Though I look old, yet I am strong and lusty;
For in my youth I never did apply
Hot and rebellious liquors in my blood;
Nor did not with unashful forehead woo
The means of weakness and debility:
Therefore my age is as a lusty winter, Frosty, but kindly.
—Shakespeare.

At length weariness succeeds to labor, and the mind lies at ease in the contemplation of her own attainments without any desire of new conquests or excursions. This is the age of recollection and narrative; the opinions are settled, and the avenues of apprehension shut against any new intelligence; the days that are to follow must pass in the inculcation of precepts already collected, and assertion of tenets already received; nothing is henceforward so odious as opposition, so insolent as doubt, or so dangerous as novelty.—Johnson.

Much has been said of the wisdom of old age. Old age is wise, I grant, for itself, but not wise for the community. It is wise in declining new enterprises, for it has not the power nor the time to execute them; wise in shrinking from difficulty, for it has not the strength to overcome it; wise in avoiding danger, for it lacks the faculty of ready and swift action, by which dangers are parried and converted into advantages. But this is not wisdom for mankind at large, by whom new enterprises must be undertaken, dangers met, and difficulties surmounted.—Bryant.

Old Year

As the wing'd arrow flies
Speedily the mark to find;
As the lightning from the skies
Darts, and leaves no trace behind—
Swiftly thus our fleeting days
Bear us down life's rapid stream.
Upward, Lord, our spirits raise;
All below is but a dream.
—John Newton.

As Christians we have one consolation. Be the year what it may, He who has helped us in the past will stand by us in the future. His unspeakable goodness will not fail. Ha will overrule all the untried experiences to our good. He will shelter us from the storms. He will deliver in times of peril. This being true, we can walk forward with calm courage. "All things work together for good to them that love God."—Epworth Herald.

Sad and solemn are the cadences of the dying year. Only a few months ago, how full of life and vigor was the new year, now grown old and ready to drop into the irrevocable past. It has spent its life on earth, for good and ill, and its footprints are eternal. Nothing can be altered, nothing recalled. It has left its ineffaceable marks, and they cannot be removed.—Alexander Macaulay.

Still on—as silent as a ghost!

Seems but a score of days, all told,
Or but a month or two at most,

Since our last New Year's song we trolled.

And lo! that New Year now is Old.
And here we stand to say "Good-by!"
Brief words—and yet, we scarce know why,
They bring a moisture to the eye,

And to the heart some quakes and aches;
We speak them very tenderly,

With half a sob and half a sigh—
"Old Year, good-by!" "Old Year, good-by!" —W. H. Burleigh.

What, then, does this lead to? This old year, with all its joys and sorrows, with all its work and failure, with its opportunities and its sins—God has been in it all; a faithful God, keeping faith with the better nature in each one of us. And now we begin to see somewhat more clearly how all things have been working together for our good—toward a real and effective repentance and reformation, and new consecration of purer love and obedience.—Franklin Noble, D. D.

The years are going. Let the chaff and the evil part of this life pass with them. As men load the wagon with the sweepings of the street, and, carrying it far to the ocean, cast it into the deep abyss, so bring together all your hatreds, weaknesses, unkindnesses, jealousies, all passions, ingrati- tudes, and embittering memories, and, tying them into one bundle, let the old year sweep them out and drop them into the gulf of oblivion. Expel from your life all sins and sordid aims. Carry into the new year only the choicest thoughts and aspirations. As in the olden days when men approached the Parthenon they cleansed their persons and arrayed themselves in white robes before entering that glorious temple, so cleanse your garments from transgression, clothe yourself with aspirations. Farewell to the past! Welcome and all hail to the future.—Newell Dwight Hillis, D. D.

He frothed his bumpers to the brim;

A jollier year we shall not see.

But tho his eyes are waxing dim,

And tho his foes speak ill of him.

He was a friend to me.

Old Year, you shall not die;

We did so laugh and cry with you,

I've half a mind to die with you,

Old Year, if you must die.

His face is growing sharp and thin.
Alack! Our friend is gone.

Close up his eyes; tie up his chin;

Step from the corpse, and let him in

That standeth there alone,

And waiteth at the door;

There's a new foot on the floor,

My friend,

And a new face at the door,

My friend,

A new face at the door.

—Alfred Tennyson.

This dying year will bear witness for or against us at the judgment. We sometimes say, "Time dies." Is time dead? No. The years die, but time lives. Time will live till the judgment, and then "Time shall be no longer." When time ends, eternity begins. The passing years are time's children, which will come from their graves to bear witness in the case pending between God and men at the great judgment-seat. Among the years which shall witness against us will be this dying year. If it shall be seen that in the year's record are written bright pages concerning us, happy shall we be. Pages which tell of toils for Jesus, of earnest prayers, of loyalty to God and conscience, of self-denials, of visitation of the sick, of sympathy for the distressed, of instruction of the ignorant—how many such things has the old year written for us?—Rev. J. M. Hubbert.

Old Year! the tried, the true, I hold you close,
Though fast your moments fleet;
For yours has been the gracious gift to know
Our sainted ones, whose feet Will come this way no more. For this your boon,
Through many a pang and tear,
Blended with tender, patient memories,
I love you, good Old Year!

Not that your days unclouded came and went,
Not that the light was sweet,
But that the darkness drew us close to Christ
In following His feet.
Hallowed by fires of pain—God's proof of love,
Pure, infinite, and free—
You helped us gauge the cost and weigh the worth Of human sympathy.

—M. K. A. Stone.

Thy life is ebbing fast, thou aged Year!
This night that wintry sun of thine will set
To rise no more. Thy days are told: and yet
It seems but yesterday thou didst appear!
But yesternight we watched, all silent here,
The Old Year's dying hours, while backward rolled
Its story, page by page; and now, behold!
Thy course is run. Even now thy moments wear
The fading hue of death. Farewell, old Friend!
Fain would we linger by thy side awhile,
And gather up thy mem'ries one by one,
While, in the vacant chairs, dear faces smile
Upon us, as of old. But ever on, Life's current bears us—swifter to the end!

—By M. C. C.

He had his virtues. This old year was impartial. No discrimination knew he between classes or conditions.
He meted the same number of hours to the man in the hovel and the man on the throne. The hour-glass he turned the same number of times for him whose garments were plain and coarse and him who wore garments of costliest fabric. Like God who sent him, this old year was no respecter of persons. He showed constant vigilance. No laggard, no loiterer, he.
Having been sent to fill a space in time's calendar, he filled it to the full.
Sent to mark off so many hours on time's dial, his hand was never slack;

he slept not for a single swing of the pendulum. May we keep our vigils as faithfully! He fulfilled his mission. God's plans are deep, and we know little, perhaps, as to the mission of any of these passing years, decades, centuries, and cycles; yet we know that each fulfills a purpose in the betterment of humanity; and the closing year has served well his embassy in bringing the race nearer its final goal. A prize, peerless and bright, awaits each of us if we are as true to our mission as the old year has been to his.—Rev. J. M. Hubbert.

A few more years shall roll,
A few more seasons come:
And we shall be with those that rest,
Asleep within the tomb,

A few more storms shall beat
On this wild rocky shore;
And we shall be where tempests cease,
And surges swell no more.

A few more struggles here,
A few more partings o'er,
A few more toils, a few more tears,
And we shall weep no more.

Then, O my Lord, prepare
My soul for that blest day;
Oh, wash me in Thy precious blood,
And take my sins away.
—Dr. Horatius Bonar.

Omnipotence

The Divine mind is as visible in its full energy of operation on every lowly bank and mouldering stone as in the lifting of the pillars of heaven, and settling the foundation of the earth.—Ruskin.

The same Being that fashioned the insect, whose existence is only discerned by a microscope, and gave that invisible speck a system of ducts and other organs to perform its vital functions, created the enormous mass of the planet thirteen hundred times larger than our earth, and launched it in its course round the sun, and the comet, wheeling with a velocity that would carry it round our globe in less than two minutes of time, and yet revolving through so prodigious a space that it takes near six centuries to encircle the sun!—Lord Brougham.

Opinion

The blind goddess of fools.—Chapman.

Opinion is a bold bastard.—Quarles.

As many men, so many opinions.—Terence.

Everything is mere opinion.—Marcus Antoninus.

Happy opinions are the wine of the heart.—Leigh Hunt.

Opinion crowns with an imperial voice.—Shakespeare.

Public opinion is a second conscience.—W. R. Alger.

Opinion, that great fool, makes fools of all.—Field.

The foolish and the dead alone never change their opinion.—Lowell.

Stiff in opinion, always in the wrong.—Dryden.

Opinion, a sovereign mistress of effects.—Shakespeare.

The only sin which we never forgive in each other is difference of opinion.—Emerson.

Opinions should be formed with great caution, and changed with greater.—H. W. Shaw.

He who is master of all opinions can never be the bigot of any.—W. R. Alger.

All power, even the most despotic, rests ultimately on opinion.—Hume.

Opinion, which on crutches walks,
And sounds the words another talks.
—Lloyd.

The feeble tremble before opinion, the foolish defy it, the wise judge it, the skillful direct it.—Mme. Roland.

We may print, but not stereotype, our opinions.—Whately.

The sages of old live again in us, and in opinions there is a metempsychosis.—Glanvill.

I have bought golden opinions from all sorts of people.—Shakespeare.

An opinion may be controverted; a prejudice, never.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

Orthodoxy on one side of the Pyrenees may be heresy on the other.—Pascal.

Those who never retract their opinions love themselves more than they love truth.—Joubert.

Men are tormented by the opinions they have of things, and not the things themselves.—Montaigne.

Our belief or disbelief of a thing does not alter the nature of the thing.—Tillotson.

Weed your better judgments of all opinion that grows rank in them.—Shakespeare.

Popular opinion is the greatest lie in the world.—Carlyle.

Opinion is, as it were, the queen of the world, but force is its tyrant.—Pascal.

Private opinion is weak, but public opinion is almost omnipotent.—Beecher.

We think very few people sensible except those who are of our opinion.—Rochefoucauld.

The mind revolts against certain opinions, as the stomach rejects certain foods.—Hazlitt.

The opinions of men who think are always growing and changing, like living children.—Hamerton.

The masses procure their opinions ready made in open market.—Colton

Opinion is a medium between knowledge and ignorance.—Plato.

Race and temperament go for much in influencing opinion.—Lady Morgan.

Predominant opinions are generally the opinions of the generation that is vanishing.—Disraeli.

Inconsistencies of opinion, arising from changes of circumstances, are often justifiable.—Daniel Webster.

The greatest part of mankind have no other reason for their opinions than that they are in fashion.—Johnson.

A man's opinions, look you, are generally of much more value than his arguments.—Holmes.

He who has no opinion of his own, but depends upon the opinion and taste of others, is a slave.—Klopstock.

Error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it.—Thomas Jefferson.

Truth is one forever absolute, but opinion is truth filtered through the moods, the blood, the disposition of the spectator.—Wendell Phillips.

With us law is nothing unless close behind it stands a warm, living public opinion.—Wendell Phillips.

Public opinion, though often formed upon a wrong basis, yet generally has a strong underlying sense of justice.—Abraham Lincoln.

There never was in the world two opinions alike, no more than two hairs, or two grains; the most universal quality is diversity.—Montaigne.

It is not only arrogant, but it is profligate, for a man to disregard the world's opinion of himself.—Cicero.

It is on opinion only that government is founded; and this maxim extends to the most despotic and most military governments, as well as to the most free and most popular.—Hume.

There is no process of amalgamation, by which opinions, wrong individually, can become right merely by their multitude.—Ruskin.

There are opinions which come from the heart, and whoever has no fixed opinions has no constant feelings.—Joubert.

If I for my opinion bleed, opinion shall be surgeon to my hurt, and keep me on the side where still I am.—Shakespeare.

Correct opinions well established on any subject are the best preservative against the seduction of error.—Bishop Mant.

No liberal man would impute a charge of unsteadiness to another for having changed his opinion.—Cicero.

To maintain an opinion because it is thine, and not because it is true, is to prefer thyself above the truth.—Venning.

That the voice of the common people is the voice of God is as full of falsehood as commonness.—Warwick.

It is always considered as a piece of impertinence in England, if a man of less than two or three thousand a year has any opinion at all upon important subjects.—Sydney Smith.

What people will say—in these words there lies the tyranny of the world, the whole destruction of our natural disposition, the oblique vision of our minds. These four words bear sway everywhere.—Auerbach.

In the minds of most men, the kingdom of opinion is divided into three territories—the territory of yes, the territory of no, and a broad, unexplored middle ground of doubt.—James A. Garfield.

Do not think of knocking out another person's brains because he differs in opinion from you. It would be as rational to knock yourself on the head because you differ from yourself ten years ago.—Horace Mann.

We should always keep a corner of our heads open and free, that we may make room for the opinions of our friends. Let us have heart and head hospitality.—Joubert.

If a man would register all his opinions upon love, politics, religion, and learning, what a bundle of inconsistencies and contradictions would appear at last!—Swift.

Public opinion is the atmosphere of society, without which the forces of the individual would collapse, and all the institutions of society fly into atoms.—W. R. Alger.

I lay it down as a fact that, if all men knew what others say of them, there would not be four friends in the world. This appears from the quarrels to which indiscreet reports occasionally give rise.—Pascal.

I could never divide myself from any man upon the difference of an opinion, or be angry with his judgment for not agreeing in that from which within a few days I might dissent myself.—Sir Thomas Browne.

Who confers reputation? who gives respect and veneration to persons, to books, to great men? Who but Opinion? How utterly insufficient are all the riches of the world without her approbation!—Pascal.

Were a whole nation to start upon a new career of education, with mature faculties and minds free from prepossession or prejudice, how much would be quickly abandoned that is now most stubbornly cherished!—Chatfield.

The free expression of opinion, as our experience has taught us, is the safety-valve of passion. That noise of the rushing steam, when it escapes, alarms the timid; but it is the sign that we are safe.—Gladstone.

The world is governed much more by opinion than by laws. It is not the judgment of courts, but the moral judgment of individuals and masses of men, which is the chief wall of defence around property and life. With the progress of society, this power of opinion is taking the place of arms.—Channing.

He is a strong man who can hold down his opinion. A man cannot utter two or three sentences without disclosing to intelligent ears precisely where he stands in life and thought, namely, whether in the kingdom of the senses and the understanding, or in that of ideas and imagination, in the realm of intuitions and duty.—Emerson.

Who observes not that the voice of the people, yea of that people that voiced themselves the people of God, did prosecute the God of all people, with one common voice, "He is worthy to die." I will not, therefore, ambitiously beg their voices for my preferment; nor weigh my worth in that uneven balance, in which a feather of opinion shall be moment enough to turn the scales and make a light piece go current, and a current piece seem light.—Arthur Warwick.

Opportunity

That touchstone Opportunity.—Charles Reade.

Alas, for the treachery of opportunity!—Ninon de Lenclos.

The cleverest of all the devils is Opportunity.—Wieland.

Danger will wink on opportunity.—Milton.

The May of life only blooms once.—Schiller.

O opportunity, thy guilt is great!—Shakespeare.

There's place and means for every man alive.—Shakespeare.

hour.—Shakespeare.

Myself and the lucky moment.—
Charles V.

Every man has his appointed day.—
Virgil.

Little opportunities should be improved.—Fénelon.

Opportunity is the great bawd.—
Franklin.

There's a time for all things.—
Shakespeare.

Plough deep while sluggards sleep.—
Benjamin Franklin.

Our great social and political advantage is opportunity.—George William Curtis.

Yet he who grasps the moment's gift,
He is the proper man. —Goethe.

Opportunity is more powerful even than conquerors and prophets.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

We must take the current when it serves, or lose our ventures.—Shakespeare.

The sure way to miss success is to miss the opportunity.—Philarète Chasles.

Opportunity, sooner or later, comes to all who work and wish.—Lord Stanley.

You will never "find" time for anything. If you want time, you must make it.—Charles Buxton.

Heaven, on occasion, half opens its arms to us; and that is the great moment.—Victor Hugo.

Every one has a fair turn to be as great as he pleases.—Jeremy Collier.

Present opportunities are not to be neglected; they rarely visit us twice.—
Voltaire.

Opportunity is rare, and a wise man will never let it go by him.—Bayard Taylor.

Nothing is too late till the tired heart shall cease to palpitate.—Longfellow.

The true scholar grudges every opportunity of action passed by, as a loss of power.—Emerson.

Do not wait for extraordinary circumstances to do good actions; try to use ordinary situations.—Richter.

Occasions are rare; and those who know how to seize upon them are rarer.—H. W. Shaw.

Improve time in the present; for opportunity is precious, and time is a sword.—Saadi.

The devil tempts us not; 'tis we tempt him, beckoning his skill with opportunity.—George Eliot.

When the time comes in which one could, the time has passed in which one can.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

A word spoken in season, at the right moment, is the mother of ages.—
Carlyle.

There is no greater wisdom than well to time the beginning and out-sets of things.—Bacon.

Nothing is so often irrevocably neglected as an opportunity of daily occurrence.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

Thou strong seducer, opportunity!
of womankind, half are undone by thee.—Dryden.

Great men should think of opportunity and not of time. That is the excuse of feeble and puzzled spirits.—
Earl of Beaconsfield.

Do not suppose opportunity will knock twice at your door.—Chamfort.

Who makes quick use of the moment is a genius of prudence.—Lavater.

Miss not the occasion; by the forelock take that subtle power, the never-halting time.—Wordsworth.

The public man needs but one patron, namely, the lucky moment.—Bulwer-Lytton.

When a thief has no opportunity for stealing, he considers himself an honest man.—Talmud.

There is an hour in each man's life appointed to make his happiness, if then he seize it.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Zeal and duty . . . on occasion's forelock watchful wait.—Milton.

Not only strike while the iron is hot, but make it hot by striking.—Cromwell.

To be a great man it is necessary to turn to account all opportunities.—Rochefoucauld.

Next to knowing when to seize an opportunity, the most important thing in life is to know when to forego an advantage.—Beaconsfield.

The opportunity to do mischief is found a hundred times a day, and that of doing good once a year.—Voltaire.

A philosopher being asked what was the first thing necessary to win the love of a woman, answered, Opportunity!—Moore.

Give me a chance, says Stupid, and I will show you. Ten to one he has had his chance already, and neglected it.—Haliburton.

Opportunity, to statesmen, is as the just degree of heat to chemists; it perfects all the work.—Suckling.

Opportunity has hair in front; behind she is bald. If you seize her by the forelock, you may hold her;

but if suffered to escape, not Jupiter himself can catch her again.—Seneca.

Presence of mind, penetration, fine observation, are the sciences of women; ability to avail themselves of these is their talent.—Rousseau.

What is opportunity to the man who can't use it? An unfecundated egg, which the waves of time wash away into nonentity.—George Eliot.

It often requires more strength and judgment to resist than to embrace an opportunity. It is better to do nothing than to do other than well.—Sydney Dobell.

The golden moments in the stream of life rush past us, and we see nothing but sand; the angels come to visit us, and we only know them when they are gone.—George Eliot.

There is no man whom Fortune does not visit once in his life; but when she does not find him ready to receive her, she walks in at the door and flies out at the window.—Cardinal Imperiali.

Many do with opportunities as children do at the seashore; they fill their little hands with sand, and then let the grains fall through, one by one, till all are gone.—Rev. T. Jones.

The best men are not those who have waited for chances, but who have taken them,—besieged the chance, conquered the chance, and made the chance their servitor.—Chapin.

Gather roses while they bloom,
To-morrow is yet far away.
Moments lost have no room
In to-morrow or to-day. —Gleim.

The means that heaven yields must be embraced, and not neglected; else, if heaven would, and we will not heaven's offer, we refuse the proffered means of succor and redress.—Shakespeare.

The great moments of life are but moments like others. Your doom is spoken in a word or two. A single look from the eyes, a mere pressure of the hand, may decide it; or of the lips, though they cannot speak.—Thackeray.

The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, neither yet bread to the wise, nor yet riches to men of understanding, nor yet favor to men of skill; but time and chance happeneth to them all.—Bible.

There is a tide in the affairs of men, Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune; Omitted, all the voyage of their life Is bound in shallows, and in miseries: And we must take the current when it serves, Or lose our ventures. —Shakespeare.

That policy that can strike only while the iron is hot will be overcome by that perseverance which, like Cromwell's, can make the iron hot by striking; and he that can only rule the storm must yield to him who can both raise and rule it.—Colton.

Opportunities do not come with their values stamped upon them. Everyone must be challenged. A day dawns, quite like other days; in it a single hour comes, quite like other hours; but in that day and in that hour the chance of a lifetime faces us. To face every opportunity of life thoughtfully and ask its meaning bravely and earnestly, is the only way to meet the supreme opportunities when they come, whether open-faced or disguised.—Maltbie Babcock.

Opposition

Opposition strengthens the manly will.—Alcott.

Opposition is the very spur of love.—Smollett.

Opposition always inflames the enthusiast, never converts him.—Schiller.

It is not the victory that makes the joy of noble hearts, but the combat.—Montalembert.

He that wrestles with us strengthens our nerves and sharpens our skill. Our antagonist is our helper.—Burke.

To make a young couple love each other, it is only necessary to oppose and separate them.—Goethe.

Nobody loves heartily unless people take pains to prevent it.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Difficulties spur us whenever they do not check us.—Charles Reade.

Difficulty adds to result, as the ramming of powder sends the bullet the further.—George MacDonald.

A strenuous soul hates cheap success. It is the ardor of the assailant that makes the vigor of the defendant.—Emerson.

Nature is upheld by antagonism. Passions, resistance, danger, are educators. We acquire the strength we have overcome.—Emerson.

The more powerful the obstacle, the more glory we have in overcoming it; and the difficulties with which we are met are the maids of honor which set off virtue.—Molière.

There is no possible success without some opposition as a fulcrum; force is always aggressive, and crowds something or other, if it does not hit and trample upon it.—O. W. Holmes.

It is not ease, but effort—not facility, but difficulty, that makes men. There is, perhaps, no station in life in which difficulties have not to be encountered and overcome before any decided measure of success can be achieved.—Samuel Smiles.

A certain amount of opposition is a great help to a man. Kites rise against and not with the wind. Even a head wind is better than none. No man ever worked his passage anywhere in a dead calm. Let no man wax pale, therefore, because of opposition.—John Neal.

The effects of opposition are wonderful. There are men who rise refreshed on hearing of a threat; men to whom a crisis which intimidates and paralyzes the majority—demand ing, not the faculties of prudence and thrift, but comprehension, immovableness, the readiness of sacrifice—comes graceful and beloved as a bride.—Emerson.

Oppression

Tyranny and anarchy are never far asunder.—Bentham.

Oppression is more easily borne than insult.—Junius.

Resistance to oppression is second nature.—Seneca.

