that scarce thy want allays!
And this—to gratify the gloating gaze
Of fools, who value nature not a straw,
But know to prize the infraction of her law
And hard perversion of her creatures' ways!
Thee the wild woods await, in leaves attired,
Where notes of liquid utterance should engage
Thy bill, that now with pain scant forage earns.
—Julian Fane.

Candor

Candor is the brightest gem of criticism.—Disraeli.

Plain dealing is easiest and best.—
Jane Porter.

In simple and pure soul I come to you.—Shakespeare.

I can promise to be candid, but I cannot promise to be impartial.—
Goethe.

He speaks home; you may relish him more in the soldier than in the scholar.
—Shakespeare.

Candor may be considered as a compound of justice and the love of truth.
—J. Abercrombie.

Candor is the seal of a noble mind, the ornament, and pride of man, the sweetest charm of woman, the scorn of rascals and the rarest virtue of sociability.—Bentzel-Sternau.

'Tis great—'tis manly to disdain disguise,
It shows our spirit, or it proves our strength.
—Young.

Make my breast
Transparent as pure crystal, that the world,
Jealous of me, may see the foulest thought
My heart does hold.
—Buckingham.

There is but one way I know of conversing safely with all men; that is, not by concealing what we say or do, but by saying or doing nothing that deserves to be concealed.—Pope.

He who, when called upon to speak a disagreeable truth, tells it boldly and has done, is both bolder and milder than he who nibbles in a low voice and never ceases nibbling.—Lavater.

Give me the avowed, the erect, the manly foe;
Bold I can meet—perhaps may turn his
blow;
But of all plagues, good heaven, thy wrath can send,
Save, save, oh! save me from the candid
friend.
—George Canning.

The brave do never shun the light;
Just are their thoughts, and open are their tempers;
Truly without disguise they love and hate;
Still are they found in the fair face of day,
And heav'n and men are judges of their actions.
—Rowe.

A man should never be ashamed to own he has been in the wrong, which is but saying, in other words, that he is wiser to-day than he was yesterday.—Pope.

You talk to me in parables.
You may have known that I'm no wordy
man,
Fine speeches are the instruments of knaves
Or fools that use them, when they want good sense;
But honesty
Needs no disguise nor ornament: be plain.
—Otway.

Some frauds succeed from the apparent candor, the open confidence, and the full blaze of ingenuousness that is thrown around them. The slightest mystery would excite suspicion and ruin all. Such stratagems may be compared to the stars; they are discoverable by darkness and hidden only by light.—Colton.

If anything in my conversation has merited your regard, I think it must be the openness and freedom with which I commonly express my sentiments. You are too wise a man not to know that such freedom is not without its use.—Burke.

Cant

Cant is the twin sister of hypocrisy.—Beecher.

Cant is the parrot talk of a profession.—Coleridge.

Cant is not the vehicle, but the substitute of thought.—Robert Hall.

The affectation of some late authors to introduce and multiply cant words is the most ruinous corruption in any language.—Swift.

Cant is the voluntary overcharging or prolongation of a real sentiment; hypocrisy is the setting up a pretension to a feeling you never had and have no wish for.—Hazlitt.

'Tis too much prov'd—that, with devotion's visage
And pious action, we do sugar o'er
The devil himself. —Shakespeare.

To wear long faces, just as if our Maker
The God of goodness, was an undertaker,
Well pleas'd to wrap the soul's unlucky
mien
In sorrow's dismal crape or bombazine.
—Dr. Wolcot.

Is not cant the materia prima of the devil, from which all falsehoods, imbecilities, abominations, body themselves, from which no true thing can come? For cant is itself properly a double-distilled lie, the second power of a lie.—Carlyle.

Those people are often the least worldly on whom they who make the loudest boast of their unworldliness seek basely to affix that opprobrious epithet. For they walk the world with a heart pure as it is cheerful; they are, by that unpretending purity, saved from infection; as there are as many fair and healthy faces to be seen in the smoke and stir of cities as in the rural wilds, so also are there as many fair and healthy spirits.—Professor Wilson.

There is such a thing as a peculiar word or phrase cleaving as it were to the memory of the writer or speaker, and presenting itself to his utterance at every turn. When we observe this, we call it a cant word or a cant phrase.—Paley.

The superabundance of phrases appropriated by some pious authors to the subject of religion, and never applied to any other purpose, has not only the effect of disgusting persons of taste, but of obscuring religion itself.—Robert Hall.

Caprice

Men are nearly as capricious as women.—Chamfort.

Caprice in woman is the antidote to beauty.—Bruyère.

Woman is a miracle of divine contradictions.—Michelet.

A woman's fitness comes by fits.—Shakespeare.

It is not always like to like in love. Titania loved the weaver Bottom, with the ass's head.—Anthony Trollope.

There is a vein of inconsistency in every woman's heart, within whose portals love hath entered.—Mme. Deluzy.

How wayward is this foolish love, that, like a testy babe, will scratch the nurse and presently, all humble, kiss the rod.—Shakespeare.

There is a proverb in the South that a woman laughs when she can, and weeps when she pleases.—J. Petit-Senn.

Love has a way of cheating itself consciously, like a child who plays at solitary hide-and-seek; it is pleased with assurances that it all the while disbelieves.—George Eliot.

There are women so hard to please that it would seem as if nothing less than an angel would suit them; and hence it comes that they often encounter devils.—Marguerite de Valois.

Sing of the nature of women, and then the song shall be surely full of variety,—old crotchets and most sweet closes. It shall be humorous, grave, fantastical, amorous, melancholy, sprightly,—one in all, all in one.—Marston.

“One might almost fear,” writes a thoughtful woman, “seeing how the women of to-day are lightly stirred up to run after some new fashion or faith, that heaven is not so near to them as it was to their mothers and grandmothers.”—Samuel Smiles.

Cards

A snug and friendly game at cards.—Cowper.

Patience and shuffle the cards.—Cervantes.

I must complain the cards are ill-shuffled till I have a good hand.—Swift.

Have I not here the best cards for the game,
To win this easy match? —Shakespeare.

Call them again, my lord, and accept their suit.—Shakespeare.

Whist, then, delightful whist, my theme shall be.—A. Thompson.

Care

I am sure care's an enemy to life.—Shakespeare.

As rust eats iron, so care eats the heart.—A. Ricard.

To carry care to bed is to sleep with a pack on your back.—Haliburton.

Care, admitted as guest, quickly turns to be master.—Bovee.

Cast all your care on God; that anchor holds.—Tennyson.

Many of our cares are but a morbid way of looking at our privileges.—Sir Walter Scott.

Second-hand cares, like second-hand clothes, come easily off and on.—Dickens.

Care that is once enter'd into the breast
Will have the whole possession ere it rest
—Johnson.

Care to our coffin adds a nail, no doubt;
And every grin so merry draws one out.
—Dr. Wolcot.

Care keeps his watch in every old man's eye,
And where care lodges, sleep will never lie.
—Shakespeare.

Some must watch while some must sleep,
so runs the world away.—Shakespeare.

Providence has given us hope and sleep as a compensation for the many cares of life.—Voltaire.

Care seeks out wrinkled brows and hollow eyes, and builds himself caves to abide in them.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Care is no cure, but rather corrosive for things that are not to be remedied.—Shakespeare.

Care may acquire wealth, which, when acquired, care must guard and worry about.—Quesnel.

But can the noble mind for ever brood,
The willing victim of a weary mood,
On heartless cares that squander life away,
And cloud young Genius bright'ning into day?
—Campbell.

O, polished perturbation! golden care that keepest the ports of slumber open wide to many a watchful night!—Shakespeare.

Black care sits behind all sorts of horses, and gives a trink-gilt to positions all over the map.—Thackeray.

All cares appear twice as large as they really are, owing to their emptiness and darkness; and so is it with the grave.—Richter.

Cares are often more difficult to thrown off than sorrows; the latter die with time, the former grow upon it.—Richter.

He who climbs above the cares of this world and turns his face to his God, has found the sunny side of life.—Spurgeon.

God gives us power to bear all the sorrows of His making; but He does not give us power to bear the sorrows of our own making, which the anticipation of sorrow most assuredly is.—Alexander Maclaren.

Our cares are the mothers, not only of our charities and virtues, but of our best joys and most cheering and enduring pleasures.—Simms.

Eat not thy heart; which forbids to afflict our souls, and waste them with vexatious cares.—Plutarch.

Why art thou troubled and anxious about many things? One thing is needful—to love Him and to sit attentively at His feet.—Fénelon.

He that taketh his own cares upon himself loads himself in vain with an uneasy burden. I will cast all my cares on God; He hath bidden me; they cannot burden Him.—Bishop Hall.

I could lie down like a tired child,
And weep away the life of care
Which I have borne, and yet must bear.
—Shelley.

Begone, old Care, and I prithee begone
from me;
For i' faith, old Care, thee and I shall never agree.—Playford.

Although my cares do hang upon my soul
Like mines of lead, the greatness of my spirit
Shall shake the sullen weight off.
—Claphorne.

I met a brother who, describing a friend of his, said he was like a man who had dropped a bottle and broken it, and put all the pieces in his bosom.

where they were cutting him perpetually.—H. W. Beecher.

But human bodies are sic fools,
For a' their colleges and schools,
That when nae real ills perplex them,
They make enow themselves to vex them.
—Burns.

And the night shall be filled with music,
And the cares that infest the day
Shall fold their tents like the Arabs,
And as silently steal away.
—Longfellow.

All creatures else a time of love possess,
Man only clogs with care his happiness,
And while he should enjoy his part of bliss,
With thoughts of what may be, destroys what is.—Dryden.

Quick is the succession of human events; the cares of to-day are seldom the cares of to-morrow; and when we lie down at night, we may safely say to most of our troubles, "Ye have done your worst, and we shall meet no more."—Cowper.

Still though the headlong cavalier,
O'er rough and smooth, in wild career,
Seems racing with the wind;
His sad companion, ghastly pale,
And darksome as a widow's veil,
Care keeps her seat behind.—Horace.

Men do not avail themselves of the riches of God's grace. They love to nurse their cares, and seem as uneasy without some fret as an old friar would be without his hair girdle. They are commanded to cast their cares upon the Lord, but even when they attempt it, they do not fail to catch them up again, and think it meritorious to walk burdened.—Beecher.

Carelessness

Carelessness does more harm than a want of knowledge.—Franklin.

If you will fling yourself under the wheels, Juggernaut will go over you; depend upon it.—Thackeray.

Childish, imbecile carelessness is enough to render any man poor, without the aid of a single positive vice.—Francis Wayland.

Carelessness is inexcusable, and merits the inevitable sequence.—Froude.

Caricature

Nothing conveys a more inaccurate idea of a whole truth than a part of a truth so prominently brought forth as to throw the other parts into shadow. This is the art of caricature; and by the happy use of that art you might caricature the Apollo Belvidere.—Bulwer-Lytton.

A farce is that in poetry which grotesque (caricature) is in painting. The persons and actions of a farce are all unnatural, and the manners false, that is, inconsistent with the characters of mankind; and grotesque painting is the just resemblance of this.—Dryden.

The great moral satirist, Hogarth, was once drawing in a room where many of his friends were assembled, and among them my mother. She was then a very young woman. As she stood by Hogarth, she expressed a wish to learn to draw caricature. "Alas, young lady," said Hogarth, "it is not a faculty to be envied! Take my advice, and never draw caricature; by the long practice of it, I have lost the enjoyment of beauty. I never see a face but distorted; I never have the satisfaction to behold the human face divine." We may suppose that such language from Hogarth would come with great effect: his manner was very earnest, and the confession is well deserving of remembrance.—Bishop Sandford.

Carpentry

The carpenter dresses his plank—the tongue of his fore-plane whistles its wild ascending lisp.—Walt Whitman.

The house-builder at work in cities or anywhere,
The preparatory jointing, squaring, sawing, mortising,
The hoist-up of beams, the push of them in their places, laying them regular,
Setting the studs by their tenons in the mortises, according as they were prepared,
The blows of the mallets and hammers.
—Walt Whitman.

Are the tools without, which the carpenter puts forth his hands to, or are they and all the carpentry within himself; and would he not smile at the notion that chest or house is more than he?—Cyrus A. Bartol.

Castles in the Air

A sigh can shatter a castle in the air.—W. R. Alger.

No tribute is laid on castles in the air.—Churchill.

Leave glory to great folks. Ah, castles in the air cost a vast deal to keep up!—Bulwer-Lytton.

Leaving the wits the spacious air,
With license to build castles there.
—Swift.

Charming Alnaschar visions! it is the happy privilege of youth to construct you.—Thackeray.

Thus we build on the ice, thus we write on the waves of the sea; the waves roaring pass away, the ice melts, and away goes our palace, like our thoughts.—Herder.

If you have built castles in the air, your work need not be lost; that is where they should be. Now put the foundations under them.—Thoreau.

Ever building, building to the clouds, still building higher, and never reflecting that the poor narrow basis cannot sustain the giddy tottering column—Schiller.

Happy season of virtuous youth, when shame is still an impassable barrier, and the sacred air-cities of hope have not shrunk into the mean clay hamlets of reality; and man, by his nature, is yet infinite and free.—Carlyle.

In all assemblies, though you wedge them ever so close, we may observe this peculiar property, that over their heads there is room enough; but how to reach it is the difficult point. To this end the philosopher's way in all ages has been by erecting certain edifices in the air.—Swift.

Cat

Mrs. Crupp had indignantly assured him that there wasn't room to swing a cat there; but as Mr. Dick justly observed to me, sitting down on the foot of the bed, nursing his leg, "You know, Trotwood, I don't want to swing a cat. I never do swing a cat. Therefore what does that signify to me!"—Dickens.

If 'twere not for my cat and dog,
I think I could not live.

—Ebenezer Elliott.

Confound the cats! All cats—always—
Cats of all colors, black, white, gray;
By night a nuisance and by day—

Confound the cats!
—Dobbin.

It has been the providence of nature to give this creature nine lives instead of one.—Pilpay.

Cause

A rotten cause abides no handling.—Shakespeare.

God hides Himself behind causes.—Charles Rollin.

God befriend us, as our cause is just.—Shakespeare.

A noble cause doth ease much a grievous case.—Sir Philip Sidney.

To all facts there are laws,
The effect has its cause, and I mount to the cause.—Lord Lytton.

I would seek unto God and unto God would I commit my cause.—Bible.

The first springs of great events, like those of great rivers, are often mean and little.—Swift.

In war events of importance are the result of trivial causes.—Cæsar.

The cause is hidden, but the result is known.—Ovid.

Happy the man who has been able to learn the causes of things.—Virgil.

We know the effects of many things, but the cause of few; experience, therefore, is a surer guide than imagination, and inquiry than conjecture.—Colton.

Every effect doth, after a sort, contain, or at least resemble, the cause from which it proceedeth.—Hooker.

Small are the seeds fate does unheeded sow
Of slight beginnings to important ends.
—Davenant.

It becomes extremely hard to disentangle our idea of the cause from the effect by which we know it.—Burke.

The great chain of causes, which, linking one to another, even to the throne of God Himself, can never be unraveled by any industry of ours.—Burke.

Those physical difficulties which you cannot account for, be very slow to arraign; for he that would be wiser than Nature would be wiser than God.—Jeremy Bentham.

The general idea of cause is that without which another thing, called the effect, cannot be. The final cause is that for the sake of which anything is done.—Lord Morpeth.

To legislate each duty, were to count
Drops of a stream that issue from one fount.
God gives, since all effects are in their
cause,
For narrow precepts universal laws.
—Abraham Coles.

Small causes are sufficient to make a man uneasy, when great ones are not in the way; for want of a block, he will stumble at a straw.—Swift.

Caution

Hasten slowly.—Augustus Cæsar.

Pitchers have ears.—Shakespeare.

Little boats should keep near shore.—Franklin.

The cautious seldom err.—Confucius.

Caution is the lower story of prudence.—Carlyle.

All is to be feared where all is to be lost.—Byron.

Caution, though very often wasted, is a good risk to take.—H. W. Shaw.

Among mortals second thoughts are wisest.—Euripides.

A hare is not caught with a drum.—
La Fontaine.

Be cautious and bold.—Rothschild.

Be slow of tongue and quick of eye.—
Cervantes.

Caution is the eldest child of wisdom.—Victor Hugo.

It is a good thing to learn caution by the misfortunes of others.—Publius Syrius.

Man's caution often into danger turns, and his guard falling crushes him to death.—Young.

When clouds are seen, wise men put on their cloaks.—Shakespeare.

Who 'scapes the snare
Once, has a certain caution to beware.
—Chapman.

Open your mouth and purse cautiously, and your stock of wealth and reputation shall, at least in repute, be great.—Zimmermann.

The way out of our narrowness may not be so easy as the way in. The weasel that creeps into the corn-bin has to starve himself before he can leave by the same passage.—Bartol.

I knew a wise man who had it for a by-word when he saw men hasten to a conclusion: "Stay a little, that we may make an end the sooner."—Bacon.

Trust none,
For oaths are straws, men's faiths are wafer cakes,
And hold-fast is the only dog.
—Shakespeare.

The wound of peace is surety,
Surety secure; but modest doubt is called
The beacon of the wise, the 'tent that searches
To the bottom of the worst.
—Shakespeare.

When you have need of a needle, you move your fingers delicately, with a wise caution. Use the same precaution with the inevitable dullness of life; give attention; keep yourself from imprudent precipitation; and do not take it by the point.—Rance.

But now so wise and wary was the knight
By trial of his former harms and cares,
That he descry'd and shunned still his slight;
The fish, that once was caught, new bait will hardly bite.
—Spenser.

The bird alighteth not on the spread net when it beholds another bird in the snare. Take warning by the misfortunes of others, that others may not take example from you.—Saadi.

Celibacy

No man can either live piously or die righteous without a wife.—Richter.

Marriage has in it less of beauty, but more of safety, than the single life.—
Jeremy Taylor.

"As to marriage or celibacy, let a man take which course he will," says Socrates, "he will be sure to repent."—
Colton.

God has set the type of marriage through creation. Each creature seeks its perfection in another.—Luther.

Alas! many an enamored pair have courted in poetry, and after marriage lived in prose.—John Foster.

Thales was reputed to be one of the wise men who made answer to the question when a man should marry: "A young man not yet, an old man not at all."—Bacon.

It happens, as with cages: the birds without despair to get in, and those within despair of getting out.—Montaigne.

Even supposing there were some spiritual advantage in celibacy, it ought to be completely voluntary.— Whately.

Might I have had my own will, I would not have married Wisdom herself, if she would have had me.—Montaigne.

Though bachelors be the strongest stakes, married men are the best binders in the hedge of the commonwealth.—Thomas Fuller.

They that have grown old in a single state are generally found to be morose, fretful, and captious,—tenacious of their own practices and maxims.—Dr. Johnson.

Unmarried men are best friends, best masters, best servants, but not always best subjects; for they are light to run away, and almost all fugitives are of that condition.—Bacon.

Celerity

Celerity is the lazy man's enemy.—R. Lowe.

Celerity wins the race.—Sir John Astley.

Celerity is never more admired
Than by the negligent.
—Shakespeare.

There is no secrecy comparable to celerity; like the motion of a bullet in the air, it flies so swift that it outruns the eye.—Bacon.

The Italians say it is not necessary to be a stag; but we ought not to be a tortoise.—Beaconsfield.

Cemeteries

The Christian cemetery is a memorial and a record. It is not a mere field in which the dead are stowed away unknown; it is a touching and beautiful history, written in family burial plots, in mounded graves, in sculptured and inscribed monuments. It tells the story of the past,—not of its institutions, or its wars, or its ideas, but of its individual lives,—of its men and women and children, and of its household. It is silent, but eloquent; it is common, but it is unique. We find no such history elsewhere; there are no records in all the wide world in which we can discover so much that is suggestive, so much that is pathetic and impressive.—Joseph Anderson.

Censure

Censure is the tax a man pays to the public for being eminent.—Swift.

The villain's censure is extorted praise.—Pope.

The death of censure is the death of genius.—Simms.

There is no defense against reproach except obscurity.—Addison.

Censure pardons the ravens, but rebukes the doves.—Juvenal.

The censure of those that are opposed to us is the nicest commendation that can be given us.—St. Evremond.

Censure is often useful, praise often deceitful.—Churchill.

We must not stint our necessary actions in the fear to cope malicious censurers.—Shakespeare.

Censure is like the lightning which strikes the highest mountains.—Balthasar Gracian.

The readiest and surest way to get rid of censure is to correct ourselves.—Demosthenes.

He that accuses all mankind of corruption ought to remember that he is sure to convict only one.—Burke.

We do not like our friends the worse because they sometimes give us an opportunity to rail at them heartily. Their faults reconcile us to their virtues.—Hazlitt.

Few persons have sufficient wisdom to prefer censure which is useful to them to praise which deceives them.—La Rochefoucauld.

Others proclaim the infirmities of a great man with satisfaction and complacency, if they discover none of the like in themselves.—Addison.

These men (chronic fault-finders) should consider that it is their envy which deforms everything, and that the ugliness is not in the object, but in the eye.—Steele.

Invective may be a sharp weapon, but overuse blunts its edge. Ever when the denunciation is just and true it is an error of art to indulge it too long.—Tyndall.

When the tongue is the weapon, a man may strike where he cannot reach; and a word shall do execution both further and deeper than the mightiest blow.—South.

To arrive at perfection, a man should have very sincere friends, or inveterate enemies; because he would be made sensible of his good or ill conduct either by the censures of the one or the admonitions of the others.—Diogenes.

Some men's censures are like the blasts of rams' horns before the walls of Jericho; all a man's fame they lay level at one stroke, when all they go upon is only conceit, without any certain basis.—J. Beaumont.

Horace appears in good humor while he censures, and therefore his censure has the more weight as supposed to proceed from judgment, not from passion.—Young.

It is undoubtedly true, though it may seem paradoxical,—but, in general, those who are habitually employed in finding and displaying faults are unqualified for the work of reformation.—Burke.

O that the too censorious world would learn
This wholesome rule, and with each other bear;
But man, as if a foe to his own species,
Takes pleasure to report his neighbors' faults.
Judging with rigor every small offense,
And prides himself in scandal. Few there are
Who injured take the part of the transgressor
And plead his pardon ere he deigns to ask it. —Haywood.

It is harder to avoid censure than to gain applause; for this may be done by one great or wise action in an age. But to escape censure a man must pass his whole life without saying or doing one ill or foolish thing.—Hume.

There are but three ways for a man to revenge himself of the censure of the world,—to despise it, to return the like, or to endeavor to live so as to avoid it; the first of these is usually pretended, the last is almost impossible, the universal practice is for the second.—Swift.

Plutarch tells us of an idle and effeminate Etrurian who found fault with the manner in which Themistocles had conducted a recent campaign. "What," said the hero in reply, "have you, too, something to say about war, who are like the fish that has a sword, but no heart?" He is always the severest censor on the merits of others who has the least worth of his own.—E. L. Magoon.

He that abuses his own profession will not patiently bear with any one else who does so. And this is one of our most subtle operations of self-love. For when we abuse our own profession, we tacitly except ourselves; but when another abuses it, we are far from being certain that this is the case.—Colton.

It is a folly for an eminent man to think of escaping censure, and a weakness to be affected with it. All the illustrious persons of antiquity, and indeed of every age in the world, have passed through this fiery persecution. There is no defense against reproach but obscurity; it is a kind of concomitant to greatness, as satires and invectives were an essential part of a Roman triumph.—Addison.

Ceremony

Ceremonies are the outworks of manners.—Chesterfield.

Truth and ceremony are two things.—Marcus Antoninus.

What art thou, thou idol ceremony?
What kind of god art thou, that suffer'st more
Of mortal griefs than do thy worshippers?
—Shakespeare.

There are ceremonious bows that repress one like a cudgel.—Bovee.

When love begins to sicken and decay it useth an enforced ceremony.—Shakespeare.

Ceremony is all backbone.—Haliburton.

To feed were best at home;
From thence the sauce to meat is ceremony;
Meeting were bare without it.
—Shakespeare.

Candlesticks and incense not being portable into the maintop, the sailor perceives these decorations to be, on the whole, inessential to a maintop mass. Sails must be set and cables bent, be it never so strict a saint's day; and it is found that no harm comes of it. Absolution on a lee-shore must be had of the breakers, it appears, if at all: and they give plenary and brief without listening to confession.—Ruskin.

Ceremony was but devis'd at first
To set a gloss on faint deeds, hollow welcomes,
Recanting goodness, sorry ere 'tis shown.
—Shakespeare.

Forms and regularity of proceeding, if they are not justice, partake much of the nature of justice, which, in its highest sense, is the spirit of distributive order.—Hare.

If we use no ceremony towards others, we shall be treated without any. People are soon tired of paying trifling attentions to those who receive them with coldness, and return them with neglect.—Hazlitt.

As ceremony is the invention of wise men to keep fools at a distance, so good breeding is an expedient to make fools and wise men equal.—Steele.

What infinite heart's ease
Must kings neglect, that private men enjoy?
And what have kings that privates have not too,
Save ceremony, save general ceremony?
—Shakespeare.

O ceremony, show me but thy worth!
What is thy soul of adoration?
Art thou aught else but place, degree, and form,
Creating awe and fear in other men?
—Shakespeare.

Ceremony keeps up things: 'tis like a penny glass to a rich spirit, or some excellent water; without it the water were spilt, and the spirit lost.—Selden.

Chance

Chance governs all.—Milton.

Chance is a nickname for Providence.—Chamfort.

Time and chance happeneth to them all.—Bible.

The generality of men have, like plants, latent properties, which chance brings to light.—Rochefoucauld.

Chance generally favors the prudent.—Joubert.

Chance is a second master.—Pliny the Elder.

Such is the chance of war.—Homer.

How slight a chance may raise or sink a soul!—Bailey.

Chance is a word void of sense; nothing can exist without a cause.—Voltaire.

Chance is blind and is the sole author of creation.—Saintine.

Chance corrects us of many faults that reason would not know how to correct.—Rochefoucauld.

Discouragement seizes us only when we can no longer count on chance.—George Sand.

The opposites of apparent chance are constancy and sensible interposition.—Paley.

Chance often gives us that which we should not have presumed to ask.—Lamartine.

Chance never helps those who do not help themselves.—Sophocles.

I have set my life upon a cast, and I will stand the hazard of the die.—Shakespeare.

Chance is a kind of god, for it preserves many things which we do not observe.—Menander.

Chance happens to all, but to turn chance to account is the gift of few.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The mines of knowledge are oft laid bare through the forked hazel wand of chance.—Tupper.

Chance is but the pseudonyme of God for those particular cases which He does not choose to subscribe openly with His own sign-manual.—Coleridge.

Nature goes on her way, and all that to us seems an exception is really according to order.—Goethe.

To talk of luck and chance only shows how little we really know of the laws which govern cause and effect.—Hosea Ballou.

Many shining actions owe their success to chance, though the general or statesman runs away with the applause.—Lord Kames.

Chance is but a mere name, and really nothing in itself; a conception of our minds, and only a compendious way of speaking.—Bentley.

I do not believe such a quality as chance exists. Every incident that happens must be a link in a chain.—Beaconsfield.

How often events, by chance and unexpectedly, come to pass, which you had not dared even to hope for!—Terence.

Chance is always powerful; let your hook always be cast. In a pool where you least expect it there will be a fish.—Ovid.

There is no such thing as chance; and what seems to us merest accident springs from the deepest source of destiny.—Schiller.

Although men flatter themselves with their great actions, they are not so often the result of a great design as of chance.—La Rochefoucauld.

There is no doubt such a thing as chance, but I see no reason why Providence should not make use of it.—Simms.

But as the unthought-on accident is guilty To what we wildly do, so we profess Ourselves to be the slaves of chance, and flies Of every wind that blows.—Shakespeare.

All nature is but art unknown to thee, All chance, direction, which thou canst not see.—Pope.

There must be chance in the midst of design; by which we mean that events which are not designed necessarily arise from the pursuit of events which are designed.—Paley.

As the ancients wisely say Have a care o' th' main chance, And look before you ere you leap; For as you sow y'are like to reap.—Butler.

To admit that there is any such thing as chance, in the common acceptance of the term, would be to attempt to establish a power independent of God.—Colton.

What can be more foolish than to think that all this rare fabric of heaven and earth could come by chance, when all the skill of art is not able to make an oyster!—Jeremy Taylor.

Be not too presumptuously sure in any business; for things of this world depend upon such a train of unseen chances that if it were in man's hands to set the tables, yet is he not certain to win the game.—George Herbert.

Chance never writ a legible book; chance never built a fair house; chance never drew a neat picture; it never did any of these things, nor ever will; nor can it be without absurdity supposed able to do them; which yet are works very gross and rude, very easy and feasible, as it were, in comparison to the production of a flower or a tree.—Barrow.

It is strictly and philosophically true in Nature and reason that there is no such thing as chance or accident; it being evident that these words do not signify anything really existing, anything that is truly an agent or the cause of any event; but they signify merely men's ignorance of the real and immediate cause.—Adam Clarke.

Can that which is not shape, shape the things that are?
Is chance omnipotent—resolve me why
The meanest shellfish, and the noblest brute, Transmit their likeness to the years that come?
—Dilnot Sladden.

Chance is a term we apply to events to denote that they happen without any necessary or foreknown cause. When we say a thing happens by chance, we mean no more than that its cause is unknown to us, and not, as some vainly imagine, that chance itself can be the cause of anything.—C. Buck.

Chance will not do the work—Chance sends the breeze;
But if the pilot slumber at the helm,
The very wind that wafts us towards the port
May dash us on the shelves.—The steersman's part is vigilance,
Blow it or rough or smooth. —Scott.

There are chords in the human heart—strange varying strings—which are only struck by accident; which will remain mute and senseless to appeals the most passionate and earnest, and respond at last to the slightest casual touch. In the most insensible or childish minds there is some train of reflection which art can seldom lead or skill assist, but which will reveal itself, as great truths have done, by chance, and when the discoverer has the plainest and simplest end in view.—Dickens.

Surely no man can reflect, without wonder, upon the vicissitudes of human life arising from causes in the highest degree accidental and trifling. If you trace the necessary concatenation of human events a very little way back, you may perhaps discover that a person's very going in or out of a door has been the means of coloring with misery or happiness the remaining current of his life.—Lord Greville.

Change

I am not what I once was.—Horace.

All things human change.—Tennyson.

Nought may endure but mutability.—Shelley.

Revolutions are not made; they come.—Wendell Phillips.

Do not think that years leave us and find us the same!—Lord Lytton.

Change still doth reign, and keep the greater sway.—Spenser.

Change generally pleases the rich.—Horace.

And one by one in turn, some grand mistake
Casts off its bright skin yearly like the snake. —Byron.

What I possess I would gladly retain; change amuses the mind, yet scarcely profits.—Goethe.

In this world of change, nought which comes stays, and nought which goes is lost.—Mme. Swetchine.

All things must change
To something new, to something strange. —Longfellow.

"Passing away" is written on the world, and all the world contains.—Mrs. Hemans.

As hope and fear alternate chase
Our course through life's uncertain race. —Scott.

Earth changes, but thy soul and God stand sure.—Robert Browning.

To the mind,
Which is itself, no changes bring surprise. —Byron.

Nothing maintains its bloom forever; age succeeds age.—Cicero.

Bodies are slow of growth, but are rapid in their dissolution.—Tacitus.

As the rolling stone gathers no moss,
so the roving heart gathers no affection.—Mrs. Jameson.

The lazy ox wishes for horse-trappings, and the steed wishes to plough.
—Horace.

The stone that is rolling can gather no moss.
Who often removeth is suer of loss.
—Tusser.

He pulls down, he builds up, he changes squares into circles.—Horace.

The world is a scene of changes, and to be constant in nature were inconsistency.—Cowley.

I am not now
That which I have been. —Byron.

The great world spins forever down the ringing grooves of change.—Tennyson.

Manners with fortunes, humors turn with climes,
Tenets with books and principles with times.
—Pope.

Changing hands without changing measures is as if a drunkard in a dropsy should change his doctors, and not his diet.—Saville.

There is nothing in the world that remains unchanged. All things are in perpetual flux, and every shadow is seen to move.—Ovid.

Weep not that the world changes—did it keep
A stable, changeless state, it were cause indeed to weep.
—Bryant.

Believe, if thou wilt, that mountains change their places, but believe not that man changes his nature.—Mohammed.

Alack, this world
Is full of change, change, change—nothing but change!
—D. M. Mulock.

This world is not for aye, nor 'tis not strange
That even our loves should with our fortunes change.
—Shakespeare.

Can any one find out in what condition his body will be, I do not say a year hence, but this evening?—Cicero.

There is nothing better fitted to delight the reader than change of circumstances and varieties of fortune.—Cicero.

The world goes up and the world goes down,
And the sunshine follows the rain;
And yesterday's sneer and yesterday's frown
Can never come over again.
—Charles Kingsley.

He is less likely to be mistaken who looks forward to a change in the affairs of the world than he who regards them as firm and stable.—Guicciardini.

All that's bright must fade—
The brightest still the fleetest;
All that's sweet was made
But to be lost when sweetest.
—Moore.

'Tis well to be merry and wise,
'Tis well to be honest and true;
'Tis well to be off with the old love
Before you are on with the new.
—Maturin.

Weary the cloud falleth out of the sky,
Dreary the leaf lieth low.
All things must come to the earth by and by,
Out of which all things grow.
—Lord Lytton.

Thus times do shift; each thing his turn does hold;
New things succeed, as former things grow old.
—Herrick.

Gather ye rosebuds while ye may,
Old Time is still a flying;
And that same flower that blooms to-day,
To-morrow shall be dying. —Herrick.

As the blessings of health and fortune have a beginning, so they must also find an end. Everything rises but to fall, and increases but to decay.—Sallust.

Ships, wealth, general confidence—
All were his;
He counted them at break of day,
And when the sun set! where were they?
—Byron.

Everything that is created is changed by the laws of man; the earth does not know itself in the revolution of years; even the races of man assume various forms in the course of ages.—Manilius.

So many great nobles, things, administrations,

So many high chieftains, so many brave nations,

So many proud princes, and powers so splendid,

In a moment, a twinkling, all utterly ended.
—Abraham Coles.

We do not know either unalloyed happiness or unmitigated misfortune. Everything in this world is a tangled yarn; we taste nothing in its purity; we do not remain two moments in the same state. Our affections as well as bodies, are in a perpetual flux.—Rousseau.

Time fleeth on,

Youth soon is gone,

Naught earthly may abide;

Life seemeth fast,

But may not last—

It runs as runs the tide.—Leland.

To-day is not yesterday; we ourselves change; how can our works and thoughts if they are always to be the fittest, continue always the same? Change, indeed, is painful; yet ever needful; and if memory have its force and worth, so also has hope.—Carlyle.

Joy comes and goes, hope ebbs and flows

Like the wave;

Change doth unknit the tranquil strength of men.

Love lends life a little grace,

A few sad smiles; and then,

Both are laid in one cold place,

In the grave.

—Matthew Arnold.

This is the state of man: To-day he puts forth

The tender leaves of hope; to-morrow blossoms,

And bears his blushing honors thick upon him;

The third day comes a frost, a killing frost, And, when he thinks, good easy man, full surely

His greatness is a-ripening, nips his root. And then he falls, as I do.—Shakespeare.

The life of any one can by no means be changed after death; an evil life can in no wise be converted into a good life, or an infernal into an angelic life; because every spirit, from head to foot, is of the character of his love, and, therefore, of his life; and to convert this life into its opposite would be to destroy the spirit utterly.—Swedenborg.

Such are the vicissitudes of the world, through all its parts, that day and night, labor and rest, hurry and retirement, endear each other; such are the changes that keep the mind in action: we desire, we pursue, we obtain, we are satiated; we desire something else and begin a new pursuit.—Johnson.

All things that we ordained festival,
Turn from their office to black funeral;
Our instruments to melancholy bells,
Our wedding cheer to a sad burial feast,
Our solemn hymns to sullen dirges change,
Our bridal flowers serve for a buried corse,
And all things change them to the contrary.
—Shakespeare.

Perfection is immutable. But for things imperfect, change is the way to perfect them. It gets the name of wilfulness when it will not admit of a lawful change to the better. Therefore constancy without knowledge cannot be always good. In things ill it is not virtue, but an absolute vice.—Feltham.

Character

Nothing endures but personal qualities.—Walt Whitman.

Character is a perfectly educated will.—Novalis.

The man that makes a character makes foes.—Young.

No talent, but yet a character.—Heine.

Character makes its own destiny.—Mrs. Campbell Praed.

The great hope of society is individual character.—Channing.

Character must be kept bright as well as clean.—Chesterfield.

Character is very much a matter of health.—Bovee.

Human improvement is from within outward.—Froude.

Our character is our will; for what we will we are.—Archbishop Manning.

Weakness of character is the only defect which cannot be amended.—Rochevoucauld.

No change of circumstances can repair a defect of character.—Emerson.

Happiness is not the end of life; character is.—Beecher.

You must look into people as well as at them.—Chesterfield.

We are sometimes as different from ourselves as we are from others.—Rochevoucauld.

As your enemies and your friends, so are you.—Lavater.

In this world a man must either be anvil or hammer.—Longfellow.

Character lives in a man, reputation outside of him.—J. G. Holland.

Character is what nature has engraven in us; can we then efface it?—Voltaire.

Character is the diamond that scratches every other stone.—Bartol.

Character is centrality, the impossibility of being overthrown.—Emerson.

A good name is better than precious ointment.—Eccles. vii. 1.

The most striking characters are sometimes the product of an infinity of little accidents.—Danton.

The fine tints and fluent curves which constitute beauty of character.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The most careful reasoning characters are very often the most easily abashed.—Mme. de Staël.

Every one is as God made him, and often a great deal worse.—Cervantes.

Talent is nurtured in solitude; character is formed in the stormy billows of the world.—Goethe.

Men and brethren, a simple trust in God is the most essential ingredient in moral sublimity of character.—Richard Fuller.

Individuality is everywhere to be guarded and honored as the root of all good.—Jean Paul Richter.

Actions, looks, words, steps from the alphabet by which you may spell characters.—Lavater.

Our character is but the stamp on our souls of the free choice of good or evil we have made through life.—J. C. Geikie.

Character is moral order seen through the medium of an individual nature.—Emerson.

Characters never change. Opinions alter,—characters are only developed.—Disraeli.

Strong characters are brought out by change of situation, and gentle ones by permanence.—Richter.

All men are like in their lower natures; it is in their higher characters that they differ.—Bovee.

I'm called away by particular business. But I leave my character behind me.—Sheridan.

Every one is least known to himself, and it is very difficult for a man to know himself.—Cicero.

Many persons carry about their character in their hands, not a few under their feet.—Murillo.

You may depend upon it that he is a good man whose intimate friends are all good.—Lavater.

Only what we have wrought into our character during life can we take away with us.—Humboldt.

I have learned by experience that no man's character can be eventually injured but by his own acts.—Rowland Hill.

Character gives splendor to youth, and awe to wrinkled skin and grey hairs.—Emerson.

Fine natures are like fine poems; a glance at the first two lines suffices for a guess into the beauty that waits you if you read on.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Learn now of the treachery of the Greeks, and from one example the character of the nation may be known.—Virgil.

The true greatness of nations is in those qualities which constitute the greatness of the individual.—Charles Sumner.

Give me the character and I will forecast the event. Character, it has in substance been said, is "victory organized."—Bovee.

Love, hope, fear, faith,—these make humanity;
These are its sign, and note, and character.
—Robert Browning.

Every man has in himself a continent of undiscovered character. Happy is he who acts the Columbus to his own soul.—Sir J. Stevens.

Not in the clamor of the crowded street,
Not in the shouts and plaudits of the throng,
But in ourselves, are triumph and defeat.
—Longfellow.

Character is higher than intellect.
* * * A great soul will be strong to live, as well as to think.—Emerson.

Every man has three characters—that which he exhibits, that which he has, and that which he thinks he has.—Alphonse Karr.

There is a kind of character in thy life,
That to the observer doth thy history
Fully unfold. —Shakespeare.

There are peculiar ways in men, which discover what they are, through the most subtle feints and closest disguises.—La Bruyère.

In all our reasonings concerning men

we must lay it down as a maxim that the greater part are moulded by circumstances.—Robert Hall.

We do not judge men by what they are in themselves, but by what they are relatively to us.—Mme. Swetchine.

As the present character of a man, so his past, so his future. Who recollects distinctly his past adventures knows his destiny to come.—Lavater.

To judge human character rightly, a man may sometimes have very small experience, provided he has a very large heart.—Bulwer-Lytton.

It is by presence of mind in untried emergencies that the native metal of a man is tested.—Lowell.

The most brilliant qualities become useless when they are not sustained by force of character.—Ségur.

Circumstances form the character; but, like petrifying matters, they harden while they form.—Landor.

He is truly great that is little in himself, and that maketh no account of any height of honors.—Thomas à Kempis.

He whose life seems fair, if all his errors and follies were articulated against him, would seem vicious and miserable.—Jeremy Taylor.

A good character when established should not be rested in as an end, but only employed as a means of doing still further good.—Atterbury.

There never has been a great and beautiful character, which has not become so by filling well the ordinary and smaller offices appointed of God.—Horace Bushnell.

It is in men as in soils where sometimes there is a vein of gold which the owner knows not of.—Swift.

Character, like porcelain ware, must be printed before it is glazed. There can be no change after it is burned in.—Beecher.

Character is made up of small duties faithfully performed—of self-denials, of self-sacrifices, of kindly acts of love and duty.—Anon.

Character shows itself apart from genius as a special thing. The first point of measurement of any man is that of quality.—T. W. Higginson.

Let the character as it began be preserved to the last; and let it be consistent with itself.—Horace.

Everything that happens to us leaves some trace behind; everything contributes imperceptibly to make us what we are.—Goethe.

Certain trifling flaws sit as disgracefully on a character of elegance as a ragged button on a court dress.—Lavater.

This is that which we call character,—a reserved force which acts directly by presence, and without means.—Emerson.

Never does a man portray his own character more vividly than in his manner of portraying another.—Richter.

Individual character is in the right that is in strict consistence with itself. Self-contradiction is the only wrong.—Schiller.

We are not that we are, nor do we treat or esteem each other for such, but for that we are capable of being.—Thoreau.

When you have discovered a stain in yourself, you eagerly seek for and gladly find stains in others.—Auerbach.

The man who consecrates his hours
By vigorous effort and an honest aim,
At once he draws the sting of life and
death;
He walks with nature, and her paths are peace.
—Young.

There is in every man a certain feeling that he has been what he is from all eternity, and by no means become such in time.—Schelling.

Those with whom we can apparently become well acquainted in a few moments are generally the most difficult to rightly know and to understand.—Hawthorne.

He that is good will infallibly become better, and he that is bad will as certainly become worse; for vice, virtue, and time are three things that never stand still.—Colton.

Conflict, which rouses up the best and highest powers in some characters, in others not only jars the whole being, but paralyzes the faculties.—Mrs. Jameson.

Many men build as cathedrals were built,—the part nearest the ground finished, but that part which soars toward heaven, the turrets and the spires, forever incomplete.—Beecher.

In common discourse we denominate persons and things according to the major part of their character; he is to be called a wise man who has but few follies.—Watts.

Character is not cut in marble; it is not something solid and unalterable. It is something living and changing, and may become diseased as our bodies do.—George Eliot.

Whatever capacities there may be for enjoyment or for suffering in this strange being of ours, and God only knows what they are, they will be drawn out wholly in accordance with character.—Mark Hopkins.

Some characters are like some bodies in chemistry; very good, perhaps, in themselves, yet fly off and refuse the least conjunction with each other.—Lord Greville.

Fame is what you have taken,
Character's what you give;
When to this truth you waken,
Then you begin to live.
—Bayard Taylor.

It was observed of Elizabeth that she was weak herself, but chose wise counsellors; to which it was replied, that to choose wise counsellors was, in a prince, the highest wisdom.—Colton.

Character is the spiritual body of the person, and represents the individualization of vital experience, the conversion of unconscious things into self-conscious men.—Whipple.

Who'er amidst the sons
Of reason, valor, liberty and virtue,
Displays distinguished merit, is a noble
Of Nature's own creating. —Thomson.

A man's character is like his shadow which sometimes follows, and sometimes precedes him, and which is occasionally longer, occasionally shorter than he is.—From the French.

The best rules to form a young man are to talk little, to hear much, to reflect alone upon what has passed in company, to distrust one's own opinions, and value others that deserve it.—Sir William Temple.

Those who quit their proper character to assume what does not belong to them are, for the greater part, ignorant both of the character they leave and of the character they assume.—Burke.

Man can have strength of character only as he is capable of controlling his faculties; of choosing a rational end; and, in its pursuit, of holding fast to his integrity against all the might of external nature.—Mark Hopkins.

In society every man is taken for what he gives himself out to be; but he must give himself out to be something. Better to be slightly disagreeable than altogether insignificant.—Goethe.

There are many persons of whom it may be said that they have no other possession in the world but their character, and yet they stand as firmly upon it as any crowned king.—Samuel Smiles.

Rugged strength and radiant beauty—
These were one in Nature's plan;
Humble toil and heavenward duty—
These will form the perfect man.
—Sarah J. Hale.

The effect of character is always to command consideration. We sport and toy and laugh with men or women who have none, but we never confide in them.—Simms.

A German writer observes: "The noblest characters only show themselves in their real light. All others act comedy with their fellow-men even unto the grave."—Lady Blessington.

I hope I shall always possess firmness and virtue enough to maintain what I consider the most enviable of all titles, the character of an "honest man."—George Washington.

In our relations with the people around us, we forgive them more readily for what they do, which they can help, than for what they are, which they cannot help.—Mrs. Jameson.

What is the true test of character, unless it be its progressive development in the bustle and turmoil, in the action and reaction of daily life?—Goethe.

These two things, contradictory as they may seem, must go together,—manly dependence and manly independence, manly reliance and manly self-reliance.—Wordsworth.

The most accomplished persons have usually some defect, some weakness in their characters, which diminishes the lustre of their brighter qualifications.—Junius.

It is amusing to detect character in the vocabulary of each person. The adjectives habitually used, like the inscriptions on a thermometer, indicate the temperament.—Tuckerman.

The keen spirit
Seizes the prompt occasion—makes the thought
Start into instant action, and at once
Plans and performs, resolves and executes.
—Hannah More.

It is in the relaxation of security; it is in the expansion of prosperity: it is in the hour of dilatation of the heart, and of its softening into festivity and pleasure, that the real character of men is discerned.—Burke.

As there is much beast and some devil in man, so is there some angel and some God in him. The beast and the devil may be conquered, but in this life never destroyed.—Coleridge.

Your disposition will be suitable to that which you most frequently think on; for the soul is, as it were, tinged with the color and complexion of its own thoughts.—Marcus Antoninus.

A man who shows no defect is a fool or a hypocrite, whom we should mistrust. There are defects so bound to fine qualities that they announce them,—defects which it is well not to correct.—Joubert.

Duke Chartres used to boast that no man could have less real value for character than himself, yet he would gladly give twenty thousand pounds for a good one, because he could immediately make double that sum by means of it.—Colton.

Where the vivacity of the intellect and the strength of the passions exceed the development of the moral faculties the character is likely to be embittered or corrupted by extremes, either of adversity or prosperity.—Mrs. Jameson.

A man is what he is, not what men say he is. His character no man can touch. His character is what he is before his God and his Judge; and only himself can damage that. His reputation is what men say he is. That can be damaged; but reputation is for time, character is for eternity.—John B. Gough.

The two most precious things this side the grave are our reputation and our life. But it is to be lamented that the most contemptible whisper may deprive us of the one, and the weakest weapon of the other.—Colton.

Should any man tell you that a mountain had changed its place, you are at liberty to doubt it if you think fit; but if any one tells you that a man has changed his character, do not believe it.—Mahomet.

Each man forms his duty according to his predominant characteristic; the stern require an avenging judge; the gentle, a forgiving father. Just so the pygmies declared that Jove himself was a pygmy.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Joy and grief decide character. What exalts prosperity? what imbibes grief? what leaves us indifferent? what interests us? As the interest of man, so his God,—as his God, so he.—Lavater.

As fire when thrown into water is cooled down and put out, so also a false accusation when brought against a man of the purest and holiest character boils over and is at once dissipated and vanishes.—Cicero.

A man's character is the reality of himself; his reputation, the opinion others have formed about him; character resides in him, reputation in other people; that is the substance, this is the shadow.—Beecher.

The noblest contribution which any man can make for the benefit of posterity is that of a good character. The richest bequest which any man can leave to the youth of his native land is that of a shining, spotless example.—Winthrop.

It is a common error, of which a wise man will beware, to measure the worth of our neighbor by his conduct towards ourselves. How many rich souls might we not rejoice in the knowledge of, were it not for our pride! —Richter.

To know a people's character, we must see it at its homes, and look chiefly to the humbler abodes where that portion of the people dwells which makes the broad basis of the national prosperity.—Kossuth.

There are beauties of character which, like the night-blooming cereus, are closed against the glare and turbulence of every-day life, and bloom only in shade and solitude, and beneath the quiet stars.—Tuckerman.

A man is known to his dog by the smell, to his tailor by the coat, to his friend by the smile; each of these know him, but how little or how much depends on the dignity of the intelligence. That which is truly and indeed characteristic of the man is known only to God.—Ruskin.

Although genius always commands admiration, character most secures respect. The former is more the product of the brain, the latter of heart-power; and in the long run it is the heart that rules in life.—Samuel Smiles.

Grit is the grain of character. It may generally be described as heroism materialized.—spirit and will thrust into heart, brain, and backbone, so as to form part of the physical substance of the man.—Whipple.

He that has light within his own clear breast,
May sit 't' his centre, and enjoy bright day;
But he that hides a dark soul, and foul thoughts,
Benighted walks under the mid-day sun;
Himself is his own dungeon. —Milton.

Character halts without aid of the imagination, which our classes in Shakespeare and Browning, music and drawing, recognize not only as amusement and by-play of the mind, but a co-ordinate power. Its work is unhappily styled fiction; for to idealize is to realize.—Bartol.

The highest of characters, in my estimation, is his who is as ready to pardon the moral errors of mankind as if he were every day guilty of some himself; and at the same time as cautious of committing a fault as if he never forgave one.—Pliny the Younger.

The only equitable manner in my opinion, of judging the character of a man is to examine if there are personal calculations in his conduct: if there are not, we may blame his manner of judging, but we are not the less bound to esteem him.—Madame de Staël.

He's truly valiant that can wisely suffer
The worst that man can breathe;
And make his wrongs his outsidings;
To wear them like his raiment, carelessly;
And ne'er prefer his injuries to his heart,
To bring it into danger. —Shakespeare.

Never get a reputation for a small perfection if you are trying for fame in a loftier area. The world can only judge by generals, and it sees that those who pay considerable attention to minutiae seldom have their minds occupied with great things.—Bulwer-Lytton.

A good character is, in all cases, the fruit of personal exertion. It is not inherited from parents, it is not created by external advantages, it is no necessary appendage of birth, wealth, talents or station; but it is the result of one's own endeavors.—Hawes.

As nature made every man with a nose and eyes of his own, she gave him a character of his own, too; and yet we, O foolish race! must try our very best to ape some one or two of our neighbors, whose ideas fit us no more than their breeches!—Thackeray.

Remedy your deficiencies, and your merits will take care of themselves. Every man has in him good and evil. His good is his valiant army, his evil is his corrupt commissariat; reform the commissariat and the army will do its duty.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The amiable and the severe, Mr. Burke's sublime and beautiful, by different proportions, are mixed in every character. Accordingly, as either is predominant, men imprint the passions of love or fear. The best punch depends on a proper mixture of sugar and lemons.—Shenstone.

It is not what a man gets, but what a man is that he should think of. He should first think of his character and then of his condition. He that has character need have no fears about his condition. Character will draw after it condition. Circumstances obey principles.—Beecher.

Many men are mere warehouses full of merchandise—the head, the heart, are stuffed with goods. * * * There are apartments in their souls which were once tenanted by taste, and love, and joy, and worship, but they are all deserted now, and the rooms are filled with earthy and material things.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Character is the product of daily, hourly actions, and words and thoughts: daily forgivenesses, unselfishness, kindnesses, sympathies, charities, sacrifices for the good of others, struggles against temptation, submissiveness under trial. Oh, it is these, like the blending colors in a picture or the blending notes of music which constitute the man.—J. R. Macduff.

Brains and character rule the world. The most distinguished Frenchman of the last century said: "Men succeed less by their talents than their character." There were scores of men a hundred years ago who had more intellect than Washington. He outlives and overrides them all by the influence of his character.—Wendell Phillips.

The craft with which the world is made runs also into the mind and character of men. No man is quite sane; each has a vein of folly in his composition, a slight determination of blood to the head, to make sure of holding him hard to some one point which Nature has taken to heart.—Emerson.

It is an error common to many to take the character of mankind from the worst and basest amongst them; whereas, as an excellent writer has observed, nothing should be esteemed as characteristic of a species but what is to be found amongst the best and the most perfect individuals of that species.—Fielding.

We should not be too hasty in bestowing either our praise or censure on mankind, since we shall often find such a mixture of good and evil in the same character, that it may require a very accurate judgment and a very elaborate inquiry to determine on which side the balance turns.—Fielding.

We must have a weak spot or two in a character before we can love it much. People that do not laugh or cry, or take more of anything than is good for them, or use anything but dictionary words, are admirable subjects for biographies. But we don't always care most for those flat-pattern flowers that press best in the herbarium.—Holmes.

Modern engineers, after having erected a viaduct, insist upon subjecting it to a severe strain by a formal trial trip before allowing it to be opened for public traffic, and it would almost seem that God, in employing moral agents for the carrying out of His purposes, secures that they shall be tested by some dreadful ordeal before He fully commits to them the work which He wishes them to perform.—Wm. M. Taylor.

Ordinary people regard a man of a certain force and inflexibility of character as they do a lion. They look at him with a sort of wonder—perhaps they admire; but they will, on no account, house with him. The lap dog, who wags his tail and licks the hand and cringes at the nod of every stranger, is a much more acceptable companion to them.—Merkel.

Avoid connecting yourself with characters whose good and bad sides are unmixed and have not fermented together; they resemble vials of vinegar and oil; or pallets set with colors; they are either excellent at home and insufferable abroad, or intolerable within doors and excellent in public; they are unfit for friendship, merely because their stamina, their ingredients of character are too single, too much apart; let them be finely ground up with each other, and they are incomparable.—Lavater.

Every man has at times in his mind the ideal of what he should be, but is not. This ideal may be high and complete, or it may be quite low and insufficient; yet in all men that really seek to improve, it is better than the actual character. * * * Man never falls so low that he can see nothing higher than himself.—Theodore Parker.

Formed on the good old plan,
A true and brave and downright honest
man!
He blew no trumpet in the market-place,
Nor in the church with hypocritic face Supplied with cant the lack of Christian
grace;
Loathing pretense, he did with cheerful will What others talked of while their hands were still. —Whittier.

Very great personages are not likely to form very just estimates either of others or of themselves; their knowledge of themselves is obscured by the battery of others; their knowledge of others is equally clouded by circumstances peculiar to themselves. For in the presence of the great, the modest are sure to suffer from too much diffidence, and the confident from too much display.—Colton.

A great character, founded on the living rock of principle, is, in fact, not a solitary phenomenon, to be at once perceived, limited and described. It is a dispensation of Providence, designed to have not merely an immediate but a continuous, progressive and never-ending agency. It survives the man who possessed it; survives his age—perhaps his country, his language.—Ed. Everett.

Character is always known. Thefts never enrich; alms never impoverish; murder will speak out of stone walls. The least admixture of a lie—for example, the taint of vanity, any attempt to make a good impression, a favorable appearance—will instantly vitiate the effect. But speak the truth and all nature and all spirits help you with unexpected furtherance.—Emerson.

Instead of saying that man is the creature of circumstance, it would be nearer the mark to say that man is the architect of circumstance. It is character which builds an existence out of circumstance. Our strength is measured by our plastic power. From the same materials one man builds palaces, another hovels; one warehouses, another villas; bricks and mortar are mortar and bricks until the architect can make them something else.—Carlyle.

Decision of character is one of the most important of human qualities, philosophically considered. Speculation, knowledge, is not the chief end of man; it is action. * * * "Give us the man," shout the multitude, "who will step forward and take the responsibility." He is instantly the idol, the lord and the king among men. He, then, who would command among his fellows, must excel them more in energy of will than in power of intellect.—Burnap.

There are some characters who appear to superficial observers to be full of contradiction, change and inconsistency, and yet they that are in the secret of what such persons are driving at, know that they are the very reverse of what they appear to be, and that they have one single object in view, to which they as pertinaciously adhere through every circumstance of change, as the hound to the hare, through all her mazes and doublings. We know that a windmill is eternally at work to accomplish one end, although it shifts with every variation of the weather-cock, and assumes ten different positions in a day.—Colton.

Charity

For charity shall cover the multitude of sins.—Bible.

Charity is the scope of all God's commands.—Chrysostom.

He is truly great who hath a great charity.—Thomas à Kempis.

Charity, which renders good for bad, blessings for curses.—Shakespeare.

What we frankly give, forever is our own.—Granville.

They serve God well who serve His creatures.—Mrs. Norton.

As the purse is emptied the heart is filled.—Victor Hugo.

True charity, a plant divinely nurs'd.—Cowper.

And learn the luxury of doing good.—Goldsmith.

Gently to hear, kindly to judge.—Shakespeare.

That comes too late that comes for the asking.—Seneca.

Charity is a virtue of the heart and not of the hands.—Addison.

Gifts and alms are the expressions, not the essence, of this virtue.—Addison.

Charity is an eternal debt and without limit.—Pasquier Quesnel.

Be charitable and indulgent to every one but yourself.—Joubert.

But when thou doest alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth.—Matthew vi. 3.

Did universal charity prevail, earth would be a heaven and hell a fable.—Colton.

Charity resembleth fire, which inflameth all things it toucheth.—Erasmus.

We are rich only through what we give, and poor only through what we refuse.—Madame Swetchine.

That charity which is the perfection and ornament of religion.—Addison.

The drying up a single tear has more Of honest fame, than shedding seas of gore.—Byron.

An effort made for the happiness of others lifts us above ourselves.—L. M. Child.

No communication or gift can exhaust genius or impoverish charity.—Lavater.

Faith and hope themselves shall die, while deathless charity remains.—Prior.

A friar who asks alms for God's sake begs for two.—Calderon.

You must have a genius for charity as well as for anything else.—Thoreau.

Alas for the rarity of Christian charity under the sun.—Hood.

The place of charity, like that of God, is everywhere.—Professor Vinet.

You find people ready enough to do the Samaritan, without the oil and twopenny.—Sydney Smith.

A poor man serv'd by thee, shall make thee rich.—Mrs. Browning.

There can be no Christianity where there is no charity.—Colton.

To pity distress is but human; to relieve it is Godlike.—Horace Mann.

I will chide no breather in the world but myself; against whom I know most faults.—Shakespeare.

Wherever the tree of beneficence takes root, it sends forth branches beyond the sky!—Saadi.

A tear for pity and a hand
Open as day for melting charity.
—Shakespeare.

There is no dearth of charity in the world in giving, but there is comparatively little exercised in thinking and speaking.—Sir Philip Sidney.

For true charity
Though ne'er so secret finds its just reward.
—May.

Charity ever finds in the act reward, and needs no trumpet in the receiver.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Large charity doth never soil, but only whiten soft white hands.—Lowell.

That charity which longs to publish itself, ceases to be charity.—Hutton.

The secret pleasure of a generous act is the great mind's great bribe.—Dryden.

The smallest act of charity shall stand us in great stead.—Atterbury.

True charity is liable to excesses and transports.—Massillon.

My poor are my best patients. God pays for them.—Boerhaave.

A hand as fruitful as the land that feeds us: His dew falls everywhere.—Shakespeare.

'Tis not enough to help the feeble up,
But to support him after.—Shakespeare.

The highest exercise of charity is charity towards the uncharitable.—Buckminster.

The heart of a girl is like a corn

ent—the holier the cloister, the more charitable the door.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Cast thy bread upon the waters; for thou shalt find it after many days.—Bible.

It is fruition, and not possession, that renders us happy.—Montaigne.

It was sufficient that his wants were known, true charity makes other's wants its own.—Robert Danborne.

And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity.—Bible.

No sound ought to be heard in the church but the healing voice of Christian charity.—Burke.

A woman who wants a charitable heart wants a pure mind.—Haliburton.

Nothing will make us so charitable and tender to the faults of others as by self-examination thoroughly to know our own.—Fénelon.

Good is no good, but if it be spend, God giveth good for none other end.—Spenser.

The charities that soothe and heal and bless, lie scattered at the feet of men like flowers.—Wordsworth.

There is no virtue can be sooner missed or later welcomed; it begins the rest, and sets them all in order.—Middleton.

Give to him that asketh thee; and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away.—Matthew.

He who receives a good turn should never forget it; he who does one should never remember it.—Charron.

Defer not charities till death. He who does so is rather liberal of another man's substance than his own.—Stretch.

With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right—as God gives us to see the right

—let us strive on to finish the work we are in.—Abraham Lincoln

How white are the fair robes of charity, as she walketh amid the lowly habitations of the poor!—Hosea Bal-lou.

Posthumous charities are the very essence of selfishness, when bequeathed by those who, when alive, would part with nothing.—Colton.

Earth has not a spectacle more glorious or more fair to show than this—love tolerating intolerance; charity covering, as with a veil, even the sin of the lack of charity.—F. W. Robertson.

Charity is that sweet-smelling savor of Jesus Christ, which vanishes and is extinguished from the moment that it is exposed.—Massillon.

Charity itself consists in acting justly and faithfully in whatever office, business and employment a person is engaged in.—Swedenborg.

Ah! what a divine religion might be found out if charity were really made the principle of it instead of faith!—Shelley.

It is wicked to withdraw from being useful to the needy, and cowardly to give way to the worthless.—Epictetus.

A rich man without charity is a rogue; and perhaps it would be no difficult matter to prove that he is also a fool.—Fielding.

Our possessions are wholly in our performances. He owns nothing to whom the world owes nothing.—Simms.

It is with charity as with money—the more we stand in need of it, the less we have to give away.—Bovee.

Prayer carries us half way to God, fasting brings us to the door of His palace and alms-giving procures us admission.—Koran.

A man should fear when he enjoys only what good he does publicly. Is

It not the publicity, rather than the charity, that he loves?—Beecher.

In all works of liberality something more is to be considered besides the occasion of the givers; and that is the occasion of the receivers.—Thomas Sprat.

In giving alms, let us rather look at the needs of the poor than his claim to your charity.—J. Petit-Senn.

True charity is spontaneous and finds its own occasion; it is never the offspring of importunity, nor of emulation.—Hosea Ballou.

We should give as we would receive, cheerfully, quickly and without hesitation; for there is no grace in a benefit that sticks to the fingers.—Seneca.

Charity is a flower not naturally of earthly growth, and it needs manuring with a promise of profit.—Ouida.

That charity is bad which takes from independence its proper pride, from mendicity its salutary shame.—Southey.

It is good to be charitable; but to whom? That is the point. As to the ungrateful, there is not one who does not at last die miserable.—La Fontaine.

Great minds, like heaven, are pleased in doing good, though the ungrateful subjects of their favors are barren in return.—Rowe.

The spirit of the world encloses four kinds of spirits, diametrically opposed to charity—the spirit of resentment, spirit of aversion, spirit of jealousy and the spirit of indifference.—Boswell.

Why should not our solemn duties and our hastening end render us so united that personal contention would be impossible, in a general sympathy, quickened by the breath of a forbearing and pitying charity?—Henry Giles.

Charity in various guises is an intruder the poor see often; but courtesy and delicacy are visitants with which they are seldom honored.—Ouida.

In charity to all mankind, bearing no malice or ill-will to any human being, and even compassionating those who hold in bondage their fellow-men, not knowing what they do.—John Quincy Adams.

He that rightly understands the reasonableness and excellency of charity will know that it can never be excusable to waste any of our money in pride and folly.—William Law.

If thou neglectest thy love to thy neighbor, in vain thou professest thy love to God; for by thy love to God, the love to thy neighbor is begotten, and by the love to thy neighbor thy love to God is nourished.—Francis Quarles.

Though we may sometimes unintentionally bestow our beneficence on the unworthy, it does not take from the merit of the act. For charity doth not adopt the vices of its objects.—Fielding.

Our true acquisitions lie only in our charities. We gain only as we give. There is no beggar so destitute as he who can afford nothing to his neighbor.—Simms.

I would have none of that rigid circumspect charity which is never done without scrutiny, and which always mistrusts the truth of the necessities laid open to it.—Massillon.

Charity is a principle of prevailing love to God and good will to men which effectually inclines one endued with it to glorify God and to do good to others.—Cruden.

Heaven be their resource who have no other but the charity of the world, the stock of which, I fear, is no way sufficient for the many great claims which are hourly made upon it.—Sterne.

Use every man after his desert, and who shall 'scape whipping? Use them after your own honor and dignity; the less they deserve, the more merit is in your bounty.—Shakespeare.

Even the wisdom of God hath not suggested more pressing motives, more powerful incentives to charity, than these, that we shall be judged by it at the last dreadful day.—Atterbury.

What we employ in charitable uses during our lives is given away from ourselves; what we bequeath at our death is given from others only, as our nearest relations.—Atterbury.

Beneficence is a duty. He who frequently practices it, and sees his benevolent intentions realized, at length comes really to love him to whom he has done good.—Kant.

Be not frightened at the hard words "imposition," "imposture;" give, and ask no questions. Cast thy bread upon the waters. Some have, unawares, entertained angels.—Lamb.

Then gently scan your brother man,
Still gentler, sister woman;
Though they may gang a gennin' wrang,
To step aside is human. —Burns.

A beggar through the world am I—
From place to place I wander by.
Fill up my pilgrim's scrip for me,
For Christ's sweet sake and charity.
—Lowell.

It maketh God man, and man God;
things temporal, eternal; mortal, immortal;
it maketh an enemy a friend,
a servant a son, vile things glorious,
cold hearts fiery, and hard things liquid.—St. Bonaventura.

In faith and hope the world will disagree,
But all mankind's concern is charity;
All must be false that thwart this one great end,
And all of God that bless mankind or mend.
—Pope.

As every lord giveth a certain livery to his servants, charity is the very livery of Christ. Our Saviour, Who is the Lord above all lords, would have His servants known by their badge, which is love.—Latimer.

Charity is that rational and constant affection which makes us sacrifice ourselves to the human race, as if we were united with it, so as to form one individual, partaking equally in its adversity and prosperity.—Confucius.

When I die, I should be ashamed to leave enough to build me a monument if there were a wanting friend above ground. I would enjoy the pleasure of what I give by giving it alive and seeing another enjoy it.—Pope.

I have no respect for that self-boasting charity which neglects all objects of commiseration near and around it, but goes to the end of the earth in search of misery, for the purpose of talking about it.—George Mason.

The charities of life are scattered everywhere, enamelling the vales of human beings as the flowers paint the meadows. They are not the fruit of study, nor the privilege of refinement, but a natural instinct.—Bancroft.

He who has never denied himself for the sake of giving has but glanced at the joys of charity. We owe our superfluity, and to be happy in the performance of our duty we must exceed it.—Mme. Swetchine.

I thank heaven I have often had it in my power to give help and relief, and this is still my greatest pleasure. If I could choose my sphere of action now, it would be that of the most simple and direct efforts of this kind.—Niebuhr.

The last, best fruit which comes to late perfection, even in the kindest soul, is tenderness toward the hard, forbearance toward the unbearing, warmth of heart toward the cold, philanthropy toward the misanthropic.—Richter.

In giving of thy alms, inquire not so much into the person, as his necessity. God looks not so much upon the merits of him that requires, as into the manner of him that relieves: if the man deserve not, thou hast given it to humanity.—Quarles.

I have much more confidence in the charity which begins in the home and diverges into a large humanity, than in the world-wide philanthropy which begins at the outside of our horizon to converge into egotism.—Mrs. Jameson.

When thy brother has lost all that he ever had, and lies languishing, and even gasping under the utmost extremities of poverty and distress, dost thou think to lick him whole again only with thy tongue?—South.

Poplicola's doors were opened on the outside, to save the people even the common civility of asking entrance; where misfortune was a powerful recommendation, and where want itself was a powerful mediator.—Dryden.

Shall we repine at a little misplaced charity—we who could no way foresee the effect—when an all-knowing, all-wise Being showers down every day His benefits on the unthankful and undeserving?—Atterbury.

The desire of power in excess caused the angels to fall; the desire of knowledge in excess caused man to fall; but in charity there is no excess, neither can angel or man come in danger by it.—Bacon.

To complain that life has no joys while there is a single creature whom we can relieve by our bounty, assist by our counsels or enliven by our presence, is to lament the loss of that which we possess, and is just as irrational as to die of thirst with the cup in our hands.—Fitzosborne.

Flatter not thyself in thy faith to God, if thou wantest charity for thy neighbor; and think not thou hast charity for thy neighbor, if thou wantest faith to God; where they are not both together, they are both wanting; they are both dead, if once divided.—Quarles.

And when Christ came to implant in human bosoms pure, disinterested Christian charity, He brought it as an exotic from heaven, and God had to coin a name for it, for there was no word in all the polyglots of earth that would properly describe it. The thing itself was a thing, unknown until the angels heralded it and Jesus brought it.

Goodness answers to the theological virtue charity, and admits no excess but error. The desire of power in excess caused the angels to fall; the desire of knowledge in excess caused man to fall; but in charity there is no excess; neither can angel nor man come in danger by it.—Bacon.

The best thing to give to your enemy is forgiveness; to an opponent, tolerance; to a friend, your heart; to your child, a good example; to a father, deference; to your mother, conduct that will make her proud of you; to yourself, respect; to all men, charity.—Mrs. Balfour.

Proportion thy charity to the strength of thy estate, lest God proportion thy estate to the weakness of thy charity; let the lips of the poor be the trumpet of thy gift, lest in seeking applause, thou lose thy reward. Nothing is more pleasing to God than an open hand and a close mouth.—Quarles.

In silence, * * *
Steals on soft-handed Charity,
Tempering her gifts, that seem so free,
By time and place,
Till not a woe the bleak world see,
But finds her grace. —Keble.

There is a debt of mercy and pity of charity and compassion, of relief and succor due to human nature, and payable from one man to another; and such as deny to pay it the distressed in the time of their abundance may justly expect it will be denied themselves in a time of want. "With what measure you mete it shall be measured to you again."—Burkitt.

Charity suffereth long, and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil; rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth; beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.—Bible.

'Mongst all your virtues
I see not charity written, which some call
The first born of religion; and I wonder,
I cannot see it in yours. Believe it, sir,
There is no virtue can be sooner miss'd
Or later welcom'd; it begins the rest,
And sets them all in order.—Middleton.

I have learned from Jesus Christ Himself what charity is, and how we ought to practise it; for He says:
"By this shall all men know that ye are My disciples, if ye love one another." Never can I, therefore, please myself in the hope that I may obtain the name of a servant of Christ if I possess not a true and unfeigned charity within me.—St. Basil.

Whoever would entitle himself after death through the merits of his Redeemer, to the noblest of rewards, let him serve God throughout life in this most excellent of all duties, doing good to our brethren. Whoever is sensible of his offences, let him take this way especially of evidencing his repentance.—Archbishop Secker.

True charity, a plant divinely nursed,
Fed by the love from which it rose at first,
Thrives against hope, and in the rudest
scene,

Storms but enliven its unfading green;
Exub'rant is the shadow it supplies,
Its fruit on earth, its growth above the skies. —Cowper.

Let shining Charity adorn your zeal,
The noblest impulse generous minds can feel. —Aaron Hill.

Would'st thou from sorrow find a sweet relief,
Or is thy heart oppress'd with woe untold?

Balm would'st thou gather for corroding
grief?—

Pour blessings round thee, like a shower of gold. —Carlos Wilcox.

It is an old saying, that charity begins at home; but this is no reason it should not go abroad. A man should live with the world as a citizen of the world; he may have a preference for the particular quarter or square, or even alley, in which he lives, but he should have a generous feeling for the welfare of the whole.—

Cumberland.

The soul of the truly benevolent man does not seem to reside much in his own body. Its life, to a great extent, is a mere reflex of the lives of others. It migrates into their bodies, and identifying its existence with their existence, finds its own happiness in increasing and prolonging their pleasures, in extinguishing or solacing their pains.—Horace Mann.

If there be a pleasure on earth which angels cannot enjoy, and which they might almost envy man the possession of, it is the power of relieving distress—if there be a pain which devils might pity man for enduring, it is the death-bed reflection that we have possessed the power of doing good, but that we have abused and perverted it to purposes of ill.—Colton.

Active beneficence is a virtue of easier practice than forbearance after having conferred, or than thankfulness after having received a benefit.
I know not, indeed, whether it be a greater and more difficult exercise of magnanimity, for the one party to act as if he had forgotten, or for the other as if he constantly remembered the obligation.—Canning.

Shut not thy purse-strings always against painted distress. Act a charity sometimes. When a poor creature (outwardly and visibly such) comes before thee, do not stay to inquire whether the "seven small children," in whose name he implores thy assistance, have a veritable existence. Rake not into the bowels of unwelcome truth to save a halfpenny. It is good to believe him.—Lamb.

In all other human gifts and passions, though they advance nature, yet they are subject to excess; but charity alone admits no excess. For so we see, by aspiring to be like God in power the angels transgressed and fell; by aspiring to be like God in knowledge man transgressed and fell; but by aspiring to be like God in goodness or love, neither man nor angel ever did or shall transgress. For unto that imitation we are called.—Bacon.

Think not you are charitable if the love of Jesus and His brethren be not purely the motive of your gifts. Alas! you might not give your superfluities, but "bestow all your goods to feed the poor;" you might even "give your body to be burned" for them, and yet be utterly destitute of charity, if self-seeking, self-pleasing or self-ends guide you; and guide you they must, until the love of God be by the Holy Ghost shed abroad in your heart.—Haweis.

O chime of sweet Saint Charity,
 Peal soon that Easter morn
 When Christ for all shall risen be,
 And in all hearts new-born!
 That Pentecost when utterance clear
 To all men shall be given,
 When all shall say My Brother here,
 And hear My Son in heaven!
 —Lowell.

The shepherds led the pilgrims to Mount Charity, where they showed them a man that had a bundle of cloth lying before him, out of which he cut coats and garments for the poor that stood about him; yet his bundle or roll of cloth was never the less. Then said they: "What should this be?" "This is," said the shepherds, "to show you that he who has a heart to give of his labor to the poor shall never want wherewithal. 'He that watereth shall be watered himself.' And the cake that the widow gave to the prophet did not cause that she had the less in her barrel."—Bunyan.

That charity alone endures which flows from a sense of duty and a hope in God. This is the charity that treads in secret those paths of misery from which all but the lowest of human wretches have fled; this is that charity which no labor can weary, no ingratitude detach, no horror disgust; that toils, that pardons, that suffers; that is seen by no man, and honored by no man, but, like the great laws of Nature, does the work of God in silence, and looks to a future and better world for its reward.—Sydney Smith.

Almost all the virtues that can be named are enwrap in one virtue of charity and love:—"for it suffereth long," and so it is longanimity; it "is kind," and so it is courtesy;

it "vaunteth not itself," and so it is modesty; it "is not puffed up," and so it is humility; it "is not easily provoked," and so it is lenity; it "thinketh no evil," and so it is simplicity; it "rejoiceth in the truth," and so it is verity; it "beareth all things," and so it is fortitude; it "believeth all things," and so it is faith; it "hopeth all things," and so it is confidence; it "endureth all things," and so it is patience; it "never faileth," and so it is perseverance.—Chillingworth.

Charm

Expression alone can invest beauty with conquering charms.—Fuseli.

Unhappy sex, whose beauty is your snare.—Dryden.

They dazzle our eyes as they fly to our hearts.—Burns.

She whom smiles and tears make equally lovely may command all hearts.—Lavater.

A beautiful woman is the paradise of the eyes.—Fontenelle.

The most beautiful object in the world, it will be allowed, is a beautiful woman.—Macaulay.

Charming women can true converts make; we love the precept for the teacher's sake.—Franklin.

When she passed it seemed like the ceasing of exquisite music.—Longfellow.

A lovely countenance is the fairest of all sights, and the sweetest harmony is the sound of the voice of her whom we love.—Brüyère.

A beautiful hand is an excellent thing in woman; it is a charm that never palls; and better than all, it is a means of fascinating that never disappears.—Beaconsfield.

There is neither spirit nor persistency enough in the whole range of masculine humanity, with but a few rare exceptions, to withstand the artillery of a magnificent woman's charms.—Dr. J. V. C. Smith.

Dean Swift proposed to tax beauty, and to leave every lady to rate her own charms; he said the tax would be cheerfully paid and very productive.—Frederic Saunders.

Charms which, like flowers, lie on the surface and always glitter, easily produce vanity; hence women, wits, players, soldiers, are vain, owing to their presence, figure and dress. On the contrary, other excellences, which lie down like gold and are discovered with difficulty, leave their possessors modest and proud.—Richter.

Chastity

Modesty and chastity are twins.—Mrs. Jameson.

She that has that is clad in complete steel.—Milton.

Of chastity, the ornaments are chaste.—Shakespeare.

The woman that deliberates is lost.—Addison.

As chaste as is the bud ere it be blown.—Shakespeare.

To the pure all things are pure.—Shelley.

Whiter than new snow on a raven's back.—Shakespeare.

Chastity is the seal of grace.—Lady Huntington.

Chastity, like piety, is a uniform grace.—Richardson.

As chaste as unsunn'd snow.—Shakespeare.

Chastity is the ermine of woman's soul.—Queen Elizabeth.

Let women paint their eyes with tints of chastity.—Tertullian.

Chastity, once lost, cannot be recalled; it goes only once.—Ovid.

As pure as a pearl,
And as perfect; a noble and innocent girl
—Lord Lytton.

A woman's character is as delicate as her eye; it can bear no flaw.—G. A. Sala.

For violets plucked, the sweetest showers will ne'er make grow again.—Byron.

A man defines his standing at the court of chastity by his views of women.—Alcott.

Not the mountain ice, congealed to crystals, is so frosty chaste as thy victorious soul, which conquers man, and man's proud tyrant, passion.—Dryden.

Vanity bids all her sons be brave, and all her daughters chaste and courteous.—Sterne.

The most chaste woman may be the most voluptuous, if she truly loves.—Mirabeau.

The supreme sway of chastity over the senses makes her queenly.—Joubert.

There needs not strength to be added to inviolate chastity; the excellency of the mind makes the body impregnable.—Sir P. Sidney.

That chastity of look which seems to hang a veil of purest light over all her beauties, and by forbidding most inflames desire.—Young.

The soul whose bosom lust did never touch
Is God's fair bride; and maidens' souls are such. —Decker.

The soul that is the abode of chastity acquires an energy which enables her to surmount with ease the obstacles that lie along the path of duty.—Joubert.

A beautiful and chaste woman is the perfect workmanship of God, and the true glory of angels, the rare miracle of earth, and the sole wonder of the world.—Hermes.

So dear to heaven is saintly chastity,
That, when a soul is found sincerely so,
A thousand liveried angels lackey her,
Driving far off each thing of sin and guilt.
—Milton.

Consider what importance to society the chastity of women is. Upon that all the property in the world depends. We hang a thief for stealing a sheep; but the unchastity of a woman transfers sheep and farm and all from the right owner.—Dr. Johnson.

A pure mind in a chaste body is the mother of wisdom and deliberation, sober counsels and ingenuous actions, open deportment and sweet carriage, sincere principles and unprejudicate understanding, love of God and self-denial, peace and confidence, holy prayers and spiritual comfort, and a pleasure of spirit infinitely greater than the sottish pleasure of unchastity.—Jeremy Taylor.

In Goethe's drama, Iphigenia defends her chastity, ascribing her firmness to the gods. "No god hath said this: thine own heart hath spoken," answered Thoas, the king. "They only speak to us through our heart," she replies. "Have not I the right to hear them too?" he rejoins. "Thy storm of passion drowns the gentle whisper," adds the maiden, and closes all debate.—Bartol.

Nothing makes a woman more esteemed by the opposite sex than chastity; whether it be that we always prize those most who are hardest to come at, or that nothing besides chastity, with its collateral attendants, truth, fidelity, and constancy, gives the man a property in the person he loves, and consequently endears her to him above all things.—Addison.

Cheerfulness

He who sings frightens away his ills.
—Cervantes.

Let cheerfulness on happy fortune wait.—Dryden.

Be thou of good cheer.—Bible.

Nature designed us to be of good cheer.—Douglas Jerrold.

A good laugh is sunshine in a house.
—Thackeray.

Cheerfulness is an offshoot of goodness and of wisdom.—Bovee.

The inborn geniality of some people amounts to genius.—Whipple.

A light heart lives long.—Shakespeare.

A merry heart goes all the day,
A sad tires in a mile.—Shakespeare.

A man he seems of cheerful yesterdays and confident to-morrows.—Wordsworth.

Cheerfulness is health; the opposite, melancholy, is disease.—Haliburton.

Cheerfulness is the friend and helper of all good graces, and the absence of it is certainly a vice.—Aughey.

The way to cheerfulness is to keep our bodies in exercise and our minds at ease.—Steele.

Cheerful at morn he wakes from short repose,
Breathes the keen air, and carols as he goes.
—Goldsmith.

A merry heart doeth good like a medicine; but a broken spirit drieth the bones.—Bible.

Cheerful looks make every dish a feast, and it is that which crowns a welcome.—Massinger.

The most manifest sign of wisdom is continued cheerfulness.—Montaigne.

What can the Creator see with greater pleasure than a happy creature?—Lessing.

The creed of the true saint is to make the best of life, and make the most of it.—Chapin.

An ounce of cheerfulness is worth a pound of sadness to serve God with.—Fuller.

The burden becomes light which is cheerfully borne.—Ovid.

If there is a virtue in the world at which we should always aim, it is cheerfulness.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The soul that perpetually overflows with kindness and sympathy will always be cheerful.—Parke Godwin.

Cheerfulness is full of significance; it suggests good health, a clear conscience, and a soul at peace with all human nature.—Charles Kingsley.

Such a man, truly wise, creams off Nature, leaving the sour and the dregs for philosophy and reason to lap up.—Swift.

The cheerful live longest in life, and after it, in our regards. Cheerfulness is the offshot of goodness.—Bovee.

The habit of looking on the best side of every event is worth more than a thousand pounds a year.—Johnson.

I like the laughter that opens the lips and the heart,—that shows at the same time pearls and the soul.—Victor Hugo.

Wondrous is the strength of cheerfulness, altogether past calculation its powers of endurance.—Carlyle.

Cheerfulness is like money well expended in charity; the more we dispense of it, the greater our possession.—Victor Hugo.

Not by constraint or severity shall you have access to true wisdom, but by abandonment and childlike mirthfulness.—Thoreau.

Cheerfulness ought to be the viaticum vitæ of their life to the old; age without cheerfulness is a Lapland winter without a sun.—Colton.

Inner sunshine warms not only the heart of the owner, but all who come in contact with it.—J. T. Fields.

Cheerfulness is also an excellent wearing quality. It has been called the bright weather of the heart.—Samuel Smiles.

I have found the saying of the ancients true, that better is a bright comrade on a weary road than a horse-litter.—Charles Reade.

God is glorified, not by our groans, but our thanksgivings; and all good thought and good action claim a natural alliance with good cheer.—Whipple.

Let us be of good cheer, remembering that the misfortunes hardest to bear are those which never happen.—Lowell.

Youth will never live to age unless they keep themselves in breath with exercise, and in heart with joyfulness.—Sir P. Sidney.

If the soul be happily disposed, every thing becomes capable of affording entertainment, and distress will almost want a name.—Goldsmith.

To be free-minded and cheerfully disposed at hours of meat and sleep and of exercise is one of the best precepts of long lasting.—Bacon.

You find yourself refreshed by the presence of cheerful people. Why not make earnest effort to confer that pleasure on others?—L. M. Child.

Between levity and cheerfulness there is a wide distinction; and the mind which is most open to levity is frequently a stranger to cheerfulness.—Blair.

Sweetness of spirit and sunshine is famous for dispelling fears and difficulties; patience is a mighty help to the burden-bearer.—James Hamilton.

If good people would but make their goodness agreeable, and smile instead of frowning in their virtue, how many would they win to the good cause!—Archbishop Usher.

I have always preferred cheerful ness to mirth. The latter I consider as an art, the former as a habit of mind. Mirth is short and transient, cheerfulness fixed and permanent.—Addison.

The lightsome countenance of a friend giveth such an inward decking to the house where it lodgeth, as proudest palaces have cause to envy the gilding.—Sir P. Sidney.

The mind that is cheerful in its present state, will be averse to all solicitude as to the future, and will meet the bitter occurrences of life with a placid smile.—Horace.

To be happy, the passions must be cheerful and gay, not gloomy and melancholy. A propensity to hope and joy is real riches; one to fear and sorrow, real poverty.—Hume.

A cheerful, easy, open countenance will make fools think you a good-natured man, and make designing men think you an undesigning one.—Ches-terfield.

As in our lives so also in our studies, it is most becoming and most wise, so to temper gravity with cheerfulness, that the former may not imbue our minds with melancholy, nor the latter degenerate into licentiousness.—Pliny.

Cheerfulness is just as natural to the heart of a man in strong health as color to his cheek; and wherever there is habitual gloom, there must be either bad air, unwholesome food, improperly severe labor, or erring habits of life.—Ruskin.

True joy is a serene and sober motion; and they are miserably out that take laughing for rejoicing; the seat of it is within, and there is no cheerfulness like the resolutions of a brave mind.—Seneca.

There is no Christian duty that is not to be seasoned and set off with cheerfulness, which in a thousand outward and intermitting crosses may yet be done well, as in this vale of tears.—Milton.

Cheerfulness is, in the first place, the best promoter of health. Repining and secret murmurs of heart give imperceptible strokes to those delicate fibres of which the vital parts are composed.—Addison.

Mirth is like a flash of lightning that breaks through a gloom of clouds and glitters for a moment. Cheerfulness keeps up a daylight in the mind, filling it with a steady and perpetual serenity.—Johnson.

You find yourself refreshed by the presence of cheerful people. Why not make earnest effort to confer that pleasure on others? You will find half the battle is gained if you never allow yourself to say anything gloomy.—Mrs. L. M. Child.

Be thou like the bird perched upon some frail thing, although he feels the branch bending beneath him, yet loudly sings, knowing full well that he has wings.—Mme. de Gasparin.

O God, animate us to cheerfulness! May we have a joyful sense of our blessings, learn to look on the bright circumstances of our lot, and maintain a perpetual contentedness.—Channing.

Cheerfulness charms us with a spell that reaches into eternity; and we would not exchange it for all the soulless beauty that ever graced the fairest form on earth.—Anna Cleaves.

Had she been light, like you,
Of such a merry, nimble, stirring spirit,
She might ha' been a grandam ere she died;
And so may you; for a light heart lives long.
—Shakespeare.

I have observed that in comedies the best actor plays the droll, while some scrub rogue is made the fine gentleman or hero. Thus it is in the farce of life. Wise men spend their time in mirth; it is only fools who are serious.—Bolingbroke.

A cheerful temper spreads like the dawn, and all vapors disperse before it. Even the tear dries on the cheek, and the sigh sinks away half-breathed when the eye of benignity beams upon the unhappy.—Jane Porter.

Cheerfulness bears the same friendly regard to the mind as to the body; it banishes all anxious care and discontent, soothes and composes the passions and keeps them in a perpetual calm.—Addison.

Cheerfulness is always to be kept up if a man is out of pain; but mirth, to a prudent man, should always be accidental. It should naturally arise out of the occasion, and the occasion seldom be laid for it.—Steele.

A cheerful temper, joined with innocence, will make beauty attractive, knowledge delightful and wit good-natured. It will lighten sickness, poverty and affliction, convert ignorance into an amiable simplicity, and render deformity itself agreeable.—Addison.

I live in a constant endeavor to fence against the infirmities of ill-health, and other evils of life, by mirth; being firmly persuaded that every time a man smiles, but much more when he laughs, it adds something to his fragment of life.—Sterne.

Cheerfulness sharpens the edge and removes the rust from the mind. A joyous heart supplies oil to our inward machinery, and makes the whole of our powers work with ease and efficiency; hence it is of the utmost importance that we maintain a contented, cheerful, genial disposition.—Aughey.

Let me play the fool; with mirth and laughter let old wrinkles come; and let my liver rather heat with wine than my heart cool with mortifying groans. Why should a man whose blood is warm within sit like his grandsire cut in alabaster, sleep when he wakes, and creep into the jaundice by being peevish?—Shakespeare.

Levity may be the forced production of folly or vice; cheerfulness is the natural offspring of wisdom and virtue only. The one is an occasional agitation; the other a permanent habit. The one degrades the character; the other is perfectly consistent with the dignity of reason and the steady and manly spirit of religion.—Blair.

Nothing will supply the want of sunshine to peaches, and, to make knowledge valuable, you must have the cheerfulness of wisdom. Whenever you are sincerely pleased you are nourished. The joy of the spirit indicates its strength. All healthy things are sweet-tempered. Genius works in sport, and goodness smiles to the last.—Emerson.

Every human soul has a germ of some flowers within; and they would open if they could only find sunshine and free air to expand in. I always told you that not having enough of sunshine was what ailed the world. Make people happy, and there will not be half the quarrelling or a tenth part of the wickedness there is.—Mrs. L. M. Child.

I have told you of the Spaniard who always put on his spectacles when about to eat cherries, that they might look bigger and more tempting. In like manner I make the most of my enjoyments; and though I do not cast my eyes away from my troubles, I pack them in as little compass as I can for myself, and never let them annoy others.—Southey.

When Goethe says that in every human condition foes lie in wait for us, "invincible only by cheerfulness and equanimity," he does not mean that we can at all times be really cheerful, or at a moment's notice; but that the endeavor to look at the better side of things will produce the habit, and that this habit is the surest safeguard against the danger of sudden evils.—Leigh Hunt.

Cheerfulness is a friend to grace, it puts the heart in tune to praise God. Uncheerful Christians, like the spies, bring an evil report on the good land; others suspect there is something unpleasant in religion, that they who profess it hang their harps upon the willows and walk so dejectedly. Be serious, yet cheerful. Rejoice in the Lord always.—Rev. T. Watson.

There seem to be some persons, the favorites of fortune and darlings of nature, who are born cheerful. "A star danced" at their birth. It is no superficial visibility, but a bountiful and beneficent soul that sparkles in their eyes and smiles on their lips. Their inborn geniality amounts to genius,—the rare and difficult genius which creates sweet and wholesome character, and radiates cheer.—Whipple.

The industrious bee does not stop to complain that there are so many poisonous flowers and thorny branches in his road, but buzzes on, selecting the honey where he can find it, and passing quietly by the places where it is not. There is enough in this world to complain about and find fault with, if men have the disposition. We often travel on a hard and uneven road; but with a cheerful spirit, and a heart to praise God for His mercies, we may walk therein with comfort, and come to the end of our journey in peace.—Dewey.

Give us, O give us, the man who sings at his work! Be his occupation what it may, he is equal to any of those who follow the same pursuit in silent sullenness. He will do more in the same time,—he will do it better,—he will persevere longer. One is scarcely sensible of fatigue whilst he marches to music. The very stars are said to make harmony as they revolve in their spheres. Wondrous is the strength of cheerfulness, altogether past calculation its powers of endurance. Efforts, to be permanently useful, must be uniformly joyous,—a spirit all sunshine,—graceful from very gladness,—beautiful because bright.—Carlyle.

I cannot tell how much I esteem and admire your good and happy temperament. What folly not to take advantage of circumstances, and enjoy gratefully the consolations which God sends us after the afflictive dispensations which He sometimes sees proper to make us feel! It seems to me to be a proof of great wisdom to submit with resignation to the storm, and enjoy the calm when it pleases Him to give it us again.—Madame de Sévigné.

A cheerful spirit is one of the most valuable gifts ever bestowed upon humanity by a kind Creator. It is the sweetest and most fragrant flower of the Spirit, that constantly sends out its beauty and fragrance, and blesses everything within its reach. It will sustain the soul in the darkest and most dreary places of this world. It will hold in check the demons of despair, and stifle the power of discouragement and hopelessness. It is the brightest star that ever cast its radiance over the darkened soul, and one that seldom sets in the gloom of morbid fancies and forboding imaginations.—Aughey.

Child (Death of)

Think of your child, then, not as dead, but as living; not as a flower that has withered, but as one that is transplanted, and touched by a divine hand, is blooming in richer colors and sweeter shades than those of earth.—Hooker.

Better that the light cloud should fade away into heaven with the morning breath, than travail through the weary day to gather in darkness, and in storm.—Bulwer.

Ye have lost a child—nay, she is not lost to you, who is found to Christ; she is not sent away, but only sent before; like unto a star, which going out of our sight, doth not die and vanish, but shineth in another hemisphere.—Rutherford.

When our children die, we drop them into the unknown, shuddering with fear. We know that they go out from us, and we stand, and pity, and wonder. If we receive news that a hundred thousand dollars had been left them by some one dying, we should be thrown into an ecstasy of rejoicing; but when they have gone home to God, we stand, and mourn, and pine, and wonder at the mystery of Providence.—H. W. Beecher.

The dying boy said: "Father, don't you weep for me; when I get to heaven I will go straight to Jesus and tell Him that ever since I can remember you have tried to lead me to Him." I would rather have my children say that of me after I am gone; or if they die before me, I would rather they should take that message to the Master than to have a monument over me reaching to the skies.—D. L. Moody.

How can a mother's heart feel cold or weary
Knowing her dearer self safe, sheltered, warm?

How can she feel her road too dark or dreary,

Who knows her treasure sheltered from the storm?

How can she sin? Our hearts may be unheeding,

Our God forgot, our holy saints defied;
But can a mother hear her dead child pleading.

And thrust those little angel hands aside?
—A. A. Proctor.

It will be hard for you not to ask why this must be. God knows why, and that may be as good to us as though we knew a thousand reasons. I pray God to hold you quiet and patient and uncomplaining, and help you bear the weight of this seemingly unintelligible sorrow. I hope you will remember that this is the only world in which a Christian can suffer, and suffer patiently and meekly. We cannot suffer by and by. God helps us to glorify Him now, when we can.—Maltbie Babcock.

My heart goes out to you—twice over—for the sorrow that has come to you, and for the thought that I could perhaps be a help to you. That shows that you see already one reason why sorrow comes—you turn to me, because I have tasted the same cup. Some day someone will come to you, and you will "comfort with the comfort wherewith you yourself have been comforted." Perfect sympathy cannot spring from the imagination. Only they who have suffered can really sympathize. I am sure you are saying, like the little child in the dark, "Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth." The worst of all losses is a lost sorrow, for then all is lost. Your little child is safe, and I believe your sorrow is safe, too, for you are your Father's child, and you want to please Him. I would not ask "why" if I were you. "How" is a better word—how can I glorify Thee, how well can I show those who know me how the Father can help His child. God's will is not to be borne, but ever to be done. Now you are to do His will under new, hard, distressing and depressing circumstances. If we were pagans, we might hide ourselves and our despair, but we are Christians who say "Our Father" and hear our Saviour's words, "Because I live ye shall live also."—Maltbie Babcock.

Childhood

The child is father of the man.—Wordsworth.

Heaven lies about us in our infancy.—Wordsworth.

A child is an angel dependent on man.—Count de Maistre.

Children are the to-morrow of society.—Whately.

Childhood is the sleep of reason.—Rousseau.

Childhood, whose very happiness is love.—L. E. L. Erinna.

In bringing up a child, think of its old age.—Joubert.

As each one wishes his children to be so they are.—Terence.

The childhood shows the man
As morning shows the day.—Milton.

Better to be driven out from among men than to be disliked of children.—R. H. Dana.

Let nothing foul to either eye or ear reach those doors within which dwells a boy.—Juvenal.

The dutifulness of children is the foundation of all virtues.—Cicero.

Who can foretell for what high cause
This darling of the gods was born?
—Andrew Marvell.

Childhood has no forebodings; but then, it is soothed by no memories of outlived sorrow.—George Eliot.

Children have more need of models than of critics.—Joubert.

Every child walks into existence through the golden gate of love.—Beecher.

The training of children is a profession where we must know to lose time in order to gain it.—Rousseau.

Parents deserve reproof when they refuse to benefit their children by severe discipline.—Petronius Arbitr.

But still I dream that somewhere there must be
The spirit of a child that waits for me.
—Bayard Taylor.

It is better to keep children to their duty by a sense of honor and by kindness than by fear.—Terence.

To a mother, a child is everything; but to a child, a parent is only a link in the chain of her existence.—Lord Beaconsfield.

Children have neither past nor future; and that which seldom happens to us, they rejoice in the present.—La Bruyère.

Man to the last is but a froward child; So eager for the future, come what may, And to the present so insensible.—Rogers.

Thine are the hours and days when both are cheering
And innocent.
—Byron.

Happy child! the cradle is still to thee a vast space; but when thou art a man the boundless world will be too small for thee.—Schiller.

Children are the keys of Paradise; They alone are good and wise,
Because their thoughts, their very lives, are prayer.
—R. H. Stoddard.

We should treat children as God does us, who makes us happiest when He leaves us under the influence of innocent delusions.—Goethe.

I love these little people; and it is not a slight thing when they, who are so fresh from God, love us.—Dickens.

Children sweeten labors, but they make misfortunes more bitter; they increase the cares of life, but they mitigate the remembrance of death.—Bacon.

A simple child,
That lightly draws its breath,
And feels its life in every limb,
What should it know of death?
—Wordsworth.

Oh, for boyhood's time of June,
Crowding years in one brief moon,
When all things I heard or saw,
Me, their master, waited for.
—Whittier.

Alas! regardless of their doom,
The little victims play;
No sense have they of ills to come,
Nor care beyond to-day.
—Gray.

Oh, would I were a boy again,
When life seemed formed of sunny years,
And all the heart then knew of pain
Was wept away in transient tears!
—Mark Lemon.

The tear down childhood's cheek that flows
Is like the dewdrop on the rose,
When next the summer breeze comes by
And waves the bush, the flower is dry.
—Scott.

"Beware," said Lavater, "of him who hates the laugh of a child." "I love God and little children," was the simple yet sublime sentiment of Richter.—Mrs. Sigourney.

While here at home, in shining day,
We round the sunny garden play,
Each little Indian sleepy-head
Is being kissed and put to bed.
—Robert Louis Stevenson.

In winter I get up at night
And dress by yellow candle-light.
In summer, quite the other way,
I have to go to bed by day.
—Robert Louis Stevenson.

If there is anything that will endure
The eye of God, because it still is pure,
It is the spirit of a little child,
Fresh from His hand, and therefore undefiled.
—R. H. Stoddard.

I do not like punishments. You will never torture a child into duty; but a sensible child will dread the frown of a judicious mother more than all the rods, dark rooms, and scolding schoolmistresses in the universe.—H. K. White.

That season of childhood, when the soul, on the rainbow bridge of fancy, glides along, dry-shod, over the walls and ditches of this lower earth.—Richter.

No man can tell but he that loves his children how many delicious assents make a man's heart dance in the pretty conversation of those dear pledges.—Jeremy Taylor.

Ah! what would the world be to us
If the children were no more?
We should dread the desert behind us
Worse than the dark before.
—Longfellow.

A man shall see, where there is a house full of children, one or two of the eldest restricted, and the youngest ruined by indulgence; but in the midst, some that are, as it were, forgotten, who many times, nevertheless, prove the best.—Bacon.

But still when the mists of doubt prevail,
And we lie becalmed by the shores of age,
We hear from the misty troubled shore
The voice of the children gone before,
Drawing the soul to its anchorage.
—Bret Harte.

Ay, these young things lie safe in our hearts just so long
As their wings are in growing; and when these are strong
They break it, and farewell! the bird flies!
—Lord Lytton.

Oh, when I was a tiny boy
My days and nights were full of joy.
My mates were blithe and kind!
No wonder that I sometimes sigh
And dash the teardrop from my eye
To cast a look behind! —Hood.

Pointing to such, well might Cornelia say,
When the rich casket shone in bright array,
"These are my Jewels!" Well of such as he,
When Jesus spake, well might the language be,
"Suffer these little ones to come to me!"
—Samuel Rogers.

A creature undefiled by the taint of the world, unvexed by its injustice, unwearied by its hollow pleasures; a being fresh from the source of light, with something of its universal lustre in it. If childhood be this, how holy the duty to see that in its onward growth it shall be no other!—Douglas Jerrold.

Do ye hear the children weeping, O my brothers,
Ere the sorrow comes with years?
They are leaning their young heads against their mothers,
And that cannot stop their tears.
—E. B. Browning.

Perhaps there lives some dreamy boy, untaught
In schools, some graduate of the field or street,
Who shall become a master of the art,
An admiral sailing the high seas of thought
Fearless and first, and steering with his fleet
For lands not yet laid down in any chart.
—Longfellow.

If a boy is not trained to endure and to bear trouble, he will grow up a girl; and a boy that is a girl has all a girl's weakness without any of her regal qualities. A woman made out of a woman is God's noblest work; a woman made out of a man is His meanest.—Beecher.

An infallible way to make your child miserable is to satisfy all his demands. Passion swells by gratification; and the impossibility of satisfying every one of his demands will oblige you to stop short at last, after he has become a little headstrong.—Henry Home.

When the lessons and tasks are all ended,
And the school for the day is dismissed,
The little ones gather around me,
To bid me good night and be kissed;
Oh, the little white arms that encircle
My neck in their tender embrace;
Oh, the smiles that are halos of heaven,
Shedding sunshine of love on my face.
—Charles M. Dickinson.

When a child can be brought to tears, not from fear of punishment, but from repentance for his offence, he needs no chastisement. When the tears begin to flow from grief at one's own conduct, be sure there is an angel nestling in the bosom.—Horace Mann.

A child's eyes, those clear wells of undefiled thought—what on earth can be more beautiful? Full of hope, love and curiosity, they meet your own. In prayer, how earnest; in joy, how sparkling; in sympathy, how tender! The man who never tried the companionship of a little child has carelessly passed by one of the great pleasures of life, as one passes a rare flower without plucking it or knowing its value.—Mrs. Norton.

Children, ay, forsooth
They bring their own love with them when they come,
But if they come not there is peace and rest;
The pretty lambs! and yet she cries for more;
Why, the world's full of them, and so is heaven—
They are not rare. —Jean Ingelow.

A truthful page is childhood's lovely face,
Whereon sweet Innocence has record made—
An outward semblance of the young heart's grace,
Where truth, and love, and trust are all portrayed. —Shillaber.

Behold, my lords,
Although the print be little, the whole matter
And copy of the father, eye, nose, lip,
The trick of 's frown, his forehead, nay,
The valley,
The pretty dimples of his chin and cheek;
his smiles;
The very mould and frame of hand, nail, finger. —Shakespeare.

You hear that boy laughing? You thing he's all fun;
But the angels laugh, too, at the good he has done.
The children laugh loud as they troop to his call,
And the poor man that knows him laughs loudest of all! —O. W. Holmes.

Dare we let children grow up with no vital contact with the Saviour, never intentionally and consciously put into His arms? Not to bring them to Him, not to teach them to walk toward Him, as soon as they can walk toward anyone, is wronging a child beyond words. The terrible indictment uttered by the Lord, "Them that were entering in ye hindered," and the mill-stone warning for offending little ones, are close akin to the deserts of those who ruin a man's whole day of life by wronging his morning hours. Not to help a child to know the saving power of Christ is to hold back a man from salvation.—Maltbie Babcock.

They are idols of hearts and of households;
They are angels of God in disguise;
His sunlight still sleeps in their tresses;
His glory still gleams in their eyes.
Oh, those truants from home and from heaven,
They have made me more manly and mild,
And I know now how Jesus could liken
The kingdom of God to a child. —Dickens.

The least and most imperceptible impressions received in our infancy have consequences very important, and of a long duration. It is with these first impressions, as with a river whose waters we can easily turn, by different canals, in quite opposite courses, so that from the insensible direction the stream receives at its source, it takes different directions, and at last arrives at places far distant from each other; and with the same facility we may, I think, turn the minds of children to what direction we please.—Locke.

Children

Fragile beginnings of a mighty end.
—Mrs. Norton.

Children like olive plants round about thy table.—Psalm cxxviii. 3.

A rose with all its sweetest leaves yet folded.—Byron.

Living jewels, dropped unstained from heaven.—Pollok.

Children are what the mothers are. —Landor.

Childhood is the sleep of reason.—Rousseau.

A child is an angel dependent on man.—Count de Maistre.

Childhood has no forebodings; but then it is soothed by no memories of outlived sorrow.—George Eliot.

Children are the to-morrow of society.—Whately.

The child is father of the man.—Wordsworth.

Heaven lies about us in our infancy.—Wordsworth.

Unblown flowers, new-appearing sweets.—Shakespeare.

Dispel not the happy delusions of children.—Goethe.

Children blessings seem, but torments are.—Otway.

Just as the twig is bent the tree is inclined.—Pope.

Your little child is your only true democrat.—Mrs. Stowe.

The sports of children satisfy the child.—Goldsmith.

In bringing up a child, think of its old age.—Joubert.

Children have more need of models than of critics.—Joseph Joubert.

Childhood shows the man, as morning shows the day.—Milton.

The smallest children are nearest to God, as the smallest planets are nearest the sun.—Richter.

Children are like grown people; the experience of others is never of any use to them.—Daudet.

Call not that man wretched, who whatever ills he suffers, has a child to love.—Southey.

Children are God's apostles, day by day sent forth to preach of love and hope and peace.—Lowell.

The clew of our destiny, wander where we will, lies at the cradle foot.—Richter.

Never educate a child to be a gentleman or lady alone, but to be a man, a woman.—Herbert Spencer.

Children will grow up substantially what they are by nature—and only that.—Mrs. H. B. Stowe.

Never despair of a child. The one you weep the most for at the mercy-seat may fill your heart with the sweetest joys.—T. L. Cuyler.

Nothing has a better effect upon children than praise.—Sir P. Sidney.

Many children, many cares; no children, no felicity.—Bovee.

The scenes of childhood are the memories of future years.—J. O. Choules.

What gift has Providence bestowed on man, that is so dear to him as his children?—Cicero.

Do not try to produce an ideal child, it would find no fitness in this world.—Herbert Spencer.

The children of to-day will be the architects of our country's destiny in 1900.—James A. Garfield.

Childhood is like a mirror, which reflects in after life the images first presented to it.—Samuel Smiles.

Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it.—Proverbs xxii. 6.

How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is To have a thankless child.—Shakespeare.

The bearing and training of a child is woman's wisdom.—Tennyson.

His little children, climbing for a kiss, welcome their father's late return at night.—Dryden.

Behold the child, by nature's kindly law Pleased with a rattle, tickled with a straw.—Pope.

A mother's love, in a degree, sanctifies the most worthless offspring.—Hosea Ballou.

The glorified spirit of the infant is as a star to guide the mother to its own blissful clime.—Mrs. Sigourney.

Where children are, there is the golden age.—Novalis.

Childhood, who like an April morn appears, Sunshine and rain, hopes clouded o'er with fears.—Churchill.

A torn jacket is soon mended; but hard words bruise the heart of a child.
—Longfellow.

We speak of educating our children.
Do we know that our children also educate us?—Mrs. Sigourney.

Truly there is nothing in the world so blessed or so sweet as the heritage of children.—Mrs. Oliphant.

A woman's natural protector is less an aged father or tall brother than a very young child.—Mme. de Girardin.

The death of a child occasions a passion of grief and frantic tears, such as your end, brother reader, will never inspire.—Thackeray.

I would not have children much beaten for their faults, because I would not have them think bodily pain
the greatest punishment.—Locke.

In the man whose childhood has known caresses, there is always a fibre

Children are the keys of Paradise.

* * * They alone are good and wise, because their thoughts, their very lives are prayer. —Stoddard.

We should treat children as God does us, who makes us happiest when He leaves us under the influence of innocent delusions.—Goethe.

Happy child! the cradle is still to thee a vast space; become a man, and the boundless world will be too small to thee.—Schiller.

What in us the women leave uncultivated, children cultivate when we retain them near us.—Goethe.

It is better to keep children to their duty, by a sense of honor, and by kindness, than by fear and punishment.—Tertullian.

Let your children be as so many flowers, borrowed from God. If the flowers die or wither, thank God for a summer loan of them.—Rutherford.

Children generally hate to be idle; all the care then is that their busy humor should be constantly employed in something of use to them.—Locke.

I seem, for my own part, to see the benevolence of the Deity more clearly in the pleasures of very young children than in anything else in the world.—Paley.

Then gathering 'round his bed, they climb to share His kisses, and with gentle violence there, Break in upon a dream not half so fair. —Rogers.

The sacred books of the ancient Persians say, "If you would be holy, instruct your children, because all the good acts they perform will be imputed to you."—Montesquieu.

A house is never perfectly furnished for enjoyment unless there is a child in it rising three years old, and a kitten rising three weeks.—Southey.

Children must be rendered reasonable, but not reasoners. The first thing to teach them is that it is reasonable for them to obey, and unreasonable for them to dispute.—Joubert.

A child's existence is a bright, soft element of joy, out of which, as in Prospero's Island, wonder after wonder bodies itself forth, to teach by charming.—Rodney.

Ah! what would the world be to us,
If the children were no more?
We should dread the desert behind us
Worse than the dark before. —Longfellow.

As in the Master's spirit you take into your arms the little ones, His own everlasting arms will encircle them and you. He will pity both their and your simplicity; and as in unseen presence He comes again, His blessing will breathe upon you.—James Hamilton.

"A fig-tree looking on a fig-tree becometh fruitful," says the Arabian proverb. And so it is with children; their first great instructor is example.—Samuel Smiles.

In trying to teach children a great deal in a short time, they are treated not as though the race they were to run was for life, but simply a three-mile heat.—Horace Mann.

"Beware," said Lavater, "of him who hates the laugh of a child." "I love God and little children," was the simple yet sublime sentiment of Richter.—Mrs. Sigourney.

Children are very nice observers, and they will often perceive your slightest defects. In general, those who govern children forgive nothing in them, but everything in themselves.—Fénelon.

Is the world all grown up? Is childhood dead? Or is there not in the bosom of the wisest and the best some of the child's heart left, to respond to its earliest enchantments?—Lamb.

We should amuse our evening hours of life in cultivating the tender plants, and bringing them to perfection, before they are transplanted to a happier clime.—Washington.

Children sweeten labors, but they make misfortunes more bitter; they increase the cares of life, but they mitigate the remembrance of death.—Bacon.

While childhood, and while dreams, producing childhood, shall be left, imagination shall not have spread her holy wings totally to fly the earth.—Lamb.

One of the greatest pleasures of childhood is found in the mysteries which it hides from the skepticism of the elders, and works up into small mythologies of its own.—O. W. Holmes.

The first duty toward children is to make them happy. If you have not made them happy, you have wronged them; no other good they may get can make up for that.—Charles Buxton.

Call not that man wretched, who whatever else he suffers as to pain inflicted, or pleasure denied, has a child for whom he hopes and on whom he floats.—Coleridge.

Who feels injustice, who shrinks before a slight, who has a sense of wrong so acute, and so glowing a gratitude for kindness, as a generous boy?—Thackeray.

That season of childhood, when the soul, on the rainbow bridge of fancy, glides along, dry-shod, over the walls and ditches of this lower earth.—Richter.

Oft too the mind well pleased surveys,
Its progress from its childish days;
See how the current upwards ran,
And reads the child o'er in the man.
—Lloyd.

To season them, and win them early to the love of virtue and true labor, by any flattering seducement or vain principle seize them wandering, some easy and delightful book of education should be read to them.—Milton.

Beware of fatiguing them by ill-judged exactness. If virtue offer itself to a child under a melancholy and constrained aspect, if liberty and license present themselves under an agreeable form, all is lost, your labor is in vain.—Fénelon.

If I were to choose among all gifts and qualities that which, on the whole, makes life pleasantest, I should select the love of children. No circumstance can render this world wholly a solitude to one who has this possession.—T. W. Higginson.

I hardly know so melancholy a reflection as that parents are necessarily the sole directors of the management of children, whether they have or have not judgment, penetration or taste to perform the task.—Lord Greville.

The child's grief throbs against the round of its little heart as heavily as the man's sorrow; and the one finds as much delight in his kite or drum as the other in striking the springs of enterprise or soaring on the wings of fame.—Chapin.

A man shall see, where there is a house full of children, one or two of the eldest restricted, and the youngest ruined by indulgence; but in the midst, some that are, as it were, forgotten, who many times, nevertheless, prove the best.—Bacon.

A large portion of Christ's miracles of love were wrought at the urgent request of parents for their suffering children. Is that ear gone deaf to-day? Will He not do for our children's souls what He did for the bodies of the ruler's daughter, and the dead youth at Nain?—T. L. Cuyler.

Of all the sights which can soften and humanize the heart of men, there is none that ought so surely to reach it as that of innocent children, enjoying the happiness which is their proper and natural portion.—Southey.

I never hear parents exclaim impatiently, "Children, you must not make so much noise," that I do not think how soon the time may come when, beside the vacant seat, those parents would give all the world, could they hear once more the ringing laughter which once so disturbed them.—A. E. Kittredge.

Delightful task! to rear the tender thought,
To teach the young idea how to shoot,
To pour the fresh instruction o'er the mind,
To breathe the enlivening spirit and to fix
The generous purpose in the glowing breast! —Thomson.

What art can paint or gild any object in after life with the glow which nature gives to the first baubles of childhood? St. Peter's cannot have the magical power over us that the red and gold covers of our first picture-book possessed.—Emerson.

The children of the poor are so apt to look as if the rich would have been over-blest with such! Alas for the angel capabilities, interrupted so soon with care, and with after life so sadly unfulfilled?—Willis.

Children are the hands by which we take hold of heaven. By these tendrils we clasp it and climb thitherward. And why do we think that we are separated from them? We never half knew them, nor in this world could.—Beecher.

I do not like punishments. You will never torture a child into duty; but a sensible child will dread the frown of a judicious mother more than all the rods, dark rooms, and scolding school-mistresses in the universe.—H. K. White.

Good Christian people, here lies for you an inestimable loan; take all heed thereof, in all carefulness employ it: with high recompense, or else with heavy penalty, will it one day be required back.—Carlyle.

The plays of natural lively children are the infancy of art. Children live in a world of imagination and feeling.

They invest the most insignificant object with any form they please, and see in it whatever they wish to see.—Oehlenschläger.

We are but children, the things that we do
Are as sports of a babe to the Infinite view,
That sees all our weakness, and pities it, too.

And oh! when aweary, may we be so blest
As to sink, like an innocent child, to our rest,
And feel ourselves clasped to the Infinite breast. —F. Burge Smith.

A mother once asked a clergyman when she should begin the education of her child, which she told him was then four years old. "Madam," was the reply, "you have lost three years already. From the very first smile that gleams over an infant's cheek, your opportunity begins."—Whately.

Our children that die young are like those spring bulbs which have their flowers prepared beforehand, and leave nothing to do but to break ground, and blossom, and pass away. Thank God for spring flowers among men, as well as among the grasses of the field.—Beecher.

Happy season of childhood! Kind Nature, that art to all a bountiful mother; that visitest the poor man's hut with auroral radiance; and for thy nursling hast provided a soft swathing of love and infinite hope wherein he waxes and slumbers, danced round by sweetest dreams!—Carlyle.

If a boy is not trained to endure and to bear trouble, he will grow up a girl; and a boy that is a girl has all a girl's weakness without any of her regal qualities. A woman made out of a woman is God's noblest work; a woman made out of a man is His meanest.—Beecher.

When a child can be brought to tears, not from fear of punishment, but from repentance for his offence, he needs no chastisement. When the tears begin to flow from grief at one's own conduct, be sure there is an angel nestling in the bosom.—Horace Mann.

An infallible way to make your child miserable is to satisfy all his demands. Passion swells by gratification; and the impossibility of satisfying every one of his demands will oblige you to stop short at last, after he has become a little headstrong.—Henry Home.

And yet we check and chide
The airy angels as they float about us,
With rules of so-called wisdom, till they grow
The same tame slaves to custom and the world. —Mrs. Osgood.

Look how he laughs and stretches out his arms,
And opens wide his blue eyes upon thine,
To hail his father: while his little form Flutters as wing'd with joy. Talk not of pain!
The childless cherubs well might envy thee
The pleasures of a parent. —Byron.

Train them to virtue; habituate them to industry, activity, and spirit.
Make them consider every vice as shameful and unmanly. Fire them with ambition to be useful. Make them disdain to be destitute of any useful knowledge. Fix their ambition upon great and solid objects, and their contempt upon little, frivolous, and useless ones.—John Adams.

Thine was the shout! the song! the burst of joy!
Which sweet from childhood's rosy lip resounded;
Thine was the eager spirit nought could cloy,
And the glad heart from which all grief
reboundeth. —Mrs. Norton.

I can endure a melancholy man, but not a melancholy child; the former, in whatever slough he may sink, can raise his eyes either to the kingdom of reason or of hope; but the little child is entirely absorbed and weighed down by one black poison-drop of the present.—Mrs. Norton.

As hardly anything can accidentally touch the soft clay without stamping its mark on it, so hardly any reading can interest a child, without contributing in some degree, though the book itself be afterwards totally forgotten, to form the character.—Whately.

It always grieves me to contemplate the initiation of children into the ways of life when they are scarcely more than infants. It checks their confidence and simplicity, two of the best qualities that heaven gives them, and demands that they share our sorrows before they are capable of entering into our enjoyments.—Dickens.

I know that a sweet child is the sweetest thing in nature, not even excepting the delicate creatures which bear them; but the prettier the kind of a thing is, the more desirable it is that it should be pretty of its kind.
One daisy differs not much from another in glory; but a violet should look and smell the daintiest.—Lamb.

A creature undefiled by the taint of the world, unweary by its injustice, un-worn by its hollow pleasures; a being fresh from the source of light, with something of its universal lustre in it.
If childhood be this, how holy the duty to see that in its onward growth it shall be no other!—Douglas Jerrold.

To aid thy mind's development—to watch
Thy dawn of little joys—to sit and see Almost thy very growth—to view thee catch
Knowledge of objects—wonders yet to thee!
To hold thee lightly on a gentle knee,
And print on thy soft cheek a parent's kiss.

A child's eyes, those clear wells of undefiled thought—what on earth can be more beautiful? Full of hope, love and curiosity, they meet your own.
In prayer, how earnest; in joy, how sparkling; in sympathy, how tender!
The man who never tried the companionship of a little child has carelessly passed by one of the great pleasures of life, as one passes a rare flower without plucking it or knowing its value.—Mrs. Norton.

Be very vigilant over thy child in the April of his understanding, lest the frost of May nip his blossoms. While he is a tender twig, straighten him;
whilst he is a new vessel, season him;
such as thou makest him, such commonly shalt thou find him. Let his first lesson be obedience, and his second shall be what thou wilt.—Quarles.

Their future may, perchance, appear dark to others; but to their fearless gaze it looms up brilliant and beautiful as the walls of a fairy palace. There is no tear which a mother's gentle hand cannot wipe away, no wound that a mother's kiss cannot heal, no anguish which the sweet murmuring of her soft, low voice cannot soothe.—Esaias Tegner.

They are idols of hearts and of households;
They are angels of God in disguise;
His sunlight still sleeps in their tresses;
His glory still gleams in their eyes.

Oh, those truants from home and from heaven,

They have made me more manly and mild,
And I know now how Jesus' could liken
The kingdom of God to a child.

—Dickens.

Be ever gentle with the children God has given you; watch over them constantly; reprove them earnestly, but not in anger. In the forcible language of Scripture, "Be not bitter against them." "Yes, they are good boys," I once heard a kind father say. "I talk to them very much, but do not like to beat my children—the world will beat them." It was a beautiful thought, though not elegantly expressed.—Elihu Burritt.

Above all things endeavor to breed them up in the love of virtue, and that holy plain way of it which we have lived in, that the world in no part of it get into my family. I had rather they were homely than finely bred as to outward behavior; yet I love sweetness mixed with gravity, and cheerfulness tempered with sobriety.—William Penn.

Bring your little children to the Saviour. Place them in His arms. Devote them to His service. Born in His camp, let them wear from the first His colors. Taking advantage of timely opportunities, and with all tenderness of spirit, seek to endear them to the Friend of Sinners, the Good Shepherd of the lambs, the loving Guardian of the little children. And not only teach them, but govern them. And in order to govern them, govern yourselves.—James Hamilton.

God sends children for another purpose than merely to keep up the race—to enlarge our hearts, to make us unselfish, and full of kindly sympathies and affections; to give our souls higher aims, and to call out all our faculties to extended enterprise and exertion; to bring rounc our fireside bright faces and happy smiles, and loving, tender hearts. My soul blesses the Great Father every day, that He has gladdened the earth with little children.—Mary Howitt.

A child is man in a small letter, yet the best copy of Adam before he tasted of Eve or the apple; and he is happy whose small practice in the world can only write his character. His soul is yet a white paper unscrawled with observations of the world, wherewith at length it becomes a blurred note-book. He is purely happy because he knows no evil, nor hath made means by sin to be acquainted with misery.—Bishop Earle.

If there is anything that will endure
The eye of God because it still is pure,
It is the spirit of a little child,
Fresh from His hand, and therefore undefiled.

Nearer the gate of Paradise than we,
Our children breathe its airs, its angels see;
And when they pray God hears their simple prayer,
Yea, even sheathes His sword, in judgment bare.

—Stoddard.

Children, like dogs, have so sharp and fine a scent that they detect and hunt out everything—the bad before all the rest. They also know well enough how this or that friend stands with their parents; and as they practice no dissimulation whatever, they serve as excellent barometers by which to observe the degree of favor or disfavor at which we stand with their parents.—Goethe.

Bring together all the children of the universe, you will see nothing in them but innocence, gentleness, and fear; were they born wicked, spiteful, and cruel, some signs of it would come from them; as little snakes strive to bite, and little tigers to tear. But nature having been as sparing of offensive weapons to man as to pigeons and rabbits, it cannot have given them an instinct to mischief and destruction.—Voltaire.

I know he's coming by this sign,
That baby's almost wild;
See how he laughs and crow and starts—
Heaven bless the merry child!
He's father's self in face and limb,
And father's heart is strong in him.
Shout, baby, shout! and clap thy hands,
For father on the threshold stands.
—Mary Howitt.

The least and most imperceptible impressions received in our infancy, have consequences very important, and of a long duration. It is with these first impressions, as with a river whose waters we can easily turn, by different canals, in quite opposite courses, so that from the insensible direction the stream receives at its source, it takes different directions, and at last arrives at places far distant from each other; and with the same facility we may, I think, turn the minds of children to what direction we please.—Locke.

Children's Day (Sunday School)

And they brought young children to Him, that He should touch them; and His disciples rebuked those that brought them. But when Jesus saw it, He was much displeased, and said unto them, Suffer the little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God. Verily I say unto you, whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein. And He took them up in His arms, put His hands upon them, and blessed them.—Bible.

Children are the lambs of the flock. Christ said to the church, "Feed my lambs." The lambs belong to the sheep and the sheep to the shepherd.—Rev. J. J. Barnhardt.

Dr. Holmes was asked when the training of a child should begin. "A hundred years before it is born," he replied. "This is a strong way of putting the truth that the training of children should begin with the training of their grandparents.—S. E. Wishard, D. D.

Anything we do to hinder a child from coming to Jesus greatly displeases our dear Lord. He cries to us, "Stand off. Let them alone. Let them come to Me, and forbid them not."—Spurgeon.

The children should have a part in public services. By enlisting their activities we shall incite them to attendance, for children love to go where they can use their powers.—J. F. Cowan.

Little works, little thoughts, little loves, little prayers for little Christians, and larger and larger as the years grow.—Rev. Chas. H. Parkhurst.

And let me say only this one word more: that the little things that a little Christian does are not overlooked any more than the larger things that an older Christian does.—Rev. Chas. H. Parkhurst.

Shepherd of tender youth,
Guiding in love and truth,
Through devious ways;
Christ, our triumphant King,
We come Thy name to sing,
And here our children bring,
To shout Thy praise.
—St. Ambrose.

Among the old Romans there prevailed the touching custom of holding the face of every new born babe toward the heavens, signifying by their presenting its forehead to the stars that it was to look above the world into celestial glories. That was only a vain superstition; but Christ has taught us how to realize the old Pagan yearning.—Dr. L. A. Banks.

I will say broadly that I have more confidence in the spiritual life of the children that I have received into this church than I have in the spiritual condition of the adults thus received. I will even go further than that, and say that I have usually found a clearer knowledge of the gospel and a warmer love of Christ in the child-converts than in the man-converts. I will even astonish you still more by saying that I have sometimes met with a deeper spiritual experience in children of ten and twelve than I have in certain persons of fifty and sixty.—Spurgeon.

Do not others expect from children more perfect conduct than they themselves exhibit? If a gracious child should lose his temper or act wrongly in some trifling thing through forgetfulness, straightway he is condemned as a little hypocrite by those who are a long way from being perfect themselves. Jesus says, "Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones."—Spurgeon.

When children ask you questions about gray hairs, and wrinkles in the face, and sighs that have no words, and smiles too bright to be carved upon the radiant face by the hands of hypocrisy—when they ask you about kneeling at the altar, speaking into the vacant air, and uttering words to an unseen and in an invisible Presence—when they interrogate you about your great psalms, and hymns, and anthembursts of thankfulness, what is your reply to these? Do not be ashamed of the history. Keep steadily along the line of fact. Say what happened to you, and magnify God in the hearing of the inquirer.—Rev. Joseph Parker.

Ought there to be room in the bonds of church-fellowship for the great mass of average boys and girls who, by judicious training and careful Christian nurture, may be induced very early to give their hearts to God? Aye, we believe with all our heart there ought to be such a place. We believe that before many years there will be such a place in every true church, and it will be just as much expected that many young children will form part of the membership of every church as that there will be gray-haired men and women there.—Rev. F. E. Clark, D. D.

Children should be educated in and into the church. Whatever our theory may be of the spiritual relation of the child to the church, this is certain and true: That children should be consecrated to God from their birth. Of such is the kingdom of heaven. We should assume this as the normal state of the case and treat the child accordingly. He should be trained in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. His first intelligent lesson should be of God and worship. The happiest hours of child-life should be in learning of the way to God through Jesus Christ.—Rev. S. Irenæus Prime, D. D.

But these dear boys and girls—there is something to be made out of them. If now they yield themselves to Christ they may have a long, happy, and holy day before them in which they may serve God with all their hearts. Who knows what glory God may have of them? Heathen lands may call them blessed. Whole nations may be enlightened by them. O brethren and sisters, let us estimate children at their true valuation, and we shall not keep them back, but we shall be eager to lead them to Jesus at once.—Spurgeon.

"Suffer that little children come to Me, Forbid them not." Emboldened by His words,
The mothers onward press; but, finding vain
The attempt to reach the Lord, they trust their babes
To strangers' hands; the innocents, alarmed
Amid the throng of faces all unknown,
Shrink, trembling, till their wandering eyes discern
The countenance of Jesus, beaming love
And pity; eager then they stretch their arms,
And, cowering, lay their heads upon His breast.
—James Grahame.

Few special days in the average Sunday school are looked forward to with such eager expectancy on the part of the scholars as Children's Day. Even fathers and mothers, big brothers and sisters, who perhaps seldom enter church doors, go then if at no other time. With many schools it is practically the end of a year's work and an anniversary corresponding to Commencement Day in our public schools. But in every school it may be a day of unusual opportunity for presenting the joy of the Christ-life and the friendship of the All-Loving One to many who perhaps are not reached at other times during the year.—New Century Teachers' Monthly

Some kind hearts have lived in every generation, but it is only within a few years that the older Christians have come into such perfect love and sympathy with children's needs as to set apart a Sunday for their especial benefit. Those who planned the grand day seem to enjoy it as much as the little ones, for the churches are full of grown-up people, many of them with silvery hair and wrinkled faces; but many of the wrinkles seem to be smoothed out by the happy, fresh looks that come over them when the children's voices are heard taking a prominent part in the worship. We older ones can testify that Children's Day has benefited us in many ways, and is the Sunday of the whole year which we enjoy the best.—Susan Teall Perry.

For you, a boy or girl, to be a Christian will be for you to be as nearly as you can like what Jesus was when He was at your age. That is one reason why it is worth so much to us to have a Jesus that began in the cradle and gradually grew up. If we had a Jesus that was already a man when He came, and hadn't stopped to be a baby and a boy, we should hardly have known what to say to the children about these things; we might have had to say that only grown-up men and women could be Christians. But now we have Jesus all the way along, from eighteen inches up, so that we can say to any one, "You can be a Christian by being as nearly as you can like what Jesus was at your age."—Rev. Chas. H. Parkhurst.

Go, then, ye happy children,
And love Him more and more!
He holds a cup of blessing,
And in it He will pour
All joy and pleasure for you;
And from this day of flowers
Ye all may work for Jesus
And bless this world of ours.
Oh, may the King of children
Be crowned of all His own;
On this sweet day of beauty
Be every heart His throne!
—Rev. Dwight Willis.

As we look and listen we hear with our hearts the cry of myriads of children pleading for the bread of life. What response shall we make to this lifted signal? The offering of Children's Day will measure our love, our gratitude, our appreciation of the divine movement of Providence and of the grand and awful time in which we are living. Let every one, then, give as God has prospered him, and additional Sabbath school missionaries will go forth to many a wilderness, and the solitary place will be glad for them and blossom as the rose.—James A. Worden, D. D.

Most of you will have a very happy Children's Day, we trust; but there will be many of Christ's little ones who will have to be at home on beds of sickness and pain, and cannot go to the Lord's house and worship Him among the beautiful flowers and loving friends who will make everything so attractive. Remember such ones. Carry them flowers and some sweet, helpful words, to make the day less burdensome to them. There may be others obliged to stay away, who have not suitable clothes to wear, because of their poverty. Seek out such and overcome any hindrances in their way that you can, so that as many as possible of Christ's little ones may gather together in His courts on that especial day.—Susan Teall Perry.

Well may the Church keep Children's Day,
And thus draw near the Son,
Who gained His richest human realm,
When children's hearts were won.
Well may the Church keep Children's Day,
And thus draw near the skies,
For in the children's sunny hearts,
The light of heaven lies.
Well may the Church keep Children's Day,
She keeps her greatness then,
E'en now the Christ uplifts a child,
Above all sinful men.
Oh, happy day! Oh, heavenly hour!
When thus the Church shall stand,
Like Christ with smile and touch of grace,
Amid the children's band. Amen.

—George Edward Martin.

And so sweetly adapted is the child-mind to the Gospel and the Gospel to the child-mind that they cheerfully coalesce, and the babe's milk is not more palatable and nutritious than is the bread of life to the new-born soul. No one can say how soon a child may intelligently apprehend the divine truth. Many saints of God have no memory of the period in their early lives when Christ was not dear to their hearts. When they were born from above they do not remember any more than they can recollect the moment when they first breathed the breath of life. It is not so with all; perhaps not so with the most. But the true theory of the Gospel is that children should be brought up on it, as their daily food; be nurtured by it; renewed by the Holy Spirit, and made heirs of salvation.—Rev. S. Irenæus Prime, D. D.

Were we more anxious about the children we would do more work of a Christian kind. The old man seems to be beyond our reach, but the little child seems to be made for Christ. It would seem—do not let us shrink from the term—natural for every little child to put out his arms to cling to the Child of Bethlehem. Save the children and you will purify society; expend your solicitude upon the young, opening, tender life, and you shall see the result of your concern after many days. Services should be constituted for children; the old people have had the sanctuary too long; their ears are sated with eloquence; their minds are stored with names that never turn into inspirations; churches might be built for children, and preachers trained to speak to them alone. We have reversed all things and thus have gone astray. * * * * A poet says he was nearer heaven in his childhood than he ever was in after days, and he sweetly prayed that he might return through his yesterdays and through his childhood back to God. That is chronologically impossible—locally and physically not to be done, and yet that is the very miracle which is to be performed in the soul—in the spirit; we must be “born again.”—Rev. Joseph Parker.

So with the children. It is even more important that religious exercises should not be made irksome and burdensome to them. Too much of a good thing is bad for them. I would not require them to be all the livelong day in a treadmill of religious work. They will be disgusted and hate the service, which should be always attractive to them and a delight. It is a serious question with ministers how to make the pulpit useful and pleasant to the young. Preachers with the gift of talking to children—a gift not so rare as is often thought—sometimes give a brief discourse to the children before the regular sermon. The objection to that practice is that children take it as their portion and dismiss the sermon that follows from their attention altogether. Now the art of talking to children does not consist in baby-talk or little stories or poor jokes. A man need not be a mountebank in order to interest the young in what he is saying. Children are not fools. If a man is simple in his words and earnest in his manner, children will hear with attention and get instruction from a sermon that is designed for the whole people.—Rev. S. Irenæus Prime, D. D.

Chivalry

The age of chivalry has gone, and one of calculators and economists has succeeded.—Burke.

Collision is as necessary to produce virtue in men as it is to elicit fire in inanimate matter; and chivalry is the essence of virtue.—Lord John Russell.

Choice

Choose you this day whom ye shall serve.—Bible.

Preferment goes by letter and affection.—Shakespeare.

There's a small choice in rotten apples.—Shakespeare.

Follow thou thy choice.—William Cullen Bryant.

The measure of choosing well is whether a man likes what he has chosen.—Lamb.

So much to win, so much to lose,
No marvel that I fear to choose.
—Miss Landon.

Be ignorance thy choice where knowledge leads to woe.—Beattie.

God offers to every mind its choice between truth and repose.—Emerson.

When to elect there is but one,
'Tis Hobson's choice; take that or none.
—Thomas Ward.

Life often presents us with a choice of evils, rather than of goods.—C. C. Colton.

Still to ourselves in every place consigned
Our own felicity we make or find.
—Goldsmith.

The strongest principle of growth lies in human choice.—George Eliot.

Rather than be less
Car'd not to be at all. —Milton.

When better cherries are not to be had,
We needs must take the seeming best of bad. —Daniel.

A wise man likes that best, that is itself;
Not that which only seems, though it look fairer. —Middleton.

Choose always the way that seems
the best, however rough it may be.
Custom will render it easy and agreeable.—Pythagoras.

Give house-room to the best; 'tis never known
Verture and pleasure both to dwell in one.
—Herrick.

But for us there are moments, O, how solemn, when destiny trembles in the balance, and the preponderance of either scale is by our own choice.—
Mark Hopkins.

I will not choose what many men desire,
Because I will not jump with common spirits,

And rank me with the barbarous multitudes. —Shakespeare.

"Thy royal will be done—'tis just,"
Replied the wretch, and kissed the dust;
"Since, my last moments to assuage,
Your majesty's humane decree
Has deigned to leave the choice to me,
I'll die, so please you, of old age."
—Horace Smith.

You must make your choice whether to hold on to some thing which cannot save you, or let go, and fall into the hands of the Lord.—Ichabod Spencer.

God has so framed us as to make freedom of choice and action the very basis of all moral improvement, and all our faculties, mental and moral, resent and revolt against the idea of coercion.—Wm. Matthews.

Are we proud and passionate, malicious and revengeful? Is this to be like-minded with Christ, who was meek and lowly?—Tillotson.