An extreme rigor is sure to arm everything against it.—Burke.

The smallest worn will turn, being trodden on.—Shakespeare.

A desire to resist oppression is implanted in the nature of man.—Tacitus.

Fishes live in the sea, as men do a-land; the great ones eat up the little ones.—Shakespeare.

Oppression is but another name for irresponsible power, if history is to be trusted.—William Pinkney.

Press not a falling man too far; 'tis virtue: His faults lie open to the laws; let them, Not you, correct him. —Shakespeare.

Hateful is the power and pitiable is the life of those who wish to be feared rather than to be loved.—Nepos.

I never could believe that Providence had sent a few men into this world, ready booted and spurred to ride, and millions ready saddled and bridled to be ridden.—Richard Rumbold.

There is no happiness for him who oppresses and persecutes; no, there can be no repose for him. For the sighs of the unfortunate cry for vengeance to heaven.—Pestalozzi.

He who, when he hath the power, doeth not good, when he loses the means will suffer distress. There is not a more unfortunate wretch than the oppressor; for in the day of adversity nobody is his friend.—Saadi.

The poorest being that crawls on earth, contending to save itself from injustice and oppression, is an object respectable in the eyes of God and man.—Burke.

Oratory

The orator is the mouth (cs) of a nation.—Joseph Roux.

Eloquence is vehement simplicity.—Cecil.

He lards with flourishes his long harangue.—Dryden.

Thoughts that breathe, and words that burn.—Gray.

There is no true orator who is not a hero.—Emerson.

Eloquence is a painting of the thoughts.—Pascal.

Brevity is a great praise of eloquence.—Cicero.

The object of oratory alone is not truth, but persuasion.—Macaulay.

Oratory is the power to talk people out of their sober and natural opinions.—Chatfield.

The poet is the nearest borderer upon the orator.—Ben Jonson.

What the orators want in depth, they give you in length.—Montesquieu.

Oratory is the power of beating down your adversary's arguments and putting better in their place.—Johnson.

Eloquence is in the assembly, not in the speaker.—William Pitt.

Pour the full tide of eloquence along, serenely pure, and yet divinely strong.—Pope.

'Tis remarkable that they talk most who have the least to say.—Prior.

The capital of the orator is in the bank of the highest sentimentalities and the purest enthusiasms.—Edward G. Parker.

The manner of your speaking is full as important as the matter.—Chesterfield.

His enthusiasm kindles as he advances; and when he arrives at his peroration it is in full blaze.—Burke.

Orators are most vehement when they have the weakest cause, as men get on horseback when they cannot walk.—Cicero.

Poesy and oratory omit things not essential, and insert little beautiful digressions, in order to place everything in the most effective light.—Dr. Watts.

Hark to that shrill, sudden shout,
The cry of an applauding multitude,
Swayed by some loud-voiced orator who wields
The living mass as if he were its soul!
—William Cullen Bryant

He is an eloquent man who can treat humble subjects with delicacy, lofty things impressively, and moderate things temperately.—Cicero.

Every man should study conciseness in speaking; it is a sign of ignorance not to know that long speeches, though they may please the speaker, are the torture of the hearer.—Felt-ham.

It is the first rule in oratory that a man must appear such as he would persuade others to be: and that can be accomplished only by the force of his life.—Swift.

In oratory, affectation must be avoided—it being better for a man by a native and clear eloquence to express himself than by those words which may smell either of the lamp or inkhorn.—Herbert of Cherbury.

Oratory may be symbolized by a warrior's eye, flashing from under a philosopher's brow. But why a warrior's eye rather than a poet's? Because in oratory the will must predominate.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

The passions are the only orators that always persuade; they are, as it were, a natural art, the rules of which are infallible; and the simplest man with passion is more persuasive than the most eloquent without it.—La Rochefoucauld.

While words of learned length, and thund'ring sound,
Amaz'd the gazing rustics rang'd around;
And still they gaz'd, and still the wonder grew That one small head should carry all he knew.
—Goldsmith.

Oratory, like the drama, abhors lengthiness; like the drama, it must keep doing. It avoids, as frigid, prolonged metaphysical soliloquy. Beauties themselves, if they delay or distract the effect which should be produced on the audience, become blemishes.—Bulwer-Lytton.

There is no power like that of oratory. Cæsar controlled men by exciting their fears; Cicero, by captivating their affections and swaying their passions. The influence of the one perished with its author; that of the other continues to this day.—Henry Clay.

Oratory is the buffing and blustering spoiled child of a semi-barbarous age. The press is the foe of rhetoric, but the friend of reason; and the art of declamation has been sinking in value from the moment that speakers were foolish enough to publish, and readers wise enough to read.—Colton.

Those orators who give us much noise and many words, but little argument and less wit, and who are the loudest when least lucid, should take a lesson from the great volume of nature; she often gives us the lightning without the thunder, but never the thunder without the lightning.—Burritt.

If our eloquence be directed above the heads of our hearers, we shall do no execution. By pointing our arguments low, we stand a chance of hitting their hearts as well as their heads. In addressing angels, we could hardly raise our eloquence too high; but we must remember that men are not angels.—Colton.

The language of the heart—the language which “comes from the heart” and “goes to the heart”—is always simple, always graceful, and always full of power, but no art of rhetoric can teach it. It is at once the easiest and most difficult language—difficult, since it needs a heart to speak it; easy, because its periods though rounded and full of harmony, are still unstudied.—Bovee.

Order

Order is heaven's first law.—Pope.

Order, thou eye of action.—Aaron Hill.

Order gave each thing view.—Shakespeare.

The gods love those of ordered soul.—Sophocles.

Observe degree, priority, and place. Shakespeare.

Let all things be done decently and in order.—Bible.

Order is man's greatest need, and his true well-being.—Amiel.

Order means light and peace, inward liberty and free command over one's self; order is power.—Amiel.

You must confine yourself within the modest limits of order.—Shakespeare.

Order is to arrangement what the soul is to the body, and what mind is to matter.—Joubert.

Order and system are nobler things than power.—Ruskin.

The friend of order has made half his way to virtue.—Lavater.

Order is the primary regulation of the celestial regions.—J. G. Saxe.

Fretfulness of temper will generally characterize those who are negligent of order.—Blair.

All are born to observe order, but few are born to establish it.—Joubert.

Good order is the foundation of all good things.—Burke.

Set all things in their own peculiar place, And know that order is the greatest grace.—Dryden.

He who has no taste for order will be often wrong in his judgment, and seldom considerate or conscientious in his actions.—Lavater.

Mark what unvary'd laws preserve each state, Laws wise as Nature, and as fixed as Fate.—Pope.

Order in a house ought to be like the machinery in opera, whose effect produces great pleasure, but whose ends must be hid.—Mme. Necker.

So work the honey-bees, creatures that by a rule in nature teach the act of order to a peopled kingdom.—Shakespeare.

Order is the sanity of the mind, the health of the body, the peace of the city, the security of the state. As the beams to a house, as the bones to the microcosm of man, so is order to all things.—Southey.

Not chaos-like together crush'd and bruis'd, But, as the world, harmoniously confused; Where order in variety we see, And where, tho' all things differ, all agree.—Pope.

For the world was built in order And the atoms march in tune; Rhyme the pipe, and Time the warder, The sun obeys them, and the moon.—Emerson.

The heavens themselves, the planets, and this centre, Observe degree, priority and place. Insisture, course, proportion, season, form, Office, and custom, in all line of order.—Shakespeare.

Creation is the production of order. What a simple, but, at the same time, comprehensive and pregnant principle is here! Plato could tell his disciples no ultimate truth of more pervading significance. Order is the law of all intelligible existence.—Blakie.

Order is a lovely nymph, the child of Beauty and Wisdom; her attendants are Comfort, Neatness, and Activity; her abode is the valley of happiness; she is always to be found when sought for, and never appears so lovely as when contrasted with her opponent, Disorder.—Johnson.

There are persons who are never easy unless they are putting your books and papers in order—that is, according to their notions of the matter—and hide things lest they should be lost, where neither the owner nor anybody else can find them. This is a sort of magpie faculty. If anything is left where you want it, it is called litter. There is a pedantry in housewifery, as well as in the gravest concerns. Abraham Tucker complained that whenever his maid servant had been in his library, he could not see comfortably to work again for several days.—Hazlitt.

Originality

No man knows himself as an original.—Washington Allston.

They who have light in themselves will not revolve as satellites.—Seneca.

Originality is nothing but judicious imitation.—Voltaire.

The originality of a subject is in its treatment.—Beaconsfield.

What stories are new? All types of all characters march through all fables.—Thackeray.

Great men are more distinguished by range and extent than by originality.—Emerson.

All thoughtful men are solitary and original in themselves.—Lowell.

The merit of originality is not novelty; it is sincerity. The believing man is the original man; whatsoever

he believes, he believes it for himself, not for another.—Carlyle.

Great things cannot have escaped former observation.—Dr. Johnson.

Be the first to say what is self-evident, and you are immortal.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

If you would create something, you must be something.—Goethe.

Originality is the one thing which unoriginal minds cannot feel the use of.—John Stuart Mill.

Every man is an original and solitary character. None can either understand or feel the book of his own life like himself.—Cecil.

When Shakespeare is charged with debts to his authors, Landor replies: "Yes, he was more original than his originals." He breathed upon dead bodies and brought them to life.—Emerson.

Those writers who lie on the watch for novelty can have little hope of greatness; for great things cannot have escaped former observation.—Johnson.

One couldn't carry on life comfortably without a little blindness to the fact that everything has been said better than we can put it ourselves.—George Eliot.

People are always talking about originality; but what do they mean? As soon as we are born, the world begins to work upon us; and this goes on to the end. And after all, what can we call our own, except energy, strength, and will? If I could give an account of all that I owe to great predecessors and contemporaries, there would be but a small balance in my favor.—Goethe.

Millions of people are provided with their thoughts as with their clothes; authors, printers, booksellers, and newsmen stand, in relation to their minds, simply as shoemakers and tailors stand to their bodies.—G. A. Sala.

The little mind who loves itself will write and think with the vulgar; but the great mind will be bravely eccentric, and scorn the beaten road, from universal benevolence.—Goldsmith.

I would rather be the author of one original thought than conqueror of a hundred battles. Yet moral excellence is so much superior to intellectual, that I ought to esteem one virtue more valuable than a hundred original thoughts.—W. B. Clulow.

Men have their intellectual ancestry, and the likeness of some one of them is forever unexpectedly flashing out in the features of a descendant, it may be after a gap of several centuries. In the parliament of the present every man represents a constituency of the past.—Lowell.

Ornament

All finery is a sign of littleness.—Lavater.

Ornaments were invented by modesty.—Joubert.

The world is still deceived by ornament.—Shakespeare.

Jewelry and profuse ornaments are unmistakable evidences of vulgarity.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The true ornament of matrons is virtue, not apparel.—Justin.

Women, like roses, should wear only their own colors, and emit no borrowed perfumes.—Rabbi Ben Azai.

The love of ornament creeps slowly but surely into the female heart.—Mrs. S. C. Hall.

Women of society, as well as Hot-tentots, run naturally to ornaments and gewgaws.—Dumas, Père.

Around the neck what dress are gold and pearl!—Young.

When I behold the passion for ornamentation, and the corresponding power, I feel as if women had so far shown what they are bad for, rather than what they are good for.—Julia Ward Howe.

Dumb jewels often, in their silent kind, more than quick words, do move a woman's mind.—Shakespeare.

Jewels! It's my belief that when woman was made, jewels were invented only to make her the more mischievous.—Douglas Jerrold.

Ornament is but the gilded shore
To a most dangerous sea; the beauteous scarf

Veiling an Indian; beauty, in a word,
The seeming truth which cunning times put on
To entrap the wisest. —Shakespeare.

Plutarch has a fine expression, with regard to some woman of learning, humility, and virtue;—that her ornaments were such as might be purchased without money, and would render any woman's life both glorious and happy.—Sterne.

Women have that feminine sensuousness which delights in color and odor and richness of fabric. Their sense of beauty is untaught. A little lower in the scale of civilization, they would pierce their noses, and dye their fingernails, and wear strings of glass beads.—Mrs. L. G. Calhoun.

We all originally came from the woods! it is hard to eradicate from any of us the old taste for the tattoo and the war-paint; and the moment that money gets into our pockets, it somehow or another breaks out in ornaments on our person, without always giving refinement to our manners.—Whipple.

Ostentation

Deeds of lowly virtue fade before the glare of lofty ostentation.—Klopstock.

Excess in apparel is another costly folly. The very trimming of the vain world would clothe all the naked ones.—William Penn.

Do what good thou canst unknown; and be not vain of what ought rather to be felt than seen.—William Penn.

They used to think they were doing God a favor to print His name in capital letters.—Richter.

Where there is much pretension, much has been borrowed; nature never pretends.—Lavater.

Show is not substance; realities govern wise men.—William Penn.

An ostentatious man will rather relate a blunder or an absurdity he has committed, than be debarred from talking of his own dear person.—Adison.

Education, indeed, has made the fondness for fine things next to natural; the corals and bells teach infants on the breasts to be delighted with sound and glitter.—H. Brooke.

There is a patience that cackles. There are a great many virtues that are hen-like. They are virtues, to be sure; but everybody in the neighborhood has to know about them.—Beecher.

As you see in a pair of bellows, there is a forced breath without life, so in those that are puffed up with the wind of ostentation, there may be charitable words without works.—Bishop Hall.

Heaven must scorn the humility which we telegraph thither by genuflection; it must prefer the manliness that stands by all created gifts, and looks itself in the face without pretence of worship.—John Weiss.

Ostentation is the signal flag of hypocrisy. The charlatan is verbose and assumptive; the Pharisee is ostentatious, because he is a hypocrite. Pride is the master sin of the Devil; and the Devil is the father of lies.—Chapin.

P

Pagan

Paganism worships creation instead of the Creator.—William Cave.

Paganism attributes the creation of the world to blind chance.—Richard Baxter.

The natural religion of the pagan philosophers was mixed with fancies and dreams.—Saurin.

In paganism light is mixed with darkness, and religion and truth are blended with superstition and error.—Lindley Murray.

When a pagan race comes in contact with a Christian race, they are converted, absorbed, or exterminated.—Joseph Bartlett.

The pagan religion, which prohibited only some of the grosser crimes, and which stopped the hand but meddled not with the heart, might have crimes that were inexplicable.—Montesquieu.

The exhaustion of taste, genius, and splendor upon its fables and ceremonies, even to our times, constitute the ancient paganism a marvel of all that was attractive and magnificent.—R. W. Hamilton.

Pain

Pain is an outcry of sin.—South.

Pain pays the income of each precious thing.—Shakespeare.

There is no mortal whom pain and disease do not reach.—Cicero.

Sweet the pleasure after pain.—Dryden.

Other men's pains are easily borne.—Cervantes.

A man of pleasure is a man of pains.—Young.

There is a pleasure that is born of pain.—Owen Meredith.

Nature knows best, and she says, roar!—Maria Edgeworth.

The same refinement which brings us new pleasures exposes us to new pains.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The pain of the mind is worse than the pain of the body.—Publius Syrus.

Pain and pleasure, like light and darkness, succeed each other.—Sterne.

Pain is the great teacher of mankind. Beneath its breath souls develop.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

There is purpose in pain; otherwise it were devilish.—Owen Meredith.

Pain and disease awaken us to convictions which are necessary to our moral condition.—Dr. Johnson.

Why, all delights are vain; but that most vain,
Which, with pain purchas'd doth inherit pain.
—Shakespeare.

Long pains, with use of bearing, are half eased.—Dryden.

Patience alleviates, as impatience augments, pain; thus persons of strong will suffer less than those who give way to irritation.—Swift.

Pain addeth zest unto pleasure, and teacheth the luxury of health.—Tupper.

Pain may be said to follow pleasure as its shadow.—Colton.

Nature has placed mankind under the government of two sovereign masters,—pain and pleasure.—Jeremy Bentham.

Pain is the deepest thing we have in our nature, and union through pain has always seemed more real and holy than any other.—Hallam.

World's use is cold, world's love is vain,
World's cruelty is bitter bane
But pain is not the fruit of pain.

—E. B. Browning.

Phychical pain is more easily borne than physical; and if I had my choice between a bad conscience and a bad tooth, I should choose the former.—Heinrich Heine.

God has scattered several degrees of pleasure and pain in all the things that environ and affect us, and blended them together in almost all our thoughts.—Locke.

The most painful part of our bodily pain is that which is bodiless or immaterial,—namely, our impatience, and the delusion that it will last forever.—Richter.

Nothing begins, and nothing ends,
That is not paid with moan;
For we are born in others' pain,
And perish in our own.

—Francis Thompson.

They talk of short-lived pleasures—be it so—
Pain dies as quickly; stern, hard-featured pain
Expires, and lets her weary prisoner go.
The fiercest agonies have shortest reign.

—Bryant.

Pain itself is not without its alleviations. It may be violent and frequent, but it is seldom both violent and long-continued; and its pauses and intermissions become positive pleasures. It has the power of shedding a satisfaction over intervals of ease, which, I believe, few enjoyments exceed.—Paley.

The brute animals have all the same sensations of pain as human beings, and consequently endure as much pain when their body is hurt; but in their case the cruelty of torment is greater, because they have no mind to bear them up against their sufferings, and no hope to look forward to when enduring the last extreme pain. Their happiness consists entirely in present enjoyment.—Chalmers.

Sense of pleasure we may well
Spare out of life perhaps, and not repine,
But live content, which is the calmest life;
But pain is perfect misery, the worst
Of evils, and excessive, overturns
All patience.

—Milton.

Painting

A picture is a poem without words.—Horace.

Thank God, I too am a painter!—Correggio.

Painters and poets have liberty to lie.—Burns.

The mind paints before the brush.—James Ellis.

The love of gain never made a painter; but it has marred many.—Washington Allston.

If we could but paint with the hand as we see with the eye!—Balzac.

A picture is an intermediate something between a thought and a thing.—Coleridge.

Painting is silent poetry, and poetry is a speaking picture.—Simonides.

A room hung with pictures is a room hung with thoughts.—Sir Joshua Reynolds.

He that would be a master must draw from the life as well as copy from originals, and join theory and experience together.—Jeremy Collier.

The art of painting does not proceed so much by intelligence as by sight and feeling and invention.—Hamerton.

Beauty, frail flower that every season fears, blooms in thy colors for a thousand years.—Pope.

Style in painting is the same as in writing,—a power over materials, whether words or colors.—James Ellis.

Caracci's strength, Correggio's softer line, Paulo's free course, and Titian's warmth divine.—Pope.

Ah, would we could at once paint with the eyes! In the long way, from the eye through the arm to the pencil, how much is lost!—Lessing.

A double task to paint the finest features of the mind, and to most subtle and mysterious things give color, strength, and motion.—Akenside.

Blest be the art that can immortalize,—the art that baffles time's tyrannic claim to quench it.—Cowper.

There are pictures by Titian so steeped in golden splendors, that they look as if they would light up a dark room like a solar lamp.—Hillard.

In portraits, the grace and, we may add, the likeness consists more in taking the general air than in observing the exact similitude of every feature.—Sir Joshua Reynolds.

The first degree of proficiency is, in painting, what grammar is in literature,—a general preparation for whatever species of the art the student may afterwards choose for his more particular application. The power of drawing, modelling, and using colors is very properly called the language of the art.—Sir Joshua Reynolds.

The painter who is content with the praise of the world in respect to what does not satisfy himself is not an artist, but an artisan; for though his reward be only praise, his pay is that of a mechanic.—Washington Allston.

The masters painted for joy, and knew not that virtue had gone out of them. They could not paint the like in cold blood. The masters of English lyric wrote their songs so. It was a fine efflorescence of fine powers.—Emerson.

The first merit of pictures is the effect which they can produce upon the mind; and the first step of a sensible man should be to receive involuntary effects from them. Pleasure and inspiration first, analysis afterward.—Beecher.

The emperor one day took up a pencil which fell from the hand of Titian, who was then drawing his picture; and upon the compliment which Titian made him on that occasion he said, "Titian deserves to be served by Cæsar."—Dryden.

Stothard learned the art of combining colors by closely studying butterflies' wings; he would often say that no one knew what he owed to these tiny insects. A burnt stick and a barn-door served Wilkie in lieu of pencil and canvas.—Samuel Smiles.

I have very often lamented and hinted my sorrow, in several speculations, that the art of painting is made so little use of to the improvement of manners. When we consider that it places the action of the person represented in the most agreeable aspect imaginable,—that it does not only express the passion or concern as it sits upon him who is drawn, but has under those features the height of the painter's imagination,—what strong images of virtue and humanity might we not expect would be instilled into the mind from the labors of the pencil!—Steele.

Panic

The stampede of our self-possession.—Rivarol.

A panic is a sudden desertion of us, and a going over to the enemy, of our imagination.—Bovee.

Paradise

The paradise of fools, to few unknown.—Milton.

In this fool's paradise he drank del-light.—Crabbe.

A good conscience is paradise.—
Arminius.

To the Elysian shades dismiss my soul, where no carnation fades.—Pope.

Having mourned your sin, for outward Eden lost, find paradise within.
—Dryden.

Gentleness and kindness will make our homes a paradise upon earth.—
Bartol.

Remembrance is the only paradise out of which we cannot be driven.—
Richter.

An inherent sense of man makes him long for an eternal paradise.—James Ellis.

Every man has a paradise around him till he sins, and the angel of an accusing conscience drives him from his Eden.—Longfellow.

The loves that meet in Paradise shall cast out fear,
And Paradise hath room for you and me and all. —Christina G. Rossetti.

But when the sun in all his state
Illumed the eastern skies,
She passed through Glory's morning-gate,
And walked in Paradise.
—James Aldrich.

There is no expeditious road
To pack and label men for God,
And save them by the barrel-load,
Some may perchance, with strange surprise,
Have blundered into Paradise.
—Francis Thompson.

In the nine heavens are eight Paradises; Where is the ninth one? In the human breast.
Only the blessed dwell in the Paradises,
But blessedness dwells in the human breast. —Wm. R. Alger.

In looking for the keys of paradise, a pope may stoop a little; having found them, he should rise again.—

Pope Sixtus V.

So on he fares, and to the border comes,
Of Eden, where delicious Paradise,
Now nearer, crowns with her enclosure
green,
As with a rural mound, the champain
head
Of a steep wilderness. —Milton.

Paradox

These are old fond paradoxes to make fools laugh i' the alehouse.—
Shakespeare.

The mind begins to boggle at unnatural substances as things paradoxical and incomprehensible.—Bishop South.

Then there is that glorious Epicurean paradox, uttered by my friend, the Historian, in one of his flashing moments: "Give us the luxuries of life, and we will dispense with its necessaries."—O. W. Holmes.

For thence,—a paradox
Which comforts while it mocks,—
Shall life succeed in that it seems to fail:
What I aspired to be,
And was not, comforts me:
A brute I might have been, but would not sink i' the scale.
—Robert Browning.

Pardon

To err is human; to forgive, divine!—Pope.

Pardon is the virtue of victory.—
Mazzini.

Pardon ever follows sincere repentance.—Spurgeon.

Pardon others often, thyself never.
—Publius Syrus.

But infinite in pardon is my Judge.
—Milton.

The heart has always the pardoning power.—Mme. Swetchine.

If I were Jesus Christ, I would save Judas.—Victor Hugo.

As we grow in wisdom, we pardon more freely.—Mme. de Staël.

The word is short, but not so short as sweet.—Shakespeare.

Pardon, not wrath, is God's best attribute.—Bayard Taylor.

The man who pardons easily courts injury.—Corneille.

God pardons like a mother who kisses away the repentant tears of her child.—Beecher.

Love is on the verge of hate each time it stoops for pardon.—Bulwer-Lytton.

He is below himself who is not above an injury.—Quarles.

Virtue pardons the wicked, as the sandal-tree perfumes the axe which strikes it.—Saadi.

Pardon is voluntary forgetfulness, while forgetfulness is involuntary pardon.—Stahl.

Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.—Bible.

Amnesty, that noble word, the genuine dictate of wisdom.—Æschines.

It is not enjoined upon us to forget, but we are told to forgive, our enemies.—Chapin.

Cowards have done good and kind actions, but a coward never pardoned.—Schiller.

They who forgive most shall be most forgiven.—Bailey.

When by a pardoned murderer blood is spilt, the judge that pardoned hath the greatest guilt.—Sir J. Denham.

If we can still love those who have made us suffer, we love them all the more.—Mrs. Jameson.

Though with their high wrongs I am struck to the quick, yet, with my nobler reason, against my fury do I take part; the rarer action is in virtue than in vengeance.—Shakespeare.

Who is a God like unto Thee, that pardoneth iniquity, and passeth by transgression?—Bible.

Thou art a God ready to pardon, gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness.—Bible.

These evils I deserve, yet despair not of His final pardon whose ear is ever open and his eye gracious to readmit the suppliant.—Milton.

Nothing in this low and ruined world bears the meek impress of the Son of God so surely as forgiveness.—Alice Cary.

God pardon them that are the cause thereof! A virtuous and a Christian-like conclusion, to pray for them that have done scath to us.—Shakespeare.

What better can we do than prostrate fall before Him reverent, and there confess humbly our faults, and pardon beg with tears watering the ground?—Milton.

You cannot play the hypocrite before God; and to obtain pardon you must cease to sin, as well as to be exercised by a spirit of repentance.—Beecher.

Pardon, I beseech Thee, the iniquity of this people, according unto the greatness of Thy mercy! And the Lord said I have pardoned, according to thy word.—Bible.

To pardon those absurdities in ourselves which we cannot suffer in others, is neither better nor worse than to be more willing to be fools ourselves than to have others so.—Pope.

God forgives; forgives not capriciously, but with wise, definite, Divine prearrangement; forgives universally, on the ground of an atonement, and on the condition of repentance and faith.—R. S. Storrs.

Parents

Does not nature for the child prepare the parent's love, the tender nurse's care?—Sir R. Blackmore.

Next to God, thy parents.—William Penn.

Honor thy parents to prolong thy end.—Thomas Randolph.

A suspicious parent makes an artful child.—Haliburton.

Whoever makes his father's heart to bleed,
Shall have a child that will revenge the deed.
—Randolph.

In general those parents have the most reverence who most deserve it; for he that lives well cannot be despised.—Johnson.

There is no friendship, no love, like that of the parent for the child.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Parents must give good example and reverent deportment in the face of their children.—Jeremy Taylor.

Honor thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.—Bible.

How pleasant it is for a father to sit at his child's board. It is like the aged man reclining under the shadow of the oak which he has planted.—Scot.

In love to our wives there is desire, to our sons there is ambition; but in that to our daughters there is something which there are no words to express.—Addison.

The most indifferent thing has its force and beauty when it is spoken by a kind father, and an insignificant trifle has its weight when offered by a dutiful child.—Steele.

I suppose that every parent loves his child; but I know without any supposing, that in a large number of homes the love is hidden behind authority, or its expression is crowded out by daily duties and cares.—A. E. Kittredge.

The voice of parents is the voice of gods, for to their children they are heaven's lieutenants.—Shakespeare.

It is the most beautiful object the eyes of man can behold to see a man of worth and his son live in an entire, unreserved correspondence.—Steele.

Some corrupt in their morals as vice could make them, have yet been solicitous to have their children soberly, virtuously, and piously brought up.—South.

The sacred books of the ancient Persians say: "If you would be holy instruct your children, because all the good acts they perform will be imputed to you."—Montesquieu.

Me, let the tender office long engage
To rock the cradle of reposing age:
With lenient arts extend a mother's breath,
Make languor smile, and smooth the bed of death.
—Pope.

Parents, to their offspring blind,
Consult nor parts, nor turn of mind;
But, ev'n in infancy, decree
What this, what t'other son shall be.
—Gay.

To you your father should be as a god;
One that composed your beauties; yea, and one
To whom you are but as a form in wax,
By him imprinted, and within his power
To leave the figure, or disfigure it.
—Shakespeare.

With joy the parent loves to trace Resemblance in his children's face;
And, as he forms their docile youth
To walk the steady paths of truth,
Observes them shooting into men,
And lives in them life o'er again.
—Lloyd.

Of all hardness of heart there is none so inexcusable as that of parents toward their children. An obstinate, inflexible, unforgiving temper is odious upon all occasions; but here it is unnatural.—Addison.

Children, honor your parents in your hearts; bear them not only awe and respect, but kindness and affection: love their persons, fear to do anything that may justly provoke them; highly esteem them as the instruments under God of your being: for "Ye shall fear every man his mother and his father."—Jeremy Taylor.

The joys of parents are secret, and so are their griefs and fears; they cannot utter the one, nor they will not utter the other. Children sweeten labors, but they make misfortunes more bitter; increase the cares of life, but they mitigate the remembrance of death.—Lord Bacon.

Parents are o'ersoon,
When with too strict a rein, they do hold in Their child's affections; and control that
love,
Which the powers divine instruct them with:
When in their shallow judgments, they may know
Affection cross'd brings misery and woe.
—Robert Taylor.

Parents must give good example and reverent deportment in the face of their children. And all those instances of charity which usually endear each other—sweetness of conversation, affability, frequent admonition—all signification of love and tenderness, care and watchfulness, must be expressed towards children; that they may look upon their parents as their friends and patrons, their defence and sanctuary, their treasure and their guide.—Jeremy Taylor.

Partiality

Partiality in a parent is unlucky; for fondlings are in danger to be made fools.—L'Estrange.

Partiality is generally supplemented by prejudice, and is most objectionable in family government.—Du Cœur.

Favoritism manifests itself in all departments of government, public and private. It is the harder to avoid, because it is so natural.—Haliburton.

As there is a partiality to opinions, which is apt to mislead the understanding, so there is also a partiality to studies, which is prejudicial to knowledge.—Locke.

Partiality is properly the understanding's judging according to the inclination of the will and affections, and not according to the exact truth of things, or the merits of the cause.—South.

Parting

In every parting there is an image of death.—George Eliot.

We only part to meet again.—Gay.

Farewell! God knows when we shall meet again.—Shakespeare.

My eyes won't lose the sight of thee,
But languish after thine, and ache with gazing. —Otway.

To know, to esteem, to love—and then to part Makes up life's tale to many a feeling heart! —Coleridge.

The joys of meeting pay the pangs of absence;
Else who could bear it? —Rowe.

Stand not upon the order of your going,
But go at once. —Shakespeare.

And by and by, will there come a time, when souls congenial will no more say adieu?—Mme. Dufresnoy.

One last long sigh to love and thee,
then back to busy life again.—Byron.

Such partings break the heart they fondly hope to heal.—Byron.

Portia, adieu! I have too griev'd a heart
To take a tedious leave. —Shakespeare.

To die and part is a less evil; but to part and live, there, there is the torment.—Lord Lansdowne.

God give us leisure for these sights of love!
Once more, adieu! —Shakespeare.

Good-night, good-night! parting is such sweet sorrow,
That I shall say good-night till it be to-morrow. —Shakespeare.

Have not all past human beings parted,
And must not all the present, one day part? —Byron.

Hereafter, in a better world than this, I shall desire more love and knowledge of you.—Shakespeare.

Parting is worse than death; it is death of love!—Dryden.

I have no parting sigh to give,
So take my parting smile,
—L. E. Landon.

Every parting is a form of death, as every reunion is a type of heaven.
—T. Edwards.

Fare thee well! and if for ever,
Still for ever, fare thee well.
—Byron.

The air is full of farewells to the dying and mournings for the dead.—
Longfellow.

So sweetly she bade me adieu, I thought that she bade me return.—
Shenstone.

Well—peace to thy heart, though another's
it be,
And health to thy cheek, though it blooms not for me. —Moore.

But fate ordains that dearest friends must part.—Young.

That farewell kiss which resembles greeting, that last glance of love which becomes the sharpest pang of sorrow.
—George Eliot.

If we must part forever, give me but one kind word to think upon and please myself with, while my heart is breaking.—Otway.

There is such sweet pain in parting that I could hang forever on thine arms, and look away my life into thine eyes.—Otway.

The man who leaves a woman best pleased with herself is the one whom she will soonest wish to see.—Roche-
foucauld.

The parting of a husband and wife is like the cleaving of a heart; one half will flutter here, one there.—Tennyson.

But still her lips refused to say, farewell; for in that word, that fatal word, howe'er we promise, hope, believe, there breathes despair.—Byron.

Will our souls, hurrying on in diverse paths, unite once more, as if the interval had been a dream?—Bulwer-Lytton.

Abruptness is an eloquence in parting, when spinning out the time is but the weaving of new sorrow.—Sir John Suckling.

Farewell! God knows when we shall meet again. I have a faint cold fear thrills through my veins, that almost freezes up the heat of life.—Shakespeare.

They who go Feel not the pain of parting; it is they Who stay behind that suffer.
—Longfellow.

One kind kiss before we part,
Drop a tear, and bid adieu;
Though we sever, my fond heart
Till we meet shall pant for you.
—Dodsley.

We two parted
In silence and tears,
Half broken-hearted
To sever for years. —Byron.

Oh! wherefore doth thou soothe me with thy softness? why doth thou wind thyself about my heart, and make this separation painful to us?—Rowe.

Let's not unman each other—part at once;
All farewells should be sudden, when forever,
Else they make an eternity of moments,
And clog the last sad sands of life with tears. —Byron.

His eye being big with tears,
Turning his face, he put his hand behind him,
And with affection wondrous sensible,
He wrung Bassanio's hand; and so they parted. —Shakespeare.

Enough, that we are parted—that there rolls
A flood of headlong fate between our souls, Whose darkness severs me as wide from thee
As hell from heaven, to all eternity!
—Moore.

Beware of parting! The true sadness is not in the pain of the parting;
it is in the when and the how you are to meet again with the face about to vanish from your view.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Time, which deadens hatred, secretly strengthens love; and in the hour of threatened separation its growth is manifested at once in radiant brightness.—Richter.

With all my soul, then let us part,
Since both are anxious to be free;
And I will send you home your heart,
If you will send back mine to me!
—Moore.

Think'st thou that I could bear to part
With thee, and learn to halve my heart?

Years have not seen, time shall not see
The hour that tears my soul from thee.
—Byron.

The consciousness of being loved softens the keenest pangs, even at the moment of parting; yea, even the eternal farewell is robbed of half its bitterness when uttered in accepts that breathe love to the last sigh.—Addison.

If I depart from thee, I cannot live;
And in thy sight to die, what were it else
But like a pleasant slumber in thy lap?
To die by thee were but to die in jest;
From thee to die were torture more than death.
—Shakespeare.

In taking leave,
Thro' the dark lashes of her darting eyes,
Methought she shot her soul at ev'ry glance,
Still looking back, as if she had a mind
That you should know she left her soul behind her.
—Lee.

We cannot part with our friends.
We cannot let our angels go. We do not see that they only go out that archangels may come in. We are idolators of the old. We do not believe in the richness of the soul, in its proper eternity and omnipresence.—Emerson.

Parting and forgetting? What faithful heart can do these? Our great thoughts, our great affections, the truths of our life, never leave us. Surely they cannot separate from our consciousness; shall follow it whither-soever that shall go; and are of their nature divine and immortal.—Thackeray.

Good-night! good-night! as we so oft have said
Beneath this roof at midnight, in the days
That are no more, and shall no more return.
Thou hast but taken up thy lamp and gone to bed;
I stay a little longer, as one stays
To cover up the embers that still burn.
—Longfellow.

A chord, stronger or weaker, is snapped asunder in every parting, and Time's busy fingers are not practised in re-splicing broken ties. Meet again you may; will it be in the same way? with the same sympathies? with the same sentiments? Will the souls, hurrying on in diverse paths, unite once more, as if the interval had been a dream? Rarely, rarely.—Bulwer Lytton.

'Tis the pang alone to part
From those we love, that rends the heart;
That agony to save,
Some nameless power in nature strives,
Our fading hope in death revives,
And blossoms in the grave.
—Mrs. John Hunter.

Two lives that once part, are as ships that divide
When, moment on moment, there rushes between
The one and the other, a sea;—
Ah, never can fall from the days that have been A gleam on the years that shall be!
Bulwer-Lytton.

Party

Political parties serve to keep each other in check, one keenly watching the other.—Henry Clay.

Party is the madness of many for the gain of a few.—Pope.

Party spirit enlists a man's virtues in the cause of his vices.—Whately.

There has ever been, and will always be, two dominant parties in politics, and this is indirectly an advantage to the general interests of the country.—Daniel Webster.

Party standards are shadows in which patriotism is buried.—Bernardin de St. Pierre.

The tendency of party-spirit has ever been to disguise and propagate and support error.—Whately.

How is it possible for those who are men of honor in their persons, thus to become notorious liars in their party?—Addison.

The parties are the gamblers; but government keeps the table, and is sure to be the winner in the end.—Burke.

Who, born for the universe, narrowed his mind, and to party gave up what was meant for mankind.—Goldsmith.

This party spirit has so ill an effect on our morals, it has likewise a very great one upon our judgments.—Addison.

He that aspires to be the head of a party will find it more difficult to please his friends than to perplex his foes.—Colton.

Nothing can be proposed so wild or so absurd as not to find a party, and often a very large party to espouse it.—Cecil.

The worst effect of party is its tendency to generate narrow, false, and illiberal prejudices, by teaching the adherents of one party to regard those that belong to an opposing party as unworthy of confidence.—Brande.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This, within certain limits, is probably true, and, in governments of a monarchical cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged.

Passion

Passion is the drunkenness of the mind.—South.

In solitude the passions feed upon the heart.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Passion makes us feel, but never see clearly.—Montesquieu.

The passions do not die out; they burn out.—Ninon de Lenclos.

The passions are the voice of the body.—Rousseau.

Steel assassinates; the passions kill.—Mme. Deluzy.

Great passions are incurable diseases.—Goethe.

Passion makes the will lord of the reason.—Shakespeare.

No man's body is as strong as his appetites.—Tillotson.

The ruling passion conquers reason still.—Pope.

A great passion has no partner.—Lavater.

We are ne'er like angels till our passion dies.—Thomas Dekker.

The passions are the only orators that always persuade.—Rochefoucauld.

He only employs his passion who can make no use of his reason.—Cicero.

Who is strong? He who subdues his passions.—Talmud.

Our headstrong passions shut the door of our souls against God.—Confucius.

Passion is always suffering, even when gratified.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

Flowers whose wild odors breathe but agonies.—Byron.

In the human breast two master-passions cannot coexist.—Campbell.

We should employ our passions in the service of life, not spend life in the service of our passions.—Richard Steele.

Let the sap of reason quench the fire of passion.—Shakespeare.

The worst of slaves is he whom passion rules.—H. Brooke.

Passions are defects or virtues in the highest power.—Goethe.

Give me that man
That is not passion's slave.
—Shakespeare.

And you, brave Cobham! to the latest
breath
Shall feel your ruling passion strong in death.
—Pope.

If we resist our passions it is more from their weakness than from our strength.—La Rochefoucauld.

One master-passion in the breast,
Like Aaron's serpent, swallows up the rest.
—Pope.

He whom passion rules, is bent to meet his death.—Sir Philip Sidney.

Govern your passions or otherwise they will govern you.—Horace.

Passion costs too much to bestow it upon every trifle.—Rev. Thomas Adam.

Lose not thyself, nor give thy humors
way;
God gave them to thee under lock and key.
—George Herbert.

Passions are like storms which, full of present mischief, serve to purify the atmosphere.—Ramsay.

All passions exaggerate; and they are passions only because they do exaggerate.—Chamfort.

We use up in the passions the stuff that was given us for happiness.—Joubert.

It is not the absence, but the mastery, of our passions which affords happiness.—Mme. de Maintenon.

Passion may not unfitly be termed the mob of the man, that commits a riot upon his reason.—William Penn.

True passion is not a wisp-light; it is a consuming flame, and either it must find fruition or it will burn the human heart to dust and ashes.—William Winter.

Man is only truly great when he acts from the passions; never irresistible but when he appeals to the imagination.—Disraeli.

Passion is universal humanity. Without it religion, history, romance and art would be useless.—Balzac.

Passion looks not beyond the moment of its existence. Better, it says, the kisses of love to-day, than the felicities of heaven afar off.—Bovee.

The passions are the gales of life; and it is religion only that can prevent them from rising into a tempest.—Dr. Watts.

The mind hath not reason to remember that passions ought to be her vassals, not her masters.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Passions are likened best to floods and streams; the shallow murmur, but the deep are dumb.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Rage is the shortest passion of our souls: Like narrow brooks, that rise with sudden show'rs,
It swells in haste, and falls again as soon.
—Rowe.

Men will always act according to their passions. Therefore the best government is that which inspires the nobler passions and destroys the meaner.—Jacobi.

He who is passionate and hasty is generally honest. It is your cool, dissembling hypocrite of whom you should beware.—Lavater.

Strong as our passions are, they may be starved into submission, and conquered without being killed.—Colton.

A genuine passion is like a mountain stream; it admits of no impediment; it cannot go backward; it must go forward.—Bovee.

The passions are like fire, useful in a thousand ways and dangerous only in one, through their excess.—Bovee.

Our passions are like convulsion fits, which, though they make us stronger for a time, leave us the weaker ever after.—Pope.

Passions, as fire and water, are good servants, but bad masters, and subminister to the best and worst purposes.—L'Estrange.

When the tongue or the pen is let loose in a frenzy of passion, it is the man, and not the subject, that becomes exhausted.—Thomas Paine.

The wither'd frame, the ruin'd mind,
The wreck by passion left behind;
A shrivell'd scroll, a scatter'd leaf,
Sear'd by the autumn-blast of grief.
—Byron.

Oh how the passions, insolent and strong,
Bear our weak minds their rapid course along;
Make us the madness of their will obey;
Then die and leave us to our griefs a prey! —Crabbe.

The blossoms of passions, gay and luxuriant flowers, are brighter and fuller of fragrance; but they beguile us and lead us astray, and their odor is deadly.—Longfellow.

The passions are like those demons with which Afrasabiab sailed down the Orus. Our only safety consists in keeping them asleep. If they wake, we are lost.—Goethe.

Even virtue itself, all perfect as it is, requires to be inspirited by passion; for duties are but coldly performed, which are but philosophically fulfilled.—Mrs. Jameson.

The passions act as winds to propel our vessel, our reason is the pilot that steers her; without the winds she would not move, without the pilot she would be lost.—From the French.

Women are much more alike than men; they have, in truth, but two passions, vanity and love; these are their universal characteristics.—Chesterfield.

Hold not conference, debate, or reasoning with any lust; 'tis but a preparatory for thy admission of it. The way is at the very first flatly to deny it.—Fuller.

Search then the ruling passion; there alone
The wild are constant, and the cunning known;
The fool consistent, and the false sincere:
Priests, princes, women, no dissemblers here.
—Pope.

Were it not for the salutary agitation of the passions, the waters of life would become dull, stagnant, and as unfit for all vital purposes as those of the Dead Sea.—Chatfield.

Words may be counterfeit, false coined, and current only from the tongue, without the mind; but passion is in the soul, and always speaks the heart.—Southern.

Alas! too well, too well they know
The pain, the penitence, the woe
That passion brings down on the best,
The wisest and the loveliest. —Moore.

No man's body is as strong as his appetites, but heaven has corrected the boundlessness of his voluptuous desires by stinting his strength and contracting his capacities.—Tillotson.

The passions may be humored till they become our masters, as a horse may be pampered till he gets the better of his rider; but early discipline will prevent mutiny, and keep the helm in the hands of reason.—Cumberland.

The most common-place people become highly imaginative when they are in a passion. Whole dramas of insult, injury and wrong pass before their minds,—efforts of creative genius, for there is sometimes not a fact to go upon.—Helps.

The passions are the winds which fill the sails of the vessel; they sink it at times, but without them it would be impossible to make way. Bile makes man passionate and sick; but without bile man could not live.—Voltaire.

Exalted souls

Have passions in proportion violent,
Resistless, and tormenting: they're a tax
Imposed by nature on pre-eminence,
And fortitude and wisdom must support them. —Lillo.

The difference between passion and love is that this is fixed, that volatile. Love grows, passion wastes, by enjoyment; and the reason is that one springs from a union of souls, and the other springs from a union of sense.—William Penn.

Passion is the great mover and spring of the soul. When men's passions are strongest, they may have great and noble effects; but they are then also apt to fall into the greatest miscarriages.—Sprat.

The way to avoid evil is not by maiming our passions, but by compelling them to yield their vigor to our moral nature. Thus they become, as in the ancient fable, the harnessed steeds which bear the chariot of the sun.—Beecher.

The men of sense, the idols of the shallow, are very inferior to the men of passions. It is the strong passions which, rescuing us from sloth, impart to us that continuous and earnest attention necessary to great intellectual efforts.—Helvetius.

The passions should be purged; all may become innocent if they are well directed and moderated. Even hatred may be a commendable feeling when it is caused by a lively love of good. Whatever makes the passions pure, makes them stronger, more durable, and more enjoyable.—Joubert.

Weak minds make treaties with the passions they cannot overcome, and try to purchase happiness at the expense of principle; but the resolute will of a strong man scorns such means, and struggles nobly with his foe to achieve great deeds.—Longfellow.

There is a holy love and a holy rage, and our best virtues never glow so brightly as when our passions are excited in the cause. Sloth, if it has prevented many crimes, has also smothered many virtues; and the best of us are better when roused.—Colton.