The best of men that ever wore earth about Him was a sufferer, a soft, meek, patient, humble, tranquil spirit; the first true gentleman that ever breathed.—Decker.

In His death He is a sacrifice, satisfying for our sins; in the resurrection, a conqueror; in the ascension, a king; in the intercession, a high priest.—Luther.

The Saviour of mankind Himself, in whose blameless life malice could find no act to impeach, has been called in question for words spoken.—Macaulay.

God never gave man a thing to do concerning which it were irreverent to ponder how the Son of God would have done it.—George MacDonald.

Those who have minutely studied the character of the Saviour will find it difficult to determine whether there is most to admire or to imitate in it—there is so much of both.

He came, bringing with Him the knowledge that God is a Being of infinite goodness; that the service required of mankind is not a service of form or ceremony, but a service of obedience.—J. A. Froude.

Hail to the King of Bethlehem,
Who weareth in His diadem
The yellow crocus for the gem
Of His authority. —Longfellow.

The sacrifice of Christ has rendered it just for Him to forgive sin; and whenever we are led to repent of and to forsake it, even the righteousness of God is declared in the pardon of it.—Robert Hall.

That image, or rather that Person, so human, yet so entirely divine, has a power to fill the imagination, to arrest the affections, to deepen and purify the conscience, which nothing else in the world has.—J. C. Shairp.

Poor shepherdless sheep! It was his delight, as the Good Shepherd, to lead them to rich pastures; and as they sat and stood around Him they forgot their bodily wants in the beauty and power of His words.—J. Cunningham Geikie.

The tears of Christ are the pity of God. The gentleness of Jesus is the long-suffering of God. The tenderness of Jesus is the love of God. "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father."—Alexander Maclaren.

Whatever Jesus is, the glorious God-head is; and to have fellowship with the Son is to have fellowship with the Father. To know the love of Christ is to be filled with all the fullness of God.—James Hamilton.

The incarnation of God is a necessity of human nature. If we really and truly have a Father, we must be able to clasp His feet in our penitence, and to lean on His breast in our weary sorrowfulness.—Charles F. Deems.

Remember that vision on the Mount of Transfiguration; and let it be ours, even in the glare of earthly joys and brightnesses, to lift up our eyes, like those wondering three, and see no man any more, save Jesus only.—Alexander Maclaren.

As to Jesus of Nazareth, my opinion of whom you particularly desire, I think the system of morals and His religion, as He left them to us, is the best the world ever saw, or is likely to see.—Benjamin Franklin.

As human voice and instrument blend in one harmony, as human soul and body blend in each act of feeling, thought, or speech, so, as far as we can know, divinity and humanity act together in the thought and heart and act of the one Christ.—A. A. Hodge.

The Christian world has a Leader, the contemplation of whose life and sufferings must administer comfort in affliction, while the sense of His power and omnipotence must give them humiliation in prosperity.—Steele.

The sages and heroes of history are receding from us, and history contracts the record of their deeds into a narrower and narrower page. But time has no power over the name and deeds and words of Jesus Christ.—Channing.

But chiefly Thou, Whom soft-eyed Pity once led down from heaven
To bleed for man, to teach him how to live,
And, oh! still harder lesson! how to die.
—Bishop Porteus.

In those holy fields,
Over whose acres walk'd those blessed feet
Which, fourteen hundred years ago, were nail'd
For our advantage on the bitter cross.
—Shakespeare.

He, the Holiest among the mighty, and the Mightiest among the holy, has lifted with His pierced hands empires off their hinges, has turned the stream of centuries out of its channel, and still governs the ages.—Richter.

Alexander, Cæsar, Charlemagne and I myself have founded empires; but upon what do these creations of our genius depend? Upon force. Jesus alone founded His empire upon love; and to this very day millions would die for Him.—Napoleon I.

The nature of Christ's existence is mysterious, I admit; but this mystery meets the wants of man. Reject it, and the world is an inexplicable riddle; believe it, and the history of our race is satisfactorily explained.—Napoleon.

All the glory and beauty of Christ are manifested within, and there He delights to dwell; His visits there are frequent, His condescension amazing, His conversation sweet, His comforts refreshing; and the peace that He brings passeth all understanding.—Thomas à Kempis.

Lovely was the death
Of Him whose life was Love! Holy with power
He on the thought-benighted Skeptic beamed Manifest Godhead. —Coleridge.

Men who neglect Christ, and try to win heaven through moralities, are like sailors at sea in a storm, who pull, some at the bowsprit and some at the mainmast, but never touch the helm.—Beecher.

It was necessary for the Son to disappear as an outward authority, in order that He might reappear as an inward principle of life. Our salvation is no longer God manifested in a Christ without us, but as a "Christ within us, the hope of glory."—F. W. Robertson.

Every unfulfilled aspiration of humanity in the past; all partial representation of perfect character; all sacrifices, nay, even those of idolatry, point to the fulfillment of what we want, the answer to every longing—the type of perfect humanity, the Lord Jesus Christ.—F. W. Robertson.

Unlike all other founders of a religious faith, Christ had no selfishness, no desire of dominance; and His system, unlike all other systems of worship, was bloodless, boundlessly beneficent, and—most marvelous of all—went to break all bonds of body and soul, and to cast down every temporal and every spiritual tyranny.—William Howitt.

No other fame can be compared with that of Jesus. He has a place in the human heart that no one who ever lived has in any measure rivaled. No name is pronounced with a tone of such love and veneration. All other laurels wither before His. His are ever kept fresh with tears of gratitude.—W. E. Channing.

Christ's whole life on earth was the assertion and example of true manliness—the setting forth in living act and word what man is meant to be, and how he should carry himself in this world of God—one long campaign in which the "temptation" stands out as the first great battle and victory.—Thomas Hughes.

Christ's miracles were vivid manifestations to the senses that He is the Saviour of the body—and now as then the issues of life and death are in His hands—that our daily existence is a perpetual miracle. The extraordinary was simply a manifestation of God's power in the ordinary.—F. W. Robertson.

You never get to the end of Christ's words. There is something in them always behind. They pass into proverbs—they pass into laws—they pass into doctrines—they pass into consolations; but they never pass away, and, after all the use that is made of them, they are still not exhausted.—Dean Stanley.

Christ is the Good Physician. There is no disease He cannot heal; no sin He cannot remove; no trouble He cannot help. He is the Balm of Gilead, the Great Physician who has never yet failed to heal all the spiritual maladies of every soul that has come unto Him in faith and prayer.—Aughey.

I find the life of Christ made up of two parts; a part I can sympathize with as a man, and a part on which I gaze; a beam sent down from heaven which I can see and love, and another beam shot into the infinite, that I cannot comprehend.—Barr.

Star unto star speaks light, and world to world
Repeats the passage of the universe
To God; the name of Christ—the one great word
Well worth all languages in earth or heaven.
—Bailey.

Who did leave His Father's throne,
To assume thy flesh and bone?
Had He life, or had He none?
If He had not liv'd for thee,
Thou hadst died most wretchedly
And two deaths had been thy fee.
—Herbert.

The most destructive criticism has not been able to dethrone Christ as the incarnation of perfect holiness. The waves of a tossing and restless sea of unbelief break at His feet, and He stands still the supreme model, the inspiration of great souls, the rest of the weary, the fragrance of all Christendom, the one divine flower in the garden of God.—Herrick Johnson.

Our Lord's miracles were all essential parts of His one consistent life. They were wrought as evidences not only of His power, but of His mercy. They were throughout moral in their character, and spiritual in the ends contemplated by them. They were in fact embodiments of His whole character, exemplars of His whole teaching, emblems of His whole mission.—James McCosh.

Christ pitied because He loved, because He saw through all the wretchedness, and darkness, and bondage of evil; that there was in every human soul a possibility of repentance, of restoration; a germ of good, which, however stifled and overlaid, yet was capable of recovery, of health, of freedom, of perfection.—Dean Stanley.

It is the grandeur of Christ's character which constitutes the chief power of His ministry, not His miracles or teachings apart from His character. The greatest triumph of the Gospel is Christ Himself—a human body become the organ of the Divine nature, and revealing, under the conditions of an earthly life, the glory of God.—Horace Bushnell.

The "wise men" were journeying to the manger—we to the throne. They to see a babe—we to look upon the King in His beauty. They to kneel and worship—we to sit with Him on His throne. That trembling star shone for them through the darkness of the night, lighting their way—Jesus is always with us, our star of hope; and the pathway is never dark where He leads; for He giveth "songs in the night."—A. E. Kittredge.

Great occasions rally great principles, and brace the mind to a lofty bearing, a bearing that is even above itself. But trials that make no occasion at all, leave it to show the goodness and beauty it has in its own disposition. And here precisely is the superhuman glory of Christ as a character, that He is just as perfect, exhibits just as great a spirit in little trials as in great ones.—Horace Bushnell.

On the head of Christ are many crowns. He wears the crown of victory; He wears the crown of sovereignty; He wears the crown of creation; He wears the crown of providence; He wears the crown of grace; He wears the crown of glory—for every one of His glorified people owes his honor, happiness and blessedness to Him.—Aughey.

Newton supposed that all matter attracted other matter inversely according to the square of the distance; and the hypothesis was found to account for the whole movements of the heavenly bodies; which all became verifications of what Newton supposed to be the law of the solar system. Adopt the hypothesis that Jesus was what He is represented, and the whole of the books and the history becomes a verification.—James McCosh.

When has the world seen a phenomenon like this?—a lonely un instructed youth, coming from amid the moral darkness of Galilee, even more distinct from His age, and from every thing around Him, than a Plato would be rising up in some wild tribe in Oregon, assuming thus a position at the head of the world and maintaining it, for eighteen centuries, by the pure self-evidence of His life and doctrine.—Horace Bushnell.

Christ's divinity accounts for His exaltation to the right hand of God, justifies the worship of angels and the confidence of mankind. It makes clear His right to the throne of the universe, and enables the mind to understand why He is exalted in providence, in grace, and in judgment. It is the unifying truth that harmonizes all other teachings of Christianity, and renders the entire system symmetrical and complete.—George C. Lorimer.

From the moment of His self-dedication, when He threw His cares away, and went forth not knowing where to lay His head, the whole energy which others spend on interests of their own was poured into His human and Divine affections, and filled His life with an enthusiasm restless and unique. However quiet His words, it is impossible not to feel the tender depths from which they come.—James Martineau.

He walked into Judæa eighteen hundred years ago; His sphere melody, flowing in wild native tones, took captive the ravished souls of men, and, being of a truth sphere melody, still flows and sounds, though now with thousandfold accompaniments and rich symphonies, through all our hearts, and modulates and divinely leads them.—Carlyle.

Across the chasm of eighteen hundred years Jesus Christ makes a demand which is beyond all others difficult to satisfy. He asks that for which a philosopher may often seek in vain at the hands of his friends, or a father of his children, or a bride of her spouse, or a man of his brother. He asks for the human heart; he will have it entirely to himself; he demands it unconditionally, and forthwith his demand is granted. Wonderful!—Napoleon I.

It was before Deity embodied in a human form, walking among men, partaking of their infirmities, leaning on their bosoms, weeping over their graves, slumbering in the manger, bleeding on the cross, that the prejudices of the synagogue, and the doubts of the academy, and the pride of the portico, and the fasces of the lictor, and the swords of thirty legions were humbled in the dust.—Macaulay.

Philosophical argument, especially that drawn from the vastness of the universe, in comparison with the insignificance of this globe, has sometimes shaken my reason for the faith that is in me; but my heart has always assured and reassured me that the gospel of Jesus Christ must be a divine reality. The Sermon on the Mount cannot merely be a human production. This belief enters into the very depth of my conscience.—Daniel Webster.

This it is that gives a majesty so pure and touching to the historic figure of Christ; self-abandonment to God, uttermost surrender, without reserve or stipulation, to the guidance of the Holy Spirit from the Soul of souls; pause in no darkness, hesitation in no perplexity, recoil in no extremity of anguish, but a gentle unfaltering hold of the invisible Hand, of the Only Holy and All Good—these are the features that have made Jesus of Nazareth the dearest and most sacred image to the heart of so many ages.—James Martineau.

Think of the majesty of that moment in this dying world's history, when Jesus Christ declared that to the Christian death was only a sleep. Outside of that small dwelling in Capernaum, a great race of men rushed and toiled as they harassed continents and seas; mighty events marshaled themselves into annals and pageants. What was inside? In one inconspicuous chamber of a now forgotten house, man's Redeemer, unobserved, martyred man's final enemy. There Immanuel subdued death forever.—C. S. Robinson.

What is our hope but the indwelling Spirit of Christ, to bring every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christ, to inspire every word and deed by His love? Then will "broken lights" blend in steady shining, the fractional be summed up in the integral, and life, unified and beautified by the central Christ, radiate God's glory, and shine with divine effulgence.—Maltbie Babcock.

Christ was placed midmost in the world's history; and in that central position He towers like some vast mountain to heaven—the farther slope stretching backward toward the creation, the hither slope toward the consummation of all things. The ages before look to Him with prophetic gaze; the ages since behold Him by historic faith; by both He is seen in common as the brightness of the Father's glory, and the unspeakable gift of God to the race.

In Christ we see the strength of achievement, and the strength of endurance. He moved with a calm majesty, like the sun. The bloody sweat, and the crown of thorns, and the cross, were full in His eyes; but He was obedient unto death. In His perfect self-sacrifice we see the perfection of strength; in the love that prompted it we see the perfection of beauty. This combination of self-sacrifice and love must be commenced in every Christian; and when it shall be in its spirit complete in him, then will he also be perfect in strength and beauty.—Mark Hopkins.

We believe that to Christ belongs creative power—that "without Him was not anything made which was made." We believe that from Him came all life at first. In Him life was as in its deep source. He is the fountain of life. We believe that as no being comes into existence without His creative power, so none continues to exist without His sustaining energy. We believe that the history of the world is but the history of His influence, and that the centre of the whole universe is the cross of Cavalry.—Alexander Maclaren.

Other sages have spoken to me of God. But from whom could I have learned the essence of divine perfection as from Him, who was in a peculiar sense the Son, representative, and image of God—who was especially an incarnation of the unbounded love of the Father? And from what other teacher could I have learned to approach the Supreme Being with that filial spirit, which forms the happiness of my fellowship with Him? From other seers I might have heard of heaven; but when I behold in Jesus the spirit of heaven, dwelling actually on earth, what a new comprehension have I of that better world!—W. E. Channing.

Jesus Christ was born in a stable; He was obliged to fly into Egypt; thirty years of His life were spent in a workshop; He suffered hunger, thirst, and weariness; He was poor, despised, and miserable; He taught the doctrines of heaven, and no one would listen. The great and the wise persecuted and took Him, subjected Him to frightful torments, treated Him as a slave, and put Him to death between two malefactors, having preferred to give liberty to a robber, rather than to suffer Him to escape. Such was the life which our Lord chose; while we are horrified at any kind of humiliation, and cannot bear the slightest appearance of contempt.—Fénelon.

If we carried with us more distinctly than we do that one simple thought that in all human joys, in all the apparently self-forgetting tenderness, of that Lord, who had a heart for every sorrow, and an ear for every complaint, and a hand open as day and full of melting charity for every need—that in every moment of that life in the boyhood, in the dawning manhood, in the maturity of His growing power—there was always present one black shadow, toward which He ever went straight with the consent of His will and the clearest eye, we should understand something more of how the life as well as the death was a sacrifice for us sinful men.—Alexander Maclaren.

“And whatsoever ye do in word or deed—all in the name of the Lord Jesus.” “Do” does not belong there. There is more than doing in life. Thinking, speaking, hoping, planning, dreaming—all are to be in the name of the Lord Jesus. His love and life are to color and shape our ambitions and accomplishments. In Him, as a plant in soil, in rain and sunshine, we are to live, growing up by Him and into Him. In His name we are to work, to pray, to suffer, to rejoice, and at last to go home. It is only another way of saying, “For me to live is Christ.”—Maltbie Babcock.

Christ's method is divine. His words have the charm of antiquity with the freshness of yesterday; the simplicity of a child with the wisdom of a God; the softness of kisses from the lip of love, and the force of the lightning rending the tower. His parables are like groups of matchless statuary; His prayers like an organ peal floating round the world and down the ages, echoed by the mountain peaks and plains into rich and varied melody, in which all devout hearts find their noblest feelings at once expressed, sustained, refined. His truths are self-evidencing. They fall into the soul as seed into the ground, to rest and germinate. He speaks, and all nature and life become vocal with theology.—Edward Thomson.

All the virtues which appeared in Christ shone brightest in the close of His life, under the trials He then met. Eminent virtue always shows brightest in the fire. Pure gold shows its purity chiefly in the furnace. It was chiefly under those trials which Christ endured in the close of His life that His love to God, His honor of God's majesty, His regard to the honor of His law, His spirit of obedience, His humility, contempt of the world, His patience, meekness, and spirit of forgiveness towards men, appeared. Indeed, everything that Christ did to work out redemption for us appears mainly in the close of His life. Here mainly is His satisfaction for sin, and here chiefly is His merit of eternal life for sinners, and here chiefly appears the brightness of His example which He has set us for imitation.—Jonathan Edwards.

He stands alone in unapproachable grandeur. Nineteen centuries roll away, and His character so lives that He inspires millions of men with impassioned love. Other men may seem to be children of their surroundings: He became what He was despite His surroundings, and is the only one who can say in truth and holiness, “Do as I have done.” He, the ideal, the perfect one of our race, appears in an age when such an ideal could not have been developed in act—could not have been conceived in thought. In the theory of development the perfection of humanity is the final result of man's history ages hence. Christ therefore is the great miracle which more than any other establishes the fact of miracles. Christ Himself is proof of His own miracles.—Reynolds.

Jesus! How does the very word overflow with sweetness, and light, and love, and life; filling the air with odors, like precious ointment poured forth; irradiating the mind with a glory of truths on which no fear can live, soothing the wounds of the heart with a balm that turns the sharpest anguish into delicious peace, shedding through the soul a cordial of immortal strength. Jesus! the answer to all our doubts, the spring of all our courage, the earnest of all our hopes, the charm omnipotent against all our foes, the remedy for all weakness, the supply of all our wants, the fullness of all our desires. Jesus! at the mention of whose name every knee shall bow and every tongue confess. Jesus! our power; Jesus! our righteousness, our sanctification, our redemption—Jesus! our elder brother, our blessed Lord and Redeemer. Thy name is the most transporting theme of the church, as they sing going up from the valley of tears, to their home on the mount of God; Thy name shall ever be the richest chord in the harmony of heaven, while the angels and the redeemed unite their exulting, adoring songs around the throne of God.—George W. Bethune.

How easily and contentedly we speak of Jesus Christ as our example. Do we realize what it means? If we did, it would revolutionize our life. Do we begin to know our Bible as He did? Do we begin to pray as He did? How thoughtful He was for others, how patient toward dullness, how quiet under insult! Think of what it meant for Him to take a basin and towel like a slave and wash the disciples' feet! Do we stoop to serve? Can anyone say of us, as was said of Him, that we go about "doing good"? Think of His words, servants of His, "I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you."

"Christlike" is a word often on our lips. Do not speak it too lightly. It is the heart of God's predestination. It is our high calling.

There has appeared in this, our day, a man of great virtue, named Jesus Christ, who is yet living amongst us, and with the Gentiles is accepted as a prophet of truth, but His own disciples call Him the Son of God. He raiseth the dead, and cureth all manner of diseases; a man of stature somewhat tall and comely, with a very reverend countenance; such as the beholder may both love and fear; his hair is of the color of a filbert, full ripe, and plain down to His ears, but from His ears downwards somewhat curled, and more orient of color, waving about His shoulders. In the midst of His head goeth a seam or partition of hair, after the manner of the Nazarites; His forehead very smooth and plain; His face, nose and mouth so framed as nothing can be reprehended; His beard somewhat thick, agreeable to the hair of His head for color, not of any great length, but forked in the middle; of an innocent and mature look; His eyes gray, clear and quick. In reproving, He is terrible; in admonishing, courteous and fair spoken, pleasant in speech, amidst gravity. It cannot be remembered that any have seen Him laugh, but many have seen Him weep. In proportion of body, well shaped and straight; His hands and arms most beauteous to behold; in speaking, very temperate, modest and wise; a man of singular virtue, surpassing the children of men.—Publius Lentulus.

Christ is a rare jewel, but men know not His value; a sun which ever shines, but men perceive not His brightness, nor walk in His light. He is a garden full of sweets, a hive full of honey, a sun without a spot, a star ever bright, a fountain ever full, a brook which ever flows, a rose which ever blooms, a foundation which never yields, a guide who never errs, a friend who never forsakes. No mind can fully grasp His glory; His beauty, His worth, His importance, no tongue can fully declare. He is the source of all good, the fountain of every excellency, the mirror of perfection, the light of heaven, the wonder of the earth, time's masterpiece, and eternity's glory; the sun of bliss, the way of life, and life's fair way. "He is altogether lovely," says the saint; a morning without clouds, a day without night, a rose without a thorn; His lips drop like the honeycomb, His eyes beam tenderness, His heart gushes love. The Christian is fed by His hands, carried in His heart, supported by His arm, nursed in His bosom, guided by His eye, instructed by His lips, warmed by His love; His wounds are his life, His smile the light of his path, the health of his soul, his rest and heaven below.—Balfarn.

Christ (Death of)

If Socrates died like a sage, Jesus died like a God.—Rousseau.

The death of the Son of God is a single and most perfect sacrifice and satisfaction for sins; of infinite value and price, abundantly sufficient to expiate the sins of the whole world.—Synod of Dort.

He was Himself forsaken that none of His children might ever need to utter His cry of loneliness.—J. H. Vincent.

Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us, and sent His son to be the propitiation for our sins.—Bible.

The sufferings and death of Jesus Christ are a substitution for the endless punishment of all who truly believe on Him.—Adams.

When Jesus knew that it was not possible for the cup to pass from Him, with love to God He held it fast, and with love to man He drank it all.—Alexander Dickson.

In this awfully stupendous manner, at which Reason stands aghast, and Faith herself is half confounded, was the grace of God to man at length manifested.—Richard Hurd.

In the beauty of the lilies Christ was born across the sea,
With a glory in His bosom that transfigures you and me:
As He died to make men holy, let us die to make men free. —Julia Ward Howe.

The whole history of Israel, its ritual and its government, is explicable only as it is typical of the spiritual Israel, of the sacrifice on Cavalry, of the precious blood which alone can wash away sin.—A. E. Kittredge.

My friends, there is one spot on earth where the fear of death, of sin, and of judgment need never trouble us, the only safe spot on earth where the sinner can stand—Calvary.—D. L. Moody.

I have always considered the atonement to be characteristic of the Gospel as a system of religion. Strip it of that doctrine, and you reduce it to a scheme of morality, excellent indeed, and such as the world never before saw; but to man in the present state of his faculties, absolutely impracticable.—Thomas, Earl of Kinnoul.

Christ's sacrifice stands in glorious proportions with the work to be done. Nothing else or less would suffice. It is a work supernatural, transacted in the plane of nature; and what but such a work could restore the broken order of the soul under evil?—Horace Bushnell.

"Having loved His own which were in the world, He loved them to the end." Often had they been faithless; and now, while addressing them, He knows that they will all in a few hours forsake Him. Yet He trusts them; He commits His cause to their keeping. And we must love as He loved.—Richard Fuller.

O, let us understand that the power of Christianity lies not in a hazy indefiniteness, not in shadowy forms, not so much even in definite truths and doctrines, but in the truth and the doctrine. There is but one Christ crucified. All the gathered might of the infinite God is in that word.—Herrick Johnson.

Other men have said, "If I could only live, I would establish and perpetuate an empire." This Christ of Galilee says, "My death shall do it." Other martyrs have died in simple fidelity to truth. This martyr dies that He may make His truth mighty over all hearts. He was a man; but was He only a man?—Herrick Johnson.

In agony unknown He bleeds away His life: in terrible throes He exhausts His soul. "Eloi! Eloi! lama sabachthani?" And then see! they pierce His side, and forthwith runneth out blood and water! This is the shedding of blood, the terrible pouring out of blood, without which, for you and the whole human race, there is no remission.—C. H. Spurgeon.

It was in His parting sorrow—that Jesus asked His disciples to remember Him; and never was entreaty of affection answered so; for ever since has

His name been breathed in morning and evening prayers that none can count, and has brought down some gift of sanctity and peace on the anguish of bereavement, and the remorse of sin.—James Martineau.

God's beloved Son, leaving the echoes of His cries upon the mountains and the traces of His weary feet upon the streets, shedding His tears over the tombs and His blood upon Golgotha, associating His life with our homes, and His corpse with our sepulchres, shows us how we, too, may be sons in the humblest vale of life, and sure of sympathy in heaven amid the deepest wrongs and sorrows of earth.—Edward Thomson.

As we look upon that agony and those tearful prayers, let us not only look with thankfulness: but let that kneeling Saviour teach us that in prayer alone can we be forearmed against our lesser sorrows; that strength to bear flows into the heart that is opened in supplication; and that a sorrow which we are made able to endure is more truly conquered than a sorrow which we avoid.—Alexander Maclaren.

It was not until Jesus had cried, "It is finished," and from His riven side the soldier's spear had fetched the blood and water; it was not till then that the fountain sealed of Incarnate Love became the fountain opened of Redeeming merit, and that the Siloah began to flow, which ever since has flowed adown the oracles of God.—James Hamilton.

But now, the sounds of infancy, always nearest the heart, and sure to come to the lips in our deepest emotion, returned in His anguish; and in words which He had learned at His mother's knee, His heart uttered its last wail—"Eloi! Eloi! lama sabachthani?" "My God! My God! why hast Thou forsaken me?"—J. Cunningham Geikie.

Grant, O Lord, that as we are baptized into the death of Thy blessed

Son our Saviour Jesus Christ, so by continual mortifying our corrupt affections, we may be buried with Him; and that through the grave, and gate of death, we may pass to our joyful resurrection; for His merits, who died, and was buried, and rose again for us, Thy Son Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.—Book of Common Prayer.

The study of everything that stands connected with the death of Christ, whether it be in the types of the ceremonial law, the predictions of the prophets, the narratives of the gospels, the doctrines of the epistles, or the sublime vision of the Apocalypse, this is the food of the soul, the manna from heaven, the bread of life. This is "meat indeed" and "drink indeed."—John Angel James.

A moment more, and all was over. The cloud had passed as suddenly as it rose. Far and wide, over the vanquished throngs of His enemies, with a loud voice, as if uttering His shout of eternal victory before entering into His glory, He cried, "It is finished!" Then, more gently, came the words, "Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit." A moment more, and there arose a great cry, as of mortal agony; the head fell. He was dead.—J. Cunningham Geikie.

All other great men are valued for their lives; He, above all, for His death, around which mercy and truth, righteousness and peace, God and man are reconciled; for the cross is the magnet which sends the electric current through the telegraph between earth and heaven, and makes both Testaments thrill, through the ages of the past and future, with living, harmonious, and saving truth.—Edward Thomson.

The world cannot bury Christ. The earth is not deep enough for His tomb, the clouds are not wide enough for His winding-sheet; He ascends into the heavens, but the heavens cannot contain Him. He still lives—in the church which burns unconsumed with His love; in the truth that reflects His image; in the hearts which burn as He talks with them by the way.—

Edward Thomson.

By Thine hour of dire despair;
By Thine agony of prayer;
By the cross, the nail, the thorn,
Piercing spear, and torturing scorn;
By the gloom that veiled the skies
O'er the dreadful sacrifice;
Listen to our humble cry,
Hear our solemn Litany.

—Sir Robert Grant.

He was alone; alone, enduring the curse for us; alone, "bearing our sins in His own body on the tree," and exhausting the fierceness of eternal justice; alone, without succor from man; alone, without one strengthening whisper from angel; above all, alone, without one ray from His Father's countenance. And that expiring cry, "My God! My God! why hast Thou forsaken me?" was the bitter, dreary, dismal, piercing wall of a soul utterly deserted—wrapped, shrouded in essential unmitigated desolation.—Richard Fuller.

I entreat you to devote one solemn hour of thought to a crucified Saviour—a Saviour expiring in the bitterest agony. Think of the cross, the nails, the open wounds, the anguish of His soul. Think how the Son of God became a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, that you might live forever. Think as you lie down upon your bed to rest, how your Saviour was lifted up from the earth to die. Think amid your plans and anticipations of future gaiety what the redemption of your soul has cost, and how the dying Saviour would wish you to act. His wounds plead that you will live for better things.—Albert Barnes.

He planted His cross in the midst of the mad and roaring current of selfishness, aggravated to malignity, and uttered from it the mighty cry of expiring love. And the waters heard Him, and from that moment they began to be refruent about His cross. From that moment, a current deeper and broader and mightier began to set heavenward; and it will continue to be deeper and broader and mightier till its glad waters shall encompass the earth, and toss themselves as the ocean. And not alone did earth hear the cry. It pierced the regions of immensity. Heaven heard it, and hell heard it, and the remotest star shall hear it, testifying to the love of God in His unspeakable gift, and to the supremacy of that blessedness of giving which could be reached only through death—the death of the cross.—Mark Hopkins.

When the Father would give men the light of the knowledge of His glory, how does He proceed? To what does He turn men's gaze? Not to His mighty works; not to creative or providential wonders; not to geological or astronomical facts; not to the data on which Paley and Bell and other admirable writers build up their argument from design; not to the still greater wonder of mind, but to "the face of Jesus Christ," that face that was more marred than any man's; that endured the ruffian blows; down which the blood drops trickled; that looked down on a mocking crowd from an ignominious cross.—John Hall.

Christ (Resurrection of)

Having made an expiation for sins, He is set down on God's right hand forever. There is no more that even Immanuel can do. This is Love's extreme effort, God's last and greatest gift, God's own sacrifice. Can there be any escape for those who neglect so great salvation?—James Hamilton.

In His discourses, His miracles, His parables, His sufferings, His resurrection, He gradually raises the pedestal of His humanity before the world, but under a cover, until the shaft reaches from the grave to the heavens, when He lifts the curtain, and displays the figure of a man on a throne, for the worship of the universe; and clothing His church with His own power, He authorizes it to baptize and to preach remission of sins in His own name.—Edward Thomson.

Step by step, He had raised their conceptions of Him nearer the unspeakable grandeur of His true nature and work. At first the Teacher, He had, after a time, by gradual disclosures, revealed Himself as the Son of God veiled in the form of man; and, now, since His crucifixion and resurrection, He had taught them to see in Him the Messiah, exalted to immortal and Divine majesty, as the conqueror of death and the Lord of all.—James Hamilton.

But who is this that cometh from the tomb, with dyed garments from the bed of death? He that is glorious in His appearance, walking in the greatness of strength? It is thy Prince, O Zion! Christian, it is your Lord! He hath trodden the wine-press alone; He hath stained His raiment with blood; but now as the first-born from the womb of nature, He meets the morning of His resurrection. He arises, a conqueror from the grave; He returns with blessings from the world of spirits; He brings salvation to the sons of men. Never did the returning sun usher in a day so glorious! It was the jubilee of the universe!

Christ (Saviour)

The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin.

Unless you live in Christ, you are dead to God.—Rowland Hill.

No man cometh unto the Father, but by me.—Bible.

In danger Christ lashes us to Himself, as the Alpine guides do when there is perilous ice to get over.—Alexander Maclaren.

Christ wants to lead men by their love, their personal love to Him, and the confidence of His personal love to them.—Horace Bushnell.

The Lord Jesus Christ would have the whole world to know that though He pardons sin, He will not protect it.—Joseph Alleine.

Jesus did all the saving-work. He brought the cross to our level. Get saved by looking to Him, and then live to God.—W. P. Mackay.

Jesus is the true manifestation of God, and He is manifested to be the regenerating power of a divine life.—Horace Bushnell.

Jesus Christ hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel.

And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto Me.—Bible.

A man may go to heaven without health, without riches, without honors, without learning, without friends; but he can never go there without Christ.—John Dyer.

He who thinks he hath no need of Christ, hath too high thoughts of himself. He who thinks Christ cannot help him, hath too low thoughts of Christ.—J. M. Mason.

Never be afraid to bring the transcendent mysteries of our faith, Christ's life and death and resurrection, to the help of the humblest and commonest of human wants.—Phillips Brooks.

You may be a dreadful failure. Christ is a divine success. "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth."—Edward Thomson.

No glory of the Eternal One is higher than this, "Mighty to save;" no name of God is more adorable than that of "Saviour;" no place among the servants of God can be so glorious as that of an instrument of salvation.—William Arthur.

Sun of my soul, Thou Saviour dear.
It is not night if Thou be near;
Oh, may no earth-born cloud arise,
To hide Thee from Thy servant's eyes.
—John Keble.

Christ's voice sounds now for each of us in loving invitation: and dead in sin and hardness of heart though we be, we can listen and live. Christ Himself, my brother, sows the seed

now. Do you take care that it falls not on, but in, your souls.—Alexander Maclaren.

On Thee alone my hope relies,
Beneath Thy cross I fall;
My Lord! my Life! my Sacrifice!
My Saviour! and my All!
—Anne Steele.

Because many who are called by the Gospel do not repent nor believe in Christ, but perish in unbelief, this does not arise from defect or insufficiency of the sacrifice offered by Christ, but from their own fault.—Synod of Dort.

Christ is known only by them that receive Him into their love, their faith, their deep want; known only as He is enshrined within, felt as a divine force, breathed in the inspirations of the secret life.—Horace Bushnell.

Beloved, you that have faith in the fountain, frequent it. Beware of two errors which are very natural and very disastrous; beware of thinking any sin too great for it; beware of thinking any sin too small.—James Hamilton.

Our sins are debts that none can pay but Christ. It is not our tears, but His blood; it is not our sighs, but His sufferings, that can testify for our sins. Christ must pay all, or we are prisoners forever.—Thomas Brooks.

It was the custom of the Roman emperors, at their triumphal entrance, to cast new coins among the multitudes; so doth Christ, in His triumphal ascension into heaven, throw the greatest gifts for the good of men that were ever given.—T. Goodwin.

There is truth in Jesus which is terrible, as well as truth that is soothing; terrible, for He shall be Judge as well as Saviour; and ye cannot face Him, ye cannot stand before Him, unless ye now give ear to His invitation.—Henry Melvill.

Christ sends His Spirit, not only to help, but to lead us on, so that we build better than we know. We come freely into His methods; we are made to carry out His plan. This is the guarantee of an eternal success.—M. B. Riddle.

Christ puts Himself at the head of the mystic march of the generations; and, like the mysterious angel that Joshua saw in the plain by Jericho, makes the lofty claim, "Nay, but as the captain of the Lord's host am I come up."—Alexander Maclaren.

Jesus does not drive His followers on before, as a herd of unwilling disciples, but goes before Himself, leading them into paths that He has trod, and dangers He has met, and sacrifices He has borne Himself, calling them after Him and to be only followers.—Horace Bushnell.

Christ is the great burden bearer—the Lamb of God who beareth the sin of the world; but in order to enjoy the benefit of His interposition, I must distinctly and for myself take advantage of it. Conscious of my lost estate, I must seek a personal share in the common salvation.—James Hamilton.

Be sure that Christ is not behind you, but before, calling and drawing you on. This is the liberty, the beautiful liberty of Christ. Claim your glorious privilege in the name of a disciple; be no more a servant, when Christ will own you as a friend.—Horace Bushnell.

As this brook not only washes off impurities, but overwhelms them, so that they can no longer be found, even so Thy Divine mercy, and the stream of my Saviour's blood, not only purge away, but extinguish my sins, sweeping them into the depths of the sea, where through all eternity they shall be remembered no more.—Christian Scriver.

Go to the family where darkness and suspicion and jealousy and disorder reign, and if they will but receive Christ, mark how light and confidence and order and peace spring up. Go to the regions of superstition and idoatry, and see what transformations are effected by Jesus.—Edward Thomson.

From behind the shadow of the still small voice—more awful than tempest or earthquake—more sure and persistent than day and night—is always sounding full of hope and strength to the weariest of us all, “Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world.”—Thomas Hughes.

And what is the joy of Christ? The joy and delight which springs forever in His great heart, from feeling that He is forever doing good; from loving all, and living for all; from knowing that if not all, yet millions on millions are grateful to Him, and will be forever.—Charles Kingsley.

When a man begins to apprehend the first approach of grace, pardon, and mercy by Jesus Christ to his soul; when he is convinced of his utter unworthiness and desert of hell, and can never expect anything from a just and holy God but damnation, how do the first dawns of mercy melt and humble him!—John Flavel.

Grieve not the Christ of God, who redeems us; and remember that we grieve Him most when we will not let Him pour His love upon us, but turn a sullen, unresponsive unbelief towards His pleading grace, as some glacier shuts out the sunshine from the mountain-side with its thick-ribbed ice.—Alexander MacLaren.

As a child walking over a slippery and dangerous path cries out, “Father, I am falling!” and has but a moment to catch his father’s hand, so every believer sees hours when only the hand of Jesus comes between him and the abysses of destruction.—T. L. Cuyler.

Compassionate Saviour! We welcome Thee to our world. We welcome Thee to our hearts. We bless Thee for the Divine goodness Thou hast brought from heaven; for the souls Thou hast warmed with love to man, and lifted up in love to God; for the efforts of divine philanthropy which Thou hast inspired; and for that hope of a pure celestial life, through which Thy disciples triumph over death.—W. E. Channing.

Reader, if Christ is yours, and you are Christ’s, is there anything on which you may more confidently repose than that Jesus is making continual intercession for you, ever displaying the merits of His cross and precious blood, not only for the church at large, but for thee, even for sinful thee?—G. W. Mylne.

Brethren, is not this the Saviour that you need? one who can save you from the utmost depths of depravity, in the utmost corner of the earth, on the utmost inch of time? One who can save you amidst the utmost urgency of fierce temptations, and who in the uttermost extreme of exhausted nature, when heart and flesh do faint and fail, completes the work, and seals the salvation for evermore?—James Hamilton.

You have only to cast your life-long guilt, your ungodliness, your evil thoughts and wicked words, your sinful soul itself, into this crime-canceling, sin-annihilating, soul-cleansing Fountain, in order to obliterate from God’s creation your foul transgressions, and yet leave the Divine perfection fair as ever. The sin which a Saviour’s blood dissolves is the only sin which, after being once committed, is totally extinguished.—James Hamilton.

“My burden is light,” said the blessed Redeemer, a light burden indeed, which carries him that bears it. I have looked through all nature for a resemblance of this, and seem to find a shadow of it in the wings of a bird, which are indeed borne by the creature, and yet support her flight towards heaven.—St. Bernard.

What do we know about the world unseen? What reasonings, what curiosities, what misgivings there have been concerning that impenetrable mystery! Out of this mystery and vagueness and vastness comes the human form of the Divine Redeemer. He assures us that there is an unmixed and endless life, and that all we have to do to secure it is to trust ourselves to Him who came to declare it and to confer it.—William Adams.

It is not the thinker who is the true king of men, as we sometimes hear it proudly said. We need one who will not only show, but be the Truth; who will not only point, but open and be the Way; who will not only communicate thought, but give, because He is the Life. Not the rabbi's pulpit, nor the teacher's desk, still less the gilded chairs of earthly monarchs, least of all the tents of conquerors, are the throne of the true king. He rules from the cross.—Alexander MacLaren.

Happy those who are able in truth to say, "My Lord and my God!" Here is the true bond of union. Here is the noblest inspiration of life. Strength for work. Comfort in trouble. Hope in death. Here is what gives eternity itself its chief interest and joy. There we shall behold the King in His beauty. And when we shall see Him as He is, and shall be like Him, with what ecstasy of love and gratitude and joy shall we cry, "My Lord and my God!"—William Forsythe.

I feel my disease, and I feel that my want of alarm and lively affecting conviction forms its most obstinate ingredient; I try to stir up the emotion, and feel myself harassed and distressed at the impotency of my own meditations. But why linger without the threshold in the face of a warm and urgent invitation? "Come unto me." Do not think it is your office to heal one part of the disease, and Christ's to heal the remainder.—Thomas Chalmers.

The hoary centuries are full of Him; the echoes of His sweet voice are heard to-day; His love has perfumed the past eighteen hundred years, and He lives to-day, as the Head of His church; He lives to-day, the object of the warmest adoration, the most passionate love, for whom millions would die this very hour. Empires have fallen, thrones have crumbled; but Jesus lives, His empire extending every day, His throne gaining new trophies of His grace.—A. E. Kittredge.

The enthronement of Christ over the minds of men is steadily going forward. His kingdom embraces the princes in the realm of mind. It embraces the nations of highest civilization. They are all beneath the cross. It is maintained by simple authority. Other mental monarchs rule by logic; Christ's word is law—it is satisfying to His subjects. His truth in the hands of His disciples, like the bread He broke upon the mountains, is an ample supply for the millions that gather at His table.—Edward Thomson.

Yes, we have throned Him in our minds and hearts—the cynosure of our wandering thoughts—the monarch of our warmest affections, hopes, desires. This we have done. And the more we meditate upon His astonishing love, His amazing sacrifice, the more we feel that if we had a thousand minds, hearts, souls, we would crown Him Lord of all. Living we will live in Him, for Him, to Him. Dying, we will clasp Him in our arms, and, with Simeon, welcome death as the consummation of bliss.—Richard Fuller.

Thus the word reveals the divine essence; His incarnation makes that life, that love, that light, which is eternally resident in God obvious to souls that steadily contemplate Himself. These terms life, love, light—so abstract, so simple, so suggestive—meet in God; but they meet also in Jesus Christ. They do not only make Him the centre of a philosophy; they belong to the mystic language of faith more truly than to the abstract terminology of speculative thought. They draw hearts to Jesus; they invest Him with a higher than any intellectual beauty.—H. P. Liddon.

My only comfort is that I with body and soul, both in life and death, am not my own, but belong to my faithful

Saviour Jesus Christ, who with His precious blood hath fully satisfied for all my sins, and delivered me from all the power of the devil; and so preserves me, that without the will of my heavenly Father, not a hair can fall from my head; yea, that all things must be subservient to my salvation. And, therefore, by His holy spirit, He also assures me of eternal life, and makes me sincerely willing and ready, henceforth to live unto Him.—Heidelberg Catechism.

We believe that the salvation of sinners is wholly of grace; through the mediatorial offices of the Son of God; who, by the appointment of the Father, freely took upon Him our nature, yet without sin; honored the divine law by His personal obedience, and by His death made a full atonement for sins; that having risen from the dead He is now enthroned in heaven; and uniting in His wonderful person the tenderest sympathies with divine perfections, He is every way qualified to be a suitable, a compassionate, and an all-sufficient Saviour.—Baptist Church Manual.

Christ is the head of all things. Everything lies open before His eye, everything is sustained by His power, and everything is disposed of by His wisdom. Not a sparrow can fall to the ground without His notice and permission. Oh, to see Jesus in all things! Oh, to see everything at the disposal of Jesus! Oh, to see that all things are directed, controlled, and overruled by Christ alone! May this calm my mind, compose my spirit, and produce holy resignation in my soul! If Jesus arranges all, sends all, directs all, overrules all, then all things must work together for good to them that love God.—James Smith.

If you are really anxious to learn the way to God, He has not left Himself without a witness, nor you without a teacher. Go to the recorded Christ, and look at that history; listen to those words which survive in the gospels. And go to the living Christ, to Him who has said, "I am the light of the world, he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." And dim as may be your outset—more of night than morning in your twilight, as you follow on you shall know the Lord, and with the light that radiates from Himself, your path will shine brighter and brighter unto the perfect day.—James Hamilton.

Christian

A Christian is the highest style of man.—Young.

A Christian is God Almighty's gentleman.—J. C. Hare.

The disciples were called Christians first at Antioch.—The Acts.

Whatever makes men good Christians, makes them good citizens.—Daniel Webster.

The purified righteous man has become a coin of the Lord, and has the impress of his King stamped upon him.—Clement of Alexandria.

Being in Christ, it is safe to forget the past; it is possible to be sure of the future; it is possible to be diligent in the present.—Alexander Maclaren.

Christians have burnt each other, quite persuaded
That all the apostles would have done as they did. —Byron.

A greater absurdity cannot be thought of than a morose, hard-hearted, covetous, proud, malicious Christian.—Jonathan Edwards.

Christians are called saints, for their holiness; believers, for their faith; brethren, for their love; disciples, for their knowledge.—Fuller.

A child of God should be a visible beatitude, for joy and happiness, and a living doxology, for gratitude and adoration.—C. H. Spurgeon.

There is nothing that will make you a Christian indeed, but a taste of the sweetness of Christ.—Rutherford.

The Christian life is not hearing nor knowing, but doing.—Rev. S. L. Dickey.

I never knew any man in my life who could not bear another's misfortunes perfectly like a Christian.—Pope.

It was a deep true thought which the old painters had, when they drew John as likest to his Lord. Love makes us like.—Alexander Maclaren.

Servant of God, well done, well hast thou fought
The better fight. —Milton.

A virtuous and a Christian-like conclusion,
To pray for them that have done scathe to us. —Shakespeare.

The greatness of God is the true rebuke to the littleness of men. The greatness of Christ is the true rebuke to the littleness of Christians.—Dean Stanley.

A Christian is a man in Christ. "If any man be in Christ." A Christian is a man for Christ. "Glorify God in your body and spirit which are God's." —Richard Fuller.

A Christian in this world is but gold in the ore; at death the pure gold is melted out and separated and the dross cast away and consumed.—Flavel.

If all were perfect Christians, individuals would do their duty; the people would be obedient to the laws, the magistrates incorrupt, and there would be neither vanity nor luxury in such a state.—Rousseau.

Christian work is something more than furnishing food and raiment and shelter. It is also teaching men of God, of Christ, of heaven, of sin, of love, of justice, of brotherhood.

Christ, in that place He hath put you, hath intrusted you with a dear pledge, which is His own glory, and hath armed you with His sword to keep the pledge, and make a good account of it to God.—Rutherford.

The last, best fruit that comes to perfection, even in the kindest soul, is tenderness toward the hard; forbearance toward the unforbearing; warmth of heart toward the cold; and philanthropy toward the misanthropic.—Jean Paul Richter.

Like the cellar-growing vine is the Christian who lives in the darkness and bondage of fear. But let him go forth, with the liberty of God, into the light of love, and he will be like the plant in the field, healthy, robust, and joyful.—H. W. Beecher.

The weakest believer is a member of Christ as well as the strongest; and the weakest member of the body mystically shall not perish. Christ will cut off rotten members, but not weak members.—Watson.

Ordinary human motives will appeal in vain to the ears which have heard the tones of the heavenly music; and all the pomp of life will show poor and tawdry to the sight that has gazed on the vision of the great white throne and the crystal sea.—Alexander Maclaren.

It is more to the honor of a Christian soldier, by faith to overcome the world, than by a monastical vow to retreat from it; and more for the honor of Christ, to serve Him in a city than to serve Him in a cell.—Matthew Henry.

Persons of mean understandings, not so inquisitive, nor so well instructed, are made good Christians, and by reverence and obedience, implicitly believe, and abide by their belief.—Montaigne.

The sum of the whole matter is this: He who is one in will and heart with God is a Christian. He who loves God is one in will and heart with Him. He who trusts Christ loves God. That is Christianity in its ultimate purpose and result. That is Christianity in its means and working forces. That is Christianity in its starting point and foundation.—Alexander Maclaren.

He that will deserve the name of a Christian must be such a man as ex-cel-leth through the knowledge of Christ and His doctrine; in modesty and righteousness of mind, in constancy of life, in virtuous fortitude, and in maintaining sincere piety toward the one and the only God, who is all in all.—Eusebius.

Many there are who, while they bear the name of Christians, are totally unacquainted with the power of their divine religion. But for their crimes the Gospel is in no wise answerable. Christianity is with them a geographical, not a descriptive, appellation.—Faber.

Yes—rather plunge me back in pagan night,
And take my chance with Socrates for bliss,
Than be the Christian of a faith like this,
Which builds on heavenly cant its earthly sway,
And in a convert mourns to lose a prey.
—Moore.

Health is a great blessing—competence obtained by honorable industry is a great blessing—and a great blessing it is to have kind, faithful, and loving friends and relatives; but, that the greatest of all blessings, as it is the most ennobling of all privileges, is to be indeed a Christian.—Coleridge.

The Christian life is not an engagement by contract between the Master and His servant. It is the union of two hearts—that of the Saviour and the saved—by the endearing ties of the most intimate love.

The great comprehensive truths written in letters of living light on every page of our history are these: Human happiness has no perfect security but freedom; freedom none but virtue; virtue none but knowledge; and neither freedom nor virtue has any vigor of immortal hope, except in the principles of Christian faith, and in the sanctions of the Christian religion.—Aughey.

Now see what a Christian is, drawn by the hand of Christ. He is a man on whose clear and open brow God has set the stamp of truth; one whose very eye beams bright with honor; in whose very look and bearing you may see freedom, manliness, veracity; a brave man—a noble man—frank, generous, true, with, it may be, many faults; whose freedom may take the form of impetuosity or rashness, but the form of meanness never.—F. W. Robertson.

A Christian is a believer in Jesus. He believes that if he only throws his own lost and sinful soul on the Redeemer, there is in His sacrifice sufficient merit to cancel all his guilt, and in His heart sufficient love to undertake the keeping of his soul for all eternity. He believes that Jesus is a Saviour. He believes that His heart is set on His people's holiness, and that it is only by making them new creatures, pure-minded, kind-hearted, unselfish, devout, that He can fit them for a home and a life like His own, that He can fit them for the occupations and enjoyments of heaven. And believing all this he prays and labors after holiness.—James Hamilton.

He that can apprehend and consider vice with all her baits and seeming pleasures, and yet abstain, and yet distinguish, and yet prefer that which is truly better, he is the true way-faring Christian. I cannot praise a fugitive and cloistered virtue unexercised and unbreathed that never sallies out and sees her adversary, but slinks out of the race, where that immortal garland is to be run for, not without dust and heat.—Milton.

These—lowliness, meekness, long-suffering, loving forbearance—quiet, unpretending, unshowy virtues, are amongst the best means for promoting true unity in the church of God. Who is the most useful Christian? Not as a rule he who has the most transcendent genius, brilliant talents, and commanding eloquence, but he who has the most of this quiet, loving, forbearing spirit. The world may do without its Niagara, whose thundering roar and majestic rush excite the highest amazement of mankind, but it cannot spare the thousand rivulets that glide unseen and unheard every moment through the earth, imparting life, and verdure, and beauty wherever they go. And so the church may do without its men of splendid abilities, but it cannot do without its men of tender, loving, forbearing souls.—David Thomas.

Putting the soul into trifles. Let us remember that greatness of action depends on two other kinds of greatness; on our appreciation of the greatness of the occasion when it can be done. It has been well said, by an eminent French writer, that the true calling of a Christian is not to do extraordinary things, but to do ordinary things in an extraordinary way. The most trivial tasks can be accomplished in a noble, gentle, regal spirit, which overrides and puts aside all petty, paltry feelings, and which elevates all little things.—Dean Stanley.

Christianity

There is no social life outside of Christendom.—Wm. H. Seward.

Christianity is a battle, not a dream.—Wendell Phillips.

Christendom, as an effect, must be accounted for. It is too large for a mortal cause.—Bishop Huntington.

Christianity ruined emperors, but saved peoples.—Alfred de Musset.

Christianity is completed Judaism, or it is nothing.—Beaconsfield.

Christianity commands us to pass by injuries; policy to let them pass by us.—Franklin.

The Christian faith is a grand cathedral with divinely pictured windows.—Hawthorne.

The pure and benign light of revelation has had a meliorating influence on mankind.—Washington.

I desire no other evidence of the truth to Christianity than the Lord's Prayer.—Madame de Staël.

Christianity is intensely practical. She has no trait more striking than her common sense.—Charles Buxton.

God must have loved the plain people; He made so many of them.—Abraham Lincoln.

Every Christian is born great because he is born for heaven.—Massillon.

Give us more and more of real Christianity, and we shall need less of its evidences.

Christianity is not so much the advent of a better doctrine as of a perfect character.—Horace Bushnell.

Without the way, there is no going; without the truth, there is no knowing; without the life, there is no living.—Thomas à Kempis.

Our Christianity is a name, a shadow, unless we resemble Him who, being the incarnate God, was incarnate goodness.—Aughey.

Though the living man can wear a mask and carry on deceit, the dying Christian cannot counterfeit.—Cumberland.

The other world is as to this like the east to the west. We cannot approach the one without turning away from the other.—Abd-el-Kader.

He who is truly a good man is more than half way to being a Christian, by whatever name he is called.—South.

There was never law, or sect, or opinion, did so much magnify goodness as the Christian religion doth.—Bacon.

In becoming Christians, though we love some persons more than we did, let us love none less.—Gambold.

I would give nothing for the Christianity of a man whose very dog and cat were not the better for his religion.—Rowland Hill.

Christianity was the temple that was to be eternal; and on it, as unconscious builders, men were laboring in all the ages from the creation.—Bishop Foss.

Christianity, which is always true to the heart, knows no abstract virtues, but virtues resulting from our wants, and useful to all.—Chateaubriand.

The church limits her sacramental services to the faithful. Christ gave Himself upon the cross, a ransom for all.—Pascal.

The whole of Christianity is comprised in three things—to believe, to love, and to obey Jesus. These are things, however, which we must be learning all our life.—Christian Scriver.

The peculiar doctrine of Christianity is that of a universal sacrifice and perpetual propitiation.—Dr. Johnson.

Christianity is the companion of liberty in all its conflicts, the cradle of its infancy and the divine source of its claims.—De Tocqueville.

Ours is a religion jealous in its demands, but how infinitely prodigal in its gifts! It troubles you for an hour, it repays you by immortality.—Bulwer-Lytton.

If Christianity were only a development, then Christ was not needed. If Christianity were only a scheme of morals, then the divine incarnation was a thing superfluous.—Herrick Johnson.

The real difficulty with thousands in the present day is not that Christianity has been found wanting, but that it has never been seriously tried.—H. P. Liddon.

Other sciences may strengthen certain faculties of the soul; some the intellect, some the imagination, some the memory; but Christianity strengthens the soul itself.

When Christianity is received, it stimulates the faculties, and calls forth new ideas, new motives and new sentiments. It has been the mother of all modern education.—James McCosh.

There is no inevitable connection between Christianity and cynicism. Truth is not a salad, is it, that you must always dress it with vinegar?—Wm. M. Punshon.

I always have had, and always shall have, a profound regard for Christianity, the religion of my fathers, and for its rights, its usages and observances.—Henry Clay.

The introduction of Christianity, which, under whatever form, always confers such inestimable benefits on mankind, soon made a sensible change in these rude and fierce manners.—Burke.

The whole history of Christianity proves that she has indeed little to fear from persecution as a foe, but much to fear from persecution as an ally.—Macaulay.

Christianity may produce agitation, anger, tumult as at Ephesus; but the diffusion of the pure gospel of Christ, and the establishment of the institutions of honesty and virtue, at whatever cost, is a blessing to mankind.—Albert Barnes.

It is a refiner as well as a purifier of the heart; it imparts correctness of perception, delicacy of sentiment, and all those nicer shades of thought and feeling which constitute elegance of mind.—Mrs. John Sanford.

If ever Christianity appears in its power, it is when it erects its trophies upon the tomb; when it takes up its votaries where the world leaves them; and fills the breast with immortal hope in dying moments.—Robert Hall.

Christianity is within a man, even as he is gifted with reason; it is associated with your mother's chair, and with the first remembered tones of her blessed voice.—Coleridge.

Christianity is, above all other religions ever known, a religion of sacrifice. It is a religion founded on the greatest of all sacrifices, the sacrifice of the incarnation, culminating in the sacrifice on Calvary.—Dean Stanley.

Our religion is not Christianity so much as Christ. Our gospel is the knowledge, not of a system, but the saving knowledge of a personal Saviour.—Aughey.

Christianity, Christ, heaven, hell, the judgment, sin, holiness, God,—these, and whether they be true or false, and our personal relations to them, whether they be right or wrong, are things to know about, not to be doubting or guessing about.—Herrick Johnson.

The distinction between Christianity and all other systems of religion consists largely in this, that in these other men are found seeking after God, while Christianity is God seeking after man.—Thomas Arnold.

A Christianity which will not help those who are struggling from the bottom to the top of society needs another Christ to die for it.—Beecher.

Christianity has no ceremonial. It has forms, for forms are essential to order; but it disdains the folly of attempting to reinforce the religion of the heart by the antics of the mind.—Rev. Dr. Erolv.

Personal Christianity is not a creed, however orthodox; not a ritualism, however Scriptural; not a profession, however outwardly consistent; not a service, however seemingly useful; but is Christ in man.

He that loves Christianity better than truth will soon love his own sect or party better than Christianity, and will end by loving himself better than all.—Coleridge.

Christ was vita magister, not scholæ; and he is the best Christian whose heart beats with the purest pulse towards heaven; not he whose head spinneth out the finest cobwebs.—Cudworth.

Christianity alone inspires and guides progress; for the progress of man is movement toward God, and movement toward God will ensure a gradual unfolding of all that exalts and adorns man.—Mark Hopkins.

Christianity teaches us to moderate our passions; to temper our affections toward all things below; to be thankful for the possession, and patient under loss, whenever He who gave shall see fit to take away.—Sir Wm. Temple.

Christianity is more than history; it is also a system of truths. Every event which its history records, either is a truth, or suggests a truth, or expresses a truth which man needs to assent to or to put into practice.—Noah Porter.

It awes by the majesty of its truths, it agitates by the force of its compunctions, it penetrates the heart by the tenderness of its appeals, and it casts over the abyss of thought, the shadow of its eternal grandeur.—Henry Giles.

Where science speaks of improvement, Christianity speaks of renovation; where science speaks of development, Christianity speaks of sanctification; where science speaks of progress, Christianity speaks of perfection.—Aughey.

Christian graces are like perfumes; the more they are pressed, the sweeter they smell; like stars that shine brightest in the dark; like trees, the more they are shaken, the deeper root they take, and the more fruit they bear.—Rev. John Mason.

Great books are written for Christianity much oftener than great deeds are done for it. City libraries tell us of the reign of Jesus Christ, but city streets tell us of the reign of Satan.—Horace Mann.

Alas! how has the social spirit of Christianity been perverted by fools at one time, and by knaves and bigots at another; by the self-tormentors of the cell, and the all-tormentors of the conclave!—Colton.

Christianity does not consist in a proud priesthood, a costly church, an imposing ritual, a fashionable throng, a pealing organ, loud responses to the creed, and reiterated expressions of reverence for the name of Christ; but in the spirit of filial trust in God, and ardent, impartial, overflowing love to man.—T. J. Mumford.

Look back to the cross, and the disciples gazing on it in terror from afar, and then look around on the nations that are influenced by the faith that there centres—and note the change! Then take these elements, established in history, and calculate the orbit Christianity is to fill.—R. S. Storrs.

We are blessed with a faith, which calls into action the whole intellectual man; which prescribes a reasonable service; which challenges the investigation of its evidences; and which, in the doctrine of immortality, invests the mind of man with a portion of the dignity of Divine intelligence.—Edward Everett.

A man can no more be a Christian without facing evil and conquering it than he can be a soldier without going to battle, facing the cannon's mouth, and encountering the enemy in the field.—Chapin.

A few persons of an odious and despised country could not have filled the world with believers, had they not shown undoubted credentials from the divine person who sent them on such a message.—Addison.

Christianity taught the capacity, the element, to love the All-perfect without a stingy bargain for personal happiness. It taught that to love Him was happiness,—to love Him in others' virtues.—Emerson.

It happened very providentially, to the honor of the Christian religion, that it did not take its rise in the dark illiterate ages of the world, but at a time when arts and sciences were at their height.—Addison.

Christianity is no mere scheme of doctrine or of ethical practice, but is instead a kind of miracle, a power out of nature and above, descending into it; a historically supernatural movement on the world, that is visibly entered into it, and organized to be an institution in the person of Jesus Christ.—Horace Bushnell.

Christian faith is a grand cathedral, with divinely pictured windows. Standing without you see no glory, nor can possibly imagine any. Nothing is visible but the merest outline of dusky shapes. Standing within all is clear and defined; every ray of light reveals an army of unspeakable splendors.—John Ruskin.

The greatest, strongest, mightiest plea for the church of God in the world is the existence of the Spirit of God in its midst, and the works of the Spirit of God are the true evidences of Christianity. They say miracles are withdrawn, but the Holy Spirit is the standing miracle of the church of God to-day.—C. H. Spurgeon.

The strong argument for the truth of Christianity is the true Christian; the man filled with the Spirit of Christ. The best proof of Christ's resurrection is a living church, which itself is walking in a new life, and drawing life from Him who hath overcome death.—Christlieb.

Christianity, contrasted with the Jewish system of emblems, is truth in the sense of reality, as substance is opposed to shadows, and, contrasted with heathen mythology, is truth as opposed to falsehood.—Whately.

Christianity is the only true and perfect religion, and in proportion as mankind adopt its principles and obey its precepts, they will be wise and happy. And a better knowledge of this religion is to be acquired by reading the Bible than in any other way.—Benjamin Rush.

Public charities and benevolent associations for the gratuitous relief of every species of distress, are peculiar to Christianity; no other system of civil or religious policy has originated them; they form its highest praise and characteristic feature.—Colton.

Had it been published by a voice from heaven, that twelve poor men, taken out of boats and creeks, without any help of learning, should conquer the world to the cross, it might have been thought an illusion against all reason of men; yet we know it was undertaken and accomplished by them.—Stephen Charnock.

Christianity is indeed peculiarly fitted to the more improved stages of society, to the more delicate sensibilities of refined minds, and especially to that dissatisfaction with the present state which always grows with the growth of our moral powers and affections.—Channing.

Christianity has found its triumphs and shown its fruits in every nation and tribe upon the globe; and its results have been in every case the same. Virtue, social order, prosperity, blessedness, the elevation and improvement, in all respects, of the human life, are the uniform and exclusive inheritance of those who receive the Gospel.—J. H. Seelye.

If Christianity has really come from heaven, it must renew the whole life of man; it must govern the life of nations no less than that of individuals; it must control a Christian when acting in his public and political capacity as completely as when he is engaged in the duties which belong to him as a member of a family circle.—H. P. Liddon.

Read a work on the "Evidences of Christianity," and it may become highly probable that Christianity, etc., are true. This is an opinion. Feel God. Do His will, till the Absolute Imperative within you speaks as with a living voice, "Thou shalt, and thou shalt not;" and then you do not think, you know that there is a God.—F. W. Robertson.

Here is Christianity. Whence came it? What is it? It is a force in the world, a prodigious force. It has revolutionized society. It has lifted man out of himself. It has changed the face of the world. There it lies, imbedded in more than eighteen centuries of human history; and history of no mean sort, the best record of the race.—Herrick Johnson.

Christianity has carried civilization along with it, whithersoever it has gone; and, as if to show that the latter does not depend on physical causes, some of the countries the most civilized in the days of Augustus are now in a state of hopeless barbarism.—Hare.

We have now in our possession three instruments of civilization, unknown to antiquity. These are the art of printing; free representative government; and, lastly, a pure and spiritual religion, the deep fountain of generous enthusiasm, the mighty spring of bold and lofty designs, the great sanctuary of moral power.—Edward Everett.

When I see how fragmentary the structure of religious knowledge was left by nature, when I see how inadequate all the labors of man had proved for its completion,—and when I look at the glorious and completed dome reared by Christianity, I cannot but feel that other than human hands have been employed in its structure.—Mark Hopkins.

Now, the whole world hears Or shall hear,—surely shall hear, at the last,
Though men delay, and doubt, and faint,
and fail,—
That promise faithful:—"Fear not, little flock!
It is your Father's will and joy, to give
To you, the Kingdom!"
—Matthew Arnold.

The relations of Christians to each other are like the several flowers in a garden that have upon each the dew of heaven, which, being shaken by the wind, they let fall the dew at each other's roots, whereby they are jointly nourished, and become nourishers of one another.—Bunyan.

The introduction of the Christian religion into the world has produced an incalculable change in history. There had previously been only a history of nations—there is now a history of mankind; and the idea of an education of human nature as a whole,—an education the work of Jesus Christ

Himself—is become like a compass for the historian, the key of history, and the hope of nations.—D'Aubigné.

I have been young, but now am old. I have spent a whole lifetime in battling against infidelity with the weapons of apologetic science; but I have become ever more and more convinced that the way to the heart does not lie through the head; and that the only way to conversion of the head lies through a converted heart which already tastes the living fruits of the Gospel.—A. Tholuck.

Christianity depends finally on consciousness and experience. From other departments of the mind she may retire at times or seem to, but never from this. Sitting here, if allowed to, on the throne of the soul, she occasionally walks into the other rooms and sets them in order; and accustomed to her presence, sooner or later the soul finds every department flooded with her light.—E. O. Haven.

Christianity is perfect, men are imperfect. Now a perfect consequence cannot spring from an imperfect principle. Christianity, therefore, is not the work of man. If Christianity is not the work of man, it can have come from none but God. If it came from God, men cannot have acquired a knowledge of it except by revelation. Therefore, Christianity is a revealed religion.—Chateaubriand.

The real security of Christianity is to be found in its benevolent morality, in its exquisite adaptation to the human heart, in the facility with which its scheme accommodates itself to the capacity of every human intellect, in the consolation which it bears to every house of mourning, in the light with which it brightens the great mystery of the grave.—Macaulay.

It is the truth divine, speaking to our whole being: occupying, calling into action, and satisfying man's every faculty, supplying the minutest wants of his being, and speaking in one and the same moment to his reason, his conscience and his heart. It is the light of reason, the life of the heart, and the strength of the will.—Pierre.

All who have been great and good without Christianity would have been much greater and better with it. If there be, amongst the sons of men, a single exception to this maxim, the divine Socrates may be allowed to put in the strongest claim. It was his high ambition to deserve, by deeds, not by creeds, an unrevealed heaven, and by works, not by faith, to enter an unpromised land.—Colton.

Nature never gives to a living thing capacities not particularly meant for its benefit and use. If Nature gives to us capacities to believe that we have a Creator whom we never saw, of whom we have no direct proof, who is kind and good and tender beyond all that we know of kindness and goodness and tenderness on earth, it is because the endowment of capacities to conceive a Being must be for our benefit and use; it would not be for our benefit and use if it were a lie.—Bulwer-Lytton.

All the graces of Christianity always go together. They so go together that where there is one, there are all, and where one is wanting, all are wanting. Where there is faith, there are love, and hope, and humility; and where there is love, there is also trust; and where there is a holy trust in God, there is love to God; and where there is a gracious hope, there also is a holy fear of God.—Jonathan Edwards.

Now you say, alas! Christianity is hard; I grant it; but gainful and happy. I condemn the difficulty when I respect the advantage. The greatest labors that have answerable requitals are less than the least that have no regard. Believe me, when I look to the reward, I would not have the work easier. It is a good Master whom we serve, who not only pays, but gives; not after the proportion of our earnings, but of His own mercy.—Bishop Hall.

No religion ever appeared in the world whose natural tendency was so much directed to promote the peace and happiness of mankind. It makes right reason a law in every possible definition of the word. And therefore, even supposing it to have been purely a human invention, it had been the most amiable and the most useful invention that was ever imposed on mankind for their good.—Lord Bolingbroke.

As to the Christian religion, besides the strong evidence which we have for it, there is a balance in its favor from the number of great men who have been convinced of its truth after a serious consideration of the question. Grotius was an acute man, a lawyer, a man accustomed to examine evidence, and he was convinced. Grotius was not a recluse, but a man of the world, who certainly had no bias on the side of religion. Sir Isaac Newton set out an infidel, and came to be a very firm believer.—Johnson.

Ordinarily rivers run small at the beginning, grow broader and broader as they proceed, and become widest and deepest at the point where they enter the sea. It is such rivers that the Christian's life is like. But the life of the mere worldly man is like those rivers in Southern Africa, which, proceeding from mountain freshets, are broad and deep at the beginning, and grow narrower and more shallow as they advance. They waste themselves by soaking into the sands, and at last they die out entirely. The farther they run the less there is of them.—Beecher.

Christianity excludes malignity, subdues selfishness, regulates the passions, subordinates the appetites, quickens the intellect, exalts the affections. It promotes industry, honesty, truth, purity, kindness. It humbles the proud, exalts the lowly, upholds law, favors liberty, is essential to it, and would unite men in one great brotherhood. It is the breath of life to social and civil well-being here, and spreads the azure of that heaven into whose unfathomed depths the eye of faith loves to look.—Mark Hopkins.

We say, then, that Christianity is adapted to the intellect, because its spirit coincides with that of true philosophy; because it removes the incubus of sensuality and low vice; because of the place it gives to truth; because it demands free inquiry; because its mighty truths and systems are brought before the mind in the same way as the truths and systems of nature; because it solves higher problems than nature can; and because it is so communicated as to be adapted to every mind.—Mark Hopkins.

In what consists the entire of Christianity but in this,—that feeling an utter incapacity to work out our own salvation, we submit our whole selves, our hearts, and our understandings, to the Divine disposal; and that, relying upon God's gracious assistance, ensured to our honest endeavors to obtain it, through the mediation of Jesus Christ, we look up to Him, and to Him alone, for safety? Nay, what is the very notion of religion, but this humble reliance upon God?—Archbishop Magee.

Christians are continually tempted to do what all controversy solicits them to do; namely, to argue; as if their business was to establish, in the light of the understanding, certain conclusions to which every rational person must assent. But this is to put the main point, the attractive action of God Himself out of the question. If the end of God be what we hold it to be, to bring human souls to Himself, then the means He actually employs must be living and spiritual. They are likely to be infinitely various and subtle; but they will deal principally with the conscience and the affections.—J. Llewelyn Davies.

The patriarchal, the Jewish, and the Christian dispensations, are evidently but the unfolding of one general plan. In the first we see the folded bud; in the second the expanded leaf; in the third the blossom and the fruit. And now, how sublime the idea of a religion thus commencing in the earliest dawn of time; holding on its way through all the revolutions of kingdoms and the vicissitudes of the race; receiving new forms, but always identical in spirit; and, finally, expanding and embracing in one great brotherhood the whole family of man! Who can doubt that such a religion was from God?—Mark Hopkins.

No, there is nothing on the face of the earth that can, for a moment, bear a comparison with Christianity as a religion for man. Upon this the hope of the race hangs. From the very first, it took its position, as the pillar of fire, to lead the race onward. The intelligence and power of the race are with those who have embraced it; and now, if this, instead of proving indeed a pillar of fire from God, should be found but a delusive meteor, then nothing will be left to the race but to go back to a darkness that may be felt, and to a worse than Egyptian bondage.—Mark Hopkins.

We live in the midst of blessings, till we are utterly insensible to their greatness, and of the source from which they flow. We speak of our civilization, our arts, our freedom, our laws, and forget entirely how large a share of all is due to Christianity. Blot Christianity out of the page of man's history, and what would his laws have been?—what his civilization? Christianity is mixed up with our very being and our daily life; there is not a familiar object round us which does not wear its mark, not a being or a thing which does not wear a different aspect, because the light of Christian hope is on it: not a law which does not owe its truth and gentleness to Christianity, not a custom, which cannot be traced, in all its holy and healthful parts, to the Gospel.—Rose.

Christianity bears all the marks of a divine original; it came down from heaven, and its gracious purpose is to carry us up thither. Its author is God; it was foretold from the beginning, by prophecies, which grew clearer and brighter as they approached the period of their accomplishment. It was confirmed by miracles, which continued until the religion they illustrated was established. It was ratified by the blood of its author; its doctrines are pure, sublime, consistent; its precepts just and holy; its worship is spiritual; its service reasonable and rendered practicable by the offers of divine aid to human weakness. It is sanctioned by the promise of eternal happiness to the faithful, and the threat of everlasting misery to the disobedient.—Hannah More.

Since its introduction, human nature has made great progress, and society experienced great changes; and in this advanced condition of the world; Christianity, instead of losing its application and importance, is found to be more and more congenial and adapted to man's nature and wants. Men have outgrown the other institutions of that period when Christianity appeared, its philosophy, its modes of warfare, its policy, its public and private economy; but Christianity has never shrunk as intellect has opened, but has always kept in advance of men's faculties, and unfolded nobler views in proportion as they have ascended. The highest powers and affections which our nature has developed, find more than adequate objects in this religion. Christianity is indeed peculiarly fitted to the more improved stages of society, to the more delicate sensibilities of refined minds, and especially to that dissatisfaction with the present state, which always grows with the growth of our moral powers and affections.—Channing.

Outside of Christianity there have been grand spectacles of activity and force, brilliant phenomena of genius and virtue, generous attempts at reform, learned philosophical systems, and beautiful mythological poems, but no real profound or fruitful regeneration of humanity and society. Jesus Christ from His cross accomplishes what erewhile in Asia and Europe, princes and philosophers, the powerful of the earth, and sages, attempted without success. He changes the moral and the social state of the world. He pours into the souls of men new enlightenment and new powers. For all classes, for all human conditions, He prepares destinies before His advent unknown. He liberates them at the same time that He lays down rules for their guidance; He quickens them and stills them. He places the Divine law and human liberty face to face, and yet still in harmony. He offers an effectual remedy for the evil which weighs upon humanity; to sin He opens the path of salvation, to unhappiness, the door of hope.—Guizot.

Since the revelation of Christianity, all moral thought has been sanctified by religion. Religion has given it a purity, a solemnity, a sublimity, which even among the noblest of the heathen, we shall look for in vain. The knowledge which shone only by fits and dimly on the eyes of Socrates and Plato, "that rolled in vain to find the light," has descended over many lands into "the huts where poor men lie"—and thoughts are familiar there, beneath the low and smoky roofs, higher far than ever flowed from the lips of Grecian sage meditating among the magnificence of his pillared temples. The whole condition and character of the human being in Christian countries has been raised up to a loftier elevation; and he may be looked at in the face without a sense of degradation, even when he wears the aspect of poverty and distress. Since that religion was given us, and not before, has been felt the meaning of that sublime expression, "The Brotherhood of Man."—John Wilson.

While Christianity is speaking in languages more numerous, by tongues more eloquent, in nations more populous than ever before; marshaling better troops, with richer harmony; shrinking from no foe, rising triumphant from every conflict; shaking down the towers of old philosophies that exalt themselves against God; making the steam-press rush under the demand for her Scriptures, and the steam-horse groan under the weight of her charities; emancipating the enslaved, civilizing the lawless, refining literature, inspiring poetry; sending forth art and science no longer clad in soft raiment to linger in king's palaces, but as hardy prophets of God to make earth bud and blossom as the rose; giving God-like breadth and freedom and energy to the civilization that bears its name, elevating savage islands into civilized states, leading forth Christian martyrs from the mountains of Madagascar, turning the clubs of cannibals into the railings of the altars before which Fiji savages call upon Jesus; repeating the Pentecost, "by many an ancient river and many a palmy plain;" thundering at the seats of ancient paganism; sailing all waters, cabling all oceans, scaling all mountains in the march of its might, and ever enlarging the diameter of those circles of light which it has kindled on earth, and which will soon meet in a universal illumination,—you call it a failure! A little more such failure, and we shall have, over all the globe, the new heavens and new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness.—Edward Thomson.

Christianity is not a voice in the wilderness, but a life in the world. It is not an idea in the air, but feet on the ground, going God's way. It is not an exotic to be kept under glass, but a hardy plant to bear twelve manner of fruits in all kinds of weather. Fidelity to duty is its root and branch. Nothing we can say to the Lord, no calling Him by great or dear names, can take the place of the plain doing of His will. We may cry out about the beauty of eating bread with Him in His kingdom, but it is wasted breath and a rootless hope, unless we plow and plant in His kingdom here and now. To remember Him at His table and to forget Him at ours, is to have invested in bad securities. There is no substitute for plain, every-day goodness.—Maltbie Babcock.

Christmas

For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord.—Luke ii. 11.

I will honor Christmas in my heart, and try to keep it all the year.—Charles Dickens.

A good conscience is a continual Christmas.—Franklin.

'Tis the season for kindling the fire of hospitality in the hall, the genial fire of charity in the heart.—W. Irving.

It is good to be children sometimes, and never better than at Christmas when its mighty Founder was a child Himself.—Dickens.

This day shall change all griefs and quarrels into love.—Shakespeare.

The belfries of all Christendom now roll along the unbroken song of peace on earth, good will to men!—Longfellow.

At Christmas play, and make good cheer,
For Christmas comes but once a year.
—Tusser.

The mistletoe hung in the castle hall,
The holly branch shone on the old oak wall.
—Thos. Haynes Bayly.

The church-bells of innumerable sects are all chime-bells to-day, ringing in sweet accordance throughout many lands, and awaking a great joy in the heart of our common humanity.—E.
H. Chapin.

Heap on more wood! the wind is chill;
But let it whistle as it will,
We'll keep our Christmas merry still.
—Scott.

The time draws near the birth of Christ:
The moon is hid; the night is still;
The Christmas bells from hill to hill
Answer each other in the mist.
—Tennyson.

Hail to the King of Bethlehem,
Who weareth in His diadem
The yellow crocus for the gem
Of His authority!
—Longfellow.

For little children everywhere
A joyous season still we make;
We bring our precious gifts to them,
Even for the dear child Jesus' sake.
—Phebe Cary.

Be merry all, be merry all,
With holly dress the festive hall;
Prepare the song, the feast, the ball,
To welcome merry Christmas.
—W. R. Spencer.

It is the Christmas time:
And up and down 'twixt heaven and earth,
In glorious grief and solemn mirth,
The shining angels climb.
—D. M. Mulock.

At Christmas-tide the open hand
Scatters its bounty o'er sea and land,
And none are left to grieve alone,
For Love is heaven and claims its own.
—Margaret E. Sangster.

The kindness of Christmas is the kindness of Christ. To know that God so loved us as to give us His Son for our dearest Brother, has brought human affection to its highest tide on the day of that Brother's birth. If God so loved us, how can we help loving one another?—Maltbie Babcock.

Hark! the herald angels sing,
Glory to the new-born King:
Peace on earth, and mercy mild,
God and sinners reconciled.
—Charles Wesley.

No trumpet-blast profaned
The hour in which the Prince of Peace was born;
No bloody streamlet stained Earth's silver rivers on that sacred morn.
—Bryant.

I heard the bells on Christmas Day
Their old, familiar carols play,
And wild and sweet
The words repeat
Of peace on earth, good-will to men!
—Longfellow.

Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men.

Heathenism had proved unequal to the wants of men; and it was when the most thoughtful among the Pagans were turned away from its hollow mockeries and misleading altars that the anthem of the angels broke clear and loud above the slopes of Bethlehem: "Glory to God in the highest!
Peace on earth and good will toward men!"—Wm. M. Taylor, D. D.

To-day the whole Christian world prostrates itself in adoration around the crib of Bethlehem and rehearses in accents of love a history which precedes all time and will endure throughout eternity. As if by an instinct of our higher, spiritual nature, there well up from the depths of our hearts, emotions which challenge the power of human expression. We seem to be lifted out of the sphere of natural endeavor to put on a new life and to stretch forward in desire to a blessedness which, though not palpable, is eminently real.—Cardinal Gibbons.

To realize this purpose—to change humanity, to triumph over evil, and to honor the Father by a union never to be broken of the Father and the many sons who should be brought unto glory—this was the thought which filled the mind of Jesus Christ. This is the meaning of Christmas; and as we love God with soul and mind and strength, and prove our divine sonship by good will and kindness toward all our fellow-men, we shall realize the divine idea of our Master and unite in His blessed work.—Observer.

In the past, Christ was, in the genealogies, stepping Bethlehemward. Every time a new descendant in the covenant-line was born, the voice of prophecy shouted: "Christ is coming!" As ancestor was added to ancestor, the voice waxed louder and louder. Thus the shout was repeated and repeated until at last the angels and the magi and the shepherds and the watchers in the Temple answered back that shout with the gladder and louder shout, "Christ has come!" That is the Christmas shout which to-day Church of God throws to Church of God all through Christendom.—David Gregg, D. D.

We therefore welcome our Christ-mas in December. The "worship of Christ" could not have a better setting than amid the domestic festivities, social forces, and generous and man helping deeds of our merry Christmas-tide. In no more fitting way can we say farewell to the closing year, and All hail! to the new. "Christ is born." We therefore must put off the old man—his moroseness and selfishness, his sadness and despair, his peevishness and fretfulness, his feebleness and decay—and put on the new man, which, after Christ, is created in true joy, large faith, energetic service, lowly duty, devout obedience, and death-daring self-sacrifice.—John Clifford.

God framed the history of the world in view of the coming of Jesus Christ. In the very beginning He chose a family whose line of descent should run directly from Eden to Bethlehem. This family God took into covenant with Himself, and the promise of the covenant was that of its seed Christ should be born in the fulness of time. This covenant-line runs through the whole of the Old Testament as the golden thread runs through the beautiful fabric. Everything centres in this covenant-line. It unifies the Old Testament. It is the cord upon which the pearls of history are strung. Keep this in mind, and it will explain a thousand mysteries and perplexities in reading the Old Testament.—David Gregg, D. D.

It is the most human and kindly of seasons, as fully penetrated and irradiated with the feeling of human brotherhood, which is the essential spirit of Christianity, as the month of June with sunshine and the balmy breath of roses.—Geo. W. Curtis.

O little town of Bethlehem!
How still we see thee lie;
Above thy deep and dreamless sleep,
The silent stars go by.
Yet, in thy dark street shineth
The everlasting Light;
The hopes and fears of all the years,
Are met in thee, to-night.

—Phillips Brooks.

Blessed be God for His unspeakable gift. We need Him. Souls desire Him as the hart panteth after the water brooks. He came to the world in the fullness of time. He comes at this advent season to us. To-day may be for some soul here the fullness of time. Let us open the gates and admit Him, that this Christ may be our Christ forever; that living with Him and dying with Him, we may also be glorified together with Him.—David J. Burrell, D. D.

But now the Prince of Peace has come—He of whom it was said that "in His days there shall be abundance of peace." Now "mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other." Now "old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new;" and "all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation; to wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto Himself."

The herald angels are singing still, and we hear their "Peace on earth, good will to men," once more, as we have often done. What can we do but answer back in glad strains: "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and His name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace"? It is His presence that fills our homes with mirth and song. If he will come again, turning life's water into wine, touching our sick that they may be healed, cleansing, pardoning, blessing us all—as He will if we make room for Him—then, indeed, we must be glad.—Christian at Work.

The universal joy of Christmas is certainly wonderful. We ring the bells when princes are born, or toll a mournful dirge when great men pass away. Nations have their red-letter days, their carnivals and festivals, but once in the year and only once, the whole world stands still to celebrate the advent of a life. Only Jesus of Nazareth claims this world-wide, undying remembrance. You cannot cut Christmas out of the Calendar, nor out of the heart of the world.—Anon.

The earth has grown old with its burden of care.

But at Christmas it always is young;
The heart of the jewel burns lustrous and fair,
And its soul, full of music, breaks forth on the air
When the song of the angels is sung.

It is coming, Old Earth, it is coming to-night!

On the snowflakes which cover thy sod
The feet of the Christ-child fall gentle and white,
And the voice of the Christ-child tells out with delight

That mankind are the children of God.
—Phillips Brooks.

If we were to fancy a wholly Christianized world, it would be a world inspired by the spirit of Christmas—a bright, friendly, beneficent, generous, sympathetic, mutually helpful world. A man who is habitually mean, selfish, narrow, is a man without Christmas in his soul. Let us cling to Christmas all the more as a day of the spirit which in every age some souls have believed to be the possible spirit of human society. The earnest faith and untiring endeavor which see in Christmas a forecast are more truly Christian, surely, than the pleasant cynicism of Atheists, etc., which smiles upon it as the festival of a futile hope. Meanwhile we may reflect that from good natured hopelessness to a Christmas world may not be farther than from star dust to a solar system.

—George William Curtis.

We see Jesus in the manger. We adore Him; we worship Him; we glorify Him. We stand oppressed before such love—a love stronger than death—a love so strong that it did die that we might live. We thank Thee for the sweetness of human love, but how could we ever have dared to think that such love was in the heart of God for us! We look on nature and see Thy beauty and Thy majesty, but we are afraid, for we have sinned. And then we learn that Thou has sent Thy Son, to be bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh; and before such inconceivable love we can only worship and adore. We are so weary of our failures and our slow growth toward Thee. Cleanse us deeply from sin, strengthen our moral purposes.—Maltbie Babcock.

The lovely legends of the day; the stories and the songs and the half-fairy lore that gather around it; the ancient traditions of dusky woods and mystic rites; the magnificence or simplicity of Christian observance, from the pope in his triple tiara, borne upon his portative throne in gorgeous state to celebrate pontifical high mass at the great altar of St. Peter's, to George Herbert humbly kneeling in his rustic church at Bemerton, or to the bare service in some missionary chapel upon the American frontier; the lighting of Christmas trees and hanging up of Christmas stockings, the profuse giving, the happy family meetings, the dinner, the game, the dance—they are all the natural signs and symbols, the flower and fruit, of Christmas. For Christmas is the day of days which declares the universal human consciousness that peace on earth comes only from good will to men.—Geo. W. Curtis.

The whole air at the first Christmas-tide was tremulous with joy. It wa

a time for holy song, for inspired psalm, for seraphic song. Let joy come still to our homes and hearts. Christ gives brightness and beauty, gladness and glory, to the whole circle of life and duty. Come, Lord Jesus, there shall be room for Thee in our homes. Once there was none in the inn, but only in the stable; now our best is Thine. Only honor us with Thy beneficent presence. Let us away with strife at this season; now is the time to speak kindly words. Let us not carry into the new year the enmities of the old; let not the harsh notes of contention come into the heavenly song of peace. Christ came to give peace, and from Heaven's throne to-day He bends to give peace to all who trust Him. He was the only person ever born into the world who had His choice as to how He should come. He might have come man, as did the first Adam; He came a babe. He inserted Himself into our race at its lowest and weakest point. If He were to lift the race He must get under it. He glorified the cradle; He beautified boyhood; He sanctified motherhood.—Robert S. MacArthur, D. D.

For us, however, in these northern climes, and with our traditions and associations, Christmas could not well be better placed than where it is. Nature is in slumber, as if in death—fit picture of the sleep of man till roused to righteousness by the voice of the new-born Babe of Bethlehem. Life is at its lowest, and death reigns, or seems to reign, everywhere. Saving the thick-berried holly, the mistletoe, dear to Druid priests, the laurel, and the yew, the trees are bared, and the warblers of the sky avoid their desolate branches. We are driven inward. The fireside is the centre of a thousand charms. Home is clothed in its most beautiful garments. We are forced to the conclusion that we need other help than Mother Earth can give us. Our hearts open instinctively to heaven and its message, and with willing feet we haste to do the will of Him "Who, though He was rich, yet for our sakes became poor."

Christians, stand at Bethlehem and open every door and window of your being Christward. Look backward. Look forward. Magnify Bethlehem. Recount to your souls the things for which it stands. It stands for the "fulness of time." It stands for the fulfilment of glorious predictions. It stands for the realization of those burning hopes which made the heroic men of the past. It stands for the coming of the Son of God Himself into our nature. It stands for the glorious past and for the more glorious future. As the dawn carries in it the full day, it carries in it the salvation of man, and the triumph of the right over the wrong, and the coming millennial glory of the kingdom of Jesus Christ.

When we comprehend the backward and forward reach of Bethlehem, we do not wonder that all that is grand crowds around the Cradle-Manger. It is worthy of all. Let the Star shine. Let the Magi give gifts. Let the Shepherds worship. Let the angel-faces flash out from the great dome overhead. Let the church-bells chime. Let the sacred harps and organs respond to the masterhand that sweeps their strings and flies over their keys, and let them turn the common air into praise. Let Christmas carols roll over this wide earth, and echo among the stars. Let the great universe of God jubilate. Let everything in Heaven and earth shout, "Hosanna to the Son of David; blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord; Hosanna in the Highest." While all this takes place, see to it, O my soul, that thou carriest thyself to Bethlehem, to receive, and to love, and to trust, and to worship. Be thou certainly there; and while there recognize Christ, honor Christ, incarnate Christ, and call Christ God.—David Gregg, D. D.

We ring the bells and we raise the strain,
We hang up garlands everywhere
And bid the tapers twinkle fair,
And feast and frolic—and then we go Back to the same old lives again.
—Susan Coolidge.

Never deny the babies their Christmas! It is the shining seal set upon a year of happiness. Let them believe in Santa Claus, or St. Nicholas, or Kriss Kringle, or whatever name the jolly Dutch saint bears in your religion.—Marion Harland.

Let Christmas be a bright and happy day; but let its brightness come from the radiance of the star of Bethlehem, and its happiness be found in Christ, the sinner's loving Saviour.—H. G. Den.

Some say, that ever 'gainst that season comes,
Wherein our Saviour's birth is celebrated,
The bird of dawning singeth all night long,
And then, they say no spirit can walk abroad,
So hallow'd and so gracious is the time.

—Shakespeare.

Blow, bugles of battle, the marches of peace;
East, west, north, and south let the long quarrel cease;
Sing the song of great joy that the angels began,
Sing of glory to God and of good-will to man!

—Whittier.

England was merry England, when Old Christmas brought his sports again.
'Twas Christmas broach'd the mightiest ale;
'Twas Christmas told the merriest tale;
A Christmas gambol oft could cheer
The poor man's heart through half the year.

—Scott.

What babe new born is this that in a manger cries?
Near on her lowly bed his happy mother lies.
Oh, see the air is shaken with white and heavenly wings—
This is the Lord of all the earth, this is the King of Kings.

—R. W. Gilder.

God rest ye, little children; let nothing you affright,
For Jesus Christ, your Saviour, was born this happy night;
Along the hills of Galilee the white flocks sleeping lay,
When Christ, the Child of Nazareth, was born on Christmas Day.

—D. M. Mulock.

'Twas the night before Christmas, when all through the house
Not a creature was stirring,—not even a mouse:
The stockings were hung by the chimney with care,
In hopes that St. Nicholas soon would be there.

—Clement C. Moore.

I have always thought of Christmas time, when it has come round apart from the veneration due to its sacred name and origin, if anything belonging to it can be apart from that—as a good time; a kind, forgiving, charitable, pleasant time.—Charles Dickens.

This is the month, and this the happy morn,
Wherein the Son of Heaven's eternal King,
Of wedded maid and virgin mother born,
Our great redemption from above did bring,
For so the holy sages once did sing,
That He our deadly forfeit should release,
And with His Father work us a perpetual peace.

—Milton.

How bless'd, how envied, were our life,
Could we but scape the poulterer's knife!
But man, curs'd man, on Turkey's preys,
And Christmas shortens all our days:
Sometimes with oysters we combine,
Sometimes assist the savory chine;
From the low peasant to the lord,
The Turkey smokes on every board.

—Gay.

God rest you, merry gentlemen,
Let nothing you dismay,
For Jesus Christ our Saviour
Was born upon this day,
To save us all from Satan's power
When we were gone astray.
O tidings of comfort and joy,
For Jesus Christ our Saviour was Born on Christmas Day.

—Old English Carol.

O most illustrious of the days of time!
Day full of joy and benison to earth
When Thou wast born, sweet Babe of Bethlehem!
With dazzling pomp descending angels sung
Good will and peace to men, to God due praise,
Who on the errand of salvation sent Thee, Son Beloved! of plural Unity
Essential part, made flesh that mad'st all worlds.

—Abraham Coles.

Ring out, ye crystal spheres!
Once bless our human ears,
If ye have power to touch our senses so:
And let your silver chime
Move in melodious time,
And let the bass of Heaven's deep organ
blow;
And with your ninefold harmony
Make up full consort to the angelic symphony.

—Milton.

The death of Christ is a great mystery; but His birth is even a greater.
That He should live a human life at all, is stranger than that, so living,
He should die a human death. I can scarce get past His cradle in my wondering, to wonder at His cross. The infant Jesus is, in some views, a greater marvel than Jesus with the purple robe and the crown of thorns.—Crichton.

The chief charm of Christmas is its simplicity. It is a festival that appeals to everyone, because every one can understand it. * * * A genuine fellowship pervades our common life—a fellowship whose source is our common share in the gift of the world's greatest Life which was given to the whole world.—Arthur Reed Kimball.

Chrysanthemum

Chrysanthemums from gilded argosy.
Unload their gaudy scentless merchandise.
—Oscar Wilde.

Fair gift of Friendship! and her ever bright
And faultless image! welcome now thou art,
In thy pure loveliness—thy robes of white,
Speaking a moral to the feeling heart;
Unscattered by heats—by wintry blasts unmoved—
Thy strength thus tested—and thy charms improved. —Anna Peyre Dinnies.

Church

Spire whose "silent finger points to heaven."—Wordsworth.

The way to preserve the peace of the church is to preserve the purity of it.—Matthew Henry.

Built God a church and laughed His word to scorn.—Cowper.

The mission of the Church is to seek and to save them that are lost.—Aughey.

Some to church repair, not for the doctrine, but the music there.—Pope.

Who builds a church to God, and not to fame,
Will never mark the marble with his name.
—Pope.

Everywhere, through all generations and ages of the Christian world, no church ever perceived the Word of God to be against it.—Hooker.

An itch of disputing will prove the scab of churches.—Sir Henry Wotton.

What is a church? Our honest sexton tells,
'Tis a tall building, with a tower and bells.
—Crabbe.

A little thing will keep them from the house of God who have no desire to go to it.—Aughey.

Fond fools
Promise themselves a name from building churches.
—Randolph.

Surely the church is a place where one day's truce ought to be allowed to the dissensions and animosities of mankind.—Burke.

I never yet have known the Spirit of God to work where the Lord's people were divided.—D. L. Moody.

Division has done more to hide Christ from the view of men than all the infidelity that has ever been spoken.—George MacDonald.

A lazy, indolent church tends toward unbelief; an earnest, busy church, in hand-to-hand conflict with sin and misery, grows stronger in faith.—John Hall.

The union of Church and State is not to make the Church political, but the State religious.—Lord Eldon.

The Church limits her sacramental services to the faithful. Christ gave Himself upon the cross a ransom for all.—Pascal.

The church is made up of individuals. It can do nothing except as its members work, and work together.—Aughey.

To support those of your rights authorized by Heaven, destroy everything rather than yield; that is the spirit of the Church.—Boileau.

The church may go through her dark ages, but Christ is with her in the midnight; she may pass through her fiery furnace, but Christ is in the midst of the flame with her.—C. H. Spurgeon.

I believe that the root of almost every schism and heresy from which the Christian church has ever suffered, has been the effort of men to earn, rather than to receive, their salvation.—John Ruskin.

The Church has a good stomach; she has swallowed down whole countries, and has never known a surfeit; the Church alone can digest such ill-gotten wealth.—Goethe.

What makes a church a den of thieves?
A dean and chapter, and white sleeves.
—Butler.

Wherever God erects a house of prayer,
The Devil always builds a chapel there;
And 'twill be found upon examination;
The latter has the largest congregation.
—De Foe.

The perfect world, by Adam trod,
Was the first temple—built by God—
His fiat laid the corner stone,
And heaved its pillars, one by one.
—Willis.

“What is a church?” Let truth and reason speak;
They would reply—“The faithful pure and meek,
From Christian folds, the one selected race,
Of all professions, and in every place.”
—Crabbe.

When once thy foot enters the church, beware—
God is more there than thou: for thou art there
Only by His permission. Then beware,
And make thyself all reverence and fear.
—Herbert.

It is better to have a plain, substantial building, with no extravagance about it, but without a debt, than to have the most splendid specimen of Gothic architecture that is overlaid by a mortgage.—Wm. M. Taylor.

We have houses of God built in defiance of the laws of God. On the walls of one of these monstrosities I saw this most appropriate motto: “This is the house of God; how dreadful is this place!”—Prof. Sheppard.

Doubts about the fundamentals of the Gospel exist in certain churches, I am told, to a large extent. My dear friends, where there is a warm-hearted church, you do not hear of them. I never saw a fly light on a red-hot plate.—C. H. Spurgeon.

Persecution has not crushed it, power has not beaten it back, time has not abated its force, and, what is most wonderful of all, the abuses and treasons of its friends have not shaken its stability.—Horace Bushnell.

One family—we dwell in Him,
One church above, beneath,
Though now divided by the stream,
The narrow stream of death.
—Charles Wesley.

Steele has observed that there is this difference between the Church of Rome and the Church of England,—the one professes to be infallible, the other to be never in the wrong.—Colton.

Why should we crave a hallow'd spot?
An altar is in each man's cot,
A church in every grove that spreads
Its living roof above our heads.
—Wordsworth.

An instinctive taste teaches men to build their churches in flat countries with spire steeples, which, as they cannot be referred to any other object, point as with silent finger to the sky and stars.—Coleridge.

Jesus organized the church, which is His vineyard. He commands all to go into the vineyard and work. All who are united to Christ by faith, and are thus members of His mystical body, should be members of His visible church.—Aughey.

And this is the mission of the church—not civilization, but salvation—not better laws, purer legislation, social elevation, human equality, and liberty, but first, the “kingdom of God and His righteousness;” regenerated hearts, and all other things will follow.—A. E. Kittredge.

They who would grow in grace, must love the habitation of God's house. It is those that are planted in the courts of the Lord who shall flourish, and not those that are occasionally there.—John Angel James.

There ought to be such an atmosphere in every Christian church that a man going there and sitting two hours should take the contagion of heaven, and carry home a fire to kindle the altar whence he came.—Beecher.

There is nothing more pitiable than a soulless, sapless, shriveled church, seeking to thrive in a worldly atmosphere, rooted in barren professions, bearing no fruit, and maintaining only the semblance of existence; such a church cannot long survive.—George C. Lorimer.

Do you recall the laughter of the Philistines at the helpless Sampson—You can hear the echo of that laughter to-day, as the church, shorn of her strength by her own sin, is an object of ridicule to the world, who cry in derision, "Where is your boasted triumph and your Millennial glory?"—A. E. Kittredge.

How long must the church live before it will learn that strength is won by action, and success by work, and that all this immeasurable feeding without action and work is a positive damage to it—that it is the procurer of spiritual obesity, gout, and debility.—J. G. Holland.

Antedating our history, possessing and illumining the hearts of the founders of liberty in our free land, and constantly exerting the soul-equalizing and soul-elevating principles of the gospel of Christ as they fall from Sabbath to Sabbath on the masses of the people, the Christian church stands before all men as the pillar and ground of civil liberty in the world.—W. H. Perrine.

To be of no church is dangerous. Religion, of which the rewards are distant, and which is animated only by Faith and Hope, will glide by degrees out of the mind, unless it be invigorated and reimpresed by external ordinances, by stated calls to worship, and the salutary influence of example.—Johnson.

Under the term Church, I understand a body or collection of human persons, professing faith in Christ, gathered together in several places of the world, for worship of the same God, and united into the same corporation.—Bishop Pearson.

As in Noah's ark there were the clean and the unclean, raven and dove, leopard and kid, the cruel lion with the gentle lamb; so in the Church of Christ on earth you will find the same diversities and differences of human character.—Rev. Dr. Guthrie.

And she (the Roman Catholic Church) may still exist in undiminished vigor, when some traveller from New Zealand shall, in the midst of a vast solitude, take his stand on a broken arch of London Bridge to sketch the ruins of St. Paul's.—Macauley.

In the true, original, catholic, evangelical religion of Jesus Christ, and in this alone, all the divided religions of Christendom find their union, their repose, their support. Find out His mind, His character, His will; and in His greatness we shall rise above our littleness; in His strength we shall lose our weakness; in His peace we shall forget our discord.—Dean Stanley.

The church is a sort of hospital for men's souls, and as full of quackery as the hospital for their bodies. Those who are taken into it live like pensioners in their Retreat or Sailors' Snug Harbor, where you may see a row of religious cripples sitting outside in sunny weather.—Thoreau.

In the Church of Christ one little worker can mar the whole by failing to fulfill his office. There is a place for each. Find your place if you are not already in it, and obey the Saviour's command, "Go work in my vineyard"—the command of a king which you disobey at the peril of losing the reward of the faithful.—Aughey.

So, from generation to generation, the spiritual church is rising upwards toward its perfection; and, though one after another the workmen pass away, the fabric remains, and the great Master-builder carries on the undertaking. Be it ours to build in our portion in a solid and substantial manner, so that they who come after us may be at once thankful for our thoroughness, and inspired by our example.—Wm. M. Taylor.

What is the average type of a counterfeit church? A hammock, attached on one side to the cross, and, on the other, held and swung to and fro by the forefinger of Mammon; its freight of nominal Christians elegantly moaning meanwhile over the evils of the times, and not at ease unless fanned by eloquence and music, and sprinkled by social adulations into perfumed, unheroic slumber.—Joseph Cook.

Let the church come to God in the strength of a perfect weakness, in the power of a felt helplessness and a child-like confidence, and then, either she has no strength, and has no right to be, or she has a strength that is infinite. Then and thus, will she stretch out the rod over the seas of difficulty that lie before her, and the waters shall divide, and she shall pass through, and sing the song of deliverance.—Mark Hopkins.

I know that with consecration on the part of believers, separation from the world, disentanglement from enslaving sins, and a mighty baptism of the Holy Spirit, the church would become a conquering power in the world, not by its constructed theology, not by its Sabbath services, not by its arguments to convince the intellect, but by its simple story of Jesus' love, by the Cross, the Cross—God's hammer, God's fire.—A. E. Kittredge.

Men say their pinnacles point to heaven. Why, so does every tree that buds, and every bird that rises as it sings. Men say their aisles are good for worship. Why, so is every mountain glen and rough sea-shore. But this they have of distinct and indisputable glory,—that their mighty walls were never raised, and never shall be, but by men who love and aid each other in their weakness.—Ruskin.

The clearest window that ever was fashioned, if it is barred by spiders' webs, and hung over with carcasses of insects, so that the sunlight has forgotten to find its way through, of what use can it be? Now, the Church is God's window; and if it is so obscured by errors that its light is darkness, how great is that darkness!—Beecher.

When I go to the house of God I do not want amusement; I want the doctrine which is according to godliness. I want to hear the remedy against the harassing of my guilt and the disorder of my affections. I want to be led from weariness and disappointment to that goodness which filleth the hungry soul. I want to have light upon the mystery of Providence; to be taught how the judgments of the Lord are right; how I shall be prepared for duty and for trial; how I may fear God all the days of my life, and close them in peace.—John M. Mason.

The church itself has got to go outside of its own borders and carry the Gospel to every creature, or it is no church of Christ; and any mutual improvement club which thinks that by reading its Shakespeare, or by acting its pretty tableaux, or by having this or that little reading from Spenser and from Chaucer, it is going to lift itself up into any higher order of culture or life, is wholly mistaken, unless as an essential part of its duty, it goes out into the world, finds those that are falling down, and lifts them up to the majesty of freemen, who are sons of God.—Edward E. Hale.

Then might ye see
Cows, hoods, and habits with their wearers
And flutter'd into rags; then reliques,
Indulgences, dispenses, pardons, bulls,
The sport of winds; all these upwhirl'd
Fly to the rearward of the world far off
Into a limbo large and broad, since called
The paradise of fools. —Milton.

The church is not a select circle of the immaculate, but a home where the outcast may come in. It is not a palace with gate attendants and challenging sentinels along the entrance-ways holding off at arm's-length the stranger, but rather a hospital where the broken-hearted may be healed, and where all the weary and troubled may find rest and take counsel together.—Aughhey.

Any church which forsakes the regular and uniform for the periodical and spasmodic service of God, is doomed to decay; any church which relies for its spiritual strength and growth entirely upon seasons of "revival," will very soon have no genuine revivals to rely on. Our holy God will not conform His blessings to man's moods and moral caprice. If a church is declining, it may require a "revival" to restore it; but what need was there of its declining?—T. L. Cuyler.

In dim cathedrals, dark with vaulted gloom,
What holy awe invests the sacred tomb!
There pride will bow, and anxious care expand,
And creeping avarice come with open hand;
The gay can weep, the impious can adore,
From morn's first glimmerings on the chancel floor
Till dying sunset shed his crimson stains
Through the faint halos of the iris'd panes.
—O. W. Holmes.

Look on this edifice of marble made—
How fair it swells, too beautiful to fade.
See what fine people in its portals crowd,
Smiling and greeting, talking, laughings loud!
What is it? Surely not a gay exchange,
Where wit and beauty social joys arrange;
Not a grand shop, where late Parisian styles
Attract rich buyers from a thousand miles?
But step within; no need of further search.
Behold, admire a fashionable church!
Look how its oriel window glints and gleams,
What tinted light magnificently streams
On the proud pulpit, carved with quaint device,
Where velvet cushions, exquisitely nice,
Press'd by the polish'd preacher's dainty hands,
Hold a large volume clasp'd by golden bands.
—Park Benjamin.

The one injurious and fatal fact of our present church work is the barrier between the churches and the poorest classes. The first thing for us to do is to demolish this barrier. The impression is abroad among the poor that they are not wanted in the churches. This impression is either correct or incorrect. If it is correct, then there is no missionary work, for us who are pastors, half so urgent as the conversion of our congregations to Christianity. If it is incorrect, we are still guilty before God in that we have allowed such an impression to go abroad; and we are bound to address ourselves, at once and with all diligence, to the business of convincing the poor people that they are wanted, and will be made welcome in the churches.—W. Gladden.

Congregations must justify their existence. If they only bring people together to be "very much pleased," why, the lecture bureaux will contract for all that. "Did you worship? Were you edified? Did the Lord speak to you? Did you speak to Him? Do you mean more seriously to be pure, honest, upright, generous, manly, holy, from what you did and heard to-day?" These are the questions which the best part of mankind feel to be proper, and to which we must have affirmative replies.—John Hall.

Churchyard

There lay the warrior and the son of song,
And there—in silence till the judgment day—

The orator, whose all-persuading tongue
Had mov'd the nations with resistless sway.
—Mrs. Norton.

Strange things, the neighbours say, have happen'd there;
Wild shrieks have issued from the hollow tombs,
Dead men have come again, and walk'd about;
And the great bell has toll'd unring, untouch'd.
Such tales their cheer at wake or gossiping,
When it draws near to 'witching time of night.
—Blair.

Yet there are graves, whose rudely shapen sod
Bears the fresh footprints where the sexton trod;
Graves where the verdure has not dar'd to shoot,
Where the chance wildflower has not fix'd its root,
Whose slumbering tenants, dead without a name,
The eternal record shall at length proclaim
Pure as the holiest in the long array
Of hooded, mitred, or tiar'd clay!
—O. W. Holmes.

The solitary, silent, solemn scene,
Where Casars, heroes, peasants, hermits lie,
Blended in dust together; where the slave Rests from his labors; where th' insulting proud
Resigns his power, the miser drops his hoard,
Where human folly sleeps. —Dyer.

Circles

The eye is the first circle; the horizon which it forms is the second; and throughout nature this primary figure is repeated without end. It is the highest emblem in the cipher of the world.—Emerson.

I watch'd the little circles die;
They past into the level flood.
—Tennyson.

As the small pebble stirs the peaceful lake;
The centre mov'd, a circle straight succeeds,
Another still, and still another spreads.
—Pope.

Glory is like a circle in the water,
Which never ceaseth to enlarge itself,
Till, by broad spreading, it disperse to
nought. —Shakespeare.

Circles in water as they wider flow
The less conspicuous in their progress grow,
And when at last they trench upon the shore,
Distinction ceases and they're view'd no more. —Crabbe.

Circles and right lines limit and close all bodies, and the mortal right-lined circle must conclude and shut up all.—Sir Thomas Browne.

Circumspection

Persons who want experience should be extremely cautious how they depart from those principles which have been received generally, because founded on solid reasons, and how they deviate from those customs which have obtained long, because in their effect they have proved good: thus circumspect should all persons be, who cannot yet have acquired much practical knowledge of the world: lest, instead of becoming what they anxiously wish to become, more beneficial to mankind than those who have preceded them, they should actually though inadvertently be instrumental towards occa-

sioning some of the worst evils that can befall human society.—Bishop Huntingford.

Circumstances

Circumstances alter cases.—Hali-burton.

Circumstances! I make circumstances.—Napoleon I.

Cause and effect are the chancellors of God.—Emerson.

Circumstances over which I have no control.—Wellington (Duke of).

The happy combination of fortuitous circumstances.—Scott.

It is circumstances (difficulties) which show what men are.—Epictetus.

We are surrounded, ambushed, by the robber troops of circumstances.—
Hafiz.

How truly are we the dupes of show and circumstances!—Washington Irving.

The education of circumstances is superior to that of tuition.—Wordsworth.

The same wind that carries one vessel into port may blow another off shore.—Bovee.

Man is not the creature of circumstances,
Circumstances are the creatures of men.
—Benj. Disraeli.

It is our relation to circumstances that determines their influence upon us.—Bovee.

Superiority to circumstances is one of the most prominent characteristics of great men.—Horace Mann.

Who does the best his circumstance allows, does well, acts nobly; angels could no more.—Young.

A prudent man should neglect no circumstances.—Sophocles.

Sure, occasion is the father of most that is good in us.—Thackeray.

Thus neither the praise nor the blame is our own.—Cowper.

And grasps the skirts of happy chance,
And breasts the blows of circumstance.
—Tennyson.

Circumstances are the rulers of the weak; they are but the instruments of the wise.—Samuel Lover.

Men are the sport of circumstance, when
The circumstances seem the sport of men.
—Byron.

To give and to lose is nothing; but to lose and to give still is the part of a great mind.—Seneca.

For these attacks do not contribute to make us frail but rather show us to be what we are.—Thomas à Kempis.

I am the very slave of circumstance
And impulse—borne away with every breath.
—Byron.

What saves the virtue of many a woman is that protecting god, the impossible.—Balzac.

Circumstance, that unspiritual god and miscreator, makes and helps along our coming evils.—Byron.

He is happy whose circumstances suit his temper; but he is more excellent who can suit his temper to any circumstances.—Hume.

A man is not little when he finds it difficult to cope with circumstances, but when circumstances overmaster him.—Goethe.

When Fate wills that something should come to pass, she sends forth a million of little circumstances to clear and prepare the way.—Thackeray.

To what fortuitous occurrence do we not owe every pleasure and convenience of our lives.—Goldsmith.

Man is not the creature of circumstances, circumstances are the creatures of man. We are free agents, and man is more powerful than matter.—Beaconsfield.

Change a virtue in its circumstances and it becomes a vice; change a vice in its circumstances, and it becomes a virtue. Regard the same quality from two sides; on one it is a fault, on the other a merit. The essential of a man is found concealed far below these moral badges.—Taine.

Thus we see, too, in the world that some persons assimilate only what is ugly and evil from the same moral circumstances which supply good and beautiful results—the fragrance of celestial flowers—to the daily life of others.—Nath. Hawthorne.

When the Gauls laid waste Rome, they found the senators clothed in their robes, and seated in stern tranquillity in their curule chairs: in this manner they suffered death without resistance or supplication. Such conduct was in them applauded as noble and magnanimous; in the hapless Indians it was reviled as both obstinate and sullen. How truly are we the dupes of show and circumstances!
How different is virtue, clothed in purple and enthroned in state, from virtue, naked and destitute, and perishing obscurely in a wilderness.—Washington Irving.

Instead of saying that man is the creature of circumstances, it would be nearer the mark to say that man is the architect of circumstance. It is character which builds an existence out of circumstance. Our strength is measured by our plastic power. From the same material one man builds palaces, another hovels; one warehouses, another villas.—G. H. Lewes.

Cities — Citizen

In the busy haunts of men.—Mrs.
Hemans.

Even cities have their graves!—
Longfellow.

Far from gay cities, and the ways of men.—Homer.

The people are the city.—Coriolanus.

If you would know and not be known, live in a city.—Colton.

I always seem to suffer some loss of faith on entering cities.—Emerson.

Before man made us citizens, great Nature made us men.—Lowell.

Towered cities please us then,
And the busy hum of men.
—Milton.

Like Melrose Abbey, large cities should especially be viewed by moonlight.—Willis.

Cities force growth, and make men talkative and entertaining, but they make them artificial.—Emerson.

Cities give us collision. 'Tis said London and New York take the nonsense out of a man.—Emerson.

Great towns are but a large sort of prison to the soul, like cages to birds, or pounds to beasts.—Charron.

I have found by experience that they who have spent all their lives in cities contract not only an effeminacy of habit, but of thinking.—Goldsmith.

The number of objects we see from living in a large city amuses the mind like a perpetual raree-show, without supplying it with any ideas.—Hazlitt.

I live not in myself, but I become Portion of that around me; and to me
High mountains are a feeling, but the hum
Of human cities torture. —Byron.

Take heed what you say, sir.
An hundred honest men! why, if there were So many i' th' city, 'twere enough to forfeit
Their charter. —Shirley.

Men, by associating in large masses, as in camps and in cities, improve their talents, but impair their virtues, and strengthen their minds, but weaken their morals.—Colton.

If you suppress the exorbitant love of pleasure and money, idle curiosity, iniquitous pursuits and wanton mirth, what a stillness would there be in the greatest cities.—Bryère.

The city an epitome of the social world. All the belts of civilization intersect along its avenues. It contains the products of every moral zone. It is cosmopolitan, not only in a national,
but a spiritual sense.—Czapin.

The union of men in large masses is indispensable to the development and rapid growth of the higher faculties of men. Cities have always been the fireplaces of civilization whence light and heat radiated out into the dark cold world.—Theodore Parker.

Dante might choose his home in all the wide beautiful world; but to be out of the streets of Florence was exile to him. Socrates never cared to go beyond the bounds of Athens. The great universal heart welcomes the city as a natural growth of the eternal forces.—F. B. Sanborn.

A great city whose image dwells on the memory of man is the type of some great idea. Rome represents conquest; faith hovers over Jerusalem; and Athens embodies the pre-eminent quality of the antique world-art.—
Beaconsfield.

There is such a difference between the pursuits of men in great cities that one part of the inhabitants lives to little other purpose than to wonder at the rest. Some have hopes and fears, wishes and aversions, which never enter into the thoughts of others, and inquiry is laboriously exerted to gain that which those who possess it are ready to throw away.—Johnson.

The conditions of city life may be made healthy, so far as the physical constitution is concerned; but there is connected with the business of the city so much competition, so much rivalry, so much necessity for industry, that I think it is a perpetual, chronic,
wholesale violation of natural law.
There are ten men that can succeed in the country, where there is one that can succeed in the city.—Beecher.

I bless God for cities. Cities have been as lamps of life along the pathway of humanity and religion. Within them science has given birth to her noblest discoveries. Behind their walls freedom has fought her noblest battles. They have stood on the surface of the earth like great break-waters, rolling back or turning aside the swelling tide of oppression. Cities, indeed, have been the cradles of human liberty. They have been the active centres of almost all church and state reformation.—Rev. Dr. Guthrie.

The most delicate beauty in the mind of women is, and ever must be, an independence of artificial stimulants for content. It is not so with men. The links that bind men to capitals belong to the golden chain of civilization,—the chain which fastens all our destinies to the throne of Jove. And hence the larger proportion of men in whom genius is pre-eminent have preferred to live in cities, though some of them have bequeathed to us the loveliest pictures of the rural scenes in which they declined to dwell.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Our large trading cities bear to me very nearly the aspect of monastic establishments in which the roar of the mill-wheel and the crane takes the place of other devotional music, and in which the worship of Mammon and Moloch is conducted with a tender reverence and an exact propriety; the merchant rising to his Mammon matins with the self-denial of an anchorite, and expiating the frivolities into which he may be beguiled in the course of the day by late attendance at Mammon vespers.—Ruskin.

Civility

Civility is but a desire to receive civility, and to be esteemed polite.—La Rochefoucauld.

Whilst thou livest keep a good tongue in thy head.—Shakespeare.

A good word is an easy obligation, but not to speak ill, requires only our silence, which costs us nothing.—Tillotson.

The insolent civility of a proud man is, if possible, more shocking than his rudeness could be; because he shows you, by his manner, that he thinks it mere condescension in him; and that his goodness alone bestows upon you what you have no pretense to claim.—Chesterfield.

Civilization

Extremes produce reaction. Beware that our boasted civilization does not lapse into barbarism.—Rivarol.

The ultimate tendency of civilization is towards barbarism.—Hare.

Barbarism recommences by the excess of civilization.—Lamartine.

A sufficient measure of civilization is the influence of good women.—Emerson.

Increased means and increased leisure are the two civilizers of men.—Beaconsfield.

Nations, like individuals, live and die; but civilization cannot die.—Mazzini.

Mankind's struggle upwards, in which millions are trampled to death, that thousands may mount on their bodies.—Mrs. Balfour.

The truest test of civilization is not the census, nor the size of cities, nor the crops; no, but the kind of man the country turns out.—Emerson.

Ever since there has been so great a demand for type, there has been much less lead to spare for cannonballs.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The most civilized people are as near to barbarism as the most polished steel is to rust. Nations, like metals, have only a superficial brilliancy.—Rivarol.

Civilization, or that which is so called, has operated two ways to make one part of society more affluent and the other part more wretched than would have been the lot of either in a natural state.—Thomas Paine.

No attribute so well befits the exalted seat supreme, and power's disposing hand, as clemency. Each crime must from its quality be judged; and pity there should interpose, where malice is not the aggressor.—Sir William Jones.

There is often no material difference between the enjoyment of the highest ranks and those of the rudest stages of society. If the life of many a young English nobleman, and an Iroquois in the forest, or an Arab in the desert are compared, it will be found that their real sources of happiness are nearly the same.—Sir A. Alison.

Such is the diligence with which, in countries completely civilized, one part of mankind labor for another, that wants are supplied faster than they can be formed, and the idle and luxurious find life stagnate for want of some desire to keep it in motion. This species of distress furnishes a new set of occupations; and multitudes are busied from day to day in finding the rich and the fortunate something to do.—Johnson.

A semi-civilized state of society, equally removed from the extremes of barbarity and of refinement, seems to be that particular meridian under which all the reciprocities and gratuities of hospitality do most readily flourish and abound. For it so happens that the ease, the luxury, and the abundance of the highest state of civilization, are as productive of selfishness, as the difficulties, the privations, and the sterilities of the lowest.—Colton.

We are but too apt to consider things in the state in which we find them, without sufficiently adverting to the causes by which they have been produced, and possibly may be upheld. Nothing is more certain than that our manners, our civilization, and all the good things which are connected with civilization, have, in this European world of ours, depended for ages upon two principles, and were indeed the result of both combined. I mean the spirit of a gentleman and the spirit of religion. The nobility and the clergy, the one by profession, the other by patronage, kept learning in existence even in the midst of arms and confusion. Learning paid back what it received to nobility and priesthood, and paid it back with usury by enlarging their ideas and furnishing their minds.—Burke.

Cleanliness

If dirt was trumps, what hands you would hold!—Charles Lamb.

Let thy mind's sweetness have its operation upon thy body, clothes, and habitation.—George Herbert.

Cleanliness may be defined to be the emblem of purity of mind.—Addison.

Certainly this is a duty, not a sin. 'Cleanliness is indeed next to godliness.'—John Wesley.

Even from the body's purity, the mind
Receives a secret, sympathetic aid.
—Thomson.

For cleanness of body was ever esteemed to proceed from a due reverence to God, to society, and to ourselves.—Bacon.

So great is the effect of cleanliness upon man, that it extends even to his moral character. Virtue never dwelt long with filth; nor do I believe there ever was a person scrupulously attentive to cleanliness, who was a consummate villain.—Rumford.

Beauty commonly produces love, but cleanliness preserves it. Age itself is not unamiable while it is preserved clean and unsullied; like a piece of metal constantly kept smooth and bright, we look on it with more pleasure than on a new vessel cankered with rust.—Addison.

Clematis

Where the woodland streamlets flow,
Gushing down a rocky bed,
Where the tasselled alders grow,
Lightly meeting overhead,
When the fullest August days
Give the richness that they know,
Then the wild clematis comes,
With her wealth of tangled blooms,
Reaching up and drooping low.
But when Autumn days are here,
And the woods of Autumn burn,
Then her leaves are black and sere,
Quick with early frosts to turn!
As the golden Summer dies,
So her silky green has fled,
And the smoky clusters rise
As from fires of sacrifice,—
Sacred incense to the dead!
—Dora Read Goodale.

Clemency

In general, indulgence for those we know is rarer than pity for those we know not.—Rivarol.

To be good to the vile is to throw water into the sea.—Cervantes.

Clemency alone makes us equal to the gods.—Claudianus.

Tender-handed stroke a nettle, and it stings you for your pains.—Aaron Hill.

Forgiveness, that noblest of all self-denial, is a virtue which he alone who can practise in himself can willingly believe in another.—Colton.

Clemency, which we make a virtue of, proceeds sometimes from vanity, sometimes from indolence, often from fear, and almost always from a mixture of all three.—Rochefoucauld.

No attribute
So well befits th' exalted seat supreme,
And power's disposing hand as clemency.
Each crime must from its quality be judged;
And pity there should interpose, where malice
Is not th' aggressor.—Sir William Jones.

The little I have seen of the world teaches me to look upon the errors of others in sorrow, not in anger. When I take the history of one poor heart that has sinned and suffered, and represent to myself the struggles and temptations it has passed through, the brief pulsations of joy, the feverish inquietude of hope and fear, the pressure of want, the desertion of friends, I would fain leave the erring soul of my fellow-man with Him from whose hand it came.—Longfellow.

Clergyman

The true clergyman is a reflex of his Master.—André Dacier.

The defects of a preacher are soon spied.—Luther.

He—the country parson—is not witty or learned or eloquent, but holy.—George Herbert.

The clergyman who lives in the city may have piety, but he must have taste.—Emerson.

The pulpit is a clergyman's parade; the parish is his field of active service.—Southey.

If you would lift me you must be on a higher ground.—Emerson.

There is nothing noble in a clergyman but burning zeal for the salvation of souls.—William Law.

Recollect for your encouragement the reward that awaits the faithful minister.—Robert Hall.

Embryos and idiots, eremites and friars,
White, black, and grey, with all their trumpery.
—Milton.

Around his form his loose long robe was thrown,
And wrapt a breast bestowed on heaven
alone.
—Byron.

There goes the parson, oh illustrious spark!
And there, scarce less illustrious, goes the clerk.
—Cowper.

I never saw, heard, nor read, that the clergy were beloved in any nation where Christianity was the religion of the country.—Swift.

As there are certain mountebanks and quacks in physic, so there are much the same also in divinity.—South.

Nothing is more detestable than a professed declaimer who retails his discourses as a quack does his medicines.—Massillon.

I do not envy a clergyman's life as an easy life, nor do I envy the clergyman who makes it an easy life.—Dr. Johnson.

The Christian messenger cannot think too highly of his Prince, or too humbly of himself.—Colton.

From such apostles, oh ye mitred heads,
Preserve the church; and lay not careless hands
On skulls that cannot teach, and will not learn.
—Cowper.

There are passages of the Bible that are soiled forever by the touches of the hands of ministers who delight in the cheap jokes they have left behind them.—Phillips Brooks.

The ascendancy of the sacerdotal order was long the ascendancy which naturally and properly belonged to intellectual superiority.—Macaulay.

Suppose, however, that something like moderation were visible in this political sermon, yet politics and the pulpit are terms that have little agreement.—Burke.

Ev'n children followed with endearing wile
And pluck'd his gown to share the good
man's smile. —Goldsmith.

Love and meekness, lord,
Become a churchman better than ambition:
Win straying souls with modesty again,
Cast none away. —Shakespeare.

Make not the church to us an instrument
Of bondage, to yourselves of liberty:
Obedience there confirms your government,
Our sovereigns, God's subalterns, you be.
—Lord Brouncker.

The proud he tamed, the penitent he cheered,
Nor to rebuke the rich offender feared;
His preaching much, but more his practice wrought,
A living sermon of the truths he taught.
—Dryden.

At church with meek and unaffected grace,
His looks adorn'd the venerable place;
Truth from his lips prevail'd with double
sway,
And fools, who came to scoff, remain'd to pray. —Goldsmith.

He that negotiates between God and man,
As God's ambassador, the grand concerns
Of judgment and of mercy, should beware
Of lightness in his speech. —Cowper.

I venerate the man, whose heart is warm,
Whose hands are pure, whose doctrine and whose life
Coincident, exhibit lucid proof
That he is honest in the sacred cause.
—Cowper.

He was a shepherd and no mercenary,
And though he holy was and virtuous,
He was to sinful men full piteous;
His words were strong, but not with anger fraught;
A love benignant he discreetly taught,
To draw mankind to heaven by gentleness
And good example was his business.
—Chaucer.

Others of graver mien, behold, adorn'd
With holy ensigns, how sublime they
move,
And bending oft their sanctimonious eyes,
Take homage of the simple-minded throng;
Ambassadors of heaven! —Akenside.

The life of a conscientious clergyman is not easy. I have always considered a clergyman as the father of a larger family than he is able to maintain. I would rather have chancery suits upon my hands than the cure of souls.—Dr. Johnson.

Do not, as some ungracious pastors do,
Show me the steep and thorny way to
heaven;
Whilst, like a puff'd and reckless libertine,
Himself the primrose path of dalliance
treads,
And reck's not his own road.
—Shakespeare.

In man or woman, but far most in man,
And most of all in man that ministers,
And serves the altar, in my soul I loathe
All affectation. 'Tis my perfect scorn:
Object of my implacable disgust.
—Cowper.

It never was a prosperous world
Since priests have interfer'd with temporal matters;
The custom of their ancestors they slight,
And change their shirts of hair for robes of
gold;
Thus luxury and interest rule the church,
Whilst piety and conscience dwell in caves.
—Bancroft.

Their sheep have crusts, and they the bread;
The chips and they the cheer:
They have the fleece, and eke the flesh,
(O seely sheep the while!)
The corn is theirs—let others thresh,
Their hands they may not file.
—Spenser.

His talk was now of tythes and dues;
He smok'd his pipe, and read the news;
Knew how to preach old sermons next,
Vamp'd in the preface and the text;
At christenings well could act his part,
And had the service all by heart;
Wish'd women might have children fast,
And thought whose sow had farrow'd last:
Against dissenters would repine,
And stood up firm for right divine;
Found his head fill'd with many a system,
But classic authors—he ne'er miss'd 'em.
—Swift.

Your Lordship and your Grace, what school can teach
A rhetoric equal to those parts of speech?
What need of Homer's verse, or Tully's prose,
Sweet interjections! if he learn but those?
Let rev'rend churls his ignorance rebuke.
Who starve upon a dog's ear'd Pentateuch.
The Parson knows enough who knows a Duke.
—Cowper.

Behold the picture! Is it like? Like whom?
 The things that mount the rostrum with a skip
 And then skip down again. Pronounce a text,
 Cry hem; and reading what they never wrote,
 Just fifteen minutes huddle up their work,
 And with a well-bred whisper close the scene.
 —Cowper.

If we must pray,
 Rear in the streets bright altars to the gods,
 Let virgin's hands adorn the sacrifice;
 And not a grey-beard forging priest come here,
 To pry into the bowels of their victim,
 And with their dotage mad the gaping world.
 —Lee.

Near yonder copse, where once the garden smil'd,
 And still where many a garden flower grows wild,
 There, where a few torn shrubs the place disclose,
 The village preacher's modest mansion rose.
 A man he was to all the country dear,
 And passing rich with forty pounds a year;
 Remote from towns he ran his godly race,
 Nor e'er had chang'd nor wish'd to change his place;
 Unskilful he to fawn, or seek for power,
 By doctrines fashion'd to the varying hour;
 Far other aims his heart had learn'd to prize.
 More bent to raise the wretched than to rise.
 —Goldsmith.

Cleverness

We can be more clever than one,
 but not more clever than all.—La Rochefoucauld.

To know how to hide one's ability is great skill.—La Rochefoucauld.

Climate

The institutions of a country depend in great measure on the nature of its soil and situation. Many of the wants of man are awakened or supplied by these circumstances. To these wants, manners, laws, and religion must shape and accommodate themselves. The division of land, and the rights attached to it, alter with the soil; the laws relating to its produce, with its fertility. The manners of its inhabitants are in various ways modified by its position. The religion of a miner is not the same as the faith of a shepherd, nor is the character of the ploughman so war-like as that of the hunter. The observant legislator follows the direction of all these various circumstances. The knowledge of the natural advantages or defects of a country thus form an essential part of political science and history.—Justus Moser.

Clouds

Those playful fancies of the mighty sky.—Smith.

The clouds,—the only birds that never sleep.—Victor Hugo.

Those clouds are angels' robes.—That fiery west
 Is paved with smiling faces.
 —Charles Kingsley.

They are fair resting-places
 For the dear weary dead on their way up to heaven.
 —Joaquin Miller.

Clouds on clouds, in volumes driven,
 Curtain round the vault of heaven.
 —Thomas Love Peacock.

When clouds appear like rocks and towers,
 The earth's refreshed by frequent showers.
 —Old Weather Rhyme.

If woolly fleeces spread the heavenly way,
 No rain, be sure, disturbs the summer's day.
 —Old Weather Rhyme.

The hooded clouds, like friars,
 Tell their beads in drops of rain.
 —Longfellow.

Yonder cloud
 That rises upward always higher,
 A looming bastion fringed with fire.
 —Tennyson.

That look'd
 As though an angel, in his upward flight,
 Had left his mantle floating in mid-air.
 —Joanna Baillie.

The clouds consign their treasure to the fields.
 And, softly shaking on the dimpled pool
 Prelusive drops, let all their moisture flow,
 In large effusion o'er a freshen'd world.
 —Thomson.

When scattered clouds are resting on the bosoms of hills, it seems as if one might climb into the heavenly region, earth being so intermixed with sky, and gradually transformed into it.

—Hawthorne.

We often praise the evening clouds,
And tints so gay and bold,
But seldom think upon our God,
Who tinged these clouds with gold.
—Scott.

Bathed in the tenderest purple of distance,
Tinted and shadowed by pencils of air,
Thy battlements hang o'er the slopes and
the forests,
Seats of the Gods in the limitless ether,
Looming sublimely aloft and afar.
—Bayard Taylor.

Now a cloud,
Massive and black, strides up; the angry gleam
Of the red lightning cleaves the frowning folds.
—Street.

Wafted up,
The stealing cloud with soft grey blinds
the sky
And in its vapory mantle onward steps
The summer shower.
—Street.

Ye clouds, that are the ornament of heaven,
Who give to it its gayest shadowings
And its most awful glories; ye who roll
In the dark tempest, or at dewy evening
Bow low in tenderest beauty;—ye are to us
A volume full of wisdom.
—Percival.

A cloud lay cradled near the setting sun;
A gleam of crimson tinged its braided snow;
* * * * *

Tranquil its spirit seemed and floated slow;
Even in its very motion there was rest;
While every breath of eve that chance to
blow

Wafted the traveller to the beauteous west.
—John Wilson.

Cloud-walls of the morning's gray
Faced with amber column,
Crowned with crimson cupola
From a sunset solemn.
May-mists, for the casements, fetch,
Pale and glimmering,
With a sunbeam hid in each,
And a smell of spring.
—Mrs. Browning.

O, it is pleasant, with a heart at ease,
Just after sunset, or by moonlight skies,
To make the shifting clouds be what you please,
Or let the easily persuaded eyes Own each quaint likeness issuing from the mould
Of a friend's fancy.
—Coleridge.

Sometimes we see a cloud that's dragonish;
A vapour, sometimes, like a bear or lion,
A tower'd citadel, a pendant rock,
A forked mountain, or blue promontory,
With trees upon't, that nod unto the world,
And mock our eyes with air.
—Shakespeare.

I bring fresh showers for the thirsting
flowers,
From the seas and the streams;
I bear light shade for the leaves when laid
In their noonday dreams.
From my wings are shaken the dews that waken
The sweet buds every one,
When rocked to rest on their mother's
breast,
As she dances about the sun.
I wield the flail of the lashing hail,
And whiten the green plains under,
And then again I dissolve it in rain,
And laugh as I pass in thunder.
—Shelley.

I loved the Clouds,
Fire-fringed at dawn, or red with twilight
bloom,
Or stretched above, like isles of leaden gloom,
In heaven's vast deep, or drawn in belts of
gray,
Or dark blue walls along the base of day;
Or snow-drifts luminous at highest noon,
Ragged and black in tempests, veined with lightning,
And when the moon was brightening.
Impeared and purpled by the changeful moon.
—R. H. Stoddard.

Color

Color is, in brief terms, the type of love. Hence it is especially connected with the blossoming of the earth; and again, with its fruits; also, with the spring and fall of the leaf, and with the morning and evening of the day, in order to show the waiting of love about the birth and death of man.—
Ruskin.

The little may contrast with the great, in painting, but cannot be said to be contrary to it. Oppositions of colors contrast; but there are also colors contrary to each other, that is, which produce an ill effect because they shock the eye when brought very near it.—Voltaire.

The fact is, that of all God's gifts to the sight of man, color is the holiest, the most divine, the most solemn. We speak rashly of gay color and sad color, for color cannot at once be good and gay. All good color is in some degree pensive, the loveliest is melancholy, and the purest and most thoughtful minds are those which love color the most.—Thomas Starr King.

Comet

Comets importing change of times and states,
Brandish your crystal tresses in the sky
And with them scourge the had revolting stars.
—Shakespeare.

Lo! from the dread immensity of space
Returning, with accelerated course,
The rushing comet to the sun descends;
And as he sinks below the shading earth,
With awful train projected o'er the heavens,
The guilty nations tremble.—Thomson.

Stranger of Heaven, I bid thee hail!
Shred from the pall of glory riven
That flashest in celestial gale—
Broad pennon of the King of Heaven
Whate'er portends thy front of fire
And streaming locks so lovely pale;
Or peace to man, or judgments dire
Stranger of Heaven, I bid thee hail.
—Hogg.

Hast thou ne'er seen the comet's flaming light?
Th' illustrious stranger passing, terror sheds
On gazing nations, from his fiery train
Of length enormous, takes his ample round
Through depths of ether; coasts unnumber'd worlds,
Of more than solar glory; doubles wide
Heaven's mighty cape; and then re-visits earth,
From the long travel of a thousand years.
—Young.

Lone traveller through the fields of air,
What may thy presence here portend?
Art come to greet the planets fair,
As friend greets friend?
Whate'er thy purpose, thou dost teach
Some lessons to the humble soul;
Though far and dim thy pathway reach,
Yet still thy goal
Tends to the fountain of that light
From whence thy golden beams are won;
So should we turn, from earth's dark night,
To God our sun.
—Mrs. Hale.

Comfort

Of all created comforts, God is the lender; you are the borrower, not the owner.—Rutherford.

Comfort and indolence are cronies.—Hood.

For in a dearth of comforts, we art taught
To be contented with the least.
—Sir W. Davenant.

Comfort—'tis for ease and quiet;
It sleeps upon the down of sweet content,
In the sound bed of industry and health.
—Havard.

Comfort, like the golden sun,
Dispels the sullen shade with her sweet influence,
And cheers the melancholy house of care.
—Rowe.

The comforts we enjoy here below are not like the anchor in the bottom of the sea that holds fast in a storm, but like the flag upon the top of the mast that turns with every wind.—
Rev. Christopher Love.

The chief secret of comfort lies in not suffering trifles to vex us, and in prudently cultivating an undergrowth of small pleasures, since very few great ones are let on long leases.—
Aughey.

It is a little thing to speak a phrase of common comfort, which by daily use has almost lost its sense; yet on the ear of him who thought to die un-mourned it will fall like choicest music.
—Talfourd.

Giving comfort under affliction requires that penetration into the human mind, joined to that experience which knows how to soothe, how to reason, and how to ridicule; taking the utmost care never to apply those arts improperly.—Fielding.