His soul, like bark with rudder lost,
On passion's changeful tide was tost;
Nor vice nor virtue had the power
Beyond th' impression of the hour;
And O, when passion rules, how rare
The hours that fall to virtue's share!
—Scott.

The art of governing the passions is more useful, and more important, than many things in the search and pursuit of which we spend our days. Without this art, riches and health, and skill and knowledge, will give us little satisfaction; and whatsoever else we be, we can be neither happy, nor wise, nor good.—Jortin.

As rivers, when they overflow, drown those grounds, and ruin those husbandmen, which, whilst they flowed calmly betwixt their banks, they fertilized and enriched; so our passions, when they grow exorbitant and unruly, destroy those virtues, to which they may be very serviceable whilst they keep within their bounds.—Boyle.

The passions are at once tempters and chastisers. As tempters, they come with garlands of flowers on brows of youth; as chastisers, they appear with wreaths of snakes on the forehead of deformity. They are angels of light in their delusion; they are fiends of torment in their inflictions.—Henry Giles.

When reason, like the skilful charioteer,
Can break the fiery passions to the bit,
And, spite of their licentious sallies, keep
The radiant tract of glory; passions, then,
Are aids and ornaments. Triumphant reason,

Firm in her seat, and swift in her career,
Enjoys their violence, and, smiling, thanks
Their formidable flame, for bright renown.
—Young.

What a mistake to suppose that the passions are strongest in youth! The passions are not stronger, but the control over them is weaker! They are more easily excited, they are more violent and apparent; but they have less energy, less durability, less intense and concentrated power than in maturer life.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Past (The)

Let the dead past bury its dead!—Longfellow.

The past is dead, and has no resurrection.—H. Kirke White.

The eternal landscape of the past.—Tennyson.

The best of prophets of the future is the past.—Byron.

'Tis greatly wise to talk with our past hours.—Young.

Theirs is the present who can praise the past.—Shenstone.

Study the past if you would divine the future.—Confucius.

So sad, so fresh, the days that are no more.—Tennyson.

Gone, glimmering through the dream of things that were.—Byron.

The past is the sepulchre of our dead emotions.—Bovee.

I desire no future that will break the ties of the past.—George Eliot.

Things without remedy should be without regard; what is done is done.—Shakespeare.

It is to live twice when we can enjoy the recollections of our former life.—Martial.

The past is utterly indifferent to its worshippers.—William Winter.

The past and future are veiled; but the past wears the widow's veil, the future, the virgin's.—Richter.

O'er the trackless past somewhere lie the lost days of our tropic youth.—Bret Harte.

What's gone and what's past help should be past grief.—Shakespeare.

The earth with its scarred face is the symbol of the past.—Coleridge.

No hand can make the clock strike for me the hours that are passed.—Byron.

Time past, even God is deprived of the power of recalling.—Aristotle.

The tender grace of a day that is dead will never come back to me.—Tennyson.

Let us not burthen our remembrance with a heaviness that's gone.—Shakespeare.

Whose yesterdays look backward with a smile.—Young.

'Tis impotent to grieve for what is past, and unavailing to exclaim.—Harvard.

The present is only intelligible in the light of the past.—Trench.

Well does Agathon say: "Of this alone is even God deprived—the power of making that which is past never to have been."—Aristotle.

Some are so very studious of learning what was done by the ancients that they know not how to live with the moderns.—William Penn.

Not heaven itself upon the past has power; But what has been, has been, and I have had my hour.—Dryden.

Not to know what happened before we were born is always to remain a child; to know, and blindly to adopt that knowledge as an implicit rule of life, is never to be a man.—Chatfield.

Weep no more, lady, weep no more,
Thy sorrowe is in vaine,
For violets pluckt, the sweetest showers
Will ne'er make grow againe.
—Thos. Percy.

To him who has thought, or done, or suffered much, the level days of his childhood seem at an immeasurable distance, far off as the age of chivalry, or as the line of Sesostris.—Talfourd.

It is delightful to transport one's self into the spirit of the past, to see how a wise man has thought before us, and to what a glorious height we have at last reached.—Goethe.

How readily we wish time spent revoked, that we might try the ground again where once—through inexperience, as we now perceive—we missed that happiness we might have found!—Cowper.

Nothing that was worthy in the past departs; no truth or goodness realized by man ever does or can die; but all is still here, and, recognized or not, lives and works through endless changes.—Carlyle.

But there have been human hearts, constituted just like ours, for six thousand years. The same stars rise and set upon this globe that rose upon the plains of Shinar or along the Egyptian Nile and the same sorrows rise and set in every age.—Beecher.

Earth has scarcely an acre that does not remind us of actions that have long preceded our own, and its clustering tombstones loom up like reefs of the eternal shore, to show us where so many human barks have struck and gone down.—Chapin.

Many classes are always praising the by-gone time, for it is natural that the old should extol the days of their youth; the weak, the era of their strength; the sick, the season of their vigor; and the disappointed, the springtime of their hopes!—C. Bingham.

O there are Voices of the Past,
Links of a broken chain,
Wings that can bear me back to Times
Which cannot come again;
Yet God forbid that I should lose
The echoes that remain!
—Adelaide A. Procter.

There have been many men who left behind them that which hundreds of years have not worn out. The earth has Socrates and Plato to this day. The world is richer yet by Moses and the old prophets than by the wisest statesmen. We are indebted to the past. We stand in the greatness of ages that are gone rather than in that of our own. But of how many of us shall it be said that, being dead, we yet speak?—Beecher.

Patience

God is with the patient.—Koran.

Patience is the key of content.—Mahomet.

Patience is sorrow's salve.—Churchill.

Patience, and shuffle the cards!—Cervantes.

Great is the advantage of patience.—Tillotson.

The truest fortitude.—Milton.

Everything comes if a man will only wait.—Beaconsfield.

I work with patience, which is almost power.—Mrs. Browning.

What I have done is due to patient thought.—Sir Isaac Newton.

Patience and fortitude conquer all things.—Emerson.

Patience, sovereign o'er transmuted ills.—Dr. Johnson.

To endure is greater than to dare.—Thackeray.

If knowledge is power, patience is powerful.—Robert Hall.

To bear is to conquer our fate.—Campbell.

Patient endurance is Godlike.—Longfellow.

Patience is a necessary ingredient of genius.—Benj. Disraeli.

There are times when patience proves at fault.—Robert Browning.

Patience and gentleness are power.
—Leigh Hunt.

Patience is nobler motion than any deed.—Bartol.

To revenge is no valor, but to bear.
—Shakespeare.

In your patience ye are strong.—
Miss Barrett.

Patience is the art of hoping.—
Vauvenargues.

Patience is bitter, but its fruit is sweet.—J. J. Rousseau.

They also serve who only stand and wait.—Milton.

Patience—in patience there is safety.
—Laboulaye.

Set not thyself to attain much rest,
but much patience.—Thomas à Kempis.

At the least bear patiently, if thou canst not joyfully.—Thomas à Kempis.

Patience—with patience everything comes in due season.—Laboulaye.

He that can have patience can have what he will.—Benjamin Franklin.

Beware the fury of a patient man.
—Dryden.

It is easy finding reasons why other folks should be patient.—George Eliot.

Never think that God's delays are God's denials. Hold on! hold fast! hold out! Patience is genius.—Count de Buffon.

It is not necessary for all men to be great in action. The greatest and sublimest power is often simple patience.—Horace Bushnell.

He that will have a cake of the wheat must needs tarry the grinding.
—Shakespeare.

A true Christian man is distinguished from other men, not so much by his beneficent works as by his patience.—Horace Bushnell.

Patience is the support of weakness;
impatience is the ruin of strength.—
Colton.

There is, however, a limit at which forbearance ceases to be a virtue.—
Burke.

We usually learn to wait only when we have no longer anything to wait for.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

Patience is the ballast of the soul that will keep it from rolling and tumbling in the greatest storms.—
Bishop Hopkins.

How poor are they who have not patience!
What wound did ever heal, but by degrees? —Shakespeare.

He who says patience, says courage, endurance, strength.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

Patience, the second bravery of man, is perhaps greater than the first.—
Antonio de Solis.

Adopt the pace of nature: her secret is patience.—Emerson.

Upon the heat and flame of thy distemper sprinkle cool patience.—Shakespeare.

Patience is the strongest of strong drinks, for it kills the giant despair.—
Douglas Jerrold.

Even the best must own patience and resignation are the pillars of human peace on earth.—Young.

Patience ornaments the woman and proves the man.—Tertullian.

Patience and time do more than strength or passion.—La Fontaine.

Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labor and to wait.
—Longfellow.

Fortify courage with the true rampart of patience.—Sir P. Sidney.

Accustom yourself to that which you bear ill, and you will bear it well.—Seneca.

Come what, come may:
Time and the hour runs through the roughest day.—Shakespeare.

Arm the obdured breast with stubborn patience as with triple steel.—Milton.

To know how to wait is the great secret of success.—De Maistre.

Every misfortune is to be subdued by patience.—Virgil.

Patience is the panacea; but where does it grow, or who can swallow it?—Shenstone.

There is no great achievement that is not the result of patient working and waiting.—J. G. Holland.

Endurance is nobler than strength, and patience than beauty.—Ruskin.

There is no well-doing, no Godlike doing, that is not patient doing.—J. G. Holland.

No school is more necessary to children than patience, because either the will must be broken in childhood or the heart in old age.—Richter.

It is in length of patience, endurance and forbearance that so much of what is good in mankind and woman-kind is shown.—Arthur Helps.

By their patience and perseverance God's children are truly known from hypocrites and dissemblers.—Augustine.

And I must bear
What is ordained with patience, being aware Necessity doth front the universe
With an invincible gesture.
—Mrs. Browning.

Therefore, let us be patient, patient; and let God our Father teach His own lesson, His own way. Let us try to learn it well and quickly; but do not let us fancy that He will ring the school-bell, and send us to play before our lesson is learnt.—Charles Kingsley.

If we could have a little patience, we should escape much mortification; time takes away as much as it gives.—Madame de Sévigné.

If the wicked flourish and thou suffer, be not discouraged. They are fatted for destruction; thou art dieted for health.—Fuller.

Had it pleas'd heaven
To try me with affliction * * *
I should have found in some place of my soul
A drop of patience.—Shakespeare.

The fortitude of a Christian consists in patience; not in enterprise, which the poets call heroic, and which is commonly the effects of interest, pride, and worldly honor.—Dryden.

Our real blessings often appear to us in the shape of pains, losses and disappointments; but let us have patience, and we soon shall see them in their proper figures.—Addison.

There is no road too long to the man who advances deliberately and without undue haste; there are no honors too distant to the man who prepares himself for them with patience.—La Bruyère.

It is all men's office to speak patience to those that wring under the load of sorrow; but no man's virtue, nor sufficiency, to be so moral, when he shall endure the like himself.—Shakespeare.

Patience, my lord! why 't is the soul of peace:
Of all the virtues 't is the nearest kin to heaven;
It makes men look like gods: the best of men
That e'er wore earth about him, was a sufferer,
A soft, meek, patient, humble, tranquil spirit,
The first true gentleman that ever breath'd.
—Decker.

All that I have accomplished, or expect or hope to accomplish, has been and will be by that plodding, patient persevering process of accretion which builds the ant-heap, particle by particle, thought by thought, fact by fact.—Elihu Burritt.

We have only to be patient, to pray, and to do His will, according to our present light and strength, and the growth of the soul will go on. The plant grows in the mist and under clouds as truly as under sunshine; so does the heavenly principle within.—Channing.

Patience is the ballast of the soul, that will keep it from rolling and tumbling in the greatest storms; and he that will venture out without this to make him sail even and steady will certainly make shipwreck and drown himself, first in the cares and sorrows of this world, and then in perdition.—Bishop Hopkins.

There is no such thing as preaching patience into people unless the sermon is so long that they have to practice it while they hear. No man can learn patience except by going out into the hurly-burly world, and taking life just as it blows. Patience is but lying to and riding out the gale.—Beecher.

She never told her love,
But let concealment, like a worm i' the bud,
Feed on her damask cheek; she pin'd in thought,
And with a green and yellow melancholy
She sat like patience on a monument,
Smiling at grief. —Shakespeare.

Let nothing disturb thee,
Nothing affright thee;
All things are passing;
God never changeth;
Patient endurance
Attaineth to all things;
Who God possesseth
In nothing is wanting;
Alone God sufficeth. —Longfellow.

Not without design does God write the music of our lives. Be it ours to learn the time, and not be discouraged at the rests. If we say sadly to ourselves, "There is no music in a rest," let us not forget "there is the making of music in it." The making of music is often a slow and painful process in this life. How patiently

God works to teach us! How long He waits for us to learn the lesson!—John Ruskin.

Patience; accomplish thy labor; accomplish thy work of affection!
Sorrow and silence are strong, and patient endurance is godlike.
Therefore accomplish thy labor of love, till the heart is made godlike, Purified, strengthened, perfected, and rendered more worthy of heaven. —Longfellow.

Patience is the guardian of faith, the preserver of peace, the cherisher of love, the teacher of humility; patience, governs the flesh, strengthens the spirit, sweetens the temper, stifles anger, extinguishes envy, subdues pride; she bridles the tongue, refrains the hand, tramples upon temptation, endures persecutions, consummates martyrdom; patience produces unity in the church, loyalty in the state, harmony in families and societies; she comforts the poor and moderates the rich; she makes us humble in prosperity, cheerful in adversity, unmoved by calumny and reproach; she teaches us to forgive those who have injured us, and to be the first in asking forgiveness of those whom we have injured; she delights the faithful, and invites the unbelieving; she adorns the woman, and approves the man; is loved in a child, praised in a young man, admired in an old man; she is beautiful in either sex and every age. —Bishop Horne.

Patriotism

Our country is the common parent of all.—Cicero.

All true patriots will meet in heaven.—Charlotte Corday.

The noblest motive is the public good.—Virgil.

I am not a Virginian, but an American.—Patrick Henry.

Millions for defence, but not one cent for tribute.—Charles Cotesworth Pinckney.

I hope to find my country in the right; however, I will stand by her, right or wrong.—J. J. Crittenden.

Patriotism is the vital condition of national permanence.—George William Curtis.

Thank God, I—I also—am an American!—Daniel Webster.

How dear is fatherland to all noble hearts!—Voltaire.

One country, one constitution, one destiny.—Daniel Webster.

Who dare to love their country and be poor.—Pope.

No government is safe unless it is protected by the good will of the people.—Nepos.

"Shoot, if you must, this old gray head,
But spare your country's flag," she said.
—Whittier.

The union of hearts, the union of hands, and the flag of our Union forever.—G. P. Morris.

I was born an American; I live an American; I shall die an American!—Daniel Webster.

Such is the patriot's boast where'er we roam; his first, best country ever is his own.—Goldsmith.

Our country! In her intercourse with foreign nations may she always be in the right; but our country, right or wrong.—Stephen Decatur.

The love of country is more powerful than reason itself.—Ovid.

He serves his party best who serves the country best.—Rutherford B. Hayes.

If any one attempts to haul down the American flag, shoot him on the spot.—John A. Dix.

I only regret that I have but one life to lose for my country.—Nathan Hale.

That grounded maxim, so rife and celebrated in the mouths of wisest men, that to the public good private respects must yield.—Milton.

We join ourselves to no party that does not carry the flag and keep step to the music of the Union.—Rufus Choate.

We mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.—Thomas Jefferson.

The man who loves home best, and loves it most unselfishly, loves his country best.—J. G. Holland.

There are no points of the compass on the chart of true patriotism.—Robt. C. Winthrop.

My country is the world, and my religion is to do good.—Thos. Paine.

Our country is the world—our countrymen are all mankind.—William Lloyd Garrison.

One flag, one land, one heart, one hand,
One Nation evermore!
—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Patriotism knows neither latitude nor longitude. It is not climatic.—Emery A. Storrs.

To be a good patriot, a man must consider his countrymen as God's creatures, and himself as accountable for his acting towards them.—Bishop Berkeley.

Strike—for your altars and your fires;
Strike—for the green graves of your sires;
God, and your native land!
—Fitz-Greene Halleck.

It is sweet and glorious to die for one's country.—Horace.

I love my country's good, with a respect more tender, more holy and profound than my own life.—Shakespeare.

Had I a dozen sons, each in my love alike, * * * I had rather have eleven die nobly for their country than one voluptuously surfeit out of action.—Shakespeare.

Be just, and fear not: let all the ends thou aimest at be thy country's, thy God's, and truth's.—Shakespeare.

The proper means of increasing the love we bear our native country is to reside some time in a foreign one.—Shenstone.

Patriotism depends as much on mutual suffering as on mutual success; and it is by that experience of all fortunes and all feelings that a great national character is created.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

If I were an American, as I am an Englishman, while a foreign troop was landed in my country, I never would lay down my arms—never, never, never.—Earl of Chatham.

Patriotism is a blind and irrational impulse unless it is founded on a knowledge of the blessings we are called to secure and the privileges we propose to defend.—Robert Hall.

This nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth.—Abraham Lincoln.

And how can man die better Than facing fearful odds,
For the ashes of his fathers
And the temple of his gods?
—Macaulay.

How sleep the brave, who sink to rest,
By all their country's wishes blest!

By fairy hands their knell is rung,
By forms unseen their dirge is sung.
—Collins.

I have heard something said about allegiance to the south: I know no south, no north, no east, no west, to which I owe any allegiance.—Henry Clay.

In peace patriotism really consists only in this—that every one sweeps before his own door, minds his own business, also learns his own lesson, that it may be well with him in his own house.—Goethe.

This is a maxim which I have received by hereditary tradition, not only from my father, but also from my grandfather and his ancestors, that after what I owe to God, nothing should be more dear or more sacred than the love and respect I owe to my country.—De Thou.

The mystic chords of memory, stretching from every battlefield and patriot grave to every living heart and hearthstone all over this broad land, will yet swell the chorus of the Union, when again touched, as surely they will be, by the better angels of our nature.—Abraham Lincoln.

That is a true sentiment which makes us feel that we do not love our country less, but more, because we have laid up in our minds the knowledge of other lands and other institutions and other races, and have had enkindled afresh within us the instinct of a common humanity, and of the universal beneficence of the Creator.—Dean Stanley.

My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,—
Of thee I sing;
Land where my fathers died,
Land of the Pilgrim's pride,
From every mountain side
Let freedom ring.
—Sam'l F. Smith.

Our country, whether bounded by the St. John and the Sabine, or however otherwise bounded or described, and be the measurements more or less—still our country, to be cherished in all our hearts, to be defended by all our hands.—Robert C. Winthrop.

Love of country produces among men such examples as Cincinnatus, Alfred, Washington—pure, unselfish, symmetrical; among women, Vittoria Colonna, Madame Roland, Charlotte Corday, Jeanne Darc—romantic, devoted, marvelous.—Lamartine.

It should be the work of a genuine and noble patriotism to raise the life of the nation to the level of its privileges; to harmonize its general practice with its abstract principles; to reduce to actual facts the ideals of its institutions; to elevate instruction into knowledge; to deepen knowledge into wisdom; to render knowledge and wisdom complete in righteousness; and to make the love of country perfect in the love of man.—Henry Giles.

Let our object be our country, our whole country, and nothing but our country. And, by the blessing of God, may that country itself become a vast and splendid monument, not of oppression and terror, but of wisdom, of peace, and of liberty, upon which the world may gaze with admiration forever!—Daniel Webster.

He who loathes war, and will do everything in his power to avert it, but who will, in the last extremity, encounter its perils, from love of country and of home—who is willing to sacrifice himself and all that is dear to him in life, to promote the well-being of his fellow-man, will ever receive a worthy homage.—Abbott.

Hail, Columbia! happy land!
Hail, ye heroes! heaven born band!
Who fought and bled in freedom's cause,
Who fought and bled in freedom's cause,
And when the storm of war was gone,
Enjoyed the peace your valor won.
Let Independence be our boast,
Ever mindful what it cost;
Ever grateful for the prize,
Let its altar reach the skies!
—Joseph Hopkinson.

Peace

Let us have peace.—U. S. Grant.

Peace the offspring is of power.—Bayard Taylor.

Peace is the masterpiece of reason.—Johann Müller.

Peace is rarely denied to the peaceful.—Schiller.

Peace rules the day, where reason rules the mind.—Collins.

He makes a solitude and calls it peace!—Byron.

Still in thy right hand carry gentle peace.—Shakespeare.

Peace is the fairest form of happiness.—William Ellery Channing.

Peace hath her victories,
No less renowned than war.
—Milton.

As on the sea of Galilee the Christ is whispering "Peace!"—Whittier.

Where God is, all agree.—Vaughan.

First of human blessings! and supreme.—Thomson.

Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God.—Bible.

Let the bugles sound the truce of God to the whole world forever.—Charles Sumner.

Peace is liberty in tranquillity.—Cicero.

Thy peace shall be in much patience.—Thomas à Kempis.

Peace won by compromise is usually a short-lived achievement.—Winfield Scott.

To be prepared for war is one of the most effectual means of preserving peace.—Washington.

I have never advocated war, except as a means of peace.—U. S. Grant.

Peace, dear nurse of arts, plenties and joyful births.—Shakespeare.

Peace is the soft and holy shadow that virtue casts.—H. W. Shaw.

Even peace may be purchased at too high a price.—Franklin.

Peace is the happy, natural state of man; war his corruption, his disgrace.—Thomson.

A peace is of the nature of a conquest;
For then both parties nobly are subdued,
And neither party loser.
—Shakespeare.

Peace is the evening star of the soul, as virtue is its sun, and the two are never far apart.—Colton.

In her days, every man shall eat in safety,
Under his own vine, what he plants; and sing
The merry song of peace to all his neighbours.
—Shakespeare.

Blessedness is promised to the peacemaker, not to the conqueror.—Quarles.

All things that speak of heaven speak of peace.—Bailey.

Nothing can bring you peace but yourself. Nothing can bring you peace but the triumph of principles.—
Emerson.

Ah! when shall all men's good be each man's rule, and universal peace lie like a shaft of light across the land?
—Tennyson.

I am a man of peace. God knows how I love peace; but I hope I shall never be such a coward as to mistake oppression for peace.—Kossuth.

Peace gives food to the husband-man, even in the midst of rocks; war brings misery to him, even in the most fertile plains.—Menander.

People are always expecting to get peace in heaven; but you know whatever peace they get there will be ready-made. Whatever of making peace they can be blest for must be on the earth here.—Ruskin.

Peace, above all things, is to be desired, but blood must sometimes be spilled to obtain it on equable and lasting terms.—Andrew Jackson.

Now is the winter of our discontent
Made glorious summer by this sun of York;
And all the clouds that lower'd upon our house,
In the deep bosom of the ocean buried.
—Shakespeare.