Sweet as refreshing dews or summer showers,
To the long parching thirst of drooping
flowers;
Grateful as fanning gales to fainting swains
And soft as trickling balm to bleeding
pains.
Such are thy words.
—Gay.

I want a sofa, as I want a friend,
upon which I can repose familiarly.
If you can't have intimate terms and freedom with one and the other, they are of no good.—Thackeray.

In the exhaustless catalogue of Heaven's mercies to mankind, the power we have of finding some germs of comfort in the hardest trials must ever occupy the foremost place; not only because it supports and upholds us when we most require to be sustained, but because in this source of consolation there is something, we have reason to believe, of the Divine Spirit; something of that goodness which detects, amidst our own evil doings, a redeeming quality; something, which even in our fallen nature, we possess in common with the angels; which had its being in the old time when they trod the earth, and linger on it yet in pity.—Dickens.

Command — Commander

A brave captain is as a root, out of which (as branches) the courage of his soldiers doth spring.—Sir Philip Sidney.

It is better to have a lion at the head of an army of sheep, than a sheep at the head of an army of lions.—De Foe.

He stopp'd the fliers:
And, by his rare example, made the coward
Turn terror into sport; as waves before
A vessel under sail, so men obey'd,
And fell below his stem. —Shakespeare.

Truly, a command of gall cannot be obeyed like one of sugar. A man must require just and reasonable things, if he would see the scales of obedience properly trimmed. From orders which are improper, springs resistance, which is not easily overcome.—Basil.

Commendation

Commend a fool for his wit, or a knave for his honesty, and they will receive you into their bosom.—Fielding.

Commerce

Commerce has made all winds her mistress.—Sterling.

God is making commerce His missionary.—Joseph Cook.

The first inventions of commerce are, like those of all other arts, cunning and short-sighted.—Curran.

More pernicious nonsense was never devised by man than treaties of commerce.—Beaconsfield.

Commerce defies every wind, out-rides every tempest, and invades every zone.—Bancroft.

Commerce is the equalizer of the wealth of nations.—Gladstone.

It may almost be held that the hope of commercial gain has done nearly as much for the cause of truth as even the love of truth.—Bovee.

The care of our national commerce redounds more to the riches and prosperity of the public than any other act of government.—Addison.

Commerce links all mankind in one common brotherhood of mutual dependence and interests.—James A. Garfield.

As soon as the commercial spirit acquires vigor, and begins to gain an ascendant in any society, we discern a new genius in its policy, its alliances, its wars, and its negotiations.—Dr. W. Robertson.

Commerce can never be at a stop while one man wants what another can supply; and credit will never be denied, while it is likely to be repaid with profit.—Dr. Johnson.

Whatever has a tendency to promote the civil intercourse of nations by an exchange of benefits is a subject as worthy of philosophy as of politics.—Thomas Paine.

Chiefly the sea-shore has been the point of departure to knowledge, as to commerce. The most advanced nations are always those who navigate the most.—Emerson.

A well regulated commerce is not, like law, physic, or divinity, to be overstocked with hands; but, on the contrary, flourishes by multitudes, and gives employment to all its professors.—Addison.

Next to the pastoral came the agricultural life. When you add to that the manufacturing phase of development, society begins to fill out, and needs but wings to fly, and commerce is its wings.—Beecher.

Commerce is no other than the traffic of two individuals, multiplied on a scale of number; and, by the same rule that Nature intended the intercourse of two, she intended that of all!—Thomas Paine.

There are no more useful members in a commonwealth than merchants. They knit mankind together in a mutual intercourse of good offices, distribute the gifts of Nature, find work for the poor, and wealth to the rich, and magnificence to the great.—Addison.

A statesman may do much for commerce, most by leaving it alone. A river never flows so smoothly, as when it follows its own course, without either aid or check. Let it make its own bed, it will do so better than you can.

Commerce, however we may please ourselves with the contrary opinion, is one of the daughters of fortune, inconstant and deceitful as her mother. She chooses her residence where she is least expected, and shifts her abode when her continuance is, in appearance, most firmly settled.—Johnson.

As Egypt does not on the clouds rely
But to the Nile owes more than to the sky;
So what our earth and what our heaven denies

Our ever constant friend, the sea supplies.
The taste of hot Arabia's spice we know,
Free from the scorching sun that makes it
grow;

Without the worm in Persia's silks we shine;

And without planting, drink of every vine,
To dig for wealth we weary not our limbs.
Gold, though the heaviest metal hither
swims,

Ours is the harvest where the Indians mow.
We plough the deep, and reap what others
sow. —Waller.

Commerce tends to wear off those prejudices which maintain distinction and animosity between nations. It softens and polishes the manners of men. It unites them by one of the strongest of all ties—the desire of supplying their mutual wants. It disposes them to peace, by establishing in every State an order of citizens bound by their interest to be the guardians of public tranquillity. As soon as the commercial spirit acquires vigor, and begins to gain an ascendant in any society, we begin to discern a new genius in its policy, its alliances, its wars, and its negotiations.—Robertson.

Nature seems to have taken a particular care to disseminate her blessings among the different regions of the world, with an eye to their mutual intercourse and traffic among mankind, that the nations of the several parts of the globe might have a kind of dependence upon one another and be united together by their common interest.—Addison.

Common Sense

Common sense is very uncommon.—Horace Greeley.

Common sense is in spite of, not because of age.—Lord Thurlow.

Common sense is nature's gift, but reason is an art.—Beattie.

Common sense, alas in spite of our educational institutions, is a rare commodity.—Bovee.

If common sense has not the brilliancy of the sun, it has the fixity of the stars.—Fernan Caballero.

Good sense, disciplined by experience and inspired by goodness, issues in practical wisdom.—Samuel Smiles.

Common sense is in spite of, not the result of, education—Victor Hugo.

Common sense is instinct, and enough of it is genius.—H. W. Shaw.

Common sense is the favorite daughter of Reason.—H. W. Shaw.

Common sense is only a modification of talent. Genius is an exaltation of it; the difference is, therefore, in the degree, not nature.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The aim of all intellectual training for the mass of the people should be to cultivate common sense.—J. Stuart Mill.

Common sense is the average sensibility and intelligence of men undisturbed by individual peculiarities.—W. R. Alger.

Common sense has given to words their ordinary signification, and common sense is the genius of mankind.—Guizot.

Common sense in one view is the most uncommon sense. While it is extremely rare in possession, the recognition of it is universal. All men feel it, though few men have it.—H. N. Hudson.

Fine sense and exalted sense are not half as useful as common sense. There are forty men of wit for one man of sense. And he that will carry nothing about him but gold will be every day at a loss for readier change.—Pope.

Sydney Smith playfully says that common sense was invented by Socrates, that philosopher having been one of its most conspicuous exemplars in conducting the contest of practical sagacity against stupid prejudice and illusory beliefs.—Whipple.

Common sense is science exactly so far as it fulfils the ideal of common sense; that is, sees facts as they are, or at any rate without the distortion of prejudice, and reasons from them in accordance with the dictates of sound judgment.—Huxley.

To act with common sense, according to the moment, is the best wisdom I know; and the best philosophy, to do one's duties, take the world as it comes, submit respectfully to one's lot, bless the goodness that has given us so much happiness with it, whatever it is, and despise affectation.—Horace Walpole.

In most old communities there is a common sense even in sensuality. Vice itself gets gradually digested into a system, is amenable to certain laws of conventional propriety and honor, has for its object simply the gratification of its appetites, and frowns with quite a conservative air on all new inventions, all untried experiments in iniquity.—Whipple.

Common sense punishes all departures from her, by forcing those who rebel into a desperate war with all facts and experience, and into a still more terrible civil war with each other and with themselves.—Colton.

Commonwealth

We will renew the times of peace and justice,
Condensing in a fair free commonwealth;
Not rash equality, but equal rights,
Proportion'd like the columns of the temple
Giving and taking strength reciprocal,
And making firm the whole with grace and beauty;
So that no part could be removed without Infringement of the general symmetry.
—Byron.

Communion

All Christian power springs from communion with God, and from the indwelling of divine grace.—Aughey.

If we show the Lord's death at Communion, we must show the Lord's life in the world. If it is a Eucharist on Sunday, it must prove on Monday that it was also a Sacrament.—Maltbie Babcock.

This do in remembrance of me.—I Cor. xi. 24.

We should come to the Lord's table with the confident expectation of meeting Christ there, of receiving there a blessing.—Rev. Chas. A. Savage.

The Lord's Supper is the central act of Christian worship. It is a prophecy, pledge, and prelude to that "supper table of the Lamb," when we shall sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of our Father.—Rev. Gerard B. F. Hallock.

I agree with you that the communion of the invisible saints must be more of a dream than a reality. But we have a right to dream dreams, if they are not contradicted by the evident laws of God's word, or God's world.—Maltbie Babcock.

We should look to the Sacrament for a special revelation of Christ and His truth. The purpose of the communion service is to afford us an opportunity to take into our spiritual natures something from the outside.—Rev. Chas. A. Savage.

A consciousness of guilt does not disqualify one. We come to the Lord's table because we know that we are sinners trusting only in the death and work of Jesus Christ. No matter how great one's consciousness of guilt, if he is penitent and is seeking strength to live a Christian life, the Lord's table is the very place for him.—Smith Baker, D. D.

The Lord's Supper comes to us like a ring plucked off from Christ's finger, or a bracelet from His arm; or rather like His picture from His breast, delivered to us with such words as these, "As oft as you look on this, remember me."—John Flavel.

Especially in acts of sacramental communion with his Lord does the Christian gather up and consecrate the powers of his life-long communion with heaven. Then it is that he has most vivid impressions of the nearness of God to his soul, a most comfortable assurance of strength for his need.—Mackarness.

The Lord's Supper has been greatly instrumental in keeping His cause alive. It is the voice of all believers preaching the Lord's death till He come. He who believes that the Lord did come and die for us, and will come again and take us to Himself, will not hesitate to regard this last request of our Lord and Saviour.—Chas. F. Deems, D. D.

We want to look at the Lord's Supper as an ordinance of thanksgiving, that we may have greater desire and pleasure and profit in its celebration. God unfolds to us the different attributes of this beautiful ordinance, that we may be attracted to it. He means every attribute to be a persuasive argument enforcing obedience to the command: "This do in remembrance of me."—David Gregg, D. D.

"We do not presume to come to this Thy table, O merciful Lord, trusting in our own righteousness, but in Thy manifold and great mercies. We are not worthy so much as to gather up the crumbs under Thy table. But thou art the same Lord, Whose property is always to have mercy," etc.—Book of Common Prayer.

It is a love feast, emphasizing Christ's love for us, and ours to Him and to one another. Sin parts men, but in Christ we have brotherhood. We are to love the world, but in a different way our Christian brothers. "This is My commandment, That ye love one another."

It is a pledge of glory, a foretaste of the marriage supper of the Lamb. The glory is in heaven, and we must wait for it, but we are heirs of it.—Howard Crosby, D. D.

Let us remember that the Lord's Supper is an ordinance given to the friends of Jesus Christ who have entered upon the saved life, and intended to help them realize their privileges. The Lord's Supper takes the most terrible facts of history and experience, and groups them with the grandest of realities in such a way that our souls break forth into hallelujahs.—David Gregg, D. D.

Bread of the world, in mercy broken.

Wine of the soul, in mercy shed,
By whom the words of life were spoken,
And in whose death our sins are dead:

Look on the heart by sorrow broken,
Look on the tears by sinners shed;
And be Thy feast to us the token
That by Thy grace our souls are fed.
—Reginald Heber.

The proper attitude to assume with relation to the Lord's Supper is a golden mean between idolatry and indifference.—Rev. Chas. A. Savage.

Historians are unanimous in their testimony that from the beginning this sacrament was viewed as a great mystery, to which was attached profound doctrinal significance and the highest spiritual efficacy. With the visible elements, it was believed, were mystically the body and blood of the Lord. Those who in faith partook of this Supper enjoyed essential communion with Christ.—Prof. E. J. Wolf, D. D.

Indifference to the Sacrament casts contempt on an ordinance instituted by our Saviour Himself, and one that is full of holy meaning. An idolatrous reverence for it not only violates the Second Commandment, but dishonors Christ.—Rev. Chas. A. Savage.

The Lord's Supper may be made more profitable for us if we emphasize it as a bond of brotherhood. A communion with Christ, it is also a communion with each other, and not only among the few gathered within the walls of a single sanctuary; it is the fellowship of the ages. In the name of our common Christ, "encompassed by so great a cloud of witnesses," we sit with them in heavenly places whenever we come to the Communion Table of our Lord.—Rev. Chas. A. Savage.

Bread of Heaven, on Thee I feed,
For Thy flesh is meat indeed;
Ever may my soul be fed
With this true and living bread;
Day by day with strength supplied,
Through the life of Him who died.

Vine of Heaven, Thy blood supplies
This blest cup of sacrifice;
'Tis Thy wounds my healing give;
To Thy cross I look and live.
Thou my Life, O let me be Rooted, grafted, built on Thee.

—Josiah Conder.

Coming by faith, and thus truly partaking of the bread and the wine, we receive anew the assurance that we are pardoned sinners. We receive increased grace to confirm our Christian habits and to quicken them in their exercise. We receive the earnest of eternal bliss and joy. Most precious foretastes of the heavenly happiness are here bestowed upon a lively faith. A bunch of grapes from the heavenly Eshcol is pressed by the Lord into the sacramental cup. We have food to eat that the world knows not of.—Rev. M. Patterson, D. D.

It is certainly not desirable that improper persons should take the sacrament of the Lord's Supper; but there are many who injure their spiritual characters and diminish their spiritual enjoyment by failing to obey the request of our dying Lord. About to die, He tenderly asked every man who believed that He was dying for the world to do this in remembrance of Him. It is a most simple request; the observance of it in a similar spirit would increase the joy and power of all who wish well the cause of Christianity.

This will appear as we notice what the Lord's Supper signifies. (a) It is a memorial of Christ's life and death. (b) It is a symbol of Christ's work. (c) It represents the union of all God's people; at the table of the Lord all human souls are on a level. (d) Again, it represents the soul's constant dependence upon Christ for strength. Christ is the daily bread of life to the soul. (e) It represents the mystic union of Christ and His people; He lives in them and they in Him. (f) The Lord's Supper is a special communion with Christ, when in a particular manner He reveals Himself to the believing heart.—Smith Baker, D. D.

Thus may we abide in union,
With each other and the Lord,
And possess in sweet communion
Joys which earth cannot afford.

—Rev. John Newton.

Let us come, then, hungering and thirsting for the body and blood of the Lord. He will be present to satisfy the spiritual desires of which He is Himself the author. It would be no feast without Himself. Mere common bread, mere common wine, mere meeting with one another, would this sacrament be unless Jesus Himself were here. "He must break the bread, if it is to nourish my soul. He must pour out the wine, if it is to refresh and gladden me." And we doubt not that He will do this. We come in obedience to His command, and we rely upon His promise. We will seek to commune under their influence, and then we will go away from the table joyfully and exultingly declaring: "As the apple-tree among the trees of the wood, so is my Beloved among the sons. I sat down under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit was sweet to my taste."

God, in giving us what we pray for because we pray, and in refusing to give what we fail to ask for, deals with us as a loving father. He cultivates that living sympathy and communion between our hearts and His own which is necessary to our happiness and growth in grace.—C. E. Babb, D. D.

He walks in the presence of God that converses with Him in frequent prayer and communion; that runs to Him with all his necessities, that asks counsel of Him in all his doubtings, that opens all his wants to Him; weeps before Him for all his sins; and that asks remedy and support for all his weakness, that fears Him as a Judge, reverences Him as a Lord, and obeys Him as a Father.

If a friend is the one who summons us to our best, then is not Jesus Christ our best friend, and should we not think of the Communion as one of His chief appeals to us to be our best? The Lord's Supper looks not back to our past with a critical eye, but to our future, with a hopeful one. The Master appeals from what we have been to what we may be. He bids us come, not because He sees we are better than we have been, but because He wants us to be. To stay away because our hearts are cold is to refuse to go to the fire till we are warm.—Maltbie Babcock.

Ye do well to remember that habitual affectionate communion with God, asking Him for all good which is needed, praising Him for all that is received, and trusting Him for future supplies, prevents anxious cares, inspires peace, calmness and composure, and furnishes a delight surpassing all finite comprehension.—Aughey.

Communism

Communism means barbarism.—Lowell.

The law cannot equalize men in spite of Nature—Vauvenargues.

Communism is plunder legalized.—Mary Trimmer.

There may be community of material possessions, but there can never be community of love or esteem.—Dr. Johnson.

Communism possesses a language which every people can understand. Its elements are hunger, envy, death.—Heinrich Heine.

You cannot place mediocrity on a par with culture and intelligence; consequently communism is impossible.—Perley Poore.

One who has yearnings for equal division of unequal earnings. Idler or bungler, he is willing to fork out his penny and pocket your shilling.—Ebenezer Elliott.

Cæsar was Rome's escape from communism. I expect no Cæsar; I find on our map no Rubicon. But then I expect to see communistic madness rebuked and ended.—Prof. Hitchcock.

Levellers wish to level down as far as themselves, but they cannot bear levelling up to themselves. They would all have some people under them; why not then have some people above them?—Dr. Johnson.

Company — Companions

Wicked companions invite us to hell.—Fielding.

A pleasant companion is as good as a coach.—Swift.

He that toucheth pitch shall be defiled therewith.—Bible.

Company, villanous company, hath been the spoil of me.—Shakespeare.

There are like to be short graces where the devil plays host.—Lamb.

The freer you feel yourself in the presence of another, the more free is he.—Lavater.

No man can be provident of his time who is not prudent in the choice of his company.—Jeremy Taylor.

No possession is gratifying without a companion.—Seneca.

A companion is but another self; wherefore it is an argument that a man is wicked if he keep company with the wicked.—St. Clement.

No man in effect doth accompany with others but he learneth, ere he is aware, some gesture, voice, or fashion.—Bacon.

No man can possibly improve in any company for which he has not respect enough to be under some degree of restraint.—Chesterfield.

Our companions please us less from the charms we find in their conversation than from those they find in ours.—Fulke Greville.

We have been born to associate with our fellow-men, and to join in community with the human race.—Cicero.

It is certain that either wise bearing or ignorant carriage is caught as men take diseases one of another; therefore, let men take heed of their company.—Shakespeare.

No company is far preferable to bad, because we are more apt to catch the vices of others than virtues, as disease is far more contagious than health.—Colton.

Let them have ever so learned lectures of breeding, that which will most influence their carriage will be the company they converse with, and the fashion of those about them.—Locke.

Without good company all dainties lose their true relish, and like painted grapes,
Are only seen, not tasted. —Massinger.

Be cautious with whom you associate, and never give your company or your confidence to persons of whose good principles you are not certain.—Bishop Coleridge.

Men or women that are greedy of acquaintance, or hasty in it, are oftentimes snared in ill company before they are aware, and entangled so, that they cannot easily get loose from it after, when they would.—Sir Matthew Hale.

Nature has left every man a capacity of being agreeable, though not of shining in company; and there are a hundred men sufficiently qualified for both, who, by a very few faults, that they might correct in half an hour, are not so much as tolerable.—Swift.

Take rather than give the tone to the company you are in. If you have parts you will show them more or less upon every subject; and if you have not, you had better talk sillily upon a subject of other people's than of your own choosing.—Chesterfield.

The most agreeable of all companions is a simple, frank man, without any high pretensions to an oppressive greatness; one who loves life, and understands the use of it; obliging alike at all hours; above all, of a golden temper and steadfast as an anchor. For such an one we gladly exchange the greatest genius, the most brilliant wit, the profoundest thinker.—Lessing.

Bad company is like a nail driven into a post, which, after the first or second blow, may be drawn out with little difficulty; but being once driven up to the head, the pincers cannot take hold to draw it out, but which can only be done by the destruction of the wood.—Augustine.

We should ever have it fixed in our memories that, by the character of those whom we choose for our friends, our own is likely to be formed, and will certainly be judged by the world. We ought, therefore, to be slow and cautious in contracting intimacy; but when a virtuous friendship is once established, we must ever consider it a sacred engagement.—Blair.

Comparisons

Comparisons are odious.—Burton.

Comparisons do ofttime great grievance.—John Lydgate.

The superiority of some men is merely local. They are great, because their associates are little.—Johnson.

Like master, like man.—Chevalier Bayard.

In virtues nothing earthly could surpass her,
Save thine "incomparable oil," Macassari
—Byron.

There's some are fou o' love divine,
There's some are fou o' brandy.
—Burns.

Compare her face with some that I shall show,
And it will make thee think thy swan a crow.
—Shakespeare.

Thus I knew that pups are like dogs, and kids like goats; so I used to compare great things with small.—Virgil.

What, is the jay more precious than the lark,
Because his feathers are more beautiful?
Or is the adder better than the eel,
Because his painted skin contents the eye?
—Shakespeare.

When two persons do the self-same thing, it oftentimes falls out that in the one it is criminal, in the other it is not so; not that the thing itself is different, but he who does it.—Terrence.

Is it possible your pragmatistical worship should not know that the comparisons made between wit and wit, courage and courage, beauty and beauty, birth and birth, are always odious and ill taken?—Cervantes.

When the moon shone, we did not see the candle, so doth the greater glory dim the less; a substitute shines brightly as a king, until a king be by; and then his state empties itself, as doth an inland brook into the main
of waters.—Shakespeare.

It's wiser being good than bad;
It's safer being meek than fierce:
It's fitter being sane than mad.

My own hope is, a sun will pierce
The thickest cloud earth ever stretched;
That, after Last, returns the First,
Though a wide compass round be fetched;
That what began best, can't end worst,
Nor what God blessed once, prove accurst.
—Robert Browning.

The botanist looks upon the astronomer as a being unworthy of his regard; and he that is growing great and happy by electrifying a bottle wonders how the world can be engaged by trifling prattle about war and peace.—Johnson.

Yet why repine? I have seen mansions on the verge of Wales that convert my farm-house into a Hampton Court, and where they speak of a glazed window as a great piece of magnificence. All things figure by comparison.—Shenstone.

Compassion

Compassion, the fairest associate of the heart.—Paine.

Man may dismiss compassion from his heart,
But God will never.
—Cowper.

There never was any heart truly great and generous that was not also tender and compassionate.—South.

It is the crown of justice, and the glory, where it may kill with right, to save with pity.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Compassion to an offender who has grossly violated the laws is, in effect, a cruelty to the peaceable subject who has observed them.—Junius.

O, heavens! can you hear a good man
groan,
And not relent, or not compassion him?
—Shakespeare.

Poor naked wretches, wheresoe'er you are,
That bide the pelting of this pitiless storm,
How shall your houseless heads and unfed sides,
Your loop'd and window'd raggedness, defend you
From seasons such as these? Oh, I have ta'en
Too little care of this! Take physic, pomp;
Expose thyself to feel what wretches feel;
That thou may'st shake the superflux to
them,
And show the heavens more just.
—Shakespeare.

Want of compassion (however inaccurate observers have reported to the contrary) is not to be numbered among the general faults of mankind. The black ingredient which fouls our disposition is envy. Hence our eyes, it is to be feared, are seldom turned up to those who are manifestly greater, better, wiser, or happier than ourselves, without some degree of malignity, while we commonly look downward on the mean and miserable with sufficient benevolence and pity.—Fielding.

Compassion is an emotion of which we ought never to be ashamed. Graceful, particularly in youth, is the tear of sympathy, and the heart that melts at the tale of woe. We should not permit ease and indulgence to contract our affections, and wrap us up in a selfish enjoyment; but we should accustom ourselves to think of the distresses of human life, of the solitary cottage, the dying parent, and the weeping orphan. Nor ought we ever to sport with pain and distress in any of our amusements, or treat even the meanest insect with wanton cruelty.—Blair.

Complacency

Complaisance renders a superior amiable, an equal agreeable, and an inferior acceptable.—Addison.

Complacency is a coin by the aid of which all the world can, for want of essential means, pay his club-bill in society. It is necessary, finally, that it may lose nothing of its merits, to associate judgment and prudence with it.—Voltaire.

Complaisance, though in itself it be scarce reckoned in the number of moral virtues, is that which gives a lustre to every talent a man can be possessed of. It was Plato's advice to an unpolished writer that he should sacrifice to the graces. In the same manner I would advise every man of learning, who would not appear in the world a mere scholar or philosopher, to make himself master of the social virtue which I have here mentioned.—Addison.

Complaining

Complaint is more contemptible than pitiful.—Bovee.

We lose the right of complaining sometimes by forbearing it; but we often treble the force.—Sterne.

Complaint is the largest tribute heaven receives.—Swift.

The usual fortune of complaint is to excite contempt more than pity.—Johnson.

We are too prone to find fault; let us look for some of the perfections.—Schiller.

Constant complaint is the poorest sort of pay for all the comforts we enjoy.—Franklin.

Every one must see daily instances of people who complain from a mere habit of complaining.—Graves.

I have always despised the whining yelp of complaint, and the cowardly feeble resolve.—Burns.

I will not be as those who spend the day in complaining of headache, and the night in drinking the wine that gives the headache.—Goethe.

Our condition never satisfies us; the present is always the worst. Though Jupiter should grant his request to each, we should continue to importune him.—La Fontaine.

To tell thy mis'ries will no comfort breed;
Men help thee most, that think thou hast
no need;
But if the world once thy misfortunes
know,
Thou soon shalt lose a friend and find a foe. —Randolph.

All our murmurings are so many arrows shot at God Himself, and they will return upon our own hearts; they reach not Him, but they will hit us; they hurt not Him, but they will wound us; therefore it is better to be mute than to murmur; it is dangerous to provoke a consuming fire.—Aughey.

Compensation

No evil is without its compensation.—Seneca.

One golden day redeems a weary year.—Celia Thaxter.

'Tis always morning somewhere in the world.—Richard Hengist Horne.

It is some compensation for great evils that they enforce great lessons.—Bovee.

Whoever makes great presents expects great presents in return.—Martial.

When the first is plucked, a second will not be wanting.—Virgil.

Since we are exposed to inevitable sorrows, wisdom is the art of finding compensation.—Lévis.

The equity of Providence has balanced peculiar sufferings with peculiar enjoyments.—Dr. Johnson.

If the poor man cannot always get meat, the rich man cannot always digest it.—Henry Giles.

'Tis toil's reward, that sweetens industry, As love inspires with strength the enrap-tur'd thrush. —Ebenezer Elliott.

What we gave, we have:
What we spent, we had:
What we left, we lost.
—Epitaph of Edward, Earl of Devon.

If poverty makes man groan, he yawns in opulence. When fortune empties us from labor, nature overwhelms us with time.—Rivarol.

The fiercest agonies have shortest reign; And after dreams of horror, comes again The welcome morning with its rays of peace. —William Cullen Bryant.

The rose does not bloom without thorns. True; but would that the thorns did not outlive the rose! —Richter.

We read on the forehead of those who are surrounded by a foolish luxury that Fortune sells what she is thought to give.—La Fontaine.

There is a day of sunny rest
For every dark and troubled night;
And grief may hide an evening guest,
But joy shall come with early light.
—William C. Bryant.

When fate has allowed to any man more than one great gift, accident or necessity seems usually to contrive that one shall encumber and impede the other.—Swinburne.

The poor eat always more relishable food than the rich; hunger makes the dishes sweet, and this occurs almost never with rich people.—Mahabharata.

Curses always recoil on the head of him who imprecates them. If you put a chain around the neck of a slave, the other end fastens itself around your own.—Emerson.

Nothing is pure and entire of a piece. All advantages are attended with disadvantages. A universal compensation prevails in all conditions of being and existence.—Hume.

Whatever difference may appear in the fortunes of mankind, there is, nevertheless, a certain compensation of good and evil which makes them equal.—Rochefoucauld.

O weary hearts! O slumbering eyes!
O drooping souls, whose destinies
Are fraught with fear and pain,
Ye shall be loved again.
—Longfellow.

If the gatherer gathers too much, Nature takes out of the man what she puts into his chest; swells the estate, but kills the owner. Nature hates monopolies and exceptions.—Emerson

And light is mingled with the gloom,
And joy with grief;
Divinest compensations come,
Through thorns of judgment mercies bloom
In sweet relief. —Whittier.

We devote the activity of our youth to revelry and the decrepitude of our old age to repentance: and we finish the farce by bequeathing our dead bodies to the chancel, which when living, we interdicted from the church—Colton.

There is a third silent party to all our bargains. The nature and soul of things takes on itself the guaranty of the fulfilment of every contract, so that honest service cannot come to loss.—Emerson.

If I have lost anything it was incidental; and the less money, the less trouble; the less favor, the less envy, —nay, even in those cases which put us out of our wits, it is not the loss itself, but the estimate of the loss that troubles us.—Seneca.

Universally, the better gold the worse man. The political economist defies us to show any gold mine country that is traversed by good roads, or a shore where pearls are found on which good schools are erected.—
Emerson.

Under the storm and the cloud to-day,
And to-day the hard peril and pain—
To-morrow the stone shall be rolled away,
For the sunshine shall follow the rain.
Merciful Father, I will not complain,
I know that the sunshine shall follow the rain.
—Joaquin Miller.

Where there is much general de-formity nature has often, perhaps generally, accorded some one bodily grace even in over-measure. So, no doubt, with the intellect and disposition, only it is frequently less apparent, and we give ourselves but little trouble to discover it.—J. F. Boyes.

As some tall cliff that lifts its awful form,
Swells from the vale, and midway leaves
the storm,
Though round its breast the rolling clouds are spread,
Eternal sunshine settles on its head.
—Goldsmith.

Earth gets its price for what Earth gives us,
The beggar is taxed for a corner to die
in;

The priest has his fee who comes and shrives us,

We bargain for the graves we lie in;
At the devil's booth are all things sold,
Each ounce of dross costs its ounce of
gold;

For a cap and bells our lives we pay,
Bubbles we buy with a whole soul's tasking,
'Tis heaven alone that is given away,
'Tis only God may be had for the asking,
No price is set on the lavish summer;
June may be had by the poorest comer.
—Lowell.

As there is no worldly gain without some loss, so there is no worldly loss without some gain. If thou hast lost thy wealth, thou hast lost some trouble with it; if thou art degraded from thy honor, thou art likewise freed from the stroke of envy; if sickness hath blurred thy beauty, it hath delivered thee from pride. Set the allowance against the loss, and thou shalt find no loss great; he loses little or nothing that reserves himself.—Quarles.

Compliments

Compliments are only lies in court clothes.

—Current among men
Like coin, the tinsel clink of compliment.
—Tennyson.

A compliment is usually accompanied with a bow, as if to beg pardon for paying it—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

Deference is the most complicate,
the most indirect, and the most elegant of all compliments.—Shenstone.

He who sports compliments, unless he takes good aim, may miss his mark, and be wounded by the recoil of his own weapon.—Haliburton.

When two people compliment each other with the choice of anything, each of them generally gets that which he likes least.—Pope.

A woman * * * always feels herself complimented by love, though it may be from a man incapable of winning her heart, or perhaps even her esteem.—Abel Stevens.

Banish all compliments but single truth,
From every tongue, and every shepherd's
heart,

Let them use still persuading, but no art.
—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Though all compliments are lies, yet because they are known to be such, nobody depends on them, so there is no hurt in them; you return them in the same manner you receive them; yet it is best to make as few as one can.—
Lady Gethin.

Treachery oft lurks
In compliments. You have sent so many posts

Of undertakings, they outride performance;
And make me think your fair pretences aim
At some intended ill, which my prevention Must strive to avert.
—Nabb.

Compliments and flattery oftenest excite my contempt by the pretension

they imply; for who is he that assumes to flatter me? To compliment often implies an assumption of superiority in the complimenter. It is, in fact, a subtle detraction.—Thoreau.

Compliments of congratulation are always kindly taken, and cost nothing but pen, ink and paper. I consider them as draughts upon good breeding, where the exchange is always greatly in favor of the drawer.—Chesterfield.

Compromise

Compromise makes a good umbrella, but a poor roof; it is a temporary expedient, often wise in party politics, almost sure to be unwise in statesmanship.—Lowell.

Compulsion

Force is the agent which ignorance uses for making his followers do the actions to which they are disinclined by nature; and (like an attempt to make water ascend above its level) the moment the agent ceases to act, the same instant does the operation cease.—Combe.

Concealment

If rich, it is easy enough to conceal your wealth; but if poor, it is not quite so easy to conceal your poverty. We shall find that it is less difficult to hide a thousand guineas than one hole in our coat.—Colton.

To conceal anything from those to whom I am attached, is not in my nature. I can never close my lips where I have opened my heart.—Dickens.

Conceit

Be not wise in your own conceits.—Bible.

Be not righteous overmuch.—Bible.

Conceit in weakest bodies strongest works.—Shakespeare.

I am not in the roll of common men.—Shakespeare.

Wind puffs up empty bladders; opinion, fools.—Socrates.

The art of making much show with little substance.—Macaulay.

Self-made men are most always apt to be a little too proud of the job.—H. W. Shaw.

The world knows only two, that's Rome and I.—Ben Jonson.

Every man, however little, makes a figure in his own eyes.—Henry Home.

Conceit may puff a man up, but never prop him up.—Ruskin.

Faith, that's as well said as if I had said it myself.—Swift.

Nature has sometimes made a fool, but a coxcomb is always of a man's own making.—Addison.

The certain way to be cheated is to fancy one's self more cunning than others.—Charron.

He who gives himself airs of importance exhibits the credentials of impotence.—Lavater.

The weakest spot in every man is where he thinks himself to be the wisest.—Emmons.

No man was ever so much deceived by another as by himself.—Lord Greville.

The more any one speaks of himself, the less he likes to hear another talked of.—Lavater.

A man who is proud of small things shows that small things are great to him.—Madame de Girardin.

The miller imagines that the corn grows only to make his mill turn.—Goethe.

One whom the music of his own vain tongue doth ravish like enchanting harmony.—Shakespeare.

We think our fathers fools, so wise we grow;
Our wiser sons, no doubt, will think us so.
—Pope.

Strong conceit, like a new principle, carries all easily with it, when yet above common-sense.—Locke.

I say that conceit is just as natural a thing to human minds as a centre to a circle.—Holmes.

Seest thou a man wise in his own conceit? There is more hope of a fool than of him.—Bible.

Man believes himself always greater than he is, and is esteemed less than he is worth.—Goethe.

A strong conceit is rich; so most men deem:
If not to be, 'tis comfort yet to seem.
—Marston.

The best of lessons, for a good many people, would be to listen at a key-hole. It is a pity for such that the practice is dishonorable.—Madame Swetchine.

Self-love is better than any gilding to make that seem gorgeous wherein ourselves be parties.—Sir P. Sidney.

The cuckoo drinks the celestial juice of the mango-tree, and is not proud; the frog drinks swamp-water, and quacks with conceit.—Varuki.

Conceit and confidence are both of them cheats; the first always imposes on itself, the second frequently deceives others too.—Zimmermann.

How wise are we in thought! how weak in practice! our very virtue, like our will, is—nothing.—Shirley.

Conceited people are never without a certain degree of harmless satisfaction wherewith to flavor the waters of life.—Madame Deluzy.

It is the admirer of himself, and not the admirer of virtue, that thinks himself superior to others.—Plutarch.

Men are found to be vainer on account of those qualities which they fondly believe they have than of those which they really have.—Voiture.

A man—poet, prophet, or whatever he may be—readily persuades himself of his right to all the worship that is voluntarily tendered.—Hawthorne.

We go and fancy that everybody is thinking of us. But he is not; he is like us—he is thinking of himself.—Charles Reade.

A man who is always well satisfied with himself is seldom so with others, and others as little pleased with him.—La Rochefoucauld.

One's self-satisfaction is an untaxed kind of property, which it is very unpleasant to find depreciated.—George Eliot.

Those who differ most from the opinions of their fellow-men are the most confident of the truth of their own.—Mackintosh.

Conceit is to nature what paint is to beauty; it is not only needless, but impairs what it would improve.—Pope.

Everything without tells the individual that he is nothing; everything within persuades him that he is everything.—X. Doudan.

I've never any pity for conceited people, because I think they carry their comfort about with them.—George Eliot.

There is scarcely any man, how much soever he may despise the character of a flatterer, but will condescend in the meanest manner to flatter himself.—Fielding.

Conceited men often seem a harmless kind of men, who, by an overweening self-respect, relieve others from the duty of respecting them at all.—Beecher.

None are so seldom found alone, and are so soon tired of their own company, as those coxcombs who are on the best terms with themselves.—Colton.

Conceit is the most contemptible and one of the most odious qualities in the world. It is vanity driven from all other shifts, and forced to appeal to itself for admiration.—Hazlitt.

Every man deems that he has precisely the trials and temptations which are the hardest of all for him to bear; but they are so, because they are the very ones he needs.—Richter.

No wonder we are all more or less pleased with mediocrity, since it leaves us at rest, and gives the same comfortable feeling as when one associates with his equals.—Goethe.

It is a fact which escapes no one, that, generally speaking, whoso is acquainted with his worth has but a little stock to cultivate acquaintance with.—Carlyle.

Conceit, more rich in matter than in words, Brags of his substance, not of ornament: They are but beggars that can count their worth. —Shakespeare.

An eagerness and zeal for dispute on every subject, and with every one, shows great self-sufficiency, that never-failing sign of great self-ignorance.—Lord Chatham.

Drawn by conceit from reason's plan
How vain is that poor creature man;
How pleas'd in ev'ry paltry elf
To prate about that thing himself.
—Churchill.

We judge of others for the most part by their good opinion of themselves; yet nothing gives such offense or creates so many enemies, as that extreme self-complacency or superciliousness of manner, which appears to set the opinion of every one else at defiance.—Hazlitt.

Be very slow to believe that you are wiser than all others; it is a fatal but common error. Where one has been saved by a true estimation of another's weakness, thousands have been destroyed by a false appreciation of their own strength.—Colton.

This self-conceit is a most dangerous shelf
Where many have made shipwreck unaware;

He who doth trust too much unto himself
Can never fail to fall in many snares.
—Earl of Stirling.

All affectation and display proceed from the supposition of possessing something better than the rest of the world possesses. Nobody is vain in possessing two legs and two arms; because that is the precise quantity of either sort of limb which everybody possesses.—Sydney Smith.

Whoe'er imagines prudence all his own,
Or deems that he hath powers to speak and judge
Such as none other hath, when they are known,
They are found shallow. —Sophocles.

They say it was Liston's firm belief, that he was a great and neglected tragic actor; they say that every one of us believes in his heart, or would like to have others believe, that he is something which he is not.—Thackeray.

A school of art or of anything else is to be looked on as a single individual, who keeps talking to himself for a hundred years, and feels an extreme satisfaction with his own circle of favorite ideas, be they ever so silly.—Goethe.

Men educate each other in reason by contact or collision, and keep each other sane by the very conflict of their separate hobbies. Society as a whole is the deadly enemy of the particular crotchet of each, and solitude is almost the only condition in which the acorn of conceit can grow to the oak of perfect self-delusion.—Whipple.

Nature descends down to infinite smallness. Great men have their parasites; and, if you take a large buzzing blue-bottle fly, and look at it in a microscope, you may see twenty or thirty little ugly insects crawling about it, which, doubtless, think their fly to be the bluest, grandest, merriest, most important animal in the universe, and are convinced the world would be at an end if it ceased to buzz.—Sydney Smith.

Conceit is just as natural a thing to human minds as a centre is to a circle. But little-minded people's thoughts move in such small circles that five minutes' conversation gives you an arc long enough to determine their whole curve. An arc in the movement of a large intellect does not differ sensibly from a straight line.—Holmes.

But the conceit of one's self and the conceit of one's hobby are hardly more prolific of eccentricity than the conceit of one's money. Avarice, the most hateful and wolfish of all the hard, cool, callous dispositions of selfishness, has its own peculiar caprices and crotchets. The ingenuities of its meanness defy all the calculations of reason, and reach the miraculous in subtlety.—Whipple.

Success seems to be that which forms the distinction between confidence and conceit. Nelson, when young, was piqued at not being noticed in a certain paragraph of the newspapers, which detailed an action wherein he had assisted. "But never mind," said he, "I will one day have a gazette of my own."—Colton.

Talk about conceit as much as you like, it is to human character what salt is to the ocean; it keeps it sweet and renders it endurable. Say rather it is like the natural unguent of the sea-fowl's plumage, which enables him to shed the rain that falls on him and the wave in which he dips. When one has had all his conceit taken out of him, when he has lost all his illusions, his feathers will soon soak through, and he will fly no more.—Holmes.

Conciliation

Agree with thine adversary quickly while thou art in the way with him.—Bible.

It is the part of a prudent man to conciliate the minds of others, and to turn them to his own advantage.—Cicero.

Conduct

A man, like a watch, is to be valued for his manner of going.—William Penn.

The integrity of men is to be measured by their conduct, not by their professions.—Junius.

And let men so conduct themselves in life As to be always strangers to defeat.—Cicero.

The conduct of men depends upon the temperament, not upon a bunch of tusty maxims.—Beaconsfield.

No books are so legible as the lives of men; no character so plain as their moral conduct.—Aughey.

Take heed lest passion sway
Thy judgment to do aught which else free-will
Would not admit. —Milton.

Those virtues which cost us dear prove that we love God; those which are easy to us prove that He loves us.—J. Petit-Senn.

To do evil is more within the reach of every man, in public as in private life, than to do good.—Dr. Parr.

All the while thou livest ill, thou hast the trouble, distraction, inconveniences of life, but not the sweets and true use of it.—Fuller.

That conduct sometimes seems ridiculous, in the eyes of the world, the secret reasons for which, may, in reality, be wise and solid.—Rochefoucauld.

I would, God knows, in a poor woodman's hut
Have spent my peaceful days, and shared my crust
With her who would have cheer'd me, rather far
Than on this throne; but being what I am,
I'll be it nobly. —Joanna Baillie.

Have more than thou showest,
Speak less than thou knowest,
Lend less than thou owest,
Learn more than thou trowest,
Set less than thou throwest.
—Shakespeare.

Obey thy parents, keep thy word justly; swear not; commit not with man's sworn spouse; set not thy sweet heart on proud array. * * * Keep thy foot out of brothels, thy pen from lenders' books.—Shakespeare.

It is not enough that you can form, nay, and follow, the most excellent rules for conducting yourself in the world. You must also know when to deviate from them, and where lies the exception.—Greville.

I will govern my life, and my thoughts, as if the whole world were to see the one, and to read the other;

for what does it signify to make anything a secret to my neighbor, when to God (who is the searcher of our hearts) all our privacies are open?—Seneca.

Only add
Deeds to thy knowledge answerable, add faith,
Add virtue, patience, temperance, add love,
By name to come call'd charity, the soul
Of all the rest; then wilt thou not be loath
To leave this Paradise, but shalt possess
A Paradise within thee, happier far.
—Milton.

As in walking it is your great care not to run your foot upon a nail, or to tread awry, and strain your leg; so let it be in all the affairs of human life, not to hurt your mind or offend your judgment. And this rule, if observed carefully in all your deportment, will be a mighty security to you in your undertakings.—Epictetus.

Confession

Confess yourself to heaven;
Repent what's past; avoid what is to come.
—Shakespeare.

Why does no man confess his vices?
Because he is yet in them; it is for a waking man to tell his dream.—Seneca.

A man should never be ashamed to own he has been in the wrong, which
is but saying, in other words, that he is wiser to-day than he was yesterday.
—Pope.

If thou wouldst be justified, acknowledge thy injustice; he that confesses his sin begins his journey toward salvation; he that is sorry for it mends his pace; he that forsakes it is at his journey's end.—Quarles.

Come, now again thy woes impart,
Tell all thy sorrows, all thy sin;
We cannot heal the throbbing heart,
Till we discern the wounds within.
—Crabbe.

Unless we realize our sins enough to all them by name, it is hardly worth while to say anything about them at all. When we pray for forgiveness, et us say, "my temper," or "untruth-fulness," or "pride," "my selfishness, my cowardice, indolence, jealousy, revenge, impurity." To recognize our sins, we must look them in the face and call them by their right names, however hard. Honesty in confession calls for definiteness in confession.—

Maltbie Babcock.

Confidence

Society is built upon trust.—South.

Self-trust is the essence of heroism.
—Emerson.

Security is mortal's chiefest enemy.
—Shakespeare.

Be not confident and affirmative.—
Jeremy Taylor.

For they can conquer who believe they can.—Dryden.

Trust not him that hath once broken faith.—Shakespeare.

Confidence is nowhere safe.—Virgil.

Confidence is a plant of slow growth in an aged bosom.—William Pitt.

He knows little who will tell his wife all he knows.—Thomas Fuller.

He who has lost confidence can lose nothing more.—Boiste.

Thou know'st how fearless is my trust in thee.—Miss L. E. Landon.

He is safe who admits no one to his confidence.—Rochefoucauld.

Confidence imparts a wonderful inspiration to its possessor.—Milton.

Be as just and gracious unto me,
As I am confident and kind to thee.
—Shakespeare.

He that wold not when he might,
He shall not when he wold-a.
—Percy.

Your wisdom is consum'd in confidence.
Do not go forth to-day. —Shakespeare.

Fields are won by those who believe in the winning.—T. W. Higginson.

Wise men have but few confidants, and cunning ones none.—H. W. Shaw.

He who believes in nobody knows that he himself is not to be trusted.—Auerbach.

Confidence in another man's virtue is no slight evidence of a man's own.—Montaigne.

Confidence in conversation has a greater share than wit.—Rochefoucauld.

It is almost always to save telling a great deal that women tell a little to their husbands.—Rochebrune.

Surely modesty never hurt any cause; and the confidence of man seems to me to be much like the wrath of man.—Tillotson.

Trust him little who praises all, him less who censures all, and him least who is indifferent about all.—Lavater.

A noble heart, like the sun, showeth its greatest confidence in its lowest estate.—Sir P. Sidney.

Trust him with little who, without proofs, trusts you with everything, or, when he has proved you, with nothing.—Lavater.

Confidence is that feeling by which the mind embarks in great and honorable courses with a sure hope and trust in itself.—Cicero.

Confidence, as opposed to modesty and distinguished from decent assurance, proceeds from self-opinion, and is occasioned by ignorance and flattery.—Jeremy Collier.

He who does not respect confidence, will never find happiness in his path. The belief in virtue vanishes from his heart, the source of nobler actions becomes extinct in him.—Auffenberg.

Whatever distrust we may have of the sincerity of those who converse with us, we always believe they will tell us more truth than they do to others.—La Rochefoucauld.

The hearing ear is always found close to the speaking tongue; and no genius can long or often utter anything which is not invited and gladly entertained by men around him.—Emerson.

We may have the confidence of another without possessing his heart. If his heart be ours, there is no need of revelation or of confidence,—all is open to us.—Du Cœur.

To reveal imprudently the spot where we are most sensitive and vulnerable is to invite a blow. The demigod Achilles admitted no one to his confidence.—Madame Swetchine.

There is something captivating in spirit and intrepidity, to which we often yield as to a resistless power; nor can he reasonably expect the confidence of others who too apparently distrusts himself.—Hazlitt.

It is unjust and absurd of persons advancing in years, to expect of the young that confidence should come all and only on their side; the human heart, at whatever age, opens only to the heart that opens in return.—Miss Edgeworth.

I see before me the statue of a celebrated minister, who said that confidence was a plant of slow growth. But I believe, however gradual may be the growth of confidence, that of credit requires still more time to arrive at maturity.—Benj. Disraeli.

Where there is any good disposition, confidence begets faithfulness; but distrust, if it do not produce treachery, never fails to destroy every inclination to evince fidelity. Most people disdain to clear themselves from the accusations of mere suspicion.—Jane Porter.

Most frequently we make confidants from vanity, a love of talking, a wish to win the confidence of others, and to make an exchange of secrets.—La Rochefoucauld.

Never put much confidence in such as put no confidence in others. A man prone to suspect evil is mostly looking in his neighbor for what he sees in himself. As to the pure all things are pure, even so to the impure all things are impure.—Hare.

Confidence always pleases those who receive it. It is a tribute we pay to their merit, a deposit we commit to their trust, a pledge that gives them a claim upon us, a kind of dependence to which we voluntarily submit.—La Rochefoucauld.

All confidence which is not absolute and entire is dangerous; there are few occasions but where a man ought either to say all or conceal all; for how little soever you have revealed of your secret to a friend, you have already said too much if you think it not safe to make him privy to all particulars.—J. Beaumont.

Confidence is conqueror of men; victorious both over them and in them; The iron will of one stout heart shall make a thousand quail; A feeble dwarf, dauntlessly resolved, will turn the tide of battle, And rally to a nobler strife the giants that had fled. —Tupper.

There is a kind of greatness which does not depend upon fortune; it is a certain manner that distinguishes us, and which seems to destine us for great things; it is the value we insensibly set upon ourselves; it is by this quality that we gain the deference of other men, and it is this which commonly raises us more above them, than birth, rank, or even merit itself.—La Rochefoucauld.

Let not the quietness of any man's temper, much less the confidence he has in thy honesty and goodness, tempt thee to contrive any mischief against him; for the more securely he relies on thy virtue, and the less mistrust he has of any harm from thee, the greater wickedness will it be to entertain even the thought of doing him an injury.—Bishop Patrick.

People have generally three epochs in their confidence in man. In the first they believe him to be everything that is good, and they are lavish with their friendship and confidence. In the next, they have had experience, which has smitten down their confidence, and they then have to be careful not to mistrust every one, and to put the worst construction upon everything. Later in life, they learn that the greater number of men have much more good in them than bad, and that even when there is cause to blame, there is more reason to pity than condemn; and then a spirit of confidence again awakens within them.—Fredrika Bremer.

When young, we trust ourselves too much, and we trust others too little when old. Rashness is the error of youth, timid caution of age. Manhood is the isthmus between the two extremes; the ripe and fertile season of action, when alone we can hope to find the head to contrive, united with the hand to execute.—Colton.

Confirmation

Believe and be confirmed.—Milton.

Confirmation is a most solemn and important ordinance.—Bishop Oxenden.

Whether confirmation be a sacrament or not, it is no use to dispute; and if it be disputed, it cannot follow that it is not of very great use and holiness.—Jeremy Taylor.

Conjecture

Our conjectures are like our hopes.—Jane Taylor.

Conjecture as to things useful is good; but conjecture as to what it would be useless to know, such as whether men went upon all-four, is very idle.—Dr. Johnson.

Conquest

I came, I saw, I conquered.—Julius Cæsar.

Self-conquest is the greatest of victories.—Plato.

How grand is victory, but how dear! —Boufflers.

He conquers twice who conquers himself in victory.—Syrus.

We triumph without glory when we conquer without danger.—Corneille.

You will hardly conquer, but conquer you must.—Ovid.

Yield to him who opposes you; by yielding you conquer.—Ovid.

He who surpasses or subdues mankind must look down on the hate of those below.—Byron.

Anticipation leads the way to victory, and is the spur to conquest.—Chamfort.

Then fly betimes, for only they Conquer love that run away.
—Thomas Carew.

A victory is twice itself when the achiever brings home full numbers.—Shakespeare.

The more acquisitions the government makes abroad, the more taxes the people have to pay at home.—Thomas Paine.

Know that the slender shrub which is seen to bend, conquers when it yields to the storm.—Metastasio.

It is the right of war for conquerors to treat those whom they have conquered according to their pleasure.—Cæsar.

Brave conquerors! for so you are
That war against your own affections,
And the huge army of the world's desires.
—Shakespeare.

Great things thro' the greatest hazards are achiev'd,
And then they shine.
—Beaumont and Fletcher.

I claim by right
Of conquest; for when kings make war,
No law betwixt two sov'reigns can decide,
But that of arms, where fortune is the
judge,
Soldiers the lawyers, and the bar the field.
—Dryden.

Hannibal knew better how to conquer than how to profit by the conquest; and Napoleon was more skillful in taking positions than in maintaining them. As to reverses, no general can presume to say that he may not be defeated; but he can, and ought to say, that he will not be surprised.—Colton.

Conscience

A still, small voice.—I Kings xix. 12.

Conscience is a thousand swords.—Shakespeare.

The only infallible judge.—Hosea Ballou.

Conscience is the voice of God in the soul.—Aughey.

The soft whispers of the God in man.—Young.

Conscience is justice's best minister.—Lady Montagu.

Conscience is its own counsellor.—South.

Man's conscience is the oracle of God!—Byron.

There is no college for the conscience.—Theodore Parker.

God's vicegerent in the soul.—Buchan.

The pulse of reason.—Coleridge.

Reason deceives us often; conscience never.—Rousseau.

No infallible oracle out of the breast.—Rev. Dr. Hedge.

The conscience is more wise than science.—Lavater.

Let his tormentor conscience find him out.—Milton.

The great theatre for virtue is conscience.—Cicero.

How awful is that hour when conscience stings.—Percival.

Conscience is the sentinel of virtue.—Johnson.

A wounded conscience is able to unparadise paradise itself.—Fuller.

Conscience is God's deputy in the soul.—Rev. T. Adams.

Conscience is the chamber of justice.—Origen.

What exile from himself can flee?—Byron.

The sense of right.—Dr. Watson.

A good conscience is a continual Christmas.—Franklin.

The thundering voice that wrings, in one dark, damning moment, crimes of years!—Percival.

No evil is intolerable but a guilty conscience.—Channing.

Conscience is its own readiest accuser.—Chapin.

The still small voice is wanted.—Cowper.

The torture of a bad conscience is the hell of a living soul.—Calvin.

A sound conscience is a brazen wall of defense.—From the Latin.

Trust that man in nothing who has not a conscience in everything.—Sterne.

Good conscience is sometimes sold for money, but never bought with it.—Aughey.

Despotic conscience rules our hopes and fears.—Ovid.

A good conscience is the best looking-glass of heaven.—Cudworth.

The most exacting jailer is our own conscience.—J. Petit-Senn.

The only incorruptible thing about us.—Fielding.

Conscience is a sacred sanctuary where God alone may enter as judge.—Lamennais.

By the verdict of his own breast no guilty man is ever acquitted.—Juvenal.

The tribunal of conscience exists independent of edicts and decrees.—Burke.

One self-approving hour whole years outweighs.—Pope.

No outward change need trouble him who is inwardly serene.—Hosea Ballou.

Conscience has no more to do with gallantry than it has with politics.—Sheridan.

The conscience of the dying belies their life.—Vauvenargues.

Many a lash in the dark doth conscience give the wicked.—Boston.

Rules of society are nothing, one's conscience is the umpire.—Madame Dudevant.

A man of integrity will never listen to any reason against conscience.—Home.

The sweetest cordial we receive at last, Is conscience of our virtuous actions past.—Goffe.

Suspicion always haunts the guilty mind; The thief doth fear each bush an officer.—Shakespeare.

The mind conscious of innocence despises false reports; but we are always ready to believe a scandal.—Ovid.

The Unknown is an ocean. What is conscience? The compass of the Unknown.—Joseph Cook.

Heed the still, small voice that so seldom leads us wrong, and never into folly.—Mme. du Deffand.

I feel within me a peace above all earthly dignities, a still and quiet conscience.—Shakespeare.

Conscience is but a word that cowards use, Devised at first to keep the strong in awe.—Shakespeare.

Labor to keep alive in your breast that little spark of celestial fire, called Conscience.—George Washington.

Most men are afraid of a bad name, but few fear their consciences.—Pliny.

Nor ear can hear nor tongue can tell
The tortures of that inward hell!
—Byron.

Conscience serves us especially to judge of the actions of others.—J. Petit-Senn.

Conscience is harder than our enemies,
Knows more, accuses with more nicety.
—George Eliot.

Ah, what a sign it is of evil life,
Where death's approach is seen so terrible!
—Shakespeare.

The conscience is the inviolable asylum of the liberty of man.—Napoleon.

No man ever offended his own conscience but first or last it was revenged upon him for it.—South.

I seek no better warrant than my own conscience.—Sir P. Sidney.

Conscience is the reason employed about questions of right and wrong.—Whewell.

What we call conscience, in many instances, is only a wholesome fear of the constable.—Bovee.

Conscience warns us as a friend before it punishes us as a judge.—Stanislaus.

The great chastisement of a knave is not to be known, but to know himself.—J. Petit-Senn.

Let us be thankful for health and competence, and, above all, for a quiet conscience.—Izaak Walton.

Leave her to heaven and to those thorns that in her bosom lodge, to prick and sting her.—Shakespeare.

Conscience is the living law, and honor is to this law what piety is to religion.—Boufflers.

There is no evil which we cannot face or fly from but the consciousness of duty disregarded.—Daniel Webster.

Conscience and wealth are not always neighbors.—Massinger.

Be fearful only of thyself, and stand in awe of none more than thine own conscience.—Burton.

In matters of conscience first thoughts are best; in matters of prudence last thoughts are best.—Robert Hall.

We never do evil so effectually as when we are led to do it by a false principle of conscience.—Pascal.

If you should escape the censure of others, hope not to escape your own.—Henry Home.

There is in man a conscience which outlives the sensations, resolutions and emotions of the hour, and rises above them all.—Edward Thomson.

Conscience is that peculiar faculty of the soul which may be called the religious instinct.—Samuel Smiles.

The voice of conscience is so delicate that it is easy to stifle it; but it is also so clear that it is impossible to mistake it.—Madame de Staël.

The virtuous mind that ever walks attended
By a strong siding champion, Conscience —Harrison.

See from behind her secret stand
The sly informer minutes ev'ry fault
And her dread diary with horror fills.
—Young.

A good conscience is the palace of Christ; the temple of the Holy Ghost; the paradise of delight; the standing Sabbath of the saints.—Augustine.

There is one court whose "findings" are incontrovertible, and whose sessions are held in the chambers of our own breast.—Hosea Ballou.

Conscience is merely our own judgment of the moral rectitude or turpitude of our own actions.—Locke.

What other dungeon is so dark as one's own heart? What jailer so inexorable as one's self?—Hawthorne.

Our secret thoughts are rarely heard except in secret. No man knows what conscience is until he understands what solitude can teach him concerning it.—Joseph Cook.

Foul whisp'rings are abroad; and unnat'ral deeds
Do breed unnat'ral troubles: infected minds
To their deaf pillows will discharge their secrets, —Shakespeare.

Every one of us, whatever his speculative opinions, knows better than he practices, and recognizes a better law than he obeys.—James A. Froude.

He that hath a scrupulous conscience is like a horse that is not well weighed; he starts at every bird that flies out of the hedge.—Selden.

I believe that we cannot live better than in seeking to become better, nor more agreeably than having a clear conscience.—Socrates.

A guilty conscience is like a whirlpool, drawing in all to itself which would otherwise pass by.—Fuller.

O conscience, into what abyss of fears and horrors hast thou driven me, out of which I find no way, from deep to deeper plunged.—Milton.

O the wound of conscience is no scar, and time cools it not with his wing, but merely keeps it open with his scythe.—Richter.

Conscience is the mirror of our souls, which represents the errors of our lives in their full shape.—Bancroft.

There is no class of men so difficult to be managed in a state, as those whose intentions are honest, but whose consciences are bewitched.—Napoleon.

We should have all our communications with men, as in the presence of God; and with God, as in the presence of men.—Colton.

Conscience, that boon companion who sets a man free under the strong breastplate of innocence, that bids him on and fear not.—Dante.

I am more afraid of my own heart than of the pope and all his cardinals. I have within me the great pope, self.—Luther.

Our faults afflict us more than our good deeds console. Pain is ever uppermost in the conscience as in the heart.—Madame Swetchine.

Conscience, that vicegerent of God in the human heart, whose "still small voice" the loudest revelry cannot drown.—W. H. Harrison.

A man never outlives his conscience, and that, for this cause only, he cannot outlive himself.—South.

There is no future pang can deal that justice on the self-condemned he deals on his own soul.—Byron.

That conscience approves of and attests such a course of action, is itself alone an obligation.—Butler.

The true grandeur of humanity is in moral elevation, sustained, enlightened, and decorated by the intellect of man.—Charles Sumner.

Be this thy brazen bulwark, to keep a clear conscience, and never turn pale with guilt.—Horace.

Light as a gossamer is the circumstance, which can bring enjoyment to a conscience, which is not its own accuser.—W. Carleton.

Liberty of conscience (when people have consciences) is rightly considered the most indispensable of liberties.—Chambers.

Thrice is he arm'd, that hath his quarrel just;
And he but naked, though lock'd up in steel,
Whose conscience with injustice is corrupted. —Shakespeare.

Who has a heart so pure but some uncleanly apprehensions keep leets and law-days, and in session sit with meditations awful?—Shakespeare.

Happy is the man who renounces everything which may bring a stain or burden upon his conscience.—Thomas à Kempis.

A quiet conscience makes one so serene! Christians have burnt each other, quite persuaded
That all the apostles would have done as they did. —Byron.

Why should not conscience have vacation,
As well as other courts o' th' nation?
Have equal power to adjourn,
Appoint appearance, and return? —Butler.

A man's first care should be to avoid the reproaches of his own heart; his next, to escape the censures of the world.—Addison.

Conscience is a blushing, shame-faced spirit that mutinies in a man's bosom; it fills one full of obstacles.—Shakespeare.

Conscience never commands nor forbids anything authentically, but there is some law of God which commands and forbids it first.—South.

A man can bear a world's contempt when he has that within which says he's worthy. When he contemns himself, there burns the hell.—Alexander Smith.

It is often easier to justify one's self to others than to respond to the secret doubts that arise in one's own bosom.—Mrs. Oliphant.

If we regulate our conduct according to our own convictions, we may safely disregard the praise or censure of others.—Pascal.

Conscience is a coward; and those faults it has not strength enough to prevent it seldom has justice enough to accuse.—Goldsmith.

The authority of conscience stands founded upon its vicegerency and deputation under God.—South.

The most miserable pettifogging in the world is that of a man in the court of his own conscience.—Beecher.

Merit and good works is the end of man's motion, and conscience of the same is the accomplishment of man's rest.—Bacon.

I must leave you to the satisfaction of your own conscience, which, though a silent panegyric, is yet the best.—Dryden.

As the blush is the signal of innocence, so is serenity of manner the token of a quiet conscience.—Mme. Necker.

Undoubtedly we render our consciences callous by evil indulgences; but we cannot entirely subdue that still, small voice.—Beecher.

Thus conscience does make cowards of us all;
And thus the native hue of resolution
Is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought. —Shakespeare.

As the mind of each man is conscious of good or evil, so does he conceive within his breast hope or fear, according to his actions.—Ovid.

Man, wretched man, when'er he stoops to sin,
Feels, with the act, a strong remorse within. —Juvenal.

The Past lives o'er again
In its effects, and to the guilty spirit
The ever-frowning Present is its image. —Coleridge.

It is as bad to clip conscience as to clip coin; it is as bad to give a counterfeit statement as a counterfeit bill.—Chapin.

Be more careful of your conscience than of your estate. The latter can be bought and sold; the former never.—Hosea Ballou.

Trust me no tortures which the poets feign
Can match the fierce unutterable pain
He feels, who night and day devoid of rest
Carries his own accuser in his breast. —Gifford.

Better be with the dead, whom we, to gain our place, have sent to peace, than on the torture of the mind to lie in restless ecstasy.—Shakespeare.

Yet still there whispers the small voice within,
 Heard thro' gain's silence, and o'er glory's
 din;
 Whatever creed be taught or land be trod,
 Man's conscience is the oracle of God!
 —Byron.

Here, here it lies; a lump of lead by day;
 And in my short distracted nightly slumbers,
 The hag that rides my dreams.
 —Dryden.

Though thy slumber may be deep,
 Yet thy spirit will not sleep;
 There are shades that will not vanish,
 There are thoughts thou canst not banish.
 —Byron.

A man who sells his conscience for his interest, will sell it for his pleasure. A man who will betray his country, will betray his friend.—Miss Edgeworth.

Even in the fiercest uproar of our stormy passions, conscience, though in her softest whispers, gives to the supremacy of rectitude the voice of an undying testimony.—Chalmers.

Let a prince be guarded with soldiers, attended by councillors, and shut up in forts; yet if his thoughts disturb him, he is miserable.—Plutarch.

If thou wouldst be informed what God has written concerning thee in Heaven look into thine own bosom, and see what graces He hath there wrought in thee.—Fuller.

But, at sixteen, the conscience rarely gnaws
 So much, as when we call our old debts in
 At sixty years, and draw the accounts of evil,
 And find a deuced balance with the devil.
 —Byron.

The color of the king doth come and go,
 Between his purpose and his conscience,
 Like heralds 'twixt two dreadful battles set:
 His passion is so ripe, it needs must break.
 —Shakespeare.

He that hath a blind conscience which sees nothing, a dead conscience which feels nothing, and a dumb conscience which says nothing, is in as miserable a condition as a man can be on this side of hell.—Patrick Henry.

In the commission of evil, fear no man so much as thyself; another is but one witness against thee, thou art a thousand; another thou mayest avoid, thyself thou canst not. Wickedness is its own punishment.—Quarles.

A man, so to speak, who is not able to bow to his own conscience every morning is hardly in a condition to respectfully salute the world at any other time of the day.—Douglas Jerrold.

What Conscience dictates to be done,
 Or warns me not to do;
 This teach me more than Hell to shun,
 That more than Heav'n pursue.
 —Pope.

Oh! think what anxious moments pass between
 The birth of plots, and their last fatal periods,
 Oh! 'tis a dreadful interval of time,
 Filled up with horror all, and big with death!
 —Addison.

Some persons follow the dictates of their conscience only in the same sense in which a coachman may be said to follow the horses he is driving.—
 Whately.

The world will never be in any manner of order or tranquillity until men are firmly convinced that conscience, honor and credit are all in one interest; and that without the concurrence of the former the latter are but impossitions upon ourselves and others.—
 Steele.

It is a man's own dishonesty, his crimes, his wickedness, and boldness, that takes away from him soundness of mind; these are the furies, these the flames and firebrands, of the wicked.
 —Cicero.

Remorse of conscience is like an old wound; a man is in no condition to fight under such circumstances. The pain abates his vigor and takes up too much of his attention.—Jeremy Collier.

Preserve your conscience always soft and sensitive. If but one sin force its way into that tender part of the soul and dwell there, the road is paved for a thousand iniquities.—Watts.

Man is naturally more desirous of a quiet and approving, than of a vigilant and tender conscience,—more desirous of security than of safety.—Whately.

Our conscience is a fire within us, and our sins as the fuel; instead of warming, it will scorch us, unless the fuel be removed, or the heat of it allayed by penitential tears.—Dr. Mason.

Conscience and covetousness are never to be reconciled; like fire and water they always destroy each other, according to the predominancy of the element.—Jeremy Collier.

A good conscience is never lawless in the worst regulated state, and will provide those laws for itself which the neglect of legislators had forgotten to supply.—Fielding.

A man's own conscience is his sole tribunal, and he should care no more for that phantom "opinion" than he should fear meeting a ghost if he crossed the churchyard at dark.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Conscience is a great ledger book in which all our offences are written and registered, and which time reveals to the sense and feeling of the offender.—Burton.

A tender conscience is an inestimable blessing; that is, a conscience not only quick to discern what is evil, but instantly to shun it, as the eyelid closes itself against the mote.—Rev. N. Adams.

Oh the difference of divers men in the tenderness of their consciences! Some are scarcely touched with a wound, while others are wounded with a touch therein.—Thomas Fuller.

Let not your peace rest in the utterances of men, for whether they put a good or bad construction on your conduct does not make you other than you are.—Thomas à Kempis.

I have somewhere read that conscience not only sits as witness and judge within our bosoms, but also forms the prison of punishment.—Hosea Ballou.

Now conscience wakes despair
That slumber'd, wakes the bitter memory,
Of what he was, what is, what must be Worse; if worst deeds, worse sufferings must ensue. —Milton.

A good conscience is to the soul what health is to the body; it preserves a constant ease and serenity within us, and more than countervails all the calamities and afflictions that can possibly befall us.—Addison.

The breast of a good man is a little heaven commencing on earth; where the Deity sits enthroned with unrivalled influence, every subjugated passion, "like the wind and storm, fulfilling his word."—Colton.

Oh! Conscience! Conscience! Man's most faithful friend,
Him canst thou comfort, ease, relieve, defend:
But if he will thy friendly checks forego,
Thou art, oh! woe for me, his deadliest foe!
—Crabbe.

Conscience is a clock which, in one man, strikes aloud and gives warning; in another, the hand points silently to the figure, but strikes not. Meantime, hours pass away, and death hastens, and after death comes judgment.—Jeremy Taylor.

He that has light within his own clear breast,
May sit i' the centre, and enjoy bright day;
But he that hides a dark soul, and foul thoughts,
Benighted walks under the mid-day sun;
Himself is his own dungeon. —Milton.

To say that we have a clear conscience is to utter a solecism; had we never sinned we should have had no conscience. Were defeat unknown, neither would victory be celebrated by songs of triumph.—Carlyle.

He that loses his conscience has nothing left that is worth keeping. Therefore be sure you look to that, and in the next place look to your health; and if you have it, praise God and value it next to a good conscience.

—Izaak Walton.

A good conscience is a port which is landlocked on every side, where no winds can possibly invade. There a man may not only see his own image, but that of his Maker, clearly reflected from the undisturbed waters.—Dryden.

Be what it may, let the first whisper of the internal monitor be listened to as an oracle, as the still small voice which Elijah heard when he wrapped his face in his mantle, recognizing it to be the voice of God.—Robert Hall.

Conscience is, at once, the sweetest and most troublesome of guests. It is the voice which demanded Abel of his brother, or that celestial harmony which vibrated in the ears of the martyrs, and soothed their sufferings.—Madame Swetchine.

God, in His wrath, has not left this world to the mercy of the subtlest dialectician; and all arguments are happily transitory in their effect when they contradict the primal intuitions of conscience and the inborn sentiments of the heart.—Whipple.

We are born to lose and to perish, to hope and to fear, to vex ourselves and others; and there is no antidote against a common calamity but virtue; for the foundation of true joy is in the conscience.—Seneca.

Oh! I have past a miserable night!
So full of fearful dreams, of ugly sights,
That as I am a Christian faithful man,
I would not spend another such a night,
Though 't were to buy a world of happy days!
—Shakespeare.

No outward tyranny can reach the mind. If conscience plays the tyrant, it would be greatly for the benefit of the world that she were more arbitrary, and far less placable than some men find her.—Junius.

The moral conscience is a truly primitive faculty; it is a particular manner of feeling which corresponds to the goodness of moral actions, as taste is a manner of feeling which corresponds to beauty. Love men, immoderate error.—St. Augustine.

The impulse which directs to right conduct, and deters from crime, is not only older than the ages of nations and cities, but coeval with that Divine Being who sees and rules both heaven and earth.—Cicero.

Who born so poor,
Of intellect so mean, as not to know
What seem'd the best; and knowing not to do?
As not to know what God and conscience bade,
And what they bade not able to obey?
—Pollok.

Not all the glory, all the praise,
That decks the hero's prosperous days,
The shout of men, the laurel crown,
The pealing anthems of renown,
May conscience' dreadful sentence drown.
—Mrs. Holford.

Alas, that we should be so unwilling to listen to the still and holy yearnings of the heart! A god whispers quite softly in our breast, softly yet audibly; telling us what we ought to seek and what to shun.—Goethe.

When Conscience wakens who can with her strive?
Terrors and troubles from a sick soul drive?
Naught so unpitying as the ire of sin,
The inappeasable Nemesis within.
—Abraham Coles.

Be fearful only of thyself; and stand in awe of none more than thine own conscience. There is a Cato in every man; a severe censor of his manners. And he that reverences this judge will seldom do anything he need repent of.—Fuller.

Be mine that silent calm repast,
A conscience cheerful to the last:
That tree which bears immortal fruit,
Without a canker at the root;
That friend which never fails the just,
When other friends desert their trust.
—Dr. Cotton.

Every man, however good he may be, has a yet better man dwelling in him, which is properly himself, but to whom nevertheless he is often unfaithful. It is to this interior and less mutable being that we should attach ourselves, not to the changeable, every-day man.

—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

Conscience is that faculty which perceives right and wrong in actions, approves or disapproves them, anticipates their consequences under the moral administration of God, and is thus either the cause of peace or of disquietude of mind.—Rev. S. Conn, D. D.

'Tis ever thus
With noble minds, if chance they slide to folly;
Remorse stings deeper, and relentless conscience
Pours more gall into the bitter cup
Of their severe repentance. —Mason.

Shall be more sweet than all the joys
Amongst us mortal men.
Then shalt thou find but one refuge
Which comfort can retain;
A guiltless conscience pure and clear
From touch of sinful stain.
—Brandon.

To be satisfied with the acquittal of the world, though accompanied with the secret condemnation of conscience, this is the mark of a little mind; but it requires a soul of no common stamp to be satisfied with its own acquittal, and to despise the condemnation of the world.—Colton.

What a fool is he who locks his door to keep out spirits, who has in his own bosom a spirit he dares not meet alone; whose voice, smothered far down, and piled over with mountains of earthliness, is yet like the fore-warning trumpet of doom!—Mrs. Stowe.

He fears not dying—'tis a deeper fear,—
The thunder-peal cries to his conscience—
"Hear!"
The rushing winds from memory lift the veil,
And in each flash his sins, like spectres pale,
Freed, from their dark abode, his guilty
breast,
Shriek in his startled ear—"Death is not rest!"
—Mrs. Hale.

It is quite certain that, if from childhood men were to begin to follow the first intimations of conscience, honestly to obey them and carry them out into act, the power of conscience would be so strengthened and improved within them, that it would soon become, what it evidently is intended to be, "a connecting principle between the creature and the Creator."—J. C. Shairp.

Give me another horse,—bind up my wounds,
Have mercy, Jesu!—soft;—I did but dream.—
O coward conscience, how dost thou afflict me!—
The lights burn blue.—It is now dead midnight.
Cold fearful drops stand on my fearful flesh.
What do I fear? myself?
—Shakespeare.

What a strange thing an old dead sin laid away in a secret drawer of the soul is? Must it some time or other be moistened with tears, until it comes to life again, and begins to stir in our consciousness, as the dry wheat-animalcule, looking like a grain of dust, becomes alive if it is wet with a drop of water?—Holmes.

A palsy may as well shake an oak, or a fever dry up a fountain, as either of them shake, dry up, or impair the delight of conscience. For it lies within, it centres in the heart, it grows into the very substance of the soul, so that it accompanies a man to his grave; he never outlives it.—South.

Conscience is too great a power in the nature of man to be altogether subdued; it may be for a time repressed and kept dormant; but conjectures there are in human life which awaken it, and when once reawakened, it flashes on the sinner's mind with all the horrors of an invisible ruler and a future judgment.—Blair.

A good conscience fears no weaknesses, but a guilty conscience is solicitous even in solitude. If we do nothing but what is honest, let all the world know it; but if otherwise, what does it signify to have nobody else know it so long as I know it myself? Miserable is he who slights that witness!—Seneca.

Conscience signifies that knowledge which a man hath of his own thoughts and actions; and because, if a man judgeth fairly of his actions by comparing them with the law of God, his mind will approve or condemn him; this knowledge or conscience may be both an accuser and a judge.—Swift.

Conscience is a judge in every man's breast, which none can cheat or corrupt, and perhaps the only incorrupt thing about him; yet, inflexible and honest as this judge is (however polluted the bench on which he sits), no man can, in my opinion, enjoy any applause which is not there adjudged to be his due.—Fielding.

A man's first care should be to avoid the reproaches of his own heart; his next, to escape the censures of the world. If the last interferes with the former, it ought to be entirely neglected; but otherwise there cannot be a greater satisfaction to an honest mind, than to see those approbations which it gives itself seconded by the applause of the public.—Addison.

A Witness.

Consider all thy actions and take heed
On stolen bread, tho' it is sweet to feed.
Sin, like a bee, unto thy hive may bring
A little honey but expect the sting.
Thou may'st conceal thy sin by cunning art,
But conscience sits a witness in thy heart,
Which will disturb thy peace, thy rest undo,
For that is witness, judge, and prison too.
—Watkins.

Were men so enlightened and studious of their own good as to act by the dictates of their reason and reflection, and not the opinion of others, conscience would be the steady ruler of human life, and the words truth, law, reason, equity, and religion could be but synonymous terms for that only guide which makes us pass our days in our own favor and approbation.—Steele.

It is a blushing, shame-faced spirit, that mutinies in a man's bosom; it fills one full of obstacles; it made me once restore a purse of gold that by chance I found; it beggars any man that keeps it; it is turned out of all towns and cities for a dangerous thing; and every man that means to live well endeavors to trust to himself, and live without it.—Shakespeare.

Conscience is justice's best minister; it threatens, promises, rewards, and punishes and keeps all under control; the busy must attend to its remonstrances, the most powerful submit to its reproof, and the angry endure its upbraidings. While conscience is our friend all is peace; but if once offended farewell the tranquil mind.—Mrs. Montagu.

In the wildest anarchy of man's insurgent appetites and sins there is still a reclaiming voice,—a voice which, even when in practice disregarded, it is impossible not to own; and to which, at the very moment that we refuse our obedience, we find that we cannot refuse the homage of what ourselves do feel and acknowledge to be the best, the highest principles of our nature.—Chalmers.

The good or evil we confer on others very often, I believe, recoils on ourselves; for as men of a benign disposition enjoy their own acts of beneficence equally with those to whom they are done, so there are scarce any natures so entirely diabolical as to be capable of doing injuries without paying themselves some pangs for the ruin which they bring on their fellow-creatures.—Fielding.

The most reckless sinner against his own conscience has always in the background the consolation that he will go on in this course only this time, or only so long, but that at such a time he will amend. We may be assured that we do not stand clear with our own consciences so long as we determine or project, or even hold it possible, at some future time to alter our course of action.—Fichte.

As the stag which the huntsman has hit flies through bush and brake, over stock and stone, thereby exhausting his strength but not expelling the deadly bullet from his body; so does experience show that they who have troubled consciences run from place to place, but carry with them wherever they go their dangerous wounds.—Gotthold.

Conscience is the voice of the soul, the passions are the voice of the body. Is it astonishing that often these two languages contradict each other, and then to which must we listen? Too often reason deceives us; we have only too much acquired the right of refusing to listen to it; but conscience never deceives us; it is the true guide of man; it is to man what instinct is to the body, which follows it, obeys nature, and never is afraid of going astray.—Rousseau.

An old historian says about the Roman armies that marched through a country, burning and destroying every living thing, "They make a solitude, and they call it peace." And so men do with their consciences. They stifle them, sear them, forcibly silence them, somehow or other; and then, when there is a dead stillness in the heart, broken by no voice of either approbation or blame, but doleful, like the unnatural quiet of a deserted city, then they say, "It is peace;" and the man's uncontrolled passions and unbridled desires dwell solitary in the fortress of his own spirit! You may almost attain to that.—Alexander Maclaren.

Although there is nothing so bad for conscience as trifling, there is nothing so good for conscience as trifles. Its certain discipline and development are related to the smallest things. Conscience, like gravitation, takes hold of atoms. Nothing is morally indifferent. Conscience must reign in manners as well as morals, in amusements as well as work. He only who is "faithful in that which is least" is dependable in all the world.—Maltbie Babcock.

Consecration

See that you receive Christ with all your heart. As there is nothing in Christ that may be refused, so there is nothing in you from which He must be excluded.—John Flavel.

If you want to live in this world, doing the duty of life, knowing the blessings of it, doing your work heartily, and yet not absorbed by it, remember that the one power whereby you can so act is, that all shall be consecrated to Christ, and done for His sake.—Alexander Maclaren.

Teach us, Master, how to give
All we have and are to Thee;
Grant us, Saviour, while we live,
Wholly, only Thine to be.
—F. R. Havergal.

God consecrates us with His Spirit; whom He adopts, He anoints; whom He makes sons, He makes saints; He doth not only give them a new name, but a new nature. God turns the wolf into a lamb; He makes the heart humble and gracious; He works such a change as if another soul did dwell in the same body.—T. Watson.

Seek to make life henceforth a consecrated thing; that so, when the sunset is nearing, with its murky vapors and lowering skies, the very clouds of sorrow may be fringed with golden light. Thus will the song in the house of your pilgrimage be always the truest harmony. It will be composed of no jarring, discordant notes; but with all its varied tones will form one sustained, life-long melody; dropped for a moment in death, only to be resumed with the angels, and blended with the everlasting cadences of your Father's house.—J. R. Macduff.

Consequences

As thou sowest, so shalt thou reap.
—Cicero.

As the dimensions of the tree are not always regulated by the size of the seed, so the consequences of things are not always proportionate to the apparent magnitude of those events that have produced them.—Colton.

Conservatism

A conservative is a man who will not look at the new moon, out of respect for that "ancient institution," the old one.—Douglas Jerrold.

The conservative may clamor against reform, but he might as well clamor against the centrifugal force. He sighs for the "good old times,"—he might as well wish the oak back into the acorn.—Chapin.

A conservative young man has wound up his life before it was unreeled. We expect old men to be conservative; but when a nation's young men are so, its funeral bell is already rung.—Beecher.

We are reformers in spring and summer; in autumn and winter we stand by the old; reformers in the morning, conservers at night. Reform is affirmative, conservatism negative; conservatism goes for comfort, reform for truth.—Emerson.

Conservatism is a very good thing; but how many conservatives announce principles which might have shocked Dick Turpin, or nonsensicalities flat enough to have raised contempt in Jerry Sneak!—Whipple.

Consideration

That should be maturely considered which can be decided but once.

Consideration, like an angel came
And whipp'd the offending Adam out of him,
Leaving his body as a paradise,
To envelope and contain celestial spirits.
—Shakespeare.

Better it is toward the right conduct of life, to consider what will be the end of a thing, than what is the beginning of it: for what promises fair at first may prove ill, and what seems at first a disadvantage, may prove very advantageous.—Wells.

Consistency

The foible of weak minds.—Emerson.

Without consistency there is no moral strength.—Owen.

Consistency is the bugbear that frightens little minds.—Emerson.

With consistency a great soul has simply nothing to do. He may as well concern himself with his shadow on the wall.—Emerson.

To be rational is so glorious a thing that two-legged creatures generally content themselves with the title.—Locke.

A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds, adored by little statesmen and philosophers and divines.—Emerson.

As flowers always wear their own colors and give forth their own fragrance every day alike, so should Christians maintain their character at all times and under all circumstances.—Beecher.

We feel something like respect for consistency even in error. We lament the virtue that is debauched into a vice; but the vice that affects a virtue becomes the more detestable.—Thomas Paine.

Tush! tush! my lassie, such thoughts resigne,
Comparisons are cruell:
Fine pictures suit in frames as fine,
Consistencie's a jewell.
—Jolly Robyn-Roughhead.

General C. is a drefle smart man:
He's been on all sides that give places or pelf;
But consistency still wuz a part of his plan;
He's been true to one party, and that is, himself;—
So John P. Robinson, he Sez he shall vote for General C.
—Lowell.

Consolation

God has commanded time to console the unhappy.—Joubert.

For grief is crowned with consolation.—Shakespeare.

And empty heads console with empty sound.—Pope.

In a healthy state of the organism all wounds have a tendency to heal.—Madame Swetchine.

For every bad there might be a worse; and when one breaks his leg, let him be thankful it was not his neck.—Bishop Hall.

Consolation heals without contact; somewhat like the blessed air which we need but to breathe.—Madame Swetchine.

Apt words have power to suage the tumors of a troubled mind.—Milton.

If a man makes me keep my distance, the comfort is he keeps his own at the same time.—Swift.

Prosperity is not without many fears and distastes, and Adversity is not without comforts and hopes.—Bacon.

Consolation indiscreetly pressed upon us, when we are suffering undue affliction, only serves to increase our pain, and to render our grief more poignant.—Rousseau.

One should never be very forward in offering spiritual consolations to those in distress. These, to be of any service, must be self-evolved in the first instance.—Coleridge.

All are not taken! there are left behind
Living Beloveds, tender looks to bring,
And make the daylight still a happy thing,
And tender voices, to make soft the wind.
—E. B. Browning.

Whoever can turn his weeping eyes to heaven has lost nothing; for there above is everything he can wish for here below. He only is a loser who persists in looking down on the narrow plains of the present time.—Rich-ter.

Before an affliction is digested, consolation ever comes too soon; and after it is digested, it comes too late; but there is a mark between these two, as fine almost as a hair, for a comforter to take aim at.—Sterne.

Queen Elizabeth, in her hard, wise way, writing to a mother who had lost her son, tells her that she will be comforted in time; and why should she not do for herself what the mere lapse of time will do for her?—Bentley.

Sprinkled along the waste of years
Full many a soft green isle appears:
Pause where we may upon the desert road,
Some shelter is in sight, some sacred safe abode. —Kehle.

As the bosom of earth blooms again and again, having buried out of sight the dead leaves of autumn, and loosed the frosty bands of winter; so does the heart, in spite of all that melancholy poets write, feel many renewed springs and summers. It is a beautiful and a blessed world we live in, and whilst that life lasts, to lose the enjoyment of it is a sin.—A. W. Chambers.

Nothing does so establish the mind amidst the rollings and turbulence of present things, as a look above them and a look beyond them,—above them, to the steady and good hand by which they are ruled; and beyond them, to the sweet and beautiful end to which, by that hand, they will be brought.—Jeremy Taylor.

Conspiracy

Conspiracies no sooner should be formed Than executed. —Addison.

For all things are less dreadful than they seem. —Wordsworth.

Conspiracies

Like thunder-clouds, should in a moment form
And strike, like lightning, ere the sound is heard. —Dowe.

Oh think what anxious moments pass between

The birth of plots, and their last fatal periods;

Oh! 'tis a dreadful interval of time,
Fill'd up with horror, and big with death.
—Addison.

Between the acting of a dreadful thing,
And the first motion, all the interim is
Like a phantasma, or a hideous dream;
The genius and the mortal instruments
Are then in council; and the state of man,
Like to a little kingdom, suffers then
The nature of an insurrection.
—Shakespeare.

O conspiracy!

Shams't thou to show thy dangerous brow
by night,

When evils are most free? O, then by day,
Where wilt thou find a cavern dark enough
To mask thy monstrous visage? Seek none,
conspiracy,

Hide it in smiles and affability:
For if thou put thy native semblance on,
Not Erebus itself were dim enough
To hide thee from prevention.

—Shakespeare.

Constancy

Constancy is a saint without a worshiper.—Boufflers.

Constancy is the complement of all the other human virtues.—Mazzini.

Constancy is the chimera of love.—
Vauvenargues.

Were man but constant, he were perfect.—Shakespeare.

The lasting and crowning privilege of friendship is constancy.—South.

'Tis often constancy to change the mind.—Hoole.

Without constancy, there is neither love, friendship, nor virtue in the world.—Addison.

True constancy no time no power can
move;
He that hath known to change, ne'er knew
to love.

—Gay.

The constancy of the wise is only the art of keeping disquietude to one's self.—Rochefoucauld.

I am constant as the northern star,
of whose true-fixed and resting quality there is no fellow in the firmament.
—Shakespeare.

A good man it is not mine to see;
could I see a man possessed of constancy, that would satisfy me.—Confucius.

The mountain rill
Seeks with no surer flow the far bright sea,
Than my unchang'd affections flow to thee.
—Park Benjamin.

Now from head to foot
I am marble-constant: now the fleeting moon
No planet is of mine. —Shakespeare.

Sooner shall this blue ocean melt to air,
Sooner shall earth resolve itself to sea,
Than I resign thine image, Oh my fair!
Or think of anything, excepting thee.
—Byron.

The love that is kept in the beauty of trust,
Cannot pass like the foam from the seas,
Or a mark that the finger hath trac'd in the dust,
Where 't is swept by the breath of the breeze. —Mrs. Welby.

There are two kinds of constancy in love, one arising from incessantly finding in the loved one fresh objects to love, the other from regarding it as a point of honor to be constant.—La Rochefoucauld.

Out upon it! I have lov'd
Three whole days together;
And am like to love three more,
If it prove fair weather.
—Sir John Suckling.

Changeless march the stars above,
Changeless morn succeeds to even;
And the everlasting hills
Changeless watch the changeless heaven.
—Charles Kingsley.

—I have won
Thy heart, my gentle girl! but it hath been
When that soft eye was on me; and the love
I told beneath the evening influence,
Shall be as constant as its gentle star.
—Willis.

Oh, the heart, that has truly loved, never forgets,
But as truly loves on to the close,
As the sun-flower turns on her god, when he sets,
The same look which she turn'd when he rose. —Moore.

There is nothing but death
Our affections can sever,
And till life's latest breath
Love shall bind us for ever.
—Percival.

Then come the wild weather, come sleet or come snow,
We will stand by each other, however it
blow.
Oppression, and sickness, and sorrow, and
pain
Shall be to our true love as links to the chain. —Longfellow.

Tell him I love him yet,
As in that joyous time;
Tell him I ne'er forget,
Though memory now be crime.
—Praed.

Though youth be past, and beauty fled,
The constant heart its pledge redeems,
Like box, that guards the flowerless bed
And brighter from the contrast seems.
—Mrs. Hale.

Whatever is genuine in social relations endures, despite of time, error, absence, and destiny; and that which has no inherent vitality had better die at once. A great poet has truly declared that constancy is no virtue, but a fact.—Tuckerman.

First shall the heaven's bright lamp forget to shine,
The stars shall from the azur'd sky decline:
First shall the orient with the west shake
hand,
The centre of the world shall cease to
stand:
First wolves shall league with lambs, the dolphins fly,
The lawyer and physician fees deny;
The Thames with Tagus shall exchange her
bed,
My mistress' locks with mine shall first turn red;
First heav'n shall lie below, and hell above,
Ere I inconstant to my Delia prove.
—Howell.

Constitution

A constitution is not a thing in name only, but in fact. It has not an ideal but a real existence, and wherever it cannot be produced in a visible form, there is none. A constitution is a thing antecedent to a government, and a government is only the creature of a constitution. The constitution of a country is not the act of its government, but of a people constituting a government. It is the body of elements to which you refer, and quote article by article, and contains the principles on which the government shall be established—the form in which it shall be organized—the powers it shall have—the mode of elections—the duration of Congress—and, in fine, everything that relates to the complete organization of a civil government, and the principles on which it shall act, and by which it shall be bound. A constitution is to a government, therefore, what the laws made by that government are to a court of judicature. The court of judicature does not make laws, neither can it alter them; it only acts in conformity to the laws made; and the government is in like manner governed by the constitution.—Paine.

Contemplation

The act of contemplation then creates the thing contemplated.—Isaac Disraeli.

In order to improve the mind, we ought less to learn than to contemplate.—Descartes.

There is no lasting pleasure but contemplation; all others grow flat and insipid upon frequent use; and when a man hath run through a set of vanities, in the declension of his age, he knows not what to do with himself, if he cannot think; he saunters about from one dull business to another, to wear out time; and hath no reason to value life but because he is afraid of death.—Burnet.

When holy and devout religious men
Are at their beads, 'tis hard to draw them thence;
So sweet is zealous contemplation.
—Shakespeare.

A contemplative life has more the appearance of a life of piety than any other; but it is the divine plan to bring faith into activity and exercise.—Cecil.

Contempt

Contempt leaves a deeper scar than anger.

Contempt is frequently regulated by fashion.—Zimmermann.

Those only are despicable who fear to be despised.—La Rochefoucauld.

An Englishman fears contempt more than death.—Goldsmith.

O, what a deal of scorn looks beautiful in the contempt and anger of his lip!—Shakespeare.

None but the contemptible are apprehensive of contempt.—Rochefoucauld.

Who can refute a sneer?—Paley.

Contempt is the only way to triumph over calumny.—Madame de Maintenon.

I find my familiarity with thee has bred contempt.—Cervantes.

Contemptuous people are sure to be contemptible.—Chamfort.

Nothing, says Longinus, can be great, the contempt of which is great.—Addison.

You may not despise any man, nor spurn anything.—Rabbi Ben Azai.

Nothing so contemptible as habitual contempt.—E. L. Magoon.

Contempt putteth an edge upon anger more than the hurt itself.—Bacon.

Contempt is a kind of gangrene which, if it seizes one part of a character, corrupts all the rest by degrees.—Johnson.

No man can fall into contempt but those who deserve it.—Johnson.

There is no room in the universe for the least contempt or pride; but only for a gentle and a reverent heart.—James Martineau.

The spirit of contempt is the true spirit of Antichrist; for no other is more directly opposed to Christ.—Henry Giles.

Christ saw much in this world to weep over, and much to pray over; but He saw nothing in it to look upon with contempt.—E. H. Chapin.

I have unlearned contempt; it is a sin that is engendered earliest in the soul, and doth beset it like a poison worm feeding on all its beauty.—Willis.

It is often more necessary to conceal contempt than resentment; the former is never forgiven, but the latter is sometimes forgotten.—Chesterfield.

Speak with contempt of no man. Every one hath a tender sense of reputation. And every man hath a sting, which he may, if provoked too far, dart out at one time or other.—Burton.

He hears

On all sides, from innumerable tongues
A dismal universal hiss, the sound
Of public scorn. —Milton.

He who feels contempt for any living thing hath faculties that he hath never used, and thought with him is in its infancy.—Wordsworth.

If there be no great love in the beginning, yet heaven may decrease it upon better acquaintance, when we are married and have more occasion to know one another; I hope, upon familiarity will grow more contempt.—Shakespeare.

What valor were it, when a cur doth grin, for one to thrust his hand between his teeth, when he might spurn him with his foot away?—Shakespeare.

Contempt is not a thing to be despised. It may be borne with a calm and equal mind, but no man, by lifting his head high, can pretend that he does not perceive the scorns that are poured down on him from above.—Burke.

There is no action in the behavior of one man toward another of which human nature is more impatient than of contempt, it being the undervaluing of a man upon a belief of his utter uselessness and inability.—South.

Ah, there is nothing more beautiful than the difference between the thought about sinful creatures which is natural to a holy being, and the thought about sinful creatures which is natural to a self-righteous being. The one is all contempt; the other, all pity.—Alexander MacLaren.

Wrongs are often forgiven, but contempt never is. Our pride remembers it forever. It implies a discovery of weaknesses, which we are much more careful to conceal than crimes. Many a man will confess his crimes to a common friend, but I never knew a man who would tell his silly weaknesses to his most intimate one.—Chesterfield.

Men are much more unwilling to have their weaknesses and their imperfections known than their crimes; and if you hint to a man that you think him silly, ignorant, or even ill-bred or awkward, he will hate you more and longer than if you tell him plainly that you think him a rogue.—Chesterfield.

Contempt of others is the truest symptom of a base and bad heart.—while it suggests itself to the mean and the vile, and tickles their little fancy on every occasion, it never enters the great and good mind but on the strongest motives; nor is it then a welcome guest,—affording only an uneasy sensation, and bringing always with it a mixture of concern and compassion.—Fielding.

Contempt naturally implies a man's esteeming of himself greater than the person whom he contemns; he therefore that slights, that contemns an affront is properly superior to it; and he conquers an injury who conquers his resentments of it. Socrates, being kicked by an ass, did not think it a revenge proper for Socrates to kick the ass again.—South.

Content — Contentment

The harvest song of inward peace.—Whittier.

Our content is our best having.—Shakespeare.

Contentment opens the source of every joy.—Beattie.

Contentment, parent of delight.—Green.

The noblest mind the best contentment has.—Spenser.

The fewer desires, the more peace.—Thomas Wilson.

Contentment is natural wealth; luxury, artificial poverty.—Socrates.

He is well paid that is well satisfied.—Shakespeare.

Contentment is better than divinations or visions.—Landor.

Contentment, as it is a short road and pleasant, has great delight and little trouble.—Epictetus.

A contented heart is an even sea in the midst of all storms.

Contentment gives a crown where fortune hath denied it.—Ford.

I have learned in whatsoever state I am therewith to be content.—Bible.

Fortify yourself with contentment, for this is an impregnable fortress.—Epictetus.

We only see in a lifetime a dozen faces marked with the peace of a contented spirit.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Mutual content is like a river, which must have its banks on either side.—Le Sage.

Contentment with to-day's lot makes candidacy for a better lot to-morrow.—Charles H. Parkhurst.

The great quality of Dulness is to be unalterably contented with itself.—Thackeray.

O Contentment, make me rich! for without thee there is no wealth.—Saadi.

Show me a thoroughly contented person, and I will show you a useless one.—H. W. Shaw.

Naught is had, all is spent, where our desire is got without content.—Shakespeare.

Without content, we shall find it almost as difficult to please others as ourselves.—Greville.

May I always have a heart superior, with economy suitable, to my fortune.—Shenstone.

Content is to the mind like moss to a tree; it bindeth it up so as to stop its growth.—Halifax.

That is true plenty, not to have, but not to want riches.—St. Chrysostom.

It is right to be contented with what we have, but never with what we are.—Sir James Mackintosh.

He is richest who is content with the least; for content is the wealth of nature.—Socrates.

The rarest feeling that ever lights a human face is the contentment of a loving soul.—Henry Ward Beecher.

A man who finds no satisfaction in himself seeks for it in vain elsewhere.—Rochefoucauld.

He that commends me to mine own content
Commends me to the thing I cannot get.
—Shakespeare.

Unless we find repose within ourselves, it is vain to seek it elsewhere.—Hosea Ballou.

Contentment is, after all, simply refined indolence.—Haliburton.

Contentment consisteth not in adding more fuel, but in taking away some fire.—Fuller.

A mind content both crown and kingdom is.—Robert Greene.

It is not for man to rest in absolute contentment.—Southey.

To be content with little is difficult; to be content with much, impossible.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

When the best things are not possible, the best may be made of those that are.—Hooker.

Let him who has enough ask for nothing more.—Horace.

If you are content, you have enough to live comfortably.—Plautus.

Be happy ye, whose fortunes are already completed.—Virgil.

Learn this of me, where'er thy lot doth fall,
Short lot, or not, to be content with all.
—Herrick.

Content dwells with him, for his mind is fed,
And temperance has driven out unrest.
—Willis.

Each good mind doubles his own free content,
When in another's use they give it vent.
—Sir Giles Goosecap.

Contentment travels rarely with fortune, but follows virtue even in misfortune.—Marie Leszczynski.

Enjoy your own life without comparing it with that of another.—Condorcet.

To be content with what we possess is the greatest and most secure of riches.—Cicero.

Contentment, rosy, dimpled maid,
Thou brightest daughter of the sky.
—Lady Manners.

All things on earth thus change, some up,
some down;
Content's a kingdom, and I wear that crown.
—Heywood.

Lord of himself, though not of lands;
And having nothing, yet hath all.
—Sir Henry Wotton.

A Man he seems of cheerful yesterdays
And confident to-morrows. —Wordsworth.

If we are at peace with God and our own conscience, what enemy among men need we fear?—Hosea Ballou.

There are two sorts of content; one is connected with exertion, the other with habits of indolence. The first is a virtue; the other, a vice.—Mrs. Maria Edgeworth.

To secure a contented spirit, measure your desires by your fortune, and not your fortune by your desires.—Jeremy Taylor.

True contentment depends not upon what we have; a tub was large enough for Diogenes, but a world was too little for Alexander.—C. C. Colton.

I have often said that all the unhappiness of men comes from not knowing how to remain quiet in a chamber.—Pascal.

What is the highest secret of victory and peace? To will what God wills, and strike a league with destiny.—W. R. Alger.

I earn that I eat, get that I wear; owe no man hate, envy no man's happiness; glad of other men's good, content with my harm.—Shakespeare.

Poor and content is rich, and rich enough; but riches, fineless, is as poor as winter to him: that ever fears he shall be poor.—Shakespeare.

Contentment is not happiness. An oyster may be contented. Happiness is compounded of richer elements.—Bovee.

Take the good with the evil, for ye all are the pensioners of God, and none may choose or refuse the cup His wisdom mixeth.—Tupper.

That happy state of mind, so rarely possessed, in which we can say, "I have enough," is the highest attainment of philosophy.—Zimmermann.

He is happy whose circumstances suit his temper; but he is more excellent who can suit his temper to any circumstances.—Hume.

For mine own part, I could be well content To entertain the lag-end of my life With quiet hours. Shakespeare.

Few things are needed to make a wise man happy; nothing can make a fool content; that is why most men are miserable.—La Rochefoucauld.

Content thyself to be obscurely good; When vice prevails, and impious men bear sway, The post of honor is a private station. —Addison.

Let's live with that small pittance which we have; Who covets more is evermore a slave. —Herrick.

Contentment is a pearl of great price and whoever procures it at the expense of ten thousand desires makes a wise and a happy purchase.—Balguy.

I am quite my own master, agreeably lodged, perfectly easy in my circumstances. I am contented with my situation, and happy because I think myself so.—Le Sage.

My God, give me neither poverty nor riches; but whatsoever it may be Thy will to give, give me with it a heart which knows humbly to acquiesce in what is Thy will.—Christian Scriver.

If two angels were sent down from heaven,—one to conduct an empire, and the other to sweep a street,—they would feel no inclination to change employments.—John Newton.

Learn to be pleased with everything, with wealth so far as it makes us beneficial to others; with poverty, for not having much to care for; and with obscurity, for being unenvied.—Plutarch.

The highest point outward things can bring unto, is the contentment of the mind; with which no estate can be poor, without which all estates will be miserable.—Sir P. Sidney.

There is some help for all the defects of fortune; for, if a man cannot attain to the length of his wishes, he may have his remedy by cutting off them shorter.—Cowley.

None is poor but the mean in mind, the timorous, the weak, and unbelieving; none is wealthy but the affluent in soul, who is satisfied and floweth over.—Tupper.

Happy the heart to whom God has given enough strength and courage to suffer for Him, to find happiness in simplicity and the happiness of others. —Lavater.

One who is contented with what he has done will never become famous for what he will do. He has lain down to die. The grass is already growing over him.—Bovee.

"What you demand is here, or at Ulubraë." You traverse the world in search of happiness, which is within the reach of every man; a contented mind confers it on all.—Horace.

We can console ourselves for not having great talents as we console ourselves for not having great places. We can be above both in our hearts.—Vauvenargues.

Alas! if the principles of contentment are not within us, the height of station and worldly grandeur will as soon add a cubit to a man's stature as to his happiness.—Sterne.

My crown is in my heart, not on my head;
Not deck'd with diamonds, and Indian stones,
Nor to be seen: my crown is call'd content;
A crown it is that seldom kings enjoy.
—Shakespeare.

What happiness the rural maid attends,
In cheerful labor while each day she spends!
She gratefully receives what Heav'n has sent,
And, rich in poverty, enjoys content.
—Gay.

I do not think that the road to contentment lies in despising what we have not got. Let us acknowledge all good, all delight that the world holds, and be content without it.—George MacDonald.

It is not by change of circumstances, but by fitting our spirits to the circumstances in which God has placed us, that we can be reconciled to life and duty.—F. W. Robertson.

An elegant Sufficiency, Content,
Retirement, rural Quiet, Friendship, Books,
Ease and alternate Labor, useful Life,
Progressive Virtue, and approving Heaven!
—Thomson.

Dear little head, that lies in calm content
Within the gracious hollow that God made
In every human shoulder, where He meant
Some tired head for comfort should be laid.
—Celia Thaxter.

I swear, 't is better to be lowly born,
And range with humble lives in content,
Than to be perk'd up in a glistening grief,
And wear a golden sorrow.
—Shakespeare.

He, fairly looking into life's account,
Saw frowns and favours were of like amount;
And viewing all—his perils, prospects, purse,
He said, "content;—'t is well it is no worse."
—Crabbe.

Contentment furnishes constant joy. Much covetousness, constant grief. To the contented, even poverty is joy. To the discontented, even wealth is a vexation.—Ming Sum Pauu Keën.

We shall be made truly wise if we be made content; content, too, not only with what we can understand, but content with what we do not understand,—the habit of mind which theologians call, and rightly, faith in God.—Charles Kingsley.

Yes! in the poor man's garden grow
Far more than herbs and flowers,
Kind thoughts, contentment, peace of mind,
And joy for weary hours.
—Mary Howitt.

This is the charm, by sages often told,
Converting all it touches into gold:
Content can soothe, where'er by fortune placed,
Can rear a garden in the desert waste.
—Henry Kirke White.

I would do what I pleased; and, doing what I pleased, I should have my will; and, having my will, I should be contented; and, content, there is no more to be desired; and when there is no more to desire, there is an end of it.—Cervantes.

Content is the best opulence, because it is the pleasantest, and the surest. The richest man is he who does not want that which is wanting to him; the poorest is the miser, who wants that which he has.—Paul Chatfield, M. D.

The chief secret of comfort lies in not suffering trifles to vex us, and in prudently cultivating our undergrowth of small pleasures, since very few great ones, alas! are let on long leases.—Sharp.

Every one is well or ill at ease, according as he finds himself! not he whom the world believes, but he who believes himself to be so, is content; and in him alone belief gives itself being and reality.—Montaigne.

It conduces much to our content if we pass by those things which happen to our trouble, and consider that which is pleasing and prosperous; that by the representation of the better the worse may be blotted out.—Jeremy Taylor.

If we will take the good we find, asking no questions, we shall have heaping measures. The great gifts are not got by analysis. Everything good is on the highway. The middle region of our being is the temperate zone.—Emerson.

Contentment produces, in some measure, all those effects which the alchemist usually ascribes to what he calls the philosopher's stone; and if it does not bring riches, it does the same thing by banishing the desire for them.—Addison.

A contented mind is the greatest blessing a man can enjoy in this world; and if in the present life his happiness arises from the subduing of his desires, it will arise in the next from the gratification of them.—Addison.

Seeming contentment is real discontent, combined with indolence or self-indulgence, which, while taking no legitimate means of raising itself, delights in bringing others down to its own level.—Mill.

With the civilized man contentment is a myth. From the cradle to the grave he is forever longing and striving after something better, an indefinable something, some new object yet unattained.—Wm. Matthews.

Happy the life, that in a peaceful stream, Obscure, unnoticed through the vale has flow'd;
The heart that ne'er was charm'd by fortune's gleam
Is ever sweet contentment's blest abode.
—Percival.

He that troubles not himself with anxious thoughts for more than is necessary, lives little less than the life of angels, whilst by a mind content with little, he imitates their want of nothing.—Cave.

O calm, hush'd, rich content,
Is there a being, blessedness, without thee?
How soft thou down'st the couch where thou
dost rest,
Nectar to life thou sweet ambrosian feast.
—Marston.

That man lives happy and in command of himself, who from day to day can say I have lived. Whether clouds obscure, or the sun illumines the following day, that which is past is beyond recall.—Horace.

Since every man who lives is born to die,
And none can boast sincere felicity,
With equal mind what happens let us bear,
Nor grieve too-much for things beyond our
care.
Like pilgrims, to th' appointed place we tend;
The world's an inn, and death the journey's end.
—Dryden.

The point of aim for our vigilance to hold in view is to dwell upon the brightest parts in every prospect, to call off the thoughts when running upon disagreeable objects, and strive to be pleased with the present circumstances surrounding us.—Rev. J. Tucker.

A sense of contentment makes us kindly and benevolent to others; we are not chafed and galled by cares which are tyrannical because original. We are fulfilling our proper destiny, and those around us feel the sunshine of our own hearts.—Bulwer-Lytton.

With more of thanks and less of thought,
I strive to make my matters meet;
To seek what ancient sages sought,
Physic and food in sour and sweet,
To take what passes in good part,
And keep the hiccups from the heart.
—John Byrom.

We'll therefore relish with content,
Whate'er kind Providence has sent,
Nor aim beyond our pow'r;
For, if our stock be very small,
'Tis prudent to enjoy it all,
Nor lose the present hour.
—Nathaniel Cotton.

A voice of greeting from the wind was sent,
The mists enfolded me with soft white arms,
The birds did sing to lap me in content,
The rivers wove their charms,
And every little daisy in the grass
Did look up in my face, and smile to see me pass.
—R. H. Stoddard.

What tho' we quit all glittering pomp and greatness,
The busy noisy flattery of courts,
We should enjoy content, in that alone
Is greatness, power, wealth, honour, all summ'd up.
—Powell.

We cannot be young twice; we cannot turn upon our steps, and go back to gather the garlands we gathered ten years ago. And, therefore, with a gaze over on the cross upon the distant hills, and a remembrance always of the shadow land that lies beyond, let us endeavor to be contented with small things, and to make ourselves happy in the pleasantness of simple pleasures.—Holme Lee.

I press to bear no haughty sway;
I wish no more than may suffice:
I do no more than well I may,
Look what I lack, my mind supplies;
Lo, thus I triumph like a king,
My mind's content with anything.

—Byrd.

There is a jewel which no Indian mine can buy,
No chemic art can counterfeit;
It makes men rich in greatest poverty,
Makes water wine, turns wooden cups to gold,
The homely whistle to sweet music's strain;
Seldom it comes, to few from heaven sent,
That much in little—all in naught—content.
—Wilbye.

Think'st thou the man whose mansions hold
The wordling's pomp and miser's gold,
Obtains a richer prize
Than he who, in his cot at rest,
Finds heavenly peace a willing guest,
And bears the promise in his breast
Of treasure in the skies?

—Mrs. Sigourney.

I say to thee be thou satisfied. It is recorded of the hares that with a general consent they went to drown themselves out of a feeling of their misery; but when they saw a company of frogs more fearful than they were, they began to take courage and comfort again. Confer thine estate with others.—Burton.

Sweet are the thoughts that savour of content;
The quiet mind is richer than a crown;
Sweet are the nights in careless slumber spent;
The poor estate scorns fortune's angry frown;
Such sweet content, such minds, such sleep,
Such bliss,
Beggars enjoy, when princes oft do miss.
—Robert Greene.

For no chance is evil to him who is content, and to a man nothing is miserable unless it is unreasonable. No man can make another man to be his slave unless he hath first enslaved himself to life and death. No pleasure or pain, to hope or fear; command these passions, and you are freer than the Parthian kings.—Jeremy Taylor.

Happy the man, of mortals happiest he,
Whose quiet mind from vain desires is free;
Whom neither hopes deceive, nor fears torment.

But lives at peace, within himself content;
In thought, or act, accountable to none
But to himself, and to the gods alone.

—Geo. Granville.

If men knew what felicity dwells in the cottage of a godly man, how sound he sleeps, how quiet his rest, how composed his mind, how free from care, how easy his position, how moist his mouth, how joyful his heart, they would never admire the noises, the diseases, the throngs of passions, and the violence of unnatural appetites that fill the house of the luxurious and the heart of the ambitious.—Jeremy Taylor.

Lo now, from idle wishes clear,
I make the good I may not find;
Adown the stream I gently steer,
And shift my sail with every wind.
And half by nature, half by reason,
Can still with pliant heart prepare,
The mind, attuned to every season,
The merry heart that laughs at care.
—H. M. Milman.

In Paris a queer little man you may see,
A little man all in gray;
Rosy and round as an apple is he,
Content with the present whate'er it may be,
While from care and from cash he is equally free,
And merry both night and day!
"Ma foi! I laugh at the world," says he,
"I laugh at the world, and the world laughs at me!"
What a gay little man in gray.
—Beranger.

Contentment is not satisfaction
It is the grateful, faithful, fruitful use of what we have, little or much. It is to take the cup of Providence, and call upon the name of the Lord. What the cup contains is its contents. To get all there is in the cup is the act and art of contentment. Not to drink because one has but half a cup, or because one does not like its flavor, or because some one else has silver to one's own glass, is to lose the contents; and that is the penalty, if not the meaning of discount. No one is discontented who employs and enjoys to the utmost what he has. It is high philosophy to say, we can have just what we like, if we like what we have; but this much at least can be done, and this is contentment,—to have the most and best in life, by making the most and best of what we have.—Maltbie Babcock.

To be contented,—what, indeed, is it? Is it not to be satisfied,—to hope for nothing, to aspire to nothing, to strive for nothing,—in short to rest in inglorious ease, doing nothing for your country, for your own or others' material, intellectual, or moral improvement, satisfied with the condition in which you or they are placed? Such a state of feeling may do very well where nature has fixed an inseparable and ascertained barrier,—a "thus far shalt thou go and no farther,"—to our wishes, or where we are troubled by ills past remedy. In such cases it is the highest philosophy not to fret or grumble, when, by all our worrying and self-teasing, we cannot help ourselves a jot or tittle, but only aggravate and intensify an affliction that is incurable. To soothe the mind down into patience is then the only resource left us, and happy is he who has schooled himself thus to meet all reverses and disappointments. But in the ordinary circumstances of life this boasted virtue of contentment, so far from being laudable, would be an evil of the first magnitude. It would be, in fact, nothing less than a triggering of the wheels of all enterprise,—a cry of "Stand still!" to the progress of the whole social world.—Wm. Matthews.

Contention

In excessive altercation, truth is lost.—Syrus.

Religious contention is the devil's harvest.—La Fontaine.

Great contests generally excite great animosities.—Livy.

He that wrestles with us strengthens our nerves, and sharpens our skill. Our antagonist is our helper.—Burke.

Contention is a hydra's head; the more they strive the more they may: and as Praxiteles did by his glass, when he saw a scurvy face in it, brake it in pieces: but for that one he saw many more as bad in a moment.—Burton.

When two discourse, if the one's anger rise,
The man who lets the contest fall is wise.—Plutarch.

Contentions fierce,
Ardent, and dire, spring from no petty cause.—Scott.

Great contest follows, and much learned dust
Involves the combatants; each claiming truth,
And truth disclaiming both.—Cowper.

A quarrel is quickly settled when deserted by one party: there is no battle unless there be two.—Seneca.

Birds in their little nests agree:
And 'tis a shameful sight,
When children of one family
Fall out, and chide, and fight.
—Isaac Watts.

Contention, like a horse
Full of high feeding, madly hath broke loose,
And bears down all before him.
—Shakespeare.

Even as a broken mirror, which the glass
In every fragment multiplies, and makes A thousand images of one that was
The same, and still the more, the more it breaks.
—Byron.

Some say, compared to Bononcini,
That Mynheer Handel's but a ninny;
Others aver,—that he to Handel
Is scarcely fit to hold a candle:
Strange all this difference should be,
'Twixt tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee?
—John Byrom.

Thus when a barber and collier fight,
The barber beats the luckless collier—white;
The dusty collier heaves his ponderous sack,
And, big with vengeance, beats the barber—black.
In comes the brick-dust man, with grime o'erspread,
And beats the collier and the barber—red;
Black, red, and white, in various clouds are toss'd,
And in the dust they raise the combatants are lost.
—Christopher Smart.

Contradiction

We must not contradict, but instruct him that contradicts us; for a madman is not cured by another running mad also.—Antisthenes.

Contrast

Shadow owes its birth to light.—Gay.

Nature hath meal and bran, contempt and grace.—Shakespeare.

The rose and the thorn, sorrow and gladness, are linked together.—Saadi.

Where there is much light the shadow is deep.—Goethe.

Do not speak of your happiness to a man less fortunate than yourself.—Plutarch.

A learned man is a tank; a wise man is a spring.—W. R. Alger.

The coldest bodies warm with opposition, the hardest sparkle in collision.—Junius.

Look here, upon this picture, and on this, The counterfeit presentment of two brothers. —Shakespeare.

The superiority of some men is merely local. They are great because their associates are little.—Johnson.

Some people with great merit are very disgusting; others with great faults are very pleasing.—Rochefoucauld.

Strange as it may seem, the most ludicrous lines I ever wrote have been written in the saddest mood.—Cowper.

The presence of the wretched is a burden to the happy; and alas! the happy still more so to the wretched.—Goethe.

Those that are good manners at the court are as ridiculous in the country as the behavior of the country is most mockable at the court.—Shakespeare.

Is the jay more precious than the lark because his feathers are more beautiful? Or is the adder better than the eel because his painted skin contents the eye?—Shakespeare.

The good often sigh more over little faults than the wicked over great. Hence an old proverb, that the stain appears greater according to the brilliancy of what it touches.—Palmieri.

Cruel men are the greatest lovers of mercy, avaricious men of generosity, and proud men of humility; that is to say, in others, not in themselves.—Colton.

Men and statues that are admired in an elevated situation have a very different effect upon us when we approach them; the first appear less than we imagined them, the last bigger.—Lord Greville.

By Heaven! upon the same man, as upon a vine-planted mount, there grow more kinds of wine than one; on the south side something little worse than nectar, on the north side something little better than vinegar.—Richter.

If there be light, then there is darkness; if cold, then heat; if height, depth also; if solid, then fluid; hardness and softness, roughness and smoothness, calm and tempest, prosperity and adversity, life and death.—Pythagoras.

As the rose-tree is composed of the sweetest flowers and the sharpest thorns,—as the heavens are sometimes overcast, alternately tempestuous and serene; so is the life of man intermingled with hopes and fears, with joy and sorrows, with pleasure and with pains.—Burton.

All things are double, one against another. Good is set against evil, and life against death; so is the godly against the sinner, and the sinner against the godly. Look upon all the works of the Most High, and there are two and two, one against another.—Bible.

Joy and grief are never far apart. In the same street the shutters of one house are closed, while the curtains of the next are brushed by shadow.

of the dance. A wedding-party returns from church, and a funeral winds to its door. The smiles and the sadness of life are the tragi-comedy of Shakespeare. Gladness and sighs brighten and dim the mirror he beholds.—Willmott.

Controversy

Where violence reigns, reason is weak.—Chamfort.

Fierceness makes error a fault and truth discourtesy.—George Herbert.

He who is not open to conviction is not qualified for discussion.—Whately.

Wise men argue causes, and fools decide them.—Anacharsis.

All disputation makes the mind deaf; and when people are deaf, I am dumb.—Joubert.

To think everything disputable is a proof of a weak mind and captious temper.—Beattie.

Controversy, though always an evil in itself, is sometimes a necessary evil.—Whately.

No great advance has ever been made in science, politics, or religion, without controversy.—Lyman Beecher.

When men differ in any matter of belief, let them meet each other manfully.—F. Wayland.

Doubtless there are times when controversy becomes a necessary evil. But let us remember that it is an evil.—Dean Stanley.

Disputation carries away the mind from that calm and sedate temper which is so necessary to contemplate truth.—Dr. Watts.

The precipitancy of disputation, and the stir and noise of passions that usually attend it, must needs be prejudicial to verity.—Glanvill.

There is no dispute managed without passion, and yet there is scarce a dispute worth a passion.—Sherlock.

It is very unfair in any writer to employ ignorance and malice together, because it gives his answerer double work.—Swift.

If a cause be good, the most violent attack of its enemies will not injure it so much as an injudicious defence of it by its friends.—Colton.

It is humbling to mankind to contemplate men capable of grasping eternal truths, fencing and debating in trivialities, like gladiators fighting with flies.—M. Nisard.

Suspense of judgment and exercise of charity were safer and seemlier for Christian men than the hot pursuit of these controversies.—Hooker.

However some may affect to dislike controversy, it can never be of ultimate disadvantage to the interests of truth or the happiness of mankind.—Robert Hall.

It is almost always the unhappiness of a victorious disputant to destroy his own authority by claiming too many consequences, or diffusing his proposition to an indefensible extent.—Dr. Johnson.

He could raise scruples dark and nice,
And after solve 'em in a trice;
As if divinity had catch'd
The itch on purpose to be scratch'd.
—Butler.

Men of many words sometimes argue for the sake of talking; men of ready tongues frequently dispute for the sake of victory; men in public life often debate for the sake of opposing the ruling party, or from any other motive than the love of truth.—Crabbe.

When civil dudgeon first grew high,
And men fell out, they knew not why;
When hard words, jealousies, and fears
Set folk together by the ears,
And made them fight, like mad or drunk,
For dame Religion, as for punk.
—Butler.

What Tully said of war may be applied to disputing: "It should be always so managed as to remember that the only true end of it is peace." But generally true disputants are like true sportsmen,—their whole delight is in the pursuit; and the disputant no more cares for the truth than the sportsman for the hare.—Pope.

There is no learned man but will confess he hath much profited by reading controversies,—his senses awakened, his judgment sharpened, and the truth which he holds firmly established. If then it be profitable for him to read, why should it not at least be tolerable and free for his adversary to write? In logic they teach that contraries laid together, more evidently appear; it follows then, that all controversy being permitted, falsehood will appear more false, and truth the more true; which must needs conduce much to the general confirmation of an implicit truth.—Milton.

We are more inclined to hate one another for points on which we differ, than to love one another for points on which we agree. The reason perhaps is this: when we find others that agree with us, we seldom trouble ourselves to confirm that agreement; but when we chance on those who differ from us, we are zealous both to convince and to convert them. Our pride is hurt by the failure, and disappointed pride engenders hatred.—Colton.

Conversation

The soul of conversation is sympathy.—Hazlitt.

Unconstraint is the grace of conversation.—Dr. Johnson.

Silence is one great art of conversation.—Hazlitt.

The less men think, the more they talk.—Montesquieu.

Many can argue, not many converse.—A. Bronson Alcott.

Conversation is a game of circles.—Emerson.

All men, well interrogated, answer well.—Plato.

Debate is masculine; conversation is feminine.—A. Bronson Alcott.

With thee conversing I forget the way.—Gay.

With thee conversing I forget all time.—Milton.

Repose is as necessary in conversation as in a picture.—Hazlitt.

Be silent always, when you doubt your sense,
And speak, tho' sure, with seeming diffidence.—Pope.

The best of life is conversation.—Emerson.

Discourse, the sweeter banquet of the mind.—Homer.

The secret of tiring is to say everything that can be said on the subject.—Voltaire.

Conceit causes more conversation than wit.—La Rochefoucauld.

Conversation is an abandonment to ideas, a surrender to persons.—A. Bronson Alcott.

Conversation is the vent of character as well as of thought.—Emerson.

Reasonable men are the best dictionaries of conversation.—Goethe.

Conversation is the laboratory and workshop of the student.—Emerson.

Conversation is an art in which a man has all mankind for competitors.—Emerson.

Conversation enriches the understanding, but solitude is the school of genius.—Gilbon.

His conversation does not show the minute hand; but he strikes the hour very correctly.—Sam'l Johnson.

Speak little and well, if you wish to be considered as possessing merit.—From the French.

Good discourse sinks differences and seeks agreements.—A. Bronson Alcott.

It is good to rub and polish our brain against that of others.—Montaigne.

Egotists cannot converse, they talk to themselves only.—A. Bronson Alcott.

In conversation avoid the extremes of forwardness and reserve.—Cato.

Form'd by thy converse, happily to steer
From grave to gay, from lively to severe.
—Pope.

Conversation, which, when it is best, is a series of intoxications.—Emerson.

Questioning is not the mode of conversation among gentlemen.—Sam'l Johnson.

A great thing is a great book, but greater than all is the talk of a great man.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

While we converse with her, we mark
No want of day, nor think it dark.
—Waller.

The first ingredient in conversation is truth, the next good sense, the third good humor, and the fourth wit.—Sir W. Temple.

In the sallies of badinage a polite fool shines; but in gravity he is as awkward as an elephant disporting.—Zimmermann.

The perfection of conversational intercourse is when the breeding of high life is animated by the fervor of genius.—Leigh Hunt.

There is no arena in which vanity displays itself under such a variety of forms as in conversation.—Pascal.

One of the first observations to make in conversation is the state, or the character, and the education of the person to whom we speak.—Madame Necker.

It is by speech that many of our best gains are made. A large part of the good we receive comes to us in conversation.—Washington Gladden.

Our companions please us less from the charms we find in their conversation than from those they find in ours.—Lord Greville.

Amongst such as out of cunning hear all and talk little, be sure to talk less; or if you must talk, say little.—La Bruyère.

There are three things in speech that ought to be considered before some things are spoken—the manner, the place and the time.—Southey.

Topics of conversation among the multitude are generally persons, sometimes things, scarcely ever principles.—W. B. Clulow.

Not only to say the right thing in the right place, but, far more difficult still, to leave unsaid the wrong thing at the tempting moment.—G. A. Sala.

The perfection of conversation is not to play a regular sonata, but, like the Æolian harp, to await the inspiration of the passing breeze.—Burke.

A single conversation across the table with a wise man is better than ten years' study of books.—Longfellow.

The art of conversation is to be prompt without being stubborn, to refute without argument, and to clothe great matters in a motley garb.—Beaconsfield.

As it is the characteristic of great wits to say much in few words, so it is of small wits to talk much and say nothing.—Rochefoucauld.

Method is not less requisite in ordinary conversation than in writing, provided a man would talk to make himself understood.—Addison.

Debate is angular, conversation circular and radiant of the underlying unity.—A. Bronson Alcott.

The extreme pleasure we take in talking of ourselves should make us fear that we give very little to those who listen to us.—La Rochefoucauld.

Conversation stock being a joint and common property, every one should take a share in it; and yet there may be societies in which silence will be our best contribution.—Paul Chatfield, M. D.

The fool only is troublesome. A man of sense perceives when he is agreeable or tiresome; he disappears the very minute before he would have been thought to have stayed too long.—La Bruyère.

The great charm of conversation consists less in the display of one's own wit and intelligence than in the power to draw forth the resources of others.—Bruyère.

You must originate, and you must sympathize; you must possess, at the same time, the habit of communicating and the habit of listening. The union is rather rare, but irresistible.—Beaconsfield.

No one will ever shine in conversation who thinks of saying fine things; to please, one must say many things indifferent, and many very bad.—Francis Lockier.

He who sedulously attends, pointedly asks, calmly speaks, coolly answers, and ceases when he has no more to say, is in possession of some of the best requisites of man.—Lavater.

Never hold any one by the button or the hand in order to be heard out; for if people are unwilling to hear you, you had better hold your tongue than them.—Chesterfield.

Conversation is interesting in proportion to the originality of the central ideas which serve as pivots, and the fitness of the little facts and observations which are communicated by the talkers.—Hamerton.

A dearth of words a woman need not fear; But 'tis a task indeed to learn to hear: In that the skill of conversation lies; That shows or makes you both polite and wise.
—Young.

Conversation never sits easier upon us than when we now and then discharge ourselves in a symphony of laughter, which may not improperly be called the chorus of conversation.—Steele.

In conversation, humor is more than wit, easiness more than knowledge; few desire to learn, or think they need it; all desire to be pleased, or, at least, to be easy.—Sir W. Temple.

Those who speak always and those who never speak are equally unfit for friendship. A good proportion of the talent of listening and speaking is the base of social virtues.—Lavater.

The fullest instruction, and the fullest enjoyment are never derived from books, till we have ventilated the ideas thus obtained, in free and easy chat with others.—Wm. Matthews.

They would talk of nothing but high life and high-lived company, with other fashionable topics, such as pictures, taste, Shakespeare, and the musical glasses.—Goldsmith.

Conversation should be pleasant without scurrility, witty without affectation, free without indecency, learned without conceitedness, novel without falsehood.—Shakespeare.

To speak well supposes a habit of attention which shows itself in the thought; by language we learn to think, and above all to develop thought.—Bonstetten.

Men of great conversational powers almost universally practice a sort of lively sophistry and exaggeration which deceives for the moment both themselves and their auditors.—Macaulay.

But conversation, choose what theme we may,
And chiefly when religion leads the way,
Should flow, like waters after summer show'rs,
Not as if raised by mere mechanic powers.
—Cowper.

In private conversation between intimate friends, the wisest men very often talk like the weakest; for indeed the talking with a friend is nothing else but thinking aloud.—Addison

There is nothing by which a man exasperates most people more than by displaying a superior ability or brilliancy in conversation. They seem pleased at the time, but their envy makes them curse him at their hearts.—Johnson.

I never, with important air,
In conversation overbear.

My tongue within my lips I rein;
For who talks much must talk in vain.
—Gay.

If it were not for respect for human opinions, I would not open my window to see the Bay of Naples for the first time, whilst I would go five hundred leagues to talk with a man of genius whom I had not seen.—Mme. de Staël.

One of the best rules in conversation is, never say a thing which any of the company can reasonably wish we had rather left unsaid. Let the sage reflections of these philosophic minds be cherished.—Swift.

If conversation be an art, like painting, sculpture, and literature, it owes its most powerful charm to nature; and the least shade of formality or artifice destroys the effect of the best collection of words.—Tuckerman.

The secret of pleasing in conversation is not to explain too much everything; to say them half and leave a little for divination is a mark of the good opinion we have of others, and nothing flatters their self-love more.—Rochefoucauld.

One thing which makes us find so few people who appear reasonable and agreeable in conversation is, that there is scarcely any one who does not think more of what he is about to say than of answering precisely what is said to him.—La Rochefoucauld.

Silence is one great art of conversation. He is not a fool who knows when to hold his tongue; and a person may gain credit for sense, eloquence, wit, who merely says nothing to lessen the opinion which others have of these qualities in themselves.—Hazlitt.

Jeffrey, in conversation, was like a skilful swordsman flourishing his weapon in the air; while Mackintosh, with a thin sharp rapier, in the middle of his evolutions, ran him through the body.—Sir A. Alison.

Among the arts of conversation no one pleases more than mutual deference or civility, which leads us to resign our own inclinations to those of our companions, and to curb and conceal that presumption and arrogance so natural to the human mind.—Hume.

The great secret of succeeding in conversation is to admire little, to hear much; always to distrust our own reason, and sometimes that of our friends; never to pretend to wit, but to make that of others appear as much as possibly we can; to hearken to what is said, and to answer to the purpose.—Benjamin Franklin.

It is given to few persons to keep this secret well. Those who lay down rules too often break them, and the safest we are able to give is to listen much, to speak little, and to say nothing that will ever give ground for regret.—La Rochefoucauld.

When we are in the company of sensible men, we ought to be doubly cautious of talking too much, lest we lose two good things, their good opinion and our own improvement; for what we have to say we know, but what they have to say we know not.—Colton.

Some men are very entertaining for a first interview, but after that they are exhausted, and run out; on a second meeting we shall find them flat and monotonous; like hand-organs, we have heard all their tunes.—Colton.

Abstruse and mystic thoughts you must express with painful care, but seeming easiness.—Wentworth Dillon.

It is a secret known but to few, yet of no small use in the conduct of life, that when you fall into a man's conversation, the first thing you should consider is, whether he has a greater inclination to hear you, or that you should hear him.—Steele.

There is nothing so delightful as the hearing, or the speaking of truth. For this reason, there is no conversation so agreeable as that of the man of integrity, who hears without any intention to betray, and speaks without any intention to deceive.—Plato.

These high wild hills and rough uneven ways,

Draw out our miles and make them wearisome;

And yet your fair discourse hath been as sugar,

Making the hard way sweet and delectable.
—Shakespeare

Conversation opens our views, and gives our faculties a more vigorous play; it puts us upon turning our notions on every side, and holds them up to a light that discovers those latent flaws which would probably have lain concealed in the gloom of unagitated abstraction.—Melmoth.

The tone of good conversation is brilliant and natural; it is neither tedious nor frivolous; it is instructive without pedantry, gay without tumultuousness, polished without affectation, gallant without insipidity, waggish without equivocation.—Rousseau.

He is so full of pleasant anecdote;
So rich, so gay, so poignant in his wit,
Time vanishes before him as he speaks,
And ruddy morning through the lattice peeps
Ere night seems well begun.

—Joanna Baillie.

Wise, cultivated, genial conversation is the last flower of civilization, and the best result which life has to offer us,—a cup for gods, which has no repentance. Conversation is our account of ourselves. All we have, all we can, all we know, is brought into play, and as the reproduction in finer form, of all our havings.—Emerson.

Discretion of speech is more than eloquence; and to speak agreeably to him with whom we deal, is more than to speak in good words or in good order. A good continued speech, without a good speech of interlocution, shows slowness; and a good reply, or second speech, without a good settled speech, sheweth shallowness and weakness.—Bacon.

One would think that the larger the company is in which we are engaged, the greater variety of thoughts and subjects would be started into discourse; but, instead of this we find that conversation is never so much straightened and confined, as in numerous assemblies.—Addison.

With good and gentle-humored hearts

I choose to chat where'er I come

Whate'er the subject be that starts.

But if I get among the glum

I hold my tongue to tell the truth

And keep my breath to cool my broth.

—John Byron.

There is a sort of knowledge beyond the power of learning to bestow, and this is to be had in conversation; so necessary is this to the understanding the characters of men, that none are more ignorant of them than those learned pedants whose lives have been entirely consumed in colleges and among books; for however exquisitely human nature may have been described by writers the true practical system can be learned only in the world.—Fielding.

In my whole life I have only known ten or twelve persons with whom it was pleasant to speak,—i. e., who keep to the subject, do not repeat themselves, and do not talk of themselves; men who do not listen to their own voice, who are cultivated enough not to lose themselves in commonplaces, and, lastly, who possess tact and good taste enough not to elevate their own persons above their subjects, —Metternich.

There is speaking well, speaking easily, speaking justly and speaking seasonably: It is offending against the last, to speak of entertainments before the indigent; of sound limbs and health before the infirm; of houses and lands before one who has not so much as a dwelling; in a word, to speak of your prosperity before the miserable; this conversation is cruel, and the comparison which naturally arises in them betwixt their condition and yours is excruciating.—La Bruyère.

One could take down a book from a shelf ten times more wise and witty than almost any man's conversation. Bacon is wiser, Swift more humorous, than any person one is likely to meet with; but they cannot chime in with the exact frame of thought in which we happen to take them down from our shelves. Therein lies the luxury of conversation; and when a living speaker does not yield us that luxury, he becomes only a book on two legs.—Campbell.

Solitary reading will enable a man to stuff himself with information; but, without conversation, his mind will become like a pond without an outlet—a mass of unhealthy stagnature. It is not enough to harvest knowledge by study; the wind of talk must winnow it, and blow away the chaff; then will the clear, bright grains of wisdom be garnered, for our own use or that of others.—Wm. Matthews.

The progress of a private conversation betwixt two persons of different sexes is often decisive of their fate, and gives it a turn very distinct perhaps from what they themselves anticipated. Gallantry becomes mingled with conversation, and affection and passion come gradually to mix with gallantry. Nobles, as well as shepherd swains, will, in such a trying moment, say more than they intended; and queens, like village maidens, will listen longer than they should.—Walter Scott.

Conversation is the music of the mind, an intellectual orchestra, where all the instruments should bear a part, but where none should play together. Each of the performers should have a just appreciation of his own powers, otherwise an unskilful novice who might usurp the first fiddle, would infallibly get into a scrape. To prevent these mistakes, a good master of the band will be very particular in the assortment of the performers; if too dissimilar, there will be no harmony, if too few, there will be no variety; and if too numerous, there will be no order, for the presumption of one prater, might silence the eloquence of a Burke, or the wit of a Sheridan, as a single kettle-drum would drown the finest solo of a Gionowich or a Jordini.—Colton.

He that questioneth much shall learn much, and content much; but especially if he apply his questions to the skill of the persons whom he asketh; for he shall give them occasion to please themselves in speaking, and himself shall continually gather knowledge; but let his questions not be troublesome, for that is fit for a poser; and let him be sure to leave other men their turn to speak; nay, if there be any that would reign and take up all the time, let them find means to take them off, and bring others on,—as musicians used to do with those that dance too long galliards. If you dissemble sometimes your knowledge of that you are thought to know, you shall be thought, another time, to know that you know not.—Bacon.

Conversion

Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?—Bible.

It is slow work to be born again.—Beecher.

As to the value of conversion God alone can judge.—Goethe.

A man to be converted has to give up his will, his ways, and his thoughts.—D. L. Moody.

The time when I was converted was when religion became no longer a duty, but a pleasure.—Prof. Lincoln.

It is pleasant to see a notorious profligate seized with a concern for religion, and converting his spleen into zeal.—Addison.

These, by obtruding the beginning of a change for the entire work of new life, will fall under the former guilt.—Henry Hammond.