We love peace, as we abhor pusillanimity; but not peace at any price.
There is a peace more destructive of the manhood of living man than war is destructive of his material body.
Chains are worse than bayonets.—
Douglas Jerrold.

The Pilgrim they laid in a large upper chamber, whose window opened toward the sun-rising; the name of the chamber was Peace, where he slept till break of day, and then he awoke and sang.—Bunyan.

You may assuredly find perfect peace, if you are resolved to do that which your Lord has plainly required —and content that He should indeed require no more of you—than to do justice, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with Him.—John Ruskin.

They shall beat their swords into plough-shares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.—Bible.

Five great enemies of peace inhabit with us—avarice, ambition, envy, anger, and pride; if these were to be banished, we should infallibly enjoy perpetual peace.—Petrarch.

Still in thy right hand carry gentle peace,
To silence envious tongues. Be just and fear not:
Let all the ends thou aim'st at be thy country's,
Thy God's, and truth's. —Shakespeare.

O Peace! thou source and soul of social life;
Beneath whose calm inspiring influence,
Science his views enlarges, Art refines,
And swelling Commerce opens all her
ports;
Blessed be the man divine, who gives us thee! —Thomson.

His helmet now shall make a hive for bees,
And lover's sonnets turn'd to holy psalms;
A man at arms must now serve on his knees,
And feed on prayers, which are his age's alms. —Geo. Peele.

Buried was the bloody hatchet;
Buried was the dreadful war-club;
Buried were all warlike weapons,
And the war-cry was forgotten.
Then was peace among the nations.
—Longfellow.

Peace is the proper result of the Christian temper. It is the great kindness which our religion doth us, that it brings us to a settledness of mind, and a consistency within ourselves.—Bishop Patrick.

With union grounded on falsehood and ordering us to speak and act lies,
we will not have anything to do.
Peace? A brutal lethargy is peaceable; the noisome grave is peaceable.

We hope for a living peace, not a dead one!—Carlyle.

There are interests by the sacrifice of which peace is too dearly purchased. One should never be at peace to the shame of his own soul—to the violation of his integrity or of his allegiance to God.—Chapin.

How different the peace of God from that of the world! It calms the passions, preserves the purity of conscience, is inseparable from righteousness, unites us to God and strengthens us against temptations. The peace of the soul consists in an absolute resignation to the will of God.—Fénelon.

The goodness of the heart is shown in deeds
Of peacefulness and kindness. Hand and heart
Are one thing with the good, as thou should'st be.
Do my words trouble thee? then treasure them,
Pain overgot gives peace, as death doth Heaven.
All things that speak of Heaven speak of peace. Bailey.

Oh first of human blessings! and supreme,
Fair peace! how lovely, how delightful thou!
By whose wide tie, the kindred sons of men
Live brothers like, in amity combin'd,
And unsuspicious faith; while honest toil
Gives every joy, and to those joys a right,
Which idle, barbarous rapine but usurps.
—Thomson.

Like the rainbow, peace rests upon the earth, but its arch is lost in heaven. Heaven bathes it in hues of light—it springs up amid tears and clouds—it is a reflection of the eternal sun—it is an assurance of calm—it is the sign of a great covenant between God and man—it is an emanation from the distant orb of immortal light.—Colton.

A time will come when the science of destruction shall bend before the arts of peace; when the genius which multiplies our powers, which creates new products, which diffuses comfort and happiness among the great mass of the people, shall occupy in the general estimation of mankind that rank which reason and common sense now assign to it.—Arago.

No peace was ever won from fate by subterfuge or argument; no peace is ever in store for any of us, but that which we shall win by victory over shame or sin—victory over the sin that oppresses, as well as over that which corrupts.—Ruskin.

Pedantry

Opinionated assurance. — Wendell Phillips.

With loads of learned lumber in his head.—Pope.

Deep-versed in books, and shallow in himself.—Milton.

A pedant is a precocious old man.—De Boufflers.

Pedantry is paraded knowledge.—H. W. Shaw.

Pedantry proceeds from much reading and little understanding.—Steele.

Pedants, who have the least knowledge to be proud of, are impelled most by vanity.—Wilkie Collins.

Folly disgusts us less by her ignorance than pedantry by her learning.—Colton.

Pedantry consists in the use of words unsuitable to the time, place, and company.—Coleridge.

The most annoying of all block-heads is a well-read fool.—Bayard Taylor.

The brains of a pedant, however full, are vacant.—Greville.

A pedant holds more to instruct us with what he knows, than of what we are ignorant.—J. Petit-Senn.

Pedants are men who would appear to be learned, without the necessary ingredient of knowledge.—Bancroft.

Pedantry in learning is like hypocrisy in religion—a form of knowledge without the power of it.—Addison.

Pedantry is the unseasonable ostentation of learning. It may be discovered either in the choice of a subject or in the manner of treating it.—Dr. Johnson.

Pedantry, in the common acceptation of the word, means an absurd ostentation of learning, and stiffness of phraseology, proceeding from a misguided knowledge of books and a total ignorance of men.—Mackenzie.

Pedantry and bigotry are mill-stones, able to sink the best book which carries the least part of their dead weight. The temper of the pedagogue suits not with the age; and the world, however it may be taught, will not be tutored.—Shaftesbury.

Pedantry prides herself on being wrong by rules; while common-sense is contented to be right, without them. The former would rather stumble in following the dead, than walk upright by the profane assistance of the living.—Colton.

Learning, like traveling and all other methods of improvement, as it finishes good sense, so it makes a silly man ten thousand times more insufferable by supplying variety of matter to his impertinence, and giving him an opportunity of abounding in absurdities.—Addison.

A well-read fool is the most pestilent of blockheads; his learning is a flail which he knows not how to handle, and with which he breaks his neighbor's shins as well as his own. Keep a fellow of this description at arm's length, as you value the integrity of your bones.—Stanislaus.

Pedigree

But even though you be sprung in direct line from Hercules, if you show a low-born meanness, that long succession of ancestors whom you disgrace are so many witnesses against you; and this grand display of their tarnished glory but serves to make your ignominy more evident.—Boileau.

Pen

The pen became a clarion.—Longfellow.

Pens carry further than rifled cannon.—Bayard Taylor.

The pen is the lever that moves the world.—Talmage.

The pen is the tongue of the mind.—Cervantes.

The chisel is the pen of the sculptor.—Pius IX.

Take away the sword;
States can be saved without it; bring the pen.
—Bulwer-Lytton.

I'll make thee famous by my pen,
And glorious by my sword.
—Montrose.

I had rather stand the shock of a basilisk than the fury of a merciless pen.—Sir T. Browne.

In days of yore, the poet's pen
From wing of bird was plunder'd,
Perhaps of goose, but now and then,
From Jove's own eagle sunder'd.
But now, metallic pens disclose
Alone the poet's numbers;
In iron inspiration glows,
Or with the poet slumbers.
—John Quincy Adams.

Oh! nature's noblest gift—my grey goose quill:
Slave of my thoughts, obedient to my will,
Torn from thy parent bird to form a pen,
That mighty instrument of little men!
—Byron.

Beneath the rule of men entirely great,
The pen is mightier than the sword. Behold
The arch enchanter's wand! itself a nothing!
But taking sorcery from the master hand,
To paralyze the Cæsars, and to strike
The loud earth breathless!
—Bulwer-Lytton.

No man was more foolish when he had not a pen in his hand (than Goldsmith), or more wise when he had.—Dr. Johnson.

The strokes of the pen need deliberation as much as those of the sword; need swiftness.—Julia Ward Howe.

The pen has shaken nations.—Tupper.

The poet's pen is the true divining rod Which trembles towards the inner founts of feeling;
Bringing to light and use, else hid from
all,
The many sweet clear sources which we have
Of good and beauty in our own deep bosoms;
And marks the variations of all mind
As does the needle. —Bailey.

The pen is a formidable weapon; but a man can kill himself with it a great deal more easily than he can other people.—G. D. Prentice.

Penetration

Penetration has an air of divination;
it pleases our vanity more than any other quality of the mind.—Roche-
foucauld.

Penetration seems a kind of inspiration:
it gives one an idea of prophecy.
—Lord Greville.

Penitence

He who is penitent is almost innocent.—Seneca.

Christian penitence is something more than a thought or an emotion or a tear; it is action.—William Adams.

It would tire the hands of an angel to write down all the pardons God bestows upon true, penitent believers.
—Joshua Bates.

Know what your sin is and confess it; but do not imagine that you have approved yourself a penitent by confessing sin in the abstract.—T. L. Cuyler.

If we do not know what the sorrow of penitence is, we have been living only on the surface of life—unmindful of its deep realities, unconscious of its grandeur glories.—F. D. Huntington.

The law can never save us; and he is nearest to the forgiveness of the gospel who, with a contrite heart, discerns most clearly and feels most profoundly that perfection of the Divine statute which impeaches and condemns him.—William Adams.

People

The character of the common people changes in a single day.—Voltaire.

The will of the people is the best law.—U. S. Grant.

The people are the only sovereigns of any country.—R. D. Owen.

The vulgar and the many are fit only to be led or driven.—South.

The second, sober thought of the people is seldom wrong, and always efficient.—Martin Van Buren.

By gaining the people, the kingdom is gained; by losing the people, the kingdom is lost.—Confucius.

No party should fear to go before the people for their decision.—Robert Yates.

Orators inflame the people, whose anger is really but a short fit of madness.—Swift.

And what the people but a herd confus'd,
A miscellaneous rabble, who extol Things vulgar, and, well weigh'd, scarce worth the praise?

They praise, and they admire, they know not what,
And know not whom, but as one leads the other;
And what delight to be by such extoll'd.
To live upon their tongues, and be their talk,
Of whom to be disprais'd were no small praise? —Milton.

Perception

The more sand has escaped from the hour-glass of our life, the clearer we should see through it.—Richter.

Minds that have nothing to confer
Find little to perceive. —Wordsworth.

All papas and mammas have exactly that sort of sight which distinguishes objects at a distance clearly, while they need spectacles to see those under their very noses.—Ruffini.

Make a point never so clear, it is great odds that a man whose habits and the bent of whose mind lie a contrary way, shall be unable to comprehend it. So weak a thing is reason in competition with inclination.—Bishop Berkeley.

Perfection

All perfection is melancholy.—Mrs. Oliphant.

I have seen an end of all perfection.—Bible.

God never made His work for man to mend.—Dryden.

Woman is most perfect when most womanly.—Gladstone.

The very pink of perfection.—Goldsmith.

Even women are perfect at the outset.—Rochefoucauld.

Earth's noblest thing—a woman perfected.—Lowell.

There are many lovely women, but no perfect ones.—Victor Hugo.

Whoever thinks a perfect work to see, thinks what ne'er was, nor is, nor e'er shall be.—Pope.

Many things impossible to thought have been by need to full perfection brought.—Dryden.

There are no perfect women in the world; only hypocrites exhibit no defects.—Ninon de Lenclos.

Faultily faultless, icily regular, splendidly null, dead perfection; no more.—Tennyson.

Were she perfect, one would admire her more, but love her less.—Grattan.

Trifles make perfection; but perfection is no trifle.—Michael Angelo.

Thou hast no faults, or I no faults can spy;

Thou art all beauty, or all blindness I.
—Christopher Codrington.

It is reasonable to have perfection in our eye, that we may always advance towards it, though we know it can never be reached.—Dr. Johnson.

Let no man measure by a scale of perfection the meager product of reality in this poor world of ours.—Schiller.

The divine nature is perfection; and to be nearest to the divine nature is to be nearest to perfection.—Xenophon.

If a man should happen to reach perfection in this world, he would have to die immediately to enjoy himself.—H. W. Shaw.

The maxims tell you to aim at perfection, which is well; but it's unattainable, all the same.—Bayard Taylor.

Perfection is attained by slow degrees; she requires the hand of time.—Voltaire.

Perfection does not exist. To understand it is the triumph of human intelligence; to desire to possess it is the most dangerous kind of madness.—Alfred de Musset.

In this broad earth of ours, Amid the measureless grossness and the slag,
Enclosed and safe within its central heart,
Nestles the seed perfection.
—Walt Whitman.

What's come to perfection perishes,
Things learned on earth we shall practise
in heaven;
Works done least rapidly Art most cherishes.
—Robert Browning.

To gild refined gold, to paint the lily, to throw a perfume on the violet, to smooth the ice, or add another hue unto the rainbow, or with taper-light to seek the beauteous eye of heaven to garnish, is wasteful and ridiculous excess.—Shakespeare.

He who boasts of being perfect is perfect in folly. I never saw a perfect man. Every rose has its thorns, and every day its night. Even the sun shows spots, and the skies are darkened with clouds; and faults of some kind nestle in every bosom.—Spurgeon.

Aim at perfection in everything, though in most things it is unattainable.

able; however, they who aim at it, and persevere, will come much nearer to it than those whose laziness and despondency make them give it up as unattainable.—Chesterfield.

Perjury

At lovers' perjuries,
They say, Jove laughs. —Shakespeare.

Shall I lay perjury upon my soul?
No, not for Venice!—Shakespeare.

And hast thou sworn on every slight pretence,
Till perjuries are common as bad pence,
While thousands, careless of the damning sin,
Kiss the book's outside, who ne'er look within?
—Cowper.

Fear not to swear; the winds carry the perjuries of lovers without effect over land and sea, thanks to Jupiter. The father of the gods himself has denied effect to what foolish lovers in their eagerness have sworn.—Tibullus.

Persecution

Persecution is not wrong because it is cruel; but it is cruel because it is wrong.—Whately.

A religion which requires persecution to sustain it is of the devil's propagation.—Hosea Ballou.

Christianity has made martyrdom sublime, and sorrow triumphant.—Chapin.

The way of this world is, to praise dead saints, and persecute living ones.—Rev. N. Howe.

Whoever is right, the persecutor must be wrong.—William Penn.

A desire to resist persecution is implanted in the nature of man.—Tacitus.

The history of persecution is a history of endeavor to cheat nature, to make water run up hill, to twist a rope of sand.—Emerson.

Persecution to persons in a high rank stands them in the stead of eminent virtue.—Cardinal de Retz.

Persecution is disobeying the most solemn injunction of Christianity, under the sham plea of upholding it.—Chatfield.

Wherever you see persecution, there is more than a probability that truth lies on the persecuted side.—Latimer.

Galileo probably would have escaped persecution if his discoveries could have been disproved.—Whately.

It is an inherent and inseparable inconvenience in persecution that it knows not where to stop.—Robert Hall.

Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.—Bible.

Persecution often does in this life what the last day will do completely—separate the wheat from the tares.—Milner.

The oppression of any people for opinion's sake has rarely had any other effect than to fix those opinions deeper, and render them more important.—Hosea Ballou.

There are only two things in which the false professors of all religions have agreed—to persecute all other sects and to plunder their own.—Colton.

It is iniquitous, unjust, and most impolitic to persecute for religion's sake. It is against natural religion, revealed religion, and sound policy.—Chief Justice Mansfield.

It has become a settled principle that nothing which is good and true can be destroyed by persecution, but that the effect ultimately is to establish more firmly, and to spread more widely, that which it was designed to overthrow. It has long since passed into a proverb that "the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church."—Albert Barnes.

In that disputable point of persecuting men for conscience sake, I see such dreadful consequences rising. I would be as fully convinced of the truth of it.

as a mathematical demonstration, before I would venture to act upon it or make it a part of my religion.—Addison.

Perseverance

Perseverance is king.—H. W. Shaw.

Perseverance is irresistible.—Sertorius.

Victory belongs to the most persevering.—Napoleon.

Press on! a better fate awaits thee.—Victor Hugo.

Hope against hope, and ask till ye receive.—Montgomery.

Every noble work is at first impossible.—Carlyle.

Whoever perseveres will be crowned.—Herder.

A falling drop at last will carve a stone.—Lucretius.

Much rain wears the marble.—Shakespeare.

The virtue lies in the struggle, not the prize.—R. M. Milnes.

Perseverance and audacity generally win.—Madame Deluzy.

Hard pounding, gentlemen; but we will see who can pound the longest.—Wellington at Waterloo.

No rock so hard but that a little wave may beat admission in a thousand years.—Tennyson.

Nothing is so hard but search will find it out.—Herrick.

Few things are impossible to diligence and skill.—Johnson.

Great works are performed not by strength but by perseverance.—Johnson.

All the great captains have performed vast achievements by conforming with the rules of art—by adjusting efforts to obstacles.—Napoleon I.

By gnawing through a dyke even a rat may drown a nation.—Edward Burke.

He that shall endure unto the end the same shall be saved.—Bible.

Do not, for one repulse, forego the purpose
That you resolv'd to effect.
—Shakespeare.

Those who would attain to any marked degree of excellence in a chosen pursuit must work, and work hard for it, prince or peasant.—Bayard Taylor.

Even in social life, it is persistency which attracts confidence, more than talents and accomplishments.—Whipple.

Perpetual pushing and assurance put a difficulty out of countenance, and make a seeming impossibility give way.—Jeremy Collier.

Great effects come of industry and perseverance; for audacity doth almost bind and mate the weaker sort of minds.—Bacon.

There is no creature so contemptible but by resolution may gain his point.—L'Estrange.

Perseverance and tact are the two great qualities most valuable for all men who would mount, but especially for those who have to step out of the crowd.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

There is no royal road to anything. One thing at a time, all things in succession. That which grows fast withers as rapidly; that which grows slowly endures.—J. G. Holland.

The nerve that never relaxes, the eye that never blanches, the thought that never wanders—these are the masters of victory.—Burke.

Few things are impracticable in themselves; and it is for want of application, rather than of means, that men fail of success.—Rochefoucauld.

Yet I argue not against heaven's hand or will, nor bate a jot of heart or hope, but still bear up and steer right onward.—Milton.

The block of granite, which was an obstacle in the pathway of the weak, becomes a stepping-stone in the pathway of the strong.—Carlyle.

If there be one thing on earth which is truly admirable, it is to see God's wisdom blessing an inferiority of natural powers, where they have been honestly, truly, and zealously cultivated.—Dr. Arnold.

I hold a doctrine, to which I owe not much, indeed, but all the little I ever had, namely, that with ordinary talent and extraordinary perseverance, all things are attainable.—Sir T. F. Buxton.

The practice of perseverance is the discipline of the noblest virtues. To run well, we must run to the end. It is not the fighting but the conquering that gives a hero his title to renown.—E. L. Magoon.

I'm proof against that word "failure." I've seen behind it. The only failure a man ought to fear is failure in cleaving to the purpose he sees to be best.—George Eliot.

Perseverance, dear my lord,
Keeps honour bright: to have done is to hang Quite out of fashion, like a rusty mail
In monumental mockery.
—Shakespeare.

The man who consecrates his hours
By vig'rous effort, and an honest aim,
At once he draws the sting of life and death;
He walks with nature; and her paths are peace.
—Young.

Want of perseverance is the great fault of women in everything—morals, attention to health, friendship, and so on. It cannot be too often repeated that women never reach the end of anything through want of perseverance.—Mme. Necker.

The conditions of conquest are always easy. We have but to toil awhile, endure awhile, believe always, and never turn back.—Simms.

There are two ways of attaining an important end—force and perseverance. Force falls to the lot only of the privileged few, but austere and sustained perseverance can be practiced by the most insignificant. Its silent power grows irresistible with time.—Madame Swetchine.

It is interesting to notice how some minds seem almost to create themselves, springing up under every disadvantage, and working their solitary but irresistible way through a thousand obstacles.—Washington Irving.

Great works are performed, not by strength, but by perseverance. Yonder palace was raised by single stones, yet you see its height and spaciousness. He that shall walk with vigor three hours a day will pass in seven years a space equal to the circumference of the globe.—Johnson.

Stick to your aim; the mongrel's hold will slip,
But only crow-bars loose the bull-dog's lip;
Small as he looks, the jaw that never yields,
Drags down the bellowing monarch of the fields.
—O. W. Holmes.

Life affords no higher pleasure than that of surmounting difficulties, passing from one step of success to another, forming new wishes and seeing them gratified. He that labors in any great or laudable undertaking has his fatigues first supported by hope and afterwards rewarded by joy.—Dr. Johnson.

Did you ever hear of a man who had striven all his life faithfully and singly towards an object, and in no measure obtained it? If a man constantly aspires, is he not elevated? Did ever a man try heroism, magnanimity, truth, sincerity, and find that there was no advantage in them—that it was a vain endeavor?—Thoreau.

It is all very well to tell me that a young man has distinguished himself by a brilliant first speech. He may go on, or he may be satisfied with his first triumph; but show me a young man who has not succeeded at first, and nevertheless has gone on, and I will back that young man to do better than most of those who have succeeded at the first trial.—Charles James Fox.

All the performances of human art, at which we look with praise or wonder, are instances of the resistless force of perseverance; it is by this that the quarry becomes a pyramid, and that distant countries are united by canals. If a man was to compare the effect of a single stroke of a pickaxe, or of one impression of the spade, with the general design and last result, he would be overwhelmed with the sense of their disproportion; yet those petty operations, incessantly continued, in time surmount the greatest difficulties, and mountains are leveled and oceans bounded, by the slender force of human beings.—Dr. Johnson.

Personality

Inanimate objects sometimes appear endowed with a strange power of sight. A statue notices, a tower watches, the face of an edifice contemplates.—Victor Hugo.

Personality is that which is most intimate to me—that by which I must act out my life. It is that by which I belong to man, that by which I am able to reach after God; and He has given to me this pearl of great price. It is an immortal treasure; it is mine, it is His, and no man shall pluck it out of His hand.—Hugh R. Haweis.

Persuasion

Persuasion tips his tongue whene'er he talks.—Colley Cibber.

Few are open to conviction, but the majority of men are open to persuasion.—Goethe.

Persuasive speech, and more persuasive sighs,
Silence that spoke, and eloquence of eyes.
—Homer.

Yet hold it more humane, more heav'nly,
first,
By winning words to conquer willing hearts,
And make persuasion do the work of fear.
—Milton.

He, from whose lips divine persuasion flows.—Homer.

It is only for those to employ force who possess strength without judgment; but the well advised will have recourse to other means. Besides, he who pretends to carry his point by force hath need of many associates; but the man who can persuade knows that he is himself sufficient for the purpose; neither can such a one be supposed forward to shed blood; for, who is there would choose to destroy a fellow citizen rather than make a friend of him by mildness and persuasion?—Xenophon.

Perverseness

To so perverse a sex all grace is vain.—Dryden.

Perverseness is your whole defence.—Swift.

The perverseness of my fate is such that he's not mine because he's mine too much.—Dryden.

We have all a propensity to grasp at forbidden fruit.—Cudworth.

Virtue hath some perverseness, for she will neither believe her good nor other's ill.—Donne.

Opposition always inflames the enthusiast, never converts him.—Schiller.