My observation continues to confirm me more and more in the opinion that to experience religion is to experience the truth of the great doctrines of divine grace.—Ichabod Spencer.

Palaces and pyramids are reared by laying one brick, or block, at a time; and the kingdom of Christ is enlarged by individual conversions.—Aughey.

You cannot find, I believe, a case in the Bible where a man is converted without God's calling in some human agency—using some human instrument.—D. L. Moody.

Every man or woman who turns to Christ must bear in mind that they are breaking with their old master, and enlisting under a new leader. Conversion is a revolutionary process.—T. L. Cuyler.

Conversion by the Holy Spirit is a spiritual illumination of the soul. God's grace lights up the dark heart. And when a man has once been kindled at the cross of Christ, he is bound to shine.—T. L. Cuyler.

Conversion is the act of joining our hands to the pierced hand of the crucified Saviour. The new life begins with the taking of Christ's hand, and His taking hold, in infinite love, of our weak hands.—T. L. Cuyler.

The evidence of our acceptance in the Beloved arises in proportion to our love, to our repentance, to our humility, to our faith, to our self-denial, to our delight in duty. Other evidence than this the Bible knows not—God has not given.—Gardiner Spring.

In what way, or by what manner of working, God changes a soul from evil to good, how He impregnates the barren rock—the priceless gems and gold—is to the human mind an impenetrable mystery, in all cases alike.—Coleridge.

The most zealous converters are always the most rancorous when they fail of producing conversion.—Colton.

Conversion is not, as some suppose, a violent opening of the heart by grace, in which will, reason and judgment are all ignored or crushed. The reason is not blinded, but enlightened; and the whole man is made to act with a glorious liberty which it never knew till it fell under the restraints of grace.—C. H. Spurgeon.

This is always the way in which the reality of Christian conversion evidences itself. It makes the selfish man charitable; the churlish, liberal; and implants in the soul, which hitherto has cared only for the things belonging to himself, a disposition to seek also the things of others.—William Adams.

Conversion goes on more prosperously in Tanjore and other provinces, where there are no Europeans, than in Tranquebar, where they are numerous; for we find that European example in the large towns is the bane of Christian instruction.—Rev. Dr. Buchanan.

As to the value of conversions, God alone can judge. God alone can know how wide are the steps which the soul has to take before it can approach to a community with Him, to the dwelling of the perfect, or to the intercourse and friendship of higher natures.—Goethe.

"Follow me!" The publican "rose up." This implies immediate action. It was now or never with him. So you must act with prompt obedience. He did the first thing Jesus bade him do. Are you willing to do as much? If not, you are deciding against Christ, and that means death.—T. L. Cuyler.

In every sound convert the judgment is brought to approve of the laws and ways of Christ, and subscribe to them as most righteous and reasonable; the desire of the heart is to know the whole mind of Christ; the free and resolved choice of the heart is determined for the ways of Christ, before all the pleasures of sin, and prosperities of the world; it is the daily care of his life to walk with God.—Joseph Alleine.

I have known men who thought the object of conversion was to cleanse them as a garment is cleansed, and that when they are converted they were to be hung up in the Lord's wardrobe, the door of which was to be shut, so that no dust could get at them. A coat that is not used the moths eat; and a Christian who is hung up so that he shall not be tempted, the moths eat him; and they have poor food at that.—Beecher.

Should you suffer your weary soul this day to sink into the arms of that Saviour who rejoices to pardon and is mighty to save, the first entrance of such a word, and the first response of such a faith, would be the date of your better life and the commencement of your union to Christ. The graft has taken. At first the juncture may be very slight—a single thread or fiber—and it is not till you try to part them that you find that they are knit together; that their life is one, and that the force which plucks away the graft must also wound the vine. And your faith may yet be no more than a single filament. It may be only one point of attachment by which you are joined to the Lord Jesus. It may be only one solitary sentence, one isolated invitation or promise, of which you have undoubting hold. But hold it fast. If it be the word of Jesus, cling to it.—Aughey.

Conviction

I will listen to any one's convictions, but pray keep your doubts to yourself.—Goethe.

Conviction is oftener the child of Temperament than of Reason.—Mme. de Lambert.

Conviction is the conscience of the mind.—Chamfort.

What man in his right mind would conspire his own hurt? Men are beside themselves when they transgress against their convictions.—William Penn.

No human power can force the intrenchments of the human mind: compulsion never persuades; it only makes hypocrites.—Fénelon.

To remember that once we were near the salvation of Christ, so near that our right hand might have touched and taken it, and after all that hand was withheld; this is a memory which will enhance remorse forever.—William Adams.

True conviction of sin—how difficult it is, when its appearances and modes of life are so fair, when it twines itself so cunningly about, or creeps so insidiously into, our amiable qualities, and sets off its internal disorders by so many outward charms and attractions.—Horace Bushnell.

It is no certain evidence, that because the conscience feels the weight of sin, the heart is humbled on account of it; that because the conscience approves of the rectitude of the Divine justice, the heart bows to the Divine sovereignty. The most powerful conviction of sin, therefore, is not conclusive evidence of Christian character.—Gardiner Spring.

Coquette

All women seem by nature to be coquettes.—Rochefoucauld.

Coquetry is the champagne of love.—Hood.

Coquetry is the art of successful deception.—Mme. Louise Colet.

Coquetry is love without conscience.—Mathieu Moté.

The most effective coquetry is innocence.—Lamartine.

What careth she for hearts when once possessed?—Byron.

By her we first were taught the wheedling art.—Gay.

New vows to plight, and plighted vows to break.—Dryden.

Though it is pleasant weaving nets, it is wiser to make cages.—Moore.

It is a species of coquetry to make a parade of never practising it.—La Rochefoucauld.

God created the coquette as soon as He had made the fool.—Victor Hugo.

Women know not the whole of their coquetry.—La Rochefoucauld.

Coquetry is the desire to inspire love without experiencing it yourself.—Mme. de Brade.

Provocation is one of the arts of coquetry for which virtue often pays the penalty.—Lingrée.

There is but one antidote for coquetry,—true love.—Mme. Deluzy.

All's one to her; above her fan she'd make sweet eyes to Caliban.—Aldrich.

The maid whom now you court in vain
Will quickly run in quest of man.
—Horace.

Mincing she was, as is a wanton colt,
Sweet as a flower and upright as a bolt.
—Chaucer.

The greatest miracle of love is the cure of coquetry.—La Rochefoucauld.

She lik'd his soothing lutes, his presents
more,
And granted kisses, but would grant no
more.
—Gay.

Bright as the sun her eyes the gazers strike,
And, like the sun, they shine on all alike.
—Pope.

A modern writer likens coquettes to those hunters who do not eat the game which they have successfully pursued.—Miss Braddon.

A flirt is like a dipper attached to a hydrant; every one is at liberty to drink from it, but no one desires to carry it away.—N. P. Willis.

The ladies—Heaven bless them!—are, as a general rule, coquettes from babyhood upwards.—Thackeray.

Women find it far more difficult to overcome their inclination to coquetry than to overcome their love.—Rochefoucauld.

It is, as it were, born in maidens that they should wish to please everything that has eyes.—Solomon Gessner.

An accomplished coquette excites the passions of others in proportion as she feels none herself.—Hazlitt.

Faints into airs and languishes with pride;
On the rich quilt sinks with becoming woe,
Wrapt in a gown for sickness and for show.
—Pope.

Heartlessness and fascination, in about equal quantities, constitute the receipt for forming the character of a coquette.—Mme. Deluzy.

From loveless youth to unrespected age
No passion gratified, except her rage;
So much the fury still outran the wit,
The pleasure miss'd her, and the scandal hit.
—Pope.

For a woman to be at once a coquette and a bigot is more than the humblest of husbands can bear; she should mercifully choose between the two.—Bruyère.

The life of a coquette is one constant lie; and the only rule by which you can form any correct judgment of them is that they are never what they seem.—Fielding.

The coquette has companions, indeed, but no lovers,—for love is respectful and timorous; and where among her followers will she find a husband?—Dr. Johnson.

How happy could I be with either,
Were I other dear charmer away!
But while ye thus tease me together,
To neither a word will I say. —Gay.

Like a lovely tree
She grew to womanhood, and between
whiles
Rejected several suitors, just to learn
How to accept a better in his turn.
—Byron.

"With every pleasing, every prudent part,
Say, What can Chloe want?"—she wants a heart.
She speaks, behaves, and acts just as she ought;
But never, never reach'd one generous thought.
—Pope.

Coquetry is the essential characteristic, and the prevalent humor of women; but they do not all practise it, because the coquetry of some is restrained by fear or by reason.—La Rochefoucauld.

The vain coquette each suit disdains,
And glories in her lover's pains;
With age she fades—each lover flies,
Contemn'd, forlorn, she pines and dies.
—Gay.

Would you teach her to love?
For a time seem to rove;
At first she may frown in a pet;
But leave her awhile,
She shortly will smile,
And then you may win your coquette.
—Byron.

Now Laura moves along the joyous crowd,
Smiles in her eyes, and simpers in her lips;
To some she whispers, others speaks aloud;
To some she curtsies, and to some she dips.
—Byron.

Ye belles, and ye flirts, and ye pert little things,
Who trip in this frolicsome round,
Pray tell me from whence this impertinence springs,
The sexes at once to confound?
—Whitehead.

See how the world its veterans reward!
A youth of frolics, an old age of cards;
Fair to no purpose, artful to no end,
Young without lovers, old without a friend;
A fop their passion but their prize a sot,
Alive ridiculous, and dead forgot!
—Pope.

Coquetry whets the appetite; flirtation depraves it. Coquetry is the thorn that guards the rose—easily trimmed off when once plucked. Flirtation is like the slime on water-plants, making them hard to handle, and when caught, only to be cherished in slimy waters.—Ik Marvel.

She who only finds her self-esteem
In others' admiration, begs an alms;
Depends on others for her daily food,
And is the very servant of her slaves;
Tho' oftentimes, in a fantastic hour,
O'er men she may a childish pow'r exert,
Which not ennobles but degrades her state.
—Joanna Baillie.

Coquettes are but too rare. It is a career that requires great abilities, infinite pains, a gay and airy spirit. 'T is the coquette who provides all the amusements,—suggests the riding-party, plans the picnic, gives and guesses charades, acts them. She is the stirring element amid the heavy congeries of social atoms,—the soul of the house, the salt of the banquet.—Beaconsfield.

Such is your cold coquette, who can't say
"No,"
And won't say "Yes," and keeps you on and off-ing
On a lee-shore, till it begins to blow,
Then sees your heart wreck'd, with an inward scoffing.
—Byron.

Then in a kiss she breath'd her various arts,
Of trifling prettily with wounded hearts;
A mind for love, but still a changing mind,
The lisp affected, and the glance design'd;
The sweet confusing blush, the secret wink,
The gentle swimming walk, the courteous sink;
The stare for strangeness fit, for scorn the frown
For decent yielding, looks declining down;
The practis'd languish, where well-feign'd desire
Would own its melting in a mutual fire;
Gay smiles to comfort; April showers to move;
And all the nature, all the art of love.
—Parnell.

A coquette is one that is never to be persuaded out of the passion she has to please, nor out of a good opinion of her own beauty: time and years she regards as things that only wrinkle and decay other women, forgetting that age is written in the face, and that the same dress which became her when she was young now only makes her look older.—Bruyère.

Corner Stone Laying

To whom coming, as unto a living stone, disallowed indeed of men, but chosen of God, and precious.—I Pet. ii. 4.

Christ is the foundation of all our hopes for time and for eternity. Oh, build on this divine foundation! All other foundations are sinking sand.—Robert S. MacArthur, D. D.

These fair stones remind us that ere long it will be our privilege to worship God in a place of greater beauty and dignity than has thus far been our lot.—S. C. Edsall.

May the influence of this great church be found for Christ in every part of this world!—Cortland Myers.

May the whole structure be one of the treasures opened by wise men for the incarnate Christ. May every passer-by hear echoing from its walls the angelic song, "Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy."—Cortland Myers.

May this temple have for its cornerstone Christ in theology, Christ in worship, Christ in work, Christ in character—four-sided, square, and perfect. May there not be one square foot of standing-room for the preacher who takes one verse from the Bible or one star from the brow of the Christ. May form and superstition and idolatry be banished from its worship, and lines never be drawn between the worshipers. Over every one of its nine entrances let the chisel cut that large gospel word, "Whosoever."—Cortland Myers.

Corporations

They cannot commit treason, nor be outlawed, nor excommunicate, for they have no souls.—Sir Edward Coke.

You never expected justice from a company, did you? They have neither a soul to lose, nor a body to kick.—Lord Thurlow.

Corruption

Loathsome canker lives in sweetest bud.—Shakespeare.

The more corrupt the state, the more laws.—Tacitus.

—I have seen corruption boil and bubble 'Till it o'errun the stew. —Shakespeare.

Be certain that he who has betrayed thee once will betray thee again.—Lavater.

A corrupt judge does not carefully search for the truth.—Horace.

E'en grave divines submit to glittering gold, The best of consciences are bought and sold. —Dr. Wolcot.

O that estates, degrees, and offices were not derived corruptly! and that clear honor were purchased by the merit of the wearer!—Shakespeare.

I have been young and am now old, and have not yet known an untruthful man to come to a good end.—Auerbach.

Our supple tribes repress their patriot throats, And ask no questions but the price of votes. —Dr. Johnson.

He that accuses all mankind of corruption ought to remember that he is sure to convict only one.—Burke.

Whoso seeks an audit here Propitious, pays his tribute, game or fish, Wild fowl or venison, and his errand speeds. —Cowper.

And conscience, truth and honesty are made To rise and fall, like other wares of trade. —Moore.

He who tempts, though in vain, at last asperses The tempted with dishonor foul, supposed Not incorruptible of faith, not proof Against temptation. —Milton.

Corruption is a tree, whose branches are Of an unmeasurable length: they spread Ev'rywhere; and the dew that drops from thence Hath infected some chairs and stools of authority. —Beaumont and Fletcher.

When rogues like these (a sparrow cries) To honours and employments rise, I court no favor, ask no place, For such preferment is disgrace. —Gay.

Here let those reign, whom pensions can incite, To vote a patriot black, a courtier white, Explain their country's dear-bought rights away, And plead for pirates in the face of day. —Dr. Johnson.

There is something in corruption which, like a jaundiced eye, transfers the color of itself to the object it looks upon, and sees everything stained and impure.—Thomas Paine.

This mournful truth is everywhere confess'd, Slow rises worth by poverty depress'd: But here more slow, where all are slaves to gold, Where looks are merchandise, and smiles are sold. —Dr. Johnson.

Men by associating in large masses, as in camps, and in cities, improve their talents, but impair their virtues, and strengthen their minds, but weaken their morals; thus a retrocession in the one is too often the price they pay for a refinement in the other.—Colton.

At length corruption, like a general flood,
(So long by watchful ministers withstood,) Shall deluge all; and avarice creeping on,
Spread like a low-born mist, and blot the sun.
—Pope.

Like a young eagle who has lent his plume,
To fledge the shaft by which he meets his doom,
See their own feathers pluck'd, to wing the dart,
Which rank corruption destines for their heart!
—Moore.

Hence, wretched nation! all thy woes arise,
Avow'd corruption, licens'd perjuries,
Eternal taxes, treaties for a day,
Servants that rule, and senates that obey.
—Lord Lyttleton.

The impious man, who sells his country's freedom
Makes all the guilt of tyranny his own.
His are her slaughters, her oppressions his;
Just heav'n! reserve your choicest plagues for him,
And blast the venal wretch.
—Martyn.

But though bare merit might in Rome appear
The strongest plea for favour, 'tis not here;
We form our judgment in another way;
And they will best succeed, who best can pay;
Those, who would gain the votes of British tribes,
Must add to force of merit, force of bribes.
—Churchill.

'Tis pleasant purchasing our fellow-creatures,
And all are to be sold if you consider
Their passions, and are dextrous; some by features
Are bought up, others by a warlike leader;
Some by a place, as tend their years or natures;
The most by ready cash—but all have prices,
From crowns to kicks, according to their vices.
—Byron.

Examine well his milk-white hand,
The palm is hardly clean,—but here and there an ugly smutch appears.
Foh! It was a bribe that left it.
He has touched corruption.—Cowper.

For, firm within, and while at heart untouched,
Ne'er yet by force was freedom overcome.
But soon as independence stoops the head,
To vice-enslaved, and vice-created wants,
Then to some foul corrupting-hand, whose waste
Their craving lusts with fatal bounty feeds,
They fall a willing, undefended prize;
From man to man th' infectious softness runs,
Till the whole state unnerved in slavery sinks.
—Thomson.

If, ye powers divine!
Ye mark the movements of this nether world
And bring them to account, crush, crush, those vipers,
Who, singled out by a community
To guard their rights, shall, for a grasp of air,
Or paltry office, sell 'em to the foe.
—Miller.

Counsel

In the multitude of counsellors there is safety.—Proverbs xi. 14.

Good counsels observed are chains of grace.—Thomas Fuller.

Let no man value at little price a virtuous woman's counsel.—George Chapman.

The best receipt—best to work and best to take—is the admonition of a friend.—Bacon.

When all is done, the help of good counsel is that which setteth business straight.—Bacon.

They say that the best counsel is that of woman.—Calderon.

Bosom up my counsel,
You'll find it wholesome.—Shakespeare.

Hasty counsels are generally followed by repentance.—Laberius.

And if the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch.—Bible.

Harsh counsels have little or no effect; they are like hammers which are always repulsed by the anvil.—Helvetius.

I will adhere to the counsels of good men, although misfortune and death should be the consequence.—Cicero.

I can easier teach twenty what were good to be done, than be one of the twenty to follow mine own teaching.—Shakespeare.

Counsel and conversation is a good second education, that improves all the virtues and corrects all the vices.—Clarendon.

Let no man presume to give advice to others that has not first given counsel to himself.—Seneca.

Good counsels observed are chains to grace, which neglected, prove halters to strange undutiful children.—Fuller.

And cast
O'er erring deeds and thoughts a heav'nly hue
Of words, like sunbeams, dazzling as they pass'd.—Byron.

The secret counsels of princes are a troublesome burden to such as have only to execute them.—Montaigne.

Though I may not be able to inform men more than they know, yet I may give them the occasion to consider.—Sir W. Temple.

Ah, gentle dames! it gars me greet,
To think how monie counsels sweet,
How monie lengthened sage advices,
The husband frae the wife despises.—Burns.

A man takes contradiction and advice much more easily than people think, only he will not bear it when violently given, even though it be well founded.—Richter.

I pray thee, cease thy counsel,
Which falls into mine ears as profitless
As water in a sieve.—Shakespeare.

Consult your friend on all things, especially on those which respect yourself. His counsel may then be useful, where your own self-love might impair your judgment.—Seneca.

Countenance

The countenance may be rightly defined as the title page which heralds the contents of the human volume, but like other title pages, it sometimes puzzles, often misleads, and often says nothing to the purpose.—Wm. Matthews.

The cheek
Is apter than the tongue to tell an errand.—Shakespeare.

A countenance more
In sorrow than in anger.—Shakespeare.

Yea this man's brow, like to a tragic leaf,
Foretells the nature of a tragic volume.—Shakespeare.

A sweet attractive kind of grace,
A full assurance given by looks,
Continual comfort in a face,
The lineaments of Gospel books—
I trow that countenance cannot lye
Whose thoughts are legible in the eye.—Spenser.

Physically, they exhibited no indication of their past lives and characters. The greatest scamp had a Raphael face, with a profusion of blonde hair; Oakhurst, a gambler, had the melancholy character and intellectual abstraction of a Hamlet; the coolest and most courageous man was scarcely over five feet in height, with a soft voice, and an embarrassed manner.—Bret Harte.

Country — Country Life

Sunny spots of greenery.—Coleridge.

Far from the gay cities, and the ways of men.—Homer.

Men are taught virtue and a love of independence by living in the country.—Menander.

If country life be healthful to the body, it is no less so to the mind.—Ruffini.

Nor rural sights alone, but rural sounds
Exhilarate the spirit, and restore
The tone of languid Nature.—Cowper.

Sir, when you have seen one green field, you have seen all green fields. Let us walk down Cheapside.—Johnson.

I consider it the best part of an education to have been born and brought up in the country.—Alcott.

riches, and partake in her rejoicing with heaven and earth.—Milton.

God made the country, and man made the town;
What wonder then, that health and virtue,
gifts,
That can alone make sweet the bitter draught
That life holds out to all, should most abound,
And least be threatened in the fields and groves? —Cowper.

And see the country, far diffused around,
One boundless blush, one white impurpled shower
Of mingled blossoms! where the raptured eye
Hurries from joy to joy. —Thomson.

As a light,
And pliant harebell swinging in the breeze
On some grey rock—its birth-place—so had I
Wanted'd, fast-rooted in the ancient tower
Of my beloved country, wishing not
A happier fortune, than to wither there.
—Wordsworth.

Here too dwells simple truth; plain innocence;
Unsullied beauty; sound unbroken youth,
Patient of labour, with a little pleas'd;
Health ever blooming; unambitious toil,
Calm contemplation; and poetic ease.
—Thomson.

This is a beautiful life now, privacy,
The sweetness and the benefit of essence;
I see there is no man but may make his paradise,
And it is nothing but his love and dotage
Upon the world's foul joys that keeps him out on't. —Beaumont and Fletcher.

They love the country, and none else, who seek
For their own sake its silence and its shade.
Delights which who would leave, that has a heart
Susceptible of pity, or a mind
Cultured and capable of sober thought.
—Cowper.

Ask any school-boy up to the age of fifteen where he would spend his holidays. Not one in five hundred will say, "In the streets of London," if you give him the option of green fields and running waters. It is, then, a fair presumption that there must be something of the child still in the character of the men or the women whom the country charms in maturer as in dawning life.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Under a tuft of shade that on the green Stood whispering soft, by a fresh fountain side
They sat them down; and after no more toil
Of their sweet gard'ning labour than suffic'd
To recommend cool zephyr, and made ease
More easy, wholesome thirst and appetite
More grateful, to their supper fruits they fell. —Milton.

How various his employments, whom the world
Calls idle, and who justly in return
Esteems that busy world an idler too!
Friends, books, a garden, and perhaps his pen,
Delightful industry enjoyed at home,
And Nature in her cultivated trim,
Dressed to his taste, inviting him abroad.
—Cowper.

Now the summer's in prime
Wi' the flowers richly blooming,
And the wild mountain thyme
A' the moorlands perfuming.
To own dear native scenes
Let us journey together,
Where glad innocence reigns
'Mang the braes o' Balquhither.
—Robert Tannahill.

O, when I am safe in my sylvan home,
I mock at the pride of Greece and Rome;
And when I am stretch'd beneath the pines
When the evening star so holy shines,
I laugh at the lore and pride of man,
At the Sophist's schools, and the learned clan;
For what are they all in their high conceit,
When man in the bush with God may meet?
—R. W. Emerson.

I'm weary of my lonely hut
And of its blasted tree,
The very lake is like my lot,
So silent constantly—
I've liv'd amid the forest gloom
Until I almost fear—
When will the thrilling voices come
My spirit thirsts to hear? —Willis.

There is a something in the pleasures of the country that reaches much beyond the gratification of the eye—a something that invigorates the mind, that erects its hopes, that allays its perturbations, that mellows its affections; and it will generally be found that our happiest schemes, and wisest resolutions, are formed under the mild influence of a country scene, and the soft obscurities of rural retirement.—

Roberts.

Ever charming, ever new,
When will the landscape tire the view?
The fountains fall, the rivers flow
The woody valleys, warm and low,
The windy summit, wild and high,
Roughly rushing on the sky!
The pleasant seat, the ruin'd tower,
The naked rock, the shady bower,
The town and village, dome and farm,
Each gave each a double charm,
As pearls upon an Ethiop's arm. —Dyer.

Abused mortals! did you know
Where joy, heart's-ease, and comforts grow;
You'd scorn proud towers,
And seek them in these bowers,
Where winds sometimes our woods perhaps may shake,
But blustering care could never tempest make,
Nor murmurs e'er come nigh us,
Saving of fountains that glide by us.
—Sir W. Raleigh.

Your love in a cottage is hungry,
Your vine is a nest for flies—
Your milkmaid shocks the graces,
And simplicity talks of pies!
You lie down to your shady slumber,
And wake with a bug in your ear;
And your damsel that walks in the morning
Is shod like a mountaineer.
—N. P. Willis.

None can describe the sweets of country life,
But those blest men that do enjoy and taste
them.

Plain husbandmen, tho' far below our pitch,
Of fortune plac'd, enjoy a wealth above us;
To whom the earth with true and bounteous
justice,

Free from war's cares, returns an easy food,
They breathe the fresh and uncorrupted air,
And by clear brooks enjoy untroubled sleeps.
Their state is fearless and secure, enrich'd
With several blessings, such as greatest kings

Might in true justice envy, and themselves
Would count too happy, if they truly knew them. —May.

Seldom shall we see in cities, courts, and rich families, where men live plentifully and eat and drink freely, that perfect health, that athletic soundness and vigor of constitution which is commonly seen in the country, in poor houses and cottages, where nature is their cook, and necessity their caterer, and where they have no other doctor but the sun and fresh air, and that such a one as never sends them to the apothecary.—South.

Country (Love of)

He who loves not his country can love nothing.—Johnson.

There's no glory like his who saves
his country.—Tennyson.

They love their land because it is their own,
And scorn to give aught other reason why.
—Hallock.

The accent of our native country dwells in the heart and mind, as well as on the tongue.—La Rochefoucauld.

Oh, Christ! it is a goodly sight to see What Heaven hath done for this delicious land! —Byron.

Land of my sires! what mortal hand
Can e'er untie the filial band
That knits me to thy rugged strand!—Scott.

I fancy the proper means of increasing the love we bear our native country is to reside some time in a foreign one.—Shenstone.

The infant, on first opening his eyes, ought to see his country, and to the hour of his death never to lose sight of it.—Rousseau.

Thou, O my country hast thy foolish ways!
Too apt to purr at every stranger's praise,
But if the stranger touch thy modes or laws,
Off goes the velvet and out come the claws.
—Holmes.

Breathes there the man with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land!
Whose heart hath ne'er within him burn'd,
As home his footsteps he hath turn'd,
From wandering on a foreign strand!
—Scott.

O beautiful and grand,
My own, my native land!
Of thee I boast:
Great empire of the west,
The dearest and the best,
Made up of all the rest,
I love thee most.

—Abraham Coles.

There ought to be a system of manners in every nation which a well-informed mind would be disposed to relish. To make us love our country, our country ought to be lovely.—

Burke.

Our hearts, our hopes, are all with thee,
Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers, our tears,
Our faith triumphant o'er our fears,
Are all with thee,—are all with thee!
—Longfellow.

Had I a dozen sons, each in my love alike, I had rather have eleven die nobly for their country, than one vo-luptuously surfeit out of action.—
Shakespeare.

Stand
Firm for your country, and become a man
Honour'd and lov'd: It were a noble life,
To be found dead, embracing her.
—Johnson.

Our country! in her intercourse with foreign nations, may she always be in the right; but our country, right or wrong.—Stephen Decatur.

Courage

God holds with the strong.—Mazzini.

The best hearts are ever the bravest.
—Sterne.

Courage is adversity's lamp.—Vau-venargues.

To bear is to conquer our fate.—
Campbell.

Courage leads to heaven; fear, to death.—Seneca.

Much danger makes great hearts
most resolute.—Marston.

A courage to endure and to obey.
—Tennyson.

Courage never to submit or yield.
—Milton.

Courage mounteth with occasion.—
Shakespeare.

A man of courage is also full of faith.—Cicero.

A stout heart may be ruined in fortune but not in spirit.—Victor Hugo.

Courage is fire, and bullying is smoke.—Beaconsfield.

The first mark of valor is defence.
—Sir P. Sidney.

Whatever enlarges hope will exalt courage.—Johnson.

Treason seldom dwells with courage.
—Sir Walter Scott.

A spirit superior to every weapon.—
Ovid.

Hold the Fort! I am coming.—
Gen. W. T. Sherman.

Courage in danger is half the battle.
—Plautus.

Fortune and Love befriend the bold.
—Ovid.

Courage of the soldier awakes the courage of woman.—Emerson.

Courage is temperamental, scientific, ideal.—Emerson.

Half a man's wisdom goes with his courage.—Emerson.

It is courage that vanquishes in war,
and not good weapons.—Cervantes.

Courage makes a man more than himself; for he is then himself plus his valor.—W. R. Alger.

True courage scorns to vent her prowess in a storm of words.—Smol-
lett.

True valor, friends, on virtue founded strong,
Meets all events alike.
—Mallet.

I dare do all that may become a man:
Who dares do more is none.
—Shakespeare.

Come one, come all! this rock shall fly
From its firm base as soon as I.
—Scott.

Courage consists not in blindly overlooking danger, but in seeing it and conquering it.—Richter.

Few persons have courage enough to appear as good as they really are.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

God is the brave man's hope and not the coward's excuse.—Plutarch.

There is no courage but in innocence; no constancy but in an honest cause.—Southern.

Courage is, on all hands, considered as an essential of high character.—Froude.

It is in great dangers that we see great courage.—Regnard.

Fortune can take away riches, but not courage.—Seneca.

True courage is like a kite; a contrary wind raises it higher.—J. Petit-Senn.

Courage without discipline is nearer beastliness than manhood.—Sir P. Sidney.

But screw your courage to the sticking place,
And we'll not fail. —Shakespeare.

Most men have more courage than even they themselves think they have.—Greville.

The mind I sway by, and the heart I bear,
Shall never sag with doubt, nor shake with fear. —Shakespeare.

Whate'er betides, by destiny 't is done,
And better bear like men, than vainly seek to shun. —Dryden.

I rather tell thee what is to be fear'd,
Than what I fear; for always I am Cæsar. —Shakespeare.

The man who has never been in danger cannot answer for his courage.—La Rochefoucauld.

Why, courage, then! what cannot be avoided
'Twere childish weakness to lament or fear. —Shakespeare.

Courage conquers all things: it even gives strength to the body.—Ovid.

Hail, Cæsar, those who are about to die salute thee.—Suetonius.

Cowards may fear to die; but courage stout,
Rather than live in snuff, will be put out. —Sir Walter Raleigh.

He has not learned the lesson of life who does not every day surmount a fear.—Emerson.

The charm of the best courages is that they are inventions, inspirations, flashes of genius.—Emerson.

Courage is generosity of the highest order, for the brave are prodigal of the most precious things.—Colton.

If we survive danger, it steels our courage more than anything else.—Niebuhr.

The soul, secure in her existence, smiles
At the drawn dagger, and defies its point. —Addison.

Small in number, but their valor tried in war, and glowing.—Virgil.

Courage is a virtue of no doubtful seeming; there can be no contradiction, no diversity of opinion, about it.—Richter.

Courage, when it is not heroic self-sacrifice, is sometimes a modification and sometimes a result of faith.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

To bear other people's afflictions, every one has courage enough and to spare.—Benjamin Franklin.

Courage, like cowardice, is undoubtedly contagious, but some persons are not liable to catch it.—George D. Prentice.

When moral courage feels that it is in the right, there is no personal darning of which it is incapable.—Leigh Hunt.

Without courage there cannot be truth, and without truth there can be no other virtue.—Sir Walter Scott.

Who hath not courage to revenge will never find generosity to forgive.—
Henry Home.

Be courageous. Be independent.
Only remember where the true courage and independence come from.—Phillips Brooks.

Go on and increase in valor, O boy!
this is the path to immortality.—Virgil.

Stand fast * * *
And all temptation to transgress repel.
—Milton.

Whenever you do what is holy, be of good cheer, knowing that God Himself takes part with rightful courage.
—Menander.

Conscience in the soul is the root of all true courage. If a man would be brave, let him learn to obey science.—James F. Clarke.

A real spirit before, who dares Should neither court nor bear it. —Brown.

He who would men of retiring timidity he who leaveth only in dangers which he meet themselves, but the first to rescue when others are endangered.—
Richter.

The wise and active conquer difficulties
By daring to attempt them: sloth and folly Shiver and shrink at sight of toil and hazard,
And make the impossibility they fear.
—Rowe.

Oh fear not in a world like this,
And thou shalt know ere long,
Know how sublime a thing it is
To suffer and be strong.
—Longfellow.

All desp'rate hazards courage do create,
As he plays frankly, who has least estate;
Presence of mind, and courage in distress,
Are more than armies, to procure success.
—Dryden.

Courage, considered in itself or without reference to its causes, is no virtue, and deserves no esteem. It is found in the best and the worst, and is Courage is incompatible with the fear of the death; but every villain fears death: therefore no villain can be brave. He may, indeed, possess the courage of a rat, and fight with desperation, when driven into a cor-

A thousand hearts are great within my bosom:
Advance our standards, set upon our foes;
Our ancient word of courage, fair St.
George,
Inspire us with the spleen of fiery dragons!
Upon them! Victory sits upon our helms.
—Shakespeare.

What though the field be lost!
All is not lost; the ungovernable will,
And study of revenge, immortal hate,
And courage never to submit or yield;
And what is else not to be overcome.
—Milton.

No thought of flight,

True courage is like a kite; a contrary wind raises it higher.—J. Petit-Senn.

Courage without discipline is near-er beastliness than manhood.—Sir P. Sidney.

But screw your courage to the sticking place, And we'll not fail. —Shakespeare.

Most men have more courage than even they themselves think they have. —Greville.

The mind I sway by, and the heart I bear, Shall never sag with doubt, nor shake with fear. —Shakespeare.

Whate'er betides, by destiny 't is done, And better bear like men, than vainly seek to shun. —Dryden.

I rather tell thee what is to be fear'd, Than what I fear; for always I am Caesar. —Shakespeare.

The man who has never been in danger cannot answer for his courage. —La Rochefoucauld.

Why, courage, then! what cannot be avoided 'Twere childish weakness to lament or fear. —Shakespeare.

Courage conquers all things: it even gives strength to the body.—Ovid.

—Aaron Hill.

To do an evil action is base; to do a good action without incurring danger is common enough; but it is the part of a good man to do great and noble deeds, though he risks every thing.—Plutarch.

Let us, then, be up and doing,

Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labor and to wait.
—Longfellow.

Women and men of retiring timidity are cowardly only in dangers which affect themselves, but the first to rescue when others are endangered.—Richter.

The wise and active conquer difficulties
By daring to attempt them: sloth and folly
Shiver and shrink at sight of toil and hazard,
And make the impossibility they fear.
—Rowe.

Oh fear not in a world like this,
And thou shalt know ere long,

—Longfellow.

All desp'rate hazards courage do create,
As he plays frankly, who has least estate;
Presence of mind, and courage in distress,
Are more than armies, to procure success.
—Dryden.

Courage, considered in itself or without reference to its causes, is no virtue, and deserves no esteem. It is found in the best and the worst, and is to be judged according to the qualities from which it springs and with which it is conjoined.—Channing.

Courage is generosity of the highest order, for the brave are prodigal of the most precious things. Our blood is nearer and dearer to us than our money, and our life than our estate.—Colton.

Courage and modesty are the most unequivocal of virtues, for they are of a kind that hypocrisy cannot imitate; they too have this quality in common, that they are expressed by the same color.—Goethe.

Courage ought to be guided by skill, and skill armed by courage. Neither should hardness darken wit, nor wit cool hardness. Be valiant as men despising death, but confident as unwonted to be overcome.—Sir P. Sidney.

Courage is incompatible with the fear of the death: but every villain fears death: therefore no villain can be brave. He may, indeed, possess the courage of a rat, and fight with desperation, when driven into a corner.—Colton.

what'll come of it after he's dead and gone.—George Eliot.

Courage multiplies the chances of success by sometimes making opportunities, and always availing itself of them; and in this sense Fortune may be said to favor fools by those who, however prudent in their opinion, are deficient in valor and enterprise.—Coleridge.

Courage is always greatest when blended with meekness; intellectual ability is most admirable when it sparkles in the setting of a modest self-distrust; and never does the human soul appear so strong as when it foregoes revenge and dares to forgive an injury.—Chapin.

True courage is the result of reasoning. A brave mind is always impregnable. Resolution lies more in the head than in the veins, and a just sense of honor and of infamy, of duty and of religion, will carry us farther than all the force of mechanism.—Jeremy Collier.

Let us not despair too soon, my friend. Men's words are ever bolder than their deeds, and many a one who now appears resolute to meet every extremity with eager zeal, will on a sudden find in their breast a heart which he wot not of.—Schiller.

Not to the ensanguin'd field of death alone
Is valor limited: she sits serene
In the deliberate council, sagely scans
The source of action: weighs, prevents, provides,
And scorns to count her glories, from the feats
Of brutal force alone. —Smollett.

A valiant man
Ought not to undergo, or tempt a danger,
But worthily, and by selected ways.
He undertakes with reason, not by chance.
His valor is the salt t' his other virtues,
They're all unseason'd without it.
—Ben Jonson.

What we want is men with a little courage to stand up for Christ. When Christianity wakes up, and every child that belongs to the Lord is willing to speak for Him, is willing to work for Him, and, if need be, willing to die for Him, then Christianity will advance, and we shall see the work of the Lord prosper.—D. L. Moody.

There is a contemptibly quiet path for all those who are afraid of the blows and clamor of opposing forces. There is no honorable fighting for a man who is not ready to forget that he has a head to be battered and a name to be bespattered. Truth wants no champion who is not as ready to be struck as to strike for her.—J. G. Holland.

Yet it may be more lofty courage dwells
In one weak heart which braves an adverse fate,
Than his whose ardent soul indignant swells,
Warm'd by the fight, or cheer'd through high debate. —Mrs. Norton.

True courage has so little to do with anger, that there lies always the strongest suspicion against it where this passion is highest. The true courage is the cool and calm. The bravest of men have the least of brutal bullying insolence, and in the very time of danger are found the most serene, pleasant, and free.—Shaftesbury.

Physical courage, which despises all danger, will make a man brave in one way; and moral courage, which despises all opinion, will make a man brave in another. The former would seem most necessary for the camp, the latter for council; but to constitute a great man, both are necessary.—Colton.

Courage, so far as it is a sign of race, is peculiarly the mark of a gentleman or a lady; but it becomes vulgar if rude or insensitive, while timidity is not vulgar, if it be a characteristic of race or fineness of make. A fawn is not vulgar in being timid, nor a crocodile "gentle" because courageous.—Ruskin.

True courage is cool and calm. The bravest of men have the least of a brutal bullying insolence, and in the very time of danger are found the most serene and free. Rage, we know, can make a coward forget himself and fight. But what is done in fury or anger can never be placed to the account of courage.—Shaftesbury.

When by and by the din of war 'gan pierce
His ready sense; then straight his doubled
spirit
Re-quickened what in flesh was fatigate,
And to the battle came he; where he did Run reeking o'er the lives of men, as if 'Twere a perpetual spoil; and till we call'd
Both field and city ours he never stood
To ease his breath with panting.
—Shakespeare.

An intrepid courage is at best but a holiday kind of virtue, to be seldom exercised, and never but in cases of necessity; affability, mildness, tenderness, and a word which I would fain bring back to its original signification of virtue, I mean good-nature, are of daily use; they are the bread of mankind and staff of life.—Dryden.

True courage is not the brutal force
Of vulgar heroes, but the firm resolve
Of virtue and of reason. He who thinks
Without their aid to shine in deeds of arms
Builds on a sandy basis his renown;
A dream, a vapor, or an ague-fit,
May make a coward of him.—Whitehead.

Courage enlarges, cowardice diminishes resources. In desperate straits the fears of the timid aggravate the dangers that imperil the brave. For towards the road of desertion should be left open. They will carry over to the enemy nothing but their fears. The poltroon, like the scabbard, is an encumbrance when once the sword is drawn.—Bovee.

What! shall one monk, scarcely known beyond his cell,
Front Rome's far-reaching bolts, and scorn her frown?
Brave Luther answered "Yes"; that thunder's swell Rocked Europe, and disarmed the triple crown.
—Lowell.

Courage that grows from constitution very often forsakes a man when he has occasion for it, and, when it is only a kind of instinct in the soul, breaks out on all occasions. without judgment or discretion. That courage which proceeds from the sense of our duty, and from the fear of offending Him that made us, acts always in a uniform manner, and according to the dictates of right reason.—Addison.

Like a mountain lone and bleak,
With its sky-encompass'd peak,
Thunder riven,
Lifting its forehead bare,
Through the cold and blighting air,
Up to heaven,
Is the soul that feels its woe,
And is nerv'd to bear the blow.
—Mrs. Hale.

"Be bold!" first gate; "Be bold, be bold, and evermore be bold," second gate; "Be not too bold!" third gate.—Inscription on the Gates of Busyrane.

Write on your doors the saying wise and old,
"Be bold! be bold!" and everywhere—"Be bold;
Be not too bold!" Yet better the excess
Than the defect; better the more than less;
Better like Hector in the field to die,
Than like a perfumed Paris turn and fly.
—Longfellow.

O friends, be men, and let your hearts be strong,
And let no warrior in the heat of fight
Do what may bring him shame in others' eyes;
For more of those who shrink from shame are safe
Than fall in battle, while with those who flee
Is neither glory nor reprieve from death.
—Homer.

None of the prophets old
So lofty or so bold!
No form of danger shakes his dauntless breast;
In loneliness sublime
He dares confront the time,
And speak the truth, and give the world no rest:
No kingly threat can cowardize his breath,
He with majestic step goes forth to meet his death.
—Abraham Coles.

Religion gives a man courage.
* * * I men the higher moral courage which can look danger in the face unawed and undismayed; the courage that can encounter loss of ease, of wealth, of friends, of your own good name; the courage that can face a world full of howling and of scorn—

ay, of loathing and of hate; can see all this with a smile, and, suffering it all, can still toil on, conscious of the result, yet fearless still.—Theodore Parker.

In the whole range of earthly experience, no quality is more attractive and ennobling than moral courage. Like that mountain of rock which towers aloft in the Irish Sea, the man possessed of this principle is unmoved by the swelling surges which fret and fume at his feet. And yet, unlike that same Ailsa Craig, he is sensitive beyond measure to every adverse influence—battling against it, and triumphing over it by a power which proceeds from God's throne, and pervades his entire being.—J. McC. Holmes.

Courage, the highest gift, that scorns to bend
To mean devices for a sordid end.
Courage—an independent spark from heaven's bright throne,
By which the soul stands raised, triumphant,
ant, high, alone.
Great in itself, not praises of the crowd,
Above all vice, it stoops not to be proud.
Courage, the mighty attribute of powers above,
By which those great in war are great in love.
The spring of all brave acts is seated here;
As falsehoods draw their sordid birth from fear.
—Farquhar.

Courage, by keeping the senses quiet and the understanding clear, puts us in a condition to receive true intelligence, to make computations upon danger, and pronounce rightly upon that which threatens us. Innocence of life, consciousness of worth, and great expectations, are the best foundations of courage. These ingredients make a richer cordial than youth can prepare; they warm the heart at eighty, and seldom fail in operation.—Elmes.

Let him not imagine who aims at greatness that all is lost by a single adverse cast of fortune; for if fortune has at one time the better of courage, courage may afterwards recover the advantage. He who is prepossessed with the assurance of overcoming at least overcomes the fear of failure; whereas he who is apprehensive of losing loses, in reality, all hopes of subduing. Boldness and power are such inseparable companions that they appear to be born together; and when once divided, they both decay and die at the same time.—Archbishop Venn.

Court — Courtiers

A court is an assemblage of noble and distinguished beggars.—Talleyrand.

The court does not render a man contented, but it prevents his being so elsewhere.—Bruyère.

The caterpillars of the commonwealth,
Which I have sworn to weed and pluck
away.
—Shakespeare.

Courts can give nothing to the wise and good,
But scorn of pomp, and love of solitude.
—Young.

Poor wretches that depend
On greatness' favor, dream as I have done;
Wake, and find nothing. —Shakespeare.

Not a courtier, although they wear their faces to the bent of the king's looks, hath a heart that is not glad at the thing they scowl at.—Shakespeare.

They smile and bow, and hug, and shake
the hand,
E'en while they whisper to the next assistant
Some curs'd plot to blast its owner's head.
—Beller.

A lazy, proud, unprofitable crew,
The vermin gender'd from the rank corruption
Of a luxurious state. —Cumberland.

Fly from the court's pernicious neighborhood;
Where innocence is sham'd, and blushing modesty
Is made the scorner's jest; where hate, deceit,
And deadly ruin wear the mask of beauty,
And draw deluded fools with shows of pleasure. —Rowe.

The chief requisites for a courtier are a flexible conscience and an inflexible politeness.—Lady Blessington.

I am no courtier, no fawning dog of state,
To lick and kiss the hand that buffets me;
Nor can I smile upon my guest and praise
His stomach, when I know he feeds on poison,
And death disguised sits grinning at my table. —Sewell.

Live loath'd and long,
Most smiling, smooth, detested parasites,
Courteous destroyers, affable wolves, meek
bears,
You fools of fortune, trencher friends,
time's flies,
Cap and knee slaves, vapors, and minute
jacks. —Shakespeare.

Men that would blush at being thought sincere,
And feign, for glory, the few faults they want;
That love a lie, where truth would pay as
well;
As if to them, vice shone her own reward.
—Young.

How many men
Have spent their blood in their dear country's service,
Yet now pine under want; while selfish
slaves,
That even would cut their throats whom now they fawn on,
Like deadly locusts, eat the honey up,
Which those industrious bees so hardly toil'd for. —Otway.

Those that go up hill, use to bow,
Their bodies forward, and stoop low
To poise themselves, and sometimes creep,
When th' way is difficult and steep:
So those at court, that do address,
By low ignoble offices,
Can stoop at anything that's base,
To wriggle into trust and grace,
Are like to rise to greatness sooner,
Than those that go by worth and honor.
—Butler.

See there he comes, th' exalted idol comes!
The circle's form'd, and all his fawning
slaves
Devoutly bow to earth; from every mouth
The nauseous flattery flows, which he returns
With promises which die as soon as born.
Vile intercourse, where virtue has no place!
Frown but the monarch, all his glories
fade;
He mingles with the throng, outcast, un-
done,
The pageant of a day; without one friend
To soothe his tortur'd mind; all, all are fled,
For though they bask'd in his meridian ray,
The insects vanish as his beams decline.
—Somerville.

Courtesy

I am the very pink of courtesy.—
Shakespeare.

Approved valor is made precious by natural courtesy.—Sir P. Sidney.

A churlish courtesy rarely comes but either for gain or falsehood.—Sir
P. Sidney.

There is no outward sign of courtesy that does not rest on a deep moral foundation.—Goethe.

O dissembling courtesy! how fine this tyrant can tickle where she wounds!—Shakespeare.

The small courtesies sweeten life;
the greater ennoble it.—Bovee.

What fairer cloak than courtesy for fraud?—Earl of Stirling.

Nothing costs less nor is cheaper than compliments of civility.—Cervantes.

Civility is a desire to receive civility, and to be accounted well-bred.—
Roche foucauld.

When my friends are blind of one eye, I look at them in profile.—Joubert.

Whilst thou livest, keep a good tongue in thy head.—Shakespeare.

Courtesy is a duty public servants owe to the humblest member of the public.—Lord Lytton.

We must be as courteous to a man as we are to a picture, which we are willing to give the advantage of a good light.—Emerson.

There is a courtesy of the heart; it is allied to love. From it springs the purest courtesy in the outward behavior.—Goethe.

If ever I should affect injustice, it would be in this, that I might do courtesies and receive none.—Feltham.

Life is not so short but that there is always time enough for courtesy.—Emerson.

A moral, sensible, and well-bred man
Will not affront me, and no other can.
—Cowper.

A good word is an easy obligation; but not to speak ill requires only our silence, which costs us nothing.—Tillotson.

Courtesy which oft is sooner found in lowly sheds, with smoky rafters, than in tapestry halls and courts of princes, where it first was named.—Milton.

When we are saluted with a salutation, salute the person with a better salutation, or at least return the same, for God taketh an account of all things.—Koran.

The whole of heraldry and of chivalry is in courtesy. A man of fine manners shall pronounce your name with all the ornament that titles of nobility could ever add.—Emerson.

By a union of courtesy and talent an adversary may be made to grace his own defeat, as the sandal-tree performs the hatchet that cuts it down.—Chatfield.

This Florentine's a very saint, so meek
And full of courtesy, that he would lend
The devil his cloak, and stand i' th' rain himself.
—Davenant.

As the sword of the best-tempered metal is the most flexible; so the truly generous are most pliant and courteous in their behavior to their inferiors.—Fuller.

Ill seemes (sayd he) if he so valiant be,
That he should be so sterne to stranger
wight;
For seldom yet did living creature see
That courtesie and manhood ever disagree.
—Spenser.

Hail! ye small sweet courtesies of life, for smooth do ye make the road of it, like grace and beauty, which beget inclinations to love at first sight; it is ye who open the door and let the stranger in.—Sterne.

Shepherd, I take thy word,
And trust thy honest offer'd courtesy,
Which oft is sooner found in lowly sheds
With smoky rafters, than in tap'stry halls,
And courts of princes.
—Milton.

When Zachariah Fox, the great merchant of Liverpool, was asked by what means he contrived to realize so large a fortune as he possessed, his reply was: "Friend, by one article alone, and in which thou mayest deal too, if thou pleasest,—it is civility."—Bentley.

How sweet and gracious, even in common speech,
Is that fine sense which men call Courtesy!
Wholesome as air and genial as the light,
Welcome in every clime as breath of flowers—
It transmutes aliens into trusting friends,
And gives its owner passport round the globe.
—James T. Fields.

Courtesy, like grace and beauty, that which begets liking and inclination to love one another at the first sight, and in the very beginning of our acquaintance and familiarity; and, consequently, that which first opens the door for us to better ourselves by the example of others, if there be anything in the society worth notice.—Montaigne.

Courtesy is a science of the highest importance. It is, like grace and beauty in the body, which charm at first sight, and lead on to further intimacy and friendship, opening a door that we may derive instruction from the example of others, and at the same time enabling us to benefit them by our example, if there be anything in our character worthy of imitation.—Montaigne.

Great talents, such as honor, virtue, learning, and parts, are above the generality of the world, who neither possess them themselves, nor judge of them rightly in others; but all people are judges of the lesser talents, such as civility, affability, and an obliging, agreeable address and manner, because they feel the good effects of them, as making society easy and pleasing.—Chesterfield.

Nothing is a courtesy unless it be meant us, and that friendly and lovingly. We owe no thanks to rivers that they carry our boats, or winds that they be favoring and fill our sails, or meats that they be nourishing; for these are what they are necessarily. Horses carry us, trees shade us; but they know it not.—Ben Jonson.

Courtship

The pleasantest part of a man's life.—Addison.

She most attracts who longest can refuse.—Aaron Hill.

See how the skilful lover spreads his toils.—Stillingfleet.

She half consents—who silently denies.—Ovid.

Men dream in courtship, but in wedlock wake!—Pope.

A feast is more fatal to love than a fast.—Colton.

Ah, fool! faint heart fair lady ne'er could win.—Spenser.

What a woman says to her lover should be written on air or swift water.—Catullus.

The acceptance of favors from the other sex is a woman's first step towards self-committal.—Mme. de Pui-sieux.

So, with decorum all things carried,
Miss frown'd, and blush'd, and then was married.—Goldsmith.

O, that I were a glove upon that hand,
That I might touch that cheek!
—Shakespeare.

She is a woman, therefore may be woo'd;
She is a woman, therefore may be won.
—Shakespeare.

That man that has a tongue, I say,
is no man if with his tongue he cannot win a woman.—Shakespeare.

A woman that wishes to retain her suitor must keep him in the trenches.
—Colton.

Men are April when they woo, December when they wed.—Shakespeare.

I knelt, and with the fervor of a lip unused to the cool breath of reason, told my love.—Willis.

With women worth the being won,
The softest lover ever best succeeds.
—Hill.

It is your virtue, being men, to try;
And it is ours, by virtue to deny.
—Drayton.

Who listens once will listen twice;
her heart be sure is not of ice, and one refusal no rebuff.—Byron.

A fellow who lives in a windmill has not a more whimsical dwelling than the heart of a man that is lodged in a woman.—Congreve.

Every man in the time of courtship and in the first entrance of marriage, puts on a behavior like my correspondent's holiday suit.—Addison.

Courtship consists in a number of quiet attentions, not so pointed as to alarm, nor so vague as not to be understood.—Sterne.

If you cannot inspire a woman with love of you, fill her above the brim with love of herself; all that runs over will be yours.—Colton.

A man is in no danger so long as he talks his love; but to write it is to impale himself on his own pothooks.—Douglas Jerrold.

I profess not to know how women's hearts are wooed and won. To me they have always been matters of ridicule and admiration.—Washington Irving.

God has put into the heart of man love and the boldness to sue, and into the heart of woman fear and the courage to refuse.—Marguerite de Valois

When a woman is deliberating with herself whom she shall choose of many near each other in other pretensions, certainly he of the best understanding is to be preferred.—Steele.

Now from the world,
Sacred to sweet retirement, lovers steal,
And pour their souls in transport.
—Thomson.

Into these ears of mine,
These credulous ears, he pour'd the sweetest words
That art or love could frame.—Beaumont.

Rejected lovers need never despair!
There are four-and-twenty hours in a day, and not a moment in the twenty-four in which a woman may not change her mind.—De Finod.

The Greek epigram intimates that the force of love is not shown by the courting of beauty, but where the like desire is inflamed for one who is ill-favored.—Emerson.

If fathers are sometimes sulky at the appearance of the destined son-in-law, is it not a fact that mothers become sentimental and, as it were, love their own loves over again—
Thackeray.

Tom hinted at his dislike at some trifle his mistress had said; she asked him how he would talk to her after marriage if he talked at this rate before.—Addison.

She that with poetry is won,
Is but a desk to write upon;
And what men say of her they mean
No more than on the thing they lean.
—Butler.

He that would win his dame must do
As love does when he draws his bow;
With one hand thrust the lady from,
And with the other pull her home.
—Butler.

Wooing thee, I found thee of more value
Than stamps in gold or sums in sealed bags;
And 'tis the very riches of thyself
That now I aim at. —Shakespeare.

How would that excellent mystery, wedded life, irradiate the world with its blessed influences, were the generous impulses and sentiments of courtship but perpetuated in all their exuberant fullness during the sequel of marriage!—Frederic Saunders.

Women are angels, wooing:
Things won are done; joy's soul lies in the
doing:
That she beloved knows naught, that knows not this—
Men prize the thing ungained more than it is. —Shakespeare.

Do proper homage to thine idol's eyes,
But not too humbly, or she will despise.
Thee and thy suit though told in moving tropes;
Disguise even tenderness, if thou art wise,
—Byron.

Like a lovely tree
She grew to womanhood, and between
whiles
Rejected several suitors, just to learn
How to accept a better in his turn.
—Byron.

Like conquering tyrants you our breasts invade,
Where you are pleas'd to ravage for awhile;
But soon you find new conquests out and leave
The ravag'd province ruinate and bare.
—Otway.

There is, sir, a critical minute in Ev'ry man's wooing, when his mistress may
Be won, which if he carelessly neglect
To prosecute, he may wait long enough
Before he gain the like opportunity.
—Marmion.

The pleasantest part of a man's life is generally that which passes in courtship, provided his passion be sincere, and the party beloved kind with discretion. Love, desire, hope, all the pleasing emotions of the soul, rise in the pursuit.—Addison.

He that can keep handsomely within rules, and support the carriage of a companion to his mistress, is much more likely to prevail than he who lets her see the whole relish of his life depends upon her. If possible, therefore, divert your mistress rather than sigh for her.—Steele.

Let a woman once give you a task, and you are hers, heart and soul; all your care and trouble lend new charms to her for whose sake they are taken.

To rescue, to revenge, to instruct, or protect a woman is all the same as to love her.—Richter.

If she do frown, 'tis not in hate of you,
But rather to beget more love in you:
If she do chide, 'tis not to have you gone;
For why, the fools are mad if left alone.
Take no repulse, whatever she doth say;
For—get you gone—she doth not mean—away. —Shakespeare.

Every man ought to be in love a few times in his life, and to have a smart attack of the fever. You are better for it when it is over: the better for your misfortune, if you endure it with a manly heart; how much the better for success, if you win it and a good wife into the bargain!—Thackeray.

Courtship is a fine bowling-green turf, all galloping round and sweet-hearting, a sunshine holiday in summer time; but when once through matrimony's turnpike, the weather becomes wintry, and some husbands are seized with a cold, aguish fit, to which the faculty give the name of indifference.—G. A. Stevens.

His folded flock secure, the shepherd home
Hies merry-hearted; and by turns relieves
The ruddy milk-maid of her brimming pail;
The beauty whom perhaps his witless heart,
Unknowing what the joy-mix'd anguish means,
Sincerely loves, by that best language shown
Of cordial glances, and obliging deeds.
—Thomson.

And otherwhyles with amorous delights
And pleasing toys he would her entertaine,
Now singing sweetly to surprise her
sprights,
Now making layes of love and lover's paine,
Bransles, ballads, virelayes, and verses vaine!
Oft purposes, oft riddles, he devys'd;
And thousands like which flowed in his braine,
With which he fed her fancy, and entsy'd
To take to his new love, and leave her old despy's'd. —Spenser.

Maggie and Stephen were in that stage of courtship which makes the most exquisite moment of youth, the freshest blossom-time of passion,—when each is sure of the other's love, but no formal declaration has been made, and all is mutual divination, exalting the most trivial words, the lightest gestures, into thrills delicate and delicious as wafted jasmine scent.

—George Eliot.

Say that she rail; why then I'll tell her plain,
She sings as sweetly as a nightingale;
Say that she frown; I'll say she looks as clear
As morning roses, newly wash'd with dew;
Say she be mute and will not speak a word,
Then I'll commend her volubility
And say she uttereth piercing eloquence.
—Shakespeare.

O days remember'd well! remember'd all!
The bitter sweet, the honey and the gall;
Those garden rambles in the silent night,
Those trees so shady, and that moon so
bright,
That thickset alley by the arbor clos'd,
That woodbine seat where we at last re-
pos'd;
And then the hopes that came and then were gone,
Quick as the clouds beneath the moon past
on. —Crabbe.

A town, before it can be plundered and deserted, must first be taken; and in this particular Venus has borrowed a law from her consort Mars. A woman that wishes to retain her suitor must keep him in the trenches; for this is a siege which the besieger never raises for want of supplies, since a feast is more fatal to love than a fast, and a surfeit than a starvation. Inanition may cause it to die a slow death, but repletion always destroys it by a sudden one.—Colton.

Covetousness

Covetousness, which is idolatry.—Bible.

The soul of man is infinite in what it covets.—Ben Jonson.

The covetous man.—Horace.

We never desire earnestly what we desire in reason.—La Rochefoucauld.

To the covetous man life is a nightmare, and God lets him wrestle with it as best he may.—Henry Ward Beecher

Covetousness is ever attended with solicitude and anxiety.—Benjamin Franklin.

He deservedly loses his own property, who covets that of another.—Phædrus.

Those who give not till they die show that they would not then if they could keep it any longer.—Bishop Hall.

Covetousness swells the principal to no purpose, and lessens the use to all purposes.—Jeremy Taylor.

The covetous man heaps up riches, not to enjoy them, but to have them.—Tillotson.

The covetous person lives as if the world were made altogether for him, and not he for the world.—South.

The covetous man explores the whole world in pursuit of a subsistence, and fate is close at his heels.—Saadi.

Some men are so covetous, as if they were to live forever; and others so profuse, as if they were to die the next moment.—Aristotle.

The things which belong to others please us more, and that which is ours, is more pleasing to others.—Syrus.

Take heed and beware of covetousness; for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth.—Bible.

Covetous men need money least, yet they most affect it; but prodigals, who need it most have the least regard for it.—Alexander Wilson.

Why are we so blind? That which we improve, we have, that which we hoard is not for ourselves.—Madame Deluzy.

Covetousness, by a greediness of getting more, deprives itself of the true end of getting; it loses the enjoyment of what it has got.—Sprat.

When all sins are old in us, and go upon crutches, covetousness does but then lie in her cradle.—Decker.

When workmen strive to do better than well, they do confound their skill in covetousness.—Shakespeare.

Covetousness is a sort of mental gluttony, not confined to money, but craving honor, and feeding on selfishness.—Chamfort.

Covetousness, like a candle ill made, smothers the splendor of a happy fortune in its own grease.—F. Osborn.

Poor in abundance, famished at a feast, man's grief is but his grandeur in disguise, and discontent is immortality.—Young.

Those that much covet are with gain so fond,
That what they have not, that which they possess,
They scatter and unloose it from their bond,
And so, by hoping more, they have but less.
—Shakespeare.

The only sovereign remedy is to give Christ the pre-eminence in our hearts; for then we shall undervalue all temporal things in comparison of Him.—Fisher's Catechism.

The covetous man is like a camel with a great hunch on his back; heaven's gate must be made higher and broader, or he will hardly get in.—Thomas Adams.

The only instance of a despairing sinner left upon record in the New Testament is that of a treacherous and greedy Judas.

Covetousness, like jealousy, when it has once taken root, never leaves a man but with his life.—Thomas Hughes.

If money be not thy servant, it will be thy master. The covetous man cannot so properly be said to possess wealth, as that it may be said to possess him.—Bacon.

The covetous man pines in plenty, like Tantalus up to the chin in water, and yet thirsty.—Rev. T. Adams.

Where necessity ends, desire and curiosity begin; and no sooner are we supplied with everything nature can demand than we sit down to contrive artificial appetites.—Johnson.

Of covetousness we may truly say that it makes both the Alpha and Omega in the devil's alphabet, and that it is the first vice in corrupt nature which moves, and the last which dies.—South.

To think well of every other man's condition, and to dislike our own, is one of the misfortunes of human nature. "Pleased with each other's lot, our own we hate."—Burton.

He that visits the sick, in hopes of a legacy, let him be never so friendly in all other cases, I look upon him in this, to be no better than a raven, that watches a weak sheep only to peck out its eyes.—Seneca.

Although the beauties, riches, honors, sciences, virtues, and perfections of all men living were in the present possession of one, yet somewhat above and beyond all this would still be sought and earnestly thirsted for.—Hooker.

Covetousness teaches men to be cruel and crafty, industrious and evil, full of care and malice; and after all this, it is for no good to itself, for it dares not spend those heaps of treasure which it has snatched.—Jeremy Taylor.

Covetous men are fools, miserable wretches, buzzards, madmen, who live by themselves, in perpetual slavery, fear, suspicion, sorrow, discontent, with more of gall than honey in their enjoyments; who are rather possessed by their money than possessors of it.—Burton.

A circle cannot fill a triangle, so neither can the whole world, if it were to be compassed, the heart of man; a man may as easily fill a chest with grace as the heart with gold. The air fills not the body, neither doth money the covetous mind of man.—Spenser.

Suppose a more complete assemblage of sublunary enjoyments, and a more perfect system of earthly felicity than ever the sun beheld, the mind of man would instantly devour it, and, as if it was still empty and unsatisfied, would require something more.—Leighton.

I am not covetous for gold,
Nor care I who doth feed upon my cost;
It yearns me not if men my garments wear;
Such outward things dwell not in my desires:
But if it be a sin to covet honor
I am the most offending soul alive.
—Shakespeare.

The covetous man heaps up riches, not to enjoy them, but to have them; and starves himself in the midst of plenty, and most unnaturally cheats and robs himself of that which is his own; and makes a hard shift, to be as poor and miserable with a great estate, as any man can be without it.—Tillotson.

It was with good reason that God commanded through Moses that the vineyard and harvest were not to be gleaned to the last grape or grain; but something to be left for the poor. For covetousness is never to be satisfied; the more it has, the more it wants. Such insatiable ones injure themselves, and transform God's blessings into evil.—Luther.

There is not a vice which more effectually contracts and deadens the feelings, which more completely makes a man's affections center in himself, and excludes all others from partaking in them, than the desire of accumulating possessions. When the desire has once gotten hold on the heart, it shuts out all other considerations, but such as may promote its views. In its zeal for the attainment of its end, it is not delicate in the choice of means. As it closes the heart, so also it clouds the understanding. It cannot discern between right and wrong; it takes evil for good, and good for evil; it calls darkness light, and light darkness. Beware, then, of the beginning of covetousness, for you know not where it will end.—Bishop Mant.

Cow

A cow is a very good animal in the field; but we turn her out of a garden.—Samuel Johnson.

Coward — Cowardice

Cowards die many times before their death.—Shakespeare.

All men would be cowards if they durst.—Earl of Rochester.

Cowards have no luck.—Elizabeth Kulman.

Cruel people are ever cowards in emergency.—Swift.

To wish for death is a coward's part.—Ovid.

Cowardice, the dread of what will happen.—Epictetus.

A plague of all cowards, I say.—Shakespeare.

A coward's fear can make a coward valiant.—Owen Feltham.

It is the misfortune of worthy people that they are cowards.—Voltaire.

What masks are these uniforms to hide cowards!—Duke of Wellington.

The craven's fear is but selfishness, like his merriment.—Whittier.

A cowardly cur barks more fiercely than it bites.—Quintus Curtius Rufus.

A coward; a most devout coward; religious in it.—Shakespeare.

It is only in little matters that men are cowards.—W. H. Herbert.

The native hue of resolution is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought.—Shakespeare.

Commonly they use their feet for defence, whose tongue is their weapon. Sir P. Sidney.

To see what is right and not to do it is want of courage.—Confucius.

Fear is the virtue of slaves; but the heart that loveth is willing.—Longfellow.

Mankind are dastardly when they meet with opposition.—Franklin.

The coward never on himself relies,
But to an equal for assistance flies.
—Crabbe.

Cowards falter, but danger is often overcome by those who nobly dare.—Queen Elizabeth.

Strange that cowards cannot see that their greatest safety lies in dauntless courage.—Lavater.

Plenty and peace breed cowards;
hardness ever of hardness is mother.
—Shakespeare.

Cowards fear to die; but courage stout,
Rather than live in snuff, will be put out.
—Sir Walter Raleigh.

A coward is the kindest animal;
'Tis the most forgiving creature in a fight.
—Dryden.

That same man that rennith awaie,
Maie again fight, an other daie.
—Erasmus.

I would give all my fame for a pot of ale and safety.—Shakespeare.

When all the blandishments of life are gone,
The coward sneaks to death, the brave live on.
—Dr. Sewell.

Cowards are cruel, but the brave
Love mercy, and delight to save.
—Gay.

Fear is my vassal, when I frown he flies;
A hundred times in life a coward dies.
—Marston.

But look for ruin when a coward wins;
For fear and cruelty are ever twins.
—Aleyn.

When desperate ills demand a speedy cure, distrust is cowardice, and prudence folly.—Dr. Johnson.

Men lie, who lack courage to tell truth—the cowards!—Joaquin Miller.

My valor is certainly going!—it is sneaking off!—I feel it oozing out, as it were, at the palms of my hands.—Sheridan.

Go—let thy less than woman's hand
Assume the distaff—not the brand.
—Byron.

He who fears to venture as far as his heart urges and his reason permits, is a coward; he who ventures further than he intended to go, is a slave.—Heine.

The man that lays his hand on woman,
Save in the way of kindness, is a wretch
Whom 'twere gross flattery to name a coward.
—Tobin.

All mankind is one of these two cowards—either to wish to die when he should live, or live when he should die.—Sir Robert Howard.

It is the coward who fawns upon those above him. It is the coward that is insolent whenever he dares be so.—Junius.

It is vain for the coward to fly; death follows close behind; it is by defying it that the brave escape.—Voltaire.

For cowards the road of desertion should be left open. They will carry over to the enemy nothing but their fears.—Bovee.

Dangers are light, if they seem light; and more dangers have deceived men than forced them.—Bacon.

Some are brave men one day and cowards another, as great captains have often told me, from their own experience and observation.—Sir W. Temple.

Dost thou now fall over to my foes?
Thou wear a lion's hide! doff it for shame,
And hang a calf's skin on those recreant limbs.
—Shakespeare.

To be afraid is the miserable condition of a coward. To do wrong, or omit to do right from fear, is to super-add delinquency to cowardice.—David Dudley Field.

Cowardice encroaches fast upon such as spend their lives in company of persons higher than themselves.—Dr. Johnson.

Cowardice is not synonymous with prudence. It often happens that the better part of discretion is valor.—Hazlitt.

The coward wretch whose hand and heart
Can bear to torture aught below,
Is ever first to quail and start
From slightest pain or equal foe.
—Eliza Cook.

He who fights and runs away
May live to fight another day.
But he who is in battle slain,
Can never rise to fight again.
—Goldsmith.

If cowardice were not so completely a coward as to be unable to look steadily upon the effects of courage, he would find that there is no refuge so sure as dauntless valor.—Jane Porter.

Lie not, neither to thyself, nor man, nor God. Let mouth and heart be one; beat and speak together, and make both felt in action. It is for cowards to lie.—George Herbert.

It is a law of nature that faint-hearted men should be the fruit of luxurious countries, for we never find that the same soil produces delicacies and heroes.—Herodotus.

To die, and thus avoid poverty or love, or anything painful, is not the part of a brave man, but rather of a coward; for it is cowardice to avoid trouble, and the suicide does not undergo death because it is honorable, but in order to avoid evil.—Aristotle.

What is in reality cowardice and faithlessness, we call charity, and consider it the part of benevolence sometimes to forgive men's evil practice for the sake of their accurate faith, and sometimes to forgive their confessed heresy for the sake of their admirable practice.—Ruskin.

The fact is, that to do anything in this world worth doing, we must not stand back shivering and thinking of the cold and danger, but jump in and scramble through as well as we can.—Sydney Smith.

The courage that grows from constitution very often forsakes a man when he has occasion for it; and when it is only a kind of instinct in the soul, it breaks out on all occasions, without judgment or discretion.—Addison.

How many cowards, whose hearts are all as false

As stairs of sand, wear yet upon their chins
The beards of Hercules and frowning Mars,

Who, inward search'd, have livers white as milk. —Shakespeare.

When the passengers gallop by as if fear made them speedy, the cur follows them with an open mouth; let them walk by in confident neglect, and the dog will not stir at all; it is a weakness that every creature takes advantage of.—J. Beaumont.

Cowards die many times before their deaths:

The valiant never taste of death but once.
Of all the wonders that I yet have heard,
It seems to me most strange that men should fear;

Seeing that death, a necessary end,
Will come when it will come. —Shakespeare.

He

That kills himself to avoid misery, fears it,
And, at the best, shows but a bastard valor.
This life's a fort committed to my trust,
Which I must not yield up, till it be forced:

Nor will I. He's not valiant that dares die,
But he that boldly bears calamity.

—Massinger.

Thou slave, thou wretch, thou coward!
Thou little valiant, great in villainy!
Thou ever strong upon the stronger side!
Thou Fortune's champion, that dost never fight
But when her humorous ladyship is by
To teach thee safety. —Shakespeare.

The reign of terror to which France submitted has been more justly termed "the reign of cowardice." One knows not which most to execrate,—the nation that could submit to suffer such atrocities, or that low and blood-thirsty demagogue that could inflict them. France, in succumbing to such a wretch as Robespierre, exhibited, not her patience, but her pusillanimity.—Colton.

A great deal of talent is lost in the world for want of a little courage. Every day sends to their graves a number of obscure men who have only remained in obscurity because their timidity has prevented them from making a first effort.—Sydney Smith.

Coxcomb

Once a coxcomb, always a coxcomb. —Dr. Johnson.

A coxcomb is the blockhead's man of merit.—La Bruyère.

A coxcomb is ugly all over with the affectation of the fine gentleman.—Johnson.

A coxcomb is four-fifths affectation and one-fifth vanity.—Haliburton.

A man of sense and gravity is less apt to succeed with a fine woman than the gay, the giddy, the flattering coxcomb.—Henry Horne.

This is he
That kiss'd away his hand in courtesy;
This is the ape of form, monsieur the nice,
That when he plays at tables, chides the dice
In honorable terms; nay, he can sing
A mean most meanly; and in ushering,
Mend him who can; the ladies call him,
sweet;
The stairs, as he treads on them, kiss his feet. —Shakespeare.

He was perfum'd like a milliner:
And 'twixt his finger and his thumb he held
A pouncet-box, which ever and anon
He gave his nose: and still he smil'd and talk'd;
And as the soldiers bore dead bodies by,
He call'd them untaught knaves, unmanly,
To bring a slovenly unhandsome corpse
Betwixt the wind and his nobility. —Shakespeare.

A vulgar man is captious and jealous; eager and impetuous about trifles. He suspects himself to be slighted, and thinks everything that is said meant at him.—Chesterfield.

All the world says of a coxcomb that he is a coxcomb; but no one dares to say so to his face, and he dies without knowing it.—Brnyère.

None are so seldom found alone, and are so soon tired of their own company, as those coxcombs who are on the best terms with themselves.—Colton.

A coxcomb begins by determining that his own profession is the first; and he finishes by deciding that he is the first of his profession.—Colton.

Craft

When the fox hath once got in his nose, He'll soon find means to make the body follow. —Shakespeare.

For he
That sows in craft does reap in jealousy. —Middleton.

That for ways that are dark
And for tricks that are vain,
The heathen Chinese is peculiar. —Bret Harte.

This is the fruit of craft:
Like him that shoots up high, looks for the shaft,
And finds it in his forehead.—Middleton.

Creation

Creation is great, and cannot be understood.—Carlyle.

All are but parts of one stupendous whole,
Whose body Nature is, and God the soul. —Pope.

Silently as a dream the fabric rose;
No sound of hammer or of saw was there. —Cowper.

As Thou has created me out of mingled air and glitter, I thank Thee for it.—Rückert.

God only opened His hand to give flight to a thought that He had held imprisoned from eternity.—Timothy Titcomb.

God may rationally be supposed to have framed so great and admirable an automaton as the world for special ends and purposes.—Robert Boyle.

A spontaneous production is against matter of fact; a thing without example, not only in man, but the vilest of weeds.—Bentley.

The chain that's fixed to the throne of Jove,
On which the fabric of our world depends,
One link dissolved, the whole creation ends. —Edmund Waller.

One God, one law, one element,
And one far-off divine event,
To which the whole creation moves. —Tennyson.

Though to recount almighty works
What words of tongue or seraph can suffice,
Or heart of man suffice to comprehend? —Milton.

Open, ye heavens, your living doors; let in
The great Creator from His work return'd
Magnificent, His six days' work, a world! —Milton.

Had I been present at the creation,
I would have given some useful hints for the better ordering of the universe. —Alphonso the Wise.

Nature, they say, doth dote,
And cannot make a man
Save on some worn-out plan,
Repeating us by rote. —Lowell.

The wisdom and goodness of the Maker plainly appears in the parts of this stupendous fabric, and the several degrees and ranks of creatures in it.—Locke.

A wonder it must be, that there should be any man found so stupid as to persuade himself that this most beautiful world could be produced by the fortuitous concourse of atoms.—John Ray.

God is a worker: He has thickly strewn
Infinity with grandeur: God is love:
He shall wipe away creation's tears,
And all the worlds shall summer in His smile. —Smith.

No man saw the building of the New Jerusalem, the workmen crowded together, the unfinished walls and unpaved streets; no man heard the clink of trowel and pickaxe; it descended out of heaven from God.—Seeley.

It became Him who created it to set it in order; and if he did so, it is unphilosophical to seek for any other origin of the world, or to pretend that it might arise out of a chaos by the mere laws of Nature.—Newton.

Through knowledge we behold the world's creation,
How in his cradle first he fostered was;
And judge of Nature's cunning operation,
How things she formed of a formless mass.
—Spenser.

What cause
Moved the Creator in His holy rest
Through all eternity so late to build
In chaos, and, the work begun, how soon Absolved.
—Milton.

Whoever considers the study of anatomy I believe will never be an atheist: the frame of man's body and coherence of his parts being so strange and paradoxical that I hold it to be the greatest miracle of Nature.—Herbert of Cherbury.

In the vast, and the minute, we see
The unambiguous footsteps of the God,
Who gives its lustre to an insect's wing
And wheels His throne upon the rolling worlds.
—Cowper.

From harmony, from heavenly harmony,
This universal frame began:
From harmony, to harmony,
Through all the compass of the notes it ran,
The diapason closing full in man.
—Dryden.

Then tower'd the palace, then in awful state
The temple rear'd its everlasting gate.
No workman steel, no ponderous axes rung,
Like some tall palm the noiseless fabric sprung.
—Bishop Heber.

Let no presuming impious railer tax
Creative wisdom as if aught was form'd
In vain, or not for admirable ends.
Shall little haughty ignorance pronounce
His works unwise of which the smallest part Exceeds the narrow vision of his mind?
—Thomson.

The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth His handiwork. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge. There is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard—Bible.

For wonderful indeed are all His works,
Pleasant to know, and worthiest to be all
Had in remembrance always with delight;
But what created mind can comprehend
Their number, or the wisdom infinite That brought them forth, but hid their causes deep?
—Milton.

The spacious firmament on high,
With all the blue ethereal sky,
And spangled heavens, a shining frame
Their great Original proclaim.
* * * * *

Forever singing as they shine
The hand that made us is divine.
—Addison.

How often might a man, after he had jumbled a set of letters in a bag, fling them out upon the ground before they would fall into an exact poem,— yea, or so much as make a good discourse in prose? And may not a little book be as easily made by chance as this great volume of the world?—Tillotson.

From nature's constant or eccentric laws,
The thoughtful soul this general inference
draws,
That an effect must pre-suppose a cause;
And, while she does her upward flight sus-tain,
Touching each link of the continued chain,
At length she is oblig'd and forc'd to see
A first, a source, a life, a Deity;
Which has forever been, and must forever be.
—Prior.

The ever varying brilliancy and grandeur of the landscape, and the magnificence of the sky, sun, moon and stars, enter more extensively into the enjoyment of mankind than we, perhaps ever think, or can possibly apprehend, without frequent and extensive investigation. This beauty and splendour of the objects around us, it is ever to be remembered, is not necessary to their existence, nor to what we commonly intend by their usefulness. It is therefore to be regarded as a source of pleasure, gratuitously superinduced upon the general nature of the objects themselves, and in this light, a testimony of the divine goodness, peculiarly affecting.— Dwight.

We cannot look around us, without being struck by the surprising variety and multiplicity of the sources of beauty of creation, produced by form, or by colour, or by both united. It is scarcely too much to say, that every object in nature, animate or inanimate, is in some manner beautiful, so largely has the Creator provided for our pleasures, through the sense of sight. It is rare to see anything, which is in itself distasteful, or disagreeable to the eye, or repulsive.—
Macculloch.

Credit — Creditor

Public credit is suspicion asleep.—
Thomas Paine.

What is bought is cheaper than a gift.—Cervantes.

If confidence is a plant of slow growth, credit is one which matures much more slowly.—Beaconsfield.

Lose not thine own for want of asking for it; 'twill get thee no thanks.—
Fuller.

Blest paper-credit! last and best supply!
That lends corruption lighter wings to fly.
—Pope.

Every man's credit and consequence are proportioned to the sums which he holds in his chest.—Juvenal.

The creditor whose appearance gladdens the heart of a debtor may hold his head in sunbeams and his foot on storms.—Lavater.

Creditors have better memories than debtors; and creditors are a superstitious sect, great observers of set days and times.—Franklin.

Private credit is wealth; public honor is security. The feather that adorns the royal bird supports its flight; strip him of his plumage, and you pin him to the earth.—Junius.

He smote the rock of the national resources, and abundant streams of revenue gushed forth. He touched the dead corpse of Public Credit, and it sprang upon its feet.—Daniel Webster.

We have now learned that rashness and imprudence will not be deterred from taking credit; let us try whether fraud and avarice may be more easily restrained from giving it.—Dr. Johnson.

Credit is a matter so subtle in its essence, that, as it may be obtained almost without reason, so, without reason, may it be made to melt away.—
Anthony Trollope.

The most trifling actions that affect a man's credit are to be regarded. The sound of your hammer at five in the morning or nine at night, heard by a creditor, makes him easy six months longer; but if he sees you at a billiard table, or hears your voice at a tavern, when you should be at work, he sends for his money the next day.—Franklin.

There is nothing in this world so fiendish as the conduct of a mean man when he has the power to revenge himself upon a noble one in adversity. It takes a man to make a devil; and the fittest man for such a purpose is a snarling, waspish, red-hot, fiery creditor.—Beecher.

Credulity

Your noblest natures are most credulous.—Chapman.

Quick believers need broad shoulders.—George Herbert.

Credulity thinks others short-sighted.—Abbé Guerguil.

The only disadvantage of an honest heart is credulity.—Sir P. Sidney.

You believe that easily which you hope for earnestly.—Terence.

It is as wise to moderate our belief as our desires.—Landor.

We believe easily what we fear or what we desire.—La Fontaine

When credulity comes from the heart it does no harm to the intellect.—Joubert.

Credulity is perhaps a weakness almost inseparable from eminently truthful characters.—Tuckerman.

I wish I was as sure of anything as Macaulay is of everything.—William Windham.

I cannot spare the luxury of believing that all things beautiful are what they seem.—Halleck.

Generous souls
Are still most subject to credulity.
—Davenant.

We believe at once in evil; we only believe in good upon reflection. Is not this sad?—Madame Deluzy.

Ignorant people are to be caught by the ears as one catches a pot by the handle.—From the French.

Men are most apt to believe what they least understand; and through the lust of human wit obscure things are more easily credited.—Pliny.

Women are sometimes drawn in to believe against probability by the unwillingness they have to doubt their own merit.—Richardson.

O credulity, thou hast as many ears as fame has tongues, open to every sound of truth as of falsehood.—Havard.

Let us believe neither half of the good people tell us of ourselves, nor half the evil they say of others.—J. Petit-Senn.

The incredulous are the most credulous. They believe the miracles of Vespasian that they may not believe those of Moses.—Pascal.

The more gross the fraud, the more glibly will it go down, and the more greedily will it be swallowed, since folly will always find faith wherever impostors will find impudence.—Bovee.

To be deceived by our enemies and betrayed by our friends is not to be borne; yet are we often content to be served so by ourselves.—Rochefoucauld.

The greatest and saddest defect is not credulity, but an habitual forgetfulness that our science is ignorance.—Thoreau.

The general goodness which is nourished in noble hearts makes every one think that strength of virtue to be in another whereof they find assured foundation in themselves.—Sir P. Sidney.

Superstition is certainly not the characteristic of this age. Yet some men are bigoted in politics who are infidels in religion. Ridiculous credulity!—Junius.

It is a curious paradox that precisely in proportion to our own intellectual weakness will be our credulity as to those mysterious powers assumed by others.—Colton.

Credulity is the common failing of inexperienced virtue, and he who is spontaneously suspicious may be justly charged with radical corruption.—Johnson.

What believer sees a disturbing omission or infelicity? The text, whether of prophet or of poet, expands for whatever we can put into it; and even his bad grammar is sublime.—George Eliot.

A man must have a good deal of vanity who believes, and a good deal of boldness who affirms, that all the doctrines he holds are true, and all he rejects are false.—Franklin.

In all places, and in all times, those religionists who have believed too much have been more inclined to violence and persecution than those who have believed too little.—Colton.

What the light of your mind, which is the direct inspiration of the Al mighty, pronounces incredible, that, in God's name, leave uncredited. At your peril do not try believing that!—Caryle.

We all know that a lie needs no other grounds than the invention of the liar; and to take for granted as truth all that is alleged against the fame of others is a species of credulity that men would blush at on any other subject.—Jane Porter.

O credulity,
Security's blind nurse, the dream of fools,
The drunkard's ape, that feeling for his way
Ev'n when he thinks, in his deluded sense
To snatch at safety, falls without defence.
—Mason.

Blessed credulity, thou great great god of error,
Thou art the strong foundation of huge wrongs,
To thee give I my vows and sacrifice;
By thee, great deity, he doth believe Falsehoods, that falsehood's self could not invent;
And from that misbelief doth draw a course
T' o'erwhelm e'en virtue, truth and sanctity.
Let him go on, blest stars, 'tis meet he fall,
Whose blindfold judgment hath no guide at all.
—Machen.

It is a curious paradox that precisely in proportion to our own intellectual weakness will be our credulity, to those mysterious powers assumed by others; and in those regions of darkness and ignorance where man cannot effect even those things that are within the power of man, there we shall ever find that a blind belief in feats that are far beyond those powers has taken the deepest root in the minds of the deceived, and produced the richest harvest to the knavery of the deceiver.—Colton.

Fear, if it be not immoderate, puts a guard about us that does watch and defend us; but credulity keeps us naked, and lays us open to all the sly assaults of ill-intending men: it was a virtue when man was in his innocence; but since his fall, it abuses those that own it.—Feltham.

Creed

Life is one, religion one, creeds are many and diverse.—A. Bronson Alcott.

He that will believe only what he can fully comprehend must have a very long head or a very short creed.—Colton.

Call your opinions your creed, and you will change it every week. Make your creed simply and broadly out of the revelation of God, and you may keep it to the end.—Phillips Brooks.

Shall I ask the brave soldier who fights by my side
In the cause of mankind, if our creeds agree?
Shall I give up the friend I have valued and tried,
If he kneel not before the same altar with me?
—Moore.

In politics, as in religion, it so happens that we have less charity for those who believe the half of our creed than for those who deny the whole of it, since if Servetus had been a Mahomedan he would not have been burnt by Calvin.—Colton.

And so the Word had breath, and wrought
With human hands the creed of creeds
In loveliness of perfect deeds,
More strong than all poetic thought.
—Tennyson.

Crime

One crime is everything; two nothing.—Madame Deluzy.

Responsibility prevents crimes.—Burke.

Crimes generally punish themselves.—Oliver Goldsmith.

For all guilt is avenged on earth.—Goethe.

Fear follows crime, and is its punishment.—Voltaire.

Every crime destroys more Edens than our own.—Hawthorne.

Those who are themselves incapable of great crimes are ever backward to suspect others.—Roche foucauld.

Purposelessness is the fruitful mother of crime.—Charles H. Parkhurst.

No crime has been without a precedent.—Seneca.

Well does Heaven have care that no man secures happiness by crime.—Alfieri.

Most people fancy themselves innocent of those crimes of which they cannot be convicted.—Seneca.

How oft the sight of means to do ill deeds
Makes ill deeds done. —Shakespeare.

He who does not prevent a crime when he can, encourages it.—Seneca.

One crime is concealed by the commission of another.—Seneca.

Society prepares the crime; the criminal commits it.—Buckle.

Crime succeeds by sudden despatch; honest counsels gain vigor by delay.—Tacitus.

For he that but conceives a crime in thought,
Contracts the danger of an actual fault. —Creech.

If poverty is the mother of crimes, want of sense is the father.—La Bruyère.

He who overlooks one crime invites the commission of another.—Syrus.

Whoever commits a crime strengthens his enemy.—Daniel O'Connell.

Crimes sometimes shock us too much; vices almost always too little.—Hare.

Those magistrates who can prevent crime, and do not, in effect encourage it.—Cato.

Most crimes are sanctioned in some form or other when they take grand names.—Ouida.

A man who has no excuse for crime is indeed defenseless!—Bulwer-Lytton.

Every crime will bring remorse to the man who committed it.—Juvenal.

For whoever meditates a crime is guilty of the deed.—Juvenal.

To be at peace in crime! ah, who can thus flatter himself?—Voltaire.

You are not to do evil that good may come of it.—Law Maxim.

Many commit the same crimes with a very different result. One bears a cross for his crime; another a crown.—Juvenal.

Crimes lead one into another; they who are capable of being forgers are capable of being incendiaries.—Burke.

No matter how you seem to fatten on a crime, that can never be good for the bee which is bad for the hive.—Emerson.

There are crimes which become innocent and even glorious through their splendor, number and excess.—Rochefoucauld.

Between the acting of a dreadful thing
And the first motion, all the interim is
Like a phantasma, or a hideous dream. —Shakespeare.

But many a crime deemed innocent on earth
Is registered in heaven; and these no doubt
Have each their record, with a curse annex'd. —Cowper.

Foul deeds will rise,
Though all the earth o'erwhelm them, to men's eyes. —Shakespeare.

The perfection of a thing consists in its essence; there are perfect criminals, as there are men of perfect probity.—La Roche.

Man's crimes are his worst enemies, following,
Like shadows, till they drive his steps into
The pit he dug. —Creon.

Where have you ever found that man who stopped short after the perpetration of a single crime?—Juvenal.

For the credit of virtue we must admit that the greatest misfortunes of men are those into which they fall through their crimes.—La Rochefoucauld.

It is supposable that, in the eyes of angels, a struggle down a dark lane and a battle of Leipsic differ in nothing but excess of wickedness.—Willmott.

We want a state of things in which crime will not pay, a state of things which allows every man the largest liberty compatible with the liberty of every other man.—Emerson.

'Tis no sin love's fruits to steal;
But the sweet thefts to reveal;
To be taken, to be seen,
These have crimes accounted been.
—Ben Jonson.

Every crime
Has, in the moment of its perpetration,
Its own avenging angel—dark misgiving,
An ominous sinking at the inmost heart.
—Coleridge.

The contagion of crime is like that of the plague. Criminals collected together corrupt each other; they are worse than ever when at the termination of their punishment they re-enter society.—Napoleon.

There is no den in the wide world to hide a rogue. Commit a crime, and the earth is made of glass. Commit a crime, and it seems as if a coat of snow fell on the ground, such as reveals in the woods the track of every partridge and fox, and squirrel and mole.—Emerson.

We are easily shocked by crimes which appear at once in their full magnitude; but the gradual growth of our wickedness, endeared by interest and palliated by all the artifices of self-deceit, gives us time to form distinctions in our favor.—Dr. Johnson.

Small crimes always precede great crimes. Whoever has been able to transgress the limits set by law may afterwards violate the most sacred rights; crime, like virtue, has its degrees, and never have we seen timid innocence pass suddenly to extreme licentiousness.—Racine.

Of all the adult male criminals in London, not two in a hundred have entered upon a course of crime who have lived an honest life up to the age of twenty; almost all who enter upon a course of crime do so between the ages of eight and sixteen.—Earl of Shaftesbury.

If little faults, proceeding on distemper,
Shall not be wink'd at, how shall we stretch
our eye
When capital crimes, chew'd, swallow'd, and digested,
Appear before us? —Shakespeare.

Oh how will crime engender crime! throw guilt
Upon the soul, and like a stone cast on
The troubled waters of a lake,
'Twill form in circles round succeeding
round,
Each wider than the first.
—Colman the Younger.

Crisis

Things at the worst will cease, or else climb upward to what they were before.—Shakespeare.

In great straits, and when hope is small, the boldest counsels are the safest.—Livy.

There is always a moment in the pyramid of our lives when the apex is reached.—Ninon de Lenclos.

There is a moment of difficulty and danger at which flattery and falsehood can no longer deceive, and simplicity itself can no longer be misled.—Junius.

The nearer any disease approaches to a crisis, the nearer it is to a cure. Danger and deliverance make their advances together; and it is only in the last push that one or the other takes the lead.—Thomas Paine.

Critic — Criticism

Criticism is our weak point.—Goethe.

Criticism is not construction, it is observation.—George William Curtis.

Criticism is easy, and art is difficult.
—P. N. Destouches.

For I am nothing if not critical.—
Shakespeare.

I criticise by creation, not by finding fault.—Michael Angelo.

Cavil you may, but never criticise.
—Pope.

Sir, there is no end of negative criticism.—Johnson.

He wreathed the rod of criticism with roses.—Disraeli.

Ten censure wrong for one who writes amiss.—Pope.

It is much easier to be critical than to be correct.—Beaconsfield.

Hold their farthing candle to the sun.—Young.

A wise scepticism is the first attribute of a good critic.—Lowell.

Good by reason of its exceeding badness.—Macaulay.

You know who the critics are? The men who have failed in literature and art.—Disraeli.

Spite of all the criticising elves,
those who make us feel must feel themselves.—Churchill.

Whoever thinks a faultless piece to see,
Thinks what ne'er was, nor is, nor e'er shall be. —Pope.

In truth it may be laid down as an almost universal rule that good poets are bad critics.—Macaulay.

The most noble criticism is that in which the critic is not the antagonist so much as the rival of the author.—
Isaac Disraeli.

The eyes of critics, whether in commending or carping, are both on one side, like a turbot's.—Landor.

It is a maxim with me that no man was ever written out of reputation but by himself.—Bentley.

But you with pleasure own your errors past,
And make each day a critic on the last.
—Pope.

Of all the cants in this canting world, deliver me from the cant of criticism.—Sterne.

Let those teach others who themselves excel; and censure freely, who have written well.—Pope.

It is easy to criticise an author, but it is difficult to appreciate him.—Vau-
venargues.

Criticism often takes from the tree caterpillars and blossoms together.—
Richter.

Those readiest to criticise are often least able to appreciate.—Joubert.

The strength of criticism lies only in the weakness of the thing criticised.—
Longfellow.

Those who do not read criticism will rarely merit to be criticised.—Isaac Disraeli.

It is the heart that makes the critic,
not the nose.—Max Müller.

The man who becomes a critic by trade ceases, in reality, to be one at all.—Tuckerman.

I had rather be hissed for a good verse than applauded for a bad one.—
Victor Hugo.

The press, the pulpit, and the stage,
Conspire to censure and expose our age.
—Wentworth Dillon.

Blame where you must, be candid where you can,
And be each critic the good-natured man.
—Goldsmith.

Sympathy is the first condition of criticism; reason and justice presup-pose, at their origin, emotion.—Amiel

A critic must accept what is best in a poet, and thus become his best encourager.—Stedman.

A critic should be a pair of snuffers. He is oftener an extinguisher, and not seldom a thief.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

An over-readiness to criticise or to depreciate a minister of Christ is proof of a lack of devotion to Christ.—H. Clay Trumbull.

The pleasure of criticism takes from us that of being deeply moved by very beautiful things.—Bruyère.

The generous Critic fann'd the Poet's fire,
And taught the world with reason to admire.
—Pope.

To what base ends, and by what abject ways,
Are mortals urg'd through sacred lust of praise!
Ah, ne'er so dire a thirst of glory boast,
Nor in the critic let the man be lost.
—Pope.

Criticism is a study by which men grow important and formidable at very small expense.—Dr. Johnson.

Comparative criticism teaches us that moral and æsthetic defects are more nearly related than is commonly supposed.—Lowell.

The purity of the critical ermine, like that of the judicial, is often soiled by contact with politics.—Whipple.

The rule in carving holds good as to criticism: never cut with a knife what you can cut with a spoon.—Charles Buxton.

He whose first emotion, on the view of an excellent production, is to undervalue it, will never have one of his own to show.—Aiken.

Who shall dispute what the reviewers say?
Their word's sufficient; and to ask a reason,
In such a state as theirs, is downright treason.
—Churchill.

A poet that fails in writing becomes often a morose critic. The weak and insipid white wine makes at length excellent vinegar.—Shenstone.

The severest critics are always those who have either never attempted, or who have failed in original composition.—Hazlitt.

How many people would like to get up in a social prayer-meeting to say a few words for Christ, but there is such a cold spirit of criticism in the church that they dare not do it.

Get your enemies to read your works in order to mend them, for your friend is so much your second self that he will judge too like you.—Pope.

There is scarcely a good critic of books born in our age, and yet every fool thinks himself justified in criticising persons.—Bulwer-Lytton.

If a faultless poem could be produced, I am satisfied it would tire the critics themselves, and annoy the whole reading world with the spleen.—Walter Scott.

It behooves the minor critic who hunts for blemishes to be a little distrustful of his own sagacity.—Junius.

Criticism, as it was first introduced by Aristotle, was meant as a standard of judging well.—Johnson.

Criticism even should not be without its charms. When quite devoid of all amenities, it is no longer literary.—Joubert.

Critics are sentinels in the grand army of letters, stationed at the corners of newspapers and reviews, to challenge every new author.—Longfellow.

Not all on books their criticism waste;
The genius of a dish some justly taste,
And eat their way to fame.—Young.

Though by whim, envy, or resentment led,
They damn those authors whom they never read.
—Churchill.

The floods of nonsense printed in the form of critical opinions seem to me a chief curse of the times, a chief obstacle to true culture.—George Eliot.

Reviewers are forever telling authors they can't understand them. The author might often reply: Is that my fault?—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

It may be observed of good writing, as of good blood, that it is much easier to say what it is composed of than to compose it.—Colton.

Criticism is as often a trade as a science; it requiring more health than wit, more labor than capacity, more practice than genius.—Bruyère.

It is ridiculous for any man to criticise on the works of another who has not distinguished himself by his own performances.—Addison.

What a blessed thing it is that nature, when she invented, manufactured and patented her authors, contrived to make critics out of the chips that were left!—Holmes.

Why will you be always sallying out to break lances with other people's wind-mills, when your own is not capable of grinding corn for the horse you ride?—J. G. Holland.

Criticism is above all a gift, an intuition, a matter of tact and flair; it cannot be taught or demonstrated—it is an art.—Amiel.

When I read rules of criticism I inquire immediately after the works of the author who has written them, and by that means discover what it is he likes in a composition.—Addison.

All truth is valuable, and satirical criticism may be considered as useful when it rectifies error and improves judgment. He that refines the public taste is a public benefactor.—Johnson.

Grant me patience, just Heaven! Of all the cants which are canted in this canting world—though the cant of hypocrites may be the worst—the cant of criticism is the most tormenting.—Laurence Sterne.

Properly speaking, we learn from those books only that we cannot judge.

The author of a book that I am competent to criticise would have to learn from me.—Goethe.

Of his shallow species there is not a more unfortunate, empty and conceited animal than that which is generally known by the name of a critic.—Addison.

A servile race
Who, in mere want of fault, all merit place;
Who blind obedience pay to ancient schools,
Bigots to Greece, and slaves to musty rules.
—Churchill.

In the world's affairs there is no design so great or good but it will take twenty wise men to help it forward a few inches; and a single fool can stop it.—Ruskin.

We rarely meet with persons that have true judgment; which, to many, renders literature a very tiresome knowledge. Good judges are as rare as good authors.—St. Evremond.

Is it in destroying and pulling down that skill is displayed? The shallowest understanding, the rudest hand, is more than equal to that task.—Burke.

Critics must excuse me if I compare them to certain animals called asses, who, by gnawing vines, originally taught the great advantage of pruning them.—Shenstone.

Neither praise nor blame is the object of true criticism. Justly to discriminate, firmly to establish, wisely to prescribe and honestly to award—these are the true aims and duties of criticism.—Simms.

Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer,
And, without sneering, teach the rest to sneer:
Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike,
Just hint a fault, and hesitate dislike.
—Pope.

To be a mere verbal critic is what no man of genius would be if he could; but to be a critic of true taste and feeling is what no man without genius could be if he would.—Colton.

He who would reproach an author for obscurity should look into his own mind to see whether it is quite clear there. In the dusk the plainest writing is illegible.—Goethe.

The opinion of the great body of the reading public is very materially influenced even by the unsupported assertions of those who assume a right to criticise.—Macaulay.

If men of wit and genius would resolve never to complain in their works of critics and detractors, the next age would not know that they ever had any.—Swift.

Thou shalt not write, in short, but what I choose.
This is true criticism, and you may kiss,
Exactly as you please, or not, the rod.
—Byron.

Criticism is not religion, and by no process can it be substituted for it. It is not the critic's eye, but the child's heart that most truly discerns the countenance that looks out from the pages of the gospel.—J. C. Shairp.

It is quite cruel that a poet cannot wander through his regions of enchantment without having a critic forever, like the Old Man of the Sea, upon his back.—Moore.

Those fierce inquisitors of wit, the critics, spare no flesh that ever writ; but just as tooth-drawers find among the rout their own teeth work in pulling others out.—Samuel Butler.

Critics on verse, as squibs on triumphs wait,
Proclaim their glory, and augment the state;
Hot, envious, noisy, proud, the scribbling fry Burn, hiss, and bounce, waste paper, ink, and die.
—Young.

He was in Logic a great critic,
Profoundly skilled in Analytic;
He could distinguish, and divide
A hair 'twixt south and southwest side.
—Butler.

The critic's first labor is the task of distinguishing between men, as history and their works display them, and the ideals which one and another have conspired to urge upon his acceptance.—Stedman.

Critics to plays for the same end resort
That surgeons wait on trials in a court;
For innocence condemn'd, they've no respect,
Provided they've a body to dissect.
—Congreve.

It is advantageous to an author that his book should be attacked as well as praised. Fame is a shuttlecock. If it be struck only at one end of the room it will soon fall to the ground. To keep it up it must be struck at both ends.—Johnson.

The great contention of criticism is to find the faults of the moderns and the beauties of the ancients. While an author is yet living we estimate his powers by his worst performance, and when he is dead we rate them by his best.—Johnson.

Men of great talents, whether poets or historians, seldom escape the attacks of those who, without ever favoring the world with any production of their own, take delight in criticising the works of others.—Cervantes.

A critic is never too severe when he only detects the faults of an author. But he is worse than too severe when, in consequence of this detection, he presumes to place himself on a level with genius.—Landor.

A true critic ought rather to dwell upon excellences than imperfections, to discern the concealed beauties of a writer, and communicate to the world such things as are worth their observation.—Addison.

I never knew a critic who made it his business to lash the faults of other writers that was not guilty of greater himself—as the hangman is generally a worse malefactor than the criminal that suffers by his hand.—Addison.

Men have commonly more pleasure in the criticism which hurts than in that which is innocuous, and are more tolerant of the severity which breaks hearts and ruins fortunes than of that which falls impotently on the grave.—Ruskin.

Censure and criticism never hurt anybody. If false, they can't hurt you unless you are wanting in manly character; and if true, they show a man his weak points, and forewarn him against failure and trouble.—Gladstone.

Modern criticism discloses that which it would fain conceal, but conceals that which it professes to disclose; it is therefore read by the discerning, not to discover the merits of an author, but the motives of his critic.—Colton.

There is a certain race of men that either imagine it their duty, or make it their amusement, to hinder the reception of every work of learning or genius, who stand as sentinels in the avenues of fame, and value themselves upon giving ignorance and envy the first notice of a prey.—Johnson.

Of all mortals a critic is the silliest; for, inuring himself to examine all things whether they are of consequence or not, never looks upon anything but with a design of passing sentence upon it; by which means he is never a companion, but always a censor.—Steele.

The exercise of criticism always destroys for a time our sensibility to beauty by leading us to regard the work in relation to certain laws of construction. The eye turns from the charms of nature to fix itself upon the servile dexterity of art.—Alison.

Doubtless criticism was originally benignant, pointing out the beauties of a work rather than its defects. The passions of men have made it malignant, as the bad heart of Procrustes turned the bed, the symbol of repose, into an instrument of torture.—Longfellow.

There is a certain meddlesome spirit which, in the garb of learned research, goes prying about the traces of history, casting down its monuments, and marring and mutilating its fairest trophies. Care should be taken to vindicate great names from such pernicious erudition.—Washington Irving.

As soon
Seek roses in December—ice in June,
Hope, constancy in wind, or corn in chaff;
Believe a woman or an epitaph,
Or any other thing that's false, before
You trust in critics. —Byron.

The critic is a literary educator, a professor of literature with a class which embraces the entire reading community. He is to instruct, if he can; he is to judge fairly and to "give his own to each;" but his main business is to stimulate the minds of people, to conduct a live conversation with the public concerning the books they are reading.—E. S. Nadal.

Reviewers are usually people who would have been poets, historians, biographers, etc., if they could; they have tried their talents at one or the other, and have failed; therefore they turn critics.—Coleridge.

The most exquisite words and finest strokes of an author are those which very often appear the most doubtful and exceptionable to a man who wants a relish for polite learning; and they are those which a sour undistinguishing critic generally attacks with the greatest violence.—Addison.

Critics are a kind of freebooters in the republic of letters—who, like deer, goats and divers other graminivorous animals, gain subsistence by gorging upon buds and leaves of the young shrubs of the forest, thereby robbing them of their verdure, and retarding their progress to maturity.—Washington Irving.

A true critic, in the perusal of a book, is like a dog at a feast, whose thoughts and stomach are wholly set upon what the guests fling away, and consequently is apt to snarl most when there are the fewest bones.—Swift.

Professional critics are incapable of distinguishing and appreciating either diamonds in the rough state or gold in bars. They are traders, and in literature know only the coins that are current. Their criticism has scales and weights, but neither crucible nor touchstone.—Joubert.

There are some books and characters so pleasant, or rather which contain so much that is pleasant, that criticism is perplexed or silent. The hounds are perpetually at fault among the sweet-scented herbs and flowers that grow at the base of Etna.—J. F. Boyes.

Nature fits all her children with something to do,
He who would write and can't write, can surely review;
Can set up a small booth as critic and sell us his Petty conceit and his pettier jealousies.
—Lowell.

It is not enough for a reader to be unprejudiced. He should remember that a book is to be studied, as a picture is hung. Not only must a bad light be avoided, but a good one obtained. This taste supplies. It puts a history, a tale, or a poem in a just point of view, and there examines the execution.—Willmott.

The critic, as he is currently termed, who is discerning in nothing but faults, may care little to be told that this is the mark of unamiable dispositions or of bad passions; but he might not feel equally easy were he convinced that he thus gives the most absolute proofs of ignorance and want of taste.—Macculloch.

Critics are a kind of wild flies, that breed in wild fig trees, and when they're grown up feed
Upon the raw fruit of the nobler kind,
And by their nibbling on the outer rind,
Open the pores, and make way for the sun
To ripen it sooner than he would have done.
—Butler.

Criticism is like champagne, nothing more execrable if bad, nothing more excellent if good; if meagre, muddy, vapid and sour, both are fit only to engender colic and wind; but if rich, generous and sparkling, they communicate a genial glow to the spirits, improve the taste, and expand the heart.—Colton.

Some critics are like chimney-sweepers; they put out the fire below, and frighten the swallows from their nests above; they scrape a long time in the chimney, cover themselves with soot, and bring nothing away but a bag of cinders, and then sing from the top of the house as if they had built it.—Longfellow.

It is necessary a writing critic should understand how to write. And though every writer is not bound to show himself in the capacity of critic, every writing critic is bound to show himself capable of being a writer; for if he be apparently impotent in this latter kind, he is to be denied all title or character in the other.—Shaftesbury.

The fangs of a bear, and the tusks of a wild boar, do not bite worse and make deeper gashes than a goose-quill sometimes; no, not even the badger himself, who is said to be so tenacious of his bite that he will not give over his hold till he feels his teeth meet and the bones crack.—Howell.

'Tis not the wholesome sharp morality,
Or modest anger of a satiric spirit,
That hurts or wounds the body of a state,
But the sinister application
Of the malicious, ignorant, and base
Interpreter; who will distort and strain
The general scope and purpose of an author
To his particular and private spleen.
—Ben Jonson.

Malherbe, on hearing a prose work of great merit much extolled, dryly asked if it would reduce the price of bread. Neither was his appreciation of poetry much higher, when he observed that a good poet was of no more use to the church or the state than a good player at ninepins.—Colton.

Criticism must never be sharpened into anatomy. The delicate veins of fancy may be traced, and the rich blood that gives bloom and health to the complexion of thought be resolved into its elements. Stop there. The life of the imagination, as of the body, disappears when we pursue it.—Willmott.

We should be wary what persecution we raise against the living labors of public men, how we spill that seasoned life of man, preserved and stored up in books, since we see a kind of homicide may be thus committed, sometimes a martyrdom; and if it extend to the whole impression, a kind of massacre, whereof the execution ends not in the slaying of an elemental life, but strikes at the ethereal and fifth essence, the breath of reason itself; slays an immortality rather than a life.—Milton.

How good it would be if we could learn to be rigorous in judgment of ourselves, and gentle in our judgment of our neighbors! In remedying defects, kindness works best with others, sternness with ourselves. It is easy to make allowances for our faults, but dangerous; hard to make allowances for others' faults, but wise. "If thy hand offend thee, cut it off," is a word for our sins; for the sins of others, "Father, forgive them."—Maltie Babcock.

A man must serve his time to ev'ry trade,
Save censure; critics all are ready made:
Take hackney'd jokes from Miller, got by rote,

With just enough of learning to misquote;
A mind well skill'd to find or forge a fault,
A turn for punning—call it Attic salt—
Fear not to lie—'twill seem a lucky hit;
Shrink not from blasphemy—'twill pass for wit;

Care not for feeling, pass your proper jest—
And stand a critic, hated, yet caress'd.

—Byron.

One interesting feature of criticism is seen in the ease with which it discovers what Addison called the specific quality of an author. In Livy, it will be the manner of telling the story; in Sallust, personal identification with the character; in Tacitus, the analysis of the deed into its motive. If the same test be applied to painters, it will find the prominent faculty of Correggio to be manifested in harmony of effect; of Poussin, in the sentiment of his landscapes; and of Raffaele, in the general comprehension of his subject.—Willmott.

The malignant deity Criticism dwelt on the top of a snowy mountain in Nova Zembla; Momus found her extended in her den upon the spoils of numberless volumes half devoured. At her right sat Ignorance, her father and husband, blind with age; at her left Pride, her mother, dressing her up in the scraps of paper herself had torn. There was Opinion, her sister, light of foot, hoodwinked and headstrong, yet giddy and perpetually turning. About her played her children, Noise and Impudence, Dullness and Vanity, Positiveness, Pedantry and Ill Manners.—Swift.

A critic was of old a glorious name,
Whose sanction handed merit up to fame;
Beauties as well as faults he brought to view,

His judgment great, and great his candor too.

No servile rules drew sickly taste aside;
Secure he walked, for nature was his guide.
But now, O strange reverse! our critics bawl

In praise of candor with a heart of gall,
Conscious of guilt, and fearful of the light;
They lurk enshrouded in the veil of night;
Safe from destruction, seize th' unwary

prey,
And stab like bravoës, all who come that way.
—Churchill.

In the whole range of literature nothing is more entertaining, and, I might add, more instructive, than sound, legitimate criticism, the disinterested convictions of a man of sensibility, who enters rather into the spirit, than the letter of his author, who can follow him to the height of his compass, and while he sympathizes with every brilliant power and genuine passion of the poet, is not so far carried out of himself as to indulge his admiration at the expense of his judgment, but who can afford us the double pleasure of being first pleased with his author, and secondly with himself, for having given us such just and incontrovertible reason for our approbation.—Colton.

Crocus

Hail to the King of Bethlehem,
Who weareth in His diadem
The yellow crocus for the gem
Of His authority! —Longfellow.

Welcome, wild harbinger of spring!
To this small nook of earth;
Feeling and fancy fondly cling
Round thoughts which owe their birth
To thee, and to the humble spot
Where chance has fixed thy lowly lot.
—Bernard Barton.

Cross

Welcome, welcome, cross of Christ, if Christ be with it.—Rutherford.

How soon would faith freeze without a cross!—Rutherford.

Weak Christians are afraid of the shadow of the cross.—Thomas Brooks.

There is an immeasurable distance between submission to the cross and acceptance of it.—Charlotte Elizabeth Tonna.

Losses and crosses are heavy to bear; but when our hearts are right with God, it is wonderful how easy the yoke becomes.—C. H. Spurgeon.

If Jesus bore the cross, and died on it for me, ought I not to be willing to take it up for Him?—D. L. Moody.

The cross is not only imposed upon the saints as their burden, but bequeathed unto them as their legacy. It is given unto them as an honor and privilege.—Richard Alleine.

He who tears down the cross, what is there left to lift him to heaven? The church claiming to be a Christian church is false to the title, if she make the cross of Christ of none effect.—Herrick Johnson.

O, cross of my bleeding Lord, may I meditate on thee more, may I feel thee more, may I resolve to know nothing but thee.—Richard Fuller.

All you have really to do is to keep your back as straight as you can; and not think about what is upon it. The real and essential meaning of "virtue" is that straightness of back.—John Ruskin.

Dear Lord, forgive my sinful, foolish fears
And give me daily, strengthening grace,
I pray,
And one thing more I ask with humble tears,
Take not my cross away.
—Susan O. Curtis.

We must bear our crosses; self is the greatest of them all. If we die in part every day of our lives, we shall have but little to do on the last. O how utterly will these little daily deaths destroy the power of the final dying!—Fénelon.

And now my cross is all supported—
Part on my Lord, and part on me;
But as He is so much the stronger,
He seems to bear it—I go free.
—Anna Warner.

In the cross of Christ I glory,
Towering o'er the wrecks of time;
All the light of sacred story
Gathers round its head sublime.
—John Bowring.

When our will runs parallel with the will of God, no cross is formed; but when our will runs counter to God's will, a cross is formed which is heavy to be borne.—Aughey.

There is no man that goeth to heaven but he must go by the cross. The cross is the standing way-mark which all they that go to glory must pass by.—Aughey.

The cross is the center of the world's history; the incarnation of Christ and the crucifixion of our Lord are the pivot round which all the events of the ages revolve. The testimony of Christ was the spirit of prophecy, and the growing power of Jesus is the spirit of history.—Alexander Maclaren.

And how high is Christ's cross? As high as the highest heaven, and the throne of God, and the bosom of the Father—that bosom out of which forever proceed all created things. Ay, as high as the highest heaven! for—if you will receive it—when Christ hung upon the cross, heaven came down on earth, and earth ascended into heaven.—Charles Kingsley.

Nothing like one honest look, one honest thought of Christ upon His cross. That tells us how much He has been through, how much He endured, how much He conquered, how much God loved us, who spared not His only begotten Son, but freely gave Him for us. Dare we doubt such a God? Dare we murmur against such a God?—Charles Kingsley.

A cross borne in simplicity, without the interference of self-love to augment it, is only half a cross. Suffering in this simplicity of love, we are not only happy in spite of the cross, but because of it; for love is pleased in suffering for the Well Beloved, and the cross which forms us into His image is a consoling bond of love.—Fénelon.

To deny one's self, to take up the cross, denotes something immeasurably grander than self-imposed penance or rigid conformity to a divine statute. It is the surrender of self to an ennobling work, an absolute subordination of personal advantages and of personal pleasures for the sake of truth and the welfare of others, and a willing acceptance of every disability which their interests may entail.—George C. Lorimer.

There under the cross is the sinner's sanctuary—there, my friend, is the place for you and me. The first smiling look we shall get from God will be when looking unto Jesus; and the first time that we shall experience the alacrity of a lightened conscience, the relief and elasticity of the great life-burden lifted off, will be when we have laid our sins on the Lamb of God.—James Hamilton.

Christianity without the cross is nothing. The cross was the fitting close of a life of rejection, scorn and defeat. But in no true sense have these things ceased or changed. Jesus is still He whom man despiseth, and the rejected of men. The world has never admired Jesus, for moral courage is yet needed in every one of its high places by him who would "confess" Christ. The "offense" of the cross, therefore, has led men in all ages to endeavor to be rid of it, and to deny that it is the power of God in the world.—William H. Thomson.

God makes crosses of great variety; He makes some of iron and lead, that look as if they must crush; some of straw, that seem so light, and yet are no less difficult to carry; some He makes of precious stones and gold, that dazzle the eye and excite the envy of spectators, but in reality are as well able to crucify as those which are so much dreaded.—Aughey.

Thou, Everlasting Strength, hast set Thyself forth to bear our burdens. May we bear Thy cross, and bearing that, find there is nothing else to bear; and touching that cross, find that instead of taking away our strength, it adds thereto. Give us faith for darkness, for trouble, for sorrow, for bereavement, for disappointment; give us a faith that will abide though the earth itself should pass away—a faith for living, a faith for dying.—H. W. Beecher.

To do Thy holy will;
To bear Thy cross;
To trust Thy mercy still,
In pain or loss;
Poor gifts are these to bring,
Dear Lord, to Thee,
Who hast done everything
For me!

—George Cooper.

Nothing but the cross of Christ can so startle the spiritual nature from its torpor, as to make it an effectual counterpoise to the debasing and sensual tendencies of the race. Favored by temperament and education, individuals may measurably escape; but if the race is to triumph in the conflict between the flesh and the spirit, between the lower propensities and the higher nature, they must, as Constantine is said to have done, see the cross, and on it the motto, "In hoc signo vinces." By this sign we conquer.—Mark Hopkins.

At the foot of the cross, in all humility and in all adoration, we have learned at once the depth and the height of human nature; we have learned to think all wisdom but foolishness for the knowledge of Christ; all purity but sin, unwashed by His atonement; all hope in earth, of all hopes the most miserable, but in the faith of His most blessed resurrection; content to bear the struggles of life, at His command; and submitting to the grave, with a consciousness that it can sting no more.—George Croly.

Crow

To shoot at crows is powder flung away.—Gay.

Even the blackest of them all, the crow,
Renders good service as your man-at-arms,
Crushing the beetle in his coat of mail,
And crying havoc on the slug and snail.
—Longfellow.

If the old shower-foretelling crow
Croak not her boding note in vain,
To-morrow's eastern storm shall strow
The woods with leaves, with weeds the main.
—Francis Horace.

Crown

Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown.—Shakespeare.

Within the hollow crown
That rounds the mortal temples of a king, Keeps death his court; and there the antic sits,
Scoffing his state, and grinning at his pomp.
—Shakespeare.

A crown
Golden in show, is but a wreath of thorns;
Brings dangers, troubles, cares, and sleepless nights
To him who wears the regal diadem,
When on his shoulders each man's burden
lies;
For therein stands the office of a king,
His honor, virtue, merit, and chief praise,
That for the public all this weight he bears.
—Milton.

Cruelty

Detested sport, that owes its pleasures to another's pain.—Cowper.

Cruelty and fear shake hands together.—Balzac.

All just laws condemn cruelty.—Calderon.

All cruelty springs from weakness.—Seneca.

I must be cruel, only to be kind.—Shakespeare.

A good thing can't be cruel.—Dickens.

Much more may a judge outweigh himself in cruelty than in clemency.—Sir P. Sidney.

An infallible characteristic of meanness is cruelty.—Dr. Johnson.

It is cruelty to be humane to rebels, and humanity is cruelty.—Attributed to Charles IX.

Cruelty is the highest pleasure to the cruel man; it is his love.—Landor.

The cruelty of the effeminate is more dreadful than that of the hardy.—Lavater.

—those whose cruelty makes many mourn
Do by the fires, which they first kindle, burn.
—Earl of Stirling.

A stony adversary, an inhuman wretch,
Uncapable of pity, void and empty
From any dram of mercy. —Shakespeare.

The man who prates about the cruelty of angling will be found invariably to beat his wife.—Christopher North.

Let me be cruel, not unnatural; I will speak daggers to her; but use none; my tongue and soul in this be hypocrites.—Shakespeare.

Cruelty, like every other vice, requires no motive outside of itself; it only requires opportunity.—George Eliot.

Cruelty, if we consider it as a crime, is the greatest of all; if we consider it as a madness, we are equally justifiable in applying to it the readiest and the surest means of oppression.—Landor.

O Saxon cruelty! how it cheers my heart to think that you dare not attempt such a thing again!—Daniel O'Connell.

We ought never to sport with pain and distress in any of our amusements, or treat even the meanest insect with wanton cruelty.—Blair.

Cruelty in all countries is the companion of anger; but there is only one, and never was another on the globe, where she coquets both with anger and mirth.—Landor.

I would not enter on my list of friends (though graced with polished manners and fine sense, yet wanting sensibility) the man who needlessly sets foot upon a worm.—Cowper.

Cruelty is no more the cure of crimes than it is the cure of sufferings. Compassion, in the first instance, is good for both; I have known it to bring compunction when nothing else would.—Landor.

That cruelty which children are permitted to show to birds and other animals will most probably exert itself on their fellow creatures when at years of maturity.—Richardson.

Men so noble,
However faulty, yet should find respect
For what they have been; 'tis a cruelty
To load a falling man. —Shakespeare.

Nothing is so pregnant as cruelty; so multifarious, so rapid, so ever teeming a mother is unknown to the animal kingdom; each of her experiments provokes another and refines upon the last; though always progressive, yet always remote from the end.—Lavater.

When the cruel fall into the hands of the cruel, we read their fate with horror, not with pity. Sylla commanded the bones of Marius to be broken, his eyes to be pulled out, his hands to be cut off, and his body to be torn in pieces with pinchers; and Catiline was the executioner. "A piece of cruelty," says Seneca, "only fit for Marius to suffer, Catiline to execute, and Sylla to command."—Colton.

Cuckoo

Sweet bird! thy bower is ever green,
Thy sky is ever clear;
Thou hast no sorrow in thy song,
No winter in thy year!
—John Logan.

The merry cuckow, messenger of spring,
His trumpet shrill hath thrice already sounded. —Spenser.

Oh, could I fly, I'd fly with thee!
We'd make, with joyful wing,
Our annual visit o'er the globe,
Companions of the spring.
—John Logan.

O blithe newcomer! I have heard,
I hear thee and rejoice;
O cuckoo! shall I call thee Bird,
Or but a wandering Voice?
—Wordsworth.

List—'twas the cuckoo—O with what delight Heard I that voice! and catch it now, though faint,
Far off and faint, and melting into air,
Yet not to be mistaken. Hark again!
Those louder cries give notice that the bird,
Although invisible as Echo's self,
Is wheeling hitherward. —Wordsworth.

Culinary — Cooks

Cookery is become an art, a noble science; cooks are gentlemen.—Burton.

Heaven sends us good meat, but the devil sends us cooks.—David Garrick.

Cultivation — Culture

Meditation is culture.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

Men of culture are the true apostles of equality.—Matthew Arnold.

Reading makes a full man, conference a ready man, and writing an exact man.—Bacon.

Partial culture runs to the ornate; extreme culture to simplicity.—Bovee.

Cultivation to the mind is as necessary as food is to the body.—Cicero.

Many-sidedness of culture makes our vision clearer and keener in particulars.—Lowell.

Great culture is often betokened by great simplicity.—Mme. Deluzy.

Culture is like wealth; it makes us more ourselves, it enables us to express ourselves.—Hamerton.

The foundation of culture, as of character, is at last the moral sentiment.—Emerson.

Unless above himself he can erect himself, how poor a thing is man!—Daniel.

Greece appears to be the fountain of knowledge; Rome of elegance.—Dr. Johnson.

Culture is then properly described not as having its origin in curiosity, but as having its origin in the love of perfection; it is a study of perfection.—Matthew Arnold.

A man's nature runs either to herbs or weeds; therefore let him seasonably water the one and destroy the other.—Lady Gethin.

Man is born barbarous—he is ransomed from the condition of beasts only by being cultivated.—Lamartine.

It matters little whether a man be mathematically or philologically or artistically cultivated, so he be but cultivated.—Goethe.

That is true cultivation which gives us sympathy with every form of human life, and enables us to work most successfully for its advancement.—Henry Ward Beecher.

As the soil, however rich it may be, cannot be productive without culture, so the mind, without cultivation, can never produce good fruit.—Seneca.

I am very sure that any man of common understanding may, by culture, care, attention and labor, make himself whatever he pleases, except a great poet.—Chesterfield.

The highest purpose of intellectual cultivation is to give a man a perfect knowledge and mastery of his own inner self; to render our consciousness its own light and its own mirror.—Novalis.

A well-cultivated mind is, so to speak, made up of all the minds of preceding ages; it is only one single mind which has been educated during all this time.—Fontenelle.

Though men of delicate taste be rare, they are easily to be distinguished in society by the soundness of their understanding, and the superiority of their faculties above the rest of mankind.—Hume.

It is very rare to find ground which produces nothing; if it is not covered with flowers, with fruit trees and grains, it produces briars and pines. It is the same with man; if he is not virtuous, he becomes vicious.—Bruyère.

Culture, far from giving us freedom, only develops, as it advances, new necessities; the fetters of the physical close more tightly around us, so that the fear of loss quenches even the ardent impulse toward improvement, and the maxims of passive obedience are held to be the highest wisdom of life.—Schiller.

The great law of culture is, Let each become all that he was created capable of being; expand, if possible, to his full growth; resisting all impediments, casting off all foreign, especially all noxious adhesions, and show himself at length in his own shape and stature be these what they may.—Carlyle.

The only worthy end of all learning, of all science, of all life, in fact, is that human beings should love one another better. Culture merely for culture's sake can never be anything but a sapless root, capable of producing at best a shriveled branch.—John Walter Cross.

High culture always isolates, always drives men out of their class, and makes it more difficult for them to share naturally and easily the common class-life around them. They seek the few companions who can understand them, and when these are not to be had within a traversable distance, they sit and work alone.—Hamerton.

Not that the moderns are born with more wit than their predecessors, but, finding the world better furnished at their coming into it, they have more leisure for new thoughts, more light to direct them, and more hints to work upon.—Jeremy Collier.

The prosperity of a country depends, not on the abundance of its revenues, nor on the strength of its fortifications, nor on the beauty of its public buildings; but it consists in the number of its cultivated citizens, in its men of education, enlightenment and character.—Luther.

Whatever expands the affections, or enlarges the sphere of our sympathies—whatever makes us feel our relation to the universe, and all that it inherits, in time and in eternity, to the great and beneficent Cause of all, must unquestionably refine our nature, and elevate us in the scale of being.—Channing.

There is no reason why the brown hand of labor should not hold Thomson as well as the sickle. Ornamental reading shelters and even strengthens the growth of what is merely useful. A cornfield never returns a poorer crop because a few wild-flowers bloom in the hedge. The refinement of the poor is the triumph of Christian civilization.—Willmott.

Where no interest is taken in science, literature and liberal pursuits, mere facts and insignificant criticisms necessarily become the themes of discourse; and minds, strangers alike to activity and meditation, become so limited as to render all intercourse with them at once tasteless and oppressive.—Mme. de Staël.

What sort of tree is there which will not, if neglected, grow crooked and unfruitful; what but will, if rightly ordered, prove productive and bring its fruit to maturity? What strength of body is there which will not lose its vigor and fall to decay by laziness, nice usage, and debauchery?—Plutarch.

The earth flourishes, or is overrun with noxious weeds and brambles, as we apply or withhold the cultivating hand. So fares it with the intellectual system of man. If you are a parent, then, consider that the good or ill dispositions and principles you please to cultivate in the mind of your infant may hereafter preserve a nation in prosperity, or hang its fate on the point of the sword.—Horace Mann.

There are few delights in any life so high and rare as the subtle and strong delight of sovereign art and poetry; there are none more pure and more sublime. To have read the greatest works of any great poet, to have beheld or heard the greatest works of any great painter or musician, is a possession added to the best things of life.—Swinburne.

Culture looks beyond machinery, culture hates hatred; culture has one great passion—the passion for sweetness and light. It has one even yet greater, the passion for making them all prevail. It is not satisfied till we all come to a perfect man; it knows that the sweetness and light of the few must be imperfect until the raw and unkindly masses of humanity are touched with sweetness and light.—Matthew Arnold.

It does not try to reach down to the level of inferior classes; it does not try to win them for this or that sect of its own, with ready-made judgments and watchwords of its own. It seeks to do away with classes, to make the best that has been taught and known in the world current everywhere, to make all men live in an atmosphere of sweetness and light, where they may use ideas, as it uses them itself, freely—nourished, and not bound by them.—Matthew Arnold.

The wealthy and the noble, when they expend large sums in decorating their houses with the rare and costly efforts of genius, with busts from the chisel of a Canova and with cartoons from the pencil of a Raphael, are to be commended, if they do not stand still here, but go on to bestow some pains and cost, that the master himself be not inferior to the mansion, and that the owner be not the only thing that is little, amidst everything else that is great.—Colton.

Culture implies all which gives the mind possession of its own powers, as languages to the critic, telescope to the astronomer. Culture alters the political status of an individual. It raises a rival royalty in a monarchy. 'Tis king against king. It is ever the romance of history in all dynasties—the co-presence of the revolutionary force in intellect. It creates a personal independence which the monarch cannot look down, and to which he must often succumb.—Emerson.

To the highest culture, evenness of development, resulting in roundness and symmetry, is essential. The ideal man possesses, in addition to all his other qualities, that quality which is figured in the bloom of the flowering plant, in the fragrance of blossoms, in the blush and flavor of fruit—a quality which cannot be counterfeited any more than you can counterfeit a flower's perfume, which cannot be hidden any more than you can hide the fragrance of an orchard in May. It is the precious flavor of the ripened man. As the full fragrance of the apple, as the velvety cheek of the peach, comes only when the fruit has reached its highest development, so this quality comes only as the result of that wise self-enlargement, that deliberate catholicity, that cultivated charity of opinion, which characterizes the man of culture.—Joseph Anderson.

Cunning

Cunning is the dwarf of wisdom.—W. R. Alger.

Stratagem is the right hand of cunning.—G. W. Curtis.

Cunning has only private selfish aims.—Addison.

Cleverness and cunning are incompatible.—Byron.

In a great business there is nothing so fatal as cunning management.—Junius.

Cunning and treachery are the offspring of incapacity.—La Rochefoucauld.

All my own experience of life teaches me the contempt of cunning, not the fear.—Mrs. Jameson.

A cunning man overreaches no one half as much as himself.—Beecher.

Cunning pays no regard to virtue, and is but the low mimic of reason.—Bolingbroke.

Cunning is the art of concealing our own defects, and discovering other people's weaknesses.—Hazlitt.

Knowledge without justice ought to be called cunning rather than wisdom.—Plato.

When the fox hath once got in his nose, he'll soon find means to make the body follow.—Shakespeare.

The bounds of a man's knowledge are easily concealed, if he has but prudence.—Goldsmith.

The fox is very cunning, but he is more cunning who catches the fox.—Calderon.

Cunning cheats itself wholly, and other people partially.—Cervantes.

The very cunning conceal their cunning; the indifferently shrewd boast of it.—Bovee.

Cunning is none of the best nor worst qualities. It floats between virtue and vice.—Bruyère.

Cunning is the intensest rendering of vulgarity, absolute and utter.—Ruskin.

The most sure method of subjecting yourself to be deceived is to consider yourself more cunning than others.—La Rochefoucauld.

Nobody was ever so cunning as to conceal their being so; and everybody is shy and distrustful of crafty men.—Locke.

We should do by our cunning as we do by our courage—always have it ready to defend ourselves, never to offend others.—Greville.

Hurry and cunning are the two apprentices of despatch and skill; but neither of them ever learn their master's trade.—Colton.

Surely the continual habit of dissimulation is but a weak and sluggish cunning, and not greatly politic.—Bacon.

Cunning differs from wisdom as twilight from open day.—Dr. Johnson.

Whoever appears to have much cunning has in reality very little; being deficient in the essential article, which is, to hide cunning.—Henry Home.

This is the fruit of craft; like him that shoots up high, looks for the shaft, and finds it in his forehead.—Middleton.

Cunning leads to knavery; it is but a step from one to the other, and that very slippery; lying only makes the difference; add that to cunning, and it is knavery.—La Bruyère.

It is a remarkable circumstance in reference to cunning persons that they are often deficient not only in comprehensive, far-sighted wisdom, but even in prudent, cautious circumspection.—Whately.

Those who are overreached by our cunning are far from appearing to us as ridiculous as we appear to ourselves when the cunning of others has overreached us.—Rochefoucauld.

The animals to whom nature has given the faculty we call cunning know always when to use it, and use it wisely; but when man descends to cunning he blunders and betrays.—Thomas Paine.

Cunning is only the mimic of discretion, and may pass upon weak men, in the same manner as vivacity is often mistaken for wit, and gravity for wisdom.—Addison.

The greatest of all cunning is to seem blind to the snares which we know to be laid for us. Men are never so easily deceived as while they are endeavoring to deceive others.—Rochefoucauld.

The common practice of cunning is the sign of a small genius; it almost always happens that those who use it to cover themselves in one place lay themselves open in another.—Rochefoucauld.

Cunning is none of the best nor worst qualities; it floats between virtue and vice; there is scarce any exigence where it may not, and perhaps ought not to be supplied by prudence. Bruyère.

Taking things not as they ought to be, but as they are, I fear it must be allowed that Macchiavelli will always have more disciples than Jesus.—Colton.

It has been a sort of maxim that the greatest art is to conceal art; but I know not how, among some people we meet with, their greatest cunning is to appear cunning.—Steele.

We take cunning for a sinister or crooked wisdom; and certainly there is a great difference between a cunning man and a wise man, not only in point of honesty, but in point of ability.—Bacon.

All my own experience of life teaches me the contempt of cunning, not the fear. The phrase "profound cunning" has always seemed to me a contradiction in terms. I never knew a cunning mind which was not either shallow or on some point diseased.—Mrs. Jameson.

Cunning has only private selfish aims, and sticks at nothing which may make them succeed. Discretion has large and extended views, and, like a well-formed eye, commands a whole horizon; cunning is a kind of short-sightedness, that discovers the minutest objects which are near at hand, but is not able to discern things at a distance.—Addison.

The whole power of cunning is private; to say nothing, and to do nothing, is the utmost of its reach. Yet men, thus narrow by nature and mean by art, are sometimes able to rise by the miscarriages of bravery and the openness of integrity, and, watching failures and snatching opportunities, obtain advantages which belong to higher characters.—Johnson.

Cupid

That blind, rascally boy that abuses every one's eyes, because his own are out.—Shakespeare.

Cupid is a knavish lad,
Thus to make poor females mad.
—Shakespeare.

Love, well thou knowest, no partnership allows; Cupid averse rejects divided vows.—Prior.

Love is a child that talks in broken language, yet then he speaks most plain.—Dryden.

The wounds invisible that Love's keen arrows make.—Shakespeare.

Thou art figured blind, and yet we borrow our best sight from thee.—Massinger.

Love looks not with the eyes, but with the mind,
And therefore is wing'd Cupid painted blind.
—Shakespeare.

There is music in the beauty, and the silent note which Cupid strikes, far sweeter than the sound of an instrument.—Sir Thomas Browne.

There is an English song beginning, "Love knocks at the door." He knocks less often than he finds it open.—Mme. Swetchine.

Love is ever busy with his shuttle, is ever weaving into life's dull warp bright, gorgeous flowers, and scenes Arcadian.—Longfellow.

According to the Asiatics, Cupid's bow is strung with bees which are apt to sting, sometimes fatally, those who meddle with it.—Miss Edgeworth.

This senior-junior, giant-dwarf, Dan Cupid: Regent of love rhymes, lord of folded arms, The anointed sovereign of sighs and groans, Liege of all loiterers and malcontents.
—Shakespeare.

Before the birth of Love, many fearful things took place through the empire of necessity; but when this god was born, all things rose to men.—Socrates.

Cupid is a casuist,
A mystic and a cabalist—
Can your lurking thought surprise,
And interpret your device. * * *
Heralds high before him run;
He has ushers many a one;
He spreads his welcome where he goes,
And touches all things with his rose.
All things wait for and divine him—
How shall I dare to malign him?
—Emerson.

We say love is blind, and the figure of Cupid is drawn with a bandage around his eyes. Blind—yes, because he does not see what he does not like; but the sharpest-sighted hunter in the universe is Love for finding what he seeks, and only that.—Emerson.

In the true mythology, Love is an immortal child, and Beauty leads him as guide; nor can we express a deeper sense than when we say Beauty is the pilot of the young soul.—Emerson.

Love can take what shape he pleases; and when once begun his fiery inroad in the soul, how vain the after knowledge which his presence gives! We weep or rave; but still he lives, and lives master and lord, amidst pride and tears and pain.—Barry Cornwall.

Curiosity

A penny for your thought.—Swift.

The over curious are not over wise.—Massinger.

Curiosity is the thirst of the soul.—Dr. Johnson.

I loathe that low vice, curiosity.—Byron.

Curiosity is lying in wait for every secret.—Emerson.

Curiosity is one of the forms of feminine bravery.—Victor Hugo.

Curiosity is thought on its entering edge.—Charles H. Parkhurst.

Curiosity is a little more than another name for hope.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

He who would pry behind the scenes oft sees a counterfeit.—Dryden.

The curiosity of knowing things has been given to man for a scourge.—Bible.

Curiosity is as much the parent of attention as attention is of memory.—Whately.

The enquiring spirit will not be controll'd,
We would make certain all, and all behold.
—Sprague.

Men are more inclined to ask curious questions than to obtain necessary instruction.—Pasquier Quesnel.

Ask me no questions, and I'll tell you no fibs.—Goldsmith.

Talk to him of Jacob's ladder, and he would ask the number of steps.—Douglas Jerrold.

Curiosity has lost more young girls than love.—Mme. de Puisieux.

The first and simplest emotion which we discover in the human mind is curiosity.—Burke.

The first vice of the first woman was curiosity, and it runs through the whole sex.—Richardson.

Curiosity in children Nature has provided to remove the ignorance they were born with.—Locke.

Curiosity is one of the permanent and certain characteristics of a vigorous intellect.—Johnson.

People of a lively imagination are generally curious, and always so when a little in love.—Longfellow.

Avoid him who from mere curiosity asks three questions running about a thing that cannot interest him.—Lavater.

Curiosity is a kernel of the forbidden fruit, which still sticketh in the throat of a natural man, sometimes to the danger of his choking.—Fuller.

O this itch of the ear, that breaks out at the tongue! Were not curiosity so over-busy, detraction would soon be starved to death.—Douglas Jerrold.

Inquisitive people are the funnels of conversation; they do not take in anything for their own use, but merely to pass it to another.—Steele.

No heart is empty of the humor of curiosity, the beggar being as attentive in his station to an improvement of knowledge as the prince.—Osborn.

The world is the book of women. What knowledge they may possess is acquired by watchful observation rather than by reading.—Rousseau.

The knowledge that women lack stimulates their imagination; the knowledge that men possess blunts theirs.—Mme. de Sartory.

Talkativeness has another plague attached to it, even curiosity; for praters wish to hear much that they may have much to say.—Plutarch.

Curiosity is, in great and generous minds, the first passion and the last, and perhaps always predominates in proportion to the strength of the contemplative faculties.—Dr. Johnson.

Man is distinguished not only by his reason, but also by this singular passion, from all other animals.—Thomas Hobbes.

Curiosity, or the love of knowledge, has a very limited influence, and requires youth, leisure, education, genius and example to make it govern any person.—Hume.

Who forces himself on others is to himself a load. Impetuous curiosity is empty and inconstant. Prying intrusion may be suspected of whatever is little.—Lavater.

Of all the faculties of the human mind, curiosity is that which is the most fruitful or the most barren in effective results, according as it is well or badly directed.—Palmieri.

He that questioneth much shall learn much, and content much; but especially if he apply his questions to the skill of the persons whom he asketh.—Bacon.

As those things which engage us merely by their novelty cannot attach us for any length of time, curiosity is the most superficial of all the affections.—Burke.

A person who is too nice an observer of the business of the crowd, like one who is too curious in observing the labor of the bees, will often be stung for his curiosity.—Pope.

There are different kinds of curiosity—one of interest, which causes us to learn that which would be useful to us, and the other of pride which springs from a desire to know that of which others are ignorant.—Rockefoucauld.

There is philosophy in the remark that every man has in his own life follies enough, in the performance of his duty deficiencies enough, in his own mind trouble enough, without being curious after the affairs of others.—Dibdin.

Curiosity is the most superficial of all the affections; it changes its object perpetually; it has an appetite which is very sharp, but very easily satisfied, and it has always an appearance of giddiness, restlessness and anxiety.—Burke.

Curiosity is a languid principle, where access is easy and gratification is immediate; remoteness and difficulty are powerful incentives to its vigorous and lasting operation.—Munro.

Curiosity is the direct incontinency of the spirit. Knock therefore at the door before you enter upon your neighbor's privacy; and remember that there is no difference between entering into his house and looking into it.—Jeremy Taylor.

Inquire not too much into your bosom companion's griefs, nor compel him to tell all the tale of his life. Much and all will be told to those that do not ask; and you shall have the secrets into which you do not pry.—Bartol.

The curiosity of an honorable mind willingly rests there, where the love of truth does not urge it farther onward, and the love of its neighbor bids it stop; in other words, it willingly stops at the point where the interests of truth do not beckon it onward, and charity cries, Halt!—Coleridge.

Curiosity is but vanity. Oftenest one wishes to know but to talk of it. Otherwise one would not go to sea if he were never to say anything about it, and for the sole pleasure of seeing, without hope of ever communicating what he has seen.—Pascal.

Curse

A curse is like a cloud—it passes.—Bailey.

Curses are like young chickens,
And still come home to roost!
—Lytton.

We let our blessings get mouldy, and then call them curses.—Beecher.

Oh! I will curse thee till thy frighted soul
Runs mad with horror. —Lee.

Down to the dust! and as thou rott'st
away,
Even worms shall perish on thy poisonous clay. —Byron.

All the infections that the sun sucks up
From bogs, fens, flats, on Prosper fall, and make him
By inch-meal a disease! —Shakespeare.

Whip me, ye devils,
Blow me about in winds, roast me in sulphur,
Wash me in steep-down gulfs of liquid fire.
—Shakespeare.

May the grass wither from thy feet; the woods
Deny thee shelter! earth a home! the dust
A grave! the sun his light! and heaven her God! —Byron.

Plagues and palsy,
Disease and pestilence consume the robber,
Infect his blood, and wither ev'ry pow'r.
—Brown.

But no, I will not curse them: thro' the
world
A curse will follow them, like the black plague,
Tracking their footsteps ever—day and
night,
Morning and eve, summer and winter—
ever. —Proctor.

Dinna curse him, sir; I have heard a good man say that a curse was like a stone flung up to the heavens, and maist like to return on his head that sent it.—Walter Scott.

You nimble lightnings, dart your blinding flames
Into her scornful eyes!—Infect her beauty,
You fen-suck'd fogs, drawn by the powerful sun,
To fall and blister her pride!
—Shakespeare.

Villains, vipers, damn'd without redemption;
Dogs, easily won to fawn on any man;
Snakes in my heart—blood warm'd, that sting
my heart;
Three Judases, each one thrice worse than Judas. —Shakespeare.

May never glorious sun reflex his beams
Upon the country where you make abode!
But darkness and the gloomy shade of
death
Environ you till mischief and despair Drive you to break your necks, or hang yourselves. —Shakespeare.

Poison be their drink!
Gall, worse than gall, the daintiest meat that they taste!—
Their softest touch as smart as lizards'
stings!
Their music frightful as the serpent's hiss!
And boding screech-owls make the concert full! —Shakespeare.

All the contagion of the south light on you,
You shames of Rome! you herd of—boils and plagues
Plaster you o'er; that you may be ab-hor'd
Further than seen, and one infect another
Against the wind a mile! —Shakespeare.

Custom

Custom is the law of fools.—Van-burgh.

Custom does often reason overrule.
—Rochester.

Custom doth make dotards of us all.
—Carlyle.

Custom is the best interpreter of laws.—Law Maxim.

Custom is held to be as a law.—Law
Maxim.

Experience is the mother of custom.
—Henry Ward Beecher.

Ancient custom is always held or regarded as law.—Law Maxim.

Custom reconciles to everything.—
Burke.

How use doth breed a habit in a man!—Shakespeare.

As the world leads we follow.—
Seneca.

A deep meaning often lies in old customs.—Schiller.

Custom, though never so ancient,
without truth, is but an old error.—
Cyprian.

Custom calls me to 't—
What custom wills, in all things should we do 't? —Shakespeare.

There is nothing more nearly permanent in human life than a well-established custom.—Joseph Anderson.

Be not so bigoted to any custom as to worship at the expense of truth.—
Zimmermann.

Great things astonish us, and small dishearten us. Custom makes both familiar.—De La Bruyère.

To follow foolish precedents, and wink
With both our eyes, is easier than to think.
—Cowper.

Habit with him was all the test of truth,
"It must be right: I've done it from my youth." —Crabbe.

There is no tyrant like custom, and no freedom where its edicts are not resisted.—Bovee.

The ancients tell us what is best;
but we must learn of the moderns what is fittest.—Franklin.

Custom may lead a man into many errors; but it justifies none.—Fielding.

Custom is the tyranny of the lower human faculties over the higher.—
Mme. Necker.

The way of the world is to make laws, but follow customs.—Montaigne.

Strange customs do not thrive in foreign soil.—Schiller.

It is a custom,
More honor'd in the breach than the observance. —Shakespeare.

The breach of custom
Is breach of all.
—Shakespeare.

Custom, which diminishes the intense, increases the moderate, pleasures.—Ramsay.

The custom of the manor and the place must be observed.—Law Maxim.

Custom, 'tis true, a venerable tyrant O'er servile man extends her blind dominion. —Thomson.

There are not unfrequently substantial reasons underneath for customs that appear to us absurd.—Charlotte Bronte.

The tyrant custom, most grave senators,
Hath made the flinty and steel couch of war
My thrice-driven bed of down.
—Shakespeare.

New customs,
Though they be never so ridiculous,
Nay, let 'em be unmanly, yet are followed.
—Shakespeare.

The laws of conscience, which we pretend to be derived from nature, proceed from custom.—Montaigne.

The influence of custom is incalculable; dress a boy as a man and he will at once change his own conception of himself.—Bayle St. John.

Choose always the way that seems
the best, however rough it may be.
Custom will render it easy and agreeable.—Pythagoras.

The custom and fashion of to-day will be the awkwardness and outrage of to-morrow. So arbitrary are these transient laws.—Dumas.

The customs and fashions of men change like leaves on the bough, some of which go and others come.—Dante

Can there be any greater dotage in the world than for one to guide and direct his courses by the sound of a bell, and not by his own judgment.—Rabelais.

Man yields to custom as he bows to fate.
In all things ruled—mind, body and estate;
In pain or sickness, we for cure apply
To them we know not, and we know not why.
—Crabbe.

Custom forms us all.
Our thoughts, our morals, our most fix'd belief
Are consequences of our place of birth.
—Hill.

The slaves of custom and established mode,
With pack-horse constancy, we keep the road
Crooked or straight, through quags or thorny dells,
True to the jingling of our leader's bells.
—Cowper.

Men commonly think according to their inclinations, speak according to their learning and imbibed opinions; but generally act according to custom.—Bacon.

Custom is the great leveller. It corrects the inequality of fortune by lessening equally the pleasures of the prince and the pains of the peasant.—Henry Home.

Their origin is commonly unknown; for the practice often continues when the cause has ceased, and concerning superstitious ceremonies it is in vain to conjecture; for what reason did not dictate, reason cannot explain.—Dr. Johnson.

Such dupes are men to custom, and so prone
To rev'rence what is ancient, and can plead
A course of long observance for its use,
That even servitude, the worst of ills,
Because deliver'd down from sire to son,
Is kept and guarded as a sacred thing!
—Cowper.

Be not too rash in the breaking of an inconvenient custom; as it was gotten, so leave it by degrees. Danger attends upon too sudden alterations; he that pulls down a bad building by the great may be ruined by the fall, but he that takes it down brick by brick may live to build a better.—Quarles.

Custom is the law of one description of fools, and fashion of another; but the two parties often clash—for precedent is the legislator of the first, and novelty of the last. Custom, therefore, looks to things that are past, and fashion to things that are present.—Colton.

When all moves equally (says Pascal), nothing seems to move, as in a vessel under sail; and when all run by common consent into vice, none appear to do so. He that stops first, views as from a fixed point the horrible extravagance that transports the rest.—Colton.

Parents fear the destruction of natural affection in their children. What is this natural principle so liable to decay? Habit is a second nature, which destroys the first. Why is not custom nature? I suspect that this nature itself is but a first custom, as custom is a second nature.—Pascal.

Custom is a violent and treacherous school mistress. She, by little and little, slyly and unperceived, slips in the foot of her authority; but having by this gentle and humble beginning, with the benefit of time, fixed and established it, she then unmasks a furious and tyrannic countenance, against which we have no more the courage or the power so much as to lift up our eyes.—Montaigne.

Cynic — Cynicism

There is so much trouble in coming into the world, and so much more, as well as meanness, in going out of it, that it is hardly worth while to be here at all.—Lord Bolingbroke.

Don't hang a dismal picture on the wall, and do not daub with sables and glooms in your conversation. Don't be a cynic and disconsolate preacher. Don't bewail and bemoan. Omit the negative propositions. Nerve us with incessant affirmatives. Don't waste yourself in rejection, nor bark against the bad, but chant the beauty of the good. When that is spoken which has a right to be spoken, the chatter and the criticism will stop. Set down nothing that will not help somebody.—Emerson.

I do not know the man I should avoid
So soon as that spare Cassius. He reads much;
He is a great observer, and he looks Quite through the deeds of men: he loves no plays,
As thou dost, Antony; he hears no music;
Seldom he smiles; and smiles in such a sort
As if he mocked himself and scorned his spirit
That could be moved to smile at anything.
—Shakespeare.

Indifference to all the actions and passions of mankind was not supposed to be such a distinguished quality at that time, I think. I have known it very fashionable indeed. I have seen it displayed with such success that I have encountered some fine ladies and gentlemen who might as well have been born caterpillars.—Dickens.

The cynic is one who never sees a good quality in a man, and never fails to see a bad one. He is the human owl, vigilant in darkness and blind to light, mousing for vermin, and never seeing noble game. The cynic puts all human actions into two classes—openly bad and secretly bad. All virtue and generosity and disinterestedness are merely the appearance of good; but selfish at the bottom. He holds that no man does a good thing except for profit. The effect of his conversation upon your feelings is to chill and sear them; to send you away sour and morose. His criticisms and hints fall indiscriminately upon every lovely thing, like frost upon flowers.—Beecher.

Nil admirari is the motto which men of the world always affect. They think it vulgar to wonder, or be enthusiastic. They have so much corruption and so much charlatanism that they think the credit of all high qualities must be delusive.—Sir Egerton Brydges.

Cypress

Dark tree! still sad when others' grief is
fled,
The only constant mourner o'er the dead,
—Byron.

D

Daffodil

That come before the swallow dares, and take
The winds of March with beauty;
violets, dim,
But sweeter than the lids of Juno's eyes,
Or Cytherea's breath. —Shakespeare.

Dainties

Such dainties to them, their health it might hurt;
It's like sending them ruffles, when wanting a shirt. —Goldsmith.

Daisy

The poet's darling. —Wordsworth.

Thou unassuming commonplace
Of nature. —Wordsworth.

That well by reason men it call may
The daisie, or els the eye of the day,
The emprise, and floure of floures all.
—Chaucer.

Small service is true service while it lasts:
Of humblest friends, bright creature! scorn not one:

The daisy, by the shadow that it casts,
Protects the lingering dewdrop from the sun. —Wordsworth.

Myriads of daisies have shown forth in flower

Near the lark's nest, and in their natural hour

Have passed away; less happy than the one That, by the unwilling ploughshare, died to prove

The tender charm of poetry and love.
—Wordsworth.

Wee, modest, crimson-tipped flow'r,
Thou'st met me in an evil hour;
For I maun crush amang the stoure
Thy slender stem:

To spare thee now is past my pow'r,
Thou bonnie gem. —Burns.

Of all the floures in the mede,
Than love I most these floures white ane
rede,
Soch that men callen daisies in our toun.
—Chaucer.

Dancing

No man in his senses will dance. —
Cicero.

Those elegant delights of jig and vaulting. —Elijah Fenton.

All are not merry that dance lightly.
—George Herbert.

Come, knit hands, and beat the ground
In a light fantastic round. —Milton.

To-brisk notes in cadence beating
Glance their many-twinkling feet. —Gray.

While his off-heel, insidiously aside,
Provokes the caper which he seems to chide.
—Sheridan.

Come and trip it as ye go,
On the light fantastic toe.
—Milton.

Others import yet nobler arts from France,
Teach kings to fiddle, and make senates dance. —Pope.

They who love dancing too much seem to have more brains in their feet than their head, and think to play the fool with reason. —Terence.

Dance, laugh, and be merry; but be also innocent. —Théodore Barriere.

Social dissipation, as witnessed in the ball-room, is the abettor of pride, the instigator of jealousy, it is the sacrificial altar of health, it is the defiler of the soul, it is the avenue of lust and it is the curse of every town in America. —Talmage.

The dancing pair, that simply sought renown,
By holding out, to tire each other
down.
—Goldsmith.

But O, she dances such a way!
No sun upon an Easter-day,
Is half so fine a sight.
—Sir John Suckling.

And the dancing has begun now,
And the dancers whirl round gaily
In the waltz's giddy mazes,
And the ground beneath them trembles.
—Heine.

Fashionable dances as now carried on are revolting to every feeling of delicacy and propriety and are fraught with the greatest danger to millions.
—Horace Bushnell.

Charity balls are a curse. The name is a subtle argument in favor of their existence, but if ever anything belied its name, it is a charity ball.—
Geo. F. Hall.

Well was it said by a man of sagacity that dancing was a sort of privileged and reputable folly, and that the best way to be convinced of this was to close the ears and judge of it by the eyes alone.—Gotthold.

On with the dance! let joy be unconfined!
No sleep till morn, when youth and pleasure meet,
To chase the glowing hours with flying feet.
—Byron.

The gymnasium of running, walking on stilts, climbing, etc., steels and makes hardy single powers and muscles, but dancing, like a corporeal poesy, embellishes, exercises, and equalizes all the muscles at once.—
Richter.

The rout is Folly's circle, which she draws
With magic wand. So potent is the spell,
That none decoy'd into that fatal ring,
Unless by heaven's peculiar grace, escape.
There we grow early gray, but never wise.
—Cowper.

The ball-room is one way and a very broad way, too, to ruin. May God help every lover of the race to sound a note of alarm both to those already astray and to those who thus far have not set foot in the slippery path.—Hall.

Alike all ages: dames of ancient days
Have led their children through the mirthful maze;
And the gay grandsire, skill'd in gestic
lore,
Has frisked beneath the burden of threescore.
—Goldsmith.

Merrily, merrily whirled the wheels of the dizzying dances
Under the orchard-trees and down the path to the meadows;
Old folk and young together, and children mingled among them.
—Longfellow.

Where wildness and disorder are visible in the dance, there Satan, death and all kinds of mischief are likewise upon the floor. For this reason I could wish that the dance of death were painted on the walls of all ball-rooms, in order to warn the dancers, not by the levity of their deportment, to provoke the God of righteousness to visit them with a sudden judgment.—Gotthold.

No amusement seems more to have a foundation in our nature. The animation of youth overflows spontaneously in harmonious movements.
The true idea of dancing entitles it to favor. Its end is to realize perfect grace in motion; and who does not know that a sense of the graceful is one of the higher faculties of our nature?—Channing.

I saw her at a country ball;
There when the sound of flute and fiddle
Gave signal sweet in that old hall,
Of hands across and down the middle.
Hers was the subtlest spell by far
Of all that sets young hearts romancing;
She was our queen, our rose, our star;
And when she danced—oh, heaven,
her dancing! —Praed.

A thousand hearts beat happily; and when Music arose with its voluptuous
 swell,
 Soft eyes look'd love to eyes which spake again,
 And all went merry as a marriage
 bell.
 —Byron.

And beautiful maidens moved down in
 the dance,
 With the magic of motion and sunshine of glance:
 And white arms wreathed lightly, and tresses fell free
 As the plumage of birds in some tropical tree.
 —Whittier.

He who esteems the Virginia reel
 A bait to draw saints from their spiritual weal,
 And regards the quadrille as a far greater knavery
 Than crushing His African children with slavery,
 Since all who take part in a waltz or cotillon
 Are mounted for hell on the devil's own pillion,
 Who, as every true orthodox Christian
 well knows,
 Approaches the heart through the door of the toes.
 —Lowell.

The uniform testimony of all religious specialists is that as the love of dancing increases, the love of the Lord and his work decreases. The spirit of the dance is not the spirit of the Master. If the one be harbored the other will not remain. Where the experiment is tried of retaining both, a horrible muddle is the result, a corruption that disgraces the holy vocation wherewith we are called. The dance is a deadly poison to the higher life and he who professing Christianity takes it into his spiritual system wounds our Lord afresh, and by the act classes himself with the traitors of old who killed the world's only hope by nailing Christ to the cross.—Sam Jones.

I love these rural dances—from my heart I love them. This world, at best, is full of care and sorrow: the life of a poor man is so stained with the sweat of his brow, there is so much toil and struggling and anguish and disappointment here below, that I gaze with delight on a scene where all those are laid aside and forgotten, and the heart of the toil-worn peasant seems to throw off its load.—Longfellow.

I love to go and mingle with the young
 In the gay festal room—when every heart
 Is beating faster than the merry tune,
 And their blue eyes are restless, and their lips
 Parted with eager joy, and their round cheeks
 Flush'd with the beautiful motion of the dance.
 —Willis.

And then he danced—all foreigners excel
 The serious Angles in the eloquence
 Of pantomime—he danced, I say, right
 well
 With emphasis, and also with good sense—
 A thing in footing indispensable:
 He danced without theatrical pretence,
 Not like a ballet-master in the van
 Of his drill'd nymphs, but like a gentleman.
 —Byron.

What may we expect of people who work all day and dance all night?
 After a while they will be thrown on society nervous, exhausted imbeciles.—
 Talmage.

I wish that I could marshall all the young to an appreciation of the fact that you have an earnest work in life and your amusements and recreations are only to help you along in that work.—Talmage.

Chaste were his steps, each kept within due bound,
 And elegance was sprinkled o'er his figure:
 Like swift Camilla, he scarce skimm'd
 the ground,
 And rather held in than put forth his vigor.
 And then he had an ear for music's sound,
 Which might defy a crotchet critic's rigor.
 Such classic pas—sans flaws—set off
 our hero.
 He glanced like a personified Bolero.
 —Byron.

Once on a time, the wight Stupidity
 For his throne trembled,
 When he discovered in the brains of men
 Something like thoughts assembled,
 And so he searched for a plausible plan—
 One of validity—
 And racked his brains, if rack his brains he can,
 None having, or a very few!
 At last he hit upon a way
 For putting to rout,
 And driving out
 From our dull clay
 These same intruders new—
 This Sense, these Thoughts, these Speculative ills—
 What could he do? He introduced quadrilles. —Ruskin.

Such pains, such pleasures now alike are o'er,
 And beaus and etiquette shall soon exist
 no more
 At their speed behold advancing
 Modern men and women dancing;
 Step and dress alike express
 Above, below, from heel to toe,
 Male and female awkwardness.
 Without a hoop, without a ruffle,
 One eternal jig and shuffle,
 Where's the air and where's the gait?
 Where's the feather in the hat?
 Where the frizzed toupee? and where Oh! where's the powder for the hair?
 —Catherine Fanshawe.

Dandy

Dandyism is a species of genius.—
 Hazlitt.

Dandyism is refined vulgarity.—G.
 F. Goss.

Clothes form the intellect of the dandy.—H. W. Shaw.

All finery is a sign of littleness.—
 Lavater.

Dandies, when first-rate, are generally very agreeable men.—Bulwer-
 Lytton.

Oh! save me, ye powers, from these pinks
 of the nation,
 These tea-table heroes! these lords of creation. —Salmagundi.

A dandy is a clothes-wearing man—a man whose trade, office, and existence consist in the wearing of clothes.
 Every faculty of his soul, spirit, person and purse is heroically consecrated to this one object—the wearing of clothes wisely and well; so that, as others dress to live, he lives to dress.

 —Carlyle.

A fool may have his coat embroidered with gold, but it is a fool's coat still.—Rivarol.

Danger

Danger comes the sooner when it is despised.—Syrus.

That danger which is despised arrives the soonest.—Liberius.

For danger levels man and brute
 And all are fellows in their need.
 —Dryden.

The absent danger greater still appears Less fears he, who is near the thing he fears. —Daniel.

Man is never watchful enough against dangers that threaten him every hour.—Horace.

In extreme danger, fear turns a deaf ear to every feeling of pity.—Cæsar.

Danger for danger's sake is senseless.—Leigh Hunt.

Our dangers and delights are near allies,
 From the same stem the rose and prickly rise. —Aleyn.

Speak, speak, let terror strike slaves mute,
 Much danger makes great hearts most resolute. —Marston.

Nothing is strong that may not be endangered even by the weak.—Quintus Curtius Rufus.

If we must fall, we should boldly meet the danger.—Tacitus.

He is safe from danger who is on his guard even when safe.—Syrus.

He knows that the man is overcome ingloriously who is overcome without danger.—Seneca.

Thou dwarf dressed up in giant's clothes, that showest far off still greater than thou art.—Suckling

There is no person who is not dangerous for some one.—Mme. de Sévigné.

Keep together here, lest, running thither,
We unawares run into danger's mouth.
—Milton.

Constant exposure to dangers will breed contempt for them.—Seneca.

Let every eye negotiate for itself,
and trust no agent.—Shakespeare.

Danger levels man and brute, and all are fellows in their need.—Byron.

It is the danger which is least expected that soonest comes to us.—Voltaire.

Out of this nettle, danger, we pluck this flower, safety.—Shakespeare.

We have scotch'd the snake, not kill'd it.
She'll close, and be herself! whilst our poor malice Remains in danger of her former tooth.
—Shakespeare.

A timid person is frightened before a danger, a coward during the time, and a courageous person afterwards.—Richter.

Fools and sensible men are equally innocuous. It is in the half fool and the half wise that the danger lies.—Goethe.

Danger knows full well,
That Caesar is more dangerous than he;
We are two lions litter'd in one day,
And I the elder and more terrible.
—Shakespeare.

What is danger
More than the weakness of our apprehensions?
A poor cold part o' th' blood; who takes it hold off?
Cowards and wicked livers: valiant minds
Were made the masters of it.
—Beaumont and Fletcher.

A man's opinion of danger varies at different times, in consequence of an irregular tide of animal spirits; and he is actuated by considerations which he dares not avow.—Smollett.

It is better to meet danger than to wait for it. He that is on a lee shore, and foresees a hurricane, stands out to sea and encounters a storm to avoid a shipwreck.—Colton.

Let the fear of a danger be a spur to prevent it; he that fears otherwise gives advantage to the danger; it is less folly not to endeavor the prevention of the evil thou fearest than to fear the evil which thy endeavor cannot prevent.—Quarles.

Thou little know'st
What he can brave, who, born and nurst
In danger's paths, has dared her worst!
Upon whose ear the signal-word
Of strife and death is hourly breaking;
Who sleeps with head upon the sword
His fever'd hand must grasp in waking.
—Moore.

Dangers are no more light if they once seem light, and more dangers have deceived men than forced them; nay, it were better to meet some dangers half-way, though they come nothing near, than to keep too long a watch upon their approaches; for if a man watch too long it is odds he will fall fast asleep.—Bacon.

He led on; but thoughts
Seem'd gathering round which troubled him. The veins Grew visible upon his swarthy brow,
And his proud lip was press'd as if with pain.
He trod less firmly; and his restless eye
Glanc'd forward frequently, as if some ill
He dared not meet were there.—Willis.

We should never so entirely avoid danger as to appear irresolute and cowardly; but, at the same time, we should avoid unnecessarily exposing ourselves to danger, than which nothing can be more foolish.—Cicero.

Daring

Fortune helps the bold.—Virgil.

I dare do all that may become a man;
Who dares do more, is none.
—Shakespeare.

And what he greatly thought, he nobly dared.—Homer.

By daring, great fears are concealed.
—Lucan.

Be bolde, be bolde, and everywhere be bolde.—Spenser.

Dare to act! Even Venus aids the bold.—Tibullus.

A decent boldness ever meets with friends.—Homer.

And what they dare to dream of,
dare to do.—Lowell.

In great straits and when hope is small, the boldest counsels are the safest.—Livy.

And dar'st thou then
To beard the lion in his den,
The Douglas in his hall? —Scott.

He either fears his fate too much,
Or his deserts are small,
That dares not put it to the touch
To gain or lose it all.
—Marquis of Montrose.

He that climbs the tall tree has won right to the fruit,
He that leaps the wide gulf should prevail
in his suit. —Scott.

No one reaches a high position without daring.—Syrus.

Darkness

Darkness which may be felt.—Bible.

Darkness visible.—Milton.

Weep, for the light is dead.—
Schiller.

At one stride comes the dark.—Coleridge.

Darkness, thou first great parent of us all,
Thou art our great original!
—Yalden.

Lo! darkness bends down like a mother of grief
On the limitless plain, and the fall of her hair
It has mantled a world.
—Joaquin Miller.

There is no darkness but ignorance.
—Shakespeare.

The repose of darkness is deeper on the water than on the land.—Victor
Hugo.

Melt, and dispel, ye spectre doubts that roll
Cimmerian darkness o'er the parting soul.
—Campbell.

There is such a thing as the pressure of darkness.—Victor Hugo.

Daughter

Good daughters make good mothers.
—Abigail G. Whittlesey.

Still harping on my daughter.—
Shakespeare.

A daughter is an embarrassing and ticklish possession.—Menander.

Marry your daughters betimes, lest they marry themselves.—Burleigh.

With a little hoard of maxims preaching down a daughter's heart.—
Tennyson.

If thy daughter marry well, thou hast found a son; if not, thou hast lost a daughter.—Quarles.

Happy is it to place a daughter; yet it pains a father's heart when he delivers to another's house a child, the object of his tender care.—Euripides.

To a father waxing old, nothing is dearer than a daughter; sons have spirits of a higher pitch, but less inclined to endearing fondness.—Euripides.

If a daughter you have, she's the plague of your life,
No peace shall you know though you've buried your wife!
At twenty she mocks at the duty you taught her—
Oh, what a plague is an obstinate daughter!
—Sheridan.

Trust to me, judicious mother: do not make of your daughter an honest man, as if to give the lie to Nature; make her an honest woman, and be assured that she will be of more worth both to herself and to us.—Rousseau.

See, indeed, that your daughter is thoroughly grounded and experienced in household duties; but take care, through religion and poetry, to keep her heart open to heaven.—Richter.

Who can describe the transports of a heart truly parental on beholding a daughter shoot up like some fair and modest flower, and acquire, day after day, fresh beauty and growing sweetness, so as to fill every eye with pleasure and every heart with admiration?—Fordyce.

When a mother, as fond mothers will, vows that she knows every thought in her daughter's heart, I think she pretends to know a great deal too much.—Thackeray.

Dawn

There is no solemnity so deep, to a right-thinking creature, as that of dawn.—Ruskin.

The morning steals upon the night,
Melting the darkness. —Shakespeare.

Yon grey lines
That fret the clouds are messengers of day.
—Shakespeare.

The dawn is overcast, the morning lowers,
And heavily in clouds brings on the day.
—Addison.

The quiet night, now dappling, 'gan to wane,
Dividing darkness from the dawning main.
—Byron.

Night's candles are burnt out, and jocund day
Stands tiptoe on the misty mountain-tops.
—Shakespeare.

The gray-eyed morn smiles on the frowning night,
Checkering the eastern clouds with streaks of light.
—Shakespeare.

The day begins to break, and night is fled,
Whose pitchy mantle over-veil'd the earth.
—Shakespeare.

Look, the morn, in russet mantle clad,
Walks o'er the dew of yon high eastern hill.
—Shakespeare.

The sun had not risen, but the vault of heaven was rich with the winning softness that "brings and shuts the day," while the whole air was filled with the carols of birds, the hymns of the feathered tribe.—James Fenimore Cooper.

Look, the gentle day,
Before the wheels of Phœbus, round about Dapples the drowsy east with spots of gray.
—Shakespeare.

The eastern gate, all fiery red,
Opening on Neptune, with fair blessed beams,
Turns into yellow gold his salt-green streams.
—Shakespeare.

Faster and more fast,
O'er night's brim, day boils at last;
Boils, pure gold, o'er the cloud-cup's brim.
—Robert Browning.

See the dapple coursers of the morn
Beat up the light with their bright silver hoofs,
And chase it through the sky.
—Marston.

Night's swift dragons cut the clouds full fast,
And yonder shines Aurora's harbinger;
At whose approach, ghosts, wand'ring here and there,
Troop home to churchyards.
—Shakespeare.

'Tis beautiful, when first the dewy light
Breaks on the earth! while yet the scented air
Is breathing the cool freshness of the night
And the bright clouds a tint of crimson wear.
—Elizabeth M. Chandler.

At last the golden oriental gate
Of greatest heaven 'gan to open fair;
And Phœbus, fresh as bridegroom to his mate,
Came dancing forth shaking his dewy hair,
And hurl'd his glist'ing beams through gloomy air.
—Spenser.

Color, in the outward world, answers to feeling in man: shape, to thought; motion, to will. The dawn of day is the nearest outward likeness of an act of creation; and it is, therefore, also the closest type in nature for that in us which most approaches to creation—the realization of an idea by an act of the will.—John Sterling.

Day

Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.—Bible.

Each day is the scholar of yesterday.—Publius Syrus.

A day for God to stoop, and man to soar.—Tennyson.

Frail empire of a day!
That with the setting sun extinct is lost.
—Somerville.

Not all Apollo's Pythian treasures hold can bribe the poor possession of a day.—Homer.

Days, that need borrow
No part of their good morrow
From a fore-spent night of sorrow.
—Richard Crashaw.

The sun is in the heaven; and the proud day, attended with the pleasures of the world, is all too wanton.—Shakespeare.

Boast not thyself of to-morrow; for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth.—Bible.

One day spent well, and agreeably to your precepts, is preferable to an eternity of error.—Yonge.

O beautiful, awful summer day,
what hast thou given, what taken away?—Longfellow.

Philip. Madam, a day may sink or save a realm.

Mary. A day may save a heart from breaking too. —Tennyson.

What hath this day deserv'd? what hath it done,

That it in golden letters should be set
Among the high tides in the calendar?
—Shakespeare.

Day is a snow-white Dove of heaven
That from the East glad message brings:
Night is a stealthy, evil Raven,
Wrapt to the eyes in his black wings.
—T. B. Aldrich.

Day is the Child of Time,
And Day must cease to be:
But Night is without a sire,
And cannot expire,
One with Eternity.
—R. H. Stoddard.

Sweet day, so cool, so calm, so bright,
The bridal of the earth and sky,
The dew shall weep thy fall to-night;
For thou must die. —Herbert.

How troublesome is day!
It calls us from our sleep away;
It bids us from our pleasant dreams awake,
And sends us forth to keep or break
Our promises to pay.

How troublesome is day!
—Thomas Love Peacock.

O summer day beside the joyous sea!
O summer day so wonderful and white,
So full of gladness and so full of pain!
Forever and forever shalt thou be
To some the gravestone of a dead delight,
To some the landmark of a new domain.
—Longfellow.

Blest power of sunshine! genial day!
What balm, what life is in thy ray;
To feel thee is such real bliss,
That had the world no joy but this,
To sit in sunshine calm and sweet—
It were a world too exquisite,
For man to leave it for the gloom.
The deep cold shadow of the tomb.
—Moore.

Enjoy the blessings of this day if God sends them: and the evils bear patiently and sweetly. For this day only is ours; we are dead to yesterday, and we are not born to to-morrow.—Jeremy Taylor.

The days are made on a loom where-of the warp and woof are past and future time. They are majestically dressed, as if every god brought a thread to the skyey web.—Emerson.

Dead

Let the dead bury their dead.—Bible.

De mortuis nil nisi bonum.—Of the dead be nothing said but what is good.—Riley.

Death puts an end to rivalry and competition. The dead can boast no advantage over us, nor can we triumph over them.—Hazlitt.

He who hath bent him o'er the dead,
Ere the first day of death is fled—
The first dark day of nothingness,
The last of danger and distress,
(Before Decay's effacing fingers,
Have swept the lines where beauty lingered)—

And mark'd the mild angelic air,
The rapture of repose that's there.
—Byron.

We hold reunions, not for the dead, for there is nothing in all the earth that you and I can do for the dead. They are past our help and past our praise. We can add to them no glory, we can give to them no immortality. They do not need us, but forever and forever more we need them.—Garfield.

To neglect at any time preparation for death is to sleep on our post at a siege; to omit it in old age is to sleep at an attack.—Johnson.

In the destroyer's steps there spring up bright creations that defy his power and his dark path becomes a way of light to heaven.—Dickens.

We bury love; forgetfulness grows over it like grass; that is a thing to weep for, not the dead.—Alexander Smith.

'Tis the cessation of our breath.
Silent and motionless we lie;
And no one knoweth more than this.
—Longfellow.

If life be a pleasure, yet, since death also is sent by the hand of the same Master, neither should that displease us.—Michael Angelo.

Of all the evils of the world which are reproached with an evil character, death is the most innocent of its accusation.—Jeremy Taylor.

Approach thy grave like one that wraps the drapery of his couch about him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.—Bryant.

Death came with friendly care, the opening bud to heaven conveyed, and bade it blossom there.—Coleridge.

The premeditation of death is the premeditation of liberty; he who has learnt to die has forgot to serve.—Montaigne.

I look upon death to be as necessary to our constitution as sleep. We shall rise refreshed in the morning.—Franklin.

Death is not the monarch of the dead, but of the dying. The moment he obtains a conquest, he loses a subject.—Thomas Paine.

Let us live like those who expect to die, and then we shall find that we feared death only because we were unacquainted with it.—William Wake.

'Tis the only discipline we are born for; all studies else are but as circular lines, and death the center where they all must meet.—Massinger.

The night comes on that knows not morn,
When I shall cease to be all alone,
To live forgotten, and love forlorn.

—Tennyson.

Death is not rare, alas! nor burials few,
And soon the grassy coverlet of God
Spreads equal green above their ashes pale.

—Bayard Taylor.

Death is delightful. Death is dawn—
The waking from a weary night
Of fevers unto truth and light.

—Joaquin Miller.

All that tread

The globe are but a handful to the tribes
That slumber in its bosom.

—Bryant.

Then Sleep and Death, two twins of winged race,
Of matchless swiftness, but of silent pace.

—Homer.

Like a led victim, to my death I'll go,
And, dying, bless the hand that gave the blow.

—Dryden.

Men in general do not live as if they looked to die; and therefore do not die as if they looked to live.—Manton.

By medicine life may be prolong'd, yet
death
Will seize the doctor too.

—Shakespeare.

Death is a commingling of eternity with time; in the death of a good man, eternity is seen looking through time.
—Goethe.

Death is the liberator of him whom freedom cannot release, the physician of him whom medicine cannot cure, and the comforter of him whom time cannot console.—Colton.

It is as natural to die as to be born;
and to a little infant, perhaps, the one is as painful as the other.—Bacon.

It is by no means a fact that death is the worst of all evils; when it comes it is an alleviation to mortals who are worn out with sufferings.—Metastasio.

Death is the only physician, the shadow of his valley the only journeying that will cure us of age and the gathering fatigue of years.—George Eliot.

The happiest of pillows is not that which love first presses! it is that which death has frowned on and passed over.—Landor.

A few feet under the ground reigns so profound a silence, and yet so much tumult on the surface!—Victor Hugo.

Oh, God! it is a fearful thing
To see the human soul take wing
In any shape, in any mood!

—Byron.

Death rides in triumph,—fell destruction
Lashes his fiery horse, and round about him
His many thousand ways to let out souls.

—Beaumont and Fletcher.

To die, I own, is a dread passage—terrible to nature, chiefly to those who have, like me, been happy.—Thomson.

How short is human life; the very breath,
Which frames my words, accelerates my death.

—Hannah More.

Death itself is less painful when it comes upon us unawares than the bare contemplation of it, even when danger is far distant.—Pascal.

Suns may set and rise; we, when our short day is closed, must sleep on during one never-ending night.—
Catullus.

To die is landing on some silent shore,
Where billows never break nor tempests
roar;
Ere well we feel the friendly stroke 'tis
o'er.

—Sir Samuel Garth.

O mighty Caesar! dost thou lie so low? Are all thy conquests, glories, triumphs, spoils, shrunk to this little measure?—Shakespeare.

If thou expect death as a friend, prepare to entertain it; if thou expect death as an enemy, prepare to overcome it; death has no advantage, but when it comes a stranger.—Quarles.

Man should ever look to his last day,
and no one should be called happy before his funeral.—Ovid.

Lay her i' the earth;
And from her fair and unpolluted flesh
May violets spring! —Shakespeare.

A man after death is not a natural but a spiritual man; nevertheless he still appears in all respects like himself.—Swedenborg.

Death upon his face
Is rather shine than shade,
A tender shine by looks belov'd made.
—Mrs. Browning.

I fled, and cried out Death!
Hell trembled at the hideous name, and sigh'd
From all her caves, and back resounded
Death. —Milton.

Death to the Christian is the funeral of all his sorrows and evils, and the resurrection of all his joys.—Aughey.

He whom the gods love dies young,
while he is in health, has his senses
and his judgment sound.—Plautus.

When at last the angels come to convey your departing spirit to Abraham's bosom, depend upon it, however dazzling in their newness they may be to you, you will find that your history is no novelty, and you yourself no stranger to them.—James Hamilton.

So we fall asleep in Jesus. We have played long enough at the games of life, and at last we feel the approach of death. We are tired out, and we lay our heads back on the bosom of Christ, and quietly fall asleep.—H. W.
Beecher.

Reflect on death as in Jesus Christ, not as without Jesus Christ. Without Jesus Christ it is dreadful, it is alarming, it is the terror of nature. In Jesus Christ it is fair and lovely, it is good and holy, it is the joy of saints.
—Pasca.

The most heaven-like spots I have ever visited have been certain rooms in which Christ's disciples were awaiting the summons of death. So far from being a "house of mourning," I have often found such a house to be a vestibule of glory.—T. L. Cuyler.

How well he fell asleep!
Like some proud river, widening toward
the sea;
Calmly and grandly, silently and deep,
Life joined eternity.—S. T. Coleridge.

When darkness gathers over all,
And the last tottering pillars fall,
Take the poor dust Thy mercy warms,
And mould it into heavenly forms.
—O. W. Holmes.

Death cannot come
To him untimely who is fit to die;
The less of this cold world, the more of
heaven;
The briefer life, the earlier immortality.
—Millman.

Drawing near her death, she sent most pious thoughts as harbingers to heaven; and her soul saw a glimpse of happiness through the chinks of her sickness-broken body.—Thomas Fuller.

It is impossible that anything so natural, so necessary, and so universal as death should ever have been designed by Providence as an evil to mankind.—Swift.

Certainly the contemplation of death, as the wages of sin, and passage to another world, is holy and religious;
but the fear of it, as a tribute due unto Nature, is weak.—Bacon.

He that would die well must always look for death, every day knocking at the gates of the grave; and then the grave shall never prevail against him to do him mischief.—Jeremy Taylor.

Death is so genuine a fact that it excludes falsehoods, or betrays its emptiness; it is a touchstone that proves the gold, and dishonors the baser metal.—Hawthorne.

Seek such union to the Son of God as, leaving no present death within,
shall make the second death impossible, and shall leave in all your future only that shadow of death which men call dissolution, and which the gospel calls sleeping in Jesus.—James Hamilton.

All was ended now, the hope and the fear and the sorrow, all the aching of heart, the restless, unsatisfied longing, all the dull, deep pain, and constant anguish of patience.—Longfellow.

When the dust of death has choked a great man's voice, the common words he said turn oracles, the common thoughts he yoked like horses draw like griffins.—Mrs. Browning.

The weariest and most loathed worldly life that age, ache, penury, and imprisonment can lay on nature is a paradise to what we fear of death.—Shakespeare.

Soon for me the light of day
Shall forever pass away;
Then from sin and sorrow free,
Take me, Lord, to dwell with Thee.
—Doane.

Love masters agony; the soul that seemed Forsaken feels her present God again
And in her Father's arms
Contented dies away.
—John Keble.

Many persons sigh for death when it seems far off, but the inclination vanishes when the boat upsets, or the locomotive runs off the track, or the measles set it.—T. W. Higginson.

We die every day; every moment deprives us of a portion of life and advances us a step toward the grave; our whole life is only a long and painful sickness.—Massillon.

The fear of approaching death, which in youth we imagine must cause inquietude to the aged, is very seldom the source of much uneasiness.—Hazlitt.

O Death, what are thou? nurse of dreamless slumbers freshening the fevered flesh to a wakefulness eternal.—Tupper.

Everything dies, and on this spring morning, if I lay my ear to the ground, I seem to hear from every point of the compass the heavy step of men who carry a corpse to its burial.—Madame de Gasparin.

Death makes a beautiful appeal to charity. When we look upon the dead form, so composed and still, the kindness and the love that are in us all come forth.—Chapin.

There is nothing of evil in life for him who rightly comprehends that death is no evil; to know how to die delivers us from all subjection and constraint.—Montaigne.

Death is as near to the young as to the old; here is all the difference: death stands behind the young man's back, before the old man's face.—Rev. T. Adams.

Cullen whispered in his last moments: "I wish I had the power of writing or speaking, for then I would describe to you how pleasant a thing it is to die."—Dr. Derby.

Death to a good man is but passing through a dark entry, out of one little dusky room of his Father's house into another that is fair and large, light-some and glorious, and divinely entertaining.—Adam Clarke.

All life is surrounded by a great circumference of death; but to the believer in Jesus, beyond this surrounding death is a boundless sphere of life. He has only to die once to be done with death forever.—James Hamilton.

How beautiful it is for a man to die on the walls of Zion! to be called like a watch-worn and weary sentinel, to put his armor off, and rest in heaven.—N. P. Willis.

Death opens the gate of fame, and shuts the gate of envy after it; it unlooses the chain of the captive, and puts the bondsman's task into another man's hand.—Sterne.

When a man dies they who survive him ask what property he has left behind. The angel who bends over the dying man asks what good deeds he has sent before him.—Koran.

Life's race well run,
Life's work well done,
Life's crown well won,
Now comes rest.
—President Garfield's Epitaph.

The churchyard is the market-place where all things are rated at their true value, and those who are approaching it talk of the world and its vanities with a wisdom unknown before.—Baxter.

There are such things as a man shall remember with joy upon his death-bed; such as shall cheer and warm his heart even in that last and bitter agony.—South.

If human love hath power to penetrate the veil—and hath it not?—then there are yet living here a few who have the blessedness of knowing that an angel loves them.—Hawthorne.

We look at death through the cheap-glazed windows of the flesh, and believe him the monster which the flawed and cracked glass represents him.—Lowell.

I have heard that death takes us away from ill things, not from good. I have heard that when we pronounce the name of man we pronounce the belief of immortality.—Emerson.

To die,—to sleep,—
No more;—and by a sleep to say we end
The heart-ache, and the thousand natural shocks
That flesh is heir to. —Shakespeare.

And there at Venice gave
His body to that pleasant country's earth,
And his pure soul unto his captain Christ,
Under whose colours he had fought so long.
—Shakespeare.

How oft, when men are at the point of death,
Have they been merry! which their keepers call
A lightning before death. —Shakespeare.

Nature intends that, at fixed periods, men should succeed each other by the instrumentality of death. We shall never outwit Nature; we shall die as usual.—Fontenelle.

The world recedes; it disappears!
Heav'n opens on my eyes! my ears
With sounds seraphic ring:
Lend, lend your wings! I mount! I fly!
—Pope.

The prince, who kept the world in awe,
The judge, whose dictate fix'd the law,
The rich, the poor, the great, the small,
Are level'd: death confounds 'em all.
—Gay.

The world will turn when we are earth
As though we had not come nor gone;
There was no lack before our birth,
When we are gone there will be none.
—Omar Khayyam.

Strange—is it not?—that of the myriads who Before us passed the door of Darkness through,
Not one returns to tell us of the road
Which to discover we must travel too.
—Omar Khayyam.

For thee, O now a silent soul, my brother,
Take at my hands this garland and farewell.
Thin is the leaf, and chill the wintry smell,
And chill the solemn earth, a fatal mother.
—Swinburne.

Death! to the happy thou art terrible;
But how the wretched love to think of thee,
O thou true comforter! the friend of all
Who have no friend beside!
—Southey.

There is no Death! What seems so is transition;
This life of mortal breath
Is but a suburb of the life elysian,
Whose portal we call death.
—Longfellow.

Death is the port where all may refuge find
The end of labor, entry into rest;
Death hath the bounds of misery confin'd
Whose sanctuary shrouds affliction best.
—Earl of Stirling.

O death! the poor man's dearest friend,
The kindest and the best!
Welcome the hour, my aged limbs
Are laid with thee at rest! —Burns.

What is certain in death is somewhat softened by what is uncertain:
it is an indefiniteness in the time.

which holds a certain relation to the infinite, and what is called eternity.—
La Bruyère.

And thou art terrible—the tear,
The groan, the knell, the pall, the bier;
And all we know, or dream, or fear
Of agony, are thine. —Halleck.

When we see our enemies and friends gliding away before us, let us not forget that we are subject to the general law of mortality, and shall soon be where our doom will be fixed forever.
—Dr. Johnson.

As man, perhaps, the moment of his breath,
Receives the lurking principle of death;
The young disease, that must subdue at length,
Grows with his growth, and strengthens with his strength. —Pope.

His last day places man in the same state as he was before he was born;
nor after death has the body or soul any more feeling than they had before birth.—Pliny the Elder.

She thought our good-night kiss was given,
And like a lily her life did close;
Angels uncurtain'd that repose,
And the next waking dawn'd in heaven.
—Gerald Massey.

Then with no fiery throbbing pain,
No cold gradations of decay,
Death broke at once the vital chain,
And freed his soul the nearest way.
—Samuel Johnson.

The soul too soft its ills to bear,
Has left our mortal hemisphere,
And sought in better world the meed
To blameless life by heaven decreed.
—Scott.

But whether on the scaffold high,
Or in the battle's van,
The fittest place where man can die
Is where he dies for man.
—Michael J. Barry.

Dust, to its narrow house beneath!
Soul, to its place on high!
They that have seen thy look in death,
No more may fear to die.
—Mrs. Hemans.

As the films of clay are removed from our eyes, Death loses the false aspect of the spectre, and we fall at last into its arms as a wearied child upon the bosom of its mother.—Bulwer.

But since, howe'er protracted, death will
come,
Why fondly study, with ingenious pains,
To put it off?—To breathe a little longer
Is to defer our fate, but not to shun it.
—Hannah More.

First our pleasures die—and then
Our hopes, and then our fears—and when
These are dead, the debt is due,
Dust claims dust—and we die too.
—Shelley.

There is a Reaper whose name is Death,
And with his sickle keen,
He reaps the bearded grain at a breath,
And the flowers that grow between.
—Longfellow.

What day, what hour, but knocks at human hearts,
To wake the soul to sense of future scenes?
Deaths stand like Mercurys, in every way,
And kindly point us to our journey's end.
—Dr. Young.

Death is the king of this world: 'tis his park
Where he breeds life to feed him. Cries of pain
Are music for his banquet.
—George Eliot.

And, as she looked around, she saw how
Death, the consoler, Laying his hand upon many a heart, had healed it forever. —Longfellow.

Death comes to all. His cold and sapless
hand
Waves o'er the world, and beckons us away.
Who shall resist the summons?
—Thomas Love Peacock.

How shocking must thy summons be, O
death!
To him that is at ease in his possessions;
Who, counting on long years of pleasure
here,
Is quite unfurnish'd for that world to come!
—Blair.

Two hands upon the breast,
And labor's done;
Two pale feet cross'd in rest,
The race is won. —D. M. Mulock.

The truth of it is, there is nothing in history which is so improving, to the reader as those accounts which we meet with of the death of eminent persons and of their behavior in that dreadful season.—Addison.

But the grave is not deep; it is the shivering tread of an angel that seeks us. When the unknown hand throws the fatal dart at the end of man, then boweth he his head and the dart only lifts the crown of thorns from his wounds.—Richter.

Brethren, we are all sailing home; and by and by, when we are not thinking of it, some shadowy thing (men call it death), at midnight, will pass by, and will call us by name, and will say, "I have a message for you from home; God wants you; heaven waits for you."—H. W. Beecher.

Death is the wish of some, the relief of many, and the end of all. It sets the slave at liberty, carries the banished man home, and places all mortals on the same level, inasmuch that life itself were a punishment without it.—Seneca.

He that always waits upon God is ready whensoever He calls. Neglect not to set your accounts even; he is a happy man who so lives as that death at all times may find him at leisure to die.—Feltham.

When you take the wires of the cage apart, you do not hurt the bird, but help it. You let it out of its prison. How do you know that death does not help me when it takes the wires of my cage down?—that it does not release me, and put me into some better place, and better condition of life?—Bishop Randolph S. Foster.

Death is a mighty mediator. There all the flames of rage are extinguished, hatred is appeased, and angelic pity, like a weeping sister, bends with gentle and close embrace over the funeral urn.—Schiller.

"Come and see how a Christian can die," said the dying sage to his pupil; how would it do to say, "Come and see how an infidel can die?"—How would it have done for Voltaire to say this, who, in his panic at the prospect of eternity, offered his physician half his fortune for six weeks more of life?—James Hamilton.

Against specious appearances we must set clear convictions, bright and ready for use. When death appears as an evil, we ought immediately to remember that evils are things to be avoided, but death is inevitable.—Epictetus.

O, if the deeds of human creatures could be traced to their source, how beautiful would even death appear; for how much charity, mercy, and purified affection would be seen to have their growth in dusty graves!—Dickens.

What is our death but a night's sleep? For as through sleep all weariness and faintness pass away and cease, and the powers of the spirit come back again, so that in the morning we arise fresh and strong and joyous; so at the Last Day we shall rise again as if we had only slept a night, and shall be fresh and strong.—Martin Luther.

If life has not made you by God's grace, through faith, holy—think you, will death without faith do it? The cold waters of that narrow stream are no purifying bath in which you may wash and be clean. No! no! as you go down into them, you will come up from them.—Alexander MacLaren.

Let death and exile, and all other things which appear terrible, be daily before your eyes, but death chiefly; and you will never entertain any abject thought, nor too eagerly covet anything.—Epictetus.

Feasts and business and pleasure and enjoyments seem great things to us, whilst we think of nothing else; but as soon as we add death to them they all sink into an equal littleness.—William Law.

At the last, when we die, we have the dear angels for our escort on the way. They who can grasp the whole world in their hands can surely also guard our souls, that they make that last journey safely.—Luther.

There is a sweet anguish springing up in our bosoms when a child's face brightens under the shadow of the waiting angel. There is an autumnal fitness when age gives up the ghost; and when the saint dies there is a tearful victory.—Chapin.

If I were a writer of books, I would compile a register, with the comment of the various deaths of men; and it could not but be useful, for who should teach men to die would at the same time teach them to live.—Montaigne.

Death alone of the gods loves not gifts, nor do you need to offer incense or libations; he cares not for altar nor hymn; the goddess of Persuasion alone of the gods has no power over him.—Horace.

Can we wonder that men perish and are forgotten, when their noblest and most enduring works decay? Death comes even to monumental structures, and oblivion rests on the most illustrious names.—Marcus Antoninus.

The bed of death brings every human being to his pure individuality; to the intense contemplation of that deepest and most solemn of all relations, the relation between the creature and his Creator.—Daniel Webster.

We so converse every night with the image of death that every morning we find an argument of the resurrection. Sleep and death have but one mother, and they have one name in common.—Jeremy Taylor.

Nature has lent us life, as we do a sum of money; only no certain day is fixed for payment. What reason then to complain if she demands it at pleasure, since it was on this condition that we received it?—Cicero.

I scarcely know how it is, but the deaths of children seem to me always less premature than those of older persons. Not that they are in fact so, but it is because they themselves have little or no relation to time or maturity.—Barry Cornwall.

To mourn deeply for the death of another loosens from myself the petty desire for, and the animal adherence to life. We have gained the end of the philosopher, and view without shrinking the coffin and the pall.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Who knows we have not lived before
In forms that felt delight and pain?
If death is not the open door
Through which we pass to life again?
—David Banks Sickels.

Few people know death, we only endure it, usually from determination, and even from stupidity and custom; and most men only die because they know not how to prevent dying.—La Rochefoucauld.

The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
Await alike the inevitable hour,
The paths of glory lead but to the grave.
—Gray.

Thy day without a cloud hath pass'd,
And thou wert lovely to the last;
Extinguish'd not decay'd!
As stars that shoot along the sky
Shine brightest as they fall from high.
—Byron.

Can that man be dead
Whose spiritual influence is upon his kind?
He lives in glory; and his speaking dust
Has more of life than half its breathing moulds.
—Miss Landon.

Let us not doubt that God has a father's pity towards us, and that in the removal of that which is dearest to us He is still loving and kind. Death separates, but it also unites. It reunites whom it separates.—Abraham Coles.

Philosophy has often attempted to repress insolence by asserting that all conditions are leveled by death; a position which, however it may deject the happy, will seldom afford much comfort to the wretched.—Dr. Johnson.

What is death but a ceasing to be what we were before? We are kindled, and put out, we die daily; nature that begot us expels us, and a better and safer place is provided for us.—Seneca.

Where the brass knocker, wrapt in flannel band,
Forbids the thunder of the footman's hand,
Th' upholder, rueful harbinger of death,
Waits with impatience for the dying breath.
—Gay.

One destin'd period men in common have,
The great, the base, the coward, and the brave,
All food alike for worms, companions in the grave.
—Lord Lansdowne.

Then fell upon the house a sudden gloom,
A shadow on those features fair and thin;
And softly, from that hushed and darkened room,
Two angels issued, where but one went in.
—Longfellow.

The hand that unnerved Belshazzar derived its most horrifying influence from the want of a body; and death itself is not formidable in what we do know of it, but in what we do not.
—Colton.

Eyes, look your last!
Arms, take your last embrace! and lips O
you
The doors of breath, seal with a righteous kiss
A dateless bargain to engrossing death.
—Shakespeare.

Death wounds to cure: we fall; we rise; we reign!
Spring from our fetters; fasten in the skies;
Where blooming Eden withers in our sight:
Death gives us more than was in Eden lost.
This king of terrors is the prince of peace.
—Young.

Every man at time of Death,
Would fain set forth some saying that may live
After his death and better humankind;
For death gives life's last word a power to
live,
And, like the stone-cut epitaph, remain
After the vanished voice, and speak to men.
—Tennyson.

I am not in the least surprised that your impression of death becomes more lively, in proportion as age and infirmity bring it nearer. God makes use of this rough trial to undeceive us in respect to our courage, to make us feel our weakness, and to keep us in all humility in His hands.—Fénelon.

The moment in which the spirit meets death is perhaps like the moment in which it is embraced in sleep. I suppose it never happened to any one to be conscious of the immediate transition from the waking to the sleeping state.—Mrs. Jameson.

The world is full of resurrections.
Every night that folds us up in darkness is a death; and those of you that have been out early, and have seen the first of the dawn, will know it—the day rises out of the night like a being that has burst its tomb and escaped into life.—George MacDonald.

When the veil of death has been drawn between us and the objects of our regard, how quick-sighted do we become to their merits, and how bitterly do we remember words, or even looks, of unkindness which may have escaped in our intercourse with them.—
Bishop Heber.

No man but knows that he must die; he knows that in whatever quarter of the world he abides—whatever be his circumstances—however strong his present hold of life—however unlike the prey of death he looks—that it is his doom beyond reverse to die.—
Stebbing.

Cowards die many times before their deaths;
The valiant never taste of death but once.
Of all the wonders that I yet have heard,
It seems to me most strange that men should
fear;
Seeing that death, a necessary end,
Will come, when it will come.
—Shakespeare.

The world recedes; it disappears;
Heav'n opens on my eyes; my ears
With sounds seraphic ring:
Lend, lend your wings! I mount! I fly!
O Grave! where is thy victory?
O Death! where is thy sting? —Pope.

All that nature has prescribed must be good; and as death is natural to us, it is absurdity to fear it. Fear loses its purpose when we are sure it cannot preserve us, and we should draw resolution to meet it from the impossibility to escape it.—Steele.

O Earth, so full of dreary noises!
O men, with wailing in your voices!
O delfed gold, the wailer's heap!
O strife, O curse, that o'er it fall!
God makes a silence through you all,
And "giveth His beloved, sleep."

—Mrs. Browning.

Yet 'twill only be a sleep:
When, with songs and dewy light,
Morning blossoms out of Night,
She will open her blue eyes
'Neath the palms of Paradise,
While we foolish ones shall weep.

—Edward Rowland Sill.

Sure 'tis a serious thing to die! My soul!
What a strange moment must it be, when,
near

Thy journey's end, thou hast the gulf in view!

That awful gulf, no mortal e'er repass'd
To tell what's doing on the other side.

—Blair.

Death never takes one alone, but twofold
Whenever he enters in at a door,
Under roof of gold or roof of thatch,
He always leaves it upon the latch,
And comes again ere the year is o'er,
Never one of a household only.

—Longfellow.

It is hard

To feel the hand of death arrest one's steps, Throw a chill blight o'er all one's budding hopes,

And hurl one's soul untimely to the shades
Lost in the gaping gulf of blank oblivion.

—Kirk White.

A true philosopher

Makes death his common practice, while he lives,

And every day by contemplation strives

To separate the soul, far as he can,
From off the body.

—May.

All at rest now—all dust!—wave flows on wave,

But the sea dries not! What to us the grave?

It brings no real homily; we sigh, Pause for a while, and murmur, "All must die!"

Then rush to pleasure, action, sin, once
more,

Swell the loud tide, and fret unto the shore!

—The New Timon.

And now, with busy, but noiseless process, the Comforter is giving the last finish to the sanctifying work, and making the heir of glory meet for home, till, at a given signal, the portal opens, and even the numb body feels the burst of blessedness as the rigid features smile and say, "I see Jesus," then leave the vision pictured on the pale but placid brow.—James Hamilton.

Death is the tyrant of the imagination. His reign is in solitude and darkness, in tombs and prisons, over weak hearts and seething brains. He lives, without shape or sound, a phantasm, inaccessible to sight or touch—
a ghastly and terrible apprehension.—
Barry Cornwall.

The birds of the air die to sustain thee; the beasts of the field die to nourish thee; the fishes of the sea die to feed thee. Our stomachs are their common sepulchre. Good God! with how many deaths are our poor lives patched up! how full of death is the life of momentary man!—Quarles.

There is before the eyes of men, on the brink of dissolution, a glassy film, which death appears to impart, that they may have a brief prospect of eternity when some behold the angels of light, while others have the demons of darkness before them.—Cockton.

Oh that we may all be living in such a state of preparedness, that, when summoned to depart, we may ascend the summit whence faith looks forth on all that Jesus hath suffered and done, and exclaiming, "We have waited for Thy salvation, O Lord," lie down with Moses on Pisgah, to awake with Moses in paradise.—Henry Melvill.

Death brings us again to our friends. They are waiting for us, and we shall not be long. They have gone before us, and are like the angels in heaven. They stand upon the borders of the grave to welcome us with the countenance of affection which they wore on earth,—yet more lovely, more radiant, more spiritual.—Longfellow.

"Paid the debt of nature." No; it is not paying a debt; it is rather like bringing a note to the bank to obtain solid gold for it. In this case you bring this cumbrous body which is nothing worth, and which you could not wish to retain long; you lay it down, and receive for it from the eternal treasures—liberty, victory, knowledge, rapture.—Poster.

For the fear of death is indeed the pretence of wisdom, and not real wisdom, being a pretended knowledge of the unknown; and no one knows whether death, which men in their fear apprehend to be the greatest evil, may not be the greatest good. Is there not here conceit of knowledge, which is a disgraceful sort of ignorance?—Plato.

The death-bed of the just is yet undrawn
By mortal hand—it merits a divine.
Angels should paint it—angels ever there—
There on a post of honour and of joy.
A death-bed's a detector of the heart;—
Here tired dissimulation drops her mask:
Virtue alone has majesty in death.
—Young.

I live,
But live to die: and living, see no thing
To make death hateful, save an innate clinging,
A loathsome and yet all invincible
Instinct of life, which I abhor, as I Despise myself, yet cannot overcome—
And so I live. —Byron.

All buildings are but monuments of death,
All clothes but winding-sheets for our last knell,
All dainty fattings for the worms beneath,
All curious music but our passing bell:
Thus death is nobly waited on, for why?
All that we have is but death's livery.
—Shirley.

For I know that Death is a guest divine,
Who shall drink my blood as I drink this wine;
And he cares for nothing! a king is he—
Come on, old fellow, and drink with me!
With you I will drink to the solemn past, Though the cup that I drain should be my last. —William Winter.

Death is but a word to us. One's own experience alone can teach us the real meaning of the word. The sight of the dying does little. What one sees of them is merely what precedes death: dull unconsciousness is all we

see. Whether this be so,—how and when the spirit wakes to life again,—this is what all wish to know, and what never can be known until it is experienced.—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

Divinely fair as thine, O never more Would strong hearts break o'er e'er biers. There sleeps to-night
A sacred sweetness on thy silent lips,
A solemn light upon thy ample brow,
That I can never, never hope to find Upon a living face. —Smith.

'Tis not the stoic's lesson got by rote,
The pomp of words, and pedant dissertation,
That can support thee in that hour of terror.
Books have taught cowards to talk nobly
of it;
But when the trial comes, they start and stand aghast. —Rowe.

None who e'er knew her can believe her
dead;
Though, should she die, they deem it well might be
Her spirit took its everlasting flight
In summer's glory, by the sunset sea,
That onward through the Golden Gate is
fled.
Ah, where that bright soul is cannot be night. —R. W. Gilder.

So his life has flow'd
From its mysterious urn a sacred stream,
In whose calm depth the beautiful and pure Alone are mirror'd, which though shapes of ill
May hover round its surface glides in light,
And takes no shadow from them. —Talfourd.

It is very singular, how the fact of a man's death often seems to give people a truer idea of his character, whether for good or evil, than they have ever possessed while he was living and acting among them. Death is so genuine a fact that it excludes falsehood or betray its emptiness; it is a touch-stone that proves the gold, and dishonors the baser metal.—Hawthorne.

O eloquent, just and mightie Death! whom none could advise, thou hast perswaded; what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised:
thou hast drawne together all the farre stretchéd greatnesse, all the pride, crueltie and ambition of men, and covered it all over with these two narrow words, Hic jacet!—Sir Walter Raleigh.

It unfortunately happens that no man believes that he is likely to die soon. So every one is much disposed to defer the consideration of what ought to be done on the supposition of such an emergency; and while nothing is so uncertain as human life, so nothing is so certain as our assurance that we shall survive most of our neighbors.—Aughey.

I have seen those who have arrived at a fearless contemplation of the future, from faith in the doctrine which our religion teaches. Such men were not only calm and supported, but cheerful in the hour of death; and I never quitted such a sick chamber without a hope that my last end might be like theirs.—Sir Henry Halford.

Then 'tis our best, since thus ordain'd to die,

To make a virtue of necessity.

Take what he gives, since to rebel is vain,
The bad grows better which we well sustain,

And could we choose the time and choose aright,

'Tis best to die, our honor at the height.
—Dryden.

Living is death; dying is life. We are not what we appear to be. On this side of the grave we are exiles, on that citizens; on this side orphans, on that children; on this side captives, on that freemen; on this side disguised, unknown, on that disclosed and proclaimed as the sons of God.—Beecher.

Dying visions of angels and Christ and God and heaven are confined to credibly good men. Why do not bad men have such visions? They die of all sorts of diseases; they have nervous temperaments; they even have creeds and hopes about the future which they cling to with very great tenacity; why do not they rejoice in some such glorious illusions when they go out of the world?—E. F. Burr.

Death, whether it regards ourselves or others, appears less terrible in war than at home. The cries of women and children, friends in anguish, a dark room, dim tapers, priests and physicians, are what affect us the most on the death-bed. Behold us already more than half dead and buried.—Henry Home.

Who is it that called time the avenger, yet failed to see that death was the consoler. What mortal afflictions are there to which death does not bring full remedy? What hurts of hope and body does it not repair? "This is a sharp medicine," said Raleigh, speaking of the axe, "but it cures all disorders."—Simms.

He that dies in an earnest pursuit is like one that is wounded in hot blood; who, for the time, scarce feels the hurt; and therefore a mind fixed and bent upon somewhat that is good doth avert the dolours of death; but above all, believe it, the sweetest canticle is, "Lord, now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace."—Bacon.

The day of our decease will be that of our coming of age; and with our last breath we shall become free of the universe. And in some region of infinity, and from among its splendors, this earth will be looked back on like a lowly home, and this life of ours be remembered like a short apprenticeship to duty.—Mountford.

Could we but know one in a hundred of the close approachings of the skeleton, we should lead a life of perpetual shudder. Often and often do his bony fingers almost clutch our throat, or his foot is put out to give us a cross buttock. But a saving arm pulls him back ere we have seen so much as his shadow.—Prof. Wilson.

Friend to the wretch whom every friend forsakes, I woo thee, Death! Life and its joys I leave to those that prize them. Hear me, O gracious God! At Thy good time let Death approach; I reckon not, let him but come in genuine form, not with Thy vengeance armed, too much for man to bear.—Bishop Porteus.

When death strikes down the innocent and young, for every fragile form from which he lets the panting spirit free, a hundred virtues rise, in shapes of mercy, charity, and love, to walk the world and bless it. Of every tear that sorrowing mortals shed on such green graves, some good is born, some gentler nature comes.—Dickens.

And when, in the evening of life, the golden clouds rest sweetly and invitingly upon the golden mountains, and the light of heaven streams down through the gathering mists of death, I wish you a peaceful and abundant entrance into that world of blessedness, where the great riddle of life will be unfolded to you in the quick consciousness of a soul redeemed and purified.—J. G. Holland.

Let dissolution come when it will, it can do the Christian no harm, for it will be but a passage out of a prison into a palace: out of a sea of troubles into a haven of rest; out of a crowd of enemies to an innumerable company of true, loving, and faithful friends; out of shame, reproach, and contempt, into exceeding great and eternal glory.—Bunyan.

Death did not first strike Adam, the first sinful man, nor Cain, the first hypocrite, but Abel, the innocent and righteous. The first soul that met with death, overcame death; the first soul that parted from earth went to heaven. Death argues not displeasure, because he whom God loved best dies first, and the murderer is punished with living.—Bishop Hall.

Death reigns in all the portions of our time. The autumn with its fruits provides disorders for us, and the winter's cold turns them into sharp diseases, and the spring brings flowers to strew our hearse, and the summer gives green turf and brambles to bind upon our graves. Calentures and surfeit, cold and agues, are the four quarters of the year, and all minister to death; and you can go no whither but you tread upon a dead man's bones.—Bishop Taylor.

There are flowers which only yield their fragrance to the night; there are faces whose beauty only fully opens out in death. No more wrinkles; no drawn, distorted lineaments; an expression of extreme humility, blended with gladness of hope; a serene brightness, and an ideal straightening of the outline, as if the Divine finger, source of supreme beauty, had been laid there.—Madame de Gasparin.

The more we sink into the infirmities of age, the nearer we are to immortal youth. All people are young in the other world. That state is an eternal spring, ever fresh and flourishing. Now, to pass from midnight into noon on the sudden, to be decrepit one minute and all spirit and activity the next, must be a desirable change. To call this dying is an abuse of language.—Jeremy Collier.

The realm of death seems an enemy's country to most men, on whose shores they are loathly driven by stress of weather; to the wise man it is the desired port where he moors his bark gladly, as in some quiet haven of the Fortunate Isles; it is the golden west into which his sun sinks, and, sinking, casts back a glory upon the leaden cloud-tack which had darkly besieged his day.—Lowell.

Ephemera die all at sunset, and no insect of this class has ever sported in the beams of the morning sun. Happier are ye, little human ephemera! Ye played only in the ascending beams, and in the early dawn, and in the eastern light; ye drank only of the prelibations of life; hovered for a little space over the world of freshness and of blossoms; and fell asleep in innocence before yet the morning dew was exhaled;—Richter.

Among the poor, the approach of dissolution is usually regarded with a quiet and natural composure, which it is consolatory to contemplate. and which is as far removed from the dead palsy of unbelief as it is from the delirious raptures of fanaticism. Theirs is a true, unhesitating faith, and they are willing to lay down the burden of a weary life, in the sure and certain hope of a blessed immortality.—Southey.

Men fear death, as children fear the dark; and as that natural fear in children is increased by frightful tales, so is the other. Groans, convulsions, weeping friends, and the like show death terrible; yet there is no passion so weak but conquers the fear of it, and therefore death is not such a terrible enemy. Revenge triumphs over death, love slights it, honor aspires to it, dread of shame prefers it, grief flies to it, and fear anticipates it.—Bacon.

Death comes equally to us all, and makes us all equal when it comes. The ashes of an oak in a chimney are no epitaph of that, to tell me how high or how large that was; it tells me not what flocks it sheltered while it stood, nor what men it hurt when it fell. The dust of great persons' graves is speechless, too; it says nothing, it distinguishes nothing.—Donne.

All death in nature is birth, and at the moment of death appears visibly the rising of life. There is no dying principle in nature, for nature throughout is unmix'd life, which, concealed behind the old, begins again and develops itself. Death as well as birth is simply in itself, in order to present itself ever more brightly and more like to itself.—Fichte.

Sometimes, I think, the angel Death
Comes down from realms above,
And grants to souls unfit for flight
More time to learn God's love.

Sometimes, I think, the pitying tears,
Like rain on parching sod,
Bring forth new life from wasted years,
And bring a soul to God. —J. C. H.

We hold death, poverty, and grief for our principal enemies; but this death, which some repute the most dreadful of all dreadful things, who does not know that others call it the only secure harbor from the storms and tempests of life, the sovereign good of nature, the sole support of liberty, and the common and sudden remedy of all evils?—Montaigne.

If I had thought thou couldst have died
I might not weep for thee;
But I forgot, when by thy side,
That thou couldst mortal be;
It never through my mind had passed,
That time would e'er be o'er
When I on thee should look my last,
And thou shouldst smile no more!
—Chas. Wolfe.

The golden ripple on the wall came back again, and nothing else stirred in the room. The old, old fashion! the fashion that came in with our first garments, and will last unchanged until our race has run its course, and the wide firmament is rolled up like a scroll. The old, old fashion—Death! Oh, thank God, all who see it, for that older fashion yet—of Immortality!—Dickens.

One may live as a conqueror, a king or a magistrate; but he must die as a man. The bed of death brings every human being to his pure individuality; to the intense contemplation of that deepest and most solemn of all relations, the relation between the creature and his Creator. Here it is that fame and renown cannot assist us; that all external things must fail to aid us; that even friends, affection and human love and devotedness cannot succor us.—Webster.

So live, that, when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan, that moves
To that mysterious realm, where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry-slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon; but sustain'd and sooth'd
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave,
Like one that draws the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.
—Bryant.

When a friend is carried to his grave, we at once find excuses for every weakness, and palliation of every fault. We recollect a thousand endearments, which before glided off our minds without impression, a thousand favors unrepaid, a thousand duties unperformed; and wish, vainly wish, for his return, not so much that we may receive as that we may bestow happiness, and recompense that kindness which before we never understood.—

Dr. Johnson.

It is an exquisite and beautiful thing in our nature, that, when the heart is touched and softened by some tranquil happiness or affectionate feeling, the memory of the dead comes over it most powerfully and irresistibly. It would seem almost as though our better thoughts and sympathies were charms, in virtue of which the soul is enabled to hold some vague and mysterious intercourse with the spirits of those whom we loved in life. Alas! how often and how long may these patient angels hover around us, watching for the spell which is so soon forgotten!—Dickens.

When I remember all
The friends so link'd together,
I've seen around me fall,
Like leaves in wintry weather;
I feel like one who treads alone
Some banquet hall deserted,
Whose lights are fled, whose garlands dead,
And all but he departed.
—Tom Moore.

Ye living soldiers of the mighty war,
Once more from roaring cannon and the drums
And bugles blown at morn, the summons comes;
Forget the halting limb, each wound and scar:
Once more your Captain calls to you;
Come to his last review!
—R. W. Gilder.

Out—out are the lights—out all!
And, over each quivering form,
The curtain, a funeral pall,
Comes down with the rush of a storm,
And the angels, all pallid and wan,
Uprising, unveiling, affirm
That the play is the tragedy, "Man,"
And its hero the Conqueror Worm.
—Poe.

Our respect for the dead, when they are just dead, is something wonderful, and the way we show it more wonderful still. We show it with black feathers and black horses; we show it with black dresses and black heraldries; we show it with costly obelisks and sculptures of sorrow, which spoil half of our beautiful cathedrals. We show it with frightful gratings and vaults, and lids of dismal stone, in the midst of the quiet grass; and last, and not least, we show it by permitting ourselves to tell any number of falsehoods we think amiable or credible in the epitaph.— Ruskin.

Ay, but to die, and go we know not where;
To lie in cold obstruction, and to rot;
This sensible warm motion to become
A kneaded clod; and the delighted spirit
To bathe in fiery floods, or to reside
In thrilling regions of thick-ribbed ice;
To be imprison'd in the viewless winds,
And blown with restless violence round about
The pendant world. —Shakespeare.

O Death, what art thou? a Lawgiver that never altereth,
Fixing the consummating seal, whereby the deeds of life become established;
O Death, what art thou? a stern and silent usher,
Leading to the judgment for Eternity, after the trial scene of Time;
O Death, what art thou? an husbandman that reapeth always,
Out of season, as in season, with the sickle in his hand. —Tupper.

He who died at Azan sends
This to comfort all his friends:
Faithful friends! It lies I know
Pale and white and cold as snow;
And ye say, "Abdallah's dead!"
Weeping at the feet and head,
I can see your falling tears,
I can hear your sighs and prayers;
Yet I smile and whisper this:
I am not the thing you kiss.
Cease your tears and let it lie;
It was mine—it is not I.
—Edwin Arnold.

To what base uses may we return!
Why may not imagination trace the noble dust of Alexander, till it find it stopping a bunghole? As thus: Alexander died, Alexander was buried, Alexander returneth to dust; the dust is earth: of earth we make loam. And why of that loam, whereto he was converted, might they not stop a beer barrel?—Shakespeare.

But know that thou must render up the dead,
And with high interest too! they are not thine
But only in thy keeping for a season,
Till the great promis'd day of restitution;
When loud diffusive sound of brazen trumpet
Of strong-lung'd cherub shall alarm thy captives,
And rouse the long, long sleepers into life,
Daylight and liberty. —Blair

The dead are like the stars, by day
Withdrawn from mortal eye,
But not extinct, they hold their way
In glory through the sky:
Spirits from bondage thus set free,
Vanish amidst immensity.
Where human thought, like human sight,
Fails to pursue their trackless flight.
—James Montgomery.

We do not die wholly at our deaths:
we have mouldered away gradually long before. Faculty after faculty, interest after interest, attachment after attachment disappear; we are torn from ourselves while living, year after year sees us no longer the same, and death only consigns the last fragment of what we were to the grave.—
Hazlitt.

Death should come

Gently to one of gentle mould, like thee,
As light winds, wandering through groves
of bloom,
Detach the delicate blossoms from the tree,
Close thy sweet eyes calmly, and without
pain,
And we will trust in God to see thee yet again. —Bryant.

Why should man's high aspiring mind
Burn in him with so proud a breath;
When all his haughty views can find
In this world, yield to death;
The fair, the brave, the vain, the wise,
The rich, the poor, the great, the small,
Are each but worms' anatomies,
To strew his quiet hall. —Marvel.

For the death of the righteous is like the descending of ripe and wholesome fruits from a pleasant and florid tree. Our senses entire, our limbs unbroken, without horrid tortures;
after provision made for our children,
with a blessing entailed upon posterity,

in the presence of our friends, our dearest relatives closing our eyes and binding our feet, leaving a good name behind us.—Jeremy Taylor.

What is death? Oh! what is death?

'Tis slumber to the weary—
'Tis rest to the forlorn—
'Tis shelter to the dreary—
'Tis peace amid the storm—
'Tis the entrance to our home—
'Tis the passage to that God
Who bids His children come,
When their weary course is trod.
Such is death! yes, such is death.
—Anon.

Yet tell me, frightened senses! what is death?
Blood only stopp'd, and interrupted breath;
The utmost limit of a narrow span,
And end of motion, which with life began,
And smoke that rises from the kindling
fires

Is seen this moment and the next expires;
As empty clouds by rising winds are toss'd
Their fleeting forms scarce scarce found than lost. —Prior.

All that tread

The globe are but a handful to the tribes
That slumber in its bosom. Take the wings
Of morning, and the Barcan desert pierce,
Or lose thyself in the continuous woods
Where rolls the Oregon, and hears no sound Save his own dashings,—yet the dead are there;
And millions in those solitudes, since first
The flight of years began, have laid them
down
In their last sleep: the dead reign there alone. —Bryant.

It is not strange that that early love of the heart should come back, as it so often does when the dim eye is brightening with its last light. It is not strange that the freshest fountains the heart has ever known in its wastes should bubble up anew when the life-blood is growing stagnant. It is not strange that a bright memory should come to a dying old man, as the sunshine breaks across the hills at the close of a stormy day; nor that in the light of that ray, the very clouds that made the day dark should grow gloriously beautiful.—Hawthorne.

Do we not all, in this very hour, recall a death-bed scene in which some loved one has passed away? And, as we bring to mind the solemn reflections of that hour, are we not ready to hear and to heed the voice with which a dying wife once addressed him who stood sobbing by her side: "My dear husband, live for one thing, and only one thing; just one thing,—the glory of God, the glory of God!"—E. P. Tenney.

Beloved in the Lord, if you only will lay hold of the Saviour's strength, and cast yourself entirely on His kind arms, with His dying grace He will do wonders for you in the dying hour. A great trembling may come upon you when you think of going down to tread the verge of Jordan; "for ye have not passed this way heretofore." But Jesus has; and you shall see His footprints on the shore. He will be your guide unto death, and through death.—Alexander Dickson.

I do not know why a man should be either regretful or afraid, as he watches the hungry sea eating away this "bank and shoal of time" upon which he stands, even though the tide has all but reached his feet—if he knows that God's strong hand will be stretched forth to him at the moment when the sand dissolves from under him, and will draw him out of many waters, and place him high above the floods on the stable land where there is "no more sea."—Alexander Mac-laren.

What is death

To him who meets it with an upright heart?
A quiet haven, where his shatter'd bark Harbours secure, till the rough storm is past,

Perhaps a passage overhung with clouds,
But at its entrance, a few leagues beyond
Opening to kinder skies and milder suns,
And seas pacific as the soul that seeks them.
—Hurdis.

Every day His servants are dying modestly and peacefully—not a word of victory on their lips; but Christ's deep triumph in their hearts—watching the slow progress of their own decay, and yet so far emancipated from personal anxiety that they are still able to think and plan for others, not knowing that they are doing any great thing. They die, and the world hears nothing of them; and yet theirs was the completest victory. They came to the battle field, the field to which they had been looking forward all their lives, and the enemy was not to be found. There was no foe to fight with.—F. W. Robertson.

What a power has Death to awe and hush the voices of this earth! How mute we stand when that presence confronts us, and we look upon the silence he has wrought in a human life! We can only gaze, and bow our heads, and creep with our broken stammering utterances under the shelter of some great word which God has spoken, and in which we see through the history of human sorrow the outstretching and overshadowing of the eternal arms.—W. W. Battershall.

My friend, there will come one day to you a Messenger, whom you cannot treat with contempt. He will say, "Come with me;" and all your pleas of business cares and earthly loves will be of no avail. When his cold hand touches yours, the key of the counting-room will drop forever, and he will lead you away from all your investments, your speculations, your bank-notes and real estate, and with him you will pass into eternity, up to the bar of God. You will not be too busy to die.—A. E. Kittredge.

Death can never interrupt a faithful Christian life. When we feel the touch upon our shoulder and hear the word whispered in our ear, we may be at our work or on a journey, walking the street or asleep in our beds, praying at church or fishing in the country. What difference does it make? We are trying to please our God in what is our business just then. Sacred places and times have no superior advantage for the dying. Sacredness is in the motive of the heart that would do everything as unto the Lord, dying along with the rest. As heaven is still the glad doing of God's will, where is there any interruption?—Maltbie Babcock.

However dreary we may have felt life to be here, yet when that hour comes—the winding up of all things, the last grand rush of darkness on our spirits, the hour of that awful sudden wrench from all we have ever known or loved, the long farewell to sun, moon, stars, and light—brother man, I ask you this day, and I ask myself humbly and fearfully, "What will then be finished? When it is finished, what will it be? Will it be the butterfly existence of pleasure, the mere life of science, a life of uninterrupted sin and self-gratification, or will it be 'Father, I have finished the work which Thou gavest me to do?'"—F. W. Robertson.

We shall be in the midst of some great work, when the tools shall drop from our relaxing fingers, and we shall work no more; we shall be planning some mighty project—house, business, society, book—when in one shattering moment all our thoughts shall perish. Life shall seem strong in us when we shall find that it is done. Oh, how happy they to whom all that remains is immortality; happy you who have that confidence in the Saviour, that, although nature start at the sudden midnight cry, "The Bridegroom cometh!" faith shall answer, the moment that we remember who He is, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus!"—James Hamilton.

When we come to die, we shall be alone. From all our worldly possessions we shall be about to part. Worldly friends—the friends drawn to us by our position, our wealth, or our social qualities,—will leave us as we enter the dark valley. From those bound to us by stronger ties—our kindred, our loved ones, children, brothers, sisters, and from those not less dear to us who have been made our friends because they and we are the friends of the same Saviour,—from them also we must part. Yet not all will leave us. There is One who "sticketh closer than a brother"—One who having loved His own which are in the world loves them to the end.—Albert Barnes.

"God giveth His beloved sleep;" and in that peaceful sleep, realities, not dreams, come round their quiet rest, and fill their conscious spirits and their happy hearts with blessedness and fellowship. In His own time He will make the eternal morning dawn, and the hand that kept them in their slumbers shall touch them into waking, and shall clothe them when they arise according to the body of His own glory; and they, looking into His face, and flashing back its love, its light, its beauty, shall each break forth into singing as the rising light of that unsetting day touches their transfigured and immortal heads, in the triumphant thanksgiving, "I am satisfied, for I awake in Thy likeness."—Alexander Maclaren.

Death is a great preacher of deathlessness. The protest of the soul against death, its reversion, its revulsion, is a high instinct of life. Dissatisfaction in his world who satisfieth the desire of every living thing has a grip on the future. As far as this goes, he has the least assurance of immortality who can be best satisfied with eating and drinking and "things"; he has the surest hope of ongoings and far distances who does not live by bread alone, whose eye is looking over the shoulder of things, whose ear hears mighty waters rolling evermore, who has "hopes naught can satisfy below." The limits of which death makes us aware, make us aware of life's limitlessness. The wing whose stretch touches the bars of its cage knows it was meant for an ampler ether and diviner air."—Maltbie Babcock.

No man who is fit to live need fear to die. Poor, timorous, faithless souls that we are! How we shall smile at our vain alarms when the worst has happened! To us here, death is the most terrible thing we know. But when we have tasted its reality, it will mean to us birth, deliverance, a new creation of ourselves. It will be what health is to the sick man. It will be what home is to the exile. It will be what the loved one given back is to the bereaved. As we draw near to it, a solemn gladness should fill our hearts. It is God's great morning lighting up the sky. Our fears are the terror of children in the night. The night with its terrors, its darkness, its feverish dreams, is passing away; and when we awake, it will be into the sunlight of God.—George S. Merriam.

Debt

Debt is the worst poverty.—M. G. Lichtwer.

He that dies pays all debts.—Shakespeare.

A church debt is the devil's salary.—Beecher.

Who goes a-borrowing goeth a-sorrowing.—Tusser.

A small debt makes a debtor; a heavy one makes an enemy.—Publius Syrus.

If I owe Smith ten dollars, and God forgives me, that doesn't pay Smith.—R. G. Ingersoll.

Rather go to bed supperless than rise in debt.—Benjamin Franklin.

Many delight more in giving of presents than in paying their debts.—Sir P. Sidney.

Debt is like any other trap, easy enough to get into, but hard enough to get out of.—H. W. Shaw.

I hold every man a debtor to his profession.—Bacon.

Wilt thou seal up the avenues of ill?
Pay every debt as if God wrote the bill!
—Emerson.

Lose not thy own for want of asking for it; it will get thee no thanks.—Fuller.

Debt is the secret foe of thrift, as vice and idleness are its open enemies.—Aughey.

The ghost of many a veteran bill
Shall hover around his slumbers.
—Holmes.

Industry pays debts, while despair increaseth them.—Benjamin Franklin.

A national debt, if it is not excessive, will be to us a national blessing.—Alex. Hamilton.

The man who never has money enough to pay his debts has too much of something else.—J. L. Basford.

Creditors have better memories than debtors; and creditors are a superstitious sect, great observers of set days and times.—Franklin.

Debt is the fatal disease of republics, the first thing and the mightiest to undermine government and corrupt the people.—Wendell Phillips.

Paying of debts is, next to the grace of God, the best means in the world to deliver you from a thousand temptations to sin and vanity.—Delany.

Run not into debt, either for wares sold or money borrowed; be content to want things that are not of absolute necessity, rather than to run up the score.—Sir M. Hale.

Man hazards the condition and loses the virtues of freeman, in proportion as he accustoms his thoughts to view without anguish or shame his lapse into the bondage of debtor.—Lytton.

Debt is to man what the serpent is to the bird; its eye fascinates, its breath poisons, its coil crushes sinew and bone, its jaw is the pitiless grave.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Small debts are like small shot,—they are rattling on every side, and can scarcely be escaped without a wound; great debts are like cannon, of loud noise but little danger.—Johnson.

A public debt is a kind of anchor in the storm; but if the anchor be too heavy for the vessel, she will be sunk by that very weight which was intended for her preservation.—Colton.

Never be argued out of your soul, never be argued out of your honor, and never be argued into believing that soul and honor do not run a terrible risk if you limp into life with the load of a debt on your shoulders.—Bulwer-Lytton.

To one that is not callous, a state of debt and embarrassment is a state of positive misery; the sufferer is as one haunted by an evil spirit, and his heart can know neither rest nor peace till it is cast out.—Bridges.

At the time we were funding our national debt, we heard much about "a public debt being a public blessing," that the stock representing it was a creation of active capital for the ailment of commerce, manufactures and agriculture.—Thomas Jefferson.

Debt, grinding debt, whose iron face the widow, the orphan, and the sons of genius fear and hate; debt, which consumes so much time, which so cripples and disheartens a great spirit with cares that seem so base, is a preceptor whose lessons cannot be foregone, and is needed most by those who suffer from it most.—Emerson.

Debt haunts the mind; a conversation about justice troubles it; the sight of a creditor fills it with confusion; even the sanctuary is not a place of refuge. The borrower is servant to the lender. Independence, so essential to the virtues and pleasures of a man, can only be maintained by setting bounds to our desires, and owing no man anything. A habit of boundless expense undermines and destroys the virtues even in the mind where they seem to dwell. It becomes difficult and at last impossible to pay punctually. When a man of sensibility thinks of the low rate at which his word must henceforth pass, he is little in his own eyes; but difficulties prompt him to study deceiving as an art, and at last he lies to his creditors without a blush. How desolate and how woeful does his mind appear, now that the fence of truth is broken down! Friendship is next dissolved. He felt it once; he now insinuates himself by means of professions and sentiments which were once sincere. He seizes the moment of unsuspecting affection to ensnare the friends of his youth, borrowing money which he never will pay, and binding them for debts which they must hereafter answer. At this rate he sells the virtuous pleasures of loving and being beloved. He swallows up the provisions of aged parents, and the portion of sisters and brethren. The loss of truth is followed by the loss of humanity. His calls are still importunate. He proceeds to fraud and walks on precipices. Ingenuity, which in a better cause might have illustrated his name, is exerted to evade the law, to deceive the world, to cover poverty with the appearance of wealth, to sow unobserved the seeds of fraud.—Chartery.

A man who owes a little can clear it off in a very little time, and, if he is a prudent man, will; whereas a man, who by long negligence, owes a great deal, despairs of ever being able to pay, and therefore never looks into his accounts at all.—Chesterfield.

Decay

Mutability is written upon all things.—Rivarol.

I sorrow that all fair things must decay.—Halleck.

A gilded halo hovering round decay.—Byron.

Ruins in some countries indicate prosperity, in others decay.—R. Anderson.

In the sweetest bud
The eating canker dwells.
—Shakespeare.

An age that melts with unperceiv'd decay,
And glides in modest innocence away.
—Samuel Johnson.

Nature strips her garment gay,
And wears the vesture of decay.
—Logan.

A worm is in the bud of youth,
And at the root of age. —Cowper.

Man passes away: his name perishes from record and recollection; his history is as a tale that is told, and his very monument becomes a ruin.—

Washington Irving.

My way o, life
Is fall'n into the sear and yellow leaf.
—Shakespeare.

Before decay's effacing fingers
Have swept the lines where beauty lingered.
—Byron.

Can we wonder that men perish and are forgotten when their noblest and most enduring works decay?—Ausonius.

Devouring Time and envious Age,
all things yield to you; and with lingering death you destroy, step by step, with venom'd tooth whatever you attack.—Ovid.

All that's bright must fade,—
The brightest still the fleetest;
All that's sweet was made
But to be lost when sweetest.
—Moore.

He that loves a rosy cheek,
Or a coral lip admires,
Or from star-like eyes doth seek Fuel to maintain his fires;—
As old Time makes these decay,
So his flames must waste away.
—Thomas Carew.

There seems to be a constant decay of all our ideas; even of those which are struck deepest, and in minds the most retentive, so that if they be not sometimes renewed by repeated exercises of the senses, or reflection on those kinds of objects which at first occasioned them, the print wears out, and at last there remains nothing to be seen.—Locke.

It is sad
To see the light of beauty wane away,
Know eyes are dimming, bosoms shrivelling, feet
Losing their springs, and limbs their lily
roundness;
But it is worse to feel the heart-spring
gone,
To lose hope, care not for the coming thing,
And feel all things go to decay within us.
—Bailey.

History fades into fable; fact becomes clouded with doubt and controversy; the inscription moulders from the tablet: the statue falls from the pedestal. Columns, arches, pyramids, what are they but heaps of sand; and their epitaphs, but characters written in the dust?—Irving.

Deceit — Deception

Life is the art of being well-deceived.
—Hazlitt.

We are our own aptest deceiver.—
Goethe.

We are never deceived; we deceive ourselves.—Goethe.

It is a double pleasure to deceive the deceiver.—La Fontaine.

The best of women are hypocrites.—
Thackeray.

Yet still we hug the dear deceit.—
Nathaniel Cotton.

Wiles and deceit are female qualities.—Æschylus.

A pious fraud.—Ovid.

Trust not in him that seems a saint.
—Fuller.

Trust not to outward show.—Juvenal.

Gold all is not that doth golden seem.—Spenser.

We are easily fooled by that which we love.—Molière.

Our distrust of another justifies his deceit.—La Rochefoucauld.

Think not I am what I appear.—
Byron.

If the world will be gulled, let it be gulled.—Burton.

It is a pity that we so often succeed in our endeavors to deceive each other.
—Empress Irene.

Oh, that deceit should dwell in such a gorgeous palace!—Shakespeare.

The cunning man uses deceit, but the more cunning man shuns deception.—Adam Ferguson.

Of darkness visible so much be lent, as half to show, half veil, the deep intent.—Pope.

But every thyng which schyneth as the gold, Nis nat gold, as that I have herd it told.
—Chaucer.

Deadly poisons are often concealed under sweet honey.—Ovid.

With such deceits he gained their easy hearts, too prone to credit his perfidious arts.—Dryden.

There is nothing more contemptible than a bald man who pretends to have hair.—Martial.

Perhaps it was right to dissemble your love, But why did you kick me down stairs?
—J. P. Kemble.

O, what a tangled web we weave,
When first we practise to deceive.
—Scott.

No man was ever so much deceived by another as by himself.—Lord Greville.

Of all the evil spirits abroad at this hour in the world, insincerity is the most dangerous.—Froude.

Who makes the fairest show means most deceit.—Pericles.

There is a demand in these days for men who can make wrong conduct appear right.—Terence.

Cheats easily believe others as bad as themselves; there is no deceiving them, nor do they long deceive.—La Bruyère.

We must distinguish between speaking to deceive and being silent to be reserved.—Voltaire.

Ah, that deceit should steal such gentle shapes, and with a virtuous visor hide deep vice!—Shakespeare.

You should not live one way in private, another in public.—Syrus.

We never deceive for a good purpose; knavery adds malice to falsehood.—Bruyère.

The surest way of making a dupe is to let your victim suppose you are his.—Bulwer-Lytton.

We deceive and flatter no one by such delicate artifices as we do our own selves.—Schopenhauer.

The first and worst of all frauds is to cheat one's self. All sin is easy after that.—Bailey.

Nothing is more easy than to deceive one's self, as our affections are subtle persuaders.—Demosthenes.

In olden times an enemy was sometimes poisoned by a bouquet,—deceit sugar-coated.—Latimer.

People would not long remain in social life if they were not the dupes of each other.—Rochefoucauld.

Men, like musical instruments, seem made to be played upon.—Bovee.

False face must hide what the false heart doth know.—Shakespeare.

He carries a stone in one hand, and offers bread with the other.—Plautus.

No one has deceived the whole world, nor has the whole world ever deceived any one.—Pliny the Younger.

It is the act of a bad man to deceive by falsehood.—Cicero.

Even the world, that despises simplicity, does not profess to approve of duplicity.—Trench.

Look to her, Moor; if thou hast eyes to see: She has deceiv'd her father, and may thee.
—Shakespeare.

You tread on smoldering fires covered by deceitful ashes.—Horace.

To know how to dissemble is the knowledge of kings.—Richelieu.

Pretexts are not wanting when one wishes to use them.—Goldoni.

Stamps God's own name upon a lie just made,
To turn a penny in the way of trade.
—Cowper.

Dissimulation creeps gradually into the minds of men.—Cicero.

Things are not always what they seem; first appearances deceive many.
—Phædrus.

The smooth speeches of the wicked are full of treachery.—Phædrus.

It is not being deceived, but undeceived, that renders us miserable.—Mme. Sophie Arnould.

Hypocrisy is the homage which vice renders to virtue.—La Rochefoucauld.

Don't tell me of deception; a lie is a lie, whether it be a lie to the eye or a lie to the ear.—Dr. Johnson.

If mankind were only just what they pretend to be, the problem of the millennium would be immediately solved.
—H. W. Shaw.

When I was stamp'd, some coiner with his tools
Made me a counterfeit. —Shakespeare.

Hateful to me as are the gates of hell is he who, hiding one thing in his heart, utters another.—Bryant.

A cunning woman is her own mistress because she confides in no one. She who deceives others anticipates deceit, and guards herself.—Ninon de Lenclos.

There is no quality so contrary to any nature which one cannot affect, and put on upon occasion, in order to serve an interest.—Swift.

Artifice is allowable in deceiving a rival; we may employ everything against our enemies.—Richelieu.

There is less misery in being cheated than in that kind of wisdom which perceives, or thinks it perceives, that all mankind are cheats.—Chapin.

All deception in the course of life is, indeed, nothing else but a lie reduced to practice and falsehood passing from words into things.—South.

There is no killing the suspicion that deceit has once begotten.—George Eliot.

Though thy face is glossed with specious art, thou retainest the cunning fox beneath thy vapid breast.—Persius.

Skilled in every trick, a worthy heir of his paternal craft, he would make black look white, and white look black.
—Ovid.

Men are so simple, and yield so much to necessity, that he who will deceive will always find him who will lend himself to be deceived.—Machiavelli.

Deceit is the false road to happiness; and all the joys we travel through to vice, like fairy banquets, vanish when we touch them.—Aarons Hill.

We are so accustomed to masquerade ourselves before others that we end by deceiving ourselves.—Rochefoucauld.

It many times falls out that we deem ourselves much deceived in others because we first deceived ourselves.—Sir P. Sidney.

Mankind in the gross is a gaping monster, that loves to be deceived, and has seldom been disappointed.—MacKenzie.

'Tis not my talent to conceal my thoughts,
Or carry smiles and sunshine in my face,
When discontent sits heavy at my heart.
—Addison.

Cheaters must get some credit before they can cozen, and all falsehood, if not founded in some truth, would not be fixed in any belief.—Fuller.

Dissimulation was his masterpiece; in which he so much excelled that men were not ashamed of being deceived but twice by him.—Clarendon.

I hate all explanations; they who make them deceive either themselves or the other party,—generally both.—Goethe.

The silly when deceived exclaim loudly; the fool complains; the honest man walks away and is silent.—La Noue.

There are falsehoods which represent truth so well that it would be judging ill not to be deceived by them.—Rochefoucauld.

It is as easy to deceive one's self without perceiving it as it is difficult to deceive others without their finding it out.—Rochefoucauld.

He seem'd
For dignity compos'd and high exploit;
But all was false and hollow. —Milton.

We have few faults that are not more excusable in themselves than are the means which we use to conceal them.—Rochefoucauld.

Men are such dupes by choice, that he who would impose upon others never need be at a loss to find ready victims.—Balzac.

With one hand he put
A penny in the urn of poverty,
And with the other took a shilling out.
—Pollok.

Shut, shut the door, good John! fatigued I said;
Tie up the knocker, say I'm sick, I'm dead.
—Pope.

You think him to be your dupe: if he feigns to be so, who is the greater dupe, he or you?—La Bruyère.

It is in disputes as in armies; where the weaker side sets up false lights, and makes a great noise, to make the enemy believe them more numerous and strong than they really are.—Swift.

Trust him not with your secrets, who, when left alone in your room, turns over your papers.—Lavater.

Smooth runs the water, where the brook is deep;
And in his simple show he harbors treason.
The fox barks not, when he would steal the lamb.
—Shakespeare.

All false practices and affections of knowledge are more odious to God, and deserve to be so to men, than any want or defect of knowledge can be.—Sprat.

If a misplaced admiration shows imbecility, an affected criticism shows vice of character. Expose thyself rather to appear a beast than false.—Diderot.

There can be no greater labor than to be always dissembling; there being so many ways by which a smothered truth is apt to blaze and break out.—South.

Many an honest man practices upon himself an amount of deceit sufficient, if practised upon another, and in a little different way, to send him to the state prison.—Bovee.

The true motives of our actions, like the real pipes of an organ, are usually concealed; but the gilded and hollow pretext is pompously placed in the front for show.—Colton.

Sigh no more, ladies, sigh no more,
Men were deceivers ever;
One foot in sea, and one on shore;
To one thing constant never.
—Shakespeare.

It is dishonorable to say one thing and think another; how much more dishonorable to write one thing and think another.—Seneca.

No man for any considerable period can wear one face to himself and another to the multitude without finally getting bewildered as to which may be true.—Hawthorne.

An evil soul producing holy witness
Is like a villain with a smiling cheek;
A goodly apple rotten at the heart;
O, what a goodly outside falsehood hath!
—Shakespeare.

It is a pity we so often succeed in our attempts to deceive each other, for our double-dealing generally comes down upon ourselves. To speak a lie or to act a lie is alike contemptible in the sight of God and man.—Everton.

The deceptions which the two sexes play off upon each other bring as many ill-sorted couples into the bonds of Hymen as ever could be done by the arbitrary pairing of a legal match-maker.—Byron.

He was justly accounted a skilful poisoner who destroyed his victims by bouquets of lovely and fragrant flowers. The art has not been lost; nay, is practised every day,—by the world.—Latimer.

As that gallant can best affect a pretended passion for one woman who has no true love for another, so he that has no real esteem for any of the virtues can best assume the appearance of them all.—Colton.

A false mind is false in everything, just as a cross eye always looks askant. But one may err once, nay, a hundred times, without being double-minded. There can never be mental duplicity where there is sincerity.—Joubert.

The life of a woman is a long dissimulation. Candor, beauty, freshness, virginity, modesty,—woman has each of these but once. When lost, she must simulate them the rest of her life.—Rétif de la Bretonne.

The life even of a just man is a round of petty frauds; that of a knave a series of greater. We degrade life by our follies and vices, and then complain that the unhappiness which is only their accompaniment is inherent in the constitution of things.—Bovee.

Deceit and falsehood, whatever conveniences they may for a time promise or produce, are, in the sum of life, obstacles to happiness. Those who profit by the cheat distrust the deceiver; and the act by which kindness was sought puts an end to confidence.—Johnson.

Of all the agonies in life, that which is most poignant and harrowing—that which for the time annihilates reason, and leaves our whole organization one lacerated, mangled heart—is the conviction that we have been deceived where we placed all the trust of love.—Bulwer-Lytton.

He who attempts to make others believe in means which he himself despises is a puffer; he who makes use of more means than he knows to be necessary is a quack; and he who ascribes to those means a greater efficacy than his own experience warrants is an impostor.—Lavater.

I follow a more easy, and, in my opinion, a wiser course, namely—to inveigh against the levity of the female sex, their fickleness, their double-dealing, their rotten promises, their broken faith, and, finally, their want of judgment in bestowing their affections.—Cervantes.

For he who has acquired the habit of lying or deceiving his father, will do the same with less remorse to others. I believe that it is better to bind your children to you by a feeling of respect, and by gentleness, than by fear.—Terence.

Think'st thou there are no serpents in the world
But those who slide along the grassy sod,
And sting the luckless foot that presses them?
There are who in the path of social life
Do bask their spotted skins in Fortune's sun,
And sting the soul.

—Joanna Baillie.

Some frauds succeed from the apparent candor, the open confidence and the full blaze of ingenuousness that is thrown around them. The slightest mystery would excite suspicion, and ruin all. Such stratagems may be compared to the stars, they are discoverable by darkness and hidden only by light.—Colton.

The world is still deceiv'd with ornament,
In law, what plea so tainted and corrupt,
But, being season'd with a gracious voice,
Obscures the show of evil? In religion,
What damned error, but some sober brow
Will bless it and approve it with a text,
Hiding the grossness with fair ornament?
—Shakespeare.

What man so wise, what earthly wit so ware,
As to descry the crafty cunning train,
By which deceit doth mask in visor fair,
And cast her colours dyed deep in grain,
To seem like truth, whose shape she well
can feign,
And fitting gestures to her purpose frame,
The guiltless man with guile to entertain?
—Spenser.

Of Adam's first wife, Lilith, it is told (The witch he loved before the gift of Eve)
That ere the snakes, her sweet tongue could deceive
And her enchanted hair was the first gold—
And still she sits, young while the earth is old
And, subtly of herself contemplative, Draws men to watch the bright net she can weave,
Till heart and body and life are in its hold.
—Dante Gabriel Rossetti.

Man is nothing but insincerity, falsehood, and hypocrisy, both in regard to himself and in regard to others.
He does not wish that he should be told the truth, he shuns saying it to others; and all these moods, so inconsistent with justice and reason, have their roots in his heart.—Pascal.

December

In cold December fragrant chaplets blow,
And heavy harvests nod beneath the snow.
—Pope.

In a drear-nighted December,
Too happy, happy brook,
Thy bubblings ne'er remember
Apollo's summer look;
But with a sweet forgetting,
They stay their crystal fretting,
Never, never petting
About the frozen time. —Keats.

December drops no weak, relenting tear,
By our fond Summer sympathies ensnared,
Nor from the perfect circle of the year
Can even Winter's crystal gems be spared. —C. P. Cranch.

In December ring
Every day the chimes;
Loud the gleemen sing
In the streets their merry rhymes.
Let us by the fire
Ever higher
Sing them till the night expire!
—Longfellow.

Shout now! The months' with loud acclaim,
Take up the cry and send it forth;
May breathing sweet her Spring perfumes,
November thundering from the North.
With hands upraised, as with one voice,
They join their notes in grand accord;
Hail to December! say they all,
It gave to Earth our Christ the Lord!
—J. K. Hoyt.

Decency

The laws of decency enforce themselves.—Mme. Louise Colet.

Decency renders all things tolerable.
—De Gerando.

Delicacy is the parent of decency.—
Mme. Deluzy.

Decency is not defined by statute, but the laws of instinct are stronger.—
Duclos.

Too great a display of delicacy can and does sometimes infringe upon decency.—Balzac.

Caprice in women often infringes upon the rules of decency.—Bruyère.

A woman without a degree of decency and delicacy is unsexed.—C. M.
Yonge.

No law reaches it, but all right-minded people observe it.—Chamfort.

Decency is the least of all laws, yet the law which is most strictly observed.—Rochefoucauld.

If once a woman breaks through the barriers of decency, her case is desperate; and if she goes greater lengths

than the men, and leaves the pale of propriety farther behind her, it is because she is aware that all return is prohibited, and by none so strongly as by her own sex.—Colton.

Virtue and decency are so nearly related that it is difficult to separate them from each other but in our imagination.—Tully.

As beauty of body, with an agreeable carriage, pleases the eye, and that pleasure consists in that we observe all the parts with a certain elegance are proportioned to each other; so does decency of behavior which appears in our lives obtain the approbation of all with whom we converse, from the order, consistency, and moderation of our words and actions.—Steele.

Decision

I'll not budge an inch.—Shakespeare.

Here I stand; I can do no otherwise. God help me. Amen.—Martin Luther.

I am here; I shall remain here.—Marshal MacMahon.

All may do what has by man been done.—Young.

For what I will, I will, and there an end.—Shakespeare.

Joking decides great things,
Stronger and better oft than earnest can.
—Milton.

He only is a well-made man who has a good determination.—Emerson.

And her yes, once said to you,
Shall be Yes for evermore.
—E. B. Browning.

The souls of men of feeble purpose are the graveyards of good intentions.

Heaven never helps the man who will not act.—Shakespeare.

I take one decisive and immediate step, and resign my all to the sufficiency of my Saviour.—Thomas Chalmers.

I hate to see things done by halves. If it be right, do it boldly; if it be wrong, leave it undone.—Gilpin.

When desperate ills demand a speedy cure, distrust is cowardice and prudence folly.—Johnson.

There is no mistake; there has been no mistake; and there shall be no mistake.—Duke of Wellington.

Advise well before you begin; and when you have decided, act promptly.—Sallust.

Take time to deliberate; but when the time for action arrives, stop thinking and go in.—Andrew Jackson.

The power of uncontrollable decision is of the most delicate and dangerous nature.—James A. Bayard.

Choose a firm cloud before it fall, and in it Catch, ere she change, the Cynthia of this minute.
—Pope.

Men must decide on what they will not do, and then they are able to act with vigor in what they ought to do.—Mencius.

Sighs, groans, and tears proclaim his inward pains,
But the firm purpose of his heart remains.
—Dryden.

The woman who is resolved to be respected can make herself to be so even amidst an army of soldiers.—Cervantes.

Once to every man and nation come the moment to decide,
In the strife of Truth with Falsehood, for the good or evil side.
—Lowell.

The keen spirit
Seizes the prompt occasion—makes the thought
Start into instant action, and at once
Plans and performs, resolves and executes!
—Hannah More.

Firmness, both in sufferance and exertion, is a character which I would wish to possess. I have always despised the whining yelp of complaint and the cowardly, feeble resolve.—Robert Burns.

Decision is a vastly important thing with a convicted sinner. He must choose, or he must be lost. If he will not do it, he may expect the Divine Spirit to depart from him, and leave him to his own way.—Ichabod Spencer.

A man who has not learned to say "no"—who is not resolved that he will take God's way in spite of every dog that can bark at him, in spite of every silvery voice that can woo him aside—will be a weak and wretched man till he dies.—Alexander Maclaren.

I reverence the individual who understands distinctly what he wishes; who unweariedly advances, who knows the means conducive to his object, and can seize and use them.—Goethe.

There is nothing more to be esteemed than a manly firmness and decision of character. I like a person who knows his own mind and sticks to it; who sees at once what is to be done in given circumstances and does it.—Hazlitt.

Decide not rashly. The decision made Can never be recalled. The Gods implore not,
Plead not, solicit not; they only offer
Choice and occasion, which once being passed Return no more. Dost thou accept the gift?
—Longfellow.

In such a world as this, with such hearts as ours, weakness is wickedness in the long run. Whoever lets himself be shaped and guided by any thing lower than an inflexible will, fixed in obedience to God, will in the end be shaped into a deformity, and guided to wreck and ruin.—Alexander Maclaren.

For a few brief days the orchards are white with blossoms. They soon turn to fruit, or else float away, useless and wasted, upon the idle breeze.

So will it be with present feelings. They must be deepened into decision, or be entirely dissipated by delay.—T. L. Cuyler.

There is a tide in the affairs of men,
Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune;
Omitted, all the voyage of their life
Is bound in shallows and in miseries;
And we must take the current when it serves,
Or lose our ventures. —Shakespeare.

To be energetic and firm where principle demands it, and tolerant in all else, is not easy. It is not easy to abhor wickedness, and oppose it with every energy, and at the same time to have the meekness and gentleness of Christ, becoming all things to all men for the truth's sake. The energy of patience, the most godlike of all, is not easy.—Mark Hopkins.

Whatever we think out, whatever we take in hand to do, should be perfectly and finally finished, that the world, if it must alter, will only have to spoil it; we have then nothing to do but unite the severed, to recollect and restore the dismembered.—Goethe.

Then to side with Truth is noble when we share her wretched crust,
Ere her cause bring fame and profit, and 'tis prosperous to be just;
Then it is the brave man chooses, while the coward stands aside,
Doubting in his abject spirit, till his Lord is crucified. —James Russell Lowell.

Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide,
In the strife of Truth with Falsehood, for the good or evil side;
Some great cause, God's new Messiah offering each the bloom or blight,
Parts the goats upon the left hand, and the sheep upon the right;
And the choice goes by forever 'twixt that darkness and that light.
—James Russell Lowell

Men first make up their minds (and the smaller the mind the sooner made up), and then seek for the reasons; and if they chance to stumble upon a good reason, of course they do not reject it. But though they are right, they are only right by chance.—Whately.

Decoration Day

"It is the purpose of the command-in-chief to inaugurate this observance with the hope that it will be kept up from year to year while a survivor of the war remains to honor the memory of the departed."—Gen. Logan.

The army of Grant and the army of Lee are together. They are one now in faith, in hope, in fraternity, in purpose, and in an invincible patriotism. And, therefore, the country is in no danger. In justice strong, in peace secure, and in devotion to the flag all one.—William McKinley.

We honor our heroic and patriotic dead by being true men, as true men by faithfully fighting the battles of our day as they fought the battles of their day.—David Gregg, D. D.

Let no vandalism of avarice or neglect, no ravages of time, testify to the present or to the coming generations, that we have forgotten, as a people, the cost of a free and undivided republic.—Gen. John A. Logan.

Other lands have had heroes, but ours were more—they were saviors, and by their sacrifices have saved the greatest land under the shining sun.—Rev. H. W. Bolton.

There is a shrine in the temple of ages, where lie forever embalmed the memories of such as have deserved well of their country and their race.—Col. John Mason Brown.

Soldiers of the Republic, the battles of the present are identical with the battles of the past. The form of warfare only is changed. The moral conflicts waged in our nation are as truly battles as were the conflicts of Gettysburg and Lookout Mountain.—David Gregg, D. D.

So long as its sons are willing to die for their motherland, so long will it endure to shelter and bless them and their children. At the hour when a people shall be unwilling to abide this test, they will find that they have no longer a country worth saving.—Capt F. J. Babson.

It is good for us to be here. He who reverently and gratefully makes a pilgrimage to the spot where lies the patriot soldier, who gave his life for his country and for freedom, and for the expression of those emotions places a violet upon the soldier's grave, has received a re-consecration to the work which belongs to the citizen and the patriot.

It is but natural that flowers should give expression to our love for the departed; theirs is an oratory that speaks in perfumed silence. Joy and sorrow have their appropriate expression in these mute yet eloquent letters of "the blooming alphabet of creation."—A. T. Slade, Esq.

The immortal Lincoln bowed in prayer, and plead Heaven's almighty aid, vowing the proclamation of freedom through all the land to all the inhabitants thereof; and though the assassin's deadly arm cut short his high career, his soul went up to God with four million broken manacles in its hand.—American Wesleyan.

It is instructive to read the arguments of the statesmen of forty years ago; but the war settled the issue, and no State nor combination of States can extricate itself from the loving grasp of all the States. "United we stand." "Divided" we cannot be. E Pluribus Unum.—Christian Advocate.

The Union army demonstrated the stability of representative government. In the estimation of Europe the American Republic was an experiment. Would it go to pieces by the earthquake shock of civil war? Jealous kings said "Yes," but when the red lips of Grant's cannon thundered "No!" thrones trembled.—Rev. C. E. Allison.

Memorial Day is one of the most significant and beautiful occasions of the year. It shows the sentiment of the people toward those who gave their lives for a good cause, and it teaches a lesson in patriotism which is without a parallel.—Rev. C. E. Allison.

No more shall the war-cry sever,
Or the widening rivers be red;
Our anger is banished forever
When are laureled the graves of our dead!
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment-day—
Love and tears for the Blue,
Tears and love for the Gray.
—F. M. Finch.

The passions of the titanic struggle will finally enter upon the sleep of oblivion, and only its splendid accomplishments for the cause of human freedom and a united nation, stronger and richer in patriotism because of the great strife, will be remembered.—General James Longstreet.

This precious slumbering dust, when animate, leaving the peaceful pursuits of life, sundering the ties of friendship and love, and assuming the habiliments of the soldier, incurred exposure, hardship, fatigue, danger, death, inspired by no such love of glory, but rather by the consciousness which animated the hero of Trafalgar, "Our country expects every man to do his duty."—Capt. W. H. Sweet.

For no such wretched end did our heroes die. In their last will and testament, sealed with their blood, they have bequeathed to us, as their dying legacy, a union stronger, nobler, freer than ever. "The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church." By the gift of these men, and such as these, we have henceforth a more homogeneous country and a grander and higher civilization.—E. B. Fairfield.

Let us cherish their memories and treasure up their deeds! Let us gather their ashes into the urn of immortality, and write every name on the national roll of honor! Our country's soil gives them all sepulture. They sleep beneath the Stripes and Stars, revered by a race freed from bondage, and the liberty-loving masses of the whole world.—J. E. Patterson.

Alas, many who went forth to the deadly fray returned not, save encoffined for the tomb, or smitten with a mortal wound or deadly disease, which claimed their lives at length. Over the memory of these, we drop the tear of affection, and strew above their sleeping dust the fragrant emblems of a nation's undying gratitude, and chant again their funeral requiem.—American Wesleyan.

Here sleeps heroic dust! It is meet that a redeemed nation should come, to pay it homage at such tombs, wreathing the memory of its patriot dead in the emblems of grateful affection. These grass-grown mounds, these flower-decked graves, awake the memories of the past, and the history of our nation's perils and its triumphs comes crowding on us here.—American Wesleyan.

Through all history, from the beginning, a noble army of martyrs have fought fiercely and fallen bravely for that unseen mistress, their country. So, through all history, to the end, as long as men believe in God, that army must still march and fall, recruited only from the flower of mankind, cheered only by their own hope of humanity, strong only in the confidence of their cause.—George William Curtis.

When the war began thousands of young men, the flower of American youth, were looking out of college halls upon a future bright with professional honors. They flung books aside and seized rifles. They became "History's Graduates." Hundreds of thousands of young Americans were anticipating a future replete with the profits and emoluments which reward business genius and integrity. Straightway they abandoned cherished life plans in order to defend free institutions.—Rev. Chas. E. Allison.

And every village graveyard will have its green mounds, that shall need no storied monument to clothe them with a peculiar consecration—graves that hold the dust of heroes—graves that all men approach with reverent steps—graves out of whose solemn silence shall whisper inspiring voices, telling the young from generation to generation how great is their country's worth and cost, and how noble and beautiful it was to die for it.—Putnam.

As we honor their patriotism, emulate their example, glorify their heroism, and teach our children the sacredness of the great cause in which they offered up their young lives, let us scatter over their graves the brightest beauties of life—the glad tokens of a blessed immortality. And may the service, now inaugurated, be perpetuated through each recurring year, so long as the republic shall stand.—Captain G. C. Mitchell.

It is very pleasant to have the opportunity to grasp the friendly hand of those who thought so diametrically opposite, thirty years ago. It proves time not only heals, but also cools the blood, gives more mature judgment, enabling each to overlook the past, and while we do not claim to forget those dark hours in our life, nor withdraw an iota, nor impugn the motives or sincerity of an opponent, we can each forgive, and while we let the dead past bury its dead, rejoice in the sunshine of the present, that brings comfort and happiness to all parts of our native land, as we remember above and over all else, we are American citizens.—Rev. Clark Wright.

We are assembled to-day to call the roll of the honored dead anew, and to lay a fresh tribute of love and gratitude upon their graves. The occasion is complete in itself. It needs no help of speech to make it memorable. These eloquent flags waving at so many headstones, with no stripe erased, and no star obscured; these bayonets gleaming in the sunshine; these echoing cannon, this tap of drums; these beautiful flowers borne by loving hands, contributed by loving hearts; these sacred memories baptizing us all; speak to us to-day more eloquently than man can speak, in a language which we can all understand.—Rev. J. B. Moore.

'Tis quite enough for grief and shame,
That such a strife e'er smote the land;
And quite enough for praise and fame,
That Union, Law, and Freedom stand.
Forgive the strife, wash out the shame
In Lethe's unrevealing river;
But build a monument to fame,
And glorify these dead forever.

—J. W. Gordon.

Strew the fair garlands where slumber the dead,
Ring out the strains like the swell of the sea;
Heart-felt the tribute we lay on each bed:
Sound o'er the brave the refrain of the free,
Sound the refrain of the loyal and free,
Visit each sleeper and hallow each bed:
Waves the starred banner from sea-coast to sea;
Grateful the living and honored the dead.

—S. F. Smith.

The light that shines from a patriot's grave is a pure and holy light, and while we are guided by it we shall never go into the paths of treason and rebellion. Let that light illuminate our pathway, and the noble example of the dead strengthen our love of country and devotion to duty. When patriotism in the hearts of the people is dead all is lost. It is the life-blood and soul of the national existence, the animating fire which makes a people great, and their history grand and beautiful.

They pass before us like a long procession coming from their camping grounds amid the cemeteries, the battlefields, the graveyards of the south. To us they are no longer dead, they live—we can almost hear their well-known voices as with flashing eye, active limb, courageous lion hearts, once more they are with us, side by side, the blue, the gray, the private, the officer; on they pass, those who died at Roanoke, at Camden, at South Mountain, at Antietam, at Fredericksburg, and the battlefields of the south. Hayes and McComas, Kimball, Sturges, Gadsden, Hamilton, Barnett, Wright, Reno, Jackson and Burnside, Grant and Lee.—Rev. Clark Wright

With no jealousies to indulge and no envy to gratify, we seek to draw a lesson from the past that shall be to our future a beacon and a guide. To the sleeping martyrs, whose graves billow every battlefield, it matters little what we may now say or do. Our tender offerings of affection will be lost upon their mounds, and the sweet aroma of our scented flowers be uselessly exhaled to air, save as we revive our faith in the doctrines which they defended, and our zeal in the cause for which they died.—Col. John P. Jackson.

These saved the Union—union which had perished

But for the courage which their deeds revealed;

No stripes were taken from the flag they cherished,

No star was blotted from its azure field.

The old survivors of that fight victorious,
Some still remain, yet leave us one by one;

They die, but never die their actions glorious—

They die, but lives the work so nobly done.
—Thomas Dunn English.

You who went forth with a mother's benediction; you who bade farewell to the children who received your last embrace at the place of embarkation; you who faced the enemy so boldly in the charge; you who died amid the carnage of battle alone, alone, while the very stars of God seemed to look in pity upon you. O yes, you, you, my countrymen, whether from Georgia or New York, tonight, these—the remnant of more than 2,000 men—these your comrades gathered here, salute you as we bring to mind your faithfulness as soldiers, and rejoice with you that our country has passed from the hurricane to the calm; from out of all that crash, of which we were part, to liberty, union, brotherly love, and peace.—Rev. Clark Wright.

In the book of nature, where every emotional, mental, and spiritual quality of humanity may find its correspondence and illustrations, flowers represent good affections, thoughts, and intentions toward others. As the flower precedes the fruit, and gives notice of its coming, so good thoughts, affections, and intentions precede and give promise of deeds in love to others. These cherished dead are now beyond the reach of our good deeds; to bring fruits to them would be vain, but to indulge good thoughts and affections toward them should enlarge our souls and wake in our breasts a more vigorous determination to sacrifice ourselves for the good of others.—Rev. Homer Everett.

The asperities and alienations engendered by the great struggle between freedom and slavery have largely passed away, and those who participated as soldiers on both sides, who are still living, fraternize with each other as brothers and fellow-citizens of one common country, on whose glorious banner is inscribed forever E pluribus unum. It is meet that those who sacrificed and died in the struggle, or who sacrificed and have since died, should be remembered and honored for the invaluable service they have rendered their country and humanity. Let the graves of the dead soldiers be decorated with flowers and wreaths of laurel, and the memory of their noble deeds revived anew in oratory and song.—Selected.

How sleep the brave who sink to rest,
With all their country's wishes blessed;
When Spring, with dewy fingers cold,
Returns to deck their hallow'd mold,
She there shall dress a sweeter sod,
Than Fancy's feet have ever trod.

By fairy hands their knell is rung,
By forms unseen their dirge is sung;
There Honor comes, a pilgrim gray,
To bless the turf that wraps their clay;
And Freedom shall awhile repair,
To dwell a weeping hermit there.

—Collins.

Then as oft as the 30th of May returns with time's annual round let a grateful nation remember its dead, and with a floral offering decorate the tombs of its fallen heroes, while the dropping tear moistens the cold sod that covers their sleeping dust. To them we owe the liberty we enjoy; to them we owe the preservation of our institutions; and shall we not hold them in grateful remembrance? And though we may often differ in opinion, let us here be united. In God's name let us respect and love the dead who have died for us. Let this beautiful custom be perpetuated until the day shall become hallowed in the history of freedom. It carries with it the idea of our loss and the dear cost of liberty. It brings fresh to mind the deeds of our country's martyrs, it keeps alive and warm the greatest principles for which our sires poured out their blood, on which our republic is based.—Gen. John A. Logan.

Cover the thousands who sleep far away—
Sleep where their friends can not find them
to-day;

They who in mountain, and hillside and dell Rest where they wearied, and lie where they fell.

Softly the grass-blade creeps round their repose;

Sweetly above them the wild flow'ret blows;
Zephyrs of freedom fly gently o'erhead,

Whispering names for the patriot dead.

Cover the faces that motionless lie,

Shut from the blue of the glorious sky;

Faces once lighted with smiles of the gay—

Faces now marred with the frown of decay.

Eyes that beamed friendship and love to your own;

Lips that sweet thoughts of affection made
known;

Brows you have soothed in the day of distress;

Cheeks you have flushed by the tender caress.

Faces that brightened at War's stirring cry;
Faces that streamed when they bade you good-by.

Faces that glowed in the battle's red flame,
Paling for naught, till the Death Angel came.

Cover them over—yes, cover them over—Parent, and husband, and brother, and lover:

Kiss in your hearts these dead heroes of ours,

And cover them over with beautiful flowers!
—Will Carleton.

For love of country they accepted death, and thus resolved all doubts, and made immortal their patriotism and their virtue. For the noblest man that lives there still remains a conflict. He must still withstand the assaults of time and fortune, must still be assailed with temptations, before which lofty natures have fallen; but with these the conflict ended, the victory was won, when death stamped on them the great seal of heroic character, and closed a record which years can never blot.—Rev. C. E. Allison.

When the life of the nation was attempted, when the cause of liberty and human rights called for their aid, they rushed forth to rally under the banner they loved, with grand singleness of purpose and heroic devotion—leaving all behind them, to meet toil and danger, hunger, sickness, wounds, and death, for nothing but the sublime satisfaction of doing their duty to their country and to mankind.—Gen. Carl Schurz.

The best men we had in each of these two regiments are not visibly present with us now; the best and truest of our number lie buried on the battlefields of the south; some were clad in gray, some in blue; no towering monument marks their resting place, nor massive monolith stands sentinel. Buried where they fell, baptizing the soil with their blood, forever consecrating the ground, making it holy, while their life and death tell the world the story of how an American will fight, and if necessary die for what he believes to be the right.—Rev. Clark Wright.

From age to age the honorable fame of this patriotic army will endure. It will not decrease, but rather increase with the flow of years. When the passions of the times are stilled in the grave and the men of this generation have passed away from the earth, the gathering plaudits of coming generations will greet the memory of the men who in a great crisis saved the national life.—Rev. Franklin Moore, D. D.

But the patriot dead are not only those who wore the blue and marched under the flag; not alone their graves do we honor. There were patriots who at home upheld the soldier's heart and inspired him to duty. There were the women, who gave their loved ones, who breathed up prayers for their safety and return, whose needles stitched for them, whose hands wrought for them, whose letters cheered them, whose love forever embodied itself in something that should comfort and relieve them. The memory of those patriot women we too would honor, and did we know where their bodies sleep, their graves we would decorate.

The martyrs of all ages are illustrious, not so much by virtue of their personal position and merits as from the fact that the great cause for which they suffered and sacrificed themselves has reflected upon them its own imperishable luster and glory. And if any cause can confer honor upon its defenders and martyrs, surely the cause for which these men suffered is such a one.—Rev. William McKinley.

As a flash of lightning in a midnight tempest reveals the abysmal horrors of the sea, so did the flash of the first gun disclose the awful abyss into which rebellion was ready to plunge us. In a moment the fire was lighted in twenty million hearts. In a moment we were the most warlike nation on the earth. In a moment we were not merely a people with an army—we were a people in arms. The nation was in column—not all at the front, but all in the array. I love to believe that no heroic sacrifice is ever lost; that the characters of men are molded and inspired by what their fathers have done; that treasured up in American souls are all the unconscious influences of the great deeds of the Anglo-Saxon race, from Agincourt to Bunker Hill. It was such an influence that led a young Greek, two thousand years ago, when musing on the battle of Marathon, to exclaim, "The trophies of Miltiades will not let me sleep!" Could these men be silent in 1861; these, whose ancestors had felt the inspiration of battle on every field where civilization had fought in the last thousand years? Read their answer in this green turf. Each for himself gathered up the cherished purposes of life—its aims and ambitions, its dearest affections—and flung all, with life itself, into the scale of battle.—James A. Garfield.

A shot fired at the old flag aroused the anger of a great people. Who can describe those historic years? The heavens were suddenly black. Fierce eagles of war flew across the lurid clouds. The awful storm rolled thunders along the sky. Reverberating, they shook the Atlantic coast and the banks of the Mississippi. They crashed over Antietam, Vicksburg, and Gettysburg. Forked lightnings played among the clouds around Lookout Mountain. Fire ran along upon the ground in Tennessee, and in Virginia, swamps and rivers were turned to blood. It was the nation's midnight. The death angel was abroad with unsheathed sword. There was a great cry in the land, for there was not a house among half a million where there was not one dead. Four years the storm raged. The iron hail rattled incessantly, prostrating armed men, and crushing woman's tender heart. It was a deluge of blood. Then muttering thunders ceased; the clouds broke away, and out of the blue sky a dove came, and lo! in her mouth was an olive leaf. More than a quarter of a century has passed. Peace still abides. "Over the cannon's mouth the spider weaves his web." But while mighty people are busied with great enterprises, they do not forget—cannot forget—the brave men who purchased peace by their valor and blood.—Rev. Chas. E. Allison.

Great God! We thank Thee for this home,
This bounteous birthland of the free,
Where wanderers from afar may come,
And breathe the air of liberty;
Still may her flowers untrampled spring,
Her harvests wave, her cities rise,
And yet, till time shall fold her wing,
Remain earth's loveliest paradise.

Give me the death of those
Who for their country die;
And oh, be mine like their repose,
As cold and low they lie.
Their loveliest mother earth
Enshrines the fallen brave;
In her sweet lap who gave them birth,
They find a tranquil grave.
—Col. T. A. Green.

We hear much of the language of flowers. With them we crown the head of childhood, and deck the brow of beauty. They bring to the sick chamber the cheering remembrance of the grand expanse of strength and loveliness that is spread abroad without. They grace the festival. They soothe the grief of the funeral. They tell the deepest secrets of love, and pass into the cells of memory, never to be forgotten. But where have flowers ever been applied by man to a nobler, fitter purpose than by us to-day? Have we not done well to give the sweetest products of our native land to the memory of those who died to defend it? May not these flowers best spend the brief hour of their unassuming lives in doing honor to heroes, and wither and meet death on the graves of the truest hearts that ever bled?—Rev. W. H. Dana.

Their heroic deeds take rank in that grandeur whose full appreciation requires the lapse of thoughtful years. Their greatness, heartily as it is recognized now, will grow more in splendor as the fruits of their victory shall fall in successive years to enrich the nation's history. It has happened to them as to all prominent actors in either religious or political contests, that the excellency of their deeds could not be fully discovered until the smoke and dust of battle had been swept away. In such time the aspirations of slandering enemies and the jealousy of lukewarm associates, and the timidity of friends in faintly claiming deserved praise, all conspire in withholding that generous award of honor which after generations take delight in bestowing. Thus the generations to come will continue the repetition of the tributes to these patriots which we have this day observed, rehearsing with ever-increasing praise the moral grandeur of their deeds.—Rev. Mr. Baumme.

But one way is open to the people of this country who would estimate the value of the services rendered by the union soldiers, living or dead. It is to try to imagine what the result would have been had the union been divided. There would have been two nations instead of one; twice as many foreign diplomats within the territory as now; twice as many possibilities of foreign complications; and much more than twice as much difficulty in settling them, while the influence of each fragment would be much less than half the amount exercised by the whole. Those who had a common ancestry which had been represented in the same halls of legislation, had cheered the same flag and fought together—not against each other—for freedom, would have been strangers and foreigners, aliens from the commonwealth of which Washington was the father. Mutual jealousies would make standing armies necessary, and war clouds would ever have lowered upon the political horizon. It was the valor of our soldiers that stood between the people of the United States and these evils.—New York Christian Advocate.

When we look at our vast country with all its resources of wealth and power, at our system of free government with all the appliances for further advancement in greatness and intelligence, reaching as it does from ocean to ocean, with its fields, and mines, and streams, its hills and valleys, smiling in the sunlight of freedom, inviting the poor and oppressed of all lands to come and occupy them, to plow and reap, to build and grow, and be happy—when we look at all this and think what we would have been had the rebellion proved a success, we feel that our comrades did not die in vain, and we feel that this is but a small token, indeed, of the love that we ought to show their memories. What tender emotions are awakened to-day in our minds as we bend over the silent, yet eloquent, mounds where the American soldier sleeps his last sleep.—Rev. J. F. Meredith.

Dedication

To be a living member of the church of Christ, and to enjoy its privileges is the highest honor God can confer on a man.—A. F. Behrends.

Strength is power in action. Beauty is the assemblage of all graces. The strength and the beauty, being connected with God's sanctuary, must be divine strength and divine beauty. In what, then, consist this strength and beauty which so emphasize and make distinctive His sanctuary?—Rev. W. B. Stevens.

Solomon closed the prayer with which he dedicated the temple with these words: "Now, my God, let, I beseech Thee, Thine eyes be open, and let Thine ears be attent unto the prayer that is made in this place. Now therefore arise, O Lord God, into Thy resting-place, Thou, and the ark of Thy strength: let Thy priests, O Lord God, be clothed with salvation, and let Thy saints rejoice in goodness."—Rev. W. B. Stevens.

Behold this temple to Thy praise,
Make it Thy very own;
Here knit our waiting souls in one,
And bind us to Thy throne.

Come, Lord, and with Thy presence fill
This consecrated place;
Come, gather here through all the years
The trophies of Thy grace.

Great benefits are conferred by the churches upon communities in the educational advantages they afford, the moral life they impart the basal fluence they exert, and the power of their associations upon individual lives in the formation of character.—Bishop E. G. Andrews.