Best friends might loathe us, if what things perverse we know of our own selves they also knew.—Trench.

Some men, like spaniels, will only fawn the more when repulsed, but will pay little heed to a friendly caress.—Abd-el-Kader.

When once a man is determined to believe, the very absurdity of the doctrine confirms him in his faith.—Junius.

Perverseness is one of the primitive impulses of the human heart—one of the indivisible, primary faculties or sentiments which give direction to man.—Edgar A. Poe.

For so remarkably perverse is the nature of man that he despises whoever courts him, and admires whoever will not bend before him.—Thucydides.

The strength of the donkey mind lies in adopting a course inversely as the arguments urged, which, well considered, requires as great a mental force as the direct sequence.—George Eliot.

Philanthropy

When we see a special reformer we feel like asking him, What right have you, sir, to your own virtue? Is virtue piecemeal?—Emerson.

I never knew a trader in philanthropy who was not wrong in his head or heart somewhere or other.—Coleridge.

There are philanthropists who, incapable of managing their own little affairs, take upon themselves those of the whole world; but as their creditors always outnumber their disciples, they owe humanity more than she will ever owe them.—J. Petit-Senn.

There was a time when I believed in the persuadability of man, and had the mania of man-mending. Experience has taught me better. The ablest physician can do little in the great lazar-house of society. He acts the wisest part who retires from the contagion.—Southey.

Philosophy

Queen of arts, and daughter of heaven.—Burke.

Philosophy is nothing but discretion.—John Selden.

Adversity's sweet milk, philosophy.—Shakespeare.

Philosophy is the health of the mind.—Seneca.

Philosophy is the art of living.—Plutarch.

To scorn philosophy is truly to philosophize.—Pascal.

A true philosopher is beyond the reach of fortune.—Landor.

Philosophy is reason with the eyes of the soul.—Simms.

The business of philosophy is to circumnavigate human nature.—Hare.

To study philosophy is nothing but to prepare one's self to die.—Cicero.

This same philosophy is a good horse in the stable, but an arrant jade on a journey.—Goldsmith.

What is philosophy? It is something that lightens up, that makes bright.—Victor Cousin.

All philosophy lies in two words, "sustain" and "abstain."—Epictetus.

Philosophy is as far separated from impiety as religion is from fanaticism.—Diderot.

Philosophy, if rightly defined, is naught but the love of wisdom.—Cicero.

All that philosophy can teach is to be stubborn or sullen under misfortunes.—Goldsmith.

The philosophy of one century is the common sense of the next.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Philosophy abounds more than philosophers, and learning more than learned men.—W. B. Clulow.

Philosophy, while it soothes the reason, damps the ambition.—Bulwer-Lytton.

A little philosophy inclineth a man's mind to atheism, but depth in philosophy bringeth men's minds about to religion.—Bacon.

If I wished to punish a province, I would have it governed by philosophers.—Frederick the Great.

The Christian religion, rightly understood, is the deepest and choicest price of philosophy.—Sir Thomas Moore.

Whence? whither? why? how?—these questions cover all philosophy.—Joubert.

There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamt of in your philosophy.—Shakespeare.

Philosophy is the rational expression of genius.—Lamartine.

Philosophy triumphs easily over past evils and future evils, but present evils triumph over it.—La Rochefoucauld.

Philosophy goes no further than probabilities, and in every assertion keeps doubt in reserve.—Froude.

Religion is the eldest sister of philosophy: on whatever subjects they may differ, it is unbecoming in either to quarrel, and most so about their inheritance.—Landor.

Philosophy consists not in airy schemes or idle speculations: the rule and conduct of all social life is her great province.—Thomson.

Philosophy is the art and law of life, and it teaches us what to do in all cases, and, like good marksmen, to hit the white at any distance.—Seneca.

The discovery of what is true and the practice of that which is good are the two most important objects of philosophy.—Voltaire.

Philosophy, when superficially studied, excites doubt: when thoroughly explored, it dispels it.—Bacon.

How charming is divine philosophy! not harsh nor crabbed, as dull fools suppose, but musical as is Apollo's lute!—Milton.

The philosopher is he to whom the highest has descended, and the lowest has mounted up; who is the equal and kindly brother of all.—Carlyle.

To be a husbandman is but a retreat from the city; to be a philosopher, from the world; or rather a retreat from the world, as it is man's, into the world, as it is God's.—Cowley.

Philosophy alone makes the mind invincible, and places us out of the reach of fortune, so that all her arrows fall short of us.—Seneca.

Philosophy is a goddess, whose head indeed is in heaven, but whose feet are upon earth; she attempts more than she accomplishes, and promises more than she performs.—Colton.

Divine Philosophy! by whose pure light
We first distinguish, then pursue the right;
Thy power the breast from every error frees,
And weeds out all its vices by degrees.
—Gifford.

A pipe is a pocket philosopher,—a truer one than Socrates, for it never asks questions. Socrates must have been very tiresome, when one thinks of it.—Ouida.

There was never yet philosopher that could endure the toothache patiently, however they have writ the style of gods, and made a push at chance and sufferance.—Shakespeare.

True philosophy is that which renders us to ourselves, and all others who surround us, better, and at the same time more content, more patient, more calm, and more ready for all decent and pure enjoyment.—Lavater.

The road to true philosophy is precisely the same with that which leads to true religion; and from both the one and the other, unless we would enter in as little children, we must expect to be totally excluded.—Bacon.

Sublime Philosophy!
Thou art the patriarch's ladder, reaching heaven,
And bright with beckoning angels; but, alas!
We see thee, like the patriarch, but in dreams,
By the first step, dull slumbering on the earth.
—Bulwer-Lytton.

Tutored by thee, hence Poetry exalts
Her voice to ages; and informs the page
With music, image, sentiment, and thought,
Never to die! the treasure of mankind!
Their highest honor, and their truest joy!
Without thee, what were unenlighten'd Man?
—Thomson.

Philosophy is a proud, sullen detector of the poverty and misery of man. It may turn him from the world with a proud, sturdy contempt; but it cannot come forward and say, here are rest, grace, pardon, peace, strength, and consolation.—Cecil.

Philosophy is a bully that talks very loud when the danger is at a distance; but the moment she is hard pressed by the enemy she is not to be found at her post, but leaves the brunt of the battle to be borne by her humbler but steadier comrade, Religion.—Colton.

Make philosophy thy journey, theology thy journey's end: philosophy is a pleasant way, but dangerous to him that either tires or retires; in this journey it is safe neither to loiter nor to rest, till thou hast attained thy journey's end; he that sits down a philosopher rises up an atheist.—Quarles.

Philosophical studies are beset by one peril, a person easily brings himself to think that he thinks; and a smattering of science encourages conceit. He is above his companions. A hieroglyphic is a spell. The gnostic dogma is cuneiform writing to the million. Moreover, the vain man is generally a doubter. It is Newton who sees himself in a child on the sea shore, and his discoveries in the colored shells.—Willmott.

Phrenology

'Tis strange how like a very dunce,
Man, with his bumps upon his scone,
Has lived so long, and yet no knowledge
he
Has had, till lately, of Phrenology—
A science that by simple dint of Head-combing he should find a hint of,
When scratching o'er those little pole-hills
The faculties throw up like mole hills.
—Hood.

Physic — Physician

Throw physic to the dogs, I'll none of it.—Shakespeare.

Time is generally the best doctor.
—Ovid.

A wise physician, skill'd our wounds to heal,
Is more than armies to the public weal.
—Pope.

Physician, heal thyself.—Bible.

The purse of the patient often protracts his case.—Zimmermann.

Joy, and Temperance, and Repose,
Slam the door on the doctor's nose.
—Longfellow.

A man who pours drugs of which he knows little into a body of which he knows less.—Voltaire.

We have not only multiplied diseases, but we have made them more fatal.—Rush.

Physic, for the most part, is nothing else but the substitute of exercise or temperance.—Addison.

Though fancy may be the patient's complaint, necessity is often the doctor's.—Zimmermann.

Physicians are the cobblers, rather the botchers, of men's bodies; as the one patches our tattered clothes, so the other solders our diseased flesh.—John Ford.

Physicians, of all men, are most happy; whatever good success soever they have the world proclaimeth, and what faults they commit the earth covereth.—Quarles.

They have no other doctor but sun and the fresh air, and that such an one as never sends them to the apothecary.—South.

A republic of philosophers, such as speculative men are fond of forming in imagination, but which was never known.—Livius.

Guy Patin recommends to a patient to have no doctor but a horse, and no apothecary but an ass!—Chesterfield.

In the actual condition of medical science, the physician mostly plays but the part of simple spectator of the sad episodes which his profession furnishes him.—Magendie.

I think you might dispense with half your doctors, if you would only consult Doctor Sun more, and be more under the treatment of these great hydropathic doctors, the clouds!

—Beecher.

Some persons will tell you, with an air of the miraculous, that they recovered although they were given over; whereas they might with more reason have said, they recovered because they were given over.—Colton.

I do remember an apothecary,— And hereabouts he dwells,—whom late I noted
In tatter'd weeds, with overwhelming
brows,
Culling of simples; meagre were his looks,
Sharp misery had worn him to the bones.
—Shakespeare.

Nothing is more estimable than a physician who, having a studied nature from his youth, knows the properties of the human body, the diseases which assail it, the remedies which will benefit it, exercises his art with caution, and pays equal attention to the rich and the poor.—Voltaire.

Physiognomy

Nature never writes a blind hand.—
T. Starr King.

There is a certain physiognomy in manners.—Joseph Cook.

Trust not too much to an enchanting face.—Virgil.

There is no art whereby to find the mind's construction in the face.—
Shakespeare.

There is nothing truer than physiognomy, taken in connection with manner.—Dickens.

The scope of an intellect is not to be measured by inches in a man's face.—
Benjamin West.

Physiognomy is often a great falsifier, though as a rule it is honest enough.—Joaquin Miller.

A wise man will find us to be rogues by our faces.—Swift.

What knowledge is there of which man is capable that is not founded on the exterior,—the relation that exists between visible and invisible, the perceptible and the imperceptible?—

Lavater.

We are all of us more or less active physiognomists.—Thoreau.

What is love at first sight but a proof of the powerful but silent language of physiognomy.—Mary Clemmer.

The language of the face is not taught by the schools; it is intuitive, and to the observant is always legible.—Julia Ward Howe.

The unsuitableness of one man's aspect to another man's fancy has raised such aversion as has produced a perfect hatred of him.—South.

The tongue is more easily controlled than the features of the face; and though the heart may be secret, the face is transparent.—Helen Hunt.

Children are marvellously and intuitively correct physiognomists. The youngest of them exhibit this trait.—
Bartol.

The scope of an intellect is not to be measured with a tape-string, or a character deciphered from the shape or length of a nose.—Bovee.

As the language of the face is universal, so 'tis very comprehensive: no laconism can reach it; 'tis the shorthand of the mind, and crowds a great deal in a little room.—Jeremy Collier.

Spite of Lavater, faces are oftentimes great lies. They are the paper money of society, for which on demand, there frequently proves to be no gold in the human coffer.—F. G. Trafford.

These flattering mirrors reflect imperfectly what is within; the countenance is often a gay deceiver. What defects of mind lie hidden under its beauty! What fair exteriors conceal base souls!—Corneille.

The distinguishing characters of the face and the lineaments of the body grow more plain and visible with time and age; but the peculiar physiognomy of the mind is most discernible in children.—Locke.

Every passion gives a particular cast to the countenance, and is apt to discover itself in some feature or other. I have seen an eye curse for half an hour together, and an eyebrow call a man a scoundrel.—Addison.

Alas! how few of nature's faces there are to gladden us with their beauty! The cares and sorrows and hungerings of the world change them as they change hearts; and it is only when these passions sleep and have lost their hold forever that the troubled clouds pass off, and leave heaven's surface clear.—Dickens.

It is believed that physiognomy is only a simple development of the features already marked out by nature. It is my opinion, however, that in addition to this development, the features come insensibly to be formed and assume their shape from the frequent and habitual expression of certain affections of the soul. These affections are marked on the countenance: nothing is more certain than this; and when they turn into habits, they must leave on it durable impressions.—Rousseau.

Pictures (See Paintings)

The beauty of the picture is an abiding concrete of the painter's vision.—Hartley Coleridge.

All really great pictures exhibit the general habits of nature, manifested in some peculiar, rare, and beautiful way.—Ruskin.

Whosoever loves not picture is injurious to truth, and all the wisdom of poetry. Picture is the invention of heaven, the most ancient and most akin to nature. It is itself a silent work, and always one and the same habit.—Ben Jonson.

No picture can be good which deceives by its imitation, for the very reason that nothing can be beautiful which is not true.—Ruskin.

Piety

Piety softens all that courage bears.—Mme. Swetchine.

Let us learn upon earth those things which can call us to heaven.—St. Jerome.

Earth has nothing more tender than a woman's heart when it is the abode of piety.—Luther.

Our piety must be weak and imperfect if it do not conquer our fear of death.—Fénelon.

Christian piety annihilates the egotism of the heart; worldly politeness veils and represses it.—Pascal.

We must labor unceasingly to render our piety reasonable, and our reason pious.—Madame Swetchine.

The affectation of sanctity is a blotch on the face of piety.—Lavater.

Let us carry only in this life that perfection which we have given to our soul.—Orfila.

Reverence the highest; have patience with the lowest. Let this day's performance of the meanest duty be thy religion.—Margaret Fuller Ossoli.

Piety and virtue are not only delightful for the present, but they leave peace and contentment behind them.—Tillotson.

Piety does not mean that a man should make a sour face about things, and refuse to enjoy in moderation what his Maker has given.—Carlyle.

We may learn by practice such things upon earth as shall be of use to us in heaven. Piety, unostentatious piety, is never out of place.—Chapin.

True piety hath in it nothing weak, nothing sad, nothing constrained. It enlarges the heart; it is simple, free, and attractive.—Fénelon.

Let it not be imagined that the life of a good Christian must necessarily be a life of melancholy and gloom.

ness; for he only resigns some pleasures, to enjoy others infinitely greater.—Pascal.

A good man regards the root; he fixes the root, and all else flows out of it. The root is filial piety; the fruit brotherly love.—Confucius.

Piety is the necessary Christian virtue proportioned adequately to the omniscience and spirituality of that Infinite Deity.—Hammond.

Among the many strange servilities mistaken for piety, one of the least lovely is that which hopes to flatter God by despising the world and villifying human nature.—G. H. Lewes.

John Wesley quaintly observed that the road to heaven is a narrow path, not intended for wheels, and that to ride in a coach here and to go to heaven hereafter, was a happiness too much for man.—Beecher.

I do not doubt but that genuine piety is the spring of peace of mind; it enables us to bear the sorrows of life, and lessens the pangs of death: the same cannot be said of hypocrisy.—Bruyère.

In theory, piety is reverence and love for God; and in practice, it is the exercise of all our powers in obedience to the Divine will. Combining the theory and practice, we have the richest treasure known on earth—love for God shown in obedience to God.—D. W. Gates.

Piety is not an end, but a means of attaining the highest degree of culture by perfect peace of mind. Hence it is to be observed that those who make piety an end and aim in itself for the most part become hypocrites.—Goethe.

It is impossible for the mind which is not totally destitute of piety, to behold the sublime, the awful, the amazing works of creation and providence; the heavens with their luminaries; the mountains, the ocean, the storm, the earthquake, and the volcano: the circuit of the seasons and the revolutions of empires; without marking in them all the mighty hand of God, and feeling strong emotions of reverence toward the Author of these stupendous works.—Dwight.

Piety is indifferent whether she enters at the eye or at the ear. There is none of the senses at which she does not knock one day or other. The Puritans forgot this, and thrust Beauty out of the meeting-house and slammed the door in her face.—Lowell.

Piety is the only proper and adequate relief of decaying man. He that grows old without religious hopes, as he declines into imbecility, and feels pains and sorrows incessantly crowding upon him, falls into a gulf of bottomless misery, in which every reflection must plunge him deeper and deeper.—Johnson.

Piety raises and fortifies the mind for trying occasions and painful events. When our country is threatened by dangers and pressed by difficulties who are the best bulwarks of its defence? Not the sons of dissipation and folly, not the smooth-tongued sycophants of a court, nor sceptics and blasphemers, from the school of infidelity; but the man whose moral conduct is animated and sustained by the doctrines and consolations of religion. Happiness is that country where patriotism is sustained and sanctified by piety; where authority respects and guards freedom, and freedom reveres and loves legitimate authority; where truth and mercy meet together, righteousness and peace embrace each other.—Ton.

We are surrounded by motives to piety and devotion, if we would but mind them. The poor are designed to excite our liberality; the miserable, our pity; the sick, our assistance; the ignorant, our instruction; those that are fallen, our helping hand. In those who are vain, we see the vanity of the world; in those who are wicked, our own frailty. When we see good men rewarded, it confirms our hope; and when evil men are punished, it excites our fear.—Bishop Wilson.

Pines

The pine is the mother of legends.—
Lowell.

Shaggy shade
Of desert-loving pine, whose emerald scalp
Nods to the storm. —Byron.

'Twas on the inner bark, stripped from the pine,

Our father pencilled this epistle rare;
Two blazing pine knots did his torches
shine,

Two braided pallets formed his desk and chair. —Durfee.

Like two cathedral towers these stately
pines

Uplift their fretted summits tipped with cones;

The arch beneath them is not built with stones,

Not Art but Nature traced these lovely lines,

And carved this graceful arabesque of vines;

No organ but the wind here sighs
and moans,

No sepulchre conceals a martyr's
bones,

No marble bishop on his tomb reclines.
Enter! the pavement, carpeted with leaves, Gives back a softened echo to thy tread!

Listen! the choir is singing; all the birds,

In leafy galleries beneath the eaves,
Are singing! listen, ere the sound
be fled,

And learn there may be worship without words. Longfellow.—

Pity

Pity is akin to love.—Southern.

Be pitiful, be courteous.—Bible.

Pity is love in undress.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

Pity is love when grown into excess.
—Sir R. Howard.

Pity melts the mind to love.—Dryden.

Pity, the tenderest part of love.—
Yalden.

Man may dismiss compassion from his heart, but God will never.—Cowper.

Pity enlarges the heart.—Fénelon.

Pity best taught by fellowship of woe.—Coleridge.

The unfortunate do not pity the unfortunate.—H. W. Shaw.

No beast so fierce but knows some touch of pity.—Shakespeare.

Fire drives out fire; so pity, pity.—
Shakespeare.

Pity and friendship seek different habitations.—Helen Hunt.

Almost all women have hearts full of pity.—Thackeray.

Pity is woman's sweetest charm.—
Balzac.

He best can pity who has felt the woe.—Gay.

Pity's tears are spontaneous.—Anna
Cora Mowatt.

A woman's pity sometimes makes her mad.—Mrs. Browning.

It is easy to condemn; it is better to pity.—Abbott.

He scorned his own, who felt another's woe.—Campbell.

Pity is not natural to man. Children are always cruel; savages are always cruel.—Dr. Johnson.

Of all the paths that lead to a woman's heart, pity is the straightest.—
Beaumont.

We pity in others only those evils which we have ourselves experienced.
—Rousseau.

O, brother man! fold to thy heart thy brother, where pity dwells, the peace of God is there.—Whittier.

He hath a tear for pity, and a hand open as day for melting charity!—
Shakespeare.

More helpful than all wisdom is one draught of simple human pity, that will not forsake us.—George Eliot.

Pity swells the tide of love.—Young.

Pity makes the world soft to the weak, and noble for the strong.—Edwin Arnold.

Alas! poor human nature, pity, if hard pressed, degenerates into contempt.—J. G. Saxe.

To him that is afflicted, pity should be shewed from his friends.—Bible.

Pity is not enough better than indifference to benefit materially either agent or recipient.—Charles H. Parkhurst.

How different is the ready hand, tearful eye, and soothing voice, from the ostentatious appearance which is called pity!—Jane Porter.

Pity is sworn servant unto love; and of this be sure, wherever it begins to make the way, it lets the master in.—Daniel.

There are two sorts of pity: one is a balm and the other a poison; the first is realized by our friends, the last by our enemies.—Charles Sumner.

The world is full of love and pity. Had there been less suffering, there would have been less kindness.—Thackeray.

The great basis of the Christian faith is compassion; do not dismiss that from your hearts, neither will your Maker.—Theodore Parker.

Friends should be very delicate and careful in administering pity as medicine, when enemies use the same article as poison.—J. F. Boyes.

People seem to think themselves in some ways superior to heaven itself, when they complain of the sorrow and want round about them. And yet it is not the devil for certain who puts pity into their hearts.—Anne Isabella Thackeray.

Pity, though it may often relieve, is but, at best, a short-lived passion, and seldom affords distress more than transitory assistance; with some it scarce lasts from the first impulse till the hand can be put into the pocket.—Goldsmith.

I shall despair. There is no creature loves me;
And if I die, no soul shall pity me:
Nay, wherefore should they, since that I myself Find in myself no pity to myself?
—Shakespeare.

Let us pity the wicked man; for it is very sad to seek happiness where it does not exist. Let our compassion express itself in efforts to bring him gently back to sacred principle, and if he persist, let us pity him the more for a blindness so fatal to himself.—De Charnage.

If ever you have looked on better days, if ever been where bells have knolled to church, if ever sat at any good man's feast, if ever from your eyelids wiped a tear and know what 'tis to pity and be pitied, let gentleness my strong enforcement sue.—Shakespeare.

No radiant pearl which crested fortune wears,
No gem that, twinkling, hangs from beauty's ears,
Not the bright stars which night's blue arch adorn,
Nor rising suns that gild the vernal morn,
Shine with such lustre as the tear that breaks
For other's woe, down virtue's manly checks.
—Darwin.

Pity and forbearance, and long-sufferance and fair interpretation, and excusing our brother, and taking in the best sense, and passing the gentlest sentence, are as certainly our duty, and owing to every person that does offend and can repent, as calling to account can be owing to the law, and are first to be paid; and he that does not so is an unjust person.—Jeremy Taylor.

Pity is a sense of our own misfortunes in those of another man; it is a sort of foresight of the disasters which may befall ourselves. We assist others, in order that they may assist us on like occasions; so that the services we offer to the unfortunate are in reality so many anticipated kindnesses to ourselves.—Rochefoucauld.

Plagiarism

Away, ye imitators, servile herd!—
Horace.

Our best thought comes from others.—Emerson.

To steal his sweet and honeyed sentences.—Shakespeare.

Borrowed garments never keep one warm.—Lowell.

I am but a gatherer and disposer of other men's stuff.—Sir Henry Wotton.

Borrowed thoughts, like borrowed money, only show the poverty of the borrower.—Lady Blessington.

Plagiarists are always suspicious of being stolen from.—Coleridge.

They lard their lean books with the fat of other's works.—Burton.