The consecration is a solemn transaction between God and the parish, as well as between the bishop and the parish—the parish, through its vestry and by a legal instrument, making the building over to God through the hands of the bishop; and God graciously accepting the gift and ratifying the transaction by the bishop's sentence of consecration, which declares it "separated henceforth from all unhallowed, ordinary, and common uses, and dedicated to the sole service of Almighty God." Henceforth this edifice is no more yours, but God's. Given to Him by your corporate and legal act, His name has been recorded here, His presence will be vouchsafed here, and each one of you, as you enter into these courts, can say with joyous hearts, "Strength and beauty are in His sanctuary."—Rev. W. B. Stevens.

In the sanctuary the strength of God's promises comes out with intense force. In the sanctuary do we find the strength of divine praise, when the swelling voices of the whole congregation ascend as the voice of many waters; and the strength of fervent prayer, when "all the people" with one mouth breathe the same prayers, which rise as a cloud of incense from the whole congregation. Thus I might go on and show that there is no conceivable strength that the soul needs which is not found in the sanctuary of the Lord.—Rev. W. B. Stevens.

Such in spirit is our prayer to-day. Make this house, O Lord God, Thy resting-place. Let the Christian priesthood which ministers here, like the Levitical priesthood of the temple, be clothed with salvation, ever showing forth the sacrificial death of Christ, as well as His perfect life in all its divine glory and beauty; and let Thy saints, Thy devout people, who worship here, ever rejoice in God's goodness, and shout aloud His praises in the beauty of holiness. Thus shall the services of this house prepare us for the higher services of the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens; and may this edifice prove to many successive generations of worshipers, as they pass in long procession through these courts, none other but the house of God and the very gate of heaven.—Rev. W. B. Stevens.

Especially is there "beauty" in the sanctuary when Christ, the "One altogether lovely," shines out of Zion, itself "the perfection of beauty." When He reveals Himself there, in all the fullness of His grace and in all the freeness of His salvation, then indeed do we "sit down under his shadow with great delight," and our hearts, transported with His loveliness, exclaim, "He brought me to the banqueting-house, and His banner over me was love." Let us now sum up in a few sentences the principal ideas of strength and beauty which are found in the sanctuary: Strength, in the strong doctrines, which uphold, like columns, the overarching dome of divine truth. Beauty, in the worship of holiness, which is celebrated therein. Strength, in the Bible, God's majestic voice speaking to us from the lectern, the font, and the table.—Rev. W. B. Stevens.

It cannot be too strongly emphasized, in this day of secularism on the one hand and the love of a sensuous ceremonial on the other, that the true strength of the church does not lie in its historic continuity with the apostles' days; does not lie in its great creeds; does not lie in its hallowed liturgy; does not lie in its learned ministry; does not lie in its churches and cathedrals—it may have all these, and yet, like the apostolic church of Sardis, have a name to live, and yet be dead. Its apostolic ministry may be apostolic in lineage and not in spirit; its grand creeds may be but great petrifications of orthodox faith; its venerable liturgy may be but the embroidered ceremonies of a corpse; its beautiful churches and basilicas may be but mausoleums of a lifeless worship. What the church must have, and by which only it can live, is the constant, realized, positive indwelling of the Holy Ghost. All our worship, all our teaching, must be subordinated to this divine Spirit.—Rev. W. B. Stevens.

Deeds

Deeds alone suffice.—Whittier.

Deeds, not words.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

'Tis deeds must win the prize.—Shakespeare.

Deeds survive the doers.—Horace Mann.

The gods see the deeds of the righteous.—Ovid.

Give me the ready hand rather than the ready tongue.—Garibaldi.

Men do not value a good deed unless it brings a reward.—Ovid.

"He wishes well" is worthless, unless the deed go with it.—Plautus.

Great things are not accomplished by idle dreams, but by years of patient study.—Aughey.

Contemplation is necessary to generate an object, but action must propagate it.—Feltham.

Heaven ne'er helps the man who will not help himself.—Sophocles.

A stirring dwarf we do allowance give before a sleeping giant.—Shakespeare.

The deeds of men never escape the gods.—Ovid.

Noble deeds that are concealed are most esteemed.—Pascal.

Foul deeds will rise,
Though all the earth o'erwhelm them, to men's eyes.—Shakespeare.

Blessings ever wait on virtuous deeds,
And, though a late, a sure reward succeeds.—Congreve.

Who doth right deeds
Is twice born, and who doeth ill deeds vile.—Edwin Arnold.

How far that little candle throws his beams!
So shines a good deed in a naughty world.—Shakespeare.

The flighty purpose never is o'ertook,
Unless the deed go with it.—Shakespeare.

Things of to-day?
Deeds which are harvest for Eternity!—Ebenezer Elliott.

Our deeds determine us as much as we determine our deeds.—George Eliot.

Go put your creed into your deed,
Nor speak with double tongue.—Emerson.

For as one star another far exceeds,
So souls in heaven are placed by their deeds.—Robert Greene.

Your deeds are known,
In words that kindle glory from the stone.—Schiller.

Our deeds are like children born to us; they live and act apart from our own will. Children may be strangled, but deeds never.—George Eliot.

Little deeds of kindness, little words of
love,
Make our earth an Eden like the heaven above.—Julia A. Carney.

A mighty deed is like the Heaven's thunder,
That wakes the nation's slumberers from their rest.—Raupach.

'Tis not what man Does which exalts him,
but what man Would do.
—Robert Browning.

However resplendent an action may be, it should not be accounted great unless it is the result of a great design.—La Rochefoucauld.

I on the other side
Us'd no ambition to commend my deeds;
The deeds themselves, though mute, spoke loud the doer.—Milton.

We are our own fates. Our own deeds
Are our doomsmen. Man's life was made
Not for men's creeds,
But men's actions.—Lord Lytton.

A word that has been said may be unsaid; it is but air. But when a deed is done, it cannot be undone, nor can our thoughts reach out to all the mischiefs that may follow.—Longfellow.

One improper word or act will neutralize the effect of many good ones;
and one base deed, after years of noble service, will cover them all with shame.—Anghey.

So our lives
In acts exemplaric, not only winne Ourselves good Names, but doth to others give Matter for virtuous Deedes, by which wee live.—George Chapman.

Every one may know that to will and not to do, when there is opportunity, is in reality not to will; and that to love what is good and not to do it, when it is possible, is in reality not to love it. Will, which stops short of action, and love, which does not do the good that is loved, is a mere thought separate from will and love, which vanishes and comes to nothing.
—Swedenborg.

Defeat

Defeat serves to enlighten us.—
Lavater.

It is defeat which educates us.—
Emerson.

Defeat is a school in which truth always grows strong.—Beecher.

Defeat should never be a source of discouragement, but rather a fresh stimulus.—South.

Ah! what seeds for a paradise I bore in my heart, of which birds of prey have robbed me.—Richter.

What is defeat? Nothing but education, nothing but the first step to something better.—Wendell Phillips.

Thirsting for the golden fountain of the fable, from how many streams have we turned away, weary and in disgust!—Bulwer-Lytton.

Such a numerous host Fled not in silence through the frightened deep,
With ruin upon ruin, rout on rout,
Confusion worse confounded.—Milton.

There is something solid and doughty in the man that can rise from defeat, the stuff of which victories are made in due time, when we are able to choose our position better, and the sun is at our back.—Lowell.

No man is defeated without some resentment which will be continued with obstinacy while he believes himself in the right, and asserted with bitterness, if even to his own conscience he is detected in the wrong.—
Johnson.

We mortals, men and women, devour many a disappointment between breakfast and dinner-time; keep back the tears and look a little pale about the lips, and in answer to inquiries say, "Oh, nothing!" Pride helps us; and pride is not a bad thing when it only urges us to hide our own hurts—not to hurt others.—George Eliot.

Defects

If we had no defects ourselves, we should not take so much pleasure in noting those of others.—La Rochefoucauld.

In the intercourse of life we please, often, more by our defects than by our good qualities.—La Rochefoucauld.

Defence

In cases of defence, 'tis best to weigh
The enemy more mighty than he seems;
So the proportions of defence are fill'd;
Which of a weak and niggardly projection Doth, like a miser, spoil his coat with scanting a little cloth.—Shakespeare.

Deference

Deference often shrinks and withers as much upon the approach of intimacy as the sensitive plant does upon the touch of one's finger.—Shenstone.

Deference is the most complicate,
the most indirect, and the most elegant of all compliments.—Shenstone.

Defiance

Then, Bolingbroke, as low as to thy heart,
Through the false passage of thy throat,
thou liest. —Shakespeare.

Come one, come all—this rock shall fly
From its firm base as soon as I.

—Scott.

Why, I will fight with him upon this theme Until my eyelids will no longer wag.

—Shakespeare.

If thou deny'st it, twenty times thou liest;
And I will turn thy falsehood to thy heart,
Where it was forged, with my rapier's point.

—Shakespeare.

I do defy him, and I spit at him;
Call him—a slanderous coward, and a villain;

Which to maintain, I would allow him
odds;

And meet him, were I ty'd to run a-foot,
Even to the frozen ridges of the Alps.

—Shakespeare.

If thou but frown on me, or stir thy foot,
Or teach thy hasty spleen to do me shame,
I'll strike thee dead. Put up thy sword
betime,

Or I'll so maul you and your toasting-iron,
That you shall think the devil has come from hell.

—Shakespeare.

Who sets me else? by heaven I'll throw at all;

I have a thousand spirits in one breast,
To answer twenty thousand such as you.

—Shakespeare.

I had rather chop this hand off at a blow,
And with the other fling it at thy face,
Than bear so low a sail, to strike to thee.

—Shakespeare.

Though all around is dark and cheerless,
And on high my star looks pale,
My heart is steadfast still and fearless,
Still my lips disdain to wail.

My spirit still stands up undaunted,

Still I on myself rely;

No craven thought my brain e'er haunted,
Fate and Fortune I defy!

—Frazer's Magazine.

Deformity

Do you suppose we owe nothing to Pope's deformity? He said to himself,
"If my person be crooked, my verses shall be straight."—Hazlitt.

In nature there's no blemish but the mind;
None can be call'd deform'd but the un-
kind:

Virtue is beauty; but the beauteous evil
Are empty trunks, o'er-flourish'd by the devil.

—Shakespeare.

Deformity of the heart I call

The worst deformity of all;

For what is form, or what is face,

But the soul's index, or its case?

—Colton.

Deformity is either natural, voluntary or adventitious, being either caused by God's unseen Providence (by men nicknamed chance), or by men's cruelty.—Fuller.

Deform'd, unfinish'd, sent before my time
Into this breathing world, scarce half made up,

And that so lamely and unfashionably,

That dogs bark at me, as I halt by them.

But I,—that am not shap'd for sportive tricks,

Nor made to court an amorous lookingglass;

I that am rudely stamp'd, and want love's majesty,

To strut before a wanton ambling nymph.

—Shakespeare.

From whence comes it that a cripple in body does not irritate us, and that a crippled mind enrages us? It is because a cripple sees that we go right, and a distorted mind says that it is we who go astray. But for that we should have more pity and less rage.

—Pascal.

Deformity is daring;
It is its essence to o'ertake mankind
By heart and soul, and make itself the equal—
Ay, the superior of the rest. There is
A spur in its halt movements, to become
All that the others cannot, in such things
As still are free for both, to compensate
For stepdame Nature's avarice at first.
—Byron.

Nature herself started back when thou wert
born,
And cried, "the work's not mine."
The midwife stood aghast; and when she saw
Thy mountain back and thy distorted legs,
Thy face itself,
Half-minted with the royal stamp of man,
And half o'ercome with beast, she doubted
long
Whose right in thee were more;
And know not if to burn thee in the flames
Were not the holier work.
—Lee.

Why, love forswore me in my mother's womb;
And, for I should not deal in her soft laws,
She did corrupt frail nature with some bribe
To shrink mine arm up like a wither'd shrub,
To make an envious mountain on my back,
Where sits deformity to make my body;
To shape my legs of an unequal size;
To disproportion me in every part,
Like to a chaos, or an unlick'd bear-whelp,
That carries no impression like the dam.
And am I then a man to be belov'd?
—Shakespeare.

Am I to blame, if nature threw my body
In so perverse a mould! yet when she cast
Her envious hand upon my supple joints,
Unable to resist, and rumbled them
On heaps in their dark lodging; to revenge
Her bungled work, she stamped my mind more fair,
And as from chaos, huddled and deform'd,
The gods struck fire, and lighted up the lamps
That beautify the sky; so she inform'd
This ill-shap'd body with a daring soul,
And, making less than man, she made me
more.
—Lee.

Many a man has risen to eminence under the powerful reaction of his mind in fierce counter-agency to the scorn of the unworthy, daily evoked by his personal defects, who with a handsome person would have sunk into the luxury of a careless life under the tranquillizing smiles of continual admiration.—De Quincey.

Degeneracy

O, that a mighty man of such descent,
Of such possessions, and so high esteem,
Should be infused with so foul a spirit!
—Shakespeare.

What a falling off was there.
—Shakespeare.

In an age remarkable for good reasoning and bad conduct, for sound rules and corrupt manners, when virtue fills our heads, but vice our hearts;
when those who would fain persuade us that they are quite sure of heaven, appear in no greater hurry to go there than other folks, but put on the livery of the best master only to serve the worst;—in an age when modesty herself is more ashamed of detection than delinquency; when independence of principle consists in having no principle on which to depend; and free thinking, not in thinking freely, but in being free from thinking; in an age when patriots will hold anything except their tongues; keep anything except their word; and lose nothing patiently except their character;—to improve such an age must be difficult; to instruct it dangerous; and he stands no chance of amending it who cannot at the same time amuse it.—Colton.

Delay

Delay is as hateful as it is dangerous.—Holcroft.

Dull not device by coldness and delay.—Shakespeare.

Every delay that postpones our joys is long.—Ovid.

Lingering labors come to naught.—
Robert Southwell.

All delays are dangerous in war.—
Dryden.

Away with delay; the chance of great fortune is short-lived.—Silius Italicus.

He that riseth late must tread all day, and shall scarce overtake his business at night.—Benjamin Franklin.

Defer no time, delays have dangerous ends.—Shakespeare.

The opportunity is often lost by deliberating.—Syrus.

What reason could not avoid has often been cured by delay.—Seneca.

Your gift is princely, but it comes too late, And falls like sunbeams on a blasted blossom.—Suckling.

Every delay is too long to one who is in a hurry.—Seneca.

Away with delay—it always injures those who are prepared.—Lucan.

When a man's life is at stake, no delay is too long.—Juvenal.

One man by delay restored the state, for he preferred the public safety to idle report.—Ennius.

Late, late, so late! but we can enter still. Too late, too late! ye cannot enter now.—Tennyson.

Ah! nothing is too late Till the tired heart shall cease to palpitate.—Longfellow.

He that gives time to resolve gives leisure to deny, and warning to prepare.—Quarles.

Some one speaks admirably of "the well-ripened fruit of sage delay."—Balzac.

The procrastinator is not only indolent and weak, but commonly false, too; most of the weak are false.—Lavater.

He who prorogues the honesty of to-day till to-morrow will probably prorogue his to-morrows to eternity.—Lavater.

Be wise to-day; 't is madness to defer; Next day the fatal precedent will plead Thus on, till wisdom is push'd out of life.—Young.

When the death of a human being may be the consequence, no delay that is afforded is long.—Law Maxim.

Meet the disorder in the outset, the medicine may be too late, when the disease has gained ground through delay.—Ovid.

O my good lord, that comfort comes too late; 'T is like a pardon after execution: That gentle physic, given in time, had cur'd me, But now I'm past all comfort here but prayers.—Shakespeare.

Procrastination is the thief of time; year after year it steals, till all are fled, and to the mercies of a moment leaves the vast concerns of an eternal scene.—Young.

Our greatest actions, or of good or evil, The hero's and the murderer's spring at once From their conception: O! how many deeds Of deathless virtue and immortal crime The world had wanted, had the actor said, I will do this to-morrow.—Lord John Russell.

Shun delays, they breed remorse; Take thy time, while time is lent thee; Creeping snails have weakest force; Fly their fault, lest thou repent thee; Good is best when soonest wrought, Ling'ring labours come to naught. Hoist up sail while gale doth last, Tide and wind stay no man's pleasure; Seek not time, when time is past, Sober speed is wisdom's leisure, After-wits are dearly bought, Let thy fore-wit guide thy thought.—Robert Southwell.

Time drinketh up the essence of every great and noble action, which ought to be performed, and is delayed in the execution.—Vishnu Sarma.

Delicacy

Delicacy is the genuine tint of virtue.—Marguerite de Valois.

Delicacy in woman is strength.—Lichtenberg.

Delicacy is an attribute of heaven.—James Ellis.

Delicacy is to affectation what grace is to beauty.—Mme. de Maintenon.

Delicacy is to the affections what grace is to the beauty.—Degerando.

If you destroy delicacy and a sense of shame in a young girl, you deprave her very fast.—Mrs. Stowe.

Delicacy is the coquetry of truth; fastidiousness is the prudery of falsehood.—H. W. Shaw.

Delicacy is to the mind what fragrance is to the fruit.—Achilles Poincelot.

The dependant who cultivates delicacy in himself very little consults his own tranquillity.—Dr. Johnson.

An appearance of delicacy is inseparable from sweetness and gentleness of character.—Mrs. Sigourney.

The hand of little employment bath the daintier sense.—Shakespeare.

An appearance of delicacy, and even of fragility, is almost essential to beauty.—Burke.

Love lessens woman's delicacy, and increases man's.—Richter.

In delicate souls love never presents itself but under the veil of esteem.—Mme. Roland.

It is against womanhood to be forward in their own wishes.—Sir P. Sidney.

True delicacy, that most beautiful heart-leaf of humanity, exhibits itself most significantly in little things.—Mary Howitt.

The finest qualities of our nature, like the bloom on fruits, can be preserved only by the most delicate handling.—Thoreau.

To a woman of delicate feeling the most persuasive declaration of love consists in the embarrassment of the lover.—Laténa.

A fine lady is a squirrel-headed thing, with small airs and small notions; about as applicable to the business of life as a pair of tweezers to the clearing of a forest.—George Eliot.

Women could take part in the processions, the songs, the dances, of old religion; no one fancied their delicacy was impaired by appearing in public for such a cause.—Margaret Fuller Ossoli.

Weak men often from the very principle of their weakness derive a certain susceptibility, delicacy and taste which render them, in those particulars, much superior to men of stronger and more consistent minds, who laugh at them.—Greville.

The commonest man, who has his ounce of sense and feeling, is conscious of the difference between a lovely, delicate woman and a coarse one. Even a dog feels a difference in her presence.—George Eliot.

Friendship, love, and piety ought to be handled with a sort of mysterious secrecy; they ought to be spoken of only in the rare moments of perfect confidence, to be mutually understood in silence. Many things are too delicate to be thought; many more, to be spoken.—Novalis.

There is a certain delicacy which in yielding conquers; and with a pitiful look makes one find cause to crave help one's self.—Sir P. Sidney.

Delight

A sip is the most that mortals are permitted from any goblet of delight.—A. Bronson Alcott.

I am convinced that we have a degree of delight, and that no small one, in the real misfortunes and pains of others.—Burke.

These violent delights have violent ends
And in their triumph die, like fire and powder,
Which as they kiss consume.
—Shakespeare.

A voice of greeting from the wind was sent;
The mists enfolded me with soft white arms;
The birds did sing to lap me in content,
The rivers wove their charms,—
And every little daisy in the grass
Did look up in my face, and smile to see me pass!
—R. H. Stoddard.

The last excessive feelings of delight are always grave.—Leigh Hunt.

Delusion

The worst deluded are the self-deluded.—Bovee.

Delusions, like dreams, are dispelled by our awaking to the stern realities of life.—A. R. C. Dallas.

Delusion produces not one mischief the less because it is universal.—Burke.

When our vices quit us, we flatter ourselves with the belief that it is we who quit them.—Rochefoucauld.

Were we perfectly acquainted with the object, we should never passionately desire it.—Rochefoucauld.

No man is happy without a delusion of some kind. Delusions are as necessary to our happiness as realities.—Bovee.

You think a man to be your dupe; if he pretends to be so, who is the greatest dupe—he or you?—Bruyère.

We are always living under some delusion, and instead of taking things as they are, and making the best of them, we follow an ignis fatuus, and lose, in its pursuit, the joy we might attain.—James Ellis.

Demagogue

We strive as hard to hide our hearts from ourselves as from others, and always with more success; for in deciding upon our own case we are both judge, jury, and executioner, and where sophistry cannot overcome the first, or flattery the second, self-love is always ready to defeat the sentence by bribing the third.—Colton.

I do despise these demagogues that fret
The angry multitude: they are but as The froth upon the mountain wave—the bird
That shrieks upon the sullen tempest's wing. —Sir A. Hunt.

Democracy

Democracy means not "I am as good as you are," but "You are as good as I am."—Theodore Parker.

Your little child is the only true democrat.—Mrs. Stowe.

Democracy is a mischievous dream.—O. A. Brownson.

The love of democracy is that of equality.—Montesquieu.

In Europe democracy is a falsehood.—Metternich.

Democracies are prone to war, and war consumes them.—William H. Seward.

Democracy is the government of the people, by the people, for the people.—Lincoln.

In every village there will arise a miscreant to establish the most grinding tyranny by calling himself the people.—Sir Robert Peel.

Christ was the first true democrat that ever breathed, as the old dramatist Dekkar said he was the first true gentleman.—Lowell.

Democracy will itself accomplish the salutary universal change from delusive to real, and make a new blessed world of us by and by.—Carlyle.

If there were a people consisting of gods, they would be governed democratically. So perfect a government is not suitable to men.—Rousseau.

Democracy is always the work of kings. Ashes, which in themselves are sterile, fertilize the land they are cast upon.—Landor.

The idea of bringing all men on an equality with each other has always been a pleasant dream; the law cannot equalize men in spite of nature.—Vauvenargues.

I cannot help concurring with the opinion that an absolute democracy, no more than absolute monarchy, is to be reckoned among the legitimate forms of government.—Burke.

He was a democrat in the best sense, earnestly desiring the elevation of the people to a higher plane of intellectual and moral life, as well as their political emancipation.—Hamerton.

Democracy is the healthful life-blood which circulates through the veins and arteries, which supports the system, but which ought never to appear externally, and as the mere blood itself.—Coleridge.

To govern according to the sense, and agreeably to the interests of the people is a great and glorious object of government. This object cannot be obtained but through the medium of popular election, and popular election is a mighty evil.—Burke.

Lycurgus being asked why he, who in other respects appeared to be so zealous for the equal rights of men, did not make his government democratical rather than oligarchical, "Go you," replied the legislator, "and try a democracy in your own house."—Plutarch.

It is the most beautiful truth in morals that we have no such thing as a distinct or divided interest from our race. In their welfare is ours, and by choosing the broadest paths to effect their happiness we choose the surest and the shortest to our own.—Bulwer-Lytton.

A father of the church said that property was theft, many centuries before Proudhon was born. Bourdaloue reaffirmed it. Montesquieu was the inventor of national workshops and of the theory that the state owed every man a living. Nay, was not the church herself the first organized democracy?—Lowell.

There is still another inconvenience in conquests made by democracies; their government is ever odious to the conquered states. It is apparently monarchical, but in reality it is more oppressive than monarchy, as the experience of all ages and countries evinces.—Montesquieu.

That is the best government which desires to make the people happy, and knows how to make them happy.

Neither the inclination nor the knowledge will suffice alone; and it is difficult to find them together. Pure democracy, and pure democracy alone, satisfies the former condition of this great problem.—Macaulay.

"It is a great blessing," says Pascal, "to be born a man of quality, since it brings one man as far forward at eighteen or twenty as another man would be at fifty, which is a clear gain of thirty years." These thirty years are commonly wanting to the ambitious characters of democracies. The principle of equality, which allows every man to arrive at everything, prevents all men from rapid advancement.—De Tocqueville.

A love of the republic in a democracy is a love of the democracy, as the latter is that of equality. A love of the democracy is likewise that of frugality. Since every individual ought here to enjoy the same happiness, and the same advantages, they should consequently taste the same pleasures and form the same hopes, which cannot be expected but from a general frugality.—Montesquieu.

Denial

The more a man denies himself the more he shall receive from heaven.—Horace.

They that do much themselves deny,
Receive more blessings from the sky.
—Crech.

To have what we want is riches, but to be able to do without it is power.

There are many seasons in a man's life—and the more exalted and responsible his position, the more frequently do these seasons recur—when the voice of duty and the dictates of feeling are opposed to each other; and it is only the weak and the wicked who yield that obedience to the selfish impulses of the heart which is due to reason and honor.—Aughey.

Denominationalism

Old religious factions are volcanoes burned out; on the lava and ashes and squalid scoræ of old eruptions grow the peaceful olive, the cheering vine.

and the sustaining corn.—Edmund Burke.

O for less of an abstract, controversial Christianity, and more of a living, loving, personal Christ.—Richard Fuller.

It is not the actual differences of Christian men that do the mischief, but the mismanagement of those differences.—Philip Henry.

I do not want the walls of separation between different orders of Christians to be destroyed, but only lowered, that we may shake hands a little easier over them.—Rowland Hill.

Sects differ; but, with few exceptions they agree not only that a life of unselfish love will insure heaven, but that repentance and faith are the way by which one enters into this path of life.—The Independent.

God grant that we may contend with other churches as the vine with the olive, which of us shall bear the best fruit; but not as the brier with the thistle, which of us shall be most unprofitable.—Lord Bacon.

It is neither possible nor desirable to make all men think alike. Variety is the very basis of harmony; and, in the sphere of ecclesiastical experience, oneness of feeling is vastly preferable to unanimity of belief. The voice of God, however, as uttered in the events and experiences of the past hundred years, enjoins upon the private membership of the church the culture of that "unity of the Spirit" which is begotten of the Holy Ghost, and which derives from its Divine Author the life in which it resides, the elements of which it is composed, and the impulses under which it acts.—J. McC. Holmes.

Were we all one body, we should lose the tremendous stimulation that comes from the present arrangement, and I fear that our uniformity would become the uniformity of death and the tomb.—George C. Lorimer.

If God allows us to remain Methodist, Baptist, or Episcopalian, it may be on account of the unconverted, that they may be without excuse; that every type of man may be confronted with a corresponding type of doctrine and of method. Surely there are means adapted to your state, and ministries fitted to your peculiar temperament.—George C. Lorimer.

Dentistry (Toothache)

One said a tooth-drawer was a kind of unconscionable trade, because his trade was nothing else but to take away those things whereby every man gets his living.—Hazlitt.

For there was never yet philosopher
That could endure the toothache patiently.
—Shakespeare.

Those cherries fairly do enclose
Of orient pearl a double row,
Which, when her lovely laughter shows,
They look like rosebuds fill'd with snow.
—Howe.

My curse upon thy venom'd stang,
That shoots my tortured gums along;
And through my lugs gies monie a twang.
Wi' gnawing vengeance,
Tearing my nerves wi' bitter pang,
Like racking engines! —Burns.

Dependence

There is no one subsists by himself alone.—Feltham.

God has made no one absolute.—Feltham.

Man is the circled oak; woman the ivy.—Aaron Hill.

Depend on no man, on no friend, but him who can depend on himself.—Lavater.

Heaven's eternal wisdom has decreed that man of man should ever stand in need.—Theocritus.

The greatest man living may stand in need of the meanest, as much as the meanest does of him.—Fuller.

Thou shalt know by experience how salt the savor is of others' bread, and how sad a path it is to climb and descend another's stairs.—Dante.

No degree of knowledge attainable by man is able to set him above the want of hourly assistance.—Johnson.

Dependence is a perpetual call upon humanity, and a greater incitement to tenderness and pity than any other motive whatever.—Addison.

People may live as much retired from the world as they please; but sooner or later, before they are aware, they will find themselves debtor or creditor to somebody.—Goethe.

He who imagines he can do without the world deceives himself much; but he who fancies the world cannot do without him is still more mistaken.—Rochefoucauld.

There is none made so great but he may both need the help and service, and stand in fear of the power and unkindness, even of the meanest of mortals.—Seneca.

In an arch each single stone which, if severed from the rest, would be perhaps defenceless is sufficiently secured by the solidity and entireness of the whole fabric, of which it is a part.—Boyle.

The beautiful must ever rest in the arms of the sublime. The gentle needs the strong to sustain it, as much as the rock-flowers need rocks to grow on, or the ivy the rugged wall which it embraces.—Mrs. Stowe.

Dependence goes somewhat against the grain of a generous mind; and it is no wonder that it should do so, considering the unreasonable advantage which is often taken of the inequality of fortune.—Jeremy Collier.

We are never without a pilot. When we know not how to steer, and dare not hoist a sail, we can drift. The current knows the way, though we do not. The ship of heaven guides itself, and will not accept a wooden rudder.—Emerson.

That acknowledgment of weakness which we make in imploring to be relieved from hunger and from temptation is surely wisely put in our daily prayer. Think of it, you who are rich, and take heed how you turn a beggar away.—Thackeray.

When we consider how weak we are in ourselves, yea, the very strongest of us, and how assaulted, we may justly wonder that we can continue one day in the state of grace; but when we look on the strength by which we are guarded, the power of God, then we see the reason of our stability to the end; for omnipotency supports us, and the everlasting arms are under us.—Leighton.

How beautifully is it ordered, that as many thousands work for one, so must every individual bring his labor to make the whole! The highest is not to despise the lowest, nor the lowest to envy the highest; each must live in all and by all. Who will not work neither shall he eat. So God has ordered that men, being in need of each other, should learn to love each other, and bear each other's burdens.—G. A. Sala.

I hate dependence on another's will,
Which changes with the breath of ev'ry
whisper,
Just as the sky and weather with the winds:
Nay, with the winds, as they blow east or west,
To make his temper pleasant or unpleasant:
So are our wholesome or unwholesome days. —Crown.

Life is a system of relations rather than a positive and independent existence; and he who would be happy himself and make others happy must carefully preserve these relations. He cannot stand apart in surly and haughty egotism; let him learn that he is as much dependent on others as others are on him.—G. A. Sala.

Department

What's a fine person, or a beauteous face.
Unless deportment gives them decent grace?
Blest with all other requisites to please,
Some want the striking elegance of ease;
The curious eye their awkward movement
tires;
They seem like puppets led about by wires.
—Churchill.

Depravity

God's love seemed lost upon him.—
Bailey.

There is not a beast of the field but may trust his nature and follow it; certain that it will lead him to the best of which he is capable. But as for us, our only invincible enemy is our nature.—William Arthur.

Human nature is said by many to be good; if so, where have social evils come from? For human nature is the only moral nature in that corrupting thing called "society." Every example set before the child of to-day is the fruit of human nature. It has been planted on every possible field—among the snows that never melt; in temperate regions, and under the line; in crowded cities, in lonely forests; in ancient seats of civilization, in new colonies; and in all these fields it has, without once failing, brought forth a crop of sins and troubles.—William Arthur.

Those that hold the doctrine of native depravity do not believe that there is a mass of corrupt matter lodged in the heart, which sends off noxious exhalations, like a dead body. But they maintain that the soul has entirely lost the image of God in which it was originally created; that there is nothing pure or good remaining in it; that in consequence of the withdrawal of those special Divine influences which were given to our first parents, the proper balance of the power is destroyed, they have lost their conformity to the law of God; and the holy dispositions, which were at first implanted in the soul, have given place to sinful dispositions, which are the source of all actual transgression.—H. A. Boardman.

If we take away this foundation, that man is by nature foolish and sinful, fallen short of the glorious image of God, the Christian system falls at once; nor will it deserve as honorable an appellation as that of a cunningly devised fable.—John Wesley.

We believe that man was created in holiness, under the law of his Maker; but by voluntary transgression fell from that holy and happy state; in consequence of which all mankind are now sinners, not by constraint, but choice; being by nature utterly void of that holiness required by the law of God, positively inclined to evil; and therefore under just condemnation to eternal ruin, without defense or excuse.—Baptist Church Manual.

Deserts

Use every man after his desert, and who should escape whipping? Use them after your own honor and dignity; the less they deserve, the more merit is in your bounty.—Shakespeare.

Design

When any great design thou dost intend,
Think on the means, the manner, and the end. —Denham.

Honest designs

Justly resemble our devotions,
Which we must pay and wait for the reward.
—Sir Robert Howard.

He that intends well, yet deprives himself
Of means to put his good thoughts into deed,
Deceives his purpose of the due reward.
—Beaumont and Fletcher.

When men's intents are wicked, their guilt haunts them,
But when they are just they're arm'd, and nothing daunts them. —Middleton.

Desire

Can one desire too much of a good thing?—Shakespeare.

Life is a race; desire the goal.—
Ramsay.

Perish the lore that deadens young desire!—Beattie.

Desires are the pulse of the soul.—
Manton.

Heart's-ease is a flower which blooms from the grave of desire.—
W. R. Alger.

Sordid desires are the children of indulgence.—J. L. Basford.

Happy the man who early learns the wide chasm that lies between his wishes and his powers!—Goethe.

We never desire ardently what we desire rationally.—Rochefoucauld.

We trifle when we assign limits to our desires, since nature has set none.—Bovee.

Each man has his own desires; all do not possess the same inclinations.—Persius.

We are always striving for things forbidden, and coveting those denied us.—Ovid.

It is easier to suppress the first desire than to satisfy all that follow it.—Franklin.

The desires of man increase with his acquisitions.—Dr. Johnson.

It is much easier to suppress the first desire than to satisfy those that follow.—Rochefoucauld.

It is not wishing and desiring to be saved will bring men to heaven: hell's mouth is full of good wishes.—Thomas Shepard.

Desire is the uneasiness a man finds in himself upon the absence of anything whose present enjoyment carries the idea of delight with it.—Lavater.

In moderating, not in satisfying desires, lies peace.—Heber.

What we seek, we shall find; what we flee from, flees from us.—Emerson.

What we wish for in youth comes in heaps to us in old age.—Goethe.

But O! for the touch of a vanish'd hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still!

—Tennyson.

We grow like flowers, and bear desire,
The odor of the human flowers.

R. H. Stoddard.

It is better to desire than to enjoy,
to love than to be loved.—Hazlitt.

Keep you in the rear of your affection, out of the shot and danger of desire.—Shakespeare.

Troubles advance upon us rapidly; our desires travel in the opposite direction.—Alfred Mercier.

The shadows of our own desires stand between us and our better angels, and thus their brightness is eclipsed.—Dickens.

Some desire is necessary to keep life in motion, and he whose real wants are supplied must admit those of fancy.—Johnson.

As a general thing we obtain very surely and very speedily what we are not too anxious to obtain.—Rousseau.

There is no inborn longing that shall not be fulfilled. I think that is as certain as the forgiveness of sins.—George MacDonald.

Ah! Vanitas vanitatum! Which of us is happy in this world? Which of us has his desire, or, having it, is satisfied?—Thackeray.

When our desires are fulfilled, we never fail to realize the wealth of imagination and the paucity of reality.—Ninon de Lenclos.

O that I might have my request;
and that God would grant me the thing that I long for.—Bible.

However rich or elevated, a nameless something is always wanting to our imperfect fortune.—Horace.

I have Immortal longings in me.
—Shakespeare

Before we passionately desire anything which another enjoys, we should examine into the happiness of its possessor.—Rochefoucauld.

The reason that many men want their desires is because their desires want reason. He may do what he will that will do but what he may.—Warwick.

He who desires naught will always be free.—Lefebvre-Laboulaye.

Unlawful desires are punished after the effect of enjoying; but impossible desires are punished in the desire itself.—Sir P. Sidney.

Where necessity ends, curiosity begins; and no sooner are we supplied with everything that Nature can demand than we sit down to contrive artificial appetites.—Dr. Johnson.

Our desires always increase with our possessions. The knowledge that something remains yet unenjoyed impairs our enjoyment of the good before us.—Dr. Johnson.

The desire of the moth for the star—
Of the night for the morrow—
The devotion to something afar
From the sphere of our sorrow.

—Shelley.

O fierce desire, the spring of sighs and tears,
Reliev'd with want, impoverish'd with store,
Nurst with vain hopes, and fed with doubtful fears,
Whose force withstood, increaseth more and more!

—Brandon.

Every desire is a viper in the bosom, who while he was chill was harmless; but when warmth gave him strength, exerted it in poison.—Johnson.

As long as the heart preserves desire, the mind preserves illusions.—Chateaubriand.

Ere yet we yearn for what is out of our reach, we are still in the cradle. When wearied out with our yearnings, desire again falls asleep; we are on the death-bed.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Our nature is inseparable from desires, and the very word "desire" (the craving for something not possessed) implies that our present felicity is not complete.—Hobbes.

There is nothing capricious in nature. In nature the implanting of a desire indicates that the gratification of that desire is in the constitution of the creature that feels it.—Emerson.

By annihilating the desires, you annihilate the mind. Every man without passions has within him no principle of action, nor motive to act.—Helvetius.

The passions and desires, like the two twists of a rope, mutually mix one with the other, and twine inextricably round the heart; producing good if moderately indulged; but certain destruction if suffered to become inordinate.—Burton.

He who can wait for what he desires takes the course not to be exceedingly grieved if he fails of it; he, on the contrary, who labors after a thing too impatiently thinks the success when it comes is not a recompense equal to all the pains he has been at about it.—Bruyère.

How large are our desires! and yet how few Events are answerable! So the dew, Which early on the top of mountains stor'd, Meaning, at least, to imitate a flood; When once the sun appears, appears no more,
And leaves that parch'd which was too moist before.

—Gomersall.

Thou blind man's mark; thou fool's self-chosen snare,
Fond fancy's scum, and dregs of scatter'd thoughts;
Band of all evils; cradle of causeless care;
Thou web of ill, whose end is never wrought;
Desire! Desire! I have too dearly bought
With price of mangled mind thy worthless ware,
Too long, too long, asleep thou hast me brought,
Who shouldst my mind to higher things prepare.

—Sir P. Sidney.

Every desire bears its death in its very gratification. Curiosity languishes under repeated stimulants, and novelties cease to excite and surprise, until at length we cannot wonder even at a miracle.—Washington Irving.

Desolation

There is no creature loves me;
And if I die no soul shall pity me.

—Shakespeare.

No soul is desolate as long as there is a human being for whom it can feel trust and reverence.—George Eliot.

On rolls the stream with a perpetual sigh;
The rocks moan wildly as it passes by;
Hyssop and wormwood border all the strand,
And not a flower adorns the dreary land.
—Bryant.

I alone am left on earth!
To whom nor relative nor blood remains,
Nol not a kindred drop that runs in human veins.
—Campbell.

Gone—flitted away,
Taken the stars from the night and the sun
from the day!
Gone, and a cloud in my heart.
—Tennyson.

No one is so accursed by fate,
No one so utterly desolate,
But some heart, though unknown,
Responds unto his own.
—Longfellow.

What is the worst of woes that wait on age?
What stamps the wrinkle deeper on the
brow?
To view each loved one blotted from life's page,
And be alone on earth, as I am now.
—Byron.

Desolate! Life is so dreary and desolate.
Women and men in the crowd meet and mingle,
Yet with itself every soul standeth single,
Deep out of sympathy moaning its moan;
Holding and having its brief exultation;
Making its lonesome and low lamentation;
Fighting its terrible conflicts alone.
—Alice Cary.

The fountain of my heart dried up within me,—
With nought that loved me, and with nought
to love,
I stood upon the desert earth alone.
And in that deep and utter agony,
Though then, then even most unfit to die
I fell upon my knees and prayed for death.
—Maturin.

Unhappy he! who from the first of joys,
Society, cut off, is left alone
Amid this world of death. Day after day,
Sad on the jutting eminence he sits,
And views the main that ever toils below;
Still fondly forming in the farthest verge,
Where the round ether mixes with the wave, Ships, dim-discovered, dropping from the
clouds;
At evening, to the setting sun he turns
A mournful eye, and down his dying heart
Sinks hopeless.
—Thomson.

Despair

God has prohibited despair.—Mme.
Swetchine.

Despair defies even despotism.—
Byron.

Despair is free.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Despair is infidelity and death.—
Whittier.

Despair makes victims sometimes victors.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Despair swallows up cowardice.—
Hazlitt.

There is a very life in our despair.
—Byron.

For me—I hold no commerce with despair!—Dawes.

Despair is the greatest of our errors.
—Vauvenargues.

That last dignity of the wretched.—
Henry Giles.

And doubt, a greater mischief than despair.—Sir J. Denham.

Despair is a dauntless hero.—Hol-croft.

Despair is the conclusion of fools.—
Beaconsfield.

It is late before the brave despair.
—Thomson.

Rage is for little wrongs; despair is dumb.—Hannah More.

All hope abandon, ye who enter here.
—Dante.

The mild despairing of a heart resigned.—Coleridge.

Dreadful is their doom, whom doubt has driven
To censure fate, and pious hope forego.
—Beattie.

He is the truly courageous man who never desponds.—Confucius.

He that despairs measures Providence by his own little contracted model.—South.

Lean abstinence, pale grief, and haggard
care,
The dire attendants of forlorn despair.
—Pattison.

Religion converts despair, which destroys, into resignation, which submits.
—Lady Blessington.

My loss is such as cannot be repair'd,
And to the wretched, life can be no mercy.
—Dryden.

Despair is the damp of hell; rejoicing is the serenity of heaven.—
Donne.

When pain can't bless, heaven quits as in despair.—Young.

Despair is a great incentive to honorable death.—Quintus Curtius Rufus.

Even every ray of hope destroyed and not a wish to gild the gloom.—
Burns.

A speculative despair is unpardonable where it is our duty to act.—
Burke.

Some noble spirits mistake despair for content.—Willis.

Sick in the world's regard, wretched and low.—Shakespeare.

Beware of desperate steps. The darkest day, live till to-morrow, will have passed away.—Cowper.

No change, no pause, no hope! Yet I endure.—Shelley.

Despair gives the shocking ease to the mind that a mortification gives to the body.—Lord Greville.

Despair doth strike as deep a furrow in the brain as mischief or remorse.—
Barry Cornwall.

Hope, withering, fled—and Mercy sighed farewell.
—Byron.

The fear that kills, and hope that is unwilling to be fed.—Wordsworth.

There are circumstances in which despair does not imply inactivity.—
Burke.

O Lucius, I am sick of this bad world!
The day-light and the sun grow painful to me.
—Addison.

Wouldst thou unlock the door to cold despair and knowing pensiveness?
—George Herbert.

There's no dew left on the daisies and clover; there's no rain left in heaven.—Jean Ingelow.

It is impossible for that man to despair who remembers that his Helper is omnipotent.—Jeremy Taylor.

Mr. Fearing had, I think, a slough of despond in his mind, a slough that he carried everywhere with him, or else he could never have been as he was.—John Bunyan.

The fact that God has prohibited despair gives misfortune the right to hope all things, and leaves hope free to dare all things.—Madame Swetchine.

All hope is lost of my reception into grace; what worse? For where no hope is left, is left no fear.—Milton.

Farewell hope, and with hope farewell fear; Farewell remorse; all good to me is lost; Evil, be thou my good! —Milton.

Talk not of comfort—'tis for lighter ills,
I will indulge my sorrow, and give way
To all the pangs and fury of despair.
—Addison.

I am one whom the vile blows and buffets of the world have so incensed that I am reckless what I do to spite the world.—Shakespeare.

O God! O God! How weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable seem to me all the uses of this world!—Shakespeare.

Where Christ brings His cross He brings His presence; and where He is none are desolate, and there is no room for despair.—Mrs. Browning.

To doubt is worse than to have lost;
and to despair is but to antedate those miseries that must fall on us.—Mas-singer.

Despair defies even despotism; there is that in my heart would make its way through hosts with leveled spears.
—Byron.

Consider how the desperate fight;
Despair strikes wild,—but often fatal too—
And in the mad encounter wins success.
—Havard.

To tell men that they cannot help themselves is to fling them into recklessness and despair.—Froude.

Hark! to the hurried question of Despair:
"Where is my child?"—an Echo answers—
"Where?" —Byron.

My day is closed! the gloom of night is come! a hopeless darkness settles over my fate.—Joanna Baillie.

There are some vile and contemptible men who, allowing themselves to be conquered by misfortune, seek a refuge in death.—Agathon.

To him whose spirit is bowed down by the weight of piercing sorrow, the day and night are both of the same color.—Dschami.

* * * then black despair,
The shadow of a starless night, was thrown
Over the world in which I moved alone.
—Shelley.

Though plunged in ills and exercised in
care,
Yet never let the noble mind despair.
—Phillips.

There is no despair so absolute as that which comes with the first moments of our first great sorrow, when we have not yet known what it is to have suffered and be healed, to have despaired and have recovered hope.—
George Eliot.

He that despairs degrades the Deity, and seems to intimate that He is insufficient, or not just to His word;
and in vain hath read the scriptures,
the world, and man.—Feltham.

Despair, thou hast the noblest issues of all ill, which frailty brings us to;
for to be worse we fear not, and who cannot lose is ever a frank gamester.
—Sir Robert Howard.

To despond is to be ungrateful beforehand. Be not looking for evil.
Often thou drainest the gall of fear while evil is passing thy dwelling.—
Tupper.

Considering the unforeseen events of this world, we should be taught that no human condition should inspire men with absolute despair.—Fielding.

No man's credit can fall so low but that, if he bear his shame as he should do, and profit by it as he ought to do, it is in his own power to redeem his reputation.—Lord Nottingham.

I would not despair unless I knew the irrevocable decree was passed; saw my misfortune recorded in the book of fate, and signed and sealed by necessity.—Jeremy Collier.

Now cold despair
To livid paleness turns the glowing red;
His blood, scarce liquid, creeps within his
veins,
Like water which the freezing wind constrains. —Dryden.

The passage of Providence lies through many crooked ways; a despairing heart is the true prophet of approaching evil; his actions may weave the webs of fortune, but not break them.—Quarles.

Despair is like forward children, who, when you take away one of their playthings, throw the rest into the fire for madness. It grows angry with itself, turns its own executioner, and revengees its misfortunes on its own head.—Charron.

Alas for him who never sees
The stars shine through his cypress-trees!
Who, hopeless, lays his dead away,
Nor looks to see the breaking day
Across the mournful marbles play!
—Whittier.

Despair makes a despicable figure,
and descends from a mean original

'Tis the offspring of fear, of laziness and impatience; it argues a defect of spirit and resolution, and oftentimes of honesty, too. I would not despair unless I saw misfortune recorded in the book of fate, and signed and sealed by necessity.—Collier.

The world goes whispering to its own,
 "This anguish pierces to the bone;"
 And tender friends go sighing round,
 "What love can ever cure this wound?"
 My days go on, my days go on.

—E. B. Browning.

Oh, break, my heart! poor bankrupt, break
 at once!

To prison, eyes, ne'er look on liberty!
 Vile earth, to earth resign; end motion here;
 And thou and Romeo press one heavy bier!
 —Shakespeare.

A broken heart is a distemper which kills many more than is generally imagined, and would have a fair title to a place in the bills of mortality, did it not differ in one instance from all other diseases, namely, that no physicians can cure it.—Fielding.

Of all faults the greatest is the excess of impious terror, dishonoring divine grace. He who despairs wants love, wants faith; for faith, hope, and love are three torches which blend their light together, nor does the one shine without the other.—Metastasio.

I am one . . . whom the foul blows . . .
 Have so incensed, that I am reckless what
 I do to spite the world.

And I another,
 So weary with disaster, tugg'd with fortune,
 That I would set my life on any chance
 To mend it, or be rid of it.—Shakespeare.

Despair of ever being saved, "except thou be born again," or of seeing God "without holiness," or of having part in Christ except thou "love Him above father, mother, or thy own life." This kind of despair is one of the first steps to heaven.—Baxter.

Disordered nerves are the origin of much religious despair, when the individual does not suspect it; and then the body and mind have a reciprocal influence upon each other, and it is difficult to tell which influences the other most. The physician is often blamed, when the fault lies with the minister. Depression never benefits body or soul. We are saved by hope.

 —Ichabod Spencer.

Lachrymal counselors, with one foot in the cave of despair, and the other invading the peace of their friends, are the paralyzers of action, the pests of society, and the subtlest homicides in the world; they poison with a tear; and convey a dagger to the heart while they press you to their bosoms.—Jane Porter.

Look on me in my sleep,
 Or watch my watchings—come and sit by
 me!
 My solitude is solitude no more,
 But peopled with the furies;—I have gnash'd
 My teeth in darkness till returning morn, Then cursed myself till sunset;—I have pray'd
 For madness as a blessing—'tis denied me.
 —Byron.

Let her rave,
 And prophesy ten thousand thousand horrors;
 I could join with her now, and bid 'em
 come;
 They fit the present fury of my soul.
 The stings of love and rage are fix'd, within,
 And drive me on to madness. Earthquakes, whirlwinds,
 A general wreck of nature now would please
 me.
 —Rowe.

As a general rule, those who are dissatisfied with themselves will seek to go out of themselves into an ideal world. Persons in strong health and spirits, who take plenty of air and exercise, who are "in favor with their stars," and have a thorough relish of the good things of this life, seldom devote themselves in despair to religion or the muses. Sedentary, nervous, hypochondriacal people, on the contrary, are forced, for want of an appetite for the real and substantial, to look out for a more airy food and speculative comforts.—Hazlitt.

Despatch

Despatch is the soul of business.—
 Chesterfield.

Business is bought at a dear hand where there is small despatch.—Bacon

The swiftest despatch seems slow to desire.—Publius Syrus.

Reason and right give the quickest despatch.—Feltham.

Crimes succeed by sudden despatch; honest counsels gain vigor by delay.—Tacitus.

Generally it is good to commit the beginning of all great actions to Argus with his hundred eyes, and the end to Briareus with his hundred hands—first to watch, and then to speed.—Bacon.

To choose time is to save time; and an unseasonable motion is but beating the air. There be three parts of business—the preparation, the debate or examination, and the perfection; whereof, if you look for despatch, let the middle only be the work of many, and the first and last the work of few.—Bacon.

Despatch is taking time by the ears; hurry is taking it by the end of the tail.—H. W. Shaw.

Despondency

Sorrow comes soon enough without despondency. It does a man no good to carry around a lightning-rod to attract trouble.—Aughey.

Open your heart to sympathy, but close it against despondency. The flower which opens to receive the dew shuts against the rain.—Aughey.

All day the darkness and the cold
Upon my heart have lain,
Like shadows on the winter sky,
Like frost upon the pane. —Whittier.

The recollection of one upward hour
Hath more in it to tranquilize and cheer
The darkness of despondency, than years
Of gayety and pleasure. —Percival.

No thought within her bosom stirs,
But wakes some feeling dark and dread;
God keep thee from a doom like hers,
Of living when the hopes are dead.
—Phœbe Carey.

Some persons depress their own minds, despond at the first difficulty;

and conclude that making any progress in knowledge, farther than serves their ordinary business, is above their capacities.—Locke.

My heart is very tired—my strength is low—
My hands are full of blossoms pluck'd before
Held dead within them till myself shall die.
—Mrs. Browning.

To believe a business impossible is the way to make it so. How many feasible projects have miscarried through despondency, and been strangled in their birth by a cowardly imagination.—Jeremy Collier.

Despondency is not a state of humility; on the contrary, it is the vexation and despair of a cowardly pride—nothing is worse; whether we stumble or whether we fall, we must only think of rising again and going on in our course.—Fénelon.

Life is a warfare; and he who easily desponds deserts a double duty—he betrays the noblest property of man, which is dauntless resolution; and he rejects the providence of that All-Gracious Being who guides and rules the universe.—Jane Porter.

Despotism

Honor is unknown in despotic states.
—Montesquieu.

A despot has always some good moments.—Voltaire.

Fear must rule in a despotism.—Kossuth.

Despotism and freedom of the press cannot exist together.—Gambetta.

Arbitrary power is but the first natural step from anarchy, or the savage life.—Swift.

Despotism is often the effort of nature to cure herself from a worse disease.—Robert Lord Lytton.

Despotism can no more exist in a nation until the liberty of the press be destroyed than the night can happen before the sun is set.—Colton.

Despotism sits nowhere so secure as under the effigy and ensigns of freedom.—Landor.

Despotism is the only form of government which may, with safety to itself, neglect the education of its infant poor.—Bishop Horsley.

In times of anarchy one may seem a despot in order to be a saviour.—Mirabeau.

It is odd to consider the connection between despotism and barbarity, and how the making one person more than man makes the rest less.—Addison.

When men have become heartily wearied of licentious anarchy, their eagerness has been proportionately great to embrace the opposite extreme of rigorous despotism.—Whately.

When the savages of Louisiana wish to have fruit, they cut the tree at the bottom and gather the fruit. That is exactly a despotic government.—Montesquieu.

As virtue is necessary in a republic, and honor in a monarchy, fear is what is required in a despotism. As for virtue, it is not at all necessary, and honor would be dangerous there.—Montesquieu.

Travelers describe a tree in the island of Java whose pestiferous exhalations blight every tiny blade of grass within the compass of its shade. So it is with despotism.—Ruffini.

Many of the greatest tyrants on the records of history have begun their reigns in the fairest manner. But the truth is, this unnatural power corrupts both the heart and the understanding.—Burke.

I will believe in the right of one man to govern a nation despotically when I find a man born into the world with boots and spurs, and a nation born with saddles on their backs.—Algernon Sidney.

There is something among men more capable of shaking despotic power than lightning, whirlwind, or earthquake; that is, the threatened indignation of the whole civilized world.—Daniel Webster.

Despots govern by terror. They know that he who fears God fears nothing else; and therefore they eradicate from the mind, through their Voltaire, their Helvetius, and the rest of that infamous gang, that only sort of fear which generates true courage.—Burke.

Then shall they seek to avail themselves of names, Places and titles, and with these to join Secular pow'r though feigning still to act By spiritual, to themselves appropriating The spirit of God, promis'd alike and given To all believers; and from that pretence, Spiritual laws by carnal pow'r shall force On every conscience; laws which none shall find

Left them enroll'd, or what the spirit within Shall on the heart engrave. —Milton.

It is difficult for power to avoid despotism. The possessors of rude health; the individualities cut out by a few strokes, solid for the very reason that they are all of a piece; the complete characters whose fibers have never been strained by a doubt; the minds that no questions disturb and no aspirations put out of breath—these, the strong, are also the tyrants.—Mme. de Gasparin.

Destiny

Alas! we are the sport of destiny.—Thackeray.

Destiny is always dark.—George Herbert.

Destiny is our will, and our will is nature.—Disraeli.

How circumscribed is woman's destiny!—Goethe.

We are but as the instrument of heaven.—Owen Meredith.

Marriage is ever made by destiny.—Chapman.

Men must work, and women must weep.—Charles Kingsley.

Hanging and wiving goes by destiny.
—Shakespeare.

Every man meets his Waterloo at last.—Wendell Phillips.

If we cannot shape our destiny there is no such thing as witchcraft.—Beaconsfield.

What a glorious thing human life is,
* * * and how glorious man's destiny!—Longfellow.

For some must watch, while some must sleep;
So runs the world away. —Shakespeare.

All, soon or late, are doom'd that path to tread.
—Homer.

That which God writes on thy forehead thou wilt come to.—Koran.

When I shun Scylla, your father, I fall into Charybdis, your mother.
—Shakespeare.

Vast, colossal destiny, which raises man to fame, though it may also grind him to powder!—Schiller.

What unknown power governs men! On what feeble causes do their destinies hinge!—Voltaire.

Resist as much as thou wilt;
Heaven's ways are heaven's ways.—Lessing.

Woman is born for love, and it is impossible to turn her from seeking it.
—Margaret Fuller Ossoli.

Destiny bears us to our lot, and destiny is perhaps our own will.—Disraeli.

What fates impose, that men must needs abide.—Shakespeare.

Our deeds determine us, as much as we determine our deeds.—George Eliot.

We are all sure of two things, at least; we shall suffer, and we shall all die.—Goldsmith.

No man of woman born, coward or brave, can shun his destiny.—Bryant.

'Tis man himself makes his own god and his own hell.—Bailey.

Everything is done by immutable laws, and our destiny is already recorded.—Voltaire.

Each thing, both in small and in great, fulfilleth the task which destiny hath set down.—Hippocrates.

Maids must be wives and mothers to fulfill the entire and holiest end of woman's being.—Frances Anne Kemble.

If the course of human affairs be considered, it will be seen that many things arise against which heaven does not allow us to guard.—Machiavelli.

There are but two future verbs which man may appropriate confidently and without pride: "I shall suffer," and "I shall die."—Madame Swetchine.

Our minds are as different as our faces; we are all traveling to one destination—happiness; but few are going by the same road.—Colton.

That which is not allotted the hand cannot reach, and what is allotted will find you wherever you may be.—Saadi.

Stern is the onlook of necessity. Not without a shudder may the hand of man grasp the mysterious urn of destiny.—Schiller.

Life treads on life, and heart on heart;
We press too close in church and mart
To keep a dream or grave apart.
—E. B. Browning.

Man supposes that he directs his life and governs his actions, when his existence is irretrievably under the control of destiny.—Goethe.

No living man can send me to the shades
Before my time; no man of woman born,
Coward or brave, can shun his destiny.
—Homer.

That each thing, both in small and in great, fulfilleth the task which destiny hath set down.—Hippocrates.

Death and life have their determined appointments; riches and honor depend upon heaven.—Confucius.

Would the face of nature be so serene and beautiful if man's destiny were not equally so.—Thoreau.

Can man or woman choose duties? No more than they can choose their birthplace, or their father and mother.—George Eliot.

The heart of silver falls ever into the hands of brass. The sensitive herb is eaten as grass by the swine.—Ouida.

That old miracle—Love-at-first-sight—Needs no explanations. The heart reads aright
Its destiny sometimes. —Owen Meredith.

They who talk much of destiny, their birth-star, etc., are in a lower dangerous plane, and invite the evil they fear.—Emerson.

Art and power will go on as they have done—will make day out of night, time out of space, and space out of time.—Emerson.

He whom the gods love dies young, while he is in health, has his senses and his judgment sound.—Plautus.

To be a Prodigal's favourite,—then, worse truth,
A Miser's Pensioner,—behold our lot!
—Wordsworth.

Unseen hands delay
The coming of what oft seems close in ken,
And, contrary, the moment, when we say
"Twill never come!" comes on us even then.
—Lord Lytton.

Alas! how easily things go wrong!
A sigh too deep, or a kiss too long,
And then comes a mist and a weeping rain,
And life is never the same again.
—George MacDonald.

Oh blindness to the future! kindly given,
That each may fill the circle mark'd by heav'n;
Who sees with equal eye, as God of all,
A hero perish, or a sparrow fall. —Pope.

And all the bustle of departure—sometimes sad, sometimes intoxicating

—just as fear or hope may be inspired by the new chances of coming destiny.
—Madame De Staël.

Alas! what stay is there in human state,
Or who can shun inevitable fate?
The doom was written, the decree was past,
Ere the foundations of the world were cast.
—Dryden.

We met, hand to hand,
We clasped hands close and fast,
As close as oak and ivy stand;
But it is past:
Come day, come night, day comes at last.
—Christina G. Rossetti.

All has its date below; the fatal hour
Was register'd in Heav'n ere time began.
We turn to dust, and all our mightiest works
Die too. —Cowper.

For I am a weed,
Flung from the rock, on Ocean's foam, to sail,
Where'er the surge may sweep, the tempest's breath prevail. —Byron.

The scapegoat which we make responsible for all our crimes and follies; a necessity which we set down for invincible, when we have no wish to strive against it.—Mrs. Balfour.

The seed ye sow, another reaps;
The wealth ye find, another keeps;
The robes ye weave, another wears;
The arms ye forge, another bears.
—Shelley.

I know that nothing comes to pass
but what God appoints; our fate is decreed, and things do not happen by chance, but every man's portion of joy and sorrow is predetermined.—Seneca.

Seek not to know what must not be reveal'd;
Joys only flow where Fate is most conceal'd;
Too busie man wou'd find his Sorrows more,
If future Fortunes he shou'd know before;
For by that knowledge of his Destiny
He would not live at all, but always die.
—Dryden.

Men are what their mothers made them. You may as well ask a loom which weaves huckabuck why it does not make cashmere as to expect poetry from this engineer or a chemical discovery from that jobber.—Emerson.

Philosophers never stood in need of Homer or the Pharisees, to be convinced that everything is done by immutable laws, that everything is settled, that everything is a necessary effect of some previous cause.—Voltaire.

"It is destiny"—phrase of the weak human heart; dark apology for every error. The strong and the virtuous admit no destiny. On earth, guides conscience; in heaven, watches God. And destiny is but the phantom we invoke to silence the one, to dethrone the other.—Bulwer-Lytton.

And this is woman's fate: all her affections are called into life by winning flatteries, and then thrown back upon themselves to perish; and her heart, her trusting heart, filled with weak tenderness, is left to bleed or break!—L. E. Landon.

There are certain events which to each man's life are as comets to the earth, seemingly strange and erratic portents; distinct from the ordinary lights which guide our course and mark our seasons, yet true to their own laws, potent in their own influences.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Ships that pass in the night, and speak each other in passing,
Only a signal shown and a distant voice in the darkness;
So on the ocean of life we pass and speak one another,
Only a look and a voice, then darkness again and a silence. —Longfellow.

The irrevocable Hand
That opes the year's fair gate, doth ope and shut
The portals of our earthly destinies;
We walk through blindfold, and the noiseless doors
Close after us forever. —D. M. Mulock.

Like warp and woof all destinies
Are woven fast,
Linked in sympathy like the keys
Of an organ vast.
Pluck one thread, and the web ye mar;
Break but one
Of a thousand keys, and the paining jar
Through all will run. —Whittier.

Take life too seriously, and what is it worth? If the morning wake us to no new joys, if the evening bring us not the hope of new pleasures, is it worth while to dress and undress? Does the sun shine on me to-day that I may reflect on yesterday? That I may endeavor to foresee and to control what can neither be foreseen nor controlled—the destiny of to-morrow?—Goethe.

Farewell! a long farewell, to all my greatness!
This is the state of man: to-day he puts forth
The tender leaves of hope; to-morrow blossoms,
And bears his blushing honours thick upon him:
The third day comes a frost, a killing frost,
And, when he thinks, good easy man, full surely
His greatness is a-ripening, nips his root,
And then he falls, as I do. —Shakespeare.

The wheels of nature are not made to roll backward; everything presses on toward Eternity; from the birth of Time an impetuous current has set in, which bears all the sons of men toward that interminable ocean. Meanwhile heaven is attracting to itself whatever is congenial to its nature, is enriching itself by the spoils of earth, and collecting within its capacious bosom, whatever is pure, permanent and divine.—Robert Hall

Determination

Muse not that I thus suddenly proceed;
For what I will, I will, and there's an end. —Shakespeare.

Although
The air of paradise did fan the house,
And angels offic'd all; I will be gone. —Shakespeare.

I'll speak to it, though hell itself should gape,
And bid me hold my peace. —Shakespeare.

Detraction

Black detraction will find faults where they are not.—Massinger.

The low desire, the base design
That makes another's virtues less. —Longfellow.

Detraction's a bold monster, and fears not
To wound the fame of princes, if it find
But any blemish in their lives to work on. —Massinger.

A third interprets motions, looks, and eyes;
At every word a reputation dies.—Pope.

Mankind praise against their will,
And mix as much detraction as they can.
—Dr. Young.

'Tis not the wholesome sharp morality,
Or modest anger of a satiric spirit,
That hurts or wounds the body of a state,
But the sinister application
Of the malicious, ignorant, and base
Interpreter, who will distort and strain
The general scope and purpose of an author
To his particular and private spleen.
—Ben Jonson.

Devil

The devil has his elect.—Carlyle.

Accursed be he who plays with the devil.—Schiller.

Every newspaper editor owes tribute to the devil.—La Fontaine.

He must have a long spoon that eats with the devil.—Marlowe.

He must needs go that the devil drives.—Shakespeare.

The devil can cite scripture for his purpose.—Shakespeare.

The devil hath power to assume a pleasing shape.—Shakespeare.

The prince of darkness is a gentleman.—Sir John Suckling.

Where God hath a temple, the devil will have a chapel.—Burton.

The devil is an ass, I do acknowledge it.—Ben Jonson.

The devil was sick, the devil a saint would
be;

The devil was well, the devil a saint was he.
—Rabelais.

For, where God built a church there the devil would also build a chapel. They imitated the Jews also in this, namely, that as the Most Holy was dark, and had no light, even so and after the same manner did they make their shrines dark where the devil made answer. Thus is the devil ever God's ape.—Martin Luther.

What, man! defy the devil? Consider, he's an enemy to mankind.—
Shakespeare.

Satan; so call him now, his former name
Is heard no more in heaven. —Milton.

The Devil, my friends, is a woman just now.
'Tis a woman that reigns in Hell.
—Lord Lytton.

Go, poor devil, get thee gone; why should I hurt thee? This world surely is wide enough to hold both thee and me.—Sterne.

The devil is not, indeed, perfectly humorous, but that is only because he is the extreme of all humor.—Coleridge.

No man means evil but the devil, and we shall know him by his horns.—
Shakespeare.

From his brimstone bed, at break of day,
A-walking the Devil is gone,
To look at his little snug farm of the world,
And see how his stock went on.
—Southey.

With grave
Aspect he rose, and in his rising seem'd
A pillar of state; deep on his front engraven
Deliberation sat and public care;
And princely counsel in his face yet shone,
Majestic though in ruin. —Milton.

If the devil take a less hateful shape to us than to our fathers, he is as busy with us as with them.—Lowell.

Black it stood as night,
Fierce as ten furies, terrible as hell,
And shook a dreadful dart; what seem'd his
head
The likeness of a kingly crown had on.
Satan was now at hand. —Milton.

I call'd the devil, and he came,
And with wonder his form did I closely scan;
He is not ugly, and is not lame,
But really a handsome and charming man.
A man in the prime of life is the devil.
Obliging, a man of the world, and civil;
A diplomatist too, well skill'd in debate,
He talks quite glibly of church and state.
—Heine.

Satan is to be punished eternally in the end, but for a while he triumphs.
—B. R. Haydon.

The meanest thing in the world is—the devil.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Let me say “amen” betimes, lest the devil cross my prayer.—Shakespeare.

It is Lucifer,
The son of mystery;
And since God suffers him to be,
He, too, is God's minister,
And labors for some good
By us not understood. —Longfellow.

The devil shall have his bargain; for he was never yet a breaker of proverbs—he will give the devil his due.—Shakespeare.

Devotion

Devotion, like fire, goeth upward.—Zoroaster.

Complete self-devotion is woman's part.—Macaulay.

A woman whom we truly love is a religion.—Mme. de Girardin.

All is holy where devotion kneels.—Holmes.

Devotion's self shall steal a thought from heaven.—Pope.

That fabric rises high as heaven whose basis on devotion stands.—Prior.

Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it.—Bible.

Like Dian's kiss, unasked, unsought, love gives itself, but is not bought.—Longfellow.

Thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of woman.—Bible.

One grain of incense with devotion offer'd
'S beyond all perfumes of Sabæan spices.
—Massinger.

Love without reverence and enthusiasm is only friendship.—George Sand.

Oh, only those whose souls have felt this one idolatry can tell how precious is the slightest thing affection gives and hallows.—L. E. Landon.

Real inward devotion knows no prayer but that arising from the depths of its own feelings.—Humboldt.

To feel, to love, to suffer, to devote herself, will always be the text of the life of woman.—Balzac.

Those who make use of devotion as a means and end generally are hypocrites.—Goethe.

The life of a devotee is a crusade of which the heart is the Holy Land.—Alfred de Musset.

The woman who has too easily and ardently yielded her devotion will find that its vitality, like a bright fire, soon consumes itself.—Rivarol.

Man may content himself with the applause of the world and the homage paid to his intellect, but woman's heart has holier idols.—George Eliot.

The perfect disinterestedness and self-devotion of which men seem incapable, but which is sometimes found in women.—Macaulay.

Devotion, when it does not lie under the check of reason, is apt to degenerate into enthusiasm.—Addison.

Seeming devotion does but gild a knave,
That's neither faithful, honest, just, nor brave;
But where religion does with virtue join,
It makes a hero like an angel shine.
—Waller.

As down in the sunless retreats of the ocean
Sweet flowers are springing no mortal can
see,
So deep in my soul the still prayer of devotion
Unheard by the world, rises silent to Thee.
—Moore.

The secret heart is fair devotion's temple; there the saint, even on that living altar, lights the flame of purest sacrifice, which burns unseen, not unaccepted.—Hannah More.

Devotion is like the candle which Michael Angelo used to take in his pasteboard cap, so as not to throw his shadow upon the work in which he was engaged.—Phillips Brooks.

Love is not love which alters when it alteration finds; love alters not with his brief hours and weeks, but bears it out even to the edge of doom.—Shakespeare.

All who wait upon the Lord shall rise higher and higher upon the mighty pinions of strong devotion, and with the unblinking eye of faith, into the regions of heavenly-mindedness, and shall approach nearer and nearer to God, the Sun of our spiritual day.—John Angus James.

The best part of a woman's love is worship; but it is hard to her to be sent away with her precious spikenard rejected, and her long tresses, too, that were let fall, ready to soothe the wearied feet.—George Eliot.

Private devotions and secret offices of religion are like the refreshing of a garden with the distilling and petty drops of a water-pot; but addressed from the temple are like rain from heaven.—Jeremy Taylor.

I find no quality so easy for a man to counterfeit as devotion, though his life and manner are not conformable to it; the essence of it is abstruse and occult, but the appearances easy and showy.—Montaigne.

The days of chivalry are not gone, notwithstanding Burke's grand dirge over them; they live still in that far-off worship paid by many a youth and man to the woman of whom he never dreams that he shall touch so much as her little finger, or the hem of her robe.—George Eliot.

There are other books in a man's library besides Ovid, and after dawdling ever so long at a woman's knee, one day he gets up and is free. We have all been there; we have all had the fever—the strongest and the smallest, from Samson, Hercules, Rinaldo, downward; but it burns out, and you get well.—Thackeray.

Devout

To worship rightly is to love each other, each smile a hymn, each kindly deed a prayer.—Whittier.

Some persons are so devotional they have not one bit of true religion in them.—B. R. Haydon.

There is a divine depth in silence. We meet God alone.—F. W. Robertson.

"Draw nigh to God, and He will draw nigh to you." Keep near to the fountain-head and "with joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation."—Gardiner Spring.

The inward sighs of humble penitence rise to the ear of heaven, when pealed hymns are scattered with the sounds of common air.—Joanna Baillie.

This is the spirit of prayer—sincere, humble, believing, submissive. Other prayer than this the Bible does not require—God will not accept.—Gardiner Spring.

Other hope had she none, nor wish in life,
but to follow
Meekly, with reverent steps, the sacred feet of her Saviour. —Longfellow.

The Christian life is a long and continual tendency of our hearts towards that eternal goodness which we desire upon earth.—Fénelon.

It is not he who knows most, nor he who hears most, nor yet he who talks most, but he who exercises grace most, who has most communion with God.—Thomas Brooks.

The hand is rais'd, the pledge is given,
One monarch to obey, one creed to own,
That monarch, God; that creed, His word alone. —Sprague.

The Christian is not always praying; but within his bosom is a heaven-kindled love—fires of desire, fervent longings—which make him always ready to pray, and often engage him in prayer.—Thomas Guthrie.

Our activity should consist in placing ourselves in a state of susceptibility to Divine impressions, and pliability to all the operations of the Eternal Word.—Madame Guyon.

The inward sighs of humble penitence Rise to the ear of Heaven, when peal'd hymns
 Are scatter'd with the sounds of common air. —Joanna Baillie.

Like earth, awake, and warm, and bright
 With joy the spirit moves and burns;
 So up to thee! O Fount of Light!
 Our light returns. —John Sterling.

He who receives a sacrament does not perform a good work; he receives a benefit. In the mass we give Christ nothing; we only receive from Him.—
 Luther.

Thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut the door pray to thy Father, which is in secret; and thy Father, which seeth in secret, shall reward thee openly.—Bible.

That holy, humble, meek, modest, retiring Form, sometimes called the Spirit of Prayer, has been dragged from the closet, and so rudely handled by some of her professed friends that she has not only lost all her wonted loveliness, but is now stalking the street, in some places, stark mad.—
 Nettleton.

Only in the sacredness of inward silence does the soul truly meet the secret, hiding God. The strength of resolve, which afterward shapes life, and mixes itself with action, is the fruit of those sacred, solitary moments.
 There is a divine depth in silence.
 We meet God alone.—F. W. Robertson.

The Christian life is a long and continual tendency of our hearts toward that eternal goodness which we desire on earth. All our happiness consists in thirsting for it. Now this thirst is prayer. Ever desire to approach your Creator, and you will never cease to pray. Do not think it necessary to pronounce many words.—
 Fénelon.

There are two principal points of attention necessary for the preservation of this constant spirit of prayer which unites us with God; we must continually seek to cherish it, and we must avoid everything that tends to make us lose it.—Fénelon.

Dew

Earth's liquid jewelery. wrought of air.—Bailey.

Dew depends not on Parliament.—
 James Otis.

None can give us dew but God.—
 Bishop Reynolds.

The dew-bend gem, of earth and sky
 begotten.—George Eliot.

Liquid pearl.—Shakespeare.

And every dew-drop paints a bow.—
 Tennyson.

The dew waits for no voice to call it to the sun.—Rev. Joseph Parker.

As fresh as morning dew distill'd on flowers.—Shakespeare.

Every dew-drop and rain-drop had a whole heaven within it.—Longfellow.

Gems which adorn the beauteous tresses of the weeping morn.—Poole.

Dew-drops are the gems of morning but the tears of mournful eve!—Coleridge.

Those tears of the sky for the loss of the sun.—Chesterfield.

I must go seek some dew-drops here,
 And hang a pearl in every cowslip's ear.
 —Shakespeare.

'Tis of the tears which stars weep,
 sweet with joy.—Bailey.

Or stars of morning, dew-drops which the
 sun
 Impearls on every leaf and every flower.
 —Milton.

The starlight dews all silently their tears of love instill.—Byron.

Hushed as the falling dews, whose noiseless showers impearl the folded leaves of evening flowers.—Congreve.

That same dew, which sometime on the buds was wont to swell, like round and orient pearls, stood now within the pretty flowerets' eyes, like tears that did their own disgrace bewail.—

Shakespeare.

Within the rose I found a trembling tear,
Close curtained in a gloom of crimson night
By tender petals from the outer light.
—Boyesen.

The dew-drop in the breeze of morn,
Trembling and sparkling on the thorn,
Falls to the ground, escapes the eye,
Yet mounts on sunbeams to the sky.
—Montgomery.

Dew-drops, Nature's tears, which she Sheds in her own breast for the fair which die.

The sun insists on gladness; but at night,
When he is gone, poor Nature loves to weep.
—Bailey.

See how the orient dew
Shed from the bosom of the morn
Into the blowing roses
(Yet careless of its mansion new
For the clear region where 'twas born)
Round in itself incloses,
And in its little globe's extent
Frames, as it can, its native element.
—Andrew Marvell.

A globe of dew
Filling, in the morning new,
Some eyed flower, whose young leaves
waken
On an unimagined world;
Constellated suns unshaken,
Orbits measureless are furl'd
In that frail and fading sphere,
With ten millions gathered there
To tremble, gleam and disappear.
—Shelley.

There is dew in one flower and not in another, because one opens its cup and takes it in, while the other closes itself and the drop runs off. So God rains goodness and mercy as wide as the dew, and if we lack them, it is because we do not open our hearts to receive them.—Aughey.

Diary

A man's diary is a record in youth of his sentiments, in middle age of his actions, in old age of his reflections.
—J. Q. Adams.

Diet

Things sweet to taste prove in digestion sour.—Shakespeare.

Simple diet is best.—Pliny.

Unquiet meals make ill digestion.—
Shakespeare.

Many dishes bring many diseases.—
Pliny.

One meal a day is enough for a lion, and it ought to suffice for a man.
—Dr. George Fordyce.

Now, good digestion wait on appetite,
And health on both! —Shakespeare.

A fig for your bill of fare; show me your bill of company.—Swift.

Free-livers on a small scale, who are prodigal within the compass of a guinea.—Washington Irving.

It was Dean Swift who ignored the bill of fare, and asked for a bill of the company.—N. P. Willis.

In general, mankind, since the improvement of cookery, eat about twice as much as nature requires.—Franklin.

The chief pleasure (in eating) does not consist in costly seasoning or exquisite flavor, but in yourself. Do you seek for sauce by sweating.—
Horace.

A chine of honest bacon would please my appetite more than all the marrow-puddings, for I like them better plain, having a very vulgar stomach.—
Dryden.

If thou wouldst preserve a sound body, use fasting and walking; if a healthful soul, fasting and praying;
walking exercises the body, praying exercises the soul, fasting cleanses both.—Quarles.

Food, improperly taken, not only produces original diseases, but affords those that are already engendered both matter and sustenance; so that, let the father of disease be what it may. Intemperance is certainly its mother.—Burton.

Your worm is your only emperor for diet; we fat all creatures else to fat us, and we fat ourselves for maggots.—Shakespeare.

All courageous animals are carnivorous, and greater courage is to be expected in a people, such as the English, whose food is strong and hearty, than in the half starved commonalty of other countries.—Sir W. Temple.

Difficulties

Out of difficulties grow miracles.—Bruyère.

It is difficulties which give birth to miracles.—Rev. Dr. Sharpe.

How strangely easy difficult things are!—Charles Buxton.

Difficulties strengthen the mind, as well as labor does the body.—Seneca.

Many things difficult to design prove easy to performance.—Sam'l Johnson.

To bear adversity with an equal mind is both the sign and glory of a brave spirit.—Quarles.

It is the surmounting of difficulties that makes heroes.—Kossuth.

There is such a choice of difficulties, that I own myself at a loss how to determine.—James.

The illustration which solves one difficulty by raising another, settles nothing.—Horace.

There are few difficulties that hold out against real attacks; they fly, like the visible horizon, before those who advance.

Wisdom is not found with those who dwell at their ease; rather nature, when she adds brain, adds difficulty.—Emerson.

The greatest difficulties lie where we are not looking for them.—Goethe.

It is as hard to come, as for a camel to thread the postern of a needle's eye.—Shakespeare.

Difficulties, by bracing the mind to overcome them, assist cheerfulness, as exercise assists digestion.—Bovee.

Every noble acquisition is attended with its risks; he who fears to encounter the one must not expect to obtain the other.—Metastasio.

The three things most difficult are—to keep a secret, to forget an injury, and to make good use of leisure.—Chilo.

Difficulty excites the mind to the dignity which sustains and finally conquers misfortunes, and the ordeal refines while it chastens.—Aughey.

There is no merit where there is no trial; and, till experience stamps the mark of strength, cowards may pass for heroes, faith for falsehood.—Aaron Hill.

Fortune is the best school of courage when she is fraught with anger, in the same way as winds and tempests are the school of the sailorboy.—Metastasio.

Difficulties are God's errands; and when we are sent upon them we should esteem it a proof of God's confidence—as a compliment from God.—Beecher.

What is difficulty? Only a word indicating the degree of strength requisite for accomplishing particular objects; a mere notice of the necessity for exertion; a bugbear to children and fools; only a mere stimulus to men.—Samuel Warren.

The more powerful the obstacle, the more glory we have in overcoming it; and the difficulties with which we are met are the maids of honor which set off virtue.—Molière.

Accustom yourself to master and overcome things of difficulty; for if you observe, the left hand for want of practice is insignificant, and not adapted to general business; yet it holds the bridle better than the right, from constant use.—Pliny.

Our energy is in proportion to the resistance it meets. We can attempt nothing great but from a sense of the difficulties we have to encounter; we can persevere in nothing great but from a pride in overcoming them.—Hazlitt.

Difficulty is a severe instructor, set over us by the supreme ordinance of a paternal guardian and legislator, who knows us better than we know ourselves, as He loves us better too. He that wrestles with us strengthens our nerves and sharpens our skill. Our antagonist is our helper.—Burke.

The wise and active conquer difficulties
By daring to attempt them; sloth and folly
Shiver and shrink at sight of toil and hazard.
And make the impossibility they fear.
—Rowe.

Hath fortune dealt thee ill cards?
let wisdom make thee a good gamester.
In a fair gale, every fool may sail, but wise behavior in a storm commends the wisdom of a pilot; to bear adversity with an equal mind is both the sign and glory of a brave spirit.
—Quarles.

Difficulties are things that show what men are. In case of any difficulty remember that God, like a gymnastic trainer, has pitted you against a rough antagonist. For what end? That you may be an Olympic conqueror, and this cannot be without toil.—Epictetus.

It is not every calamity that is a curse, and early adversity is often a blessing. Perhaps Madame de Maintenon would never have mounted a throne had not her cradle been rocked in a prison. Surmounted obstacles not only teach, but hearten us in our future struggles; for virtue must be learnt, though, unfortunately, some of the vices come as it were by inspiration.—Rev. Dr. Sharpe.

Diffidence

Diffidence is a sort of false modesty.
—Thackeray.

Diffidence is not always innocence.
—Mme. Necker.

Mere bashfulness without merit is awkward.—Thomas Hughes.

We are as often duped by diffidence as by confidence.—Chesterfield.

Persons extremely reserved are like old enamelled watches, which had painted covers, that hindered your seeing what o'clock it was.—Walpole.

A tardiness in nature,
Which often leaves the history unspoke,
That it intends to do. —Shakespeare.

Diffidence may check resolution and obstruct performance, but compensates its embarrassments by more important advantages; it conciliates the proud, and softens the severe; averts envy from excellence, and censure from miscarriage.—Johnson.

Dignity

Ease with dignity.—Cicero.

Dignity and love do not blend
Mme. Necker.

All celebrated people lose on a close view.—Napoleon I.

There is even the dignity of vice.—Rivarol.

Dignity increases more easily than it begins.—Seneca.

Dignity and love were never yet boon companions.—Fielding.

Dignity consists not in possessing honors, but in deserving them.—Aristotle.

Dignity and love do not blend well, nor do they continue long together.—Ovid.

Dignity of manner always conveys a sense of reserved force.—Alcott.

Let none presume to wear an undeserved dignity.—Shakespeare.

As vivacity is the gift of woman, gravity is that of man.—Addison.

There is a healthful hardiness about real dignity that never dreads contact and communion with others, however humble.—Washington Irving.

Grace was in all her steps, heaven in her eye,
In every gesture dignity and love.
—Milton.

True dignity is never gained by place,
And never lost when honours are withdrawn.
—Massinger.

A fit of anger is as fatal to dignity as a dose of arsenic to life.—J. G. Holland.

The nearer we approach great men, the clearer we see that they are men.—Bruyère.

Clay and clay differs in dignity, whose dust is both alike.—Shakespeare.

Dignity is often a veil between us and the real truth of things.—Whipple.

It is of very little use in trying to be dignified, if dignity is no part of your character.—Bovee.

She is calm because she is the mistress of her subject,—the secret of self-possession.—Beaconsfield.

The dignity of truth is lost with much protesting.—Ben Jonson.

True dignity is his whose tranquil mind virtue has raised above the things below.—Beattie.

In order that she may be able to give her hand with dignity, she must be able to stand alone.—Margaret Fuller Ossoli.

Remember this,—that there is a proper dignity and proportion to be observed in the performance of every act of life.—Marcus Aurelius.

She hath a natural, wise sincerity, a simple truthfulness; and these have lent her a dignity as moveless as the centre.—Lowell.

Men possessing minds which are morose, solemn, and inflexible enjoy generally a greater share of dignity than of happiness.—Bacon.

It is at once the thinnest and most effective of all the coverings under which duncedom sneaks and skulks.—Whipple.

We have exchanged the Washingtonian dignity for the Jeffersonian simplicity, which was in truth only another name for the Jeffersonian vulgarity.—Bishop Henry C. Potter.

Dignity of position adds to dignity of character, as well as to dignity of carriage. Give us a proud position, and we are impelled to act up to it.—Bovee.

True dignity abides with him alone who, in the silent hour of inward thought, can still suspect and still revere himself in lowliness of heart.—Wordsworth.

The dignity of man into your hands is given;
Oh, keep it well, with you it sinks or lifts itself to heaven.
—Schiller.

True dignity is his whose tranquil mind
Virtue has raised above the things below;
Who, every hope and fear to heaven resign'd Shrinks not, though fortune aims her deadliest blow.
—Beattie.

With grave
Aspect he rose, and in his rising seem'd
A pillar of state; deep on his front engraven
Deliberation sat, and public care;
And princely counsel in his face yet shone
Majestic, though in ruin. Sage he stood,
With Atlantean shoulders, fit to bear
The weight of mightiest monarchies; his look
Drew audience and attention still as night
Or summer's noontide air.
—Milton.

Lord Chatham and Napoleon were as much actors as Garrick or Talma. Now, an imposing air should always be taken as evidence of imposition. Dignity is often a veil between us and the real truth of things.—Whipple.

Digression

Digressions incontestably are the sunshine; they are the life, the soul of reading.—Sterne.

Diligence

Diligence is the mother of good fortune.—Cervantes.

Diligence, above all, is the mother of good luck.—Samuel Smiles.

Who makes quick use of the moment, is a genius of prudence.—Lavater.

That which ordinary men are fit for, I am qualified in; and the best of me is diligence.—Shakespeare.

What we hope ever to do with ease we may learn first to do with diligence.—Johnson.

It is want of diligence rather than want of means that causes most failures.—Alfred Mercier.

Prefer diligence before idleness, unless you esteem rust above brightness.—Plato.

The more the marble wastes, the more the statue grows.—Michael Angelo.

The expectations of life depend upon diligence; and the mechanic that would perfect his work, must first sharpen his tools.—Confucius.

Like clocks, one wheel another on must drive,
Affairs by diligent labors only thrive.
—Chapman.

To be rich be diligent; move on
Like heav'n's great movers that enrich the earth;
Whose moment's sloth would show the world undone;
And make the spring straight bury all her birth.
Rich are the diligent who can command
Time—nature's stock. —Davenant.

As he that lives longest lives but a little while, every man may be certain that he has no time to waste. The duties of life are commensurate to its duration; and every day brings its task, which, if neglected, is doubled on the morrow.—Dr. Johnson.

Diligence is the mother of good luck, and God gives all things to industry. Then plough deep while sluggards sleep, and you shall have corn to sell and to keep.—Benjamin Franklin.

Diligence which, as it avails in all things, is also of the utmost moment in pleading causes. Diligence is to be particularly cultivated by us; it is to be constantly exerted; it is capable of effecting almost everything.—Cicero.

Dimples

Then did she lift her hands unto his chin,
And praise the pretty dimpling of his skin.
—Beaumont.

In each cheek appears a pretty dimple;
Love made those hollows; if himself were slain

He might be buried in a tomb so simple;
Foreknowing well, if there he came to lie,
Why, there Love lived, and there he could not die.
—Shakespeare.

Dinner — Dining

The tocsin of the soul—the dinner bell!—Byron.

He fell upon whate'er was offer'd, like
A priest, a shark, an alderman, or pike.
—Byron.

When dinner has oppress'd one,
I think it is perhaps the gloomiest hour
Which turn: up out of the sad twenty-four.
—Byron.

Their various cares in one great point combine
The business of their lives, that is—to dine.
—Young.

All human history attests
That happiness for man—the hungry sinner—
Since Eve ate apples, much depends on dinner!
—Byron.

'Twas a public feast and public day—
Quite full, right dull, guests hot, and dishes cold,
Great plenty, much formality, small cheer,
And everybody out of their own sphere.
—Byron.

A good dinner sharpens wit, while it softens the heart.—Doran.

Before dinner men meet with great inequality of understanding; and those who are conscious of their inferiority have the modesty not to talk; when they have drunk wine, every man feels himself happy, and loses that modesty, and grows impudent and vociferous; but he is not improved; he is only not sensible of his defects.—Johnson.

Dirt

Dirt is not dirt, but only something in the wrong place.—Lord Palmerston.

Dirt has been shrewdly termed "misplaced material."—Victor Hugo.

By those who look close to the ground dirt will be seen. I hope I see things from a greater distance.—Dr. Johnson.

I confess I could never see any good reason why dirt should always be a necessary concomitant of poverty.—W. G. Clark.

In Nature there is no dirt, everything is in the right condition; the swamp and the worm, as well as the grass and the bird,—all is there for itself. Only because we think that all things have a relation to us, do they appear justifiable or otherwise.—Auerbach.

"Ignorance," says Ajax, "is a painless evil"; so, I should think, is dirt, considering the merry faces that go along with it.—George Eliot.

Disappointment

Disappointment is the nurse of wisdom.—Sir Bayle Roche.

Disappointment is often the salt of life.—Theodore Parker.

O world, how many hopes thou dost engulf!—Alfred de Musset.

Bearing a life-long hunger in his heart.—Tennyson.

Thus ever fade my fairy dreams of bliss.—Byron.

How Disappointment tracks the steps of Hope!—J. E. Landon.

Disappointments are to the soul what a thunder-storm is to the air.—Schiller.

Oh! that a dream so sweet, so long enjoy'd
Should be so sadly, cruelly destroy'd!
—Moore.

As distant prospects please us, but when near
We find but desert rocks and fleeting air.
—Sir Sam'l Garth.

His early dreams of good outstripp'd the
truth,
And troubled manhood follow'd baffled youth.
—Byron.

Life is as tedious as a twice-told tale, vexing the dull ear of a drowsy
man.—Shakespeare.

Women suffer more from disappointment than men, because they have more of faith and are naturally more credulous.—Marguerite de Valois.

Of all the uses of adversity which are sweet, none are sweeter than those which grow out of disappointed love.—Henry Taylor.

Disappointment to a noble soul is what cold water is to burning metal; it strengthens, tempers, intensifies, but never destroys it.—Eliza Tabor.

Life often seems like a long shipwreck, of which the debris are friendship, glory, and love; the shores of existence are strewn with them.—Mme. de Staël.

Man must be disappointed with the lesser things of life before he can comprehend the full value of the greater.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Oft expectation fails, and most oft there where it most promises; and oft it hits where hope is coldest, and despair most sits.—Shakespeare.

We mount to heaven mostly on the ruins of our cherished schemes, finding our failures were successes.—Alcott.

Mean spirits under disappointment, like small beer in a thunder-storm, always turn sour.—Randolph.

When we meet with better fare than was expected, the disappointment is overlooked even by the scrupulous. When we meet with worse than was expected, philosophers alone know how to make it better.—Zimmermann.

Impell'd with steps unceasing to pursue
Some fleeting good, that mocks me with the view,
That, like the circle bounding earth and
skies,
Allures from far, yet, as I follow, flies.
—Goldsmith.

A thousand years a poor man watched
Before the gate of Paradise:
But while one little nap he snatched,
It oped and shut. Ah! was he wise?
—Wm. R. Alger.

It never yet happened to any man since the beginning of the world, nor ever will, to have all things according to his desire, or to whom fortune was never opposite and adverse.—Burton.

In the light of eternity we shall see that what we desired would have been fatal to us, and that what we would have avoided was essential to our well-being.—Fénelon.

The best-laid schemes o' mice and men,
Gang aft a-gley,
And leave us nought but grief and pain,
For promised joy.
—Burns.

O! ever thus from childhood's hour,
I've seen my fondest hopes decay;
I never loved a tree or flower,
But 'twas the first to fade away!
—Moore.

Out of the same substances one stomach will extract nutriment, another poison; and so the same disappointments in life will chasten and refine one man's spirit, and embitter another's.—Wm. Matthews.

It is generally known that he who expects much will be often disappointed; yet disappointment seldom cures us of expectation, or has any other effect than that of producing a moral sentence or peevish exclamation.
—Johnson.

He that will do no good offices after a disappointment must stand still, and do just nothing at all. The plough goes on after a barren year; and while the ashes are yet warm, we raise a new house upon the ruins of a former.

—Seneca.

It is sometimes of God's mercy that men in the eager pursuit of worldly aggrandizement are baffled; for they are very like a train going down an inclined plane,—putting on the brake is not pleasant, but it keeps the car on the track.—Beecher.

An old man once said, "When I was young I was poor; when old I became rich; but in each condition I found disappointment. When the faculties of enjoyment were, I had not the means; when the means came, the faculties were gone."—Madame de Gas-parin.

It is folly to pretend that one ever wholly recovers from a disappointed passion. Such wounds always leave a scar. There are faces I can never look upon without emotion, there are names I can never hear spoken without almost starting.—Longfellow.

Full little knowest thou that hast not tried,
What hell it is in suing long to bide:
To loose good dayes, that might be better spent;
To waste long nights in pensive discontent;
To speed to-day, to be put back to-morrow;
To feed on hope, to pine with feare and sorrow.
—Spenser.

Young ladies may have been crossed in love, and have had their sufferings, their frantic moments of grief and tears, their wakeful nights, and so forth; but it is only in very sentimental novels that people occupy themselves perpetually with that passion, and I believe what are called broken hearts are a very rare article indeed.
—Thackeray.

The darling schemes and fondest hopes of man are frequently frustrated, by time. While sagacity contrives, patience matures, and labor industriously executes, disappointment laughs at the curious fabric, formed by so many efforts, and gay with so many brilliant colors, and, while the artists imagine the work arrived at the moment of completion, brushes away the beautiful web, and leaves nothing behind.—Dwight.

Welcome, Disappointment! Thy hand is cold and hard, but it is the hand of a friend. Thy voice is stern and harsh, but it is the voice of a friend. Oh, there is something sublime in calm endurance, something sublime in the resolute, fixed purpose of suffering without complaining, which makes disappointment oftentimes better than success!—Longfellow.

Disaster

Disasters teach us humility.—St. Anselm.

Defeat may be victory in disguise.—Longfellow.

The cruelest foe is a masked benefactor. The wars which make history so dreary have served the cause of truth and virtue.—Emerson.

It is in periods of apparent disaster, during the sufferings of whole generations, that the greatest improvement in human character has been effected.—Sir A. Allison.

When the foot of the mountain is enveloped in mist, the mountain appears to us much loftier than it is; so also when the ground and basis of a disaster is not clear to us.—Auerbach.

Discernment

Lynx-eyed toward our equals, and moles to ourselves.—La Fontaine.

Good men can more easily see through bad men than the latter can the former.—Jean Paul Richter.

The rarest things in world, next to a spirit of discernment, are diamonds and pearls.—La Bruyère.

There seems to be no part of knowledge in fewer hands than that of discerning when to have done.—Swift.

Discernment is a power of the understanding in which few excel. Is not that owing to its connection with impartiality and truth? for are not prejudice and partiality blind?—Greenville.

If you give me six lines written by the hand of the most honest of men, I will find something in them which will hang him.—Richelieu.

To succeed in the world, it is much more necessary to possess the penetration to discern who is a fool than to discover who is a clever man.—Talleyrand.

The idiot, the Indian, the child, and unschooled farmer's boy stand nearer to the light by which nature is to be read, than the dissector or the antiquary.—Emerson.

Simple creatures, whose thoughts are not taken up, like those of educated people, with the care of a great museum of dead phrases, are very quick to see the live facts which are going on about them.—Holmes.

Discipline

It is never wise to slip the bands of discipline.—Lew Wallace.

A stern discipline pervades all nature, which is a little cruel that it may be very kind.—Spenser.

No pain, no palm; no thorns, no throne; no gall, no glory; no cross, no crown.—William Penn.

No evil propensity of the human heart is so powerful that it may not be subdued by discipline.—Seneca.

Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old he will not depart from it.—Bible.

We have all to be laid upon an altar; we have all, as it were, to be subjected to the action of fire.—G. J. W. Melville.

The strength one can eke from little, who knows till he has been subjected to the trial?—Lew Wallace.

Has it never occurred to us, when surrounded by sorrows, that they may be sent to us only for our instruction, as we darken the cages of birds when we wish to teach them to sing.—Richter.

He that hath wife and children hath given hostages to fortune, for they are impediments to great enterprises, either of virtue or mischief. * * * Certainly wife and children are a kind of discipline of humanity.—Bacon.

A dull axe never loves grindstones, but a keen workman does; and he puts his tool on them in order that it may be sharp. And men do not like grinding; but they are dull for the purposes which God designs to work out with them, and therefore He is grinding them.—Beecher.

The heart must be divorced from its idols. Age does a great deal in curing the man of his frenzy; but if God has a special work for a man, he takes a shorter and sharper course with him. This grievous loss is only a further and more expensive education for the work of the ministry; it is but saying more closely, "Will you pay the price?"—Cecil.

Discipline, like the bridle in the hand of a good rider, should exercise its influence without appearing to do so; should be ever active, both as a support and as a restraint, yet seem to lie easily in hand. It must always be ready to check or to pull up, as occasion may require; and only when the horse is a runaway should the action of the curb be perceptible.

Discontent

What is more miserable than discontent?—Shakespeare.

Men would be angels; angels would be gods.—Pope.

Discontent is the want of self-reliance: it is infirmity of will.—Emerson.

We love in others what we lack ourselves, and would be everything but what we are.—R. H. Stoddard.

O thoughts of men accurst! Past and to come seems best; things present, worst.—Shakespeare.

The lazy ox wishes for horse-trappings, and the steed wishes to plough.—Horace.

'T is not my talent to conceal my thoughts, or carry smiles and sunshine in my face when discontent sits heavy at my heart.—Addison.

Discontent is the source of all trouble, but also of all progress in individuals and in nations.—Auerbach.

That which makes people dissatisfied with their condition is the chimerical idea they form of the happiness of others.—Thomson.

It happens as with cages; the birds without despair to get in, and those within despair of getting out.—Montaigne.

Man hath a weary pilgrimage,
As through the world he wends;
On every stage, from youth to age,
Still discontent attends. —Southey.

Such is the emptiness of human enjoyment that we are always impatient of the present. Attainment is followed by neglect, and possession by disgust.—Dr. Johnson.

How does it happen, Mæcenas, that no one is content with that lot in life which he has chosen, or which chance has thrown in his way, but praises those who follow a different course?—Horace.

There's discontent from sceptre to the swain
And from the peasant to the king again,
The whatsoever in thy will afflict thee,
Or in thy pleasure seem to contradict thee,
Give it a welcome as a wholesome friend
That would instruct thee to a better end.
Since no condition from defect is free,
Think not to find what here can never be.
—Nicholes.

Discontents are sometimes the better part of our life. I know not well which is the most useful; joy I may choose for pleasure, but adversities are the best for profit; and sometimes those do so far help me, as I should, without them, want much of the joy I have.—Fetham.

It's hardly in a body's power
To keep at times, frae being sour,
To see how things are shar'd;
How best o' chieles are whyles in want,
While coofs on countless thousands rant,
And ken na how to wear't. —Burns.

Against our peace we arm our will;
Amidst our plenty something still,
For horses, houses, pictures planting,
To thee, to me, to him is wanting;
That cruel something unpossesst
Corrodes and leavens all the rest,
That something if we could obtain,
Would soon create a future pain.
—Prior.

The malcontent is neither well, full nor fasting; and though he abounds with complaints, yet nothing dislikes him but the present; for what he condemns while it was, once passed, he magnifies and strives to recall it out of the jaw of time. What he hath he seeth not, his eyes are so taken up with what he wants; and what he sees he careth not for, because he cares so much for that which is not.—Bishop Hall.

Men are merely on a lower or higher stage of an eminence, whose summit is God's throne, infinitely above all; and there is just as much reason for the wisest as for the simplest man being discontent with his position, as respects the real quantity of knowledge he possesses.—Ruskin.

Discord

A modicum of discord is the very spice of courtship.—Chamfort.

Discord oft in music makes the sweeter lay.—Spenser.

Untimely conduct is the discord of manners.—Mme. Louise Colet.

How sour sweet music is,
When time is broke, and no proportion kept!
—Shakespeare.

Unity, agreement, is always silent or soft-voiced; it is only discord that loudly proclaims itself.—Carlyle.

Our life is full of discord; but by forbearance and virtue this same discord can be turned to harmony.—James Ellis.

From hence, let fierce contending nations
know
What dire effects from civil discord flow.
—Addison.

Discord, a sleepless hag, who never dies,
With snipe-like nose and ferret-glowing eyes,
Lean sallow cheeks, long chin, with beard supplied,
Poor crackling joints, and wither'd parchment hide,
As if old drums, worn out with martial din,
Had clubb'd their yellow heads to form her skin. —Peter Pindar.

The peacemakers shall be called the sons of God, who came to make peace between God and man. What then shall the sowers of discord be called, but the children of the devil? And what must they look for but their father's portion?—St. Bernard.

Discoveries

A new principle is an inexhaustible source of new views.—Vauvenargues.

All great discoveries are made by men whose feelings run ahead of their thoughts.—Charles H. Parkhurst.

Obedience does not stop for mystery, but, going on, sees twilight brighten into day. How can wheat and corn become energy to think, and love, and work? Who can tell, but who can doubt? When we obey God's laws, it is as if an angel troubled the water, and instantly life and power emerge. Loyalty discovers. It is not merely the illumination, but the transfiguration of life; a brave departure, and then a discovery; "Westward-ho," and then a new world.

It is a mortifying truth, and ought to teach the wisest of us humility, that many of the most valuable discoveries have been the result of chance, rather than of contemplation, and of accident, rather than of design.—Colton.

Discovery Day

The spirit of Columbus hovers over us to-day.—Chauncey Depew.

The Old World owes scarcely less to Columbus than the New.—Rev. W. W. Wilson.

Every man has in himself a continent of undiscovered character. Happy is he who acts the Columbus to his own soul.—Theo. L. Cuyler, D. D.

And he went out not knowing whither he went.—Bible.

I will command your fleet and discover for you new realms.—Columbus.

Neither realism nor romance furnishes a more striking and picturesque figure than that of Christopher Columbus. The mystery about his origin heightens the charm of his story.—Chauncey Depew.

It was for Columbus, when the right hour struck, forced and propelled by this fresh life, to reveal the land where these new principles were to be brought, and where the awaited trial of the new civilization was to be made.—Chauncey Depew.

The tomb of the Saviour was a narrow and empty vault, precious only for its memories of the supreme tragedy of the centuries, but the new continent was to be the home and temple of the living God.—Chauncey Depew.

Columbus stood in his age as the pioneer of progress and achievement. The system of universal education is in our age the most prominent and salutary feature of the spirit of enlightenment, and it is peculiarly appropriate that the schools be made by the people the center of the day's demonstration. Let the national flag float over every school-house in the country, and the exercises be such as shall impress upon our youth the patriotic duties of American citizenship.—Benjamin Harrison.

England of late has been the elect nation, but now the star of empire is passing westward to this land. There is no question but that now and in the future this land is to be the elect nation under God for solving the problems of liberty, of the amelioration of mankind, and of the best Christian civilization.—Rev. M. M. Smith.

If we claim heritage in Bacon, Shakespeare and Milton, we also acknowledge that it was for liberties guaranteed Englishmen by sacred charters our fathers triumphantly fought. While wisely rejecting throne and caste and privilege and an Established Church in their new-born state, they adopted the substance of English liberty and the body of English law.—Chauncey Depew.

A great revolution has happened—a revolution made, not by chopping and changing of power in any of the existing states, but by the appearance of a new state, of a new species, in a new part of the globe. It has made as great a change in all the relations and balances and gravitations of power as the appearance of a new planet would in the system of the solar world.—Burke.

Columbus was an Abraham, for he went out not knowing whither he went. Columbus was a Moses, for he endured as seeing Him who is invisible. Only the man of faith is the man of power. Only he who can see the invisible can do the impossible. God grant that to-day in that bark we may be wafted by God's blessing, and may land at last on the shores of Heaven, where we shall sing a sweeter Te Deum than that which awoke the echoes on the soil of virgin America, or those amid the splendors of the court at Barcelona.—Rev. R. S. MacArthur.

He, too, went out not knowing whither he went, and he never fully knew; he died under an utter misapprehension of the nature of the country he had visited and of the character of the discoveries he had made. He, too, realized the necessity of great faith, and of divine guidance. God went before Abraham, and before even Columbus, altho he was a very imperfect man, as truly as when by the pillar of cloud by day, and the pillar of fire by night, He went before the children of Israel on their weary march.—Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D. D.

Till the English-speaking and God-fearing colonists came there were none who dwelt on this continent who had thoughts worth keeping alive in the world. If all the ideas our forerunners had were utterly dropped out of history men would not miss them. These people lived after a fashion, but what did they stand for? What principles, what causes were incarnate in them? People who only live must die the death. It is Heaven's law.—Bishop Haygood.

Columbus died in utter ignorance of the true nature of his discovery. He supposed he had found India, but never knew how strangely God had used him. So God piloted the fleet. The great discoverer, with all his heroic virtues, did not know whither he went. "He sailed for the back door of Asia, and landed at the front door of America, and knew it not." He never settled the continent. Thus far and no farther, said the Lord. His providence was over all.—Rev. D. J. Burrill, D. D.

From the discovery of the New World, the mercantile spirit has been rapidly gaining upon its old antagonist; and the establishment upon these shores of our Republic, whose union was the immediate result of commercial necessities, whose independence found its original impulse in commercial oppression, and of whose Constitution the regulation of commerce was the first leading idea, may be regarded as the epoch at which the martial spirit finally lost its supremacy, which, it is believed and trusted, it can never again acquire.—Robert C. Winthrop.

His perseverance never failed: when rejected at Genoa, rejected at Venice, rejected in Portugal, delayed in England and delayed in Spain, he still persevered, amid all the trials of his immortal voyage until on the morning of the 12th of October, 1492, he saw the sand glistening on the shores of the New World, and in a little while heard one of the men on the Pinta call out, "Land! land!" and a new world was discovered.

Our country for the World! we sing,
But in no worldly way;
Our country to the Lord we bring
And fervent for her pray:
God make her true; God make her pure;
God make her wise and good;
And through her may the Christ make sure
Man's world-wide Brotherhood!
America! America!
'Gainst wrong thy might be hurled;
For thee we lift our loud Huzzal
Our Country for the World!
—Denis Wortman, D. D.

Ours is the last experiment among the nations. Other nations may possibly arise and mar their future or make it, but it is in no undue spirit of self-importance that we say to-day that no other nation can arise with so great an inheritance and so great opportunities as the God of Nations has given us. Great danger lurks in our country's rapid growth in material wealth. The rich are growing richer and the poor poorer, and all are selfish. I hope that the problem of our civilization may be solved without bloodshed.—Rev. Dr. Rainsford.

All hail, Columbus, discoverer, dreamer, hero, and apostle! We here, of every race and country, recognize the horizon which bounded his vision and the infinite scope of his genius. The voice of gratitude and praise for all the blessings which have been showered upon mankind by his adventure is limited to no language, but is uttered in every tongue. Neither marble nor brass can fitly form his statue. Continents are his monument, and unnumbered millions present and to come, who enjoy in their liberties and their happiness the fruits of his faith, will reverently guard and preserve, from century to century, his name and fame.—World's Best Orations.

The history of the connection of the Spaniards with the Indians of the New World shows that, far from being actuated by a desire for the spiritual welfare of the unfortunate red men, their sole purpose was to use them as instruments for gaining wealth, regardless of their health or even of their lives. History does not contain a blacker record than the dealings of the Spaniards with the Indians. Columbus himself set the example in Hayti, when he and his companions ruthlessly butchered the miserable savages simply to create terror. The pages of Las Casas are full of the records of deeds of which demons should be ashamed.—St. Louis Advocate.

Without a parallel in history the name of Christopher Columbus stands alone, and like some great oak towering above the forest trees, so does he stand far in advance of his age with a work which is the most important since the birth of the Saviour of mankind. And I believe that as surely as men have been chosen by God for any work, so surely was he the chosen vessel to reveal the marvels of a New World to the wondering vision of the Old.—Rev. E. S. Holloway.

Force was the factor in the government of the world when Christ was born, and force was the source and exercise of authority both by Church and State when Columbus sailed from Palos. The Wise Men traveled from the East toward the West under the guidance of the Star of Bethlehem. The spirit of the equality of all men before God and the law moved westward from Calvary with its revolutionary influence upon old institutions, to the Atlantic Ocean. Columbus carried it westward across the seas.—Chauncey M. Depew.

He wrote the sacred name of Christ on his banner and gave Him all honor. He landed on the shores of this New World dressed in the resplendent robes of an admiral, with a sword in one hand and the banner of Christ in the other. The company fell upon their knees and praised God for His wonderful goodness. This New World was consecrated to God from the very moment of its first discovery. This country is a Christian land; the highest authority has recently pronounced it to be a Christian land, and it ought to be recognized as a Christian land, and the holy Sabbath be observed. Woe to us as a people if we lower our flag, if we dishonor our history, if we forsake our God!—Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D. D.

We, therefore, on this anniversary of America, present the Public School as the proudest and noblest expression of the principle of enlightenment which Columbus grasped by faith. We uplift the system of free and universal education as the master-force which, under God, has been informing each of our generations with the peculiar truths of Americanism. America, therefore, gathers her sons around the schoolhouse to-day as the institution closest to the people, most characteristic of the people, and fullest of hope for the people. To-day America's fifth century begins. The world's twentieth century will soon be here. To the thirteen millions now in the American schools the command of the coming years belongs. We, the youth of America, who to-day unite to march as one army under the sacred flag, understand our duty. We pledge ourselves that the flag shall not be stained, and that America shall mean equal opportunity and justice for every citizen, and brotherhood for the world.—Francis Bellamy.

What are we here for? I answer, as a Christian—as one who believes in God and his Christ, and therefore does not despair of man. We are here to build a Christian nation. Nothing less would vindicate the wisdom of the Creator in preparing such a country; nothing less vindicate the Providence that first settled these shores with English-speaking Christian men and women, by divine laws of life driving hence and away the people who would not use their gifts; nothing less than a Christian state makes life worth living for us or our children.—Bishop Haygood.

Columbus is always a good subject for meditation. His piety, his courage, his confidence in Providence and in himself, his ceaseless industry, his enterprise and indomitable self-control are strongly marked in every step of his romantic and extraordinary career. Had he been a man who could be turned from his high purpose by dis couragements his name would be unknown to-day. His life and work are a monument to faith and determination. He felt within him the power to do, and he had the courage to dare.—N. Y. Herald.

Many blessings and advantages were bequeathed to all nations by the discoveries of the great captain: First, in securing large space for the multiplying millions of the Old World; second, in affording opportunity for experiments in government, unburdened by the evil traditions and prejudices which have so often defeated efforts toward political equality; and, third, in liberating the world's thought and sympathies by showing how men of all creeds and conceits might dwell together in the same political household in perfect good will.—Dr. Rylance.

The advent of the United States as a Sixth Power in the world has made obsolete all the traditions and diplomacy that have known only the Five Great Powers of Europe. Six months have made the United States one of the greatest factors in the history of the future by making this Nation the disinterested champion of freedom in the world. The die is cast. There can be no retreat, no drawing back. It is demanded of our Government and people, that they shall take their place in the councils of the nations, and inaugurate and carry out, in the spirit of disinterestedness, a Christian policy and diplomacy, in accomplishing the extraordinary task providentially assigned to them.—Gregory.

We are to-day treading in the same steps that other historic republics have taken and regretted—luxury and extravagance attending upon wealth, general laxity in morality and religion, jealousies and discontents incident to poverty among the masses, bitter conflicts between political parties, abuse heaped upon public servants, favors shown to the most dangerous classes when they can be used to promote party interests. These were the reasons why the historic republics fell into degradation, disgrace, and death. The greatest danger threatening our republic to-day is promiscuous immigration, and from this giant evil flow many perils, chief among which is the wholesale placing of the sacred ballot in the hands of those who have as yet done nothing entitling them to American citizenship. More than one republic has been wrecked on this rock.—Rev. C. H. Parkhurst.

Among the thoughts suggested by this day the first is one of humiliation. As a people we are disposed to brag and boast and have an inordinate confidence in our powers. We are possessed with an idea that American ingenuity can accomplish anything. We regard our own things as far the best in the world, our own institutions as the most perfect. But if we come to view things with an unprejudiced eye and to pass judgment free from self-interest, we must say that, as a rule, our own things are not the best, the productions of our skilled labor are not always equal to those of older countries. The only things we have any shadow of reason to boast of are those things the production of which we have nothing to do with, namely, those things which are our natural resources and are the gift of God.—Rev. J. Nevitt Steele.

My native land, my native land,
To her my thoughts will fondly turn;
For her the warmest hopes expand,
For her the heart with fears will yearn.
Oh, may she keep her eye, like thee,
Proud eagle of the rocky wild,
Fixed on the sun of Liberty,
By rank, by faction, unbeguiled;
Remembering still the rugged road
Our venerable fathers trod,
When they through toil and danger pressed
To gain their glorious bequest,
And from each lip the caution fell
To those who followed, "Guard it well."
—Col. S.

Before Columbus and the one hundred and twenty men embarked on board the Santa Maria, the Pinta, and the Nina, on their eventful voyage, what did they do? Took the Sacrament of our Lord Jesus Christ. Coming in sight of land, what song goes up from all three decks? "Gloria in Excelsis." What did they first do stepping from shipboard to solid ground? All knelt in prayer, consecrating the

New World to God. What did the Huguenots do, landing in the Carolinas; and the Hollanders, landing in New York; and the Puritans, landing in New England? With bent knees, uplifted faces and heaven-beseeching prayer, they took possession of this Continent for God. How did they open the First American Congress? With prayer in the name of Christ. Beside that, see what God has done for us. Open the map of our North American Continent, and see how the land was shaped for immeasurable prosperities. Behold the navigable rivers, greater and more numerous than those of any other land, running down to the sea in all directions—prophecy of large manufactures and easy commerce. Look at the great ranges of mountains, timbered with wealth on the tops and sides, and metaled with wealth underneath: 180,000 square miles of coal; 180,000 square miles of iron. The land so contoured that extreme weather seldom lasts more than three days. For the most of the year the climate is bracing, and favorable for brawn and brain. All fruits, all minerals, all harvests. Scenery which displays an autumnal pageantry which no other land pretends to rival. No South American earthquakes. No Scotch mists. No English fogs. No Egyptian plagues. No Germanic divisions. The happiest people on the earth are the people of the United States. The poor man has more chance, the industrious man more opportunity. How good God was to our fathers! How good God is to us and our children!

Discretion

Great ability without discretion comes almost invariably to a tragic end.—Gambetta.

Even in a hero's heart
Discretion is the better part.
—Churchill.

Discretion and hard valor are the twins of honor.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

To make another person hold his tongue, be you first silent.—Seneca.

The better part of valor is discretion.—Shakespeare.

Discretion in speech is more than eloquence.—Bacon.

If thou art a master, be sometimes blind; if a servant, sometimes deaf.—Fuller.

Neither coquetry nor love is imbued with discretion.—Mme. Sophie Arnould.

Remember the divine saying, He that keepeth his mouth, keepeth his life.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Let's teach ourselves that honourable stop, Not to outsport discretion. —Shakespeare.

All persons are not discreet enough to know how to take things by the right handle.—Cervantes.

Partake of love as a temperate man partakes of wine; do not become intoxicated.—Alfred de Musset.

Let your own discretion be your tutor: suit the action to the word, the word to the action.—Shakespeare.

I have seen the day of wrong through the little hole of discretion.—Shakespeare.

A sound discretion is not so much indicated by never making a mistake as by never repeating it.—Bovee.

In a state where discretion begins, law, liberty, and safety end.—Junius.

Discretion is the salt, and fancy the sugar of life; the one preserves, the other sweetens it.—Bovee.

The better part of valour is discretion; in the which better part I have saved my life.—Shakespeare.

Discreet women have sometimes neither eyes nor ears.—Mme. Deluzy.

There are many more shining qualities in the mind of man, but there is none so useful as discretion.—Addison.

What is denominated discretion in man we call cunning in brutes.—La Fontaine.

Discretion is the perfection of reason, and a guide to win all the duties of life.—Addison.

Never join with your friend when he abuses his horse or his wife, unless the one is about to be sold, and the other to be buried.—Colton.

For 'tis not good that children should know any wickedness: old folks, you know, have discretion, as they say, and know the world.—Shakespeare.

Discretion is more necessary to women than eloquence, because they have less trouble to speak well than to speak little.—Father du Bosc.

There are three things that ought to be considered before some things are spoken,—the manner, the place, and the time.—Southey.

Had Windham possessed discretion in debate, or Sheridan in conduct, they might have ruled their age.—Swift.

Some delicate matters must be treated like pins, because if they are not seized by the right end, we get pricked.—J. Petit-Senn.

Without discretion, people may be overlaid with unreasonable affection, and choked with too much nourishment.—Jeremy Collier.

If a cause be good, the most violent attack of its enemies will not injure it so much as an injudicious defence of it by its friends.—Colton.

Open your purse and your mouth cautiously; and your stock of wealth and reputation shall, at least in repute, be great.—Zimmermann.

Swift calls discretion low prudence; it is high prudence, and one of the most important elements entering into either social or political life.—Chapin.

There is no talent so useful towards rising in the world, or which puts men more out of the reach of fortune, than discretion, a species of lower prudence.—Swift.

If we look into communities and divisions of men, we observe that the discreet man, not the witty, nor the learned, nor the brave, guides the conversation, and gives measure to society.—Addison.

Quoth he, That man is sure to lose,
That fouls his hands with dirty foes;
For where no honor's to be gain'd,
'Tis thrown away in being maintain'd.
—Butler.

You are old;
Nature in you stands on the very verge
Of her confine: you should be ruled and led
By some discretion, that discerns your state
Better than you yourself. —Shakespeare.

I do not contend against the advantages of distrust. In the world we live in, it is but too necessary. Some of old called it the very sinews of discretion.—Burke.

The greatest parts, without discretion, as observed by an elegant writer, may be fatal to their owner; as Polyphemus, deprived of his eyes, was only the more exposed on account of his enormous strength and stature.—Addison.

Jest not openly at those that are simple, but remember how much thou art bound to God, who hath made thee wiser. Defame not any woman publicly, though thou know her to be evil; for those that are faulty cannot endure to be taxed, but will seek to be avenged of thee; and those that are not guilty cannot endure unjust reproach.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Always man needs woman for his friend. He needs her clearer vision, her subtler insight, her softer thought, her winged soul, her pure and tender heart. Always woman needs man to be her friend. She needs the vigor of his purpose, the ardor of his will, his calmer judgment, his braver force of action, his reverence and his devotion.
—Mary Clemm

There is no talent so useful towards rising in the world, or which puts men more out of the power of fortune, than that quality generally possessed by the duller sort of men, and in common speech called "discretion,"—a species of lower prudence, by the assistance of which people of the meanest intellectuals pass through the world in great tranquillity, neither giving nor taking offence. For want of a reasonable infusion of this aldermanly discretion, everything fails.—Swift.

Discretion is the perfection of reason, and a guide to us in all the duties of life; cunning is a kind of instinct, that only looks out after our immediate interests and welfare. Discretion is only found in men of strong sense and good understanding; cunning is often to be met with in brutes themselves, and in persons who are but the fellest removes from them.—Bruyère.

Discrimination

I will buy with you, sell with you, talk with you, walk with you, and so following, but I will not eat with you, drink with you, nor pray with you.—Shakespeare.

You ought to choose both physician and friend, not the most agreeable, but the most useful.—Epictetus.

Discussion

The bitter clamor of two eager tongues.—Shakespeare.

Religious contention is the devil's harvest.—La Fontaine.

Free and fair discussion will ever be found the firmest friend to truth.—George Campbell.

Men are never so likely to settle a question rightly as when they discuss it freely.—Macaulay.

The fair way of conducting a dispute is to exhibit, one by one, the arguments of your opponent, and, with each argument, the precise and specific answer you are able to make to it.—Pailey.

The skilful disputant well knows that he never has his enemy at more advantage than when, by allowing the premises, he shows him arguing wrong from his own principles.—Warburton.

Of a certain class of disputants it has been wittily observed that their conclusions are always right and their reasons for them invariably wrong.—J. C. Jeaffreson.

Whoever is afraid of submitting any question, civil or religious, to the test of free discussion, is more in love with his own opinion than with truth.—Bishop Watson.

The great enemy of knowledge is not error, but inertness. All that we want is discussion; and then we are sure to do well, no matter what our blunders may be. One error conflicts with another, each destroys its opponent, and truth is evolved.—Buckle.

Disease

Disease is the retribution of outraged Nature.—Hosea Ballou.

Disease is a hot-house plant.—Haller.

Desperate diseases need desperate cures.—Proverb.

Just disease to luxury succeeds.—Pope.

Sickness seizes the body from bad ventilation.—Ovid.

Against diseases here the strongest fence, is the defensive virtue, abstinence.—Herrick.

That dire disease, whose ruthless power Withers the beauty's transient flower.—Goldsmith.

This sickness doth infect
The very life-blood of our enterprise.—Shakespeare.

O, he's a limb, that has but a disease;
Mortal, to cut it off; to cure it, easy.—Shakespeare.

He who cures a disease may be the skilfullest, but he that prevents it is the safest physician.—T. Fuller.

Diseases of the mind impair the bodily powers.—Ovid.

A wounded heart can with difficulty be cured.—Goethe.

It is not the disease but neglect of the remedy which generally destroys life.—From the Latin.

Diseases desperate grown
By desperate appliance are reliev'd,
Or not at all. —Shakespeare.

Before the curing of a strong disease, even in the instant of repair and health, the fit is strongest.—Shakespeare.

Decay and disease are often beautiful, like the pearly tear of the shellfish and the hectic glow of consumption.—Thoreau.

A bodily disease which we look upon as whole and entire within itself, may, after all, be but a symptom of some ailment in the spiritual part.—Nath. Hawthorne.

Diseases crucify the soul of man, attenuate our bodies, dry them, wither them, shrivel them up like old apples, make them as so many anatomies.—Burton.

The surest road to health, say what they will,
Is never to suppose we shall be ill.
Most of those evils we poor mortals know
From doctors and imagination flow.
—Churchill.

So when a raging fever burns,
We shift from side to side by turns;
And 'tis a poor relief we gain,
To change the place but keep the pain.
—Watts.

As man, perhaps, the moment of his breath,
Receives the lurking principle of death,
The young disease, that must subdue at length,
Grows with his growth, and strengthens with his strength.
—Pope.

The canker which the trunk conceals is revealed by the leaves, the fruit, or the flower.—Metastasio.

Disenchantment

A blaze first pleases and then tires the sight.—Dr. Johnson.

Which of us that is thirty years old has not had his Pompeii? Deep under ashes lies Life, Youth, the careless sports, the pleasures and passions, the darling joy.—Thackeray.

Year by year, more and more of the world gets disenchanting. Even the icy privacy of the arctic and antarctic circles is invaded. We have played Jack Horner with our earth, till there is never a plum left in it.—Lowell.

Disgrace

No one can disgrace us but ourselves.—J. G. Holland.

Disgrace is the synonym of discovery.—Alfred de Musset.

Come, Death, and snatch me from disgrace.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Dishonor is like the Aaron's Beard in the hedgerows; it can only poison if it be plucked.—Onida.

Reason bears disgrace, courage combats it, patience surmounts it.—Mme. de Sévigné.

Disgrace is immortal, and living even when one thinks it dead.—Plautus.

That only is a disgrace to a man which he has deserved to suffer.—Phædrus.

Could he with reason murmur at his case
Himself sole author of his own disgrace?
—Cowper.

Whatever disgrace we may have deserved, it is almost always in our power to re-establish our character.—La Rochefoucauld.

The unbought grace of life, the cheap defence of nations, the nurse of manly sentiment and heroic enterprise, is gone!—Burke.

It is disgraceful when the passers-by exclaim. "O ancient house, alas, how unlike is thy present master to thy former one."—Cicero.

And wilt thou still be hammering treachery,
To tumble down thy husband and thyself
From top of honour to disgrace's feet?
—Shakespeare.

Since you go where all have gone before, why do you torment your disgraceful life with such mean ambitions, O miser?—Phædrus.

Disguise

We become so accustomed to disguise ourselves to others, that at last we are disguised to ourselves.—La Rochefoucauld.

'Tis great, 'tis manly, to disdain disguise;
It shows our spirit, or it proves our strength.
—Young.

Were we to take as much pains to be what we ought to be as we do to disguise what we really are, we might appear like ourselves without being at the trouble of any disguise at all.—Rochefoucauld.

Disguise, I see, thou art a wickedness,
Wherein the pregnant enemy does much.
How easy is it for the proper false
In women's waxen hearts to set their forms!
Alas, our frailty is the cause, not we:
For, such as we are made of, such are we.
—Shakespeare.

Men would not live long in society, were they not the mutual dupes of each other.—Rochefoucauld.

Dishonesty

Ill-gotten wealth is never stable.—Euripides.

Who purposely cheats his friend, would cheat his God.—Lavater.

What is dishonestly got vanishes in prodigacy.—Cicero.

The gains of the wicked bring short-lived pleasure, but afterwards long-continued grief.—Antiphanes.

Dishonor waits on perfidy. A man should blush to think a falsehood; it is the crime of cowards.—Johnson.

Dishonesty is a forsaking of permanent for temporary advantages.—Bo-vee.

Dishonesty is so grasping it would deceive God Himself, were it possible.—Bancroft.

Dishonest men conceal their faults from themselves as well as others; honest men know and confess them.—Rochefoucauld.

It is hard to say which of the two we ought most to lament,—the unhappy man who sinks under the sense of his dishonor, or him who survives it.—Junius.

That which is won ill, will never wear well, for there is a curse attends it, which will waste it; and the same corrupt dispositions which incline men to the sinful ways of getting, will incline them to the like sinful ways of spending.—Matthew Henry.

If you attempt to beat a man down and to get his goods for less than a fair price, you are attempting to commit burglary, as much as though you broke into his shop to take the things without paying for them. There is cheating on both sides of the counter, and generally less behind it than before it.—Beecher.

I have known a vast quantity of nonsense talked about bad men not looking you in the face. Don't trust that conventional idea. Dishonesty will stare honesty out of countenance any day in the week, if there is anything to be got by it.—Dickens.

Disinterestedness

How difficult it is to get men to believe that any other man can or does act from disinterestedness!—B. R. Haydon.

Men of the world hold that it is impossible to do a disinterested action, except from an interested motive; for the sake of admiration, if for no grosser, more tangible gain. Doubtless they are also convinced that, when the sun is showering light from the sky, he is only standing there to be stared at.

The slightest emotion of disinterested kindness that passes through the mind, improves and refreshes that mind, producing generous thought and noble feeling. We should cherish kind wishes, for a time may come when we may be enabled to put them in practice.—Miss Mitford.

Disobedience

Wherever there is authority, there is a natural inclination to disobedience.—Haliburton.

Of man's first disobedience, and the fruit
Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste Brought death into the world, and all our
woe. —Milton.

She is peevish, sullen, froward,
Proud, disobedient, stubborn, lacking duty;
Neither regarding that she is my child,
Nor fearing me as if I were her father.
—Shakespeare.

Disparagement

They praise, and they admire, they know not what,
And know not whom, but as one leads the other,
And what delight to be by such extoll'd,
To live upon their tongues, and be their talk,
Of whom to be disparaisd were no small praise? —Milton.

My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun;
Coral is far more red than her lips' red:
If snow be white, why then her breasts are dun;

If hairs be wires, black wires grow on her
head.

I have seen roses damask'd, red and white,
But no such roses see I in her cheeks;
And in some perfumes is there more delight
Than in the breath that from my mistress reeks.

I love to hear her speak; yet well I know
That music hath a far more pleasing sound:
I grant, I never saw a goddess go;
My mistress, when she walks, treads on the ground. —Shakespeare.

Disparity

Crabbed age and youth cannot live together:
Youth is full of pleasance, age is full of
care;

Youth like summer morn, age like winter
weather;

Youth like summer brave, age like winter
bare;

Youth is full of sport, age's breath is short;

Youth is nimble, age is lame:
Youth is hot and bold, age is weak and cold;
Youth is wild, and age is tame.

—Shakespeare.

Display

Display is as false as it is costly.—
Franklin.

They that govern most make least noise.—Selden.

Narrow waists and narrow minds go together.—Chamfort.

She who desires to see, desires also to be seen.—Cervantes.

Loud-dressing men and women have also loud characters.—Haliburton.

People newly emerged from obscurity generally launch out into indiscriminate display.—Jean Ingelow.

A fop of fashion is the mercer's friend, the tailor's fool, and his own foe.—Lavater.

Display is like shallow water, where you can see the muddy bottom.—Alphonse Karr.

The lowest people are generally the first to find fault with show or equipage; especially that of a person lately emerged from his obscurity. They never once consider that he is breaking the ice for themselves.—Shenstone.

If a young lady has that discretion and modesty without which all knowledge is little worth, she will never make an ostentatious parade of it, because she will rather be intent on acquiring more than on displaying what she has.—Hannah More.

I have often reflected within myself on this unaccountable humor in wom-ankind of being smitten with everything that is showy and superficial, and on the numberless evils that befall the sex from this light fantastical disposition.—Addison.

The horses which make the most show are, in general, those which advance the least. It is the same with men; and we ought not to confound that perpetual agitation which exhausts itself in vain efforts, with the activity which goes right to the end.—Baron de Stassart.

Beauty gains little, and homeliness and deformity lose much, by gaudy attire. Lysander knew this when he refused the rich garments that the tyrant Dionysius proffered to his daughter, saying that they were fit only to make unhappy faces more remarkable.—Zimmermann.

Dispute

Could we forbear dispute, and practice love, We should agree, as angels do above.

—Waller.

The pain of dispute exceeds by much its utility. All disputation makes the mind deaf; and when people are deaf I am dumb.—Joubert.

'Tis strange how some men's tempers suit, Like bawd and brandy, with dispute, That for their own opinions stand fast, Only to have them claw'd and canvass'd.

—Butler.

The more discussion the better, if passion and personality be eschewed; and discussion, even if stormy, often winnows truth from error—a good never to be expected in an uninquiring age.—Channing.

Some say, compared to Bononcini, That Mynheer Handel's but a ninny; Others aver that he to Handel Is scarcely fit to hold a candle. Strange that all this difference should be 'Twixt Tweedledum and Tweedledee.

—J. Byrom.

It is true there is nothing displays a genius, I mean a quickness of genius, more than a dispute; as two diamonds, encountering, contribute to each other's luster. But perhaps the odds is much against the man of taste in this particular.—Shenstone.

Dissatisfaction

Let not the stream of your life be a murmuring stream.—Aughey.

Opposition embitters the enthusiast, but never converts him.—Schiller.

The fastidious are unfortunate; nothing can satisfy them.—La Fontaine.

Dissension

Dissensions, like small streams at first begun, Unseen they rise, but gather as they run. —Garth.

Civil dissension is a viperous worm That gnaws the bowels of the commonwealth. —Shakespeare.

If they perceive dissension in our looks And that within ourselves we disagree, How will their grudging stomachs be provoked

To wilful disobedience and rebel! —Shakespeare.

Alas! how light a cause may move Dissension between hearts that love! Hearts that the world in vain had tried, And sorrow but more closely tied; That stood the storm, when waves were rough, Yet in a sunny hour fall off. —Moore.

Dissimulation

All men wear a disguised habit.—Terence.

We endeavor to conceal our vices under the disguise of the opposite virtues.—Fielding.

When my love swears that she is made of truth, I do believe her, though I know she lies. —Shakespeare.

He who knows not how to dissimulate knows not how to rule.—Metellus of Macedon.

Away and mock the time with fairest show; False face must hide what false heart doth know. —Shakespeare.

Thus 'tis with all—their chief and constant care Is to seem everything but what they are. —Goldsmith.

We are so much accustomed to disguise ourselves to others that at length we disguise ourselves to ourselves.—Rochefoucauld.

Dissimulation, even the most innocent in its nature, is ever productive of embarrassment; whether the design is evil or not artifice is always dangerous and almost inevitably disgraceful.

—La Bruyere.

Dissimulation is the only thing that makes society possible; without its amenities the world would be a bear-garden.—Ouida.

Dissimulation is but a faint kind of policy or wisdom; for it asketh a strong wit and a strong heart to know when to tell truth, and to do it; therefore, it is the weaker sort of politicians that are the greatest dissemblers.—Bacon.

Dissimulation in youth is the fore-runner of perfidy in old age; its first appearance is the fatal omen of growing depravity and future shame. It degrades parts and learning, obscures the luster of every accomplishment and sinks us into contempt. The path of falsehood is a perplexing maze. After the first departure from sincerity, it is not in our power to stop; one artifice unavoidably leads on to another, till, as the intricacy of the labyrinth increases, we are left entangled in our snare.—Blair.

Dissolution

Like the baseless fabric of this vision,
The cloud-capped towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve;
And, like this insubstantial pageant faded,
Leave not a rack behind. —Shakespeare.

Distance

Distance sometimes endears friendship and absence sweeteneth it.—Howell.

'Tis distance lends enchantment to the view,
And robes the mountain in its azure hue.
—Campbell.

Wishes, like painted landscapes, best delight,
Whilst distance recommends them to the sight,
Plac'd afar off, they beautiful appear:
But show their coarse and nauseous colors near.
—Dr. Yalden.

She pleased while distant, but when near she charm'd.—Shenstone.

Distinction

Distinction, with a broad and powerful fan, puffing at all, winnows the light away.—Shakespeare.

There's but the twinkling of a star
Between a man of peace and war;
A thief and justice, fool and knave.
A huffing officer and a slave;
A crafty lawyer and a pickpocket,
A great philosopher and a blockhead;
A formal preacher and a player,
A learn'd physician and man-slayer.
—Butler.

All that causes one man to differ from another is a very slight thing. What is it that is the origin of beauty or ugliness, health or weakness, ability or stupidity? A slight difference in the organs, a little more or a little less bile. Yet this more or less is of infinite importance to men; and when they think otherwise they are mistaken.—Vauvenargues.

All our distinctions are accidental; beauty and deformity, though personal qualities, are neither entitled to praise nor censure; yet it so happens that they color our opinion of those qualities to which mankind have attached responsibility.—Zimmermann.

Distrust

What loneliness is more lonely than distrust?—George Eliot.

In love the deceit generally outstrips the distrust.—Rochefoucauld.

The best use one can make of his mind is to distrust it.—Fénelon.

A usurper always distrusts the whole world.—Alfieri.

Doubt the man who swears to his devotion.—Mme. Louise Colet.

Women distrust men too much in general, and too little in particular.—Commerson.

It is difficult for a woman to try to be anything good when she is not believed in.—George Eliot.

Jealousy lives upon distrust, becomes madness, or ceases entirely,

when we pass from doubt to certainty.
—Rochefoucauld.

The saddest thing that can befall a soul is when it loses faith in God and woman.
—Alexander Smith.

This feeling of distrust is always the last which a great mind acquires;
he is deceived for a long time.—Racine.

Excessive distrust is not less hurtful than its opposite. Most men become useless to him who is unwilling to risk being deceived.—Vauvenargues.

Zoroaster said, when in doubt abstain;
but this does not always apply.
At cards, when in doubt take the trick.
—H. W. Shaw.

Self-reliance is demanded in woman;
the supreme fall of falls is the first doubt of one's self.—Mme. de Gasparin.

As health lies in labor, and there is no royal road to it but through toil, so there is no republican road to safety
but in constant distrust.—Wendell Phillips.

Three things a wise man will not trust,
The wind, the sunshine of an April day,
And woman's plighted faith. —Southey.

A certain amount of distrust is wholesome, but not so much of others as of ourselves; neither vanity nor conceit can exist in the same atmosphere with it.—Madame Necker.

The doubts of love are never to be wholly overcome; they grow with its various anxieties, timidities, and tenderness, and are the very fruits of the reverence
in which the admired object is beheld.—Jane Porter.

Self-distrust is the cause of most of our failures. In the assurance of strength there is strength, and they are the weakest, however strong, who have no faith in themselves or their powers.—Bovee.

Nothing is more certain of destroying any good feeling that may be cherished towards us than to show distrust.

To be suspected as an enemy is often enough to make a man become so; the whole matter is over, there is no farther use of guarding against it. On the contrary, confidence leads us naturally to act kindly, we are affected by the good opinion which others entertain of us, and we are not easily induced to lose it.—
Madame de Sévigné.

Divinity

There's a Divinity that shapes our ends,
Rough-hew them how we will.
—Shakespeare.

Docility

A docile disposition will, with application, surmount every difficulty.—
Manilius.

Doctor

An ignorant doctor is the aide-de-camp of death.—Abu Avicenna.

By medicine life may be prolonged, yet
Will seize the doctor, too.—Shakespeare.

It is not much trouble to doctor sick folks, but to doctor healthy ones is troublesome.—H. W. Shaw.

Though fancy may be the patient's complaint, necessity is often the doctor's.
—Zimmermann.

The doctor is not unfrequently death's pilot-fish.—G. D. Prentice.

Doctrine

Live to explain thy doctrine by thy life.—Prior.

The question is not whether a doctrine is beautiful, but whether it is true.—
Guesses at Truth.

All sects seem to me to be right in what they assert, and wrong in what they deny.—Goethe.

Every one cleaves to the doctrine he has happened upon, as to a rock against which he has been thrown by tempest.
—Cicero.

Doctrine is nothing but the skin of truth set up and stuffed.—Beecher.

How absurd to try to make two men think alike on matters of religion, when I cannot make two timepieces agree!—Charles V.

Go put your creed into your deed
Nor speak with double tongue.
—Emerson.

"Orthodoxy, my Lord," said Bishop Warburton, in a whisper—"orthodoxy is my doxy—heterodoxy is another man's doxy."—Joseph Priestly.

Doctrine is something that is taught. Applied to religion it is something that God teaches.—Joseph Shipp.

He knew how to weaken his divinity, on occasion, as well as an old housewife to weaken her tea, lest it should keep people awake.—O. W. Holmes.

The Athanasian creed is the most splendid ecclesiastical lyric ever poured forth by the genius of man.—Benj. Disraeli.

Logic has its use and metaphysics has its use, but neither of them is of much help in the making of a creed.—Talmage.

That doctrine which rectifies the conscience, purifies the heart and produces love to God and men is necessarily true.—Walker.

In religion as in politics it so happens that we have less charity for those who believe half our creed, than for those who deny the whole of it.—Colton.

I move for a creed for all our denominations made out of Scripture quotations, pure and simple. That would be impregnable against infidelity and Apollyonic assault. That would be beyond human criticism. Let us make it simpler and plainer for people to get into the Kingdom of God.—Talmage.

Religion, as embodied in the character and conduct of its disciples, cannot survive without doctrinal purity. In the absence of this element, religious feeling inevitably decays; while even religious necessity becomes a thing of naught.—J. McC. Holmes.

Doctrine is the framework of life; it is the skeleton of truth, to be clothed and rounded out by the living graces of a holy life. It is only the lean creature whose bones become offensive.—A. J. Gordon.

Go on your knees before God. Bring all your idols; bring self-will, and pride, and every evil lust before Him, and give them up. Devote yourself, heart and soul, to His will; and see if you do not "know of the doctrine."—H. W. Beecher.

The question is not whether a doctrine is beautiful, but whether it is true. When we want to go to a place, we don't ask whether the road leads through a pretty country, but whether it is the right road, the road pointed out by authority, the turnpike-road.—Hare.

Don't turn your back upon your doctrinal doubts and difficulties. Go up to them and examine them. Perhaps the ghastly object which looks to you in the twilight like a sheeted ghost may prove to be no more than a table-cloth hanging upon a hedge.—A. H. Boyd.

Shall I ask the brave soldier, who fights by my side
In the cause of mankind, if our creeds agree?
Shall I give up the friend I have valued and tried,
If he kneel not before the same altar with me?
From the heretic girl of my soul should I fly,
To seek somewhere else a more orthodox kiss?
No! perish the hearts, and the laws that try Truth, valor, or love, by a standard like this!
—Moore.

As those wines which flow from the first treading of the grape are sweeter and better than those forced out by the press, which gives them the roughness of the husk and stone, so are those doctrines best and sweetest which flow from a gentle crush of the scriptures.

and are not wrung into controversies and commonplaces.—Bacon.

And after hearing what our Church can say,
If still our reason runs another way,
That private reason, 'tis more just to curb,
Than by disputes the public peace disturb;
For points obscure are of small use to learn,

But common quiet is mankind's concern.
—Dryden.

We are not called on to believe this or that doctrine which may be proposed to us till we can do so from honest conviction. But we are called on to trust—to trust ourselves to God, being sure that He will lead us right—to keep close to Him—and to trust the promises which He whispers through our conscience; this we can do, and we ought to do.—J. C. Shairp.

Dog

Every dog must have his day.—Swift.

Let Hercules himself do what he may,
The cat will mew, and dog will have his day.
—Shakespeare.

I am his highness' dog at Kew;
Pray tell me, sir, whose dog are you?
—Pope.

Let dogs delight to bark and bite,
For God hath made them so;
Let bears and lions growl and fight,
For 'tis their nature to. —Watts.

And in that town a dog was found,
As many dogs there be,
Both mongrel, puppy, whelp and hound,
And curs of low degree. —Goldsmith.

I have a dog of Blenheim birth,
With fine long ears and full of mirth;
And sometimes, running o'er the plain,
He tumbles on his nose;
But quickly jumping up again
Like lightning on he goes! —Ruskin.

Ay, in the catalogue ye go for men;
As hounds, and greyhounds, mongrels,
spaniels, curs,
Shoughs, water-rugs, and demi-wolves, are
'clept

All by the name of dogs: the valued file Distinguishes the swift, the slow, the subtle,
The housekeeper, the hunter, every one
According to the gift which bounteous nature
Hath in him closed. —Shakespeare.

We are two travelers, Roger and I.
Roger's my dog—come here, you scamp!
Jump for the gentleman—mind your eye!
Over the table—look out for the lamp!
The rogue is growing a little old;
Five years we've tramped through wind and
weather,
And slept out-doors when nights were cold,
And ate and drank and starved together.
—John T. Trowbridge.

Dogmatism

Nothing can be more unphilosophical than to be positive or dogmatical on any subject.—Hume.

They utter all they think with violence.—Ben Jonson.

When men are the most sure and arrogant, they commonly are the most mistaken.—Hume.

Those who differ most from the opinions of their fellow men are the most confident of the truth of their own.—Mackintosh.

He who is certain, or presumes to say he knows, is, whether he be mistaken or in the right, a dogmatist.—William Fleming.

Those who refuse the long drudgery of thought, and think with the heart rather than the head, are ever the most fiercely dogmatic in tone.—Bayne.

It is a wrong use of my understanding to make it the rule and measure of another man's—a use which it is neither fit for nor capable of.—Locke.

A dogmatical spirit inclines a man to be censorious of his neighbors. Every one of his opinions appears to him written, as it were, with sunbeams, and he grows angry that his neighbors do not see it in the same light. He is tempted to disdain his correspondents as men of low and dark understandings because they do not believe what he does.—Watts.

Nothing can be more unphilosophical than to be positive or dogmatical on any subject; and even if excessive scepticism could be maintained it would not be more destructive to all just reasoning and inquiry. When men are the most sure and arrogant, they are commonly the most mistaken, and have there given reins to passion, without that proper deliberation and suspense which can alone secure them from the grossest absurdities.—Hume.

Domesticity

Home joys are blessed of heaven.—Seneca.

Home is the sacred refuge of our life.—Dryden.

Home is the chief school of human virtue.—Channing.

A cottage will hold as much happiness as would stock a palace.—James Hamilton.

Home should be the center of joy, equatorial and tropical.—Beecher.

Silence and chaste reserve is woman's genuine praise, and to remain quiet within the house.—Euripides.

Apelles used to paint a good housewife on a snail, to import that she was home-keeping.—James Howell.

Domestic happiness, thou only bliss of paradise that hath survived the fall.—Cowper.

The sober comfort, all the peace which springs from the large aggregate of little things.—Hannah More.

Lord Lyttleton says true domestic bliss shuns too strong a light.—J. C. Hare.

A prince wants only the pleasure of private life to complete his happiness.—Bruyère.

Women do act their part when they do make their ordered houses know them.—Sheridan Knowles.

A woman is not a woman until she has been baptized in her love and devotion to home and children.—Mrs. F. C. Croly.

The nest may be constructed, so far as the sticks go, by the male bird; but only the hen can line it with moss and down!—Frances Power Cobbe.

The grandest of heroic deeds are those which are performed within four walls and in domestic privacy.—Richter.

Only so far as a man is happily married to himself is he fit for married life, and family life generally.—Novalis.

The parted bosom clings to wonted home, if aught that's kindred cheer the welcome hearth.—Byron.

Domestic happiness is the end of almost all our pursuits, and the common reward of all our pains.—Fielding.

The domestic man, who loves no music so well as his kitchen clock, and the airs which the logs sing to him as they burn on the hearth, has solaces which others never dream of.—Emerson.

The only fountain in the wilderness of life, where man drinks of water totally unmingled with bitterness, is that which gushes for him in the calm and shady recess of domestic life.—William Penn.

The best school of discipline is home. Family life is God's own method of training the young, and homes are very much as women make them.—Samuel Smiles.

She was little known beyond her home; but there she silently spread around her that soft, pure light, the preciousness of which is never fully understood till it is quenched.—Channing.

Oh, trebly blest the placid lot of those whose hearth foundations are in pure love laid, where husband's breast with tempered ardor glows, and wife, oft mother, is in heart a maid!—Euripides.

The man at the head of the house can mar the pleasure of the household, but he cannot make it; that must rest with the woman, and it is her great privilege.—Arthur Helps.

Housekeepers, homemakers, wives, and mothers are fundamental social relations, which rest upon woman's characteristics, physical, mental, and moral.—R. Herbert Newton.

A house kept to the end of prudence is laborious without joy; a house kept to the end of display is impossible to all but a few women, and their success is dearly bought.—Emerson.

No money is better spent than what is laid out for domestic satisfaction. A man is pleased that his wife is dressed as well as other people, and the wife is pleased that she is dressed.—Johnson.

Our notion of the perfect society embraces the family as its center and ornament. Nor is there a paradise planted until the children appear in the foreground, to animate and complete the picture.—Alcott.

Father, mother, child, are the human trinity, whose substance must not be divided nor its persons confounded. As well reconstruct your granite out of all the real ease and satisfaction in existence.—Harriet Prescott Spofford.

If a woman is not fit to manage the internal matters of a house, she is fit for nothing, and should never be put in a house or over a house, any way. Good housekeeping lies at the root of all the real ease and satisfaction in existence.—Harriet Prescott Spofford.

Men talk in raptures of youth and beauty, wit and sprightliness; but after seven years of union not one of them is to be compared to good family management, which is seen at every meal, and felt every hour in the husband's purse.—Witherspoon.

Domestic happiness is the end of almost all our pursuits, and the common reward of all our pains. When men find themselves forever barred from this delightful fruition, they are lost to all industry, and grow careless of all their worldly affairs. Thus they become bad subjects, bad relations, bad friends, and bad men.—Fielding.

Dominion Day

We are here a nation, composed of the most heterogeneous elements—Protestants and Catholics, English, French, German, Irish, Scotch, every one, let it be remembered, with his traditions, with his prejudices. In each of these conflicting antagonistic elements, however, there is a common spot of patriotism, and the only true policy is that which reaches that common patriotism and makes it vibrate in all toward common ends and common aspirations.—Wilfrid Laurier.

Ye sons of Canada, awake!
Stretch forth the mighty arm of toil;
Embattle, beautify the soil
Your fathers won by brave turmoil;
And, while your glory swells, behold
Your virgin empire still unfold
Her halcyon hope, her wealth untold.

—A. M. Taylor.

Blest land of peace!—O may'st thou ever
be
Even as now the land of liberty!
Treading serenely thy bright upward road,
Honored of nations, and approved of God!
On thy fair front emblazoned clear and
bright—

Freedom, fraternity, and equal right!

—Pamela S. Vining.

One hundred years have passed away since the conquest of Quebec, but here we sit, the children of the victor and the vanquished, all avowing hearty attachment to the British crown, all earnestly deliberating how we shall best extend the blessings of British institutions: how a great people may be established on this continent, in close and hearty connection with Great Britain. Where, sir, in the page of history, shall we find a parallel to this? Will it not stand as an imperishable monument to the generosity of British rule? And it is not in Canada alone that this scene has been witnessed. Four other colonies are at this moment occupied as we are—declaring their hearty love for the parent state, and deliberating with us how they may best discharge the great duty entrusted to their hands, and give their aid in developing the teeming resources of these vast possessions.—Hon. George Brown.

We should strengthen the faith of our people in their own future, the faith of every Canadian in Canada, and of every province in its sister province. This faith wrongs no one; burdens no one; menaces no one; dishonors no one; and, as it was said of old, faith moves mountains, so I venture reverently to express my own belief that if the difficulties of our future as a dominion were as high as the peaks of the Alps or Andes, yet that the pure patriotic faith of a united people would be all sufficient to overcome and ultimately to triumph over all such difficulties.—Hon. D'Arcy McGee.

We wear no haughty tyrant's chain—

We bend no servile knee,
When to the mistress of the main
We pledge our fealty.

She binds us with the cords of love—

All others we disown;
The rights we owe to God above
We yield to Him alone.

May He our future course direct
By His unerring hand;

Our laws and liberties protect,
And bless our native land!

—Helen M. Johns.

Here's to the land of the rock and the pine;
Here's to the land of the raft and the river!

Here's to the land where the sunbeams shine,

And the night that is bright with the north-light's quiver!

Here's to the land of the ax and the hoe!
Here's to the stalwarts that give them their glory—

With stroke upon stroke, and with blow upon blow,

The might of the forest has passed into story!
—William Wye Smith.

Other countries have seen their territories enlarged and their destinies determined by trouble and war, but no blood has stained the bonds which have knit together your free and order-loving populations, and yet in this brief period, so brief in the life of a nation, you have attained to a union whose characteristics from sea to sea are the same. A judicature above suspicion, a strong central government to direct all national interests, the toleration of all faiths with favor to none, a franchise recognizing the rights of labor by the exclusion only of the idler, a government ever susceptible to the change of public opinion and ever open, through a responsible ministry, to the scrutiny of the people—these are the features of your rising power.—Lord Lorne.

He must have a dull and sluggish soul who can look without emotion on the quiet graves of the early settlers of this country, who can tread upon their moldering bones without a thought of their privations and their toils, who can, from their tombs, look out upon the rural loveliness—the fruitfulness and peace by which he is surrounded, nor drop a tear to the memories of the dead, who won, by the stoutness of their hearts, and the sweat of their brows, the blessings their children have only to cherish and enjoy.

Why should not these three great branches of the family flourish, under different systems of government, it may be, but forming one grand whole, proud of a common origin and of their advanced civilization? The clover lifts its trefoil leaves to the evening dew, yet they draw their nourishment from a single stem. Thus distinct, and yet united, let us live and flourish. Why should we not? For nearly two thousand years we were one family. Our fathers fought side by side at Hastings, and heard the curfew toll. They fought in the same ranks for the sepulchre of our Saviour. In the earlier and later civil wars, we can wear our white and red roses without a blush, and glory in the principles those conflicts established. Our common ancestors won the great charter and the bill of rights—established free parliaments, the habeas corpus, and trial by jury. Our jurisprudence comes down from Coke and Mansfield to Marshall and Story, rich in knowledge and experience which no man can divide. From Chaucer to Shakespeare our literature is a common inheritance. Tennyson and Longfellow write in one language, which is enriched by the genius developed on either side of the Atlantic. In the great navigators from Cortereal to Hudson, and in all their "moving accidents by flood and field" we have a common interest.—Joseph Howe.

Awake, my country, the hour of dreams is done.

Doubt not, nor dread the greatness of thy fate,

Tho' faint souls fear the keen, confronting sun

And fain would bid the morn in splendor wait!

Tho' dreamers wrapped in starry visions cry:

"Lo, yon thy future, yon thy faith, thy fame!"

And stretch vain hands to stars. Thy fame is nigh,

Here in Canadian hearth, and home and name;

This name which yet shall grow till all the nations know

Us for a patriot people, heart and hand, Loyal to our native hearth, our native land.

—C. D. Roberts.

What can we say as to our future? What of our destiny? Our destiny under a kind Providence will be just what we will make it. It rests in our own hands. We may in the face of all our advantages mar it if we will. As it is with individual destiny, so is it with national destiny; we are largely the architects of our own fortunes. We have laid, as I have shown, deep and safe and broad foundations for a bright future. What country can show legislation more advanced or leading up to better results than ours? In what land do we find a people enjoying more fully than we do the rights of self-government, or where is there a people more fitted to be entrusted with that precious right? Our laws have been well administered. Our courts of justice have won the unlimited confidence of the people. Imbued with the healthy sentiment which has prevailed in the mother land for centuries, attached to her forms of government, cherishing her precedents and traditions, we have passed from childhood to youth. We are approaching manhood, and its strength and vigor must depend upon ourselves. What is needed, then? We must appease inter-provincial jealousies; we must modify mere local patriotism; we must cultivate an increased national feeling and show in every way we can that we have crossed the line of youth and pupillage.—Richard Harcourt.

Doubt

Doubt indulged soon becomes doubt realized.—F. R. Havergal.

When you doubt, abstain.—Zoroaster.

Human knowledge is the parent of doubt.—Lord Greville.

Doubt is the accomplice of tyranny.—Amiel.

When in doubt, lean to the side of mercy.—Cervantes.

Misgive that you may not mistake.—Whately.

Doubt is hell in the human soul.—Mme. de Gasparin.

To be once in doubt is once to be resolved.—Shakespeare.

Our distrust justifies the deceit of others.—Rochefoucauld.

Doubt is the vestibule of faith.—Colton.

Doubt is the shadow of truth.—Bailey.

I love sometimes to doubt, as well as know.—Dante.

Man was not made to question, but adore.—Young.

There lives more faith in honest doubt, Believe me, than in half the creeds.

—Tennyson.

Doubt comes in at the window when inquiry is denied at the door.—Prof. Jowett.

Doubting charms me not less than knowledge.—Dante.

Every body drags its shadow, and every mind its doubt.—Victor Hugo.

Never do anything, concerning the rectitude of which you have a doubt.
—Pliny, Junior.

I run the gauntlet of a file of doubts,
Each one of which down hurls me to the ground.
—Bailey.

Who never doubted never half believed,
Where doubt there truth is—'tis her shadow.
—Bailey.

To believe with certainty we must begin to doubt.—Stanislaus.

A bitter and perplexed "What shall I do?"
Is worse to man than worse necessity.
—Coleridge.

Many with trust, with doubt few, are undone.—Greville.

Modest doubt is call'd
The beacon of the wise.
—Shakespeare.

Uncertain ways unsafest are,
And doubt a greater mischief than despair.
—Sir John Denham.

Who knows most, doubts most; entertaining hope means recognizing fear.—Browning.

Doubt springs from the mind; faith is the daughter of the soul.—J. Petit-Senn.

Galileo called doubt the father of invention; it is certainly the pioneer.—Bovee.

No sadder proof can be given by a man of his own littleness than disbelief in great men.—Carlyle.

There is no weariness like that which rises from doubting. It is unfixed reason.—South.

Faith keeps many doubts in her pay. If I could not doubt, I should not believe.—Thoreau.

Doubt follows white-winged hope with trembling steps.—Balzac.

The doubts of an honest man contain more moral truth than the profession of faith of people under a worldly yoke.—X. Doudan.

We know accurately only when we know little; with knowledge doubt increases.—Goethe.

You prove but too clearly that seeking to know
Is too frequently learning to doubt.
—Madame Deshoulières.

Our doubts are traitors
And make us lose the good we oft might win,
By fearing to attempt. —Shakespeare.

Weary the path that does not challenge reason. Doubt is an incentive to truth, and patient inquiry leadeth the way.—Hosea Ballou.

Servile doubt argues an impotence of mind, that says we fear because we dare not meet misfortunes.—Aaron Hill.

To doubt is worse than to have lost; and to despair is but to antedate those miseries that must fall on us.—Masingier.

But the gods are dead—
Ay, Zeus is dead, and all the gods but Doubt,
And Doubt is brother devil to Despair!
—John Boyle O'Reilly.

In contemplation, if a man begin with certainties, he shall end in doubts, but if he will be content to begin with doubts, he shall end in certainties.—Bacon.

Can that which is the greatest virtue in philosophy, doubt (called by Galileo the father of invention), be in religion what the priests term it, the greatest of sins?—Bovee.

The wound of peace is surety, surety secure; but modest doubt is called the beacon of the wise; the tent that searches to the bottom of the worst.—Shakespeare.

Doubt thou the stars are fire;
Doubt that the sun doth move;
Doubt truth to be a liar;
But never doubt, I love.
—Shakespeare.

To doubt is a misfortune, but to seek when in doubt is an indispensable duty. So he who doubts and seeks not is at once unfortunate and unfair.—Pascal.

Fain would I but I dare not; I dare, and yet I may not;
I may, although I care not for pleasure when I play not.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Remember Talleyrand's advice, "If you are in doubt whether to write a letter or not, don't!" The advice applies to many doubts in life besides that of letter-writing.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Known mischiefs have their cure; but doubts have none;
And better is despair than fruitless hope
Mix'd with a killing fear. —May.

Beware of doubt—faith is the subtle chain
Which binds us to the infinite: the voice
Of a deep life within, that will remain Until we crowd it thence.
—Mrs. E. Oakes Smith.

Give unqualified assent to no propositions but those the truth of which is so clear and distinct that they cannot be doubted. The enunciation of this first great commandment of science consecrated doubt.—Huxley.

People, when asked if they are Christians, give some of the strangest answers you ever heard. Some will say if you ask them: "Well—well—well, I—I hope I am." Suppose a man should ask me if I am an American. Would I say: "Well, I—well, I—I hope I am?"—D. L. Moody.

The clear, cold question chills to frozen doubt;
Tired of beliefs, we dread to live without;
O then, if reason waver at thy side,
Let humbler Memory be thy gentle guide,
Go to thy birth-place, and, if faith was there,
Repeat thy father's creed, thy mother's prayer.
—O. W. Holmes.

To get rid of your doubts, part with your sin. Put away your intemperance, your dishonesty, your unlawful ways of making money, your sensuality, your falsehood, acted or spoken, and see if a holy life be not the best disperser of unwelcome doubts, and new obedience the most certain guide to fresh assurance.—James Hamilton.

There is no weariness like that which rises from doubting, from the perpetual jogging of unfixed reason. The torment of suspense is very great; and as soon as the wavering, perplexed mind begins to determine, be the determination which way soever, it will find itself at ease.—South.

Nothing is more perplexing than the power, but nothing is more durable than the dynasty of doubt; for he reigns in the hearts of all his people, but gives satisfaction to none of them, and yet he is the only despot who can never die while any of his subjects live.—Colton.

When we are in doubt and puzzle out the truth by our own exertions, we have gained a something that will stay by us, and which will serve us again. But, if to avoid the trouble of the search, we avail ourselves of the superior information of a friend, such knowledge will not remain with us; we have not bought, but borrowed it.—Colton.

Life's sunniest hours are not without
The shadow of some lingering doubt—
Amid its brightest joys will steal
Spectres of evil yet to feel—
Its warmest love is blent with fears,
Its confidence a trembling one—
Its smile—the harbinger of tears—
Its hope—the change of April's sun!
A weary lot—in mercy given,
To fit the chastened soul for heaven.
—Whittier.

Cold hearts are not anxious enough to doubt. Men who love will have their misgivings at times; that is not the evil. But the evil is, when men go on in that languid, doubting way, content to doubt, proud of their doubts, morbidly glad to talk about them, liking the romantic gloom of twilight, without the manliness to say, "I must and will know the truth." That did not John the Baptist. Brethren, John appealed to Christ.—F. W. Robertson.

You ask bitterly, like Pontius Pilate, "What is truth?" In such an hour what remains? I reply, "Obedience." Leave those thoughts for the present. Act—be merciful and gentle—honest; force yourself to abound in little services; try to do good to others; be true in the duty that you know. That must be right, whatever else is uncertain. And by all the laws of the human heart, by the word of God, you shall not be left to doubt. Do that much of the will of God which is plain to you, and "You shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God."—F. W. Robertson.

Of the terrible doubt of appearances,
Of the uncertainty after all, that we may be deluded.

That maybe reliance and hope are but speculations after all.

That maybe identity beyond the grave is a beautiful fable only.

Maybe the things I perceive, the animals, plants, men, hills, shining and flowing waters,

The skies of day and night, colors, densities, forms, maybe these are (as doubtless they are) only apparitions, and the real something has yet to be known.

—Walt. Whitman.

Fear not to confront realities. The Saviour lives; and the first joy that you will give to Him is when, leaving off your false excuses, you throw yourself with a full heart and empty hands into His arms of mercy. The Saviour lives; and were you now to die looking for salvation only from that Friend of Sinners, verily this day should you be with Him in a better than Adam's paradise. The Saviour lives; and in full sympathy with that wondrous lover of men's souls, the Holy Spirit is even now ready if besought to begin His sanctifying process in your mind. The Saviour lives; and even now He stretches out toward you an arm which, if you only grasp in thankful love, your faith shall strengthen while you cling, and it will be from no weakness in that arm, if you are not ere long exalted to a point of holy attainment which at this moment you view with despair, and by and by to that region of unveiled realities where you will ask in wonder at yourself, "Wherefore did I doubt?"

—James Hamilton.

Dove

And there my little doves did sit
With feathers softly brown
And glittering eyes that showed their right
To general Nature's deep delight.

—E. B. Browning.

The thrustelcok made cek hir lay,
The wode dove upon the spray
She sang ful loude and cleere.

—Chaucer.

As when the dove returning bore the mark
Of earth restored to the long laboring ark;
The relics of mankind, secure of rest,
Oped every window to receive the guest,
And the fair bearer of the message bless'd.

—Dryden.

Oh! when 'tis summer weather,
And the yellow bee, with fairy sound,
The waters clear is humming round,
And the cuckoo sings unseen,
And the leaves are waving green—

Oh! then 'tis sweet,

In some retreat,

To hear the murmuring dove,
With those whom on earth alone we love,
And to wind through the greenwood together.

—Rev. Wm. Lisle Bowles.

Drama

The drama is the book of the people.
—Willmott.

The drama's laws the drama's patrons give,
For we that live to please, must please to live.

—Dr. Johnson.

A passion for the dramatic art is inherent in the nature of man.—Edwin Forrest.

All the world's a stage, and all the men and women merely players.—Shakespeare.

It is remarkable how virtuous and generously disposed every one is at a play.—Hazlitt.

The seat of wit, when one speaks as a man of the town and the world, is the playhouse.—Steele.

The real object of the drama is the exhibition of the human character.—Macaulay.

Men of wit, learning and virtue might strike out every offensive or unbecoming passage from plays.—Swift.

The drama is the looking-glass in which we see the hideousness of vice and the beauties of virtue.—Frances Anne Kemble.

Dramatical or representative poetry is, as it were, a visible history; for it sets out the image of things as if they were present.—Bacon.

The propriety of thoughts and words, which are the hidden beauties of a play, are but confusedly judged in the vehemence of action.—Dryden.

I maintain, against the enemies of the stage, that patterns of piety, decently represented, may second the precepts.—Dryden.

There is so much of the glare and grief of life connected with the stage that it fills me with most solemn thoughts.—Henry Giles.

The business of the dramatist is to keep himself out of sight, and to let nothing appear but his characters. As soon as he attracts notice to his personal feelings, the illusion is broken.—Macaulay.

On the Greek stage a drama, or acted story, consisted in reality of three dramas, called together a trilogy, and performed consecutively in the course of one day.—Coleridge.

Every movement of the theater by a skilful poet is communicated, as it were, by magic, to the spectators; who weep, tremble, resent, rejoice, and are inflamed with all the variety of passions which actuate the several personages of the drama.—Hume.

The drama embraces and applies all the beauties and decorations of poetry. The sister arts attend and adorn it. Painting, architecture, and music are her handmaids. The costliest lights of a people's intellect burn at her show. All ages welcome her.—Willmott.

The tragedy of "Hamlet" is critically considered to be the masterpiece of dramatic poetry; and the tragedy of "Hamlet" is also, according to the testimony of every sort of manager, the play of all others which can invariably be depended on to fill a theater.—G. A. Sala.

The dramatist, like the poet, is born, not made. * * * There must be inspiration back of all true and permanent art, dramatic or otherwise, and art is universal: there is nothing national about it. Its field is humanity, and it takes in all the world; nor does anything else afford the refuge that is provided by it from all troubles and all the vicissitudes of life.—William Winter.

The drama is not a mere copy of nature, not a facsimile. It is the free running hand of genius, under the impression of its liveliest wit or most passionate impulses, a thousand times adorning or feeling all as it goes; and you must read it, as the healthy instinct of audiences almost always does, if the critics will let them alone, with a grain of allowance, and a tendency to go away with as much of it for use as is necessary, and the rest for the luxury of laughter, pity, or poetical admiration.—Leigh Hunt.

Dreams

The visions of a busy brain.—Joanna Baillie.

The fickle pensioners of Morpheus' train.—Milton.

Our waking dreams are fatal.—Young.

But if, as morning rises, dreams are true.—Dante.

A change came o'er the spirit of my dream.—Byron.

His fancy lost in pleasant dreams.—Addison.

Yet eat in dreams, the custard of the day.—Pope.

A dream itself is but a shadow.—Shakespeare.

For dhreams always go by contraries, my dear.—Samuel Lover.

Ground not upon dreams, you know they are ever contrary.—Thos. Middleton.

Sleep brings dreams; and dreams are often most vivid and fantastical before we have yet been wholly lost in slumber.—Robert Montgomery Bird.

Dreams are excursions into the limbo of things, a semi-deliverance from the human prison.—Amiel.

Our dreams drench us in sense, and sense steepens us again in dreams.—A.
Bronson Alcott.

But dreams full off are found of real events
The form and shadows. —Joanna Baillie.

As a wild maiden, with love-drinking eyes, sees in sweet dreams a beaming youth of glory.—Alexander Smith.

Like the dreams,
Children of night, of indigestion bred.
—Churchill.

The dreamer is a madman quiescent,
the madman is a dreamer in action.—
F. H. Hedge.

Regard not dreams, since they are but the images of our hopes and fears.
—Cato.

We are near waking when we dream that we dream.—Novalis.

Let not our babbling dreams affright
our souls.—Shakespeare.

When monarch reason sleeps, this mimic wakes.—Dryden.

For his dreams, I wonder he's so simple to trust the mockery of unquiet slumbers.—Shakespeare.

If I may trust the flattering truth of sleep,
My dreams presage some joyful news at hand. —Shakespeare.

When we die, we shall find we have not lost our dreams; we have only lost our sleep.—Richter.

In waking whispers and repeated dreams, to hint pure thoughts and warn the favored soul.—Thomson.

Dreams where thought, in fancy's maze, runs mad.—Young.

Dreams are like portraits; and we find they please because they are confessed resemblances.—Crabbe.

In sleep, when fancy is let loose to play,
Our dreams repeat the wishes of the day.
—Claudius.

Till their own dreams at length deceive 'em,
And, oft repeating, they believe 'em.
—Prior.

Beneath closed lids and folds of deepest shade we think we see.—N. L.
Frothingham.

Friday night's dreams on Saturday told
Are sure to come true—be they never so old. —Old Sayings.

There are a kind of men so loose of soul
That in their sleep will utter their affairs.
—Shakespeare.

I have had a most rare vision. I have had a dream—past the wit of man to say what dream it was.—
Shakespeare.

The day seems long, but night is odious; no sleep, but dreams; no dreams but visions strange.—Sir P.
Sidney.

Alas! that dreams are only dreams!
That fancy cannot give
A lasting beauty to those forms,
Which scarce a moment live!
—Rufus Dawes.

What studies please, what most delight,
And fill men's thoughts, they dream them
o'er at night. —Creech.

Sorrow returned with the dawning of morn, and the voice in my dreaming ear melted away.—Campbell.

Every one turns his dreams into realities as far as he can; man is cold as ice to the truth, hot as fire to falsehood.—La Fontaine.

We are such stuff
As dreams are made on, and our little life
Is rounded with a sleep. —Shakespeare.

In this retirement of the mind from the senses, it retains a yet more incorherent manner of thinking, which we call dreaming.—Locke.

As dreams are the fancies of those that sleep, so fancies are but the dreams of those awake.—Sir T. P. Blount.

True, I talk of dreams,
Which are the children of an idle brain,
Begot of nothing but vain fantasy.
—Shakespeare.

A body may as well lay too little as too much stress upon a dream; but the less he heed them the better.—L'Estrange.

Nothing so much convinces me of the boundlessness of the human mind as its operations in dreaming.—W. B. Clulow.

For never yet one hour in his bed
Have I enjoyed the golden dew of sleep,
But have been waked by his timorous dreams.
—Shakespeare.

Dreaming is an act of pure imagination, attesting in all men a creative power which, if it were available in waking, would make every man a Dante or a Shakespeare.—F. H. Hedge.

I'll dream no more—by manly mind
Not even in sleep is will resigned.
My midnight orisons said o'er,
I'll turn to rest, and dream no more.
—Scott.

Dreams are the children of an idle brain, begot of nothing but vain fantasy; which is as thin of substance as the air, and more inconstant than the wind.—Shakespeare.

Divinity hath oftentimes descended
Upon our slumbers, and the blessed troupes
Have, in the calm and quiet of the soule, Conversed with us.
—Shirley.

That holy dream—that holy dream,
While all the world were chiding,
Hath cheered me as a lovely beam
A lonely spirit guiding.
—Poe.

I believe it to be true that dreams are the true interpreters of our inclinations; but there is art required to sort and understand them.—Montaigne.

What the tender and poetic youth dreams to-day, and conjures up with inarticulate speech, is to-morrow the vociferated result of public opinion, and the day after is the character of nations.—Emerson.

Dreams are rudiments
Of the great state to come. We dream what is
About to happen.
—Bailey.

One of those passing rainbow dreams,
Half light, half shade, which fancy's beams
Paint on the fleeting mists that roll,
In trance or slumber, round the soul!
—Moore.

Some dreams we have are nothing else but dreams,
Unnatural and full of contradictions;
Yet others of our most romantic schemes
Are something more than fictions.
—Hood.

The dream
Dreamed by a happy man, when the dark east,
Unseen, is brightening to his bridal morn.
—Tennyson.

'Twas but a dream—let it pass—let it vanish like so many others!
What I thought was a flower is only a weed, and is worthless.
—Longfellow.

In blissful dream, in silent night,
There came to me, with magic might,
With magic might, my own sweet love,
Into my little room above.
—Heine.

Dream after dream ensues;
And still they dream that they shall still succeed;
And still are disappointed.
—Cowper.

The chambers in the house of dreams
Are fed with so divine an air,
That Time's hoar wings grow young therein,
And they who walk there are most fair.
—Francis Thomson.

Dreams, which, beneath the hov'ring shades
of night,
Sport with the ever-restless minds of men,
Descend not from the gods. Each busy brain
Creates its own.—Thomas Love Peacock.

Dreams are the bright creatures of poem and legend, who sport on the earth in the night season, and melt away with the first beam of the sun.

which lights grim care and stern reality on their daily pilgrimage through the world.—Dickens.

In this world of dreams, I have chosen my part.

To sleep for a season and hear no word
Of true love's truth or of light love's art,
Only the song of a secret bird.

—Swinburne.

If we can sleep without dreaming, it is well that painful dreams are avoided. If, while we sleep, we can have any pleasing dreams, it is as the French say, tant gagné, so much added to the pleasure of life.—Franklin.

Dreams in their development have breath, And tears, and tortures. and the touch of joy,

They have a weight upon our waking thoughts,

They take a weight from off our waking toils,

They do divide our being. —Byron.

Oh! I have pass'd a miserable night,
So full of ugly sights, of ghastly dreams,
That, as I am a Christian faithful man,
I would not spend another such a night,
Though 'twere to buy a world of happy days.

—Shakespeare.

And yet, as angels in some brighter dreams
Call to the soul when man doth sleep,
So some strange thoughts transcend our wonted dreams,
And into glory peep.

—Vaughan.

When to soft Sleep we give ourselves away,
And in a dream as in a fairy bark
Drift on and on through the enchanted dark

To purple daybreak—little thought we pay
To that sweet bitter world we know by day.

—T. B. Aldrich.

We are somewhat more than ourselves in our sleep; and the slumber of the body seems to be but the waking of the soul. It is the ligation of sense, but the liberty of reason; and our waking conceptions do not match the fancies of our sleeps.—Sir Thomas Browne.

I believe that everyone, some time or other, dreams that he is reading papers, books, or letters; in which case the invention prompts so readily that the mind is imposed upon, and mistakes its own suggestions for the composition of another.—Addison.

As one who in some frightful dream would shun

His pressing foe, labors in vain to run
And his own slowness in his sleep bemoans.
In short thick sighs, weak cries, and tender groans.

—Dryden.

I dreamt my lady came and found me dead.
(Strange dream! that gives a dead man leave to think),

And breath'd such life with kisses in my lips

That I reviv'd, and was an emperor.

—Shakespeare.

Sweet sleep be with us, one and all!

And if upon its stillness fall

The visions of a busy brain,

We'll have our pleasure o'er again,

To warm the heart, to charm the sight,

Gay dreams to all! good night, good night.

—Joanna Baillie.

What was your dream?

It seemed to me that a woman in white raiment, graceful and fair to look upon, came towards me and calling me by name said:

On the third day, Socrates, thou shalt reach the coast of fertile Phthia.

—Plato.

The fisher droppeth his net in the stream,
And a hundred streams are the same as one;

And the maiden dreameth her love-lit dream;

And what is it all, when all is done?

The net of the fisher the burden breaks

And always the dreaming the dreamer wakes.

—Alice Cary.

And the dream that our mind had sketched in haste

Shall others continue, but never complete.
For none upon earth can achieve his scheme;

The best as the worst are futile here:

We wake at the self-same point of the dream—

All is here begun, and finished elsewhere.

—Victor Hugo.

In dreams we are true poets; we create the persons of the drama; we give them appropriate figures, faces, costumes; they are perfect in their organs, attitudes, manners; moreover they speak after their own characters, not ours; and we listen with surprise to what they say.—Emerson.

Dreams ought to produce no conviction whatever on philosophical minds. If we consider how many dreams are dreamt every night, and how many events occur every day, we shall no longer wonder at those accidental coincidences which ignorance mistakes for verifications.—Colton.

Thy spirit within thee hath been so at war,
And thus hath so bestirr'd thee in thy sleep
That beads of sweat have stood upon thy
brow

Like bubbles in a late-disturbed stream:
And in thy face strange motions have appear'd,

Such as we see when men restrain their breath
On some great sudden haste.

—Shakespeare.

Those dreams, that on the silent night intrude,
And with false flitting shades our minds delude,

Jove never sends us downward from the
skies;

Nor can they from infernal mansions rise;
But are all mere productions of the brain,
And fools consult interpreters in vain.

—Swift.

Metaphysicians have been learning their lessons for the last four thousand years, and it is high time that they should now begin to teach us something. Can any of the tribe inform us why all the operations of the mind are carried on with undiminished strength and activity in dreams, except the judgment, which alone is suspended and dormant?—Colton.

Dress

The dress does not make the monk.
—Rabelais.

Dress changes the manners.—Voltaire.

A saint in crape is twice a saint in lawn.—Pope.

Dress is an index of your contents.
—Lavater.

She bears a duke's revenues on her back.—Shakespeare.

His dress was a volcano of silk with lava buttons.—Sydney Smith.

Ridiculous modes, invented by ignorance, and adopted by folly.—Smollett.

Dress does not give knowledge.—Yriarte.

Out of clothes out of countenance, out of countenance out of wit.—Ben Jonson.

Oft in dreams invention we bestow to change a flounce or add a furbelow.
—Pope.

No man is esteemed for gay garments but by fools and women.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Eat to please thyself, but dress to please others.—Franklin.

Who seems most hideous when adorned the most.—Ariosto.

The only medicine which does women more good than harm is dress.—Richter.

It is not every man who can afford to wear a shabby coat.—Colton.

In the matter of dress one should always keep below one's ability.—Montesquieu.

In clothes clean and fresh there is a kind of youth with which age should surround itself.—Joubert.

No real happiness is found
In trailing purple o'er the ground.
—Parnell.

Gay mellow silks her mellow charms infold, and nought of Lyce but herself is old.—Young.

My dear, your everlasting blue velvet quite tires me.—Thackeray.

The fashion wears out more apparel than the man.—Shakespeare.

Next to dressing for a rout or ball, undressing is a woe.—Byron.

In cloths cheap handsomeness doth bear the bell.—George Herbert.

The wanton lawns, more soft and white than milk.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Beauty, like truth, never is so glorious as when it goes plainest.—Sterne.

There can be no kernel in this light nut; the soul of this man is in his clothes.—Shakespeare.

There is not so variable a thing in nature as a lady's head-dress.—Addison.

Dress is the great business of all women, and the fixed idea of some.—Alphonse Karr.

An ugly woman in a rich habit set out with jewels nothing can become.—Dryden.

When a soldier is hit by a cannon-ball, rags are as becoming as purple.—Thoreau.

Here's such a plague every morning, with buckling shoes, gartering, combing and powdering.—Farquhar.

Be plain in dress, and sober in your diet; In short, my deary, kiss me! and be quiet.
—Lady M. W. Montagu.

The plainer the dress, with greater luster does beauty appear.—Lord Halifax.

As soon as a woman begins to dress "loud," her manners and conversation partake of the same element.—Haliburton.

There are female dandies as well as clothes-wearing men; and the former are as objectionable as the latter.—Carlyle.

There are some women who require much dressing, as some meats must be highly seasoned to make them palatable.—Rochebrune.

Worldly wisdom dictates to her disciples the propriety of dressing somewhat beyond their means, but of living somewhat within them.—Colton.

If a woman were about to proceed to her execution, she would demand a little time to perfect her toilet.—Chamfort.

Too great carelessness, equally with excess in dress, multiplies the wrinkles of old age, and makes its decay still more conspicuous.—Bruyère.

Let Harlequin be taken with a fit of the colic, and his trappings will have to serve that mood too.—Thoreau.

And why take ye thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow: they toil not, neither do they spin.—Bible.

We sacrifice to dress till household joys and comforts cease. Dress drains our cellar dry, and keeps our larder lean.—Cowper.

Costly thy habit as thy purse can buy, but not expressed in fancy; rich, not gaudy; for the apparel oft proclaims the man.—Shakespeare.

Oh, fair undress, best dress! It checks no vein, but every flowing limb in pleasure drowns, and heightens ease with grace.—Thomson.

Sturdy swains, in clean array, for rustic dance prepare, mixed with the buxom damsels hand in hand.—John Phillips.

A fine coat is but a livery when the person who wears it discovers no higher sense than that of a footman.—Addison.

As you treat your body, so your house, your domestics, your enemies, your friends. Dress is a table of your contents.—Lavater.

The peacock in all his pride does not display half the colors that appear in the garments of a British lady when she is dressed.—Addison.

Nothing can embellish a beautiful face more than a narrow band that indicates a small wound drawn crosswise over the brow.—Richter.

In the indications of female poverty there can be no disguise. No woman dresses below herself from caprice.—Lamb.

The vanity of loving fine clothes and new fashions, and valuing ourselves by them, is one of the most childish pieces of folly that can be.—Sir Matthew Hale.

A rich dress adds but little to the beauty of a person. It may possibly create a deference, but that is rather an enemy to love.—Shenstone.

I am convinced that if the virtuosi could once find out a world in the moon, with a passage to it, our women would wear nothing but what directly came from thence.—Swift.

A man's appearance falls within the censure of every one that sees him; his parts and learning very few are judges of.—Steele.

We believe that the dress that shows taste and sentiment is elevating to the home, and is one of the most feminine means of beautifying the world.—Miss Oakey.

We may hold it slavish to dress according to the judgment of fools and the caprice of coxcombs; but are we not ourselves both when we are singular in our attire?—Chatfield.

Those who think that in order to dress well it is necessary to dress extravagantly or grandly make a great mistake. Nothing so well becomes true feminine beauty as simplicity.—George D. Prentice.

Those who are incapable of shining out by dress would do well to consider that the contrast between them and their clothes turns out much to their disadvantage.—Shenstone.

He that is proud of the rustling of his silks, like a madman, laughs at the rattling of his fetters; for, indeed, clothes ought to be our remembrancers of our lost innocence.—Thomas Fuller.

That the women of the Old Testament were dressed with oriental richness there is no doubt, nor are they censured for so arraying themselves.—Charlotte M. Yonge.

Women always show more taste in adorning others than themselves; and the reason is that their persons are like their hearts—they read another's better than they can their own.—Richter.

A lady of genius will give a genteel air to her whole dress by a well-fancied suit of knots, as a judicious writer gives a spirit to a whole sentence by a single expression.—Gay.

Rich apparel has strange virtues; it makes him that hath it without means esteemed for an excellent wit; he that enjoys it with means puts the world in remembrance of his means.—Ben Jonson.

What, is the jay more precious than the lark,
Because his feathers are more beautiful?
Or is the adder better than the eel,
Because his painted skin contents the eye?
—Shakespeare.

Our purses shall be proud, our garments poor;
For 'tis the mind that makes the body rich;
And as the sun breaks through the darkest clouds,
So honor peereth in the meanest habit.
—Shakespeare.

Women overrate the influence of fine dress and the latest fashions upon gentlemen; and certain it is that the very expensiveness of such attire frightens the beholder from all ideas of matrimony.—Abba Gould Woolson.

Her polish'd limbs,
Veil'd in a simple robe, their best attire,
Beyond the pomp of dress; for loveliness
Needs not the foreign aid of ornament,
But is, when unadorn'd, adorn'd the most
—Thomson.

It is well known that a loose and easy dress contributes much to give to both sexes those fine proportions of body that are observable in the Grecian statues, and which serve as models to our present artists.—Rousseau.

I have heard with admiring submission the experience of the lady who declared that the sense of being well dressed gives a feeling of inward tranquillity which religion is powerless to bestow.—Emerson.

Through tattered clothes small vices do appear; robes and furred gowns hide all. Plate sin with gold, and the strong lance of justice hurtless breaks; arm it in rags, a pygmy's straw doth pierce it.—Shakespeare.

Good dressing includes a suggestion of poetry. One nowhere more quickly detects sentiment than in dress. A well-dressed woman in a room should fill it with poetic sense, like the perfume of flowers.—Miss Oakley.

Let women paint their eyes with tints of chastity, insert into their ears the word of God, tie the yoke of Christ around their necks, and adorn their whole persons with the silk of sanctity and the damask of devotion.—Tertullian.

Be neither too early in the fashion, nor too long out of it, nor too precisely in it; what custom hath civilized is become decent, till then ridiculous; where the eye is the jury thy apparel is the evidence.—Quarles.

To this end, nothing is to be more carefully consulted than plainness. In a lady's attire this is the single excellence; for to be what some people call fine, is the same vice, in that case, as to be florid is in writing or speaking.—Addison.

Many shiver from want of defence against the cold; but there is vastly more suffering among the rich from absurd and criminal modes of dress, which fashion has sanctioned, than among the poor from deficiency of raiment.—Channing.

Love in modern times has been the tailor's best friend. Every suitor of the nineteenth century spends more than his spare cash on personal adornment. A faultless fit, a glistening hat, tight gloves, and tighter boots proclaim the imminent peril of his position.—G. A. Sala.

Next to clothes being fine, they should be well made, and worn easily; for a man is only the less genteel for a fine coat, if, in wearing it, he shows a regard for it, and is not as easy in it as if it was a plain one.—Chesterfield.

Virgil has very finely touched upon the female passion for dress and shows, in the character of Camilla; who, though she seems to have shaken off all the other weaknesses of her sex, is still described as a woman in this particular.—Addison.

Beauty gains little, and homeliness and deformity lose much, by gaudy attire. Lysander knew this was in part true, and refused the rich garments that the tyrant Dionysius proffered to his daughters, saying "that they were fit only to make unhappy faces more remarkable."—Zimmermann.

Dress has a moral effect upon the conduct of mankind. Let any gentleman find himself with dirty boots, old surtout, soiled neckcloth and a general negligence of dress, and he will in all probability find a corresponding disposition by negligence of address.—Sir Jonah Barrington.

In Athens the ladies were not gaudily but simply arrayed, and we doubt whether any ladies ever excited more admiration. So also the noble old Roman matrons, whose superb forms were gazed on delightedly by men worthy of them, were always very plainly dressed.—George D. Prentice.

Men of quality never appear more amiable than when their dress is plain. Their birth, rank, title and its appendages are at best invidious; and as they do not need the assistance of dress, so, by their disclaiming the advantage of it, they make their superiority sit more easy.—Shenstone.

Processions, cavalcades, and all that fund of gay frippery, furnished out by tailors, barbers, and tire-women, mechanically influence the mind into veneration; an emperor in his nightcap would not meet with half the respect of an emperor with a crown.—Goldsmith.

I have always a sacred veneration for any one I observe to be a little out of repair in his person, as supposing him either a poet or a philosopher; because the richest minerals are ever found under the most ragged and withered surfaces of the earth.—Swift.

A simple garb is the proper costume of the vulgar; it is cut for them, and exactly suits their measure; but it is an ornament for those who have filled up their lives with great deeds. I liken them to beauty in dishabille, but more bewitching on that account.—Bruyère.

The person whose clothes are extremely fine I am too apt to consider as not being possessed of any superiority of fortune, but resembling those Indians who are found to wear all the gold they have in the world in a bob at the nose.—Goldsmith.

A majority of women seem to consider themselves sent into the world for the sole purpose of displaying dry goods, and it is only when acting the part of an animated milliner's block that they feel they are performing their appropriate mission.—Abba Goold Woolson.

Beauty in dress, as in other things, is largely relative. To admit this is to admit that a dress which is beautiful upon one woman may be hideous worn by another. Each should understand her own style, accept it, and let the fashion of her dress be built upon it.—Miss Oakey.

Never teach false modesty. How exquisitely absurd to teach a girl that beauty is of no value, dress of no use! Beauty is of value; her whole prospects and happiness in life may often depend upon a new gown or a becoming bonnet; if she has five grains of common sense she will find this out. The great thing is to teach her their proper value.—Sydney Smith.

A French woman is a perfect architect in dress; she never, with Gothic ignorance, mixes the orders; she never tricks out a snobby Doric shape with Corinthian finery; or, to speak without metaphor, she conforms to general fashion only when it happens not to be repugnant to private beauty.—Goldsmith.

The gracious and self-sacrificing and womanly women of our revolution wore dresses cut lower than those of their great-granddaughters, as any portrait gallery will show. The dress is indefensible, but let us not be too ready to condemn the wearer for worse sins than thoughtlessness and vanity.—Mrs. L. G. Calhoun.

A gentleman's taste in dress is, upon principle, the avoidance of all things extravagant. It consists in the quiet simplicity of exquisite neatness; but, as the neatness must be a neatness in fashion, employ the best tailor; pay him ready money, and, on the whole, you will find him the cheapest.—Bulwer-Lytton.

No man ever stood lower in my estimation for having a patch in his clothes; yet I am sure there is greater anxiety to have fashionable, or at least clean and unpatched clothes, than to have a sound conscience. I sometimes try my acquaintances by some such test as this—who could wear a patch, or two extra seams only, over the knee.—Thoreau.

As long as there are cold and nakedness in the land around you, so long can there be no question at all but that splendor of dress is a crime. In due time, when we have nothing better to set people to work at, it may be right to let them make lace and cut jewels; but as long as there are any who have no blankets for their beds, and no rags for their bodies, so long it is blanket-making and tailoring we must set people to work at, not lace.—Ruskin.

It is the saying of an old divine, "Two things in my apparel I will chiefly aim at—commodiousness and decency; more than these is not commendable, yet I hate an effeminate spruceness as much as a fantastic disorder. A neglected comeliness is the best ornament." It is said of the celebrated Mr. Whitfield that he always was very clean and neat, and often said pleasantly "that a minister of the gospel ought to be without a spot."—J. Beaumont.

As the index tells us the contents of stories and directs to the particular chapter, even so does the outward habit and superficial order of garments (in man or woman) give us a taste of the spirit, and demonstratively point (as it were a manual note from the margin) all the internal quality of the soul; and there cannot be a more evident, palpable, gross manifestation of poor, degenerate, dunghilly blood and breeding than a rude, unpolished, disordered, and slovenly outside.—Massinger.

I would rather have a young fellow too much than too little dressed; the excess on that side will wear off, with a little age and reflection; but if he is negligent at twenty, he will be a sloven at forty, and stink at fifty years old. Dress yourself fine where others are fine, and plain where others are plain; but take care always that your clothes are well made and fit you, for otherwise they will give you a very awkward air.—Chesterfield.

Drink, Drunkenness

Habitual intoxication is the epitome of every crime.—Douglas Jerrold.

Drunkenness is nothing else than a voluntary madness.—Seneca.

Drink, pretty creature, drink!—Wordsworth.

Some folks are drunk, yet do not know it.—Prior.

Troops of furies march in the drunkard's triumph.—Zimmermann.

The drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty.—Prov. 23: 21.

Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning that they may follow strong drink.—Bible.

A drunkard is unprofitable for any kind of good service.—Plato.

Every inordinate cup is unblest'd, and the ingredient is a devil.—Shakespeare.

Thirst teaches all animals to drink, but drunkenness belongs only to man.—Fielding.

The axe of intemperance has lopped off his green boughs and left him a withered trunk.—Swift.

There is scarcely a crime before me that is not directly or indirectly caused by strong drink.—Judge Coleridge.

'Tis pity wine should be so deleterious, For tea and coffee leave us much more serious.—Byron.

Inspiring bold John Barleycorn, What dangers thou canst make us scorn.—Burns.

The sight of a drunkard is a better sermon against that vice than the best that was ever preached upon that subject.—Saville.

A vine bears three grapes—the first of pleasure, the second of drunkenness, and the third of repentance.—Anacharsis.

The drunkard forfeits man and doth divest
All wordly right, save what he hath by beast.—Herbert.

The bliss of the drunkard is a visible picture of the expectation of the dying atheist, who hopes no more than to lie down in the grave with the "beasts that perish."—Jane Porter.

If a man is right, all the bombardment of the world for five, ten, twenty, forty years will only strengthen him in his position. So that all you have to do is to keep yourself right. Never mind the world. Let it say what it will. It can do you no damage. But as soon as it is whispered "he drinks," and it can be proved, he begins to go down. What clerk can get a position with such a reputation? What store wants him? What Church of God wants him for a member? What dying man wants him for an executor? "He drinks!"—Talmage.

Now to rivulets from the mountains
Point the rods of fortune-tellers;
Youth perpetual dwells in fountains,
Not in flasks, and casks, and cellars.
—Longfellow.

There shall be, in England, seven half-penny loaves sold for a penny; the three-hooped pot shall have ten hoops; and I will make it felony to drink small beer.—Shakespeare.

Woe to him that giveth his neighbor drink, that putteth thy bottle to him and makest him drunken.—Hab. 2: 15.

When he is best, he is little worse than a man; and when he is worst he is little better than a beast.—Shakespeare.

The first draught a man drinks ought to be for thirst, the second for nourishment, the third for pleasure, the fourth for madness.

Man has evil as well as good qualities peculiar to himself. Drunkenness places him as much below the level of the brutes as reason elevates him above them.—Sir G. Sinclair.

People say, "Do not regard what he says now he is in liquor." Perhaps it is the only time he ought to be regarded: Aperit prae cordia liber.—Shenstone.

Those men who destroy a healthful constitution of body by intemperance and an irregular life do as manifestly kill themselves as those who hang or poison or drown themselves.—Shakespeare.

Almighty God! If it be thy will that man should suffer, whatever seemeth good in thy sight impose upon me. Let the bread of affliction be given to me to eat. Take from me the friends of my confidence. Let the cold hut of poverty be my dwelling-place and the wasting hand of disease inflict its painful torments. Let me sow in the whirlwind and reap in the storm. Let those have me in derision who are younger than I. Let the passing away of my welfare be like the fleeting of a cloud and the shouts of my enemies like the rushing of waters. When I anticipate good, let evil annoy me. When I look for light, let darkness come upon me. Do all this, but save me, merciful God! Save me from the fate of a drunkard.—Talmage.

I drank: I liked it not: 'twas rage,
'twas noise,
An airy scene of transitory joys.
In vain I trusted that the flowing bowl
Would banish sorrow and enlarge the soul.
—Prior.

Some of the domestic evils of drunkenness are houses without windows, gardens without fences, fields without tillage, barns without roofs, children without clothing, principles, morals or manners.—Franklin.

Drunkenness is a flattering devil, a sweet poison, a pleasant sin, which whosoever hath hath not himself; which whosoever doth commit doth not commit sin, but he himself is wholly sin.—St. Augustine.

Call things by their right names.
* * * Glass of brandy and water!
That is the current, but not the appropriate, name: ask for a glass of liquid fire and distilled damnation.—Robert Hall.

O that men should put an enemy in their mouths to steal away their brains! that we should with joy, pleasance, revel, and applause, transform ourselves into beasts!—Shakespeare.

As long as you make drinking respectable, drinking customs will prevail, and the plowshare of death, drawn by terrible disasters, will go on turning up this whole continent, from end to end, with the long, deep, awful furrow of drunkards' graves.—Talmage.

I will ask him for my place again: he shall tell me I am a drunkard. Had I as many mouths as Hydra, such an answer would stop them all. To be now a sensible man, by and by a fool, and presently a beast. O strange! Every inordinate cup is un-blessed, and the ingredient is a devil.—Shakespeare.

A monster such as never ranged African thicket or Hindustan jungle hath traced this land, and with bloody maw hath strewn the continent with the mangled carcasses of whole generations; and there are tens of thousands of fathers and mothers who could hold up the garment of their slain boy, truthfully exclaiming, "It is my son's coat; that evil beast, Intemperance, hath devoured him."—Talmage.

Oli.—What's a drunken man like, fool?

Clo.—Like a drowned man, a fool, and a madman; one draught above heat makes him a fool, the second mads him, and a third drowns him.—Shakespeare.

The thirsty Earth soaks up the Rain, And drinks, and gapes for Drink again;
The Plants suck in the Earth and are With constant Drinking fresh and fair.—Cowley.

Thou sparkling bowl! thou sparkling bowl!

Through lips of bards thy brim may press,
And eyes of beauty o'er thee roll,
And song and dance they power confess—

I will not touch thee; for there clings A scorpion to thy side that stings.—John Pierpont.

Oh! if you could only hear Intemperance with drunkards' bones drumming on the top of the wine cask the Dead March of immortal souls, you would go home and kneel down and pray God that rather than your children should ever become the victims of this evil habit, you might carry them out to Greenwood and put them down in the last slumber, waiting for the flowers of spring to come over the grave—sweet prophecies of the resurrection. God hath a balm for such a wound, but what flower of comfort ever grew on the blasted heath of a drunkard's sepulcher?—Talmage.

All excess is ill, but drunkenness is of the worst sort. It spoils health, dismounts the mind, and unmans men. It reveals secrets, is quarrelsome, lascivious, impudent, dangerous and bad.—William Penn.

Drunkenness is the vice of a good constitution or of a bad memory—of a constitution so treacherously good that it never bends till it breaks; or of a memory that recollects the pleasures of getting intoxicated, but forgets the pains of getting sober.—Colton.

If a man's innate self-respect will not save him from habitual, disgusting intoxication, all the female influences in the universe would not avail. Man's will, like woman's, is stronger than the affections, and once subjugated by vice, all eternal influences will be futile.—Miss Evans.

The rum fiend would like to go and hang up a skeleton in your beautiful house so that, when you opened the front door to go in, you would see it in the hall; and, when you sat at your table you would see it hanging from the wall; and, when you opened your bedroom you would find it stretched upon your pillow; and, waking at night, you would feel its cold hand passing over your face and pinching at your heart. There is no home so beautiful but it may be devastated by the awful curse.—Talmage.

It were better for a man to be subject to any vice than to drunkenness: for all other vanities and sins are recovered, but a drunkard will never shake off the delight of beastliness.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Your friends avoid you, brutishly transform'd
They hardly know you, or if one remains
To wish you well, he wishes you in heaven.—Armstrong.

Beware of drunkenness, lest all good men beware of thee; where drunkenness reigns, there reason is an exile, virtue a stranger, God an enemy; blasphemy is wit, oaths are rhetoric, and secrets are proclamations.—Quarles.

Intemperance is a dangerous companion. It throws many people off their guard, betrays them to a great many indecencies, to ruinous passions, to disadvantages in fortune; makes them discover secrets, drive foolish bargains, engage in play, and often to stagger from the tavern to the stews.—Jeremy Collier.

The longer it possesseth a man the more he will delight in it, and the elder he groweth the more he shall be subject to it; for it dulleth the spirits, and destroyeth the body as ivy doth the old tree, or as the worm that engendereth in the kernel of the nut.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

The habit of using ardent spirits by men in office has occasioned more injury to the public, and more trouble to me, than all other causes. Were I to commence my administration again, the first question I would ask respecting a candidate for office would be, Does he use ardent spirits?—Jefferson.

Man with raging drink inflam'd,
Is far more savage and untamed;
Supplies his loss of wit and sense
With barb'rousness and insolence;
Believes himself, the less he's able
The more heroic and formidable.

—Butler.

The costliest thing on earth is the drunkard's song. It costs ruin of body. It costs ruin of mind. It costs ruin of soul. Go right down among the residential streets of any city and you can find once beautiful and luxurious homesteads that were expended in this destructive music. The lights have gone out in the drawing-room the pianos have ceased the pulsation of their keys, the wardrobe has lost its last article of appropriate attire. The Belshazzarean feast has left nothing but the broken pieces of the crushed chalices. There it stands, the ghastliest thing on earth, the remnant of a drunkard's home. The costliest thing on earth is sin. The most expensive of all music is the Song of the Drunkards. It is the highest tariff of nations—not a protective tariff, but a tariff of doom, a tariff of woe, a tariff of death.—Talmage.

Drunkenness is not only the cause of crime, but it is crime; and if any encourage drunkenness for the sake of the profit derived from the sale of drink, they are guilty of a form of moral assassination as criminal as any that has ever been practiced by the braves of any country or of any age.—Ruskin.

Drunkenness! Does it not jingle the burglar's key? Does it not whet the assassin's knife? Does it not cock the highwayman's pistol? Does it not wave the incendiary's torch? Does it not send the physician reeling into the sickroom; and the minister with his tongue thick into the pulpit? Did not an exquisite poet, from the very top of his fame, fall a gibbering sot, into the gutter, on his way to be married to one of the fairest daughters of New England, and at the very hour the bride was decking herself for the altar; and did he not die of delirium tremens, almost unattended, in a hospital? Tamerlane asked for one hundred and sixty thousand skulls with which to build a pyramid to his own honor. He got the skulls, and built the pyramid. But if the bones of all those who have fallen as a prey to dissipation could be piled up, it would make a vaster pyramid.—Talmage.

The young man who thinks he can drink "just a little" because others do, and not be in danger of a drunkard's grave, should look around him to the fearful examples to be found on the streets of every large city and many small ones. Even if you succeed in keeping within the limits of "moderate drinking" your example to those who are unfortunately not so strong-willed should ever be borne in mind. Help the weaker brother. Think not of self alone. Remember the Golden Rule.—George D. R. Hubbard.

Let no company or respect ever draw you to excess in drink, for be you well assured, that if ever that possess you, you are instantly drunk to all the respects your friends will otherwise pay you, and shall by unequal staggering paces go to your grave with confusion of face, as well in them that love you as in yourself; and, therefore abhor all company that might entice you that way.—Lord Strafford.

It weaks the brain, it spoils the memory,
Hasting on age, and wilful poverty;
It drowns thy better parts, making thy name
To foes a laughter, to thy friends a shame.
'Tis virtue's poison and the bane of trust,
The match of wrath, the fuel unto lust.
Quite leave this vice, and turn not to 't
again,
Upon presumption of a stronger brain;
For he who holds more wine than others
can,
I rather count a hogshead than a man.
—Randolph.

Of all vices take heed of drunkenness; other vices are but fruits of dis-ordered affections—this disorders, nay, banishes reason; other vices but impair the soul—this demolishes her two chief faculties, the understanding and the will; other vices make their own way—this makes way for all vices;
he that is a drunkard is qualified for all vice.—Quarles.

Drowning

O Lord, methought, what pain it was to drown,
What dreadful noise of water in mine ears!
What sights of ugly death within mine eyes!
Methought I saw a thousand fearful
wracks;
A thousand men that fishes gnaw'd upon;
Wedges of gold, great anchors, heaps of pearl,
Inestimable stones, unvalued jewels,
All scattered in the bottom of the sea;
Some lay in dead men's skulls; and in those holes
Where eyes did once inhabit, there were crept,
As 'twere in scorn of eyes, reflecting gems.
—Shakespeare.

Drudgery

The everyday cares and duties, which men call drudgery, are the weights and counterpoises of the clock of time; giving its pendulum a true vibration and its hands a regular motion; and when they cease to hang upon its wheels, the pendulum no longer swings, the hands no longer move, the clock stands still.—Longfellow.

Duelling

Since bodily strength is but a servant to the mind, it were very barbarous and preposterous that force should be made judge over reason.—

Sir P. Sidney.

If all seconds were as averse to duels as their principals, very little blood would be shed in that way.—
Colton.

It has a strange, quick jar upon the ear,
That cocking of a pistol, when you know
A moment more will bring the sight to bear Upon your person, twelve yards off or so.
—Byron.

Some fiery fop, with new commission vain,
Who sleeps on brambles till he kills his
man;
Some frolic drunkard, reeling from a feast,
Provokes a broil, and stabs you for a jest.
—Dr. Johnson.

Ah me! what perils do environ
The man that meddles with cold iron!
What plaguy mischiefs and mishaps
Do dog him still with after-claps.
—Butler.

Duelling, though barbarous in civilized, is a highly civilized institution among barbarous people; and when compared to assassination, is a prodigious victory gained over human passions.—Sydney Smith.

Do not cherish that daring vice for which the whole age suffers—these private duels—which had their first original from the French and for which to this day we're justly censured, are banished from all civil government.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Men engage in it compell'd by force,
And fear, not courage, is its proper source,
The fear of tyrant custom, and the fear
Lest fops should censure us, and fools should sneer.

Am I to set my life upon a throw
Because a bear is rude and surly?—No—
A moral, sensible, and well-bred man
Will not affront me, and no other can.
—Cowper.

With respect to duels, indeed, I have my own ideas. Few things in this surprising world strike me with more surprise. Two little visual spectra of men, hovering with insecure enough cohesion in the midst of the unfathomable, and to dissolve therein, at any rate, very soon, make pause at the distance of twelve paces asunder, whirl around, and simultaneously, by the cunningest mechanism, explode one another into dissolution; and, off-hand, become air, and non-extant—the little spitfires!—Carlyle.

Dullness

The worst of it is, dullness is catching.—Douglas Jerrold.

Glory and gain the industrious tribe provoke;
And gentle dullness ever loves a joke.
—Pope.

There are some heads which have no windows, and the day can never strike from above; nothing enters from heavenward.—Joubert.

For of a truth stupidity is strong, most strong, as the poet Schiller sings, "Against stupidity the very gods fight invictorious."—Carlyle.

The head of dullness, unlike the tail of the torpedo, loses nothing of the benumbing and lethargizing influence, by reiterated discharges.—Colton.

What a comfort a dull but kindly person is, to be sure, at times! A ground-glass shade over a gas lamp does not bring more solace to our dazzled eyes than such a one to our minds.—Holmes.

A dull man is so near a dead man that he is hardly to be ranked in the list of the living; and as he is not to be buried whilst he is half alive, so he is as little to be employed whilst he is half dead.—Saville.

Duplicity

Where nature's end of language is declined,
And men talk only to conceal the mind.
—Young.

Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer;
And, without sneering, teach the rest to sneer;
Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike,
Just hint a fault, and hesitate dislike.
—Pope.

I, I, I myself, sometimes, leaving the fear of heaven on the left hand, and hiding mine honor in my necessity, am fain to shuffle, to hedge, and to lurch.—Shakespeare.

O, what may man within him hide,
Though angel on the outward side.
—Shakespeare.

One dupe is as impossible as one twin.—John Sterling.

Duty

Stern daughter of the voice of God!
—Wordsworth.

Duties are ours; events are God's.
—Cecil.

Duty is the demand of the hour.—Goethe.

Simple duty hath no place for fear.
—Whittier.

Who escapes a duty avoids a gain.
—Theodore Parker.

Consult duty, not events.—Annesly.

Man cannot choose his duties.—George Eliot.

New occasions teach new duties.—James Russell Lowell.

Men must be either the slaves of duty, or the slaves of force.—Joseph Joubert.

The reward of one duty is the power to fulfill another.—George Eliot.

Do the duty which lies nearest to thee.—Goethe.

Fear is not a lasting teacher of duty.—Cicero.

God never imposes a duty without giving the time to do it.—Ruskin.

Every subject's duty is the king's; but every subject's soul is his own.—Shakespeare.

Life is of little value unless it be consecrated by duty.—Samuel Smiles.

Perish discretion when it interferes with duty.—Hannah More.

The sense of duty pursues us ever.—Joseph Cook.

Thanks to the gods; my boy has done his duty.—Addison.

England expects every man to do his duty.—Horatio Nelson.

Not liberty but duty is the condition of existence.—Mathilde Blind.

There is no moment without some duty.—Cicero.

We have an intuitive sense of our duty.—Swift.

The doing of things from duty is but a stage on the road to the kingdom of truth and love.—George MacDonald.

Hath the spirit of all beauty
Kissed you in the path of duty?
—Anna Katharine Green.

There are not good things enough in life to indemnify us for the neglect of a single duty.—Madame Swetchine.

None should expect to prosper who go out of the way of duty.—Aughey.

There is nothing in the universe I fear but that I shall not know all my duty, or shall fail to do it.—Mary Lyon.

Knowledge is the hill which few may hope to climb; duty is the path that all may tread.—Lewis Morris.

Cold duty's path is not so blithely trod
Which leads the mournful spirit to its God.
—William Herbert.

When I'm not thank'd at all, I'm thank'd enough:
I've done my duty, and I've done no more.
—Fielding.

Knowledge of our duties is the most useful part of philosophy.—Whately.

The most fruitful and elevating influence I have ever seemed to meet has been my impression of obligation to God.—Daniel Webster.

The latest gospel in this world is, know thy work and do it.—Carlyle.

Duty only frowns when you flee from it; follow it, and it smiles upon you.—Elizabeth, Queen of Roumania.

Let us not run out of the path of duty, lest we run into the way of danger.—Rowland Hill.

He who can at all times sacrifice pleasure to duty approaches sublimity.—Lavater.

Never anything can be amiss, when simpleness and duty tender it.—Shakespeare.

As birds are made to fly and rivers to run, so the soul to follow duty.—Ramayana.

Every duty we omit obscures some truth we should have known.—Ruskin.

To what gulfs a single deviation from the track of human duties leads! —Byron.

Every mission constitutes a pledge of duty.—Mazzini.

Do well the duty that lies before you.—Pittachus.

In doing what we ought we deserve no praise, because it is our duty.—St. Augustine.

Zeal and duty are not slow;
But on occasion's forelock watchful wait
—Milton.

Men love to hear of their power, but have an extreme disrelish to be told their duty.—Burke.

Whether your time calls you to live or die, do both like a prince.—Sir P. Sidney.

Every one regards his duty as a troublesome master from whom he would like to be free.—La Roche.

The true way to render ourselves happy is to love our duty and find in it our pleasure.—Mme. de Motteville.

Then on! then on! where duty leads,
My course be onward still.
—Bishop Heber.

You will always find those who think they know your duty better than you know it.—Emerson.

Duty grows everywhere—like children, like grass.—Emerson.

Nothing is properly one's duty but what is also one's interest.—Bishop Wilkins.

Not once or twice in our rough island story,
The path of duty was the way to glory.
—Tennyson.

Every duty, even the least duty, involves the whole principle of obedience.—Archbishop Manning.

Thy sum of duty let two words contain—. . . be humble and be just.—Prior.

It is thy duty oftentimes to do what thou wouldst not; thy duty, too, to leave undone that thou wouldst do.—Thomas à Kempis.

There is no evil which we cannot face or fly from but the consciousness of duty disregarded.—Daniel Webster.

The last pleasure in life is the sense of discharging our duty.—Hazlitt.

Such duty as the subject owes the prince,
Even such a woman oweth to her husband.
—Shakespeare.

In common things the law of sacrifice takes the form of positive duty.—Froude.

Our grand business is, not to see what lies dimly at a distance, but to do what lies clearly at hand.—Thomas Carlyle.

A nation, as an individual, has duties to fulfill appointed by God and His moral law.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

Duty—the command of heaven, the eldest voice of God.—Charles Kingsley.

Duty, especially out of the domain of love, is the veriest slavery in the world.—Timothy Titcomb.

They do well, or do their duty, who with alacrity do what they ought.—La Bruyère.

Our duty is to be useful, not according to our desires but according to our powers.—Amiel.

I am not aware that payment, or even favors, however gracious, bind any man's soul and conscience in questions of highest morality and highest importance.—Charles Kingsley.

When any duty is to be done, it is fortunate for you if you feel like doing it; but, if you do not feel like it, that is no reason for not doing it.—W. Gladden.

Brethren, life is passing; youth goes, strength decays. But duty performed, work done for God—this abides forever, this alone is imperishable.—Richard Fuller.

Man is saved by love and duty, and by the hope that springs from duty, or rather from the moral facts of consciousness, as a flower springs from the soil.—Amiel.

The pleasure a man of honor enjoys in the consciousness of having performed his duty is a reward he pays himself for all his pains.—La Bruyère.

I have learned that to do one's next duty is to take a step toward all that is worth possessing.—J. G. Holland.

Only when the voice of duty is silent, or when it has already spoken, may we allowably think of the consequences of a particular action.—Hare.

A deliberate rejection of duty prescribed by already recognized truth cannot but destroy, or at least impair most seriously the clearness of our mental vision.—H. P. Liddon.

Duty is what goes most against the grain, because in doing that we do only what we are strictly obliged to, and are seldom much praised for it.—La Bruyère.

Let men of all ranks, whether they are successful or unsuccessful, whether they triumph or not—let them do their duty, and rest satisfied.—Plato.

The constant duty of every man to his fellows is to ascertain his own powers and special gifts, and to strengthen them for the help of others.—John Ruskin.

The primal duties shine aloft like stars; The charities that soothe, and heal, and bless,
Are scattered at the feet of man, like flowers. —Wordsworth.

Stern duties need not speak sternly. He who stood firm before the thunder worshipped the "still small voice." —Sidney Dobell.

It is one of the worst of errors to suppose that there is any other path of safety except that of duty.—Aughey.

Whatever our place allotted to us by Providence, that for us is the post of honor and duty. God estimates us, not by the position we are in, but by the way in which we fill it.—T. Edwards.

Let no guilty man escape, if it can be avoided. No personal consideration should stand in the way of performing a public duty.—Ulysses S. Grant.

Duty does not consist in suffering everything, but in suffering everything for duty. Sometimes, indeed, it is our duty not to suffer.—Professor Vinet.

Do your duty, and don't swerve from it. Do that which your conscience tells you to be right, and leave the consequences to God.—B. R. Haydon.

Duty is one and invariable: it requires no impossibilities, nor can it ever be disregarded with impunity.—Thoreau.

Let men laugh when you sacrifice desire to duty, if they will. You have time and eternity to rejoice in.—Theodore Parker.

I see nothing worth living for but the divine virtue which endures and surrenders all things for truth, duty, and mankind.—Channing.

Be content with doing calmly the little which depends upon yourself, and let all else be to you as if it were not.—Fénelon.

Can man or woman choose duties? No more than they can choose their birthplace, or their father and mother.—George Eliot.

All duties are matter of conscience, with this restriction that a superior obligation suspends the force of an inferior one.—L'Estrange.

Thy sum of duty let two words contain
(O may they graven in thy heart remain!)
Be humble and be just. —Prior.

Duty speaks with the lawful authority of many voices; pleasure has no strength except in the longing desire of the hungry unit.—Edith Simcox.

Of an accountable creature, duty is the concern of every moment, since he is every moment pleasing or displeasing God.—Robert Hall.

I think myself obliged, whatever my private apprehensions may be of the success, to do my duty, and leave events to their Disposer.—Robert Boyle.

The thing which must be, must be for the best; God helps us do our duty and not shrink.—Lytton.

Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God and keep His commandments, for this is the whole duty of man.—Bible.

He who is false to present duty breaks a thread in the loom, and will find the flaw when he may have forgotten its cause.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Let us have faith that right makes might, and in that faith let us, to the end, dare to do our duty as we understand it.—Abraham Lincoln.

Never to tire, never to grow cold; to be patient, sympathetic, tender; to look for the budding flower and the opening heart; to hope always; like God, to love always—this is duty.—Amiel.

The gospel chargeth us with piety towards God, and justice and charity to men, and temperance and chastity in reference to ourselves.—Tillotson.

If doing what ought to be done be made the first business, and success a secondary consideration—is not this the way to exalt virtue?—Confucius.

To hallow'd duty
Here with a loyal and heroic heart,
Bind we our lives. —Mrs. Osgood.

Man owes two solemn debts—one to society, and one to nature. It is only when he pays the second that he covers the first.—Douglas Jerrold.

I hate to see a thing done by halves; if it be right, do it boldly; if it be wrong, leave it undone.—Gilpin.

Duty, though set about by thorns, may still be made a staff supporting even while it tortures. Cast it away, and, like the prophet's wand, it changes to a snake.—D. Jerrold.

I slept and dreamed that life was Beauty;
I woke, and found that life was Duty—
Was thy dream then a shadowy lie?
—Ellen Sturgis Hooper.

The great point is to renounce your own wisdom by simplicity of walk.

and to be ready to give up the favor, esteem, and approbation of every one, whenever the path in which God leads you passes that way.—I énelon.

It is not the profession of religion which creates the obligation for the performance of duty; for that existed before any such profession was made. The profession of religion only recognizes the obligation.—Albert Barnes.

Duties are ours; events are God's. This removes an infinite burden from the shoulders of a miserable, tempted, dying creature. On this consideration only, can he securely lay down his head, and close his eyes.—Richard Cecil.

O thou sculptor, painter, poet,
Take this lesson to thy heart;
That is best which lieth nearest;
Shape from that thy work of art.
—Longfellow.

Put thou thy trust in God;
In duty's path go on;
Fix on His word thy steadfast eye;
So shall thy work be done.
—Martin Luther.

When faith and hope fail, as they do sometimes, we must trust charity, which is love in action. We must speculate no more on our duty, but simply do it. When we have done it, however blindly, perhaps heaven will show us the reason why.—D. M. Craik.

If the duties before us be not noble, let us ennoble them by doing them in a noble spirit; we become reconciled to life if we live in the spirit of Him who reconciled the life of God with the lowly duties of servants.—F. W. Robertson.

Do to-day's duty, fight to-day's temptation; and do not weaken and distract yourself by looking forward to things which you cannot see, and could not understand if you saw them.—Charles Kingsley.

Every mission constitutes a pledge of duty. Every man is bound to consecrate his every faculty to its full filment. He will derive his rule of action from the profound conviction of that duty.—William Lloyd Garrison.

There is little pleasure in the world that is true and sincere besides the pleasure of doing our duty and doing good. I am sure no other is comparable to this.—Tillotson.

The path of duty lies in what is near, and men seek for it in what is remote; the work of duty lies in what is easy, and men seek for it in what is difficult.—Mencius.

Thet tells the story! Thet's wut we shall git
By tryin' squirtguns on the burnin' Pit;
For the day never comes when it'll du
To kick off dooty like a worn-out shoe.
—Lowell.

However dear you hold your patri-mony, your honor, or even your life, you should be willing to sacrifice all to duty, if you are called upon to do so.—Silvio Pellico.

And rank for her meant duty, various
Yet equal in its worth, done worthily.
Command was service; humblest service
done
By willing and discerning souls was glory.
—George Eliot.

So nigh is grandeur to our dust,
So near is God to man.
When Duty whispers low, Thou must,
The youth replies, I can.
—Emerson.

Duty reaches down the ages in its effects, and into eternity; and when the man goes about it resolutely, it seems to me now as though his foot-steps were echoing beyond the stars, though only heard faintly in the atmosphere of this world.—William Mountford.

A judge's duty is to grant justice, but his practice is to delay it; even those judges who know their duty adhere to the general practice.—La Bruyère.

It is a happy thing for us that this is really all we have to concern ourselves about—what to do next. No man can do the second thing. He can do the first.—George MacDonald.

Thus is man made equal to every event. He can face danger for the right. A poor, tender, painful body, he can run into flame or bullets or pestilence, with duty for his guide.—Emerson.

Every man has obligations which belong to his station. Duties extend beyond obligations, and direct the affections, desires, and intentions, as well as the actions.—Whewell.

Rugged strength and radiant beauty—
These were one in nature's plan;
Humble toil and heavenward duty—
These will form the perfect man.
—Mrs. Hale.

And I read the moral—A brave endeavor
To do thy duty, whate'er its worth,
Is better than life with love forever,
And love is the sweetest thing on earth.
—James J. Roche.

I believe that we are conforming to the divine order and the will of Providence when we are doing even indifferent things that belong to our condition.—Fénelon.

Whoso neglects a thing which he suspects he ought to do, because it seems to him too small a thing, is deceiving himself; it is not too little, but too great for him, that he doeth it not.—E. B. Pusey.

The sense of duty is the fountain of human rights. In other words, the same inward principle which teaches the former bears witness to the latter. Duties and rights must stand and fall together.—William Ellery Channing.

In all ordinary cases we see intuitively at first view what is our duty, what is the honest part. In these cases doubt and deliberation is of itself dishonesty; as it was in Balaam's case upon the second message.—Bishop Butler.

Be not diverted from your duty by any idle reflections the silly world may make upon you, for their censures are not in your power, and consequently should not be any part of your concern.—Epictetus.

Let a man begin in earnest with "I ought," and he will end, by God's grace, if he persevere, with "I will." Let him force himself to abound in all small offices of kindness, attention, affectionateness, and all these for God's sake. By and by he will feel them become the habit of his soul.—F. W. Robertson.

Attention is our first duty whenever we want to know what is our second duty. There is no such cause of confusion and worry about what we ought to do, and how to do it, as our unwillingness to hear what God would tell us on that very point.—H. Clay Trumbull.

The great object of the Christian is duty; his predominant desire to obey God. When he can please the world consistently with these, he will do so; otherwise it is enough for him that God commands, and enough for them that he cannot disobey.—Gardiner Spring.

Go to your duty, every man, and trust yourself to Christ; for He will give you all supply just as fast as you need it. You will have just as much power as you believe you can have. Be a Christian; throw yourself upon God's work; and get the ability you want in it.—Horace Bushnell.

Let him who gropes painfully in darkness or uncertain light, and prays vehemently that the dawn may ripen into day, lay this precept well to heart: "Do the duty which lies nearest to thee," which thou knowest to be a duty! Thy second duty will already have become clearer.—Carlyle.

Submission to duty and God gives the highest energy. He, who has done the greatest work on earth, said that He came down from heaven, not to do His own will, but the will of Him who sent Him. Whoever allies himself with God is armed with all the forces of the invisible world.—Clarke.

Christian obligation cannot be made to accord with a law of expediency. The Christian's maxims are, "Do right because you are bound to do right." "Do right though the heavens fall." There is a world of difference between "You had better" and "You are bound to."—Francis L. Patton.

The secret consciousness
Of duty well performed; the public voice
Of praise that honors virtue, and rewards
it;
All these are yours. —Francis.

To check the erring and reprove;
Thou who art victory and law,
When empty terrors overawe,
Give unto me, made lowly wise,
The spirit of self-sacrifice.
—Wordsworth.

Do daily and hourly your duty; do it patiently and thoroughly. Do it as it presents itself; do it at the moment, and let it be its own reward. Never mind whether it is known and acknowledged or not, but do not fail to do it.—Aughey.

We are apt to mistake our vocation by looking out of the way for occasions to exercise great and rare virtues, and by stepping over the ordinary ones that lie directly in the road before us.—Hannah More.

Reverence the highest, have patience with the lowest. Let this day's performance of the meanest duty be thy religion. Are the stars too distant, pick up the pebble that lies at thy feet and from it learn the all.—Margaret Fuller.

The people of this country have shown by the highest proofs human nature can give that wherever the path of duty and honor may lead, however steep and rugged it may be, they are ready to walk in it.—James A. Garfield.

Duty itself is supreme delight when love is the inducement and labor. By such a principle the ignorant are enlightened, the hard-hearted softened, the disobedient reformed, and the faithful encouraged.—Hosea Ballou.

The idea of duty—that recognition of something to be lived for beyond the mere satisfaction of self—is to the moral life what the addition of a great central ganglion is to animal life.—George Eliot.

There is generally no such thing as duty to the people who do it. They simply take life as it comes, meeting, not shirking its demands, whether pleasant or unpleasant; and that is pretty much all there is of it.—Gail Hamilton.

Those who do it always would as soon think of being conceited of eating their dinner as of doing their duty. What honest boy would pride himself on not picking a pocket? A thief who was trying to reform would.—George MacDonald.

High hearts are never long without hearing some new call, some distant clarion of God, even in their dreams; and soon they are observed to break up the camp of ease, and start on some fresh march of faithful service.—James Martineau.

There is no mean work save that which is sordidly selfish; there is no irreligious work save that which is morally wrong; while in every sphere of life "the post of honor is the post of duty."—Chapin.

We require from buildings, as from men, two kinds of goodness; first, the doing their practical duty well; then that they be graceful and pleasing in doing it; which last is itself another form of duty.—Ruskin.

The consideration that human happiness and moral duty are inseparably connected will always continue to prompt me to promote the progress of the former by inculcating the practice of the latter.—Washington.

Commonplace though it may appear, this doing of one's duty embodies the highest ideal of life and character. There may be nothing heroic about it; but the common lot of men is not heroic.—Samuel Smiles.

Duty is a power which rises with us in the morning, and goes to rest with us at night. It is coextensive with the action of our intelligence. It is the shadow which cleaves to us, go where we will, and which only leaves us when we leave the light of life.—Gladstone.

No man living in deliberate violation of his duty, in willful disobedience to God's commands, as taught by conscience, can possibly make progress in acquaintance with the Supreme Being. Vain are all acts of worship in church or in secret, vain are religious reading and conversation, without this instant fidelity.—W. E. Channing.

Men should soon make up their minds to be forgotten, and look about them, or within them, for some higher motive in what they do than the approbation of men, which is fame, namely, their duty; that they should be constantly and quietly at work, each in his sphere, regardless of effects, and leaving their fame to take care of itself.—Longfellow.

My noble father,
I do perceive here a divided duty;
To you, I am bound for life and education;
My life and education both do learn me
How to respect you; you are the lord of
duty;
I am hitherto your daughter: But here's my husband. —Shakespeare.

Both love of mankind, and respect for their rights are duties; the former however is only a conditional, the latter an unconditional, purely imperative duty, which he must be perfectly certain not to have transgressed who would give himself up to the secret emotions arising from benevolence.—Kant.

Speak, Lord, our souls are hushed to hear what Thou hast to say to us. Great is the stake, overwhelming may be the risks—most glorious are the opportunities. Speak, Lord, and show us what our duty is—how high, how difficult, yet how happy, how blessed—show us what our duty is, and, O great God and Father, give us strength to do it.—Dean Stanley.

No man's spirits were ever hurt by doing his duty; on the contrary, one good action, one temptation resisted and overcome, one sacrifice of desire or interest, purely for conscience' sake, will prove a cordial for weak and low spirits, far beyond what either indulgence or diversion or company can do for them.—Paley.

It is an impressive truth that sometimes in the very lowest forms of duty, less than which would rank a man as a villain, there is, nevertheless, the sublimest ascent of self-sacrifice. To do less would class you as an object of eternal scorn, to do so much presumes the grandeur of heroism.—De Quincey.

The duty of man is not a wilderness of turnpike gates, through which he is to pass by tickets from one to the other. It is plain and simple, and consists but of two points—his duty to God, which every man must feel; and, with respect to his neighbor, to do as he would be done by.—Thomas Paine.

As soon as we lay ourselves entirely at His feet, we have enough light given us to guide our own steps; as the foot-soldier, who hears nothing of the councils that determine the course of the great battle he is in, hears plainly enough the word of command which he must himself obey.—George Eliot.

The everyday cares and duties, which men call drudgery, are the weights and counterpoises of the clock of time, giving its pendulum a true vibration and its hands a regular motion; and when they cease to hang upon its wheels, the pendulum no longer swings, the hands no longer move, the clock stands still.—Longfellow.

In the sacred fact of obligation you touch the immutable, and lay hold, as it were, on the eternities. At the very center of your being, there is a fixed element, and that of a kind or degree essentially sovereign. A standard is set up in your very thought, by which a great part of your questions are determined, and about which your otherwise random thoughts may settle into order and law.—Horace Bushnell.

Is there no reconciliation of some ancient quarrel, no payment of some long outstanding debt, no courtesy or love or honor to be rendered to those to whom it has long been due; no charitable, humble, kind, useful deed, by which you can promote the glory of God, or good will among men, or peace upon earth? If there be any such, I beseech you, in God's name, in Christ's name, go and do it.—Dean Stanley.

Let us do our duty in our shop or our kitchen, the market, the street, the office, the school, the home, just as faithfully as if we stood in the front rank of some great battle, and we knew that victory for mankind depended upon our bravery, strength, and skill. When we do that the humblest of us will be serving in that great army which achieves the welfare of the world.—Theodore Parker.

Take your duty, and be strong in it, as God will make you strong. The harder it is, the stronger in fact you will be. Understand, also, that the great question here is, not what you will get, but what you will become. The greatest wealth you can ever get will be in yourself. Take your burdens and troubles and losses and wrongs, if come they must and will, as your opportunity, knowing that God has girded you for greater things than these.—Horace Bushnell.

The moment you can make a very simple discovery, viz., that obligation to God is your privilege, and is not imposed as a burden, your experience will teach you many things—that duty is liberty, that repentance is a release from sorrow, that sacrifice is gain, that humility is dignity, that the truth from which you hide is a healing element that bathes your disordered life, and that even the penalties and terrors of God are the artillery only of protection to His realm.—

Horace Bushnell.

The things of the world are ever rising and falling, and in perpetual change; and this change must be according to the will of God, as He has bestowed upon man neither the wisdom nor the power to enable him to check it. The great lesson in these things is, that man must strengthen himself doubly at such times to fulfill his duty and to do what is right, and must seek his happiness and inward peace from objects which cannot be taken away from him.—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

I cannot but take notice of the wonderful love of God to mankind, who, in order to encourage obedience to His laws, has annexed a present as well as a future reward to a good life; and has so interwoven our duty and our happiness together that, while we are discharging our obligations to the one, we are at the same time making the best provision for the other.—Melmoth.

There is no evil that we cannot either face or fly from but the consciousness of duty disregarded. A sense of duty pursues us ever. It is omnipresent, like the Deity. If we take to ourselves the wings of the morning, and dwell in the utmost parts of the seas, duty performed, or duty violated, is still with us, for our happiness or our misery. If we say the darkness shall cover us, in the darkness as in the light our obligations are yet with us. We cannot escape their power, nor fly from their presence. They are with us in this life, will be with us at its close, and in that scene of inconceivable solemnity which lies yet further onward we shall still find ourselves surrounded by the consciousness of duty, to pain us wherever it has been violated, and to console us so far as God may have given us grace to perform it.—Webster.

Not infrequently are Christians heard to speak of duties as crosses to be borne; and I am convinced that some among them regard their performance as a complete compliance with the law of self-denial. It is a cross to pray, to speak, to commend Christ to others, to attend church, to frequent the social meetings, and, indeed, to do anything of a distinctly religious nature. By the force of their will and with the aid of sundry admonitions they bring themselves up to the discharge of those obligations, but, on the whole, they feel that it should entitle them to a place in "the noble army of martyrs." I am sorry to dissipate the comfortable illusion; but I am compelled to assure them that they totally misapprehend the doctrine of our Lord. He said that it was His meat and drink to do the will of His Father; and He never once refers to duty in any other way than as a delight. The cross was something distinct from it.—George C. Lorimer.

Feeble are we? Yes, without God we are nothing. But what, by faith, every man may be, God requires him to be. This is the only Christian idea of duty. Measure obligation by inherent ability! No, my brethren, Christian obligation has a very different measure. It is measured by the power that God will give us, measured by the gifts and possible increments of faith. And what a reckoning will it be for many of us, when Christ summons us to answer before Him under the law, not for what we are, but for what we might have been.—Horace Bushnell.

Dwarf

A dwarf on a giant's shoulders sees further of the two.—Herbert.

E

Eagle Other birds fight in flocks, but the eagle fights his battles alone.

King of the peak and glacier,
King of the cold, white scalps,
He lifts his head at that close tread,
The eagle of the Alps.
—Victor Hugo.

Bird of the broad and sweeping wing,
Thy home is high in heaven,
Where wide the storms their banners fling,
And the tempest clouds are driven.
—Percival.

Around, around, in ceaseless circles wheeling,
With clangs of wings and scream, the Eagle sailed Incessantly.
—Shelley.

So the struck eagle, stretched upon the plain,
No more through rolling clouds to soar
again,
Viewed his own feather on the fatal dart,
And winged the shaft that quivered in his heart.
—Byron.

Tho' he inherit
Nor the pride, nor ample pinion,
That the Theban eagle bear,
Sailing with supreme dominion
Thro' the azure deep of air.
—Gray.

That eagle's fate and mine are one,
Which, on the shaft that made him die,
Espied a feather of his own,
Wherewith he went to soar so high.
—E. Waller.

Shall eagles not be eagles? wrens be wrens?
If all the world were falcons, what of that?
The wonder of the eagle were the less,
But he not less the eagle. —Tennyson.

He clasps the crag with hooked hands;
Close to the sun in lonely lands,
Ring'd with the azure world, he stands.
The wrinkled sea beneath him crawls:
He watches from his mountain walls,
And like a thunderbolt he falls.
—Tennyson.

Ear

The ear is the road to the heart.—
Voltaire.

One ear it heard, at the other out it went.—Chaucer.

Make not my ear a stranger to thy thoughts.—Addison.

Sir J. Davies calls the ear the wicket of the soul.—G. A. Sala.

A side intelligencer.—Lamb.

The ear in man and beast is an evidence of blood and high breeding.
—N. P. Willis.

Give every man thine ear, but few thy voice; take each man's censure, but reserve thy judgment.—Shake-
speare.

Eyes and ears, two traded pilots
'twixt the dangerous shores of will and judgment.—Shakespeare.

Early Rising

Prevent your day at morning.—
Ben Jonson.

Thus we improve the pleasures of the day,
While tasteless mortals sleep their time
away.
—Mrs. Centlivre.

When one begins to turn in bed, it is time to get up.—Wellington.

The early morning has gold in its mouth.—Franklin.

I rise with the lark.—Anonymus.

Awake before the sun is risen, I call for my pen and papers and desk.—Smart.

Few ever lived to a great age, and fewer still ever became distinguished, who were not in the habit of early rising.—Dr. John Todd.

Next to temperance, a quiet conscience, a cheerful mind and active habits, I place early rising as a means of health and happiness.—Flint.

I would have inscribed on the curtains of your bed, and the walls of your chamber: "If you do not rise early, you can make progress in nothing."—Chatham.

He that from childhood has made rising betimes familiar to him will not waste the best part of his life in drowsiness.—Locke.

The famous Apollonius being very early at Vespasian's gate, and finding him stirring, from thence conjectured that he was worthy to govern an empire, and said to his companion, "This man surely will be emperor; he is so early."—Causin.

The difference between rising at five and seven o'clock in the morning, for the space of forty years, supposing a man to go to bed at the same hour at night, is nearly equivalent to ten additional years to a man's life.—Dodridge.

Early rising not only gives us more life in the same number of our years, but adds likewise to their number; and not only enables us to enjoy more of existence in the same measure of time, but increases also the measure.—Colton.

No man can promise himself even fifty years of life, but any man may, if he please, live in the proportion of fifty years in forty—let him rise early.

that he may have the day before him, and let him make the most of the day, by determining to expend it on two sorts of acquaintance only—those by whom something may be got, and those from whom something may be learnt.—Colton.

Six, or at most seven, hours' sleep is, for a constancy, as much as you or anybody else can want; more is only laziness and dozing, and is, I am persuaded, both unwholesome and stupefying.—Chesterfield.

Whoever has tasted the breath of morning knows that the most invigorating and most delightful hours of the day are commonly spent in bed; though it is the evident intention of nature that we should enjoy and profit by them.—Southey.

O, there is a charm
Which morning has, that gives the brow
of age
A smack of earth, and makes the lip of
youth
Shed perfume exquisite. Expect it not,
Ye who till noon upon a down bed lie,
Indulging feverous sleep. —Hurd.

With charwomen such early hours agree,
And sweeps, that earn betimes their bit
and sup;
But I'm no climbing boy, and need not be,
All up—all up!
So here I'll lie, my morning calls deferring, Till something nearer to the stroke of noon;
A man that's fond precociously of stirring,
Must be a spoon. —Thomas Hood.

Is there aught in sleep can charm the wise,
To lie in dead oblivion, losing half
The fleeting moments of too short a life;
Total extinction of the enlighten'd soul?
Wilder'd and tossing thro' distemper'd
dreams?
Who would in such a gloomy state remain Longer than nature craves; when ev'ry muse
And every blooming pleasure wait without,
To bless the wildly devious morning walk?
—Thomson.

When you find an unwillingness to rise early in the morning, endeavor to rouse your faculties, and act up to your kind, and consider that you have to do the business of a man; and that action is both beneficial and the end of your being.—Antoninus.

Earnestness

Earnestness is the devotion of all the faculties.—C. N. Bovee.

Earnestness alone makes life eternal.—Carlyle.

Time and pains will do anything.—F. W. Robertson.

Intense people are usually narrow-minded.—Madame de Sartory.

Earnestness and sincerity are synonymous.—Kant.

Earnestness is the salt of eloquence.—Victor Hugo.

The generous warmth that prompts to worthy deeds.—Gifford.

Earnestness is enthusiasm tempered by reason.—Pascal.

His heart was in his work, and the heart giveth grace unto every art.—Longfellow.

There is no substitute for thoroughgoing, ardent, and sincere earnestness.—Dickens.

A man in earnest finds means, or, if he cannot find, creates them.—William Ellery Channing.

My God, help me always resolutely to strive, and, through life and death, to force my way unto Thee.—Christian Scriver.

The earnestness of life is the only passport to the satisfaction of life.—Theodore Parker.

Earnestness is needed in this world as much as any virtue.—James Ellis.

Earnestness is the best gift of mental power, and deficiency of heart is the cause of many men never becoming great.—Bulwer.

A man is relieved and gay when he has put his heart into his work and done his best; but what he has said or done otherwise shall give no peace.—Emerson.

Vigor is contagious; and whatever makes us either think or feel strongly adds to our power and enlarges our field of action.—Emerson.

The most precious wine is produced upon the sides of volcanoes. Now bold and inspiring ideals are only born of a clear head that stands over a glowing heart.—Horace Mann.

Child of earth and earthly sorrows—child of God and immortal hopes—arise from thy sadness, gird up the loins of thy mind, and with unfaltering energy press toward thy rest and reward on high.—E. L. Magoon.

Up, then, with speed, and work;

Fling ease and self away—

This is no time for thee to sleep—

Up, watch, and work, and pray!

—Horatius Bonar.

The shortest and surest way to prove a work possible is strenuously to set about it; and no wonder if that proves it possible that for the most part makes it so.—South.

Earnestness commands the respect of mankind. A wavering, vacillating, dead-and-alive Christian does not get the respect of the church or the world.—John Hall.

A man without earnestness is a mournful and perplexing spectacle. But it is a consolation to believe, as we must of such a one, that he is the most effectual and compulsive of all schools.—Sterling.

I look upon enthusiasm in all other points but that of religion to be a very necessary turn of mind; as, indeed, it is a vein which nature seems to have marked with more or less strength in the tempers of most men.—Fitzosborne.

He who would do some great thing in this short life, must apply himself to the work with such a concentration of his forces as to the idle spectators, who live only to amuse themselves, looks like insanity.—John Foster.

Without earnestness no man is ever great, or does really great things. He may be the cleverest of men; he may be brilliant, entertaining, popular; but he will want weight. No soul-moving picture was ever painted that had not in it depth of shadow.—Peter Bayne.

Do you wish to become rich? You may become rich, that is, if you desire it in no half way, but thoroughly. A miser sacrifices all to his single passion; hoards farthings and dies possessed of wealth. Do you wish to master any science or accomplishment? Give yourself to it and it lies beneath your feet. Time and pains will do anything. This world is given as the prize for the men in earnest; and that which is true of this world is truer still of the world to come.—F. W. Robertson.

Earnestness is the cause of patience; it gives endurance, overcomes pain, strengthens weakness, braves dangers, sustains hope, makes light of difficulties, and lessens the sense of weariness in overcoming them.—Bovee.

Earth

The rugged, all-nourishing earth.—Sophocles.

The flowers are but earth vivified.—Lamartine.

Earth, air, and ocean, glorious three.—R. Montgomery.

Earth, ocean, air, beloved brotherhood.—Shelley.

The earth, that's nature's mother, is her tomb.—Shakespeare.

This goodly frame, the earth, seems to me a sterile promontory.—Shakespeare.

I believe this earth on which we stand is but the vestibule to glorious mansions through which a moving crowd forever press.—Joanna Baillie.

Once every atom of this ground lived, breathed, and felt like me!—James Montgomery.

We are pilgrims, not settlers; this earth is our inn, not our home.—J. H. Vincent.

Air, earth, and seas, obey'd th' Almighty nod,
And with a general fear confess'd the God.
—Dryden.

Speak no harsh words of earth; she is our mother, and few of us her sons who have not added a wrinkle to her brow.—Alexander Smith.

Nought so vile that on the earth doth live, but to the earth some special good doth give.—Shakespeare.

Where is the dust that has not been alive?
The spade, the plough, disturb our ancestors;
From human mould we reap our daily bread.
—Young.

This poor world, the object of so much insane attachment, we are about to leave; it is but misery, vanity, and folly; a phantom—the very fashion of which “passeth away.”—Fénelon.

Earth, thou great footstool of our God
Who reigns on high; thou fruitful source
Of all our raiment, life and food,
Our house, our parent, and our nurse.
—Watts.

Friend, hast thou considered the “rugged, all-nourishing earth,” as Sophocles well names her; how she feeds the sparrow on the housetop, much more her darling man?—Carlyle.

Lean not on earth; it will pierce thee to the heart; a broken reed at best; but oft a spear, on its sharp point Peace bleeds and Hope expires.
—Young.

Let the mantle of worldly enjoyments hang loose about you, that it may be easily dropped when death comes to carry you into another world.
—T. Boston.

The earth, though in comparison of heaven so small, nor glistening, may of solid good contain more plenty than the sun, that barren shines.—Milton.

I speak of that learning which makes us acquainted with the boundless extent of nature, and the universe, and which even while we remain in this world, discovers to us both heaven, earth, and sea.—Cicero.

The earth is bright,
And I am earthly, so I love it well;
Though heaven is holier, and full of light
Yet I am frail, and with frail things would dwell.
—Mrs. Judson.

Our earthly possessions will indeed perish in the final wreck of all things; but let the ship perish, let all we have sink in the deep, if we may come "safe to land." From these storms and billows—these dangerous seas—these tempestuous voyages—may we all be brought at last safe to heaven.—Albert Barnes.

The cloud-capped towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve,
And, like this unsubstantial pageant faded,
Leave not a rack behind. —Shakespeare.

Transiency is stamped on all our possessions, occupations, and delights. We have the hunger for eternity in our souls, the thought of eternity in our hearts, the destination for eternity written on our inmost being, and the need to ally ourselves with eternity proclaimed by the most short-lived trifles of time. Either these things will be the blessing or the curse of our lives. Which do you mean that they shall be for you?—Alexander Maclaren.

Thou sure and firm-set earth,
Hear not my steps, which way they walk,
for fear
The very stones prate of my whereabout.
—Shakespeare.

It is this earth that, like a kind mother, receives us at our birth, and sustains us when born; it is this alone, of all the elements around us, that is never found an enemy of man.—Pliny.

The waters deluge man with rain, oppress him with hail, and drown him with inundations; the air rushes in storms, prepares the tempest, or lights up the volcano; but the earth, gentle and indulgent, ever subservient to the wants of man, spreads his walks with flowers and his table with plenty; returns with interest every good committed to her care, and though she produces the poison, she still supplies the antidote; though constantly teased more to furnish the luxuries of man than his necessities, yet, even to the last, she continues her kind indulgence, and when life is over she piously covers his remains in her bosom.—Pliny.

The common growth of Mother Earth
Suffices me—her tears, her mirth,
Her humblest mirth and tears.
—Wordsworth.

Diseased nature oftentimes breaks forth
In strange eruptions; oft the teeming earth
Is with a kind of colic pinch'd and vex'd
By the imprisoning of unruly wind Within her womb; which, for enlargement striving,
Shakes the old heldame earth, and topples
down
Steeple and moss-grown towers.
—Shakespeare.

Earth fills her lap with pleasures of her own;
Yearnings she hath in her own natural kind,
And, even with something of a mother's mind,
And no unworthy aim,
The homely nurse doth all she can
To make her foster child, her inmate man,
Forget the glories he hath known
And that imperial palace whence he came.
—Wordsworth.

Ease

A life of ease is a difficult pursuit.
—Cowper.

Indulge, and to thy genius freely give,
For not to live at ease is not to live.
—Persius.

Ease leads to habit, as success to ease.
He lives by rule who lives himself to please.
—Crabbe.

He lives at ease that freely lives.—Barbour.

Easter

Hail, day of days! in peals of praise
Throughout all ages owned,
When Christ, our God, hell's empire trod,
And high o'er heaven was throned.
—Fortunatus.

Ye heavens, how sang they in your courts,
How sang the angelic choir that day,
When from His tomb the imprisoned God,
Like the strong sunrise, broke away?
—Frederick William Faber, D. D.

Christ is our Passover!
And we will keep the feast
With the new heaven,
The bread of heaven:
All welcome, even the least!
—A. R. Thompson, D. D.

"Christ the Lord is risen to-day,"
Sons of men and angels say.
Raise your joys and triumphs high;
Sing, ye heavens, and earth reply.
—Charles Wesley.

Jesus lives, to Him the Throne
Over all the world is given,
May we go where He is gone,
Rest and reign with Him in heaven.
Alleluia! —C. F. Gillert.

Yes, He is ris'n who is the First and Last;
Who was and is; who liveth and was
dead;
Beyond the reach of death He now has
pass'd,
Of the one glorious Church the glorious Head.
—Horatius Bonar, D. D.

O Risen Christ! O Easter Flower!
How dear Thy Grace has grown!
From east to west, with loving power,
Make all the world Thine own.
—Phillips Brooks.

Awake, thou wintry earth—
Fling off thy sadness!
Fair vernal flowers, laugh forth
Your ancient gladness!
Christ is risen.
—Thomas Blackburn.

Come, ye saints, look here and wonder,
See the place where Jesus lay;
He has burst His bands asunder;
He has borne our sins away;
Joyful tidings,
Yes, the Lord has risen to-day.
—Thomas Kelly.

God expects from men something more at such times, and that it were much to be wished for the credit of their religion as well as the satisfaction of their conscience that their Easter devotions would in some measure come up to their Easter dress.—

South.

Rise, heart! thy Lord is risen. Sing His praise
Without delays.
Who takes thee by the hand, that thou likewise
With Him mayst rise—
That as His death condemned thee to dust,
His life may make thee gold, and much more just.
—Herbert.

The fasts are done; the Aves said;
The moon has filled her horn;
And in the solemn night I watch
Before the Easter morn.
So pure, so still the starry heaven,
So hushed the brooding air,
I could hear the sweep of an angel's wings
If one should earthward fare.
—Edna Dean Proctor.

Ring, snow-white bells, your purest praise
To glorify this Easter day,
And let our risen Saviour's joy
Your voiceless, fragrant breath employ—
Fill every valley with perfume
And lighten death's appalling gloom,
Teach ye our troubled hearts the way
To trust our Saviour every day.
—W. J. R. Taylor.

Christ hath arisen! O mountain peaks, attest—
Witness, resounding glen and torrent wave!
The immortal courage in the human breast Sprung from that victory—tell how oft the brave
To camp 'midst rock and cave,
Nerved by those words, their struggling faith have borne,
Planting the cross on high above the clouds of morn!
—Mrs. Hemans.

Sing aloud, children! sing to the glorious
King
Of Redemption, who sits on the throne,
For the seraphim high veil their faces, and cry,
And the angels are praising the Son.
With His raiment blood-dyed, and with wounds in His side,
He returns like a chief from the war,
When His champion blow hath laid death
and hell low,
And hath driven destruction afar.
—A. R. Thompson, D. D.

Our faith in God asks of Him a risen Redeemer, and the faith is answered in a Saviour raised from the dead.—Bishop Fallows.

But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept.—Bible.

Immortality is the glorious discovery of Christianity.—Channing.

The resurrection of Jesus Christ is a certainty. If any fact, not merely of Christianity, but of history, stands on an impregnable foundation, this does.—E. P. Goodwin, D. D.

Tomb, thou shalt not hold Him longer;
Death is strong, but life is stronger;
Stronger than the dark, the light;
Stronger than the wrong, the right;
Faith and hope triumphant say,
"Christ will rise on Easter day!"
—Phillips Brooks.

Up and down our lives obedient
Walk, dear Christ, with footsteps radiant,
Till those garden lives shall be Fair with duties done for Thee;
And our thankful spirits say,
"Christ arose on Easter Day,"
—Phillips Brooks, D. D.

The fact of resurrection is not extraordinary; it is in accord with what we who believe at all believe to be the uniform law of life—that death does not touch it. The witnesses to the resurrection of Christ were unprejudiced, unexpectant, incredulous, and their honesty is not doubted even by skeptical criticism.—Spurgeon.

Had Christ not risen we could not believe Him to be what He declared Himself when He "made Himself equal with God." But He has risen in the confirmation of all His claims. By it alone, but by it thoroughly, is He manifested as the very Son of God, who has come into the world to reconcile the world to Himself. It is the fundamental fact in the Christian's unwavering confidence in "all the words of this life."—Benj. B. Warfield, D. D.

From the empty grave of Jesus the enemies of the cross turn away in unconcealable dismay. Those whom the force of no logic can convince, and whose hearts are steeled against the appeal of almighty love from the cross itself, quail before the irresistible power of this simple fact. Christ has risen from the dead! After two thousand years of the most determined assault upon the evidence which demonstrates it, that fact stands. And so long as it stands Christianity, too, must stand as the one supernatural religion.—Benj. B. Warfield, D. D.

This Easter-time brings us the assurance that when He comes and shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and with the trump of God, believers who sleep in Christ and those then living will be caught up together to meet Him in the air, and all will be, as in the twinkling of an eye, transformed and transfigured and possessed of bodies as perfect and as glorious as His own, and in these glorious and resplendent bodies we shall reign and rejoice forever.—E. P. Goodwin, D. D.

Had He not emerged from the tomb all our hopes, all our salvation would be lying dead with Him unto this day. But as we see Him issue from the grave we see ourselves issue with Him in newness of life. Now we know that His shoulders were strong enough to bear the burden that was laid upon them, and that He is able to save to the uttermost all that come unto God through Him. The resurrection of Christ is thus the indispensable evidence of His completed work, His accomplished redemption.—Benj. B. Warfield.

All Christian worship is a witness of the resurrection of Him who liveth for ever and ever. Because He lives, "now abideth faith, hope, charity."—Lyman Abbott.

In every grave on earth's green sward is a tiny seed of the resurrection life of Jesus Christ, and that seed cannot perish. It will germinate when the warm south wind of Christ's return brings back the spring-tide to this cold sin-cursed earth of ours; and then they that are in their graves, and we who shall lie down in ours, will feel in our mortal bodies the power of His resurrection, and will come forth to life immortal.—Dr. David Gregg.

In Christ's resurrection, therefore, the Christian man sees the earnest and pledge of his own resurrection; and by it he is enheartened as he lays away the bodies of those dear to him, not sorrowing "as the rest that have no hope," but with hearts swelling with glad anticipations of the day when they shall rise to meet their Lord. "For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also that are fallen asleep in Jesus will He bring with Him."—Benj. B. Warfield, D. D.

A happy and a glorious Easter will this one be to all of us who get a new vision of the risen Christ, and prostrate ourselves in humble adoration at His feet, and cry out: "Rabboni! Rabboni!" Then shall we set our hearts, lifted into a new atmosphere, on things above, and reach an actual higher life. We shall know more of what it is to live by Christ, in Christ, for Christ, and with Christ, till we reach the marvelous light around the throne in glory.—Theo. L. Cuyler, D. D.

We can no longer speak of a bourne from which no traveler e'er returns. The middle wall of partition has been broken down and the boundary become but an invisible line by the resurrection of Christ. That He who died has been raised again and ever lives in the form of a complete humanity is the fundamental fact in the revelation of the Christian doctrine of immortality.—Benj. B. Warfield, D. D.

It was for the glory that was set before Him that Christ endured the humiliation and suffering of the cross. Let us keep our eyes fixed steadily on the crown immortal, and then our sacrifices and services, and sufferings for Christ's cause, will seem light and trivial in comparison. * * * The seal of the Sanhedrim, a regiment of soldiers from the town, a floor of rock, a roof of rock, a wall of rock, a niche of rock, cannot keep Christ in the crypt. Though you pile upon us all the boulders of the mountains, you cannot keep us down. The door of the tomb will be lifted from its hinges and flung flat in the dust.—Talmage.

Over all earth's scarred and grave-ridged surface it kindled the light of this great hope: These moldering ashes may live again in human form. By the testimony of the senses Jesus is alive from the dead, and by the emptiness of Joseph's sepulcher, by Mary's risen Son, the resurrection is not incredible. Bereaved hearts may wrap themselves around with its sweet hope; human graves may be made vocal with its promise! the dying race of man come unto victory through faith.—S. S. Mitchell, D. D.

Jesus has redeemed not only our souls, but our bodies. When the Lord shall deliver His captive people out of the land of the enemy He will not leave a bone of one of them in the adversary's power. The dominion of death shall be utterly broken.—Spurgeon.

Ring, joyous bells of Easter,
Death hath not conquered Life;
Victorious is our risen Lord,
And finished all His strife,
From Calvary's mount of darkness,
Lo! starry lilies bloom;
For by the cross we conquer
And fearless face the tomb.
—Mary E. Sangster.

For forty centuries, in one unbroken column, the race of man had been marching into the shadows. And of all the millions who had descended into the shadowed valley, not one had ever returned. No dead human form through all the centuries had risen up into a post-mortem life. There was in all Earth's area not one empty grave. No human heart believed, no human voice declared that there was such a grave—a grave robbed by the power of a victor stronger than man's great enemy, death. It was therefore a new and wonderful message which the Apostle communicated, when unto the dying race of man he lifted up his voice in the words: "One human form has risen from the dead; one grave of earth is empty; the man Christ Jesus who was dead, is alive again."—S. S. Mitchell, D. D.

This, then, is the doctrine of the resurrection. We do not believe—at least I do not—that law has been rudely violated in one extraordinary and unparalleled episode. We believe that a universal law of life, overmastering death, and always superior to it, has had once a visible witness.—Spurgeon.

If you have no share in the living Lord may God have mercy upon you! If you have no share in Christ's rising from the dead then you will not be raised up in the likeness of His glorified body. If you do not attain to that resurrection from among the dead then you must abide in death.—Spurgeon.

Whoever, therefore, is a true believer has of necessity an indefeasible hope, an absolute certainty of salvation. He shares the resurrection of Christ. His sins are as absolutely buried out of God's sight as the body of Christ was buried in the tomb from the light of day. They can no more touch and spoil his hope than they can touch and condemn the risen Lord. All true children of God are now, because of His resurrection, wholly and forever justified, assured absolutely that they are now heirs of God and joint heirs with Jesus Christ, and waiting only for the day of full and final deliverance and glorification. E. P. Goodwin, D. D.

We have often asserted, and we affirm it yet again, that no fact in history is better attested than the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. It must not be denied, by any who are willing to pay the slightest respect to the testimony of their fellow-men, that Jesus, who died upon the cross, and was buried in the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea, did literally rise again from the dead.—Spurgeon.

A bare seed is the former. Look into the wheat bin. There lie the bare seeds—the natural bodies—but no artist would think of sitting down before them. Now turn your eyes upon the field of living grain as the winds of summer billow its surface. What beauty—what a glory! The bare grains have risen from death in a body of living green, matchless in the splendor of a new and a higher material body. So is the resurrection of the human form. It is sown corruptible—it is raised incorruptible; it is sown in weakness—it is raised in power; a low, inferior, imperfect body is sown—one of glorious perfection rises up from this, as from a seed. There is a natural body and there is a spiritual body, and the former comes first—is the seed of the latter? As we have borne the image of the earthly, so also shall we bear the image of the heavenly.—S. S. Mitchell, D. D.

We Christians do not believe that Jesus Christ was the only one that ever rose from the dead. We believe that every death-bed is a resurrection; that from every grave the stone is rolled away.—Spurgeon.

No one has ever yet succeeded in resolving the narrative of this event into figure or myth, and failures in this direction go to prove that the evidence on which the event rests is unimpeachable. And if it is trustworthy, then Christianity rests on a sure foundation, and our faith is in no sense vain, but warrantable and precious.—Geo. C. Lorimer, D. D.

Let patriotism have its high days and freedom its monuments, and let the triumphs of navigators and generals be annually observed; but surely, beyond all these, a season that stands for as much to the race as Easter does may well be remembered each year with songs and flowers and with every mark of gratitude and of loftiest jubilation.—Rev. Geo. C. Lorimer, D. D.

It longs for existence that it may have life. Life and immortality are brought to light by the higher and holy nature of the risen Christ, who shows the meaning and possibilities of life, and awakens in all responsive natures a desire to live. Every Christian life becomes thus a witness of the resurrection. Its very possibility in a world of evil is due to a living Saviour. "Because I live, ye shall live also."—Bishop Hendrix.

See the land, her Easter keeping,
Rises as her Maker rose;
Seeds so long in darkness sleeping
Burst at last from winter snows.
Earth with heaven above rejoices;
Fields and garlands hail the spring;
Shaughts and woodlands ring with voices
While the wild birds build and sing.
—Charles Kingsley.

Christ is risen from the dead, and thus His own words have been justified. Christ is risen from the dead, and thus God has given Him the sign of His Messianic mission. The final and absolute seal of genuineness has been put on all His claims, and the indelible stamp of a divine authority upon all His teachings. The resurrection spans and binds the sacred Scriptures from Genesis to Revelation. Christ is risen from the dead, and every promise of God is yea and amen in Him.—Bishop Fallows.

Was it not most meet that a woman should first see the risen Saviour? She was first in the transgression; let her be first in the justification. In you garden she was first to work our woe; let her in that other garden be the first to see Him who works our weal. She takes first the apple of that bitter tree which brings us all our sorrow; let her be the first to see the Mighty Gardener, who has planted a tree which brings forth fruit unto everlasting life.—Spurgeon.

Let all the jubilant sounds of earth swing up in one resonant wave of triumphant song. Let us robe ourselves in the sunny gladness of a hope so bright—the hope that defies death, and reaches across all the breadth of graves, and clasps the hand of an immortal friend, and says through any hour of sorrow, "It doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like Him"—waking or sleeping, for, waking or sleeping, we are the Lord's; and while it thus chants its faith, hears, rising slow and sweet, and with an olden pathos, out of the deeps of ancient days, the quenchless faith of a twilight child of God: "I know that my Redeemer liveth: * * * and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God."—Rev. I. M. Haldemann.

Christendom never came from an unbroken grave. It would have been buried in that grave, as Judas thought it was going to be, and as the Jews thought it was going to be, except there had been a resurrection from the dead. Then you can explain Christendom, churches, and literatures, if Christ rose again; but otherwise they cannot be explained at all. Our whole civilization rests on the broken Cross of the Master, and it is incredible that a civilization like this, in a world advancing steadily for eighteen centuries, has been founded on a lie.—Richard S. Storrs, D. D.

We do not strike out one part or another part of the prophecy on record; we have the whole compacted together by this mighty keystone in the arch, the resurrection of the Son of God and the glorious manifestation given by Him as the divine representative and Son in the world. Then the world is beautiful; it is not a place of graves; it is a place of graves that are to be opened. It is not the city of the dead. They who are dead to human view are living unto God. It is a portal of paradise instead of a place of graves, and there is light upon it every Easter morning such as never was before on sea or shore until the Master had risen from the grave.—Richard S. Storrs, D. D.

We greatly need the cheer of this precious Easter truth. We make too little of the place our Lord has gone to prepare for us. We rob ourselves greatly when we try to reduce heaven to a mere state of ecstatic feeling. We need the cheer which comes of having the eye of faith fixed on the better country and the city that hath the foundations. Such a certainty of an inheritance that is real and that cannot fade away goes far to mitigate the pangs which come of the fires and floods and disasters and frauds which so often despoil God's people of their earthly possessions; for we know that the things seen are temporal, but the things not seen are eternal, and they are only a few heart-beats away.—E. P. Goodwin, D. D.

He who burst the bars of death was thereby declared to be the Son of God with power. Since the resurrection morning there has never been—there could not be—the slightest question as to His final rulership of the world. Death was conquered, Satan was conquered, and He proclaimed the wearer of the name above every name. His final triumph was hence merely a question of the fullness of time. And He is now seated at the right hand of the Father, from henceforth expecting till His enemies are made His footstool. This Easter morning certifies us of that approaching day, and with, as it were, the foregleams of its glory on our faces and the stirrings of its mighty joy in our hearts, bids us watch and pray and look for the coming of the King.—E. P. Goodwin, D. D.

Preach the defeat of death and the triumph over the grave as historic facts; preach it as the great middle truth, as the potent truth out of which all others of our faith flow forth; keep it ever lifted up as the justification of all our best endeavors; preach it as the one great thing that rails off the children of God from the children of death; hold it out as the beacon across all the dark waters of time's tumult; throw it out in the face of human fears, and tell it increasingly with joy.—Rev. I. M. Haldemann.

Remember there is no man can say that Jesus is the Lord but by the Holy Ghost; so no man can profess, to any purpose, faith in Christ's resurrection but by the Holy Ghost. "It is the Spirit that beareth witness" now, as nineteen centuries ago, by that influence on the will of man which leaves the intellect at liberty to do justice to the evidence before it. Pray that most blessed Spirit so to teach your hearts and wills that you may, at least, have no reason for wishing the resurrection to be untrue.

Pray Him for His gracious assistance that you may recover or may strengthen the great grace of faith and have your part in the blessed promise of the apostle: "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thy heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved."—Canon Liddon, D. D.

Thine, O death, was the furrow: we cast therein the precious seed. Now let us wait and see what God shall bring forth for us. A single leaf falls—the bud at its axil will shoot forth many leaves. The husbandman bargains with the year to give back a hundred grains for the one buried. Shall God be less generous? Yet, when we sow, our hearts think that beauty is gone out, that all is lost. But when God shall bring again to our eyes the hundredfold beauty and sweetness of that which we planted, how shall we shame over that dim faith that, having eyes, saw not, and ears, heard not, though all heaven and all the earth appeared, and spake, to comfort those who mourn!—Henry Ward Beecher.

There can, I apprehend, my dear brethren, be no sort of doubt that, if an ordinary historical occurrence, such as the death of Julius Cæsar, is attested as clearly as the resurrection of our Lord—not, we will suppose, more clearly nor less—as having taken place nineteen centuries ago, all the world would believe it as a matter of course. Nay, more: if an extraordinary occurrence traversing the usual operations of God in nature were similarly tested, it would be easily believed if only it stood alone as an isolated wonder connected with no religious claims, implying no religious duties, appealing only to the bare understanding, and having no bearing, however remote, upon the will. The reason why the resurrection was not always believed upon the evidence of those who were witness to it was because to believe means for a consistent and thoughtful man to believe in and accept practically a great deal else. To believe the resurrection is to believe implicitly in the Christian faith.—Canon Liddon, D. D.

He (Death) carries a black flag, and he takes no prisoners. He digs a trench across the hemispheres and fills it with the carcasses of nations. Fifty times would the world have been depopulated had not God kept making new generations. Fifty times the world would have swung lifeless through the air—no man on the mountain, no man on the sea—an abandoned ship plowing through immensity. Again and again has He done this work with all generations. He is a monarch as well as a conqueror; His palace a sepulcher; His fountains the falling tears of a world. Blessed be God! in the light of this Easter morning I see the prophecy that His scepter shall be broken and His palace shall be demolished. The hour is coming when all who are in their graves shall come forth. Christ risen, we shall rise. Jesus is "the first-fruits of them that slept."

Day of the Crucified Lord's Resurrection;
Day that the Lord by His triumph hath made;

Day of Redemption's seal of perfection;
Day of the Crown of His power displayed;

Beautiful Easter, dazzling bright;
Sun-Day that filleth all Sundays with light!
Queen of all festivals; glad culmination
Of the bright feasts that encircle the year;

Glimpsing the Life, in a transfiguration,
That shall at length in its glory appear.
Beautiful Easter; day in its height;
Sun-Day that filleth all Sundays with light!
He who redeemeth, consoleth, forgiveth;

Who His own body raised up from the dead,
Holdeth all evil in bondage and liveth,
Source of all blessing, our Life and our Head.

It is His Glory that maketh thee bright,
Sun-Day that filleth all Sundays with light!
—Harriet McEwen Kimball.

Most of all, when the very anniversary comes and we are carried back to the cross and to the sepulcher from which the Master came, should this note of triumph be in our hearts or on our lips: songs of triumphant praise should sound from organ and voice. When we go home, it should be with a feeling that the world is consecrated, the sepulcher has been broken, and that life is lovelier than ever, and duty more beautiful, and death not terrible. So we should walk with an elastic step, with a light shining over our faces and in our eyes, and with music on our lips as we go to our homes; and if any one ask, Whence came this new expression? Whence came this sweeter and more victorious tone? we should be able to say to them, It is natural, for to-day I have walked with the risen Christ; to-day I have walked as conqueror of the Cross with Him who conquered it; to-day I have walked near the gates which He entered who broke the bars of the sepulcher and ascended in glory to heaven.—Richard S. Storrs, D. D.

Eating

We must eat to live, not live to eat.
—Fielding.

He was a bold man that first ate an oyster.—Swift.

The proof of the pudding is in the eating.—Cervantes.

Strive mightily, but eat and drink as friends.—Shakespeare.

Unquiet meals make ill digestions.
—Shakespeare.

Feast to-day makes fast to-morrow.
—Plautus.

Appetite comes with eating.—Rabelais.

Go to your banquet then, but use delight
So as to rise still with an appetite.
—Herrick.

Sit down and feed, and welcome to our table.—Shakespeare.

Tell me what you eat, and I will tell you what you are.—Brillat Savarin.

I want every peasant to have a chicken in his pot on Sundays.—Henry IV. of France.

To abstain that we may enjoy is the epicureanism of reason.—Rousseau.

A warmed-up dinner was never worth much.—Boileau.

They say fingers were made before forks, and hands before knives.—Swift.

With eager feeding food doth choke the feeder.—Shakespeare.

Now good digestion wait on appetite,
And health on both. —Shakespeare.

They are as sick that surfeit with too much, as they that starve with nothing.—Shakespeare.

Famish'd people must be slowly nurst,
And fed by spoonfuls, else they always burst. —Byron.

A stomach that is seldom empty despises common food.—Horace.

A surfeit of the sweetest things
The deepest loathing to the stomach brings.
—Shakespeare.

For a man seldom thinks with more earnestness of anything than he does of his dinner.—Samuel Johnson.

My soul tasted that heavenly food, which gives new appetite while it satiates.—Dante.

One solid dish his weekday meal affords,
An added pudding solemniz'd the Lord's.
—Pope.

Bad men live that they may eat and drink,
whereas good men eat and drink that they may live.—Socrates.

O hour, of all hours, the most bless'd upon earth,
The blessed hour of our dinners!
—Lord Lytton.

The turnpike road to people's hearts I find Lies through their mouths, or I mistake mankind.
—Dr. Wolcot.

For the sake of health, medicines are taken by weight and measure; so ought food to be, or by some similar rule.—Skelton.

For I look upon it, that he who does not mind his belly will hardly mind anything else.—Samuel Johnson.

Your supper is like the Hidalgo's dinner; very little meat, and a great deal of table-cloth.—Longfellow.

The difference between a rich man and a poor man is this—the former eats when he pleases, and the latter when he can get it.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Some hae meat and canna eat,
And some wad eat that want it;
But we hae meat, and we can eat;
Sae let the Lord be thankit.
—Burns.

"Here, dearest Eve," he exclaims, "here is food." "Well," answered she, with the germ of a housewife stirring within her, "we have been so busy to-day that a picked-up dinner must serve."—Nath. Hawthorne.

All human history attests
That happiness for man—the hungry sinner—
Since Eve ate apples, much depends on dinner.
—Byron.

Yet shall you have to rectify your palate,
An olive, capers, or some better salad
Ushering the mutton; with a short-legged hen,
If we can get her, full of eggs, and then,
Limons, and wine for sauce: to these a coney
Is not to be despaired of for our money;
And though fowl now be scarce, yet there are clerks,
The sky not falling, think we may have larks.
—Ben Jonson.

"Good well-dress'd turtle beats them hollow—
It almost makes me wish, I vow,
To have two stomachs, like a cow!"
And, lo! as with the cud, an inward thrill
Upheaved his waistcoat and disturb'd his frill,
His mouth was oozing, and he work'd his jaw—
"I almost think that I could eat one raw."
—Hood.

The chief pleasure (in eating) does not consist in costly seasoning, or exquisite flavor, but in yourself. Do you seek sauce by sweating.—Horace.

A woman asked a coachman, "Are you full inside"? Upon which Lamb put his head through the window and said: "I am quite full inside; tha' last piece of pudding at Mr. Gillman's did the business for me."—Charles Lamb.

Man is a carnivorous production,
And must have meals, at least one meal
a day;
He cannot live, like woodcocks, upon suc-
tion,
But, like the shark and tiger, must have
prey;
Although his anatomical construction
Bears vegetables, in a grumbling way,
Your laboring people think beyond all question,
Beef, veal, and mutton better for digestion.
—Byron.

Oh, better no doubt is a dinner of herbs,
When season'd by love, which no rancor disturbs
And sweeten'd by all that is sweetest in life
Than turbot, bisque, ortolans, eaten in strife!
But if, out of humor, and hungry, alone
A man should sit down to dinner, each one Of the dishes of which the cook chooses to spoil
With a horrible mixture of garlic and oil,
The chances are ten against one, I must own,
He gets up as ill-tempered as when he sat
down.
—Lord Lytton.

We may live without poetry, music and art;
We may live without conscience, and live without heart;
We may live without friends; we may live without books;
But civilized man cannot live without cooks.
He may live without books—what is knowledge but grieving?
He may live without hope—what is hope but deceiving?
He may live without love—what is passion
but pining?
But where is the man that can live without dining?
—Lord Lytton.

Their best and most wholesome feeding is upon one dish and no more and the same plaine and simple; for surely this huddling of many meats one upon another of divers tastes is pestiferous. But sundrie sauces are more dangerous than that.—Pliny.

Eccentricity

Eccentricity is developed monoma-nia.—Bayard Taylor.

Who affects useless singularities has surely a little mind.—Lavater.

Even beauty cannot always palliate eccentricity.—Balzac.

Men are of necessity so mad, that not to be mad were madness in another form.—Pascal.

Often extraordinary excellence, not being rightly conceived, does rather offend than please.—Sir P. Sidney.

Oddities and singularities of behavior may attend genius; but when they do, they are its misfortunes and blemishes. The man of true genius will be ashamed of them, or at least will never affect to be distinguished by them.—Sir W. Temple.

Eccentricity has always abounded when and where strength of character has abounded; and the amount of eccentricity in a society has been proportional to the amount of genius, mental vigor, and moral courage it contained. That so few now dare to be eccentric, marks the chief danger of the time.—John Stuart Mill.

Echo

Echo is the voice of a reflection in a mirror.—Hawthorne.

The babbling gossip of the air.—
Shakespeare.

That tuneful nymph, the babbling
Echo.—Ovid.

The old echoes are long in dying.—
Charles H. Parkhurst.

Lost Echo sits amid the voiceless mountains,
And feeds her grief.
—Shelley.

Echo waits with art and care
And will the faults of song repair.
—Emerson.

The invisible and loquacious maiden of the mountain passes.—Horace Smith.

And when the echoes had ceased, like a sense of pain was the silence.—
Longfellow.

The Jews of old called an echo "the daughter of the voice."—Bathkeel.

The shadow of a sound,—a voice without a mouth, and words without a tongue.—Paul Chatfield.

I heard * * *
* * * the great echo flap
And buffet round the hills from bluff to bluff. —Tennyson.

So plain is the distinction of our words,
That many have supposed it a spirit
That answers. —Webster.

Let echo, too, perform her part,
Prolonging every note with art;
And in a low expiring strain,
Play all the comfort o'er again.
—Addison.

And a million horrible bellowing echoes
broke
From the red-ribb'd hollow behind the wood,
And thunder'd up into heaven.
—Tennyson.

Hark! how the gentle echo from her cell
Talks through the cliffs, and murmuring o'er the stream,
Repeats the accent—we shall part no more.
—Akenside.

Sweetest Echo, sweetest nymph, that liv'st unseen
Within thy airy shell,
By slow Meander's margent green,
And in the violet-embroidered vale.
—Milton.

O love, they die, in yon rich sky,
They faint on hill or field or river:
Our echoes roll from soul to soul,
And grow forever and forever.
Blow, bugle, blow, set the wild echoes flying,
And answer, echoes, answer, dying, dying,
dying. —Tennyson.

How sweet the answer Echo makes
To music at night,
When, roused by lute or horn, she wakes,
And far away, o'er lawns and lakes,
Goes answering light.
—Moore.

Where we find echoes, we generally find emptiness and hollowness;
it is the contrary with the echoes of the heart.—J. F. Boyes.

Economy

Economy is a savings-bank, into which men drop pennies, and get dollars in return.—H. W. Shaw.

Economy is a great revenue.—Cicero.

Economy, the poor man's mint.—
Tupper.

Ere fancy you consult, consult your purse.—Franklin.

A creative economy is the fuel of magnificence.—Emerson.

Let heaven-eyed Prudence battle with Desire.—J. T. Fields.

The back door robs the house.—
George Herbert.

To make three guineas do the work of five.—Burns.

Beware of little expenses; a small leak will sink a great ship.—Franklin.

Economy is half the battle of life;
it is not so hard to earn money as to spend it well.—Spurgeon.

It would be well had we more misers than we have among us.—
Goldsmith.