Plagiarists, at least, have the merit of preservation.—Disraeli.

For such kind of borrowing as this, if it be not bettered by the borrower, among good authors is accounted Plagiarism.—Milton.

Goethe said there would be little left of him if he were to discard what he owed to others.—Charlotte Cushman.

Is the painter a plagiarist because he sets his palette to nature?—Benjamin West.

There is nothing original; all is reflected light.—Balzac.

Honest thinkers are always stealing from each other.—O. W. Holmes.

Literature is full of coincidences which some love to believe plagiarisms.—O. W. Holmes.

Thought is the property of him who can entertain it, and of him who can adequately place it.—Emerson.

Amongst so many borrowed things am glad if I can steal one, disguising and altering it for some new service.—Montaigne.

Steal! to be sure they may, and, egad, serve your best thoughts as gypsies do stolen children,—disfigure them to make 'em pass for their own.—Sheridan.

Plagiarists are purloiners who filch the fruit that others have gathered, and then throw away the basket.—Chatfield.

We can say nothing but what hath been said, * * * Our poets steal from Homer * * * Our story-dressers do as much; he that comes last is commonly best.—Burton.

No earnest thinker is a plagiarist pure and simple. He will never borrow from others that which he has not already, more or less, thought out for himself.—Charles Kingsley.

Most plagiarists, like the drone, have neither taste to select, industry to acquire, nor skill to improve, but impudently pilfer the honey ready prepared, from the hive.—Colton.

Next, o'er his books his eyes began to roll,
In pleasing memory of all he stole,
How here he sipp'd, how there he plunder'd snug,
And suck'd all o'er, like an industrious bug. —Pope.

It has come to be practically a sort of rule in literature, that a man, having once shown himself capable of original writing, is entitled thenceforth to steal from the writings of others at discretion.—Emerson.

All the makers of dictionaries, all compilers who do nothing else than repeat backwards and forwards the opinions, the errors, the impostures, and the truths already printed, we may term plagiarists; but honest plagiarists, who arrogate not the merit of invention.—Voltaire.

If we steal thoughts from the moderns, it will be cried down as plagiarism; if from the ancients, it will be cried up as erudition. But in this respect every author is a Spartan, being more ashamed of the discovery than of the depredation.—Colton.

All men who have sense and feeling are being continually helped; they are taught by every person they meet, and enriched by everything that falls in their way. The greatest is he who has been oftenest aided. Originality is the observing eye.—Ruskin.

Nothing is sillier than this charge of plagiarism. There is no sixth commandment in art. The poet dare help himself wherever he lists, wherever he finds material suited to his work. He may even appropriate entire columns with their carved capitals, if the temple he thus supports be a beautiful one. Goethe understood this very well, and so did Shakespeare before him.—Heinrich Heine.

All the poets are indebted more or less to those who have gone before them; even Homer's originality has been questioned, and Virgil owes almost as much to Theocritus, in his Pastorals, as to Homer, in his Heroics; and if our own countryman, Milton, has soared above both Homer and Virgil, it is because he has stolen some feathers from their wings.—Colton.

As monarchs have a right to call in the specie of a state, and raise its value, by their own impression; so are there certain prerogative geniuses, who are above plagiaries, who cannot be said to steal, but, from their improvement of a thought, rather to borrow it, and repay the commonwealth of letters with interest again; and may more properly be said to adopt, than to kidnap a sentiment, by leaving it heir to their own fame.—Sterne.

Play

Play may not have so high a place in the divine economy, but it has as legitimate a place as prayer.—J. G. Holland.

Play is a sacred thing, a divine ordinance, for developing in the child a harmonious and healthy organism, and preparing that organism for the commencement of the work of life.—J. G. Holland.

It is the great harmonizer of the human faculties, overstrained and made inharmonious by labor. It is the agency that keeps alive and in healthy activity the faculties and sympathies which work fails to use or helps to repress. It is the conservator of moral, mental, and physical health.—J. G. Holland.

Pleasure

Great pleasures are serious.—Voltaire.

Pleasure limps for him who enjoys it alone.—J. Petit-Senn.

Fly the pleasure that bites to-morrow.—George Herbert.

A man of pleasure is a man of pains.—Young.

Pleasure itself is painful at the bottom.—Montaigne.

There is a pleasure which is born of pain.—Lord Lytton.

Pleasure is far sweeter as a recreation than a business.—Roswell D. Hitchcock.

The shortest pleasures are the sweetest.—Farquhar.

Pleasure has no logic; it never treads in its own footsteps.—Alexander Smith.

There is no sterner moralist than pleasure.—Byron.

A fool to pleasure, yet a slave to fame.—Pope.

Pleasures can undo a man at any time, if yielded to.—Feltham.

Pleasure can be supported by illusion, but happiness rests upon truth.—Chamfort.

Great pleasures are much less frequent than great pains.—Hume.

Most pleasures embrace us but to strangle.—Montaigne.

Pleasure's couch is virtue's grave.—Duganne.

Pleasure of every kind quickly satisfies.—Burke.

Rare indulgence produces greater pleasure.—Juvenal.

God made all pleasures innocent.—Mrs. Norton.

There is no pleasure without a tincture of bitterness.—Hafiz.

Death treads in pleasure's footsteps round the world,
When pleasure treads the paths which reason shuns. —Young.

Choose such pleasures as recreate much and cost little.—Fuller.

Pleasure, or wrong or rightly understood, Our greatest evil, or our greatest good. —Pope.

Mistake not. Those pleasures are not pleasures that trouble the quiet and tranquillity of thy life.—Jeremy Taylor.

I should rejoice if my pleasures were as pleasing to God as they are to myself.—Marguerite de Valois.

We tire of those pleasures we take, but never of those we give.—J. Petit-Senn.

It is characteristic of pleasure that we can never recognize it to be pleasure till after it is gone.—Alexander Smith.

Pleasure never comes sincere to man; but lent by heaven upon hard usury.—Dryden.

Though sages may pour out their wisdom's treasure,
There is no sterner moralist than pleasure. —Byron.

All the human race, from China to Peru, pleasure, however disguised by art, pursue.—Thomas Warton.

He who seeks to imbitter innocent pleasure has a cancer in his heart.—Lavater.

I built my soul a lordly pleasure-house,
Wherein at ease for aye to dwell. —Tennyson.

Consider pleasures as they depart, not as they come.—Aristotle.

Pain may be said to follow pleasure as its shadow.—Colton.

But pleasures are like poppies spread; you seize the flower, its bloom is shed!—Burns.

Pleasure makes our youth inglorious, our age shameful.—Steele.

The greatest of all pleasures is to give pleasure to one whom we love.—Boufflers.

The public pleasures of far the greater part of mankind are counterfeit.—Johnson.

He that would have the perfection of pleasure must be moderate in the use of it.—Benjamin Whichcote.

The inward pleasure of imparting pleasure—that is the choicest of all.—Hawthorne.

He who can at all times sacrifice pleasure to duty approaches sublimity.—Lavater.

All pleasures are commendable that do not culminate in regret.—Mme. de Maintenon.

The rule of my life is to make business a pleasure, and pleasure my business.—Aaron Burr.

Ever let the Fancy roam,
Pleasure never is at home. —Keats.

Take all the pleasures of all the spheres,
And multiply each through endless years,
One minute of Heaven is worth them all. —Moore.

Put this restriction on your pleasures; be cautious that they injure not being which has life.—Zimmermann.

For the bow cannot stand always bent, nor can human nature or human frailty subsist without some lawful recreation.—Cervantes.

Let not the enjoyment of pleasures now within your grasp be carried to such excess as to incapacitate you from future repetition.—Seneca.

Reason's whole pleasure, all the joys of sense,
Lie in three words,—health, peace, and competence.—Pope.

Pleasure admitted in undue degree
Enslaves the will, nor leaves the judgment free.—Cowper.

The most delicate, the most sensible, of all pleasures consists in promoting the pleasures of others.—Bruyère.

Why, all delights are vain; but that most vain which with pain purchased doth inherit pain.—Shakespeare.

The seeds of repentance are sown in youth by pleasure, but the harvest is reaped in age by pain.—Colton.

Remember that thy heart will shed its pleasures as thine eye its tears, and both leave loathsome furrows.—Bailey.

Pleasure has its time; so too has wisdom. Make love in thy youth, and in old age attend to thy salvation.—Voltaire.

Pleasures of the mind have this advantage,—they never cloy nor wear themselves out, but increase by employment.—Frances Power Cobbe.

There is no such thing as pure, unalloyed pleasure; some bitter ever mingles with the sweet.—Ovid.

Where solid pains succeed our senseless joys, and short-lived pleasures pass like fleeting dreams.—Rochester.

There is a pleasure in the pathless woods,
There is a rapture on the lonely shore,
There is society where none intrudes
By the deep Sea, and music in its roar.
—Byron.

The amiable is the voluptuous in expression or manner. The sense of pleasure in ourselves is that which excites it in others; or, the art of pleasing is to seem pleased.—Hazlitt.

Pleasures lie thickest where no pleasures seem;
There's not a leaf that falls upon the ground
But holds some joy of silence or of sound,
Some sprite begotten of a summer dream.—Blanchard.

Pleasure seizes the whole man who addicts himself to it, and will not give him leisure for any good office in life which contradicts the gayety of the present hour.—Steele.

Mental pleasures never cloy; unlike those of the body, they are increased by repetition, approved of by reflection, and strengthened by enjoyment.—Colton.

When the idea of any pleasure strikes your imagination, make a just computation between the duration of the pleasure and that of the repentance that is likely to follow it.—Epictetus.

The end of pleasure is to support the offices of life, to relieve the fatigues of business, to reward a regular action, and to encourage the continuance.—Jeremy Collier.

A man would have no pleasures in discovering all the beauties of the universe, even in heaven itself, unless he had a partner with whom he might share his joys.—Cicero.

The roses of pleasure seldom last long enough to adorn the brow of him who plucks them; for they are the only roses which do not retain their sweetness after they have lost their beauty.—Hannah More.

The pleasures of the world are deceitful; they promise more than they give. They trouble us in seeking them, they do not satisfy us when possessing them, and they make us despair in losing them.—Mme. De Lambert.

If you suppress the exorbitant love of pleasure and money, idle curiosity, iniquitous pursuits and wanton mirth, what a stillness would there be in the great cities! The necessities of life do not occasion at most a third part of the hurry.—Bruyère.

Would you judge of the lawfulness or unlawfulness of pleasures, take this rule: whatever weakens your reason impairs the tenderness of your conscience, obscures your sense of God, or takes off the relish of spiritual things; in short, whatever increases the strength and authority of your body over your mind, that thing is sin to you, however innocent it may be in itself.—Southey.

Relaxation is a physical and moral necessity. Animals, even to the simplest and dullest, have their games, their sports, their diversions. The toil-worn artisan, stooping and straining over his daily task, which taxes eye and brain and limb, ought to have opportunity and means for an hour or two of relaxation after that task is concluded.—Horace Greeley.

People should be guarded against temptation to unlawful pleasures by furnishing them the means of innocent ones. In every community there must be pleasures, relaxations and means of agreeable excitement; and if innocent are not furnished, resort will be had to criminal. Man was made to enjoy as well as labor, and the state of society should be adapted to this principle of human nature.—Channing.

Pleasure's the only noble end
To which all human powers should tend;
And virtue gives her heavenly lore,
But to make pleasure please us more!
Wisdom and she were both design'd
To make the senses more refined,
That man might revel free from cloying,
Then most a sage, when most enjoying!
—Moore.

Poetry

Poetry is the overflowing of the soul.—Tuckerman.

Poetry is the morning dream of great minds.—Lamartine.

Poetry, the eldest sister of all arts, and parent of most.—Congreve.

Poetry is truth dwelling in beauty.—Gilfillan.

Poetry is the apotheosis of sentiment.—Mme. de Staël.

The poetry of earth is ceasing never.—Keats.

Poetry, the sister-spirit of music.—Mme. le Vert.

Poetry is the breath of beauty.—Leigh Hunt.

Poetry is the key to the hieroglyphics of nature.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

Poetry is the child of enthusiasm.—Sigma.

Poetry is to be found nowhere unless we carry it within us.—Joubert.

Poetry is the eloquence of verse.—Bryant.

The poetry of earth is never dead.—Keats.

Truth shines the brighter, clad in verse.—Pope.

The essence of poetry is will and passion.—Hazlitt.

The finest poetry was first experience.—Emerson.

Much is the force of heaven-bred poesy.—Shakespeare.

It is uninspired inspiration.—Henry Reed.

A poem round and perfect as a star.—Alexander Smith.

Only that is poetry which cleanses and mans me.—Emerson.

Science sees signs; poetry the thing signified.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

Sweet food of sweetly uttered knowledge.—Sir P. Sidney.

Poetry is evidently a contagious complaint.—Washington Irving.

The intellect colored by the feelings.
—Professor Wilson.

Poetry is the robe, the royal apparel, in which truth asserts its divine origin.—Beecher.

Poetry is the art of substituting shadows, and of lending existence to nothing.—Burke.

Of all kinds of ambition, that which pursues poetical fame is the wildest.—Goldsmith.

Poetry is the attempt which man makes to render his existence harmonious.—Carlyle.

Take the sweet poetry of life away, and what remains behind?—Wordsworth.

Poetry is the music of thought, conveyed to us in music of language.—Chatfield.

Poetry is the record of the best and happiest moments of the happiest and best minds.—Shelley.

One merit of poetry few persons will deny: it says more and in fewer words than prose.—Voltaire.

He murmurs near the running brooks a music sweeter than their own.—Wordsworth.

Bishop Ken styled poetry "thought in blossom."—William Winter.

Willmott, the English essayist, says poetry is the natural religion of literature.—W. R. Alger.

Poetry is the music of the soul, and, above all, of great and feeling souls.—Voltaire.

In the earliest ages science was poetry, as in the latter poetry has become science.—Lowell.

They learn in suffering what they teach in song.—Shelley.

Our poetry in the eighteenth century was prose: our prose in the seventeenth, poetry.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

What makes poetry? A full heart, brimful of one noble passion.—Goethe.

Heroic poetry has ever been esteemed the greatest work of human nature.—Dryden.

Lyrical poetry is much the same in every age, as the songs of the nightingales in every spring-time.—Heine.

Poetry has been the guardian angel of humanity in all ages.—Lamartine.

There is no heroic poem in the world but is at bottom a biography, the life of a man.—Carlyle.

Nothing which does not transport is poetry. The lyre is a winged instrument.—Joubert.

Poetry is only born after painful journeys into the vast regions of thought.—Balzac.

The elegance, facility and golden cadence of poesy.—Shakespeare.

Sweet are the pleasures that to verse belong,
And doubly sweet a brotherhood in song.
—Keats.

Nor florid prose, nor honied lies of rhyme,
Can blazon evil deeds, or consecrate a crime.
—Byron.

The art of poetry is to touch the passions, and its duty to lead them on the side of virtue.—Cowper.

As yet a child, not yet a fool to fame, I lisp'd in numbers, for the numbers came.—Pope.

True poets, like great artists, have scarcely any childhood, and no old age.—Mme. Swetchine.

The poet's leaves are gathered one by one, in the slow process of the doubtful years.—Bayard Taylor.

Words become luminous when the poet's finger has passed over them its phosphorescence.—Joubert.

Those are poets who write thoughts as fragrant as flowers, and in as many-colored words.—Mme. de Krudener.

Poetry uses the rainbow tints for special effects, but always keeps its essential object in the purest light of truth.—Holmes.

Poetry is simply the most beautiful, impressive and widely effective mode of saying things, and hence its importance.—Matthew Arnold.

Every great poem is in itself limited by necessity, but in its suggestions unlimited and infinite.—Longfellow.

Poesy is of so subtle a spirit that in the pouring out of one language into another it will evaporate.—Denham.

Poesy, drawing within its circle all that is glorious and inspiring, gave itself but little concern as to where its flowers originally grew.—Karl Ottfried Müller.

Poetry teaches the enormous force of a few words, and, in proportion to the inspiration, checks loquacity.—Emerson.

We hold that the most wonderful and splendid proof of genius is a great poem produced in a civilized age.—Macaulay.

That which moveth the heart most is the best poetry; it comes nearest unto God, the source of all power.—Landon.

Poetry is unfallen speech. Paradise knew no other, for no other would suffice to answer the need of those ecstatic days of innocence.—Abraham Coles.

There is as much difference between good poetry and fine verses as between the smell of a flower-garden and of a perfumer's shop.—Hare.

Poetry and flowers are the wine and spirit of the Arab; a couplet is equal to a bottle, and a rose to a dram, without the evil effects of either.—Layard.

Never did poesy appear so full of heaven to me as when I saw how it pierced through pride and fear to the lives of coarsest men.—Lowell.

Poetry is in itself strength and joy, whether it be crowned by all mankind, or left alone in its own magic hermitage.—Sterling.

The world is full of poetry. The air is living with its spirit; and the waves dance to the music of its melodies, and sparkle in its brightness.—Percival.

I wish our clever young poets would remember my homely definitions of prose and poetry; that is, prose = words in their best order; poetry = the best words in the best order.—Coleridge.

The essence of poetry is invention; such invention as, by producing something unexpected, surprises and delights.—Samuel Johnson.

In the hands of genius the driest stick becomes an Aaron's rod, and buds and blossoms out in poetry.—H. N. Hudson.

Poetry is the blossom and the fragrance of all human knowledge, human thoughts, human passions, emotions, language.—Coleridge.

Milton saw not, and Beethoven heard not, but the sense of beauty was upon them, and they fain must speak.—Ruskin.

Poetry is the sister of Sorrow. Every man that suffers and weeps is a poet; every tear is a verse, and every heart a poem.—Marc André.

Poetry is enthusiasm with wings of fire; it is the angel of high thoughts, that inspires us with the power of sacrifice.—Mazzini.

He who, in an enlightened and literary society, aspires to be a great poet, must first become a little child.—Macaulay.

Poetry is itself a thing of God; He made his prophets poets; and the more we feel of poeise do we become Like God in love and power,—under-makers. —Bailey.

The poet in prose or verse—the creator—can only stamp his images fore bly on the page in proportion as he has forcibly felt, ardently nursed, and long brooded over them.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Poetry has been to me its own exceeding great reward; it has given me the habit of wishing to discover the good and beautiful in all that meets and surrounds me.—S. T. Coleridge.

True poetry, like the religious prompting itself, springs from the emotional side of a man's complex nature, and is ever in harmony with his highest intuitions and aspirations.—Epes Sargent.

He who finds elevated and lofty pleasures in the feeling of poetry is a true poet, though he has never composed a line of verse in his entire lifetime.—Mme. Dudevant.

Poetry should be vital—either stirring our blood by its divine movements or snatching our breath by its divine perfection. To do both is supreme glory, to do either is enduring fame.—Augustine Birrell.

Pretty conceptions, fine metaphors, glittering expressions, and something of a neat cast of verse are properly the dress, gems, or loose ornaments of poetry.—Pope.

When the Divine Artist would produce a poem, He plants a germ of it in a human soul, and out of that soul the poem springs and grows as from the rose-tree the rose—James A. Garfield.

Blessings be with them, and eternal praise,
Who gave us nobler loves and nobler cares,
The poets, who on earth have made us heirs
Of truth and pure delight by heavenly lays.
—Wordsworth.

The poet may say or sing, not as things were, but as they ought to have been; but the historian must pen them, not as they ought to have been, but as they really were.—Cervantes.

Poetry is music in words, and music is poetry in sound: both excellent sauce, but they have lived and died poor, that made them their meat.—Fuller.

Over all life broods Poesy, like the calm blue sky with its motherly, rebuking face. She is the great reformer, and where the love of her is strong and healthy, wickedness and wrong cannot long prevail.—Lowell.

An artist that works in marble or colors has them all to himself and his tribe; but the man who moulds his thoughts in verse has to employ the materials vulgarized by everybody's use, and glorify them by his handling.—O. W. Holmes.

O brave poets! keep back nothing, nor mix falsehood with the whole; look up Godward; speak the truth in worthy song from earnest soul; hold, in high poetic duty, truest truth the fairest beauty!—Mrs. Browning.

Then, rising with Aurora's light,
The muse invoked, sit down to write;
Blot out, correct, insert, refine,
Enlarge, diminish, interline;
Be mindful, when invention fails,
To scratch your head and bite your nails.
—Swift.

As the falcon launched trustingly heavenward is lost to view, the course of the higher poetry often soars beyond the ken of the multitude; and, as the humble birds carol blithely round our dwellings, so the meeker lays of the muse linger tunelessly about the heart.—Tuckerman.

Poetry, good sir, in my opinion, is like a tender virgin, very young and extremely beautiful, whom divers other virgins—namely, all the other sciences—make it their business to enrich, polish, and adorn; and to her it belongs to make use of them all, and on her part to give a lustre to them all.—Cervantes.

Poetry interprets in two ways: it interprets by expressing, with magical felicity, the physiognomy and movements of the outward world; and it interprets by expressing, with inspired conviction, the ideas and laws of the inward world of man's moral and spiritual nature. In other words, poetry is interpretative both by having natural magic in it, and by having moral profundity.—Matthew Arnold.

I had rather be a kitten, and cry mew,
Than one of these same metre ballad-mongers;

I had rather hear a brazen canstick turn'd,
Or a dry wheel grate on the axle-tree;
And that would set my teeth nothing on edge,

Nothing so much as mincing poetry;
'Tis like the forc'd gait of a shuffling nag.
—Shakespeare.

There are so many tender and holy emotions flying about in our inward world, which, like angels, can never assume the body of an outward act; so many rich and lovely flowers spring up which bear no seed,—that it is a happiness poetry was invented, which receives into its limbus all these incorporated spirits and the perfume of all these flowers.—Richter.

Poetry deserves the honor it obtains as the eldest offspring of literature, and the fairest. It is the fruitfulness of many plants growing into one flower and sowing itself over the world in shapes of beauty and color, which differ with the soil that receives and the sun that ripens the seed. In Persia, it comes up the rose of Hafiz; in England, the many-blossomed tree of Shakespeare.—Willmott.

Poetry reveals to us the loveliness of nature, brings back the freshness of youthful feeling, revives the relish of simple pleasures, keeps unquenched the enthusiasm which warmed the spring-time of our being, refines youthful love, strengthens our interest in human nature, by vivid delineations of its tenderest and softest feelings, and, through the brightness of its prophetic visions, helps faith to lay hold on the future life.—Channing.

Poetical taste is the only magician whose wand is not broken. No hand, except its own, can dissolve the fabric of beauty in which it dwells. Genii, unknown to Arabian fable, wait at the portal. Whatever is most precious from the loom or the mine of fancy is poured at its feet. Love, purified by contemplation, visits and cheers it; unseen musicians are heard in the dark; it is Psyche in the palace of Cupid.—Willmott.