There can be no economy where there is no efficiency.—Beaconsfield.

If you know how to spend less than you get you have the philosopher's stone.—Franklin.

The injury of prodigality leads to this, that he who will not economize will have to agonize.—Confucius.

A penny saved is two pence clear,
A pin a day's a groat a year.
—Franklin.

Where there is a question of economy, I prefer privation.—Madame Swetchine.

Not to be covetous is money, not to be a purchaser is a revenue.—Cicero.

Take care to be an economist in prosperity; there is no fear of your being one in adversity.—Zimmermann.

Economy is an excellent lure to betray people into expense.—Zimmermann.

Frugality is founded on the principle that all riches have limits.—Burke.

There is no gain so certain as that which arises from sparing what you have.—Publius Syrus.

To balance fortune by a just expense, Join with Economy, Magnificence.
—Pope.

Be saving, but not at the cost of all liberality. Have the soul of a king and the hand of a wise economist.—Joubert.

There are but two ways of paying debt: increase of industry in raising income, increase of thrift in laying out.—Carlyle.

No man is rich whose expenditure exceeds his means; and no one is poor whose incomings exceed his outgoings.—Haliburton.

I can get no remedy against this consumption of the purse; borrowing only lingers and lingers it out, but the disease is incurable.—Shakespeare.

The man who will live above his present circumstances is in great danger of living, in a little, much beneath them.—Addison.

As much wisdom may be expended on a private economy as on an empire, and as much wisdom may be drawn from it.—Emerson.

Men live best upon small means. Nature has provided for all, if they only knew how to use her gifts.—Claudianus.

The world abhors closeness, and all but admires extravagance; yet a slack hand shows weakness, a tight hand strength.—Charles Buxton.

He that, when he should not, spends too much, shall, when he would not, have no little to spend.—Feltbam.

Economy is the parent of integrity, of liberty, and of ease, and the beautiful sister of temperance, of cheerfulness and health.—Dr. Johnson.

A man may, if he knows not how to save as he gets, keep his nose all his life to the grindstone and die not worth a groat at last.—Benjamin Franklin.

I knew once a very covetous, sordid fellow, who used to say, Take care of the pence; for the pounds will take care of themselves.—Lord Chesterfield.

The regard one shows economy is like that we show an old aunt who is to leave us something at last.—Shenstone.

With parsimony a little is sufficient; and without it nothing is sufficient; whereas frugality makes a poor man rich.—Seneca.

He who is taught to live upon little owes more to his father's wisdom than he that has a great deal left him does to his father's care.—William Penn.

Sense can support herself handsomely in most countries on some eighteen pence a day; but for fantasy, planets and solar systems, will not suffice.—Macaulay.

Certainly, if a man will but keep of an even hand, his ordinary expenses ought to be but to the half of his receipts; and if he thinks to wax rich, but to the third part.—Bacon.

The prospect of penury in age is so gloomy and terrifying that every man who looks before him must resolve to avoid it; and it must be avoided generally by the science of sparing.—Dr. Johnson.

Proportion and propriety are among the best secrets of domestic wisdom; and there is no surer test of integrity than a well-proportioned expenditure.—Hannah More.

Gain may be temporary and uncertain; but ever while you live expense is constant and certain; and it is easier to build two chimneys than to keep one in fuel.—Franklin.

Qualities not regulated run into their opposites. Economy before competence is meanness after it. Therefore economy is for the poor; the rich may dispense with it.—Bovee.

Nature is avariciously frugal; in matter it allows no atom to elude its grasp; in mind, no thought or feeling to perish. It gathers up the fragments that nothing be lost.—Rev. Dr. Thomas.

Let us learn the meaning of economy. Economy is a high human office,—a sacrament when its aim is grand, when it is the prudence of simple tastes, when it is practised for freedom or for love or devotion.—Emerson.

As boys should be educated with temperance, so the first greatest lesson that should be taught them is to admire frugality. It is by the exercise of this virtue alone they can ever expect to be useful members of society.—Goldsmith.

The man who will live above his present circumstances is in great danger of living in a little time much beneath them, or, as the Italian proverb says: "The man who lives by hope will die by despair."—Addison.

Economy is integrity and profuseness is a cruel and crafty demon, that gradually involves her followers in dependence and debts; that is, fetters them with irons that enter into their souls.—Hawkesworth.

Men talk in raptures of youth and beauty, wit and sprightliness; but after seven years of union not one of them is to be compared to good family management, which is seen at every meal, and felt every hour in the husband's purse.—Witherspoon.

Sound economy is a sound understanding brought into action; it is calculation realized; it is the doctrine of proportion reduced to practice; it is foreseeing contingencies, and providing against them.—Hannah More.

Expense, and great expense, may be an essential part in true economy. If parsimony were to be considered as one of the kinds of that virtue, there is, however, another and a higher economy. Economy is a distinctive virtue, and consists not in saving, but in selection.—Burke.

All to whom want is terrible, upon whatever principle, ought to think themselves obliged to learn the sage maxims of our parsimonious ancestors, and attain the salutary arts of contracting expense; for without economy none can be rich, and with it few can be poor.—Johnson.

It is no small commendation to manage a little well. He is a good waggoner that can turn in a little room. To live well in abundance is the praise to the estate, is the praise not of the person. I will study more how to give a good account of my little, than how to make it more.—Bishop Hall.

He regarded nothing to be cheap that was superfluous, for what one does not need is dear at a penny; and it was better to possess fields, where the plough goes and cattle feed, than fine gardens that require much watering and sweeping.—Plutarch.

Let honesty and industry be thy constant companions and spend one penny less than thy clear gains; then shall thy hide-bound pocket soon begin to thrive and will never again cry with the empty belly-ache; neither will creditors insult thee, nor want oppress, nor hunger bite, nor nakedness freeze thee.—Franklin.

The mere power of saving what is already in our hands must be of easy acquisition to every mind; and as the example of Lord Bacon may show that the highest intellect cannot safely neglect it, a thousand instances every day prove that the humblest may practise it with success.—Dr. Johnson.

Those individuals who save money are better workmen; if they do not the work better, they behave better and are more respectable; and I would sooner have in my trade a hundred men who save money than two hundred who would spend every shilling they get. In proportion as individuals save a little money their morals are much better; they husband that little, and there is a superior tone given to their morals, and they behave better for knowing that they have a little stake in society.

Education

Education is the cheap defence of nations.—Burke.

Just education forms the man.—Gay.

A boy is better unborn than untaught.—Gascoigne.

The secret of education lies in respecting the pupil.—Emerson.

Love is the greatest of educators.—Mrs. Osgood.

Capacity without education is deplorable.—Saadi.

To form a brave man, educate boldly.—Richter.

Hew the block off, and get out the man.—Pope.

Teach the children! It is painting in fresco.—Emerson.

By education most have been misled.—Dryden.

I carry my satchel still.—Michael Angelo.

We are taught words, not ideas.—Beaconsfield.

Education is only second to nature.—Horace Bushnell.

The best and most important part of every man's education is that which he gives himself.—Gibbon.

Education should be as broad as man.—Emerson.

Education is the apprenticeship of life.—Willmott.

We should ask, not who is the most learned, but who is the best learned.—Lady Montagu.

There are many things which we can afford to forget which it is yet well to learn.—Holmes.

To breed up the son to common sense is evermore the parent's least expense.—Dryden.

Each excellent thing, once well learned, serves for a measure of all other knowledge.—Sir P. Sidney.

Schoolhouses are the republican line of fortifications.—Horace Mann.

'Tis education forms the common mind,
Just as the twig is bent, the tree's inclined.
—Pope.

Man must either make provision of sense to understand, or of a halter to hang himself.—Antisthenes.

In this country every one gets a mouthful of education, but scarcely any one a full meal.—Theodore Parker.

Capacity without education is deplorable, and education without capacity is thrown away.—Saadi.

Observation more than books, experience rather than persons, are the prime educators.—A. Bronson Alcott.

The world is only saved by the breath of the school children.—Talmud.

The best education is to be had at a price, as well as the best broadcloth.—Anthony Trollope.

We shall one day learn to supersede politics by education.—Emerson.

Whose school-hours are all the days and nights of our existence.—Carlyle.

Learned women are ridiculed because they put to shame unlearned men.—George Sand.

The education of life perfects the thinking mind, but depraves the frivolous.—Mme. de Staël.

The acquirements of science may be termed the armor of the mind.—Colton.

Man forms and educates the world, but woman educates man.—Julie Burrow.

Education alone can conduct us to that enjoyment which is at once best in quality and infinite in quantity.—Horace Mann.

No woman is educated who is not equal to the successful management of a family.—Burnap.

Education may work wonders as well in warping the genius of individuals as in seconding it.—A. Bronson Alcott.

Education is a capital to the poor man, and an interest to the rich man.—Horace Mann.

Men must be taught as if you taught them ^{not,}
And things unknown proposed as things forgot.—Pope.

Reading maketh a full man, conference a ready man, and writing an exact man.—Bacon.

Education is only like good culture,—it changes the size, but not the sort.—Henry Ward Beecher.

The worst education, which teaches self-denial, is better than the best which teaches everything else and not that.—John Sterling.

What sculpture is to a block of marble, education is to an human soul.—Addison.

We speak of educating our children. Do we know that our children also educate us?—Mrs. Sigourney.

No inheritance can supply the want of a virtuous education.—Thomas Wilson.

Every fresh acquirement is another remedy against affliction and time.—Willmott.

Education is our only political safety. Outside of this ark all is deluge.—Horace Mann.

The wisest man may always learn something from the humblest peasant.—J. Petit-Senn.

The self-educated are marked by stubborn peculiarities.—Isaac Disraeli.

Learning by study must be won
'Twas ne'er entail'd from sire to son.
—Gay.

Delightful task! to rear the tender thought, to teach the young idea how to shoot.—Thomson.

The best education in the world is that got by struggling to get a living.—Wendell Phillips.

Public instruction should be the first object of government.—Napoleon.

A college education shows a man how little other people know.—Haliburton.

The best that we can do for one another is to exchange our thoughts freely; and that, after all, is about all.—Froude.

Education is the only interest worthy the deep, controlling anxiety of the thoughtful man.—Wendell Phillips.

Histories make men wise; poets, witty; the mathematics, subtle; natural philosophy, deep; moral, grave; logic and rhetoric, able to contend.—Bacon.

Education must bring the practice as nearly as possible to the theory. As the children now are, so will the sovereigns soon be.—Horace Mann.

A complete and generous education fits a man to perform justly, skilfully and magnanimously all the offices of peace and war.—Milton.

Next in importance to freedom and justice is popular education, without which neither justice nor freedom can be permanently maintained.—James A. Garfield.

He is to be educated because he is a man, and not because he is to make shoes, nails, and pins.—Channing.

Education begins the gentleman, but reading, good company, and education must finish him.—Locke.

The pains we take in books or arts which treat of things remote from the necessities of life is a busy idleness.—Fuller.

In exalting the faculties of the soul, we annihilate, in a great degree, the delusion of the senses.—Aimé-Martin.

I think I should know how to educate a boy, but not a girl; I should be in danger of making her too learned.—Niebuhr.

On the diffusion of education among the people rests the preservation and perpetuation of our free institutions.—Webster.

Prussia is great because her people are intelligent. They know the alphabet. The alphabet is conquering the world.—G. W. Curtis.

The true purpose of education is to cherish and unfold the seed of immortality already sown within us.—Mrs. Jameson.

Restraint of discipline, emulation, examples of virtue and of justice, form the education of the world.—Burke.

I have hope that society may be reformed, when I see how much education may be reformed.—Leibnitz.

It is not the mediocrity of women's education which makes their weakness; it is their weakness which necessarily causes their mediocrity.—De Maistre.

The opening of the first grammar-school was the opening of the first trench against monopoly in Church and State.—Lowell.

Nothing so good as a university education, nor worse than a university without its education.—Bulwer-Lytton.

All of us who are worth anything, spend our manhood in unlearning the follies, or expiating the mistakes of our youth.—Shelley.

Women, like men, must be educated with a view to action, or their studies cannot be called education.—Harriet Martineau.

When you introduce into our schools a spirit of emulation, you have present the keenest spur admissible to the youthful intellect.—Horace Mann.

Modern education too often covers the fingers with rings, and at the same time cuts the sinews at the wrist.—Earl of Sterling.

The reason why education is usually so poor among women of fashion is, that it is not needed for the life which they elect to lead.—Julia Ward Howe.

Only the refined and delicate pleasures that spring from research and education can build up barriers between different ranks.—Mme. de Staël.

Do not then train boys to learning by force and harshness; but direct them to it by what amuses their minds.—Plato.

Finally, education alone can conduct us to that enjoyment which is, at once, best in quality and infinite in quantity.—Horace Mann.

No education deserves the name unless it develops thought, unless it pierces down to the mysterious spiritual principle of mind, and starts that into activity and growth.—E. P. Whipple.

The fruit of liberal education is not learning, but the capacity and desire to learn; not knowledge, but power.—C. W. Eliot.

Do not ask if a man has been through college. Ask if a college has been through him; if he is a walking university.—Chapin.

To be thoroughly imbued with the liberal arts refines the manners, and makes men to be mild and gentle in their conduct.—Ovid.

As the fertilest ground must be manured, so must the highest flying wit have a Dædalus to guide him.—Sir P. Sidney.

Unless the people can be kept in total darkness, it is the wisest way for the advocates of truth to give them full light.—Whately.

Education, however indispensable in a cultivated age, produces nothing on the side of genius. When education ends, genius often begins.—Isaac Disraeli.

To pour the fresh instruction o'er the mind,
To breathe the enliv'ning spirit, and to fix
The generous purpose in the glowing breast.
—Thomson.

God hath blessed you with a good name: to be a well-favored man is the gift of fortune, but to write and read comes by nature.—Shakespeare.

A free school
For th' education of young gentlemen,
To study how to drink and take tobacco.
—Randolph.

The best system of education is that which draws its chief support from the voluntary effort of the community, from the individual efforts of citizens, and from those burdens of taxation which they voluntarily impose upon themselves.—Garfield.

Education is the constraining and directing of youth towards that right reason, which the law affirms, and which the experience of the best of our elders has agreed to be truly right.—Plato.

The awakening of our best sympathies, the cultivation of our best and purest tastes, strengthening the desire to be useful and good, and directing youthful ambition to unselfish ends,—such are the objects of true education.—J. T. Headley.

Jails and state prisons are the complement of schools; so many less as you have of the latter, so many more you must have of the former.—Horace Mann.

Education commences at the mother's knee, and every word spoken within the hearing of little children tends toward the formation of character. Let parents bear this ever in mind.—Hosea Ballou.

But it was in making education not only common to all, but in some sense compulsory on all, that the destiny of the free republics of America was practically settled.—Lowell.

Enflamed with the study of learning, and the admiration of virtue; stirred up with high hopes of living to be brave men, and worthy patriots, dear to God, and famous to all ages.—Milton.

He can write and read and cast account.
O monstrous!
We took him setting of boys' copies.
Here's a villain! —Shakespeare.

Girls, like the priestesses of old, should be educated only in sacred places, and never hear, nor much less see, what is rude, immoral, or violent.—Richter.

Wherever is found what is called a paternal government, was found a State education. It had been discovered that the best way to insure implicit obedience was to commence tyranny in the nursery.—Beaconsfield.

They who provide much wealth for their children, but neglect to improve them in virtue, do like those who feed their horses high, but never train them to the manage.—Socrates.

Were it not better for a man in a fair room to set up one great light, or branching candlestick of lights, than to go about with a rushlight into every dark corner.—Bacon.

A journalist is a grumbler, a censor, a giver of advice, a regent of sovereigns, a tutor of nations. Four hostile newspapers are more to be feared than a thousand bayonets.—Napoleon.

Slavery is but half abolished, emancipation is but half completed, while millions of freemen with votes in their hands are left without education.—Robert C. Winthrop.

An acquaintance with the muses, in the education of youth, contributes not a little to soften manners. It gives a delicate turn to the imagination and a polish to the mind.—Richardson.

Education keeps the key of life; and a liberal education insures the first conditions of freedom,—namely, adequate knowledge and accustomed thought.—Julia Ward Howe.

Very few men are wise by their own counsel, or learned by their own teaching; for he that was only taught by himself had a fool to his master.—Ben Jonson.

'Tis pleasing to be school'd in a strange tongue
By female lips and eyes—that is, I mean,
When both the teacher, and the taught are young,
They smile so when one's right; and when one's wrong
They smile still more. —Byron.

The fruits of the earth do not more obviously require labor and cultivation to prepare them for our use and subsistence than our faculties demand instruction.—Barrow.

A true teacher should penetrate to whatever is vital in his pupil, and develop that by the light and heat of his own intelligence.—E. P. Whipple.

It is wonderful what a difference learning makes upon people even in the common intercourse of life, which does not appear to be much connected with it.—Dr. Johnson.

If Nature be not improved by instruction, it is blind; if instruction be not assisted by Nature, it is maimed; and if exercise fail of the assistance of both, it is imperfect.—Plutarch.

Oh ye, who teach th' ingenuous youth of nations—
Holland, France, England, Germany, or Spain—

I pray ye flog them upon all occasions;
It mends their morals; never mind the pain. —Byron

A little learning is a dangerous thing,
Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring,
There shallow draughts intoxicate the brain,
And drinking largely sobers us again. —Pope.

The greatest defect of common education is, that we are in the habit of putting pleasure all on one side, and weariness on the other; all weariness in study, all pleasure in idleness.—Fénelon.

How can man be intelligent, happy, or useful, without the culture and discipline of education? It is this that unlocks the prison-house of his mind, and releases the captive.—Rev. Dr. Humphrey.

An intelligent class can scarce ever be, as a class, vicious; never, as a class, indolent. The excited mental activity operates as a counterpoise to the stimulus of sense and appetite.—Edward Everett.

As an apple is not in any proper sense an apple until it is ripe, so a human being is not in any proper sense a human being until he is educated.—Horace Mann.

It depends on education (that holder of the keys which the Almighty hath put into our hands) to open the gates which lead to virtue or to vice, to happiness or misery.—Jane Porter.

All who have meditated on the art of governing mankind have been convinced that the fate of empires depends on the education of youth.—Aristotle.

Education is a better safeguard of liberty than a standing army. If we retrench the wages of the schoolmaster, we must raise those of the recruiting sergeant.—Edward Everett.

I consider that it is on instruction and education that the future security and direction of the destiny of every nation chiefly and fundamentally rests.—Kossuth.

A good education is generally considered as reflecting no small credit on its possessor; but in the majority of cases it reflects credit on the wise solicitude of his parents or guardians, rather than on himself.—James Cotter Morison.

The most important part of education is right training in the nursery. The soul of the child in his play should be trained to that sort of excellence in which, when he grows to manhood, he will have to be perfected.—Plato.

The essential difference between a good and a bad education is this, that the former draws on the child to learn by making it sweet to him, the latter drives the child to learn, by making it sour to him if he does not.—Charles Buxton.

I consider a human soul without education like marble in the quarry, which shows none of its inherent beauties until the skill of the polisher fetches out the colors and makes the surface shine.—Addison.

Bonaparte asked Mme. de Staël in what manner he could best promote the happiness of France. Her reply is full of political wisdom. She said, "Instruct the mothers of the French people."—Daniel Webster.

School is no place of education for any children whatever till their minds are well put in action. This is the work which has to be done at home, and which may be done in all homes where the mother is a sensible woman.—Harriet Martineau.

We are inclined to think that the study of the classics is, on the whole, advantageous to public morals, by inspiring an elegance of sentiments and an elevation of soul which we should in vain seek for elsewhere.—Robert Hall.

The young boys that went to Athens, the first year, were wise men; the second year, philosophers, lovers of wisdom; the third year, mere orators; and the fourth but plebeians, and understood nothing but their own ignorance.—Mendemus.

I have no sympathy whatever with those who would grudge our workmen and our common people the very highest acquisitions which their taste or their time or their inclination would lead them to realize.—Chalmers.

The greatest of all warriors that went to the siege of Troy had not the pre-eminence because Nature had given him strength and he carried the largest bow, but because self-discipline had taught him how to bend it.—Daniel Webster.

The most distinguished professional men bear witness, with an overwhelming authority, in favor of a course of education in which to train the mind shall be the first object, and to stock it, the second.—Gladstone.

If you suffer your people to be ill educated, and their manners to be corrupted from their infancy, and then punish them for those crimes to which their first education disposed them—you first make thieves and then punish them.—Sir Thomas More.

Into what boundless life does education admit us. Every truth gained through it expands a moment of time into illimitable being—positively enlarges our existence, and endows us with qualities which time cannot weaken or destroy.—Chapin.

That there should one man die ignorant who had capacity for knowledge, this I call a tragedy, were it to happen more than twenty times in a minute, as by some computations it does.—Carlyle.

The true order of learning should be first, what is necessary; second, what is useful, and third, what is ornamental. To reverse this arrangement is like beginning to build at the top of the edifice.—Mrs. Sigourney.

Promote as an object of primary importance institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened.—Washington.

Education is the leading human souls to what is best, and making what is best out of them; and these two objects are always attainable together, and by the same means. The training which makes men happiest in themselves also makes them most serviceable to others.—Ruskin.

The different steps and degrees of education may be compared to the artificer's operations upon marble; it is one thing to dig it out of the quarry, and another to square it, to give it gloss and lustre, call forth every beautiful spot and vein, shape it into a column, or animate it into a statue.—Thomas Gray.

The aim of education should be to teach us rather how to think than what to think,—rather to improve our minds, so as to enable us to think for ourselves, than to load the memory with the thoughts of other men.—Beattie.

Upon the education of the people of this country the fate of the country depends. There is no person or the history of the world in a point believe it has been more important than the disposition and mind of the people.

should be considered by the State than it is at present.—Disraeli.

We shall one day learn to supersede politics by education. What we call our root-and-branch reforms of slavery, war, gambling, intemperance, is only medicating the symptoms. We must begin higher up, namely, in education.—Emerson.

A father inquires whether his boy can construe Homer, if he understands Horace, and can taste Virgil; but how seldom does he ask, or examine, or think whether he can restrain his passions,—whether he is grateful, generous, humane, compassionate, just and benevolent.—Lady Hervey.

It was the German schoolhouse which destroyed Napoleon III. France, since then, is making monster cannon and drilling soldiers still, but she is also building schoolhouses. As long as war is possible, anything that makes better soldiers people want.—Beecher.

I believe that our experience instructs us that the secret of education lies in respecting the pupil. It is not for you to choose what he shall know and what he shall do. It is chosen and foreordained, and he only holds the key to his own secret.—Emerson.

Could we know by what strange circumstances a man's genius became prepared for practical success, we should discover that the most serviceable items in his education were never entered in the bills which his father paid for.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Any who says (with Mandeville in his treatise against charity schools), "If a horse knew as much as a man, I should not like to be his rider," ought to add, "If a man knew as little as a horse, I should not like to trust him to ride."—Whately.

Virtue and talents, though allowed their due consideration, yet are not enough to procure a man a welcome wherever he comes. Nobody contents himself with rough diamonds, or wears them so. When polished and set, then they give a lustre.—Locke.

Education is all paint: it does not alter the nature of the wood that is under it, it only improves its appearance a little. Why I dislike education so much is that it makes all people alike, until you have examined into them; and it is sometimes so long before you get to see under the varnish!—Lady Hester Stanhope.

I am always for getting a boy forward in his learning, for that is sure good. I would let him at first read any English book which happens to engage his attention; because you have done a great deal when you have brought him to have entertainment from a book. He'll get better books afterwards.—Dr. Johnson.

The education of the present race of females is not very favorable to domestic happiness. For my own part, I call education, not that which smothers a woman with accomplishments, but that which tends to consolidate a firm and regular system of character; that which tends to form a friend, a companion, and a wife.—Hannah More.

What we do not call education is more precious than that which we call so. We form no guess, at the time of receiving a thought, of its comparative value. And education often waste its efforts in attempts to thwart and balk this natural magnetism, which is sure to select what belongs to it.—Emerson.

The real object of education is to give children resources that will endure as long as life endures; habits that time will ameliorate, not destroy; occupation that will render sickness tolerable, solitude pleasant, age venerable, life more dignified and useful, and death less terrible.—Sydney Smith.

I shall detain you no longer in the demonstration of what we should not do, but straight conduct ye to a hill-side, where I will point ye out the right path of a virtuous and noble education; laborious indeed at the first ascent, but else so smooth, so green, so full of goodly prospect, and melodious sounds on every side, that the harp of Orpheus was not more charming.—Milton.

We know that the gifts which men have do not come from the schools. If a man is a plain, literal, factual man, you can make a great deal more of him in his own line by education than without education, just as you can make a great deal more of a potato if you cultivate it than if you do not; but no cultivation in this world will ever make an apple out of a potato.—Beecher.

Knowledge does not comprise all which is contained in the large term of education. The feelings are to be disciplined, the passions are to be restrained; true and worthy motives are to be inspired; a profound religious feeling is to be instilled, and pure morality inculcated under all circumstances. All this is comprised in education.—Webster.

Whatever expands the affections, or enlarges the sphere of our sympathies, whatever makes us feel our relation to the universe, "and all that it inherits," in time and in eternity, to the great and beneficent Cause of all, must unquestionably refine our nature, and elevate us in the scale of being.—Channing.

When a king asked Euclid, the mathematician, whether he could not explain his art to him in a more compendious manner, he was answered, that there was no royal way to geometry. Other things may be seized by might, or purchased with money; but knowledge is to be gained only by study, and study to be prosecuted only in retirement.—Johnson.

Education is either from nature, from man, or from things; the developing of our faculties and organs is the education of nature; that of man is the application we learn to make of this very developing; and that of things is the experience we acquire in regard to the different objects by which we are affected. All that we have not at our birth, and that we stand in need of at the years of maturity, is the gift of education.—Rousseau.

Begin the education of the heart, not with the cultivation of noble propensities, but with the cutting away of those that are evil. When once the noxious herbs are withered and rooted out, then the more noble plants, strong in themselves, will shoot upwards. The virtuous heart, like the body, becomes strong and healthy more by labor than nourishment.—Richter.

If we work upon marble, it will perish; if we work upon brass, time will efface it; if we rear temples, they will crumble into dust; but if we work upon immortal minds, if we imbue them with principles, with the just fear of God and love of our fellow-men, we engrave on those tablets something which will brighten to all eternity.—Daniel Webster.

And say to mothers what a holy charge is theirs—with what a kingly power their love
Might rule the fountains of the new-born mind;
Warn them to wake at early dawn, and sow
Good seed before the world has sown its tares.
—Mrs. Sigourney.

There is, between the sexes, a law of incessant reciprocal action, of which God avails himself in the constitution of the family, when He permits brothers and sisters to nestle about the same hearthstone. Its ministration is essential to the best educational results. Our own educational institutions should rest upon this divine basis.—Caroline H. Dall.

Curiosity is as much the parent of attention as attention is of memory; therefore the first business of a teacher—first not only in point of time, but of importance—should be to excite not merely a general curiosity on the subject of the study, but a particular curiosity on particular points in that subject. To teach one who has no curiosity to learn, is to sow a field without ploughing it.—Whately.

I too acknowledge the all-but omnipotence of early culture and nurture; hereby we have either a doddered dwarf-bush, or a high-towering, wide-shadowing tree! either a sick yellow cabbage, or an edible luxuriant green one. Of a truth, it is the duty of all men, especially of all philosophers, to note down with accuracy the characteristic circumstances of their education,—what furthered, what hindered, what in any way modified it.—Carlyle.

A statue lies hid in a block of marble, and the art of the statuary only clears away the superfluous matter and removes the rubbish. The figure is in the stone; the sculptor only finds it. What sculpture is to a block of marble, education is to a human soul. The philosopher, the saint, or the hero,—the wise, the good, or the great man,—very often lies hid and concealed in a plebeian, which a proper education might have disinterred, and have brought to light.—Addison.

It is not scholarship alone, but scholarship impregnated with religion, that tells on the great mass of society. We have no faith in the efficacy of mechanics' institutes, or even of primary and elementary schools, for building up a virtuous and well-conditioned peasantry so long as they stand dissevered from the lessons of Christian piety. Unless your cask is perfectly clean, whatever you pour into it turns sour.—Horace.

Minds that are stupid and incapable of science are in the order of nature to be regarded as monsters and other extraordinary phenomena; minds of this sort are rare. Hence I conclude that there are great resources to be found in children, which are suffered to vanish with their years. It is evident, therefore, that it is not of nature, but of our own negligence, we ought to complain.—Quintilian.

All that a university or final highest school can do for us is still but what the first school began doing—teach us to read. We learn to read in various languages, in various sciences; we learn the alphabet and letters of all manner of books. But the place where we are to get knowledge, even theoretic knowledge, is the books themselves. It depends on what we read, after all manner of professors have done their best for us. The true university of these days is a collection of books.—Carlyle.

Thalwell thought it very unfair to influence a child's mind by inculcating any opinions before it had come to years of discretion to choose for itself. I showed him my garden, and told him it was a botanical garden. "How so?" said he; "it is covered with weeds." "O," I replied, "that is only because it has not yet come to its age of discretion and choice. The weeds, you see, have taken the liberty to grow, and thought it unfair in me to prejudice the soil towards roses and strawberries."—Coleridge.

Every man has two educations—that which is given to him, and the other, that which he gives to himself. Of the two kinds, the latter is by far the most valuable. Indeed, all that is most worthy in a man, he must work out and conquer for himself. It is that that constitutes our real and best nourishment. What we are merely taught seldom nourishes the mind like that which we teach ourselves.—Richter.

Man is an animal, formidable both from his passions and his reason; his passions often urging him to great evils, and his reason furnishing means to achieve them. To train this animal, and make him amenable to order; to inure him to a sense of justice and virtue; to withhold him from ill courses by fear, and encourage him in his duty by hopes; in short, to fashion and model him for society, hath been the aim of civil and religious institutions: and, in all times, the endeavor of good and wise men. The aptest method for attaining this end hath been always judged a proper education.—Bishop Berkeley.

There have been periods when the country heard with dismay that "the soldier was abroad." That is not the case now. Let the soldier be abroad; in the present age he can do nothing. There is another person abroad—a less important person in the eyes of some, an insignificant person, whose labors have tended to produce this state of things. The schoolmaster is abroad! And I trust more to him, armed with his primer, than I do to the soldier in full military array, for upholding and extending the liberties of his country.—Brougham.

Egotism

Egotism is the tongue of vanity.—Chamfort.

The egotist is next door to a fanatic.—Samuel Smiles.

The unfortunate are always egotistical.—Beaconsfield.

The pest of society is egotists.—Emerson.

Love is an egotism of two.—Antoine de la Salle.

The egotism of woman is always for two.—Mme. de Staël.

It is never permissible to say, I say.—Mme. Necker.

Let the degree of egotism be the measure of confidence.—Lavater.

Avoid making yourself the subject of conversation.—Bruyère.

And though all cry down self, none means his own self in a literal sense.—Butler.

He who discommendeth others obliquely commendeth himself.—Sir T. Browne.

Be your character what it will, it will be known; and nobody will take it upon your word.—Chesterfield.

Discourse ought to be as a field, without conceit home to any man.—Bacon.

Do you wish men to speak well of you? Then never speak well of yourself.—Pascal.

Here is the egotist's code: everything for himself, nothing for others.—Sanial-Dubay.

The more you speak of yourself, the more you are likely to lie.—Zimmermann.

We would rather speak ill of ourselves than not to talk of ourselves at all.—Rochefoucauld.

Men are egotists, and not all tolerant of one man's selfhood; they do not always deem the affinities elective.—Stedman.

The more anyone speaks of himself the less he likes to hear another talked of.—Lavater.

The personal pronoun "I" should be the coat of arms of some individuals.—Rivarol.

Christian piety annihilates the egotism of the heart; worldly politeness veils and represses it.—Pascal.

To speak highly of one with whom we are intimate is a species of egotism. Our modesty as well as our jealousy teaches us caution on this subject.—Hazlitt.

There is a serious and resolute egotism that makes a man interesting to his friends and formidable to his opponents.—Whipple.

When all is summed up, a man never speaks of himself without loss; his accusations of himself are always believed, his praises never.—Montaigne.

We often boast that we are never bored, but yet we are so conceited that we do not perceive how often we bore others.—La Rochefoucauld.

We never could clearly understand how it is that egotism, so unpopular in conversation, should be so popular in writing.—Macaulay.

Seldom do we talk of ourselves with success. If I condemn myself, more is believed than is expressed; if I praise myself, much less.—Henry Home.

The reason why lovers are never weary of one another is this—they are always talking of themselves.—Rochefoucauld.

What hypocrites we seem to be whenever we talk of ourselves! Our words sound so humble, while our hearts are so proud.—Hare.

I shall never apologize to you for egotism. I think very few men writing to their friends have enough of it.—Sydney Smith.

If the egotist is weak, his egotism is worthless. If the egotist is strong, acute, full of distinctive character, his egotism is precious, and remains a possession of the race.—Alexander Smith.

Byron owed the vast influence which he exercised over his contemporaries at least as much to his gloomy egotism as to the real power of his poetry.—Macaulay.

He who thinks he can find in himself the means of doing without others is much mistaken; but he who thinks that others cannot do without him is still more mistaken.—La Rochefoucauld.

It is natural to man to regard himself as the object of the creation, and to think of all things in relation to himself, and the degree in which they can serve and be useful to him.—Goethe.

It is a false principle that because we are entirely occupied with ourselves, we must equally occupy the thoughts of others. The contrary inference is the fair one.—Hazlitt.

The passages in which Milton has alluded to his own circumstances are perhaps read more frequently, and with more interest, than any other lines in his poems.—Macaulay.

It is a hard and nice subject for a man to speak of himself: it grates his own heart to say anything of disparagement, and the reader's ear to hear anything of praise from him.—Cowley.

An egotist will always speak of himself, either in praise or in censure, but a modest man ever shuns making himself the subject of his conversation.—La Bruyère.

Every man, like Narcissus, becomes enamored of the reflection of himself, only choosing a substance instead of a shadow. This love for any particular woman is self-love at second hand, vanity reflected, compound egotism.—Horace Smith.

All the walks of literature are infested with mendicants for fame, who attempt to excite our interest by exhibiting all the distortions of their intellects and stripping the covering from all the putrid sores of their feelings.—Macaulay.

There is scarce any man who cannot persuade himself of his own merit. Has he common sense, he prefers it to genius; has he some diminutive virtues, he prefers them to great talents.—Sewall.

The awkwardness and embarrassment which all feel on beginning to write, when they themselves are the theme, ought to serve as a hint to authors that self is a subject they ought very rarely to descant upon.—Colton.

Egotism is more like an offense than a crime; though it is allowable to speak of yourself, provided nothing is advanced in favor; but I cannot help suspecting that those who abuse themselves are, in reality, angling for approbation.—Zimmermann.

Only by the supernatural is a man strong—only by confiding in the divinity which stirs within us. Nothing is so weak as an egotist—nothing is mightier than we, when we are vehicles of a truth before which the state and the individual are alike ephemeral.—Emerson.

Five, or six, or ten people shall be made temporarily wretched because one person, unconsciously perhaps, yet supremely egotistic and selfish, has never learned to control his disposition and bridle his tongue.—Aughey.

Every real master of speaking or writing uses his personality as he would any other serviceable material; the very moment a speaker or writer begins to use it, not for his main purpose, but for vanity's sake, as all weak people are sure to do, hearers and readers feel the difference in a moment.—Holmes.

We like so much to talk of ourselves that we are never weary of those private interviews with a lover during the course of whole years, and for the same reason the devout like to spend much time with their confessor; it is the pleasure of talking of themselves, even though it be to talk ill.—Mme. de Sévigné.

There are dull and bright, sacred and profane, coarse and fine egotists. It is a disease that, like influenza, falls on all constitutions. In the distemper known to physicians as chorea, the patient sometimes turns round, and continues to spin slowly in one spot. Is egotism a metaphysical varioloid of this malady?—Emerson.

Egotism erects its center in itself: love places it out of itself in the axis of the universal whole. Love aims at unity, egotism at solitude. Love is the citizen ruler of a flourishing republic, egotism is a despot in a devastated creation. Egotism sows for gratitude, love for the ungrateful. Love gives, egotism lends; and love does this before the throne of judicial truth, indifferent if for the enjoyment of the following moment, or with the view to a martyr's crown—indifferent whether the reward is in this life or in the next.—Schiller.

Speech of a man's self ought to be seldom and well chosen. I knew one was wont to say in scorn, "He must needs be a wise man, he speaks so much of himself." There is but one case wherein a man may commend himself with good grace, and that is in commending virtue in another, especially if it be a virtue whereunto himself pretendeth.—Bacon.

Election Day

Free and just political institutions are absolutely essential to the progress and development both of the individual and of the race.—Rev. Hugh Price Hughes.

In every movement that Christianity makes to eradicate the corrupt practices of men in political and in social life Christ is setting up His kingdom on the earth.—Rev. Bernard Paine.

The trouble is not in our institutions, imperfect as they doubtless are. The crying necessity for reform springs from the fact that while our institutions are representative theoretically, our public officials are not so, actually.—Fulton McMahon.

Long may a ballot pure proclaim
The nation's righteous, sovereign will,
Their highest thought and loftiest aim
Their own high mission to fulfill.
Thus shall the ballot prove a guide
To point the way that should be trod,
And prove to them no less, beside,
The people's voice the voice of God.
—V. G. Haesdarth.

The men needed for all our offices are men to whom righteousness, temperance and judgment are obligations which they feel called upon to fulfill—not men who, like Felix, tremble, self-convicted, when these are urged upon them. A candidate for office should be as white in principle and in practice as his title indicates or suggests that he is.—Homiletic Review.

Profligacy in taking office is so extreme that we have no doubt public men may be found who for half a century would postpone all remedies for a pestilence, if the preservation of their places depended upon the propagation of the virus.—Selected.

A faithful setting forth of Christian duty at the polls, not to vote for this or that man, but to vote conscientiously as before God, and to make the use of the franchise a solemn duty to be prayerfully performed, is a part of the minister's function, when he is teaching his people how to live on earth as representatives of God's truth.—Howard Crosby, D. D.

Let the ministry hold high and fast the standard of Christ's cross, which means pardon and renewal to every sinner that repents and trusts in His atoning sacrifice. Let this be the first and main work of the Christian ministry, and from this, as a source, let the life of both minister and people be fitted to discharge the personal duties which belong to them both as men and citizens. So will the ministry best work to purify our politics and to serve the state.—Howard Crosby, D. D.

Municipal government is corrupt simply because corrupt and corruptible men are elected to office. Corrupt men are elected to office because office "pays," and corruptible men yield because they make money by yielding. If municipal governments had no profitable contracts to award, if school boards had no text-books to select, we should have no "municipal problem."—Forum.

It must recognize and hold up before men the moral character of this corruption of the ballot. Bribery is a sin. It is condemned in the laws of Moses: "And thou shalt take no gift; for a gift blindeth the wise, and perverteth the words of the righteous." These words are as true to-day as when they were written.—Rev. Bernard Paine.

Politics is the only serious subject that men think themselves qualified to act upon without any previous education or instruction whatever. If it happened to be astronomy, or botany, or medicine, or law, he would never be allowed to work in any of these arts, or to take a decisive part in the history of any one of these sciences without having, at least, acquired the A B C of it; but the awful fact of politics is that we do not take the trouble seriously to understand the political situation.—Rev. Hugh Price Hughes.

I have seen the sea lashed into fury and tossed into spray, and its grandeur moves the soul of the dullest man; but I remember that it is not the billows, but the calm level of the sea, from which all heights and depths are measured. When the storm has passed and the hour of calm settles on the ocean, when the sunlight bathes its smooth surface, then the astronomer and surveyor take the level from which to measure all terrestrial heights and depths. Gentlemen of the convention, your present temper may not mark the healthful pulse of our people when our enthusiasm has passed. When the emotions of this hour have subsided, we shall find that calm level of public opinion below the storm, from which the thoughts of a mighty people are to be measured, and by which their final action will be determined.—James A. Garfield.

Parties are an essential part of representative governments, and can be effective only by organization; but when organization degenerates into a brutal machinery that stifles intelligence and true patriotism, the republic is moribund. As the perfunctory and bigoted exercise of the suffrage has gradually extinguished much of the manhood of American citizenship, so the restoration of intelligence, conscience and individual independence in this prime duty will be the sole effective means of curing many existing evils and preventing others that might be equally dangerous.—Silas W. Burt.

The large use of money, both before and after election, in the political campaigns of the present day, is a phase of modern public life that represents one of the great changes in our political methods since our forefathers established and practiced the principles laid down in the constitution. The constitution, as we know, was based on the pure democratic idea of government, in which all power and initiative should proceed from the people themselves. Gradually we have substituted for this, which we might call the spontaneous expression of the people, a mechanism by which, instead of the people's instructing their delegates, the presumption is that the delegates are going to instruct the people. In other words, we have absolutely inverted the original idea that lay at the basis of our political fabric.—Silas W. Burt.

One of the most iniquitous forms of taking from an American citizen his right to a free ballot is through intimidation. This is not bribery; it is oppression. It is oppression in a free land. It is practiced by both parties, sometimes through corporations and capitalists, and sometimes by threats of violence at the polls. The evidence is spread before the nation that it is practiced at elections in various states at the South for the suppression of the colored voters.—Rev. Bernard Paine.

You cannot help being a politician. You cannot live for an hour without being a politician. But what a man generally means when he says that he is not a politician I am afraid is this—that he has been all his life enjoying his political privileges and grossly neglecting his political duties; and in that sense the observation is scarcely to his credit. As a matter of fact, politics, properly understood, is simply Science of Life—the doctrine of the way in which I am to do my duty to my neighbor, which is an essential part of true religion. It is nothing in the world except religion applied to human society; in fact, it is the practical recognition of the Second Table of the Law of God.—Rev. Hugh Price Hughes.

Now, I do implore those who are listening to me to realize the gravity of all these questions. There is nothing that you do in all your life for which you are more accountable to God, or which is more serious, than the vote which many of you are going to give at the approaching general election (1892). I dare say you have already made up your mind which party you are going to vote for, but I confess I have some suspicion that, even in an unusually intelligent audience like this, if I brought some of you up to this platform and elicited from you for whom you were going to vote, and then were permitted to cross examine you as to why you were going to give that vote, the answers which you would give would not satisfy yourselves or the audience.—Rev. Hugh Prices Hughes.

It is because politics, as I have already said, have been confounded with party politics; have often been contemptible and wicked beyond description; and, indeed, when not carried so far as that, there are a great many persons who positively cannot discuss politics without losing their temper. And this is so well known that the subject is tabooed to a very great extent in polite society, so-called, so that if you go to a dinner party the one thing of which you must not speak is politics, and the place that might reasonably be occupied by noble and instructive conversation about the science and art of life, and human progress, is occupied by inane, and worse than inane, gossip.—Rev. Hugh Price Hughes.

It is difficult to estimate the cost of a great presidential campaign. There is no doubt but what it might be measured by millions of dollars, apart from the loss involved in the general destruction of business. It has been said that frequent elections have their value in keeping alive public interest in public affairs, and in educating the people upon the great questions that are to be solved. But when we recollect that a great part of the expenses of the campaign are spent in badges, torchlight processions and other appeals to the imagination and sensation rather than to reason, it seems probable that a very large part of this expenditure is practically valueless, so far as the education of the people is concerned, and is really spent to pervert their intelligence.—Silas W. Burt.

Electricity

Striking the electric chain where—with we are darkly bound.—Byron.

Too like the lightning, which doth cease to
be Ere one can say "it lightens."
—Shakespeare.

The earth is rocking, the skies are riven—
Jove in a passion, in god-like fashion,
Is breaking the crystal urns of heaven.
—Robert Buchanan.

For the poplars showed
The white of their leaves, the amber grain
Shrunk in the wind—and the lightning now
Is tangled in tremulous skeins of rain.
—T. B. Aldrich.

Stretches, for leagues and leagues, the Wire,
A hidden path for a Child of Fire—
Over its silent spaces sent,
Swifter than Ariel ever went,
From continent to continent.
—Wm. Henry Burleigh.

Swift as a shadow, short as any dream;
Brief as the lightning in the collied night,
That, in a spleen, unfolds both heaven and
earth,
And ere a man hath power to say "Behold!"
The jaws of darkness do devour it up.
—Shakespeare.

Is it a fact—or have I dreamt it—that by means of electricity the world of matter has become a great nerve, vibrating thousands of miles in a breathless point of time? Rather, the round globe is a vast head, a brain, instinct with intelligence; or shall we say it is itself a thought, nothing but thought, and no longer the substance which we dreamed it.—Nathaniel Hawthorne.

Elegance

Elegance is not an ornament worthy of man.—Seneca.

Elegance is exquisite polish.—Mme. Necker.

Many a woman will pass for elegant in a ballroom, or even at a court drawing room, whose want of true breeding would become evident in a chosen company.—Julia Ward Howe.

Neither refinement nor delicacy is indispensable to produce elegance.—Lavater.

Elegance of manner is the outgrowth of refined and exalted sense.—Chesterfield.

When the mind loses its feeling for elegance, it grows corrupt and groveling, and seeks in the crowd what ought to be found at home.—Landor.

The wisest woman you talk with is ignorant of something that you know; but an elegant woman never forgets her elegance.—O. W. Holmes.

Elegance is something more than ease; it is more than a freedom from awkwardness or restraint. It implies, I conceive, a precision, a polish, a sparkling, spirited yet delicate.—Hazlitt.

Taste and elegance, though they are reckoned only among the smaller and secondary morals, yet are of no mean importance in the regulations of life. A moral taste is not of force to turn vice into virtue; but it recommends virtue with something like the blandishments of pleasure, and it infinitely abates the evils of vice.—Burke.

Elephant

The elephant hath joints, but none for courtesy; his legs are legs for necessity, not for flexure.—Shakespeare.

Th' unwieldy elephant,
To make them mirth, us'd all his might,
and wreathed
His lithe proboscis. —Milton.

Eloquence

The poetry of speech.—Byron.

Eloquence is the language of Nature.—Colton.

Eloquence is to the sublime what the whole is to its part.—La Bruyère.

Eloquence is the poetry of prose.—Bryant.

Silence is more eloquent than words.—Carlyle.

The glorious burst of winged words! —Tupper.

Thoughts that breathe and words that burn.—Gray.

Eloquence is vehement simplicity.—Burleigh.

Eloquence the soul, song charms the senses.—Milton.

Action is eloquence.—Shakespeare.

Brevity is a great praise of eloquence.—Cicero.

Words sweetly placed and modestly directed.—Shakespeare.

True eloquence scorns eloquence.—Pascal.

Silence that spoke, and eloquence of eyes.—Pope.

There is no eloquence which does not agitate the soul.—Landor.

Eloquence must be grounded on the plainest narrative.—Emerson.

Great eloquence we cannot get, except from human genius.—Thomas Starr King.

That besotting intoxication which verbal magic brings upon the mind.—South.

Ev'ry word he speaks is a syren's note
To draw the careless hearer. —Beaumont.

Silence that wins, where eloquence is vain.—William Hayley.

Eloquence shows the power and possibility of man.—Emerson.

Honesty is one part of eloquence. We persuade others by being in earnest ourselves.—Hazlitt.

The art of clothing the thought in apt, significant and sounding words.—Dryden.

Her tears her only eloquence.—Rogers.

There was speech in their dumbness, language in their very gesture.—Shakespeare.

Eloquence is the power to translate a truth into language perfectly intelligible to the person to whom you speak.—Emerson.

True eloquence consists in saying all that is necessary, and nothing but what is necessary.—La Rochefoucauld.

Verily, O man, with truth for thy theme, eloquence shall throne thee with archangels.—Tupper.

In an easy cause any man may be eloquent.—Ovid.

Your Words are like the notes of dying swans,
Too sweet to last! —Dryden.

False eloquence is exaggeration, true eloquence is emphasis.—W. R. Alger.

He has oratory who ravishes his hearers while he forgets himself.—Lavater.

Those who would make us feel must feel themselves.—Churchill.

Eloquence is the appropriate organ of the highest personal energy.—Emerson.

It is but poor eloquence which only shows that the orator can talk.—Sir Joshua Reynolds.

Eloquence is in the assembly, not in the speaker.—William Pitt.

Manner, as much as matter, constitutes eloquence.—François Delsarte.

Eloquence, when in its highest pitch, leaves little room for reason or reflection.—Hume.

Pour the full tide of eloquence along,
Serenely pure, and yet divinely strong.
—Pope.

Words are like leaves, and where they most abound,
Much fruit of sense beneath is rarely found.
—Pope.

O! as a bee upon the flower, I hang Upon the honey of thy eloquent tongue.
—Bulwer.

Were we as eloquent as angels, we should please some more by listening than by talking.—Colton.

There is no talent so pernicious as eloquence to those who have it under command.—Addison.

But for your words, they rob the Hybla bees, and leave them honeyless.—Shakespeare.

Eloquence dwells quite as much in the hearts of the hearers as on the lips of the orator.—Lamartine.

Such was the force of his eloquence, to make the hearers more concerned than he that spake.—Denham.

Here rills of oily eloquence in soft Meanders lubricate the course they take.
—Cowper.

Men are more eloquent than women made; but women are more powerful to persuade.—Thomas Randolph.

As the grace of man is in the mind, so the beauty of the mind is eloquence.—Cicero.

The manner of your speaking is full as important as the matter, as more people have ears to be tickled than understandings to judge.—Chesterfield.

The nature of our constitution makes eloquence more useful and more necessary in this country than in any other in Europe.—Chesterfield.

There is as much eloquence in the tone of the voice, in the eyes, and in the air of a speaker as in his choice of words.—Rochefoucauld.

Every tongue that speaks
But Romeo's name speaks heavenly eloquence.
—Shakespeare.

Many are ambitious of saying grand things, that is, of being grandiloquent. Eloquence is speaking out * * * a quality few esteem, and fewer aim at.—Hare.

It is of eloquence as of a flame; it requires matter to feed it, motion to excite it, and it brightens as it burns.—Tacitus.

An orator of past times declared that his calling was to make small things appear to be grand.—Montaigne.

There should be in eloquence that which is pleasing and that which is real; but that which is pleasing should itself be real.—Pascal.

Talking and eloquence are not the same: to speak and to speak well are two things. A fool may talk, but a wise man speaks.—Ben Jonson.

Eloquence is the child of knowledge. When a mind is full, like a wholesome river, it is also clear.—Beaconsfield.

Copiousness of words is always false eloquence, though it will ever impose on some sort of understandings.—Montagu.

Eloquence may be found in conversation and all kinds of writings; 'tis rarely where we seek it, and sometimes where 'tis least expected.—La Bruyère.

Profane eloquence is transferred from the bar, where it formerly reigned, to the pulpit, where it never ought to come.—Bruyère.

O Eloquence! thou violated fair, how thou art wooed and won to either bed of right or wrong!—Havard.

Eloquence is a painting of thought; and thus, those who, after having painted it, still add to it, make a picture instead of a portrait.—Pascal.

He is an eloquent man who can speak of low things acutely, and of great things with dignity, and of moderate things with temper.—Cicero.

His tongue dropped manna, and could make the worse appear the better reason, to perplex and dash maturest counsels.—Milton.

When he spoke, what tender words he us'd!
So softly, that like flakes of feather'd snow,
They melted as they fell. —Dryden.

Go on, spare no invectives, but open the spout of your eloquence, and see with what a calm, connubial resignation I will both hear and bow to the chastisement.—Colley Cibber.

Say she be mute and will not speak a word;
Then I'll commend her volubility,
And say she uttereth piercing eloquence.
—Shakespeare.

No man can make a speech alone. It is the great human power that strikes up from a thousand minds that acts upon him, and makes the speech.—James A. Garfield.

Eloquence is an engine invented to manage and wield at will the fierce democracy, and, like medicine to the sick, is only employed in the paroxysms of a disordered state.—Montaigne.

The spell is thine that reaches
The heart, and makes the wisest head its sport;
And there's one rare, strange virtue in thy speeches,
The secret of their mastery—they are short.
—Hallock.

No man ever did or ever will become truly eloquent without being a constant reader of the Bible, and an admirer of the purity and sublimity of its language.—Fisher Ames.

The art of saying well what one thinks is different from the faculty of

The pleasure of eloquence is in greatest part owing often to the stimulus of the occasion which produces it—to the magic of sympathy, which exalts the feeling of each by radiating on him the feeling of all.—Emerson.

We may put too high a premium on speech from platform and pulpit; at the bar and in the legislative hall, and pay dear for the whistle of our endless harangues. England, and especially Germany, are less loquacious, and attend more to business. We let the eagle, and perhaps too often the peacock, scream.—Bartol.

By eloquence I understand those appeals to our moral perceptions that produce emotion as soon as they are uttered. * * * This is the very enthusiasm that is the parent of poetry. Let the same man go to his closet and clothe in numbers conceptions full of the same fire and spirit, and they will be poetry.—Bryant.

His words seem'd oracles
That pierc'd their bosoms; and each man would turn
And gaze in wonder on his neighbour's
face,
That with the like dumb wonder answer'd
him.

You could have heard
The beating of your pulses while he spoke.
—George Croly.

Extemporaneous and oral harangues will always have this advantage over those that are read from a manuscript: every burst of eloquence or spark of genius they may contain, however studied they may have been beforehand, will appear to the audience to be the effect of the sudden inspiration of talent.—Colton.

Pow'r above pow'rs! O heavenly eloquence!
That with the strong rein of commanding
words,
Dost manage, guide, and master th' eminence
Of men's affections, more than all their swords!
—Daniel.

How often in the halls of legislation does eloquence unmask corruption, expose intrigue, and overthrow tyranny! In the cause of mercy it is omnipotent. It is bold in the consciousness of its superiority, fearless and unyielding in the purity of its motives. All opposition it destroys;
all power it defies.—Henry Melville.

This is that eloquence the ancients represented as lightning, bearing down every opposer; this the power which has turned whole assemblies into astonishment, admiration and awe—that is described by the torrent, the flame, and every other instance of irresistible impetuosity.—Goldsmith.

Eloquence is the language of nature,
and cannot be learned in the schools;
the passions are powerful pleaders, and their very silence, like that of Garrick, goes directly to the soul, but rhetoric is the creature of art, which he who feels least will most excel in; it is the quackery of eloquence, and deals in nostrums, not in cures.—Colton.

His eloquent tongue so well seconds his fertile invention that no one speaks better when suddenly called forth. His attention never languishes; his mind is always before his words; his memory has all its stock so turned into ready money that, without hesitation or delay, it supplies whatever the occasion may require.—Erasmus.

The charm of eloquence—the skill
To wake each secret string,
And from the bosom's chords at will Life's mournful music bring;
The o'ermastr'ing strength of mind, which sways
The haughty and the free,
Whose might earth's mightiest ones obey
This charm was given to thee.
—Mrs. Embury.

Method, we are aware, is an essential ingredient in every discourse designed for the instruction of mankind; but it ought never to force itself on the attention as an object—never appear to be an end instead of an instrument; or beget a suspicion of the sentiments being introduced for the sake of the method, not the method for the sentiments.—Robert Hall.

When'er he speaks, Heaven, how the list'n'ing throng
Dwell on the melting music of his tongue!
His arguments are emblems of his mien.
Mild but not faint, and forcing, though serene:
And when the power of eloquence he'd try,
Here lightning strikes you, there soft breezes sigh.
—Garth.

The clear conception, outrunning the deductions of logic, the high purpose, the dauntless spirit, speaking on the tongue, beaming from the eye, informing every feature, and urging the whole man onward, right onward, to his object—this is eloquence, or rather it is something greater and higher than all eloquence—it is action, noble, sublime, godlike action.—Webster.

A just and reasonable modesty does not only recommend eloquence, but sets off every great talent which a man can be possessed of. It heightens all the virtues which it accompanies; like the shades of paintings, it raises and rounds every figure, and makes the colors more beautiful, though not so glowing as they would be without it.—Addison.

There's a charm in deliv'ry, a magical art,
That thrills like a kiss from the lip to the heart;

'T is the glance—the expression—the well-chosen word—

By whose magic the depths of the spirit are stir'd.

The lip's soft persuasion—its musical tone:
Oh! such were the charms of that eloquent one! —Mrs. Welby.

In eloquence, the great triumphs of the art are when the orator is lifted above himself; when consciously he makes himself the mere tongue of the occasion and the hour, and says what cannot but be said. Hence the term "abandonment," to describe the self-surrender of the orator. Not his will, but the principle on which he is horsed, the great connection and crisis of events, thunder in the ear of the crowd.—Emerson.

His eloquence is classic in its style,
Not brilliant with explosive coruscations
Of heterogeneous thoughts, at random caught,

And scatter'd like a shower of shooting stars,

That end in darkness: no;—his noble mind
Is clear, and full, and stately, and serene.

His earnest and undazzled eye he keeps
Fix'd on the sun of Truth, and breathes his words

As easily as eagles cleave the air;

And never pauses till the height is won;

And all who listen follow where he leads.

—Mrs. Hale.

The receipt to make a speaker, and an applauded one too, is short and easy. Take common sense quantum

sufficit; add a little application to the rules and orders of the House [of Commons], throw obvious thoughts in a new light, and make up the whole with a large quantity of purity, correctness and elegance of style. Take it for granted that by far the greatest part of mankind neither analyze nor search to the bottom; they are incapable of penetrating deeper than the surface.—Chesterfield.

Gentlemen, do you know what is the finest speech that I ever in my life heard or read? It is the address of Garibaldi to his Roman soldiers, when he told them: "Soldiers, what I have to offer you is fatigue, danger, struggle and death; the chill of the cold night in the free air, and heat under the burning sun; no lodgings, no munitions, no provisions, but forced marches, dangerous watchposts and the continual struggle with the bayonet against batteries;—those who love freedom and their country may follow me." That is the most glorious speech I ever heard in my life.—Kossuth.

Emancipation Day

A freeman contending for liberty on his own ground is superior to any slavish mercenary on earth.—Washington.

They who refuse education to a black man would turn the South into a vast poorhouse, and labor into a pendulum, necessity vibrating between poverty and indolence.—Henry Ward Beecher.

The very best thing we can do for the black man, or for the white, is to strive with all our might to promote and secure the establishment of his inalienable rights.—John Swinton.

I do order and declare that all persons held as slaves, within said designated States and parts of States, are, and henceforth shall be, free; and that the Executive Government of the United States, including the military and navy authorities thereof, will recognize and maintain the freedom of said persons. And I hereby enjoin upon the people so declared to be free to abstain from all violence; and I recommend to them that in all cases, when allowed, they labor faithfully for reasonable wages.—Abraham Lincoln's Proclamation.

But, inasmuch as the Almighty has created His children of various hues, I plead again, that if one of these children be cast in an image of pearl, another in the image of ebony, another in the image of bronze, if their work be meritorious, then should they receive social and public recognition for their work's sake. Those works demonstrate beyond all cavil that the souls enshrined within those caskets emanate from the same divine source and partake of the same indefinable essence of infinitude.—Rev. J. A. Brockett.

To-day Massachusetts, and the whole of the American republic, from the border of Maine to the Pacific slopes, and from the Lakes to the Gulf, stand upon the immutable and everlasting principles of equal and exact justice. The days of unrequited labor are numbered with the past. Fugitive slave laws are only remembered as relics of that barbarism which John Wesley pronounced "the sum of all villainies," and whose knowledge of its blighting effects was matured by his travels in Georgia and the Carolinas.—Horace Mann.

The black man will not be faded out by miscegenation. The fate of the Indian, and the supposed fate of all weaker races in the presence of the stronger, will not be the fortune of the American negro. He has his great defense already in his hand. He is the peer at the ballot-box and in the courts of his white fellow-citizen. For the present, through his ignorance, he is made his tool, or is wronged out of his rights. He may make merchandise of his right of suffrage for a while; but it is his, and every year he will come to have a higher conception of its significance.—North American Review.

The only written theology of the negro is found in the plantation melodies; what are they but the plaintive strains of weeping faith which came from hearts in vital union with God? He has an absolute faith in a personal Saviour who, only, has power on earth to forgive sin, and in a Holy Spirit upon whom he relies as the witness with his spirit that he is a child of God.—P. P. Hood.

The old South rested everything on slavery and agriculture, unconscious that these could neither give nor maintain healthy growth. The new South presents a perfect democracy, the oligarchs leading into the popular movement—a social system compact and closely knitted, less splendid on the surface, but stronger at the core—a hundred farms for every plantation, fifty homes for every palace, and a diversified industry that meets the complex needs of this complex age.—H. W. Grady.

When I recall the negro as I knew him during the existence of slavery, in the Carolinas, in the States of the Gulf, and in those along the Mississippi—when I behold the improvement that has been brought about in his being and condition since his liberation—I feel bound to say that he is doing as well as could be expected, and to express the opinion that he will do yet better under a larger liberty. He has been transformed within a generation, and the work of transformation will go on steadily, if it be not impeded.—John Swinton.

The new South is enamored of her new work. Her soul is stirred with the breath of a new life. The light of a grander day is falling fair on her face. She is thrilling, sir, with the consciousness of growing power and prosperity. As she stands full-statured and equal among the peoples of the earth, breathing the keen air and looking out upon an expanding horizon, she understands that her emancipation came because in the inscrutable wisdom of God her honest purpose was crossed and her brave armies were beaten.—H. W. Grady.

There is a good day coming for the South. Through darkness and tears and blood she has sought it. It has been an unconscious Via Dolorosa. But, in the end, it will be worth all it has cost. Her institutions before were deadly. She nourished death in her bosom. The greater her secular prosperity the more sure was her ruin. Every year of delay but made the change more terrible. Now, by an earthquake, the evil is shaken down. Her own historians in a better day shall write that from that day the sword cut off the cancer she began to find her health.—Henry Ward Beecher.

During the darkest days of slavery on every plantation there were Christian negroes who could be trusted anywhere and with anything, so much so that when the war came their masters felt free to go to the front and leave their treasures, their wives, their daughters and helpless children in the absolute care and protection of these negroes, and their trust was not betrayed. To-day you will find in these black belts the most honorable marriages, and the tie in many cases sacredly kept, churches disciplining members for immoralities, and ministers, ignorant men, giving their trumpet no uncertain sound upon these great principles.—P. P. Hood.

The white children have been brought up on dusky bosoms and love them. It is caste that alone creates an offense, and this is unchristian and must die out, as will every other indignity to humanity and to God. The black man, wearing his unfaded and God-given badge of race, equally cultivated, equally rich and self-possessed, will live beside his white neighbor and enjoy the opportunities and bounties of a common heaven equally with his Saxon fellow-citizen, both alike unconscious of the different livery each one wears. This condition of things is seen in all portions of Europe, and will, ere long, be witnessed on American soil.—North American Review.

On January 1, 1863, went forth the decree of emancipation, the proclamation of which startled the world with its just magnanimity and challenged the admiration of an onlooking universe. Five millions of people, helpless, worse than poor because of their ignorance, made the air resonant with their songs of praise. Along the dusty turnpikes men, women, and children journeyed with joy—but where? The world's history does not furnish a parallel case. But with undaunted courage they faced the world, wrested from the field its stores, and, under the star of nominal liberty, they are marching on to-day to a higher destiny and to an exalted plane of heroic endeavor undreamed of by their liberator.—Rev. J. A. Brockett.

To liberty and enfranchisement is as far as law can carry the negro. The rest must be left to conscience and common sense. It should be left to those among whom his lot is cast, with whom he is indissolubly connected and whose prosperity depends upon their possessing his intelligent sympathy and confidence. Faith has been kept with him in spite of calumnious assertions to the contrary, by those who assume to speak for us or by frank opponents. Faith will be kept with him in the future, if the South holds her reason and integrity.—H. W. Grady.

No land ever, even in war, did so brave and bold a thing as to take from the plantation a million black men who could not read the Constitution or the spelling-book, and who could hardly tell one hand from the other, and permit them to vote, in the sublime faith that liberty, which makes a man competent to vote, would render him fit to discharge the duties of the voter. And I beg to say, as I am bound to say, that when this one million unwashed black men came to vote, though much disturbance occurred—as much disturbance always occurs upon great changes—they proved themselves worthy of the trust that had been confided to them.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Through fire and blood freedom and citizenship came to us. The conflict was waged for the preservation of the Union, but back of all of that were the prayers, the tears, and the heart throbs of the millions in the bonds of chattel slavery. We stand to-day in the presence of the American people, and with uncovered heads before the statue of Abraham Lincoln to celebrate the emancipation from slavery in the District of Columbia. This occasion should be a suggestive one to us. We should realize that awful grandeur in the responsibility of American citizenship, and we should read our duty on the starry firmament of the old flag. This is our country, our home. We know no cause but the American cause; no flag but the American flag! Let others appeal to England and the nations of the earth, but our appeal is to the American people and to their sense of fair play.—Jesse Lawson.

But, as the storm-dipping eagle nurtures her eaglets amid the thunder-scarred crags and peaks of the loftiest mountains, and teaches them to float with joy on the lightning-torn bosom of the blackest storm, so had the Almighty, while the storms of war's horrors were marshaling their forces of awful wrath, raised up the man of liberty amid the majestic forests of a western home. Like ancient Israel, the prayers, tears, and groans of mothers and sisters had gone up a pitiful memorial to God. And when the thunders of cannon, on land and sea, began to shock the continent with their fearful din, forth came the choice of God—the man of liberty—Abraham Lincoln. Notwithstanding that various official mistakes were made in the commencement of his administration, never has there a greater man graced the American soil, nor the whole circumference of God's footstool, than Abraham Lincoln.—Rev. J. A. Brockett.

Let this day be to us as sacred as was the night of the Passover to ancient Israel. Let the anthems of your praise ring out with joyous liberty until the glad sound shall be caught up by the hoary heights of the western mountains, "Lincoln and freedom!" By the mountains let the electric words be hurled down to the embattled hills—thence, down to the lowlands, through the shaded aisles of darkplumed forests, until the skies shall catch the glad sound—"Lincoln, beyond the stars, and freedom inseparable now and forever." Thus, hurled from glory to glory, and from age to age, shall these words pass on until the unsightly piece of ebony, quarried from the depths of slavery's pit, shall prove a priceless jewel gleaming in the diadem of humanity.—A. M. E. Review.

During the war, when he knew that his liberty was the gage, when he knew the battle was to decide whether he should or should not be free, although the country for hundreds of miles was stripped bare of able-bodied white men, and though property and the lives of the women and children were at the mercy of the slave, there never was an instance of arson, or assassination, or rapine, or conspiracy, and there never was an uprising. They stood still, conscious of their power, and said, "We will see what God will do for us." Such a history has no parallel. And since they began to vote, I beg leave to say, in closing this subject, that they have voted just as wisely and patriotically as their late masters did before the emancipation.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Emigration

The emigrant's way o'er the western desert is mark'd by Camp-fires long consum'd and bones that bleach in the sunshine.—Longfellow.

Beheld the duteous son, the sire decayed,
The modest matron, and the blushing maid,
Forc'd from their homes, a melancholy
train,
To traverse climes beyond the western main. —Goldsmith.

Let us depart! the universal sun
Confines not to one land his blessed beams;
Nor is man rooted, like a tree, whose seed
The winds on some ungenial soil have cast
There, where it cannot prosper. —Southey.

Down where yon anch'ring vessel spreads
the sail,
That, idly waiting, flaps with every gale,
Downward they move, a melancholy band,
Pass from the shore and darken all the strand. —Goldsmith.

Good heav'n! what sorrows gloom'd that parting day,
That call'd them from their native walks
away,

When the poor exiles, ev'ry pleasure past,
Hung round the bow'rs, and fondly look'd their last,

And took a long farewell, and wish'd in vain,

For seats like these beyond the western main,

And shudd'ring still to face the distant
deep,

Return'd and wept, and still return'd to weep. —Goldsmith.

I hear the tread of pioneers

Of nations yet to be,

The first low wash of waves where soon

Shall roll a human sea. —Whittier.

Eminence

He who surpasses or subdues mankind,
Must look down on the hate of those below.
—Byron.

It is a folly for an eminent man to think of escaping censure, and a weakness to be affected with it. All the illustrious persons of antiquity, and indeed of every age in the world, have passed through this fiery persecution.
—Addison.

Emotion

Emotion is always new.—Victor
Hugo.

The feelings, like flowers and butterflies, last longer the later they are delayed.—Richter.

It is our kindest and tenderest emotion which we screen from the world.
—Richter.

The heart that is soonest awake to the flowers is always the first to be touched by the thorns.—Moore.

Women are ever the dupes or the victims of their extreme sensitiveness.—Balzac.

Women endowed with remarkable sensibilities enjoy much; but they also suffer much.—Anna Cora Mowatt.

All loving emotions, like plants, shoot up most rapidly in the tempestuous atmosphere of life.—Richter.

Women are more susceptible to pain than to pleasure.—Montaigne.

Emotion turning back on itself, and not leading on to thought or action, is the element of madness.—John Sterling.

The reason that women are so much more sociable than men is because they act more from the heart than the intellect.—Lamartine.

In love we never think of moral qualities, and scarcely of intellectual ones. Temperament and manners alone, with beauty, excite love.—
Hazlitt.

How many women are born too finely organized in sense and soul for the highway they must walk with feet unshod.—O. W. Holmes.

At certain periods of life, we live years of emotion in a few weeks, and look back on those times as on great gaps between the old life and the new.
—Thackeray.

Emotion is the atmosphere in which thought is steeped, that which lends to thought its tone or temperature, that to which thought is often indebted for half its power.—Hugh R. Haweis.

Natural emotion is the soul of poetry, as melody is of music; the same faults are engendered by over-study of either art; there is a lack of sincerity, of irresistible impulse in both the poet and the composer.—Stedman.

Emotion, whether of ridicule, anger, or sorrow,—whether raised at a puppet show, a funeral, or a battle,— is your grandest of levellers. The man who would be always superior should be always apathetic.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Emotion has no value in the Christian system, save as it stands connected with right conduct as the cause of it. Emotion is the bud, not the flower, and never is it of value until it expands into a flower.—Murray.

There are three orders of emotions, —those of pleasure, which refer to the senses; those of harmony, which refer to the mind; and those of happiness, which are the natural result of a union between harmony and pleasure. —Chapone.

We are but shadows: we are not endowed with real life, and all that seems most real about us is but the thinnest substance of a dream,—till the heart be touched. That touch creates us—then we begin to be—thereby we are beings of reality and inheritors of eternity.—Hawthorne.

Empire

Nations and empires flourish and decay,
By turns command, and in their turns obey. —Ovid.

Extended empire, like expanded gold
Exchanges solid strength for feeble splendor. —Johnson.

Westward the course of empire takes its way.

The four first acts already past,
A fifth shall close the drama with the day;
Time's noblest offspring is the last. —Bishop Berkeley.

Employment

Indolence is stagnation; employment is life.—Seneca.

The rust rots the steel which use preserves.—Lytton.

The hand of little employment hath the daintier sense.—Shakespeare.

The man who falls in love will find plenty of occupation.—Ovid.

The devil does not tempt people whom he finds suitably employed.—Jeremy Taylor.

Be always employed about some rational thing, that the devil find thee not idle.—Jerome.

Employment is nature's physician, and is essential to human happiness.—Galen.

The great principle of human satisfaction is engagement.—Paley.

Employment and ennui are simply incompatible.—Madame Deluzy.

The devil never tempted a man whom he found judiciously employed.—Spurgeon.

Give us employment in place of ennui; for we must have one or the other.—Mme. De Salm.

The wise prove, and the foolish confess, by their conduct, that a life of employment is the only life worth leading.—Paley.

Employment, which Galen calls "nature's physician," is so essential to human happiness, that indolence is justly considered as the mother of misery.—Burton.

Women are in this respect more fortunate than men, that most of their employments are of such a nature that they can at the same time be thinking of quite different things.—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

At present, the most valuable gift which can be bestowed upon women is something to do which they can do well and worthily, and thereby maintain themselves.—James A. Garfield.

A vast deal of human sympathy runs along the electric line of needle-work, stretching from the throne to the wicker chair of the humble seamstress.—Hawthorne.

Life will frequently languish, even in the hands of the busy, if they have not some employment subsidiary to that which forms their main pursuit.—Blair.

Cares are employments; and without employment
The soul is on a rack; the rack of rest,
To souls most adverse; action all their joy. —Young.

People cry out, and deplore the unremunerative employment of woman. The true want is the other way. Women really trained, and capable of good work, can command any wages or salaries.—Gail Hamilton.

Employment gives health, sobriety, and morals. Constant employment and well-paid labor produce, in a country like ours, general prosperity, content, and cheerfulness. Thus happy have we seen the country.—Daniel Webster.

Nothing can hide from me the conviction that an immortal soul needs for its sustenance something more than visiting, and gardening, and novel-reading, and crochet-needle, and the occasional manufacture of sponge cake.—T. W. Higginson.

Let us candidly confess our indebtedness to the needle. How many hours of sorrow has it softened, how many bitter irritations calmed, how many confused thoughts reduced to order, how many life-plans sketched in purple!—Caroline H. Dall.

The question of woman's work in its economic aspect is really one not so much now of woman's rights as of woman's might. Pretty much anything she wants to do, a resolute girl may now do.—R. Herbert Newton.

What kind of work would be done if Hercules took to spinning wool in safe places, while Omphales turned out to do battle with monsters, in his stead? What kind of men should we have as the result of the exchange?—E. Lynn Linton.

We have employment assigned to us for every circumstance in life. When we are alone, we have our thoughts to watch; in the family, our tempers; and in company, our tongues.—Hannah More.

Laziness begat wearisomeness, and this put men in quest of diversions, play and company, on which however it is a constant attendant; he who works hard, has enough to do with himself otherwise.—La Bruyère.

Exert your talents, and distinguish yourself, and don't think of retiring from the world until the world will be sorry that you retire. I hate a fellow whom pride or cowardice or laziness drives into a corner, and who does nothing when he is there but sit and growl. Let him come out, as I do, and bark.—Dr. Johnson.

Emulation

Emulation and imitation are of twin birth.—Charles Buxton.

There is emulation even in vice.—Eugene Sue.

'T is no shame to follow the better precedent.—Ben Jonson.

Emulation admires and strives to imitate great actions; envy is only moved to malice.—Balzac.

My heart laments that virtue cannot live out of the teeth of emulation.—Shakespeare.

An envious fever of pale and bloodless emulation.—Shakespeare.

Emulation embalms the dead; envy, the vampire, blasts the living.—Fuseli.

Those fair ideas to my aid I'll call, and emulate my great original.—Dryden.

Envy, to which the ignoble mind's a slave, is emulation in the learned or brave.—Pope.

Emulation is a handsome passion; it is enterprising, but just withal.—Jeremy Collier.

Where there is emulation, there will be vanity; where there is vanity, there will be folly.—Johnson.

Terror has its inspiration, as well as competition.—Beaconsfield.

Emulation is active virtue; envy is brooding malice.—Ouida.

There is a long and wearisome step between admiration and imitation.—Richter.

Emulation is a noble and just passion, full of appreciation.—Schiller.

It is scarce possible at once to admire and excel an author, as water rises no higher than the reservoir it falls from.—Bacon.

Unsuccessful emulation is too apt to sink into envy, which of all sins has not even the excuse to offer of temporary gratification.—Sydney Dobell.

Keeps mankind sweet by action; without that
The world would be a filthy settled mud.
—Crown.

Emulation looks out for merits, that she may exert herself by a victory; envy spies out blemishes, that she may have another by a defeat.—Colton.

Emulation hath a thousand sons, that one by one pursue; if you give way, or edge aside from the direct forthright, like to an entered tide, they all rush by, and leave you hindmost.—Shakespeare.

When emulation leads us to strive for self-elevation by merit alone, and not by belittling another, then it is one of the grandest possible incentives to action.—Dr. Johnson.

Does the man live who has not felt this spur to action, in a more or less generous spirit? Emulation lives so near to envy that it is sometimes difficult to establish the boundary-lines.—Henry Giles.

God grant that we may contend with other churches, as the vine with the olive, which of us shall bear the best fruit; but not as the brier with the thistle, which of us will be the most unprofitable.—Bacon.

Worldly ambition is founded on pride or envy, but emulation, or laudable ambition, is actually founded in humility; for it evidently implies that we have a low opinion of our present attainments, and think it necessary to be advanced.—Bishop Hall.

Emulation has been termed a spur to virtue, and assumes to be a spur of gold. But it is a spur composed of baser materials, and if tried in the furnace will be found to want that fixedness which is the characteristic of gold. He that pursues virtue, only to surpass others, is not far from wishing others less forward than himself; and he that rejoices too much at his own perfections will be too little grieved at the defects of other men.—Colton.

Emulation is a handsome passion; it is enterprising, but just withal. It keeps a man within the terms of honor, and makes the contest for glory just and generous. He strives to excel, but it is by raising himself, not by depressing others.—Jeremy Collier.

Emulation is grief arising from seeing one's self exceeded or excelled by his concurrent, together with hope to equal or exceed him in time to come, by his own ability. But envy is the same grief joined with pleasure conceived in the imagination of some ill-fortune that may befall him.—Thomas Hobbes.

Give me the boy who rouses when he is praised, who profits when he is encouraged and who cries when he is defeated. Such a boy will be fired by ambition; he will be stung by reproach, and animated by preference; never shall I apprehend any bad consequences from idleness in such a boy.—Quintilian.

It is averse to talent to be con-sorted and trained up with inferior minds or inferior companions, however high they may rank. The foal of the racer neither finds out his speed, nor calls out his powers, if pastured out with the common herd, that are destined for the collar and the yoke.—Colton.

Emulation, even in brutes, is sensitively "nervous." See the tremor of the thoroughbred racer before he starts. The dray-horse does not tremble, but he does not emulate. It is not his work to run a race. Says Marcus Antoninus, "It is all one to a stone whether it be thrown upward or downward." Yet the emulation of a man of genius is seldom with his contemporaries, that is, inwardly in his mind, although outwardly in his act it would seem so. The competitors with whom his secret ambition seems to vie are the dead.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Encouragement

Correction does much, but encouragement does more. Encouragement after censure is as the sun after a shower.—Goethe.

More hearts pine away in secret anguish for the want of kindness from those who should be their comforters than for any other calamity in life.—Young.

It may be proper for all to remember that they ought not to raise expectations which it is not in their power to satisfy; and that it is more pleasing to see smoke brightening into flame than flame sinking into smoke.—Johnson.

Faint not; the miles to heaven are but few and short.—Rutherford.

End

Every hour has its end.—Scott.

Deed done is well begun.—Dante.

The end must justify the means.—Prior.

Let the end try the man.—Shakespeare.

All's well that ends well, still the finis is the crown.—Shakespeare.

I am the last of my race. My name ends with me.—Schiller.

We ought to consider the end in everything.—La Fontaine.

The end crowns all;
And that old common arbitrator, time,
Will one day end it. —Shakespeare.

By the same means we do not always arrive at the same ends.—St. Real.

Endurance

Still achieving, still pursuing, learn to labor and to wait.—Longfellow.

Endurance is the crowning quality.—Lowell.

He conquers who endures.—Persius.

Endurance is patience concentrated.—Carlyle.

Patience and time conquer all things.—Corneille.

Prolonged endurance tames the bold.—Byron.

Things may serve long, but not serve ever.—Shakespeare.

The bird that flutters least is longest on the wing.—Cowper.

The burden becomes light that is shared by love.—Ovid.

By bravely enduring it, an evil which cannot be avoided is overcome.—Old Proverb.

Through suffering and sorrow thou hast passed, to show us what a woman true can be.—Lowell.

The seal of suffering impressed upon our destiny announces in clear characters our high calling.—De Gerando.

I have often had occasion to remark the fortitude with which women sustain the most overwhelming reverses of fortune.—Washington Irving.

The greater the difficulty the more glory in surmounting it. Skilful pilots gain their reputation from storms and tempests.—Epicurus.

To endure is the first thing a child ought to learn, and that which he will have most need to know.—Rousseau.

There is nothing in the world so much admired as a man who knows how to bear unhappiness with courage.—Seneca.

There was never yet philosopher that could endure the toothache patiently, however they have writ the style of gods, and make a pish at chance and sufferance.—Shakespeare.

Wounds and hardships provoke our courage, and when our fortunes are at the lowest, our wits and minds are commonly at the best.—Charron.

Endurance is the prerogative of woman, enabling the gentlest to suffer what would cause terror to manhood.—Wieland.

Not in the achievement, but in the endurance of the human soul, does it show its divine grandeur and its alliance with the infinite God.—Chapin.

'Tis not now who's stout and bold?
But who bears hunger best, and cold?
And he's approv'd the most deserving,
Who longest can hold out at starving.
—Butler.

To the disgrace of men it is seen that there are women both more wise to judge what evil is expected, and more constant to bear it when it happens.—Sir P. Sidney.

Women are so gentle, so affectionate, so true in sorrow, so untired and untiring! but the leaf withers not sooner, and tropic light fades not more abruptly.—Barry Cornwall.

Our strength often increases in proportion to the obstacles which are imposed upon it; it is thus that we enter upon the most perilous plans after having had the shame of failing in more simple ones.—Rapin.

Whenever evil befalls us, we ought to ask ourselves, after the first suffering, how we can turn it into good. So shall we take occasion, from one bitter root, to raise perhaps many flowers.—Leigh Hunt.

Allowing everything that can be claimed for the superior patience and self-command of women, still the main solution of their enduring pain better than men is their having less physical sensibility.—Moore.

The women of the poorer classes make sacrifices, and run risks, and bear privations, and exercise patience and kindness to a degree that the world never knows of, and would scarcely believe even if it did know.—Samuel Smiles.

As in labor, the more one doth exercise, the more one is enabled to do, strength growing upon work; so, with the use of suffering, men's minds get the habit of suffering, and all fears and terrors are to them but as a summons to battle, whereof they know beforehand they shall come off victorious.—Sir P. Sidney.

There is a sort of natural instinct of human dignity in the heart of man which steels his very nerves not to bend beneath the heavy blows of a great adversity. The palm-tree grows best beneath a ponderous weight, even so the character of man. There is no merit in it, it is a law of psychology. The petty pangs of small daily cares have often bent the character of men, but great misfortunes seldom. There is less danger in this than in great good luck.—Kossuth.

"Blessed is the man that endureth temptation, for when he is tried he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love Him." It is a verse of climbing power. It begins with man, it ends with God. It begins with earth, it ends with heaven. It begins with struggle, it ends with a crown. Blessed is the man that endureth, stands up under it, resists, conquers. "Blessed," for it means new wisdom, new strength, new joy,—"the crown of life."—Maltbie Babcock.

Enemies

Our enemies are our outward consciences.—Shakespeare.

None but yourself who are your greatest foe.—Longfellow.

There is no little enemy.—Franklin.

The man who has no enemies has no following.—Donn Piatt.

True wisdom, in general, consists in energetic determination.—Napoleon.

A man who makes no enemies is never a positive force.—Simon Cameron.

A man selects his enemies, his friends make themselves, and from these friends he is apt to suffer.—Donn Piatt.

My nearest
And dearest enemy.
—Thomas Middleton.

A merely fallen enemy may rise again, but the reconciled one is truly vanquished.—Schiller.

A man's enemies have no power to harm him, if he is true to himself and loyal to God.—John B. Gough.

That is a most wretched fortune which is without an enemy.—Publius Syrus.

Did a person but know the value of an enemy, he would purchase him with pure gold.—Abbé de Raucni.

If you want enemies excel others; if you want friends let others excel you.—Colton.

Make no enemies; he is insignificant indeed that can do thee no harm.—Colton.

It is better to break off a thousand friendships, than to endure the sight of a single enemy.—Saadi.

There's not so much danger in a known foe as a suspected friend.—Nabb.

The relief of enemies has a tendency to unite mankind in fraternal affection.—Johnson.

A malicious enemy is better than a clumsy friend.—Madame Swetchine.

A friend exaggerates a man's virtues; an enemy inflames his crimes.—Addison.

Inflict not on an enemy every injury in your power, for he may afterwards become your friend.—Saadi.

Our enemies come nearer the truth in the opinions they form of us than we do in our opinion of ourselves.—La Rochefoucauld.

An enemy despised is the most dangerous of all enemies.—Publius Syrus.

It is the enemy whom we do not suspect who is the most dangerous.—Rojas.

Let our friends perish, provided that our enemies fall at the same time.—Cicero.

The body of a dead enemy always smells sweet.—Vespasian.

'Tis death to me to be at enmity;
I hate it, and desire all good men's love.
—Shakespeare.

Though all things do to harm him what they can,
No greater en'my to himself than man.
—Earl of Stirling.

'Tis ill to trust a reconciled foe;
Be still in readiness, you do not know
How soon he may assault us.
—Webster and Rowley.

If we could read the secret history of our enemies we should find in each man's life sorrow and suffering enough to disarm all hostility.—Longfellow.

I am persuaded that he who is capable of being a bitter enemy can never possess the necessary virtues that constitute a true friend.—Fitzosborne.

It is from our enemies that we often gain excellent maxims, and are frequently surprised into reason by their mistakes.—Thomas Paine.

Discover the opinion of your enemies, which is commonly the truest; for they will give you no quarter, and allow nothing to complaisance.—Dryden.

Whosoever formeth an intimacy with the enemies of his friends, does so to injure the latter. O wise man! wash your hands of that friend who associates with your enemies.—Saadi

I have adopted the Roman sentiment, that it is more honorable to save a citizen than to kill an enemy.—Dr. Johnson.

It would be a rarity worth seeing could any one show us such a thing as a perfectly reconciled enemy.—South.

The world is large when its weary leagues two loving hearts divide;
But the world is small when your enemy is loose on the other side.

—John Boyle O'Reilly.

It is better to decide a difference between enemies than friends, for one of our friends will certainly become an enemy and one of our enemies a friend.—Bias.

The fine and noble way to kill a foe
Is not to kill him; you with kindness may
So change him, that he shall cease to be so;
Then he's slain.

—Alecyn.

Avoid that which an enemy tells you to do; for if you follow his advice, you will smite your knees with the hand of sorrow. If he shows you a road straight as an arrow, turn from it and go the other way.—Saadi.

Who can look down upon the grave even of an enemy, and not feel a compunctious throb, that he should ever have warred with the poor handful of earth that lies mouldering before him!—Washington Irving.

A certain excess of animal spirits with thoughtless good-humor will often make more enemies than the most deliberate spite and ill-nature, which is on its guard, and strikes with caution and safety.—Hazlitt.

A Christian should not discover that he has enemies by any other way than by doing more good to them than to others. "If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink."—Bishop Wilson.

Let us carefully observe those good qualities wherein our enemies excel us; and endeavor to excel them, by avoiding what is faulty, and imitating what is excellent in them.—Plutarch.

Some men are more beholden to their bitterest enemies than to friends who appear to be sweetness itself. The former frequently tell the truth, but the latter never.—Cato.

It is with many enterprises as with striking fire; we do not meet with success except by reiterated efforts, and often at the instant when we despaired of success.—Madame de Maintenon.

Lands, intersected by a narrow frith,
Abhor each other. Mountains interpos'd
Make enemies of nations, who had else,
Like kindred drops, been mingled into one.

—Cowper.

We pray for our enemies; we seek to persuade those who hate us without cause to live conformably to the goodly precepts of Christ, that they may become partakers with us of the joyful hope of blessings from God, the Lord of all.—Justin Martyr.

Never disregard what your enemies say. They may be severe, they may be prejudiced, they may be determined to see only in one direction, but still in that direction they see clearly. They do not speak all the truth, but they generally speak the truth from one point of view; so far as that goes, attend to them.—B. R. Haydon.

I do defy him, and I spit at him;
Call him a slanderous coward and a villain!
Which to maintain I would allow him odds,
And meet him, were I tied to run afoot
Even to the frozen ridges of the Alps.

—Shakespeare.

Be assured those will be thy worst enemies, not to whom thou hast done evil, but who have done evil to thee. And those will be thy best friends, not to whom thou hast done good, but who have done good to thee.—Lavater.

Plutarch has written an essay on the benefits which a man may receive from his enemies; and, among the good fruits of enmity, mentions this in particular, that by the reproaches which it casts upon us, we see the worst side of ourselves.—Addison.

Everybody has enemies. To have an enemy is quite another thing. One must be somebody in order to have an enemy. One must be a force before he can be resisted by another force.—Madame Swetchine.

When you see discord amongst the troops of your enemy, be of good courage; but if they are united, then be upon your guard. When you see contention amongst your enemies, go and sit at ease with your friends; but when you see them of one mind, string your bow, and place stones upon the ramparts.—Saadi.

Men of sense often learn from their enemies. Prudence is the best safeguard. This principle cannot be learned from a friend, but an enemy extorts it immediately. It is from their foes, not their friends, that cities learn the lesson of building high walls and ships of war. And this lesson saves their children, their homes, and their properties.—Aristophanes.

Energy

Energy and persistence conquer all things.—Franklin.

He alone has energy that cannot be deprived of it.—Lavater.

Women love energy and grand results.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Thought and action are the redeeming features of our lives.—Zimmermann.

Energy, even like the biblical grain of mustard-seed, will remove mountains.—Hosea Ballou.

It is unreasonable for us to look for as great a degree of energy in a woman as in a man; energy is quite as much of a physical as a mental product.—Voltaire.

Energy will do anything that can be done in this world; and no talents, no circumstances, no opportunities, will make a two-legged animal a man without it.—Goethe.

We should act with as much energy as those who expect everything from themselves; and we should pray with as much earnestness as those who expect everything from God.—Colton.

The shortest and surest way to prove a work possible is strenuously to set about it; and no wonder if that proves it possible that for the most part makes it so.—South.

Is there one whom difficulties dishearten—who bends to the storm? He will do little. Is there one who will conquer? That kind of man never fails.—Hunter.

Strong impulses are but another name for energy. Energy may be turned to bad uses; but more good may always be made of an energetic nature, than of an indolent and impassive one.—John Stuart Mill.

He who would do some great thing in this short life must apply himself to the work with such a concentration of his forces as, to idle spectators, who live only to amuse themselves, looks like insanity.—Foster.

No conjunction can possibly occur, however fearful, however tremendous it may appear, from which a man by his own energy may not extricate himself, as a mariner by the rattling of his cannon can dissipate the impending waterspout.—Beaconsfield.

England

The land of scholars, and the nurse of arms.—Goldsmith.

The storehouse of the world.—Dr. Young.

England is safe, if true within itself.—Shakespeare.

England! my country, great and free!
Heart of the world, I leap to thee!
—Bailey.

Rule, Britannia, rule the waves;
Britons never will be slaves.
—Thomson.

It was always yet the trick of our English nation, if they have a good thing, to make it too common.—

Shakespeare.

Most brilliant star upon the crest of Time
Is England, England!
—Alexander Smith.

This England never did, nor never shall,
Lie at the proud foot of a conqueror.
—Shakespeare.

O England!—model to thy inward greatness,
Like little body with a mighty heart.
—Shakespeare.

Be England what she will,
With all her faults, she is my country still.
—Churchill.

May he be suffocate,
That dims the honour of this warlike isle!
—Shakespeare.

England, of all countries in the world,
Most blind to thine own good.
—Randolph.

Without one friend, above all foes,
Britannia gives the world repose.
—Cowper.

This land of such dear souls, this dear, dear land,
Dear for her reputation through the world.
—Shakespeare.

The Continent will not suffer England to be the workshop of the world.
—Earl of Beaconsfield.

The noblest prospect which a Scotchman ever sees is the high-road that leads him to England.—Sam'l
Johnson.

England, bound in with the triumphant sea,
Whose rocky shore beats back the envious siege
Of watery Neptune.
—Shakespeare.

Come the three corners of the world in
arms,
And we shall shock them. Naught shall make us rue,
If England to itself do rest but true.
—Shakespeare.

'T is liberty crowns Britannia's Isle,
And makes her barren rocks and her bleak mountains smile.
—Addison.

The people of England are the most enthusiastic in the world. There are others more excitable, but there are none so enthusiastic.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

Hail, land of bowmen! seed of those who scorn'd
To stoop the neck to wide imperial Rome:
O dearest half of Albion sea-walled.
—Albania.

Set in this stormy Northern sea,
Queen of these restless fields of tide,
England! what shall men say of thee,
Before whose feet the worlds divide?
—Oscar Wilde.

His home! the Western giant smiles,
And turns the spotty globe to find it;—
This little speck the British Isles?
'Tis but a freckle,—never mind it.
—O. W. Holmes.

Poor England! thou art a devoted deer,
Beset with every ill but that of fear.
The nations hunt; all mock thee for a prey;
They swarm around thee, and thou stand'st at bay.
—Cowper.

England, a happy land we know,
Where follies naturally grow,
Where without culture they arise,
And tow'r above the common size.
—Churchill.

Be Britain still to Britain true,
Among ourselves united;
For never but by British hands,
Maun British wrangs be righted.
—Burns.

Britain, the queen of isles, our fair possession
Secur'd by nature, laughs at foreign force;
Her ships her bulwark, and the sea her dike,
Sees plenty in her lap, and braves the world.
—Havard.

Oh, when shall Britain, conscious of her
claim,
Stand emulous of Greek and Roman fame?
In living medals see her wars enroll'd,
And vanquished realms supply recording
gold?
—Pope.

This precious stone set in the silver sea,
Which serves it in the office of a wall,
Or as a moat defensive to a house,
Against the envy of less happier lands;
This blessed plot, this earth, this realm, this England.
—Shakespeare.

The ocean is the grand vehicle of trade, and the uniter of distant nations. To us it is peculiarly kind, not only as it wafts into our ports the harvests of every climate, and renders our island the centre of traffic, but also as it secures us from foreign invasions by a sort of impregnable intrenchment.—Harvey.

For of old time, since first the rushing flood,
Urg'd by Almighty Pow'r, this favour'd isle
Turn'd flashing from the continent aside,
Indented shore to shore responsive still,
Its guardian she. —Thomson.

This royal throne of kings, this scepter'd isle,
This earth of majesty, this seat of Mars,
This other Eden, demi-paradise,
This fortress built by nature for herself
Against infection and the hand of war;
This happy breed of men, this little world,
This precious stone set in the silver sea.
—Shakespeare.

There is no land like England,
Whate'er the light of day be;
There are no hearts like English hearts,
Such hearts of oak as they be;
There is no land like England,
Whate'er the light of day be:
There are no men like Englishmen,
So tall and bold as they be!
And these will strike for England,
And man and maid be free
To foil and spoil the tyrant Beneath the greenwood tree.
—Tennyson.

O native isle! fair freedom's happiest seat!
At thought of thee, my bounding pulses beat;
At thought of thee my heart impatient burns;
And all my country to my soul returns.
When shall I see those fields, whose plentiful grain
No pow'r can ravish from th' industrious swain?
When kiss, with pious love, the sacred earth
That gave a Burleigh or a Russell birth?
When—in the shade of laws that long have stood,
Propt by their care or strengthen'd by their blood,—
Of fearless independence wisely vain,
The proudest slave of Bourbon's race disdain.
—Lord Littleton.

England is a domestic country.
Here the home is revered and the hearth sacred. The nation is represented by a family,—the Royal family,—and if that family is educated with a sense of responsibility and a sentiment of public duty, it is difficult to exaggerate the salutary influence it may exercise over a nation.—Beaconsfield.

Island of bliss! amid the subject seas,
That thunder round thy rocky coasts, set up,
At once the wonder, terror and delight
Of distant nations: whose remotest shores
Can soon be shaken by thy naval arm;
Not to be shook thyself, but all assaults
Baffling, as thy hoar cliffs the loud sea-wave.
—Thomson.

England, our Mother's Mother! Come, and see
A greater England here! O come, and be
At home with us, your children, for there runs
The same blood in our veins as in your sons;
The same deep-seated love of Liberty
Beats in our hearts. We speak the same good tongue:
Familiar with all songs your bards have sung:
Those large men, Milton, Shakespeare, both are ours.
—R. H. Stoddard.

There learned arts do flourish in great honour
And poets' wits are had in peerless price;
Religion hath lay power, to rest upon her,
Advancing virtue, and suppressing vice.
For end all good, all grace there freely grows,
Had people grace it gratefully to use:
For God His gifts there plenteously bestows,
But graceless men them greatly do abuse.
—Spenser.

A power which has dotted over the surface of the whole globe with her possessions and military posts, whose morning drum-beat, following the sun, and keeping company with the hours, circles the earth with one continuous and unbroken strain of the martial airs of England.—Daniel Webster.

Enjoyment

He scatters enjoyment who can enjoy much.—Lavater.

They most enjoy the world who least admire.—Young.

Be merry if you are wise.—Martial.

Enjoy the present day, trusting very little to the morrow.—Horace.

The enjoyments of this life are not equal to its evils, even if equal in number.—Pliny.

Sleep, riches, and health are only truly enjoyed after they have been interrupted.—Richter.

And 'tis my faith that every flower
Enjoys the air it breathes.
—Wordsworth.

Who can enjoy alone?
Or all enjoying what contentment find?
—Milton.

A day of such serene enjoyment spent,
Were worth an age of splendid discontent.
—James Montgomery.

The less you can enjoy, the poorer,
the scantier yourself,—the more you can enjoy, the richer, the more vigorous.—Lavater.

Temper your enjoyments with prudence, lest there be written upon your heart that fearful word "satiety."—
Quarles.

Whether with Reason, or with Instinct
blest,
Know, all enjoy that pow'r which suits them best.
—Pope.

Heaven forbids, it is true, certain gratifications, but there are ways and means of compounding such matters.
—Molière.

Pound St. Paul's Church into atoms, and consider any single atom; it is,
to be sure, good for nothing; but put all these atoms together, and you have
St. Paul's Church. So it is with human felicity, which is made up of many ingredients, each of which may be shown to be very insignificant.—
Dr. Johnson.

All solitary enjoyments, quickly fall, or become painful, so that, perhaps, no more insufferable misery can be conceived than that which must follow incommunicable privileges. Only imagine a human being condemned to perpetual youth while all around him decay and die. O, how sincerely would he call upon death for deliverance!—Archbishop Sharp.

You were made for enjoyment, and the world was filled with things which you will enjoy, unless you are too proud to be pleased by them, or too grasping to care for what you cannot turn to other account than mere delight.—Ruskin.

Providence has fixed the limits of human enjoyment by immovable boundaries, and has set different grati-fications at such a distance from each other, that no art or power can bring them together. This great law it is the business of every rational being to understand, that life may not pass away in an attempt to make contradictions consistent, to combine opposite qualities, and to unite things which the nature of their being must always keep asunder.—Johnson.

How small of all that human hearts endure,
That part which laws or kings can cause or cure!

Still to ourselves in every place consigned,
Our own felicity we make or find.
With secret course, which no loud storms
annoy,
Glides the smooth current of domestic joy.
—Goldsmith.

We are all children in our strife to seize
Each petty pleasure, as it lures the sight,
And like the tall tree swaying in the breeze,

Our lofty wishes stoop their tow'ring flight,
Till when the prize is won it seems no
more
Than gather'd shells from ocean's countless store,
And ever those who would enjoyment gain
Must find it in the purpose they pursue.
—Mrs. Hale.

Ye men of gloom and austerity, who paint the face of Infinite Benevolence with an eternal frown, read in the everlasting book, wide open to your view, the lesson it would teach. Its pictures are not in black and sombre hues, but bright and glowing tints; its music—save when ye drown it—is not in sighs and groans, but songs and cheerful sounds. Listen to the million voices in the summer air, and find one dismal as your own.—Dickens.

Ennui

Ennui was born one day of uniformity.—Motte.

The curse of the great is ennui.—Bulwer-Lytton.

A scholar has no ennui.—Richter.

A French word for an English malady.—Chatfield.

I am wrapped in dismal thinking.—Shakespeare.

Ennui shortens life, and bereaves the day of its light.—Emerson.

Ennui is an expressive word invented in France.—Bancroft.

Ennui is the rust of the mind born of idleness. It is unused tools that corrode.—Mme. de Girardin.

We are amused through the intellect, but it is the heart that saves us from ennui.—Madame Swetchine.

Ennui is the desire of activity without the fit means of gratifying the desire.—Bancroft.

Ennui, the parent of expensive and ruinous vices.—Ninon de Lenclos.

That which renders life burdensome to us generally arises from the abuse of it.—Rousseau.

I do pity unlearned gentlemen on a rainy day.—Lord Falkland.

Ennui is a growth of English root, though nameless in our language.—Byron.

You cannot give me an instance of any man who is permitted to lay out his own time contriving not to have tedious hours.—Dr. Johnson.

It is only those who never think at all, or else who have accustomed themselves to brood invariably on abstract ideas, that ever feel ennui.—Hazlitt.

The gloomy and the resentful are always found among those who have nothing to do or who do nothing.—Dr. Johnson.

Social life is filled with doubts and vain aspirings; solitude, when the imagination is dethroned, is turned to weariness and ennui.—Miss L. E. Landon.

As the gout seems privileged to attack the bodies of the wealthy, so ennui seems to exert a similar prerogative over their minds.—Colton.

Ennui, perhaps, has made more gamblers than avarice, more drunkards than thirst, and perhaps as many suicides as despair.—Colton.

I am tired of looking on what is,
One might as well see beauty never more,
As look upon it with an empty eye.
I would this world were over. I am tired.
—Bailey.

Alas! I have nor hope nor health,
Nor peace within nor calm around,
Nor that content surpassing wealth
The sage in meditation found.
—Shelley.

For Ennui is a growth of English root,
Though nameless in our language;—we resort
The fact for words, and let the French translate That awful Yawn which Sleep cannot abate.
—Byron.

I have also seen the world, and after long experience have discovered that ennui is our greatest enemy, and remunerative labor our most lasting friend.—Möser.

This ennui, for which we Saxons had no name,—this word of France, has got a terrific significance. It shortens life, and bereaves the day of its light.—Emerson.

Ambition itself is not so reckless of human life as ennui; clemency is a favorite attribute of the former; but ennui has the taste of a cannibal.—Bancroft.

There is nothing so insupportable to man as to be in entire repose, without passion, occupation, amusement, or application. Then it is that he feels his own nothingness, isolation, insignificance, dependent nature, powerlessness, emptiness. Immediately there issue from his soul ennui, sadness, chagrin, vexation, despair.—Pascal.

The victims of ennui paralyze all the grosser feelings by excess, and torpify all the finer by disuse and inactivity. Disgusted with this world, and indifferent about another, they at last lay violent hands upon themselves, and assume no small credit for the sang froid with which they meet death. But, alas! such beings can scarcely be said to die, for they have never truly lived.—Colton.

They are mockery all—these skies, these

skies,
Their untroubled depth of blue—
They are mockery all—those eyes, those

eyes,
Which seem so warm and true;
Each tranquil star in the one that lies,
Each meteor glance that at random flies

The other's lashes through!
They are mockery all, these flowers of
spring,

Which her airs so softly woo—
And the love to which we would madly cling,

Ay, it is mockery too!
The winds are false which the perfume
stir,

And the looks deceive to which we sue;
And love but leads to the sepulchre,
Which flowers spring to strew.

—Hoffman.

Ennui, wretchedness, melancholy, groans, and sighs are the offering which these unhappy Methodists make to a Deity, who has covered the earth with gay colors, and scented it with rich perfumes; and shown us, by the plan and order of His works, that He has given to man something better than a bare existence, and scattered over His creation a thousand superfluous joys, which are totally unnecessary to the mere support of life.—Sydney Smith.

Enterprise

What passes in the world for talent or dexterity or enterprise is often only a want of moral principle. We may succeed where others fail, not from a greater share of invention, but from not being nice in the choice of expedients.—Hazlitt.

On the neck of the young man sparkles no gem, so gracious as enterprise.—Hafiz.

Providence has hidden a charm in difficult undertakings which is appreciated only by those who dare to grapple with them.—Madame Swetchine.

How slow the time
To the warm soul, that in the very instant
It forms, would execute a great design.
Thomson.

The method of the enterprising is to plan with audacity and execute with vigor; to sketch out a map of possibilities, and then to treat them as probabilities.—Bovee.

The fact is, that to do anything in this world worth doing, we must not stand back shivering and thinking of the cold and danger, but jump in and scramble through as well as we can.—Sydney Smith.

Before thy undertaking of any design, weigh the glory of thy action with the danger of the attempt; if the glory outweigh the danger, it is cowardice to neglect it; if the danger exceed the glory, it is rashness to attempt it; if the balances stand poised, let thy own genius cast them.—Quarles.

Enthusiasm

Enthusiasm is the breath of genius
—Beaconsfield.

Enthusiasts soon understand each other.—Washington Irving.

Enthusiasm is the fever of reason.—Victor Hugo.

Enthusiasm begets enthusiasm.—Longfellow.

Enthusiasm goes out.—Emerson.

Every great and commanding movement in the annals of the world is the triumph of enthusiasm.—Emerson.

Enthusiasm is the intoxication of earnestness.—Lamartine.

Nothing great was ever achieved without enthusiasm.—Emerson.

Religion is among the most powerful causes of enthusiasm.—Burke.

Great dejection often follows great enthusiasm.—Joseph Roux.

Every production of genius must be the production of enthusiasm.—Beaconsfield.

No wild enthusiast ever yet could rest,
Till half mankind were like himself possessed.
—Cowper.

For virtue's self may too much zeal be had:
The worst of madmen is a saint run mad.
—Pope.

The most enthusiastic man in a cause is rarely chosen as a leader.—Arthur Helps.

In things pertaining to enthusiasm no man is sane who does not know how to be insane on proper occasions.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Alas! how enthusiasm decreases as experience increases!—Mme. Louise Colet.

Enthusiasm imparts itself magnetically and fuses all into one happy and harmonious unity of feeling and sentiment.—A. Bronson Alcott.

And rash enthusiasm in good society
Were nothing but a moral inebriety.
—Byron.

The best thing which we derive from history is the enthusiasm that it raises in us.—Goethe.

Opposition may inflame the enthusiast, but never converts him.—Schiller.

Be not afraid of enthusiasm; you need it; you can do nothing effectually without it.—Guizot.

The sense of this word among the Greeks affords the noblest definition of it: enthusiasm signifies God in us.—Mme. de Staël.

There is a melancholy which accompanies all enthusiasm.—Shaftesbury.

All noble enthusiasms pass through a feverish stage and grow wiser and more serene.—Channing.

Enthusiasm gives life to what is invisible, and interest to what has no immediate action on our comfort in this world.—Mme de Staël.

Enthusiasm is the height of man; it is the passing from the human to the divine.—Emerson.

Enthusiasm is always connected with the senses.—Kant.

Enlist the interests of stern Morality and religious Enthusiasm in the cause of Political Liberty, as in the time of the old Puritans, and it will be irresistible.—S. T. Coleridge.

Depend upon it, my younger brethren, the bright, self-sacrificing enthusiasms of early manhood are among the most precious things in the whole course of human life.—H. P. Liddon.

Enthusiasm is grave, inward, self-controlled; mere excitement, outward, fantastic, hysterical, and passing in a moment from tears to laughter.—Sterling.

Enthusiasm is the leaping lightning, not to be measured by the horse-power of the understanding.—Emerson.

When once enthusiasm has been turned into ridicule, everything is undone except money and power.—Mme. de Staël.

There is not a more melancholy object than a man who has his head turned with religious enthusiasm.—Addison.

Nothing is so contagious as enthusiasm; it moves stones, it charms brutes. Enthusiasm is the genius of sincerity and truth accomplishes no victories without it.—Lytton.

Enthusiasm is that temper of the mind in which the imagination has got the better of the judgment.—Warburton.

Let us recognize the beauty and power of true enthusiasm; and whatever we may do to enlighten ourselves and others, guard against checking or chilling a single earnest sentiment.—Tuckerman.

The same reason makes a man a religious enthusiast, that makes a man an enthusiast in any other way, an uncomfortable mind in an uncomfortable body.—Hazlitt.

That youthful fervor, which is sometimes called enthusiasm, but which is a heat of imagination subsequently discovered to be inconsistent with the experience of actual life.—Beaconsfield.

Ridicule has ever been the most powerful enemy of enthusiasm, and properly the only antagonist that can be opposed to it with success.—Goldsmith.

Enthusiasm is the element of success in everything. It is the light that leads and the strength that lifts men on and up in the great struggles of scientific pursuits and of professional labor. It robs endurance of difficulty, and makes a pleasure of duty.—Bishop Doane.

Those who have arrived at any very eminent degree of excellence in the practice of an art or profession have commonly been actuated by a species of enthusiasm in their pursuit of it. They have kept one object in view amidst all the vicissitudes of time and fortune.—John Knox.

Without enthusiasm, the adventurer could never kindle that fire in his followers which is so necessary to consolidate their mutual interests; for no one can heartily deceive numbers who is not first of all deceived himself.—Warburton.

Let us beware of losing our enthusiasms. Let us ever glory in something, and strive to retain our admiration for all that would ennoble, and our interest in all that would enrich and beautify our life.—Phillips Brooks.

The fire of true enthusiasm is like the fires of Baku, which no water can ever quench, and which burn steadily on from night to day, and year to year, because their well-spring is eternal.—Ouida.

The enthusiast has been compared to a man walking in a fog; everything immediately around him, or in contact with him, appears sufficiently clear and luminous; but beyond the little circle of which he himself is the centre, all is mist and error and confusion.—Colton.

Conscience is doubtless sufficient to conduct the coldest character into the road of virtue; but enthusiasm is to conscience what honor is to duty; there is in us a superfluity of soul, which it is sweet to consecrate to the beautiful when the good has been accomplished.—Mme. de Staël.

Enthusiasm begets enthusiasm, eloquence produces conviction for the moment; but it is only by truth to Nature and the everlasting institutions of mankind that those abiding influences are won that enlarge from generation to generation.—Lowell.

Enthusiasm is an evil much less to be dreaded than superstition. Superstition is the disease of nations; enthusiasm that of individuals: the former grows inveterate by time; the latter is cured by it.—Robert Hall.

A mother should give her children a superabundance of enthusiasm; that after they have lost all they are sure to lose on mixing with the world, enough may still remain to prompt and support them through great actions. A cloak should be of three-pile, to keep its gloss in wear.—Hare.

Enthusiasm is that secret and harmonious spirit which hovers over the production of genius, throwing the reader of a book, or the spectator of a statue, into the very ideal presence whence these works have really originated. A great work always leaves us in a state of musing.—Isaac Disraeli.

I look upon enthusiasm, in all other points but that of religion, to be a very necessary turn of mind; as indeed it is a vein which nature seems to have marked with more or less strength, in the tempers of most men. No matter what the object is, whether business, pleasures or the fine arts: whoever pursues them to any purpose must do so con amore.—Melmoth.

Enthusiasm is a virtue rarely to be met with in seasons of calm and untroubled prosperity. Enthusiasm flourishes in adversity, kindles in the hour of danger, and awakens to deeds of renown. The terrors of persecution only serve to quicken the energy of its purposes. It swells in proud integrity, and, great in the purity of its cause, it can scatter defiance amidst hosts of enemies.—Dr. Chalmers.

It is impossible to combat enthusiasm with reason; for though it makes a show of resistance, it soon eludes the pressure, refers you to distinctions not to be understood, and feelings which it cannot explain. A man who would endeavor to fix an enthusiast by argument might as well attempt to spread quicksilver with his finger.—Goldsmith.

I gaze upon the thousand stars

That fill the midnight sky;

And wish, so passionately wish,

A light like theirs on high.

I have such eagerness of hope

To benefit my kind;

I feel as if immortal power

Were given to my mind.

—Miss Landon.

Enthusiasm is always connected with the senses, whatever be the object that excites it. The true strength of virtue is serenity of mind, combined with a deliberate and steadfast determination to execute her laws. That is the healthful condition of the moral life; on the other hand, enthusiasm, even when excited by representations of goodness, is a brilliant but feverish glow which leaves only exhaustion and languor behind.—Kant.

They wrong man greatly who say he is to be seduced by ease. Difficulty, abnegation, martyrdom, death, are the allurements that act on the heart of man. Kindle the inner genial life of him, you have a flame that burns up all lower considerations. Not happiness, but something higher; one sees this even in the frivolous classes, with their "point of honor" and the like. Not by flattering our appetites—no, by awakening the heroic that slumbers in every heart can any religious gain follow.—Carlyle.

In the whole range of human vision nothing is more attractive than to see a young man full of promise and of hope, bending all his energies in the direction of truth and duty and God, his soul pervaded with the loftiest enthusiasm, and his life consecrated to the noblest ends. To be such a young man is to rival the noblest and best of men in heroic valor and Christian chivalry. Nay, to be such a young man is to be like Christ, the highest type, the most illustrious example of enthusiasm the world has ever seen.—J. McC. Holmes.

Envy

Envy—the rottenness of the bones.—Proverbs.

Envy, the attendant of the empty mind.—Pindar.

Envy is a kind of praise.—Gay.

Envy is the antagonist of the fortunate.—Epictetus.

Envy is not to be conquered but by death.—Horace.

Envy feeds only on the living.—Ovid.

It was well said that envy keeps no holidays.—Bacon.

Envy pierces more in the restriction of praises than in the exaggeration of its criticisms.—Achilles Poincelot.

Envy, like flame, soars upwards.—
Livy.

All envy is proportionate to desire.
—Dr. Johnson.

Envy is more irreconcilable than hatred.—La Rochefoucauld.

The man that makes a character makes foes.—Young.

Envy sets the strongest seal on desert.—Ben Jonson.

The envious will die, but envy never.
—Molière.

Better it is to be envied than pitied.
—Herodotus.

Nothing can allay the rage of biting envy.—Claudianus.

As rust corrupts iron, so envy corrupts man.—Antisthenes.

How bitter a thing it is to look into happiness through another man's eyes!
—Shakespeare.

Envy is like a fly that passes all a body's sounder parts, and dwells upon the sores.—Chapman.

Those who raise envy will easily incur censure.—Churchill.

Men that make envy and crooked malice nourishment, dare bite the best.
—Shakespeare.

How can we explain the perpetuity of envy—a vice which yields no return?—Balzac.

The hate which we all bear with the most Christian patience is the hate of those who envy us.—Colton.

Envy lies between two beings equal in nature, though unequal in circumstances.—Jeremy Collier.

That incessant envy wherewith the common rate of mankind pursues all superior natures to their own.—Swift.

An envious man waxeth lean with the fatness of his neighbors.—Socrates.

For envy, to small minds, is flattery.
—Young.

He who surpasses or subdues man kind must look down on the hate of those below.—Byron.

There is not a passion so strongly rooted in the human heart as envy.—
Sheridan.

Envy, like flame, blackens that which is above it, and which it cannot reach.—J. Petit-Senn.

Such men as he be never at heart's ease whiles they behold a greater than themselves.—Shakespeare.

Envy will merit as its shade pursue,
But like a shadow proves the substance true.
—Pope.

Envy, to which th' ignoble mind's a slave,
Is emulation in the learn'd or brave.
—Pope.

Base Envy withers at another's joy,
And hates that excellence it cannot reach.
—Thomson.

Envy not greatness: for thou mak'st thereby Thyself the worse, and so the distance greater.—Herbert.

But, oh! what mighty 'magician can assuage,
A woman's envy? —Geo. Granville.

It is the practice of the multitude to bark at eminent men, as little dogs do at strangers.—Seneca.

A weak mind is ambitious of envy, a strong one of respect.—E. Wigglesworth.

Thy danger chiefly lies in acting well;
No crime's so great as daring to excel.
—Churchill.

To all apparent beauties blind,
Each blemish strikes an envious mind.
—Gay.

No metal can—no, not the hangman's axe—bear half the keenness of thy sharp envy.—Shakespeare.

The truest mark of being born with great qualities is being born without envy.—La Rochefoucauld.

Envy is blind, and has no other quality but that of detracting from virtue.—Livy.

The hen of our neighbor appears to us a goose, says the Oriental proverb.—Mme. Deluzy.

The Sicilian tyrants never devised a greater punishment than envy.—Juvenal.

When men are full of envy they disparage everything, whether it be good or bad.—Tacitus.

Envy is but the smoke of low estate, ascending still against the fortunate.—Lord Brooke.

Envy lurks at the bottom of the human heart, like a viper in its hole.—Balzac.

As a moth gnaws a garment, so doth envy consume a man.—St. Chrysostom.

Envy makes us see what will serve to accuse others, and not perceive what may justify them.—Bishop Wilson.

In short, virtue cannot live where envy reigns, nor liberality subsist with niggardliness.—Cervantes.

Stones and sticks are thrown only at fruit-bearing trees.—Saadi.

For something in the envy of the small
Still loves the vast democracy of death!
—Lytton.

When we envy another, we make their virtue our vice.—Boileau.

Just so far as we are pleased at finding faults, are we displeased at finding perfection.—Lavater.

We ought to be guarded against every appearance of envy, as a passion that always implies inferiority wherever it resides.—Pliny.

Envy assails the noblest; the winds howl around the highest peaks.—Ovid.

We often glory in the most criminal passion; but that of envy is so shameful that we dare not even own it.—Rochefoucauld.

We are all clever enough at envying a famous man while he is yet alive.—Mimnermus.

Envy is a passion so full of cowardice and shame that nobody ever had the confidence to own it.—Rochester.

If we did but know how little some enjoy of the great things that they possess, there would not be much envy in the world.—Young.

Envy, like a cold prison, benumbs and stupefies; and, conscious of its own impotence, folds its arms in despair.—Jeremy Collier.

Envy is a littleness of soul, which cannot see beyond a certain point, and if it does not occupy the whole space, feels itself excluded.—Hazlitt.

There is but one man who can believe himself free from envy; and it is he who has never examined his own heart.—Helvetius.

Save those who fill the highest stations, I know of none more unfortunate than those who envy them.—Mme. de-Maintenon.

Emulation looks out for merits, that she may exalt herself by a victory; envy spies out blemishes, that she may lower another by defeat.—Colton.

Envy, among other ingredients, has a mixture of the love of justice in it. We are more angry at undeserved than at deserved good fortune.—Hazlitt.

Many men profess to hate another, but no man owns envy, as being an enmity or displeasure for no cause but goodness or felicity.—Jeremy Taylor.

'Tis the beginning of hell in this life, and a passion not to be excused. Every other sin hath some pleasure annexed to it, or will admit of an excuse: envy alone wants both.—Burton.

There is a time in every man's education when he arrives at the conviction that envy is ignorance.—Emerson.

Envy sets the stronger seal on desert; if he have no enemies, I should esteem his fortune most wretched.—Ben Jonson.

He that would live clear of envy must lay his finger on his mouth, and keep his hand out of the ink-pot.—L'Estrange.

Envy, my son, wears herself away, and droops like a lamb under the influence of the evil eye.—Sannazaro.

Of all hostile feelings, envy is perhaps the hardest to be subdued, because hardly any one owns it even to himself, but looks out for one pretext after another to justify his hostility.—Whately.

It is because we have but a small portion of enjoyment ourselves that we feel so little pleasure in the good fortune of others. Is it possible for the happy to be envious?—W. B. Clulow.

Envy, if surrounded on all sides by the brightness of another's prosperity, like the scorpion confined within a circle of fire, will sting itself to death.—Colton.

They say that love and tears are learned without any master; and I may say that there is no great need of studying at the court to learn envy and revenge.—N. Caussin.

Newton found that a star, examined through a glass tarnished by smoke, was diminished into a speck of light. But no smoke ever breathed so thick a mist as envy or detraction.—Willmott.

Mankind are so ready to bestow their admiration on the dead, because the latter do not hear it, or because it gives no pleasure to the objects of it.

Even fame is the offspring of envy.—Hazlitt.

Envy is the deformed and distorted offspring of egotism; and when we reflect on the strange and disproportioned character of the parent, we cannot wonder at the perversity and waywardness of the child.—Hazlitt.

Lo! ill-rejoicing envy, wing'd with lies,
Scattering calumnious rumours as she flies,
The steps of miserable men pursue,
With haggard aspect, blasting to the view.
—Elton.

The praise of the envious is far less creditable than their censure; they praise only that which they can surpass, but that which surpasses them they censure.—Colton.

With that malignant envy, which turns pale,
And sickens, even if a friend prevail,
Which merit and success pursues with hate,
And damns the worth it cannot imitate.
—Churchill.

Envy, eldest born of hell, embu'd
Her hands in blood, and taught the sons of men
To make a death which nature never made,
And God abhor'd. —Dr. Porteus.

Envy is of all others the most ungratifying and disconsolate passion. There is power for ambition, pleasure for luxury, and pelf even for covetousness; but envy gets no reward but vexation.—Jeremy Collier.

There is some good in public envy, whereas in private there is none; for public envy is as an ostracism that eclipseth men when they grow too great; and therefore it is a bridle also to great ones to keep within bounds.—Bacon.

Other passions have objects to flatter them, and seem to content and satisfy them for a while; there is power in ambition, pleasure in luxury, and pelf in covetousness; but envy can gain nothing but vexation.—Montaigne.

Whoever feels pain in hearing a good character of his neighbor will feel a pleasure in the reverse; and those who despair to rise in distinction by their virtues are happy if others can be depressed to a level with themselves.—Rev. John Barker.

A man that hath no virtue in himself ever envieth virtue in others; for men's minds will either feed upon their own good or upon others' evil; and who wanteth the one will prey upon the other.—Bacon.

Men of noble birth are noted to be envious towards new men when they rise; for the distance is all told, and it is like a deceit of the eye, that when others come on they think themselves going back.—Bacon.

In our road through life we may happen to meet with a man casting a stone reverentially to enlarge the cairn of another which stone he has carried in his bosom to sling against that very other's head.—Landor.

Envy may justly be called "the gall of bitterness and bond of iniquity;" it is the most acid fruit that grows on the stock of sin, a fluid so subtle that nothing but the fire of divine love can purge it from the soul.—Hosea Ballou.

Envy, like the worm, never runs but to the fairest fruit; like a cunning bloodhound, it singles out the fattest deer in the flock. Abraham's riches were the Philistines' envy; and Jacob's blessing bred Esau's hatred.—J. Beaumont.

Envy is a weed that grows in all soils and climates, and is no less luxuriant in the country than in the court; is not confined to any rank of men or extent of fortune, but rages in the breasts of all degrees.—Lord Clarendon.

To pooh-pooh what we are never likely to possess is wonderfully easy. The confirmed celibate is loudest in his denunciations of matrimony. In Æsop, it is the tailless fox that advocates the disuse of tails. It is the grapes we cannot reach that we call sour.—Æneas Sage.

If envy, like anger, did not burn itself in its own fire, and consume and destroy those persons it possesses, before it can destroy those it wishes worst to, it would set the whole world on fire, and leave the most excellent persons the most miserable.—Lord Clarendon.

Envy ought in strict truth to have no place whatever allowed it in the heart of man; for the goods of this present world are so vile and low that they are beneath it, and those of the future world are so vast and exalted that they are above it.—Colton.

Envy is an ill-natured vice, and is made up of meanness and malice. It wishes the force of goodness to be strained, and the measure of happiness abated. It laments over prosperity, and sickens at the sight of health. It oftentimes wants spirit as well as good nature.—Jeremy Collier.

I don't believe that there is a human creature in his senses, arrived to maturity, that at some time or other has not been carried away by this passion (sc. envy) in good earnest; and yet I never met with any one who dared own he was guilty of it but in jest.—Mandeville.

We are often infinitely mistaken, and take the falsest measures, when we envy the happiness of rich and great men; we know not the inward canker that eats out all their joy and delight, and makes them really much more miserable than ourselves.—Bishop Hall.

If our credit be so well built, so firm, that it is not easy to be shaken by calumny or insinuation, envy then commends us, and extols us beyond reason to those upon whom we depend, till they grow jealous, and so blow us up when they cannot throw us down.—Clarendon.

To our betters we can reconcile ourselves, if you please—respecting them sincerely, laughing at their jokes, making allowance for their stupidities, meekly suffering their insolence; but we can't pardon our equals going beyond us.—Thackeray.

We had rather do anything than acknowledge the merit of another if we can help it. We cannot bear a superior or an equal. Hence ridicule is sure to prevail over truth, for the malice of mankind, thrown into the scale, gives the casting weight.—Hazlitt.

As the rays of the sun, notwithstanding their velocity, injure not the eye, by reason of their minuteness, so the attacks of envy, notwithstanding their number, ought not to wound our virtue by reason of their insignificance.—Colton.

Do not envy the violet the dew-drop or glitter of a sunbeam; do not envy the bee the plant from which he draws some sweets. Do not envy man the little goods he possesses; for the earth is for him the plant from which he obtains some sweets, and his mind is the dew-drop which the world colors for an instant.—Leopold Schefer.

Surely, if we considered detraction to be bred of envy, nested only in deficient minds, we should find that the applauding of virtue would win us far more honor than the seeking slyly to disparage it. That would show we loved what we commended, while this tells the world we grudge at what we want in ourselves.—Feltham.

An envious man waxeth lean with the fatness of his neighbors. Envy is the daughter of pride, the author of murder and revenge, the beginner of secret sedition and the perpetual tormentor of virtue. Envy is the filthy slime of the soul; a venom, a poison, or quicksilver which consumeth the flesh and drieth up the marrow of the bones.—Socrates.

To be an object of hatred and aversion to their contemporaries has been the usual fate of all those whose merit has raised them above the common level. The man who submits to the shafts of envy for the sake of noble objects pursues a judicious course for his own lasting fame. Hatred dies with its object, while merit soon breaks forth in full splendor, and his glory is handed down to posterity in never-dying strains.—Thucydides.

To diminish envy, let us consider not what others possess, but what they enjoy; mere riches may be the gift of lucky accident or blind chance, but happiness must be the result of prudent preference and rational design; the highest happiness then can have no other foundation than the deepest wisdom; and the happiest fool is only as happy as he knows how to be.—Colton.

Envy is the most universal passion. We only pride ourselves on the qualities we possess, or think we possess; but we envy the pretensions we have, and those which we have not, and do not even wish for. We envy the greatest qualities and every trifling advantage. We envy the most ridiculous appearance or affectation of superiority. We envy folly and conceit; nay, we go so far as to envy whatever confers distinction of notoriety, even vice and infamy.—Hazlitt.

When any person of really eminent virtue becomes the object of envy, the clamor and abuse by which he is assailed is but the sign and accompaniment of his success in doing service to the public. And if he is a truly wise man, he will take no more notice of it than the moon does of the howling of the dogs. Her only answer to them is to shine on.—Whately.

And next to him malicious Envy rode Upon a ravenous wolfe, and still did chaw Between his cankered teeth a venomous
tode,
That all the poison ran about his jaw;
But inwardly he chawed his own maw
At neighbour's wealth that made him ever sad
For death it was when any good he saw;
And wept, that cause of weeping none he had;
And when he heard of harme he waxed wondrous glad. —Spenser.

The envious man is in pain upon all occasions which ought to give him pleasure. The relish of his life is inverted; and the objects which administer the highest satisfaction to those who are exempt from this passion give the quickest pangs to persons who are subject to it. All the perfections of their fellow creatures are odious.

Youth, beauty, valor and wisdom are provocations of their displeasure. What a wretched and apostate state is this! to be offended with excellence, and to hate a man because we approve him!—Steele.

Epigram

Diaulus, lately a doctor, is now an undertaker; what he does as an undertaker, he used to do also as a doctor.—Martial.

The book which you are reading aloud is mine, Fidentinus; but, while you read it so badly, it begins to be yours.—Martial.

You see those fish before you, a beautiful example of the sculpture of Phidias; give them water, and they will swim.—Martial.

You wonder that Marius' ear smells unpleasantly. You are the cause of this, Nestor; you whisper into it.—Martial.

Fannius, as he was fleeing from the enemy, put himself to death. Is not this, I ask, madness—to die for fear of dying?—Martial.

You complain, Velox, that the epigrams which I write are long. You yourself write nothing; your attempts are shorter.—Martial.

He who prefers to give Linus the half of what he wishes to borrow, rather than to lend him the whole, prefers to lose only the half.—Martial.

Though I often salute you, you never salute me first; I shall therefore, Pontilianus, salute you with an eternal farewell.—Martial.

You were constantly, Matho, a guest at my villa at Tivoli. Now you buy it—I have deceived you; I have merely sold you what was already your own.—Martial.

Since your legs, Phœbus, resemble the horns of the moon, you might bathe your feet in a cornucopia.—Martial.

Philo swears that he has never dined at home, and it is so; he does not dine at all, except when invited out.—Martial.

Thais has black, Læcania white teeth; what is the reason? Thais has her own, Læcania bought ones.—Martial.

Lycoris has buried all the female friends she had, Fabianus; would she were the friend of my wife.—Martial.

A crafty innkeeper at Ravenna lately cheated me. I asked him for wine and water; he sold me pure wine.—Martial.

When your crowd of attendants so loudly applaud you, Pomponius, it is not you, but your banquet, that is eloquent.—Martial.

See how the mountain goat hangs from the summit of the cliff: you would expect it to fall; it is merely showing its contempt for the dogs.—Martial.

You admire, Vacerra, only the poets of old, and praise only those who are dead. Pardon me, I beseech you, Vacerra, if I think death too high a price to pay for your praise.—Martial.

If your slave commits a fault, do not smash his teeth with your fists; give him some of the (hard) biscuit which famous Rhodes has sent you.—Martial.

You are pretty—we know it; and young—it is true; and rich—who can deny it? But when you praise yourself extravagantly, Fabulla, you appear neither rich, nor pretty, nor young.—Martial.

If I remember right, Ælia, you had four teeth; a cough displaced two, another two more. You can now cough without anxiety all the day long. A third cough can find nothing to do in your mouth.—Martial.

When you try to conceal your wrinkles, Polla, with paste made from beans, you deceive yourself, not me. Let a defeat, which is possibly but small, appear undisguised. A fault concealed is presumed to be great.—Martial.

If you wish, Faustinus, a bath of boiling water to be reduced in temperature—a bath, such as scarcely Julianus could enter—ask the rhetorician Sabinæus to bathe himself in it. He would freeze the warm baths of Nero.—Martial.

Why do I not kiss you, Philænis? you are bald. Why do I not kiss you, Philænis? you are carrotty. Why do I not kiss you, Philænis? you are one-eyed. He who kisses you, Philænus, sins against nature.—Martial.

Do you wonder for what reason, Theodorus, notwithstanding your frequent requests and importunities, I have never presented you with my works? I have an excellent reason; it is lest you should present me with yours.—Martial.

I have not a farthing in the house; one thing only remains for me to do, Regulus, and that is to sell the presents which I have received from you; are you inclined to buy them?—Martial.

Do you ask what sort of a maid I desire or dislike, Flaccus? I dislike one too easy and one too coy. The just mean, which lies between the two extremes, is what I approve; I like neither that which tortures nor that which cloy.—Martial.

In whatever place you meet me, Postumus, you cry out immediately, and your very first words are, "How do you do?" You say this, even if you meet me ten times in one single hour; you, Postumus, have nothing, I suppose, to do.—Martial.

Report says that you, Fidentinus, recite my compositions in public as if they were your own. If you allow them to be called mine, I will send you my verses gratis; if you wish them to be called yours, pray buy them, that they may be mine no longer.—Martial.

I commend you, Postumus, for kissing me with only half your lip; you may, however, if you please, withhold even the half of this half. Are you inclined to grant me a boon still greater, and even inexpressible? Keep this whole half entirely to yourself, Postumus.—Martial.

I could do without your face, and your neck, and your hands, and your limbs, and your bosom, and other of your charms. Indeed, not to fatigue myself with enumerating each of them, I could do without you, Chloe, altogether.—Martial.

You often ask me, Priscus, what sort of person I should be, if I were to become suddenly rich and powerful. Who can determine what would be his future conduct? Tell me, if you were to become a lion, what sort of a lion would you be?—Martial.

All your female friends are either old or ugly; nay, more ugly than old women usually are. These you lead about in your train, and drag with you to feasts, porticos and theaters. Thus, Fabulla, you seem handsome, thus you seem young.—Martial.

You utter all sorts of falsehoods, Pontilianus; I assent to them. You recite bad verses; I praise them. You sing; I do the same. You drink, Pontilianus; I drink also. You are rude; I pretend not to perceive it. You wish to play at chess; I allow myself to be beaten. There is one thing only which you do without me, and I hold my tongue on the subject. Yet you never make me the slightest present. "When I die," say you, "I shall remember you handsomely." I do not look for anything; but die.—Martial.

What are the precise characteristics of an epigram it is not easy to define. It differs from a joke, in the fact that the wit of the latter dies in the words, and cannot therefore be conveyed in another language; while an epigram is a wit of ideas, and hence is trans-latable. Like aphorisms, songs and sonnets, it is occupied with some single point, small and manageable; but whilst a song conveys a sentiment, a sonnet, a poetical, and an aphorism a moral reflection, an epigram expresses a contrast.—Wm. Matthews.

Do you ask why I am unwilling to marry a rich wife? It is because I am unwilling to be taken to husband by my wife. The mistress of the house should be subordinate to her husband, for in no other way, Priscus, will the wife and husband be on an equality.—Martial.

Epiphany (See Missions)

The Bartholdi Statue of Liberty enlightening the world. It is the gospel which enlightens the world, and, placed on the church for a pedestal, holds up Jesus to let all on the stormy sea of life see the light of the world and safely reach the desired haven.—Peloubet.

The festival of the Epiphany must be deemed of very high importance by a believing and thoughtful Christian. It does not merely commemorate one of the most beautiful incidents of our Lord's infant life, it asserts one of the most fundamental and vital features of Christianity: the great distinction, in fact, between Christianity and Judaism. The Jewish revelation of God contained within itself the secret and the reason of its vanishing by absorption into the brighter light which should succeed it.—Canon Liddon.

The Light of the world is not put out. Now have death and the grave been converted into the great testimonies for life and immortality. Now may each man, who has the sentence of Adam upon him, know that he is a kinsman of the Son of God. Now may he follow Him; and so, when the darkness is thickest around him and within, not walk in it, but see the Light of Life.—F. D. Maurice.

There is no figure more common in scripture, and none more beautiful, than that by which Christ is likened unto light. Incomprehensible in its nature, itself the first visible, and that by which all things are seen, light represents to us Christ, Whose generation none can declare, but Who must shine upon us ere we can know aught aright, whether of things Divine or human.—H. Melville.

Thou whose almighty Word
Chaos and darkness heard,
And took their flight,
Hear us, we humbly pray;
And where the gospel's day
Sheds not its glorious ray,
Let there be light.
Thou, who didst come to bring
On Thy redeeming wing
Healing and sight—
Health to the sick in mind,
Sight to the inly blind—
Oh, now to all mankind,
Let there be light.

—John Marriott.

Epitaph

Peas to his Hashes.—Epitaph on a London Cook.

Satire does not look pretty upon a tombstone.—Charles Lamb.

Here lies one whose name was writ in water.—Engraved on Keats' Tombstone.

It is so soon that I am done for,
I wonder what I was begun for!
—Epitaph in Cheltenham Churchyard.

Shrine of the mighty! can it be,
That this is all remains of thee?
—Byron.

Grave-stones tell truth scarce forty years. Generations pass while families last not three oaks. —Sir Thomas Browne.

If you would see his monument look around.—Inscription on the tomb of Sir Christopher Wren, St. Paul's, London.

Of Manners gentle, of Affections mild;
In Wit a man; Simplicity, a child.
—Pope.

Nature and Nature's laws lay hid in night.
God said "Let Newton be!" and all was light.
—Pope.

Let there be no inscription upon my tomb; let no man write my epitaph;

no man can write my epitaph.—Robert Emmet.

And many a holy text around she strews
That teach the rustic moralist to die.
—Gray.

Life is a jest, and all things show it,
I thought so once, but now I know it.
—Gay.