What is a Sonnet? 'Tis the pearly shell That murmurs of the far-off, murmuring sea;

A precious jewel carved most curiously;
It is a little picture painted well.

What is a Sonnet? 'Tis the tear that fell
From a great poet's hidden ecstasy;

A two-edged sword, a star, a song—ah
me!

Sometimes a heavy tolling funeral bell.
—R. W. Gilder.

In the hands of genius, the driest stick becomes an Aaron's rod, and buds and blossoms out in poetry. Is he a Burns? the sight of a mountain daisy unseals the fountains of his nature, and he embalms the "bonny gem" in the beauty of his spirit. Is he a Wordsworth? at his touch all nature is instinct with feeling; the spirit of beauty springs up in the footsteps of his going, and the darkest, nakedest grave becomes a sunlit bank empurpled with blossoms of life.—H. N. Hudson.

Poetry is the first and last of all knowledge: it is immortal as the heart of men. If the labors of the men of science should ever create any revolution, direct or indirect, in our condition, and in the impressions which we habitually receive, the poet will then sleep no more than at present; he will be ready to follow the steps of the man of science, not only in those general indirect effects, but he will be at his side, carrying sensation into the midst of the objects of the science itself. The remotest discoveries of the chemist, the botanist, or mineralogist will be as proper objects of the poet's art as any upon which it can be employed, if the time should ever come when these things shall be familiar to us, and the relations under which they are contemplated by the followers of the respective sciences shall be manifestly and palpably material to us as enjoying and suffering beings. If the time should ever come when what is now called science, thus familiarized to men, shall be ready to put on, as it were, a form of flesh and blood, the poet will lend his divine spirit to aid the transfiguration, and will welcome the being thus produced as a dear and genuine inmate of the household of man.—Wordsworth.

We have more poets than judges and interpreters of poetry. It is easier to write an indifferent poem than to understand a good one. There is, indeed, a certain low and moderate sort of poetry, that a man may well enough judge by certain rules of art; but the true, supreme, and divine poesy is equally above all rules and reason. And whoever discerns the beauty of it with the most assured and most steady sight sees no more than the quick reflection of a flash of lightning.—Montaigne.

Poets

Poets are far rarer birds than kings.—Ben Jonson.

All men are poets at heart.—Emerson.

For a good poet's made, as well as born.—Ben Jonson.

I learn life from the poets.—Mme. de Staël.

A poet must sing for his own people.—Stedman.

He koude songes make and wel endite.—Chaucer.

To the poetic mind all things are poetical.—Longfellow.

Who live on fancy, and can feed on air.—Gay.

The true poem is the poet's mind.—Emerson.

All great poets have been men of great knowledge.—Bryant.

To a poet nothing can be useless.—Johnson.

A poet is a painter of the soul.—Isaac Disraeli.

God's prophets of the Beautiful,
These Poets were. —E. B. Browning.

Nature, after all, is still the grand agent in making poets.—Carlyle.

Most of the poets of to-day have the spider's talent of spinning, but not her art of weaving.—Richter.

Poets are all who love,—who feel great truths,
And tell them. —Bailey.

A poet is the translator of the silent language of nature to the world.—R. W. Griswold.

Poets utter great and wise things which they do not themselves understand.—Plato.

A poet without love were a physical and metaphysical impossibility.—Carlyle.

Most joyful let the Poet be;
It is through him that all men see.
—William E. Channing.

'Tis a question whether adversity or prosperity makes the most poets.—Farquhar.

There is a pleasure in poetic pains,
Which only poets know. —Cowper.

For next to being a great poet is the power of understanding one.—Longfellow.

Poets alone are sure of immortality; they are the truest diviners of nature.—Bulwer-Lytton.

A poem's life and death dependeth still Not on the poet's wits, but reader's will.
—Alexander Brome.

It's a man's sincerity and depth of vision that makes him a poet.—Carlyle.

The Poet's leaves are gathered one by one,
In the slow process of the doubtful years.
—Bayard Taylor.

The poet who does not revere his art, and believe in its sovereignty, is not born to wear the purple.—Stedman.

Never durst poet touch a pen to write Until his ink were temper'd with Love's sighs.
—Shakespeare.

The poet's labors are a work of joy, and require peace of mind.—Ovid.

A poet's soul must contain the perfect shape of all things good, wise and just. His body must be spotless and without blemish, his life pure, his thoughts high, his studies intense.—Augustine Birrell.

Poets are the hierophants of an unapprehended inspiration; the mirrors of the gigantic shadows which futurity casts upon the present.—Shelley.

Show me one wicked man who has written poetry, and I will show you where his poetry is not poetry; or, rather, I will show you in his poetry no poetry at all.—Elizabeth S. Shephard.

The poet is a creator, not an iconoclast, and never will tamely endeavor to say in prose what can only be expressed in song.—Stedman.

Dan Chaucer, well of English undefyled, On Fame's eternall beadroll worthie to be fyled. —Spenser.

I fancy the character of a poet is in every country the same.—fond of enjoying the present, careless of the future; his conversation that of a man of sense, his actions those of a fool.—Goldsmith.

If men will impartially, and not asquint, look toward the offices and function of a poet, they will easily conclude to themselves the impossibility of any man's being a good poet without first being a good man.—Ben Jonson.

For voices pursue him by day,
And haunt him by night,—
And he listens, and needs must obey,
When the Angel says: "Write!" —Longfellow.

Ages elapsed ere Homer's lamp appear'd,
And ages ere the Mantuan swan was heard;
To carry nature lengths unknown before,
To give a Milton birth, ask'd ages more.
—Cowper.

To have read the greatest works of any great poet, to have beheld or heard the greatest works of any great painter or musician, is a possession added to the best things of life.—Swinburne.

Poets should be law-givers; that is, the boldest lyric inspiration should not chide and insult, but should announce and lead the civil code, and the day's work.—Emerson.

The poet must be alike polished by an intercourse with the world as with the studies of taste; one to whom labor is negligence, refinement a science, and art a nature.—Isaac Disraeli.

Every poet, be his outward lot what it may, finds himself born in the midst of prose; he has to struggle from the littleness and obstruction of an actual world into the freedom and infinitude of an ideal.—Carlyle.

Poets are never young, in one sense. Their delicate ear hears the far-off whispers of eternity, which coarser souls must travel towards for scores of years before their dull sense is touched by them. A moment's insight is sometimes worth a life's experience.—Holmes.

A poet is a nightingale, who sits in darkness and sings to cheer its own solitude with sweet sounds. His auditors are as men entranced by the melody of an unseen musician, who feel that they are moved and softened, yet know not whence or why.—Shelley.

For his chaste Muse employed her heaven-taught lyre
None but the noblest passions to inspire,
Not one immortal, one corrupted thought,
One line, which dying he could wish to blot.
—Lord Lyttleton.

To be a poet is to have a soul so quick to discern that no shade of quality escapes it, and so quick to feel that discernment is but a hand playing with finely ordered variety on the chords of emotion: a soul in which knowledge passes instantaneously into feeling, and feeling flashes back as a new organ of knowledge.—George Eliot.

One more royal trait properly belongs to the poet. I mean his cheerfulness, without which no man can be a poet,—for beauty is his aim. He loves virtue, not for its obligation, but for its grace; he delights in the world, in man, in woman, for the lovely light that sparkles from them. Beauty, the spirit of joy and hilarity, he sheds over the universe.—Emerson.

In his own verse the poet still we find,
In his own page his memory lives enshrined,
As in their amber sweets the smothered bees,—
As the fair cedar, fallen before the breeze, Lies self-embalmed amidst the mouldering trees.
—O. W. Holmes.

I can no more believe old Homer blind,
Than those who say the sun hath never shined;
The age wherein he lived was dark, but he Could not want sight who taught the world to see.
—Sir John Denham.

O brave poets, keep back nothing;
Nor mix falsehood with the whole!
Look up Godward! speak the truth in Worthy song from earnest soul!
Hold, in high poetic duty, Truest Truth the fairest Beauty.
—E. B. Browning.

Genius in the poet, like the nomad of Arabia, ever a wanderer, still ever makes a home where the well or the palm-tree invites it to pitch the tent. Perpetually passing out of himself and his own positive circumstantial condition of being into other hearts and into other conditions, the poet obtains his knowledge of human life by transporting his own life into the lives of others.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The source of each accordant strain
Lies deeper than the Poet's brain.
First from the people's heart must spring
The passions which he learns to sing;
They are the wind, the harp is he,
To voice their fitful melody,—
The language of their varying fate,
Their pride, grief, love, ambition, hate,—
The talisman which holds inwrought
The touchstone of the listener's thought;
That penetrates each vain disguise,
And brings his secret to his eyes.
—Bayard Taylor.

All poets pretend to write for immortality, but the whole tribe have no objection to present pay, and present praise. Lord Burleigh is not the only statesman who has thought one hundred pounds too much for a song, though sung by Spenser; although Oliver Goldsmith is the only poet who ever considered himself to have been overpaid.—Colton.

There is nothing of which nature has been more bountiful than poets. They swarm like the spawn of codfish, with a vicious fecundity that invites and requires destruction. To publish verses is become a sort of evidence that a man wants sense; which is repelled, not by writing good verses, but by writing excellent verses.—Sydney Smith.

The poet's eye, in a fine frenzy rolling,
Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven;
And, as imagination bodies forth
The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen
Turns them to shapes, and gives to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name.
—Shakespeare.

O ye dead Poets, who are living still Immortal in your verse, though life be fled,
And ye, O living Poets, who are dead
Though ye are living, if neglect can kill,
Tell me if in the darkest hours of ill,
With drops of anguish falling fast and red
From the sharp crown of thorns upon your head, Ye were not glad your errand to fulfill.
—Longfellow.

Poison

It is medicine, not poison, I offer you.—Lessing.

To rankling poison hast thou turned in me the milk of human kindness.—
Schiller.

While Fell was reposing himself in the hay,
A reptile concealed bit his leg as he lay;
But, all venom himself, of the wound he made light,
And got well, while the scorpion died of the bite.
—Lessing.

All men carry about them that which is poison to serpents: for if it be true that is reported, they will no better abide the touching with man's spittle than scalding water cast upon them: but if it happen to light within their chawes or mouth, especially if it come from a man that is fasting, it is present death.—Pliny.

Policy

The creed of diplomats.—Horace Greeley.

Assume a virtue if you have it not.—Shakespeare.

Like Æsop's fox, when he had lost his tail, would have all his fellow foxes cut off theirs.—Burton.

Keep a good table and don't forget the ladies.—Napoleon I.

Kings will be tyrants from policy, when subjects are rebels from principle.—Burke.

They had best not stir the rice, though it sticks to the pot.—Cervantes.

The publick weal requires that a man should betray, and lye, and massacre.—Montaigne.

I make presents to the mother, but think of the daughter.—Goethe.

He has mastered all points who has combined the useful with the agreeable.—Horace.

Measures, not men, have always been my mark.—Goldsmith.

The policy of adapting one's self to circumstances makes all ways smooth.—Lavater.

Cervantes shrewdly advises to lay a bridge of silver for a flying enemy.—Whipple.

The devil knew what he did when he made men politic; he crossed himself by it.—Shakespeare.

To manage men one ought to have a sharp mind in a velvet sheath.—George Eliot.

It is easiest to "be all things to all men," but it is not honest. Self-respect must be sacrificed every hour in the day.—Abraham Lincoln.

At court one becomes a sort of human ant-eater, and learns to catch one's prey by one's tongue.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Honesty is the best policy, says the familiar axiom; but people who are honest on that principle defraud no one but themselves.—James A. Garfield.

Turn him to any cause of policy,
The Gordian-knot of it he will unloose,
Familiar as his garter: that, when he speaks,
The air, a charter'd libertine, is still.
—Shakespeare.

Factions among yourselves; preferring such
To offices and honors, as ne'er read
The elements of saving policy;
But deeply skilled in all the principles
That usher to destruction.
—Massinger.

When I see a merchant over-polite to his customers, begging them to taste a little brandy and throwing half his goods on the counter,—thinks I, that man has an axe to grind.—Charles Miner.

To beguile the time,
Look like the time; bear welcome in your eye,
Your hand, your tongue; look like the innocent flower,
But be the serpent under 't.
—Shakespeare.

One of the old philosophers says that it is the part of wisdom to sometimes seem a fool; but in our day there are too many ready-made ones to render this a desirable policy.—Haliburton.

In a troubled state we must do as in foul weather upon a river, not think to cut directly through, for the boat may be filled with water; but rise and fall as the waves do, and give way as much as we conveniently can.—Selden.

Mahomet made the people believe that he would call a hill to him, and from the top of it offer up his prayers for the observers of his law. The people assembled: Mahomet called the hill to come to him, again and again; and when the hill stood still, he was never a whit abashed, but said, "If the hill will not come to Mahomet, Mahomet will go to the hill."—Bacon.

Politeness

Politeness is to goodness what words are to thoughts.—Joubert.

Politeness is practical Christianity.
—Dewey.

The zero of friendship's thermometer.—Boufflers.

The truest politeness comes of sincerity.—Samuel Smiles.

Self-command is the main elegance.
—Emerson.

Politeness costs little and yields much.—Mme. de Lambert.

With bat in hand, one gets on in the world.—Auerbach.

There is nothing costs less than civility.—Cervantes.

Politeness smooths wrinkles.—Joubert.

Politeness costs nothing and gains everything.—Lady Montagu.

Avoid all haste; calmness is an essential ingredient of politeness.—Alphonse Karr.

Politeness has been well defined as benevolence in small things.—Macaulay.

Fine manners are like personal beauty,—a letter of credit everywhere.
—Bartol.

And when a lady's in the case,
You know all other things give place.
—Gay.

The true effect of genuine politeness seems to be rather ease than pleasure.
—Johnson.

Politeness is the flower of humanity.
—Joubert.

It is a part of good breeding that a man should be polite even to himself.
—Richter.

Politeness is a wreath of flowers that adorns the world.—Mme. de Basanville.

There is a politeness of the heart; this is closely allied to love.—Goethe.

Politeness is better than logic. You can often persuade when you cannot convince.—H. W. Shaw.

Politeness is as natural to delicate natures as perfume is to flowers.—De Finod.

Off goes his bonnet to an oyster wench.—Shakespeare.

There is no accomplishment so easy to acquire as politeness, and none more profitable.—H. W. Shaw.

Politeness induces morality. Serenity of manners requires serenity of mind.—Julia Ward Howe.

Gentleness is the great point to be obtained in the study of manners.—N. P. Willis.

As charity covers a multitude of sins before God, so does politeness before men.—Lord Greville.

Politeness is the art of rendering to every one, without effort, that which is socially his due.—From the French.

Defect in manners is usually the defect of fine perceptions. Men are too coarsely made for the delicacy of beautiful carriage and customs. It is not quite sufficient to good breeding, a union of kindness and independence.—Emerson.

There are few defects in our nature so glaring as not to be veiled from observation by politeness and good breeding.—Stanislaus.

Whoever pays you more court than he is accustomed to pay, either intends to deceive you, or finds you necessary to him.—Courtenay.

Politeness is fictitious benevolence. Depend upon it, the want of it never fails to produce something disagreeable to one or other.—Johnson.

True politeness is perfect ease and freedom. It simply consists in treating others just as you love to be treated yourself.—Chesterfield.

As in smooth oil the razor best is whet, so wit is by politeness keenest set.—Young.

In the great world, malevolence and disdain never appear in any other garb than that of cold and ceremonious politeness.—Lath.

The wisest and best are repulsive, if they are characterized by repulsive manners. Politeness is an easy virtue, costs little, and has great purchasing power.—Alcott.

When two goats met on a bridge which was too narrow to allow either to pass or return, the goat which lay down that the other might walk over it was a finer gentleman than Lord Chesterfield.—Cecil.

There is no policy like politeness; and a good manner is the best thing in the world, either to get one a good name or to supply the want of it.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Politeness is a mixture of discretion, civility, complaisance and circumspection spread over all we do and say.—St. Evremond.

Politeness is nothing more than an elegant and concealed species of flattery, tending to put the person to whom it is addressed in good humor and respect with himself.—Cumberland.

I consider that the spirit of politeness is a certain desire to bring it about, that, by our words and manners, others may be pleased with us and with themselves.—Montesquieu.

Politeness has been defined to be artificial good-nature; but we may affirm, with much greater propriety, that good-nature is natural politeness.—Stanislaus.

Politeness is not always a sign of wisdom; but the want of it always leaves room for a suspicion of folly, if folly and imprudence are the same.—Landor.

It seems to me that the spirit of politeness is a certain attention in causing that, by our words and by our manners, others may be content with us and with themselves.—Bruyère.

Nothing is more dissimilar than natural and acquired politeness. The first consists in a willing abnegation of self; the second in a compelled recollection of others.—Chesterfield.

Politeness does not always inspire goodness, equity, complaisance, and gratitude; it gives at least the appearance of these qualities; and makes man appear outwardly, as he should be within.—Bruyère.

It is because gold is rare that gilding has been invented, which, without having its solidity, has all its brilliancy. Thus, to replace the kindness we lack, we have devised politeness which has all its appearance.—De Lévis.

In all the affairs of human life, social as well as political, I have remarked that courtesies of a small and trivial character are the ones which strike deepest to the grateful and appreciating heart.—Henry Clay.

All politeness is owing to liberty. We polish one another, and rub off our corners and rough sides by a sort of amicable collision. To restrain this is inevitably to bring a rust upon men's understandings.—Shaftesbury.

Good-breeding is not confined to externals, much less to any particular dress or attitude of the body; it is the art of pleasing or contributing as much as possible to the ease and happiness of those with whom you converse.—Fielding.

Politeness is one of those advantages which we never estimate rightly but by the inconvenience of its loss. Its influence upon the manners is constant and uniform, so that, like an equal motion, it escapes perception.—Dr. Johnson.

Kindly politeness is the slow fruit of advanced reflection; it is a sort of humanity and kindness applied to small acts and every-day discourse; it bids man soften towards others, and forget himself for the sake of others: it constrains genuine nature, which is selfish and gross.—Taine.

Politeness is to goodness what words are to thought. It tells not only on the manners, but on the mind and the heart; it renders the feelings, the opinions, the words, moderate and gentle.—Joubert.

Politeness is a kind of anæsthetic which envelops the asperities of our character, so that other people be not wounded by them. We should never be without it, even when we contend with the rude.—Joubert.

Do not press your young children into book-learning; but teach them politeness, including the whole circle of charities which spring from the consciousness of what is due to their fellow-beings.—Spurzheim.

To the acquisition of the rare quality of politeness, so much of the enlightened understanding is necessary that I cannot but consider every book in every science, which tends to make us wiser, and of course better men, as a treatise on a more enlarged system of politeness.—Monro.

The polite of every country seem to have but one character. A gentleman of Sweden differs but little, except in trifles, from one of any other country. It is among the vulgar we are to find those distinctions which characterize a people.—Goldsmith.

Christianity is designed to refine and to soften; to take away the heart of stone, and to give us hearts of flesh; to polish off the rudeness and arrogances of our manners and tempers; and to make us blameless and harmless, the sons of God, without rebuke.—Jay.

Wisdom and virtue are by no means sufficient, without the supplemental laws of good-breeding, to secure freedom from degenerating into rudeness, or self-esteem from swelling into insolence. A thousand incivilities may be committed, and a thousand offices neglected, without any remorse of conscience, or reproach from reason.—Johnson.

"Politeness," says Witherspoon, "is real kindness kindly expressed;" an admirable definition, and so brief that all may easily remember it. This is the sum and substance of all true politeness. Put it in practice, and all will be charmed with your manners.—Mrs. Sigourney.

Bowing, ceremonious, formal compliments, stiff civilities, will never be politeness; that must be easy, natural, unstudied; and what will give this but a mind benevolent and attentive to exert that amiable disposition in trifles to all you converse and live with?—Chatham.

True politeness is the spirit of benevolence showing itself in a refined way. It is the expression of good-will and kindness. It promotes both beauty in the man who possesses it, and happiness in those who are about him. It is a religious duty, and should be a part of religious training.—Beecher.

The only true source of politeness is consideration,—that vigilant moral sense which never loses sight of the rights, the claims, and the sensibilities of others. This is the one quality, over all others, necessary to make a gentleman.—Simms.

True politeness is consideration for the opinions of others. It has been said of dogmatism that it is only puppyism come to its full growth; and certainly the worst form this quality can assume is that of opinionativeness and arrogance.—Samuel Smiles.

Not to perceive the little weaknesses and the idle but innocent affectations of the company may be allowable as a sort of polite duty. The company will be pleased with you if you do, and most probably will not be reformed by you if you do not.—Chesterfield.

That politeness which we put on, in order to keep the assuming and the presumptuous at a proper distance, will generally succeed. But it sometimes happens that these obtrusive characters are on such excellent terms with themselves that they put down this very politeness to the score of their own great merits and high pretensions, meeting the coldness of our reserve with a ridiculous condescension of familiarity, in order to set us at ease with ourselves.—Colton.

In politeness, as in many other things connected with the formation of character, people in general begin outside, when they should begin inside; instead of beginning with the heart, and trusting that to form the manners, they begin with the manners, and trust the heart to chance influences.—Mrs. L. M. Child.

Among well-bred people a mutual deference is affected, contempt of others is disguised; authority concealed; attention given to each in his turn; and an easy stream of conversation maintained without vehemence, without interruption, without eagerness for victory, and without any airs of superiority.—Hume.

He is truly well-bred who knows when to value and when to despise those national peculiarities, which are regarded by some with so much observance; a traveller of taste at once perceives that the wise are polite all the world over, but that fools are polite only at home.—Bacon.

Political Economy

It is not the insurrections of ignorance that are dangerous, but the revolts of intelligence.—Lowell.

A well-employed and prosperous community can buy and consume. An ill-employed community cannot buy and consume. This is the solution of the whole matter; and the whole science of political economy has not one truth of half so much importance as this.—Daniel Webster.

No, sir, you dare not make war on cotton. No power on earth dares make war upon it. Cotton is king. Until lately the Bank of England was king; but she tried to put her screws as usual, the fall before last, upon the cotton crop, and was utterly vanquished. The last power has been conquered.—James Henry Hammond.

The protection of American labor against the injurious competition of foreign labor, so far, at least, as respects general handicraft productions, is known historically to have been one end designed to be obtained by establishing the Constitution; and this object, and the constitutional power to accomplish it, ought never in any degree to be surrendered or compromised.—Daniel Webster.

To tax the community for the advantage of a class is not protection; it is plunder, and I disclaim it; but I ask you to protect the rights and interests of labor generally; in the first place by allowing no free imports from countries which meet you with countervailing duties; and, in the second place, with respect to agricultural produce, to compensate the soil for the burdens from which other classes are free by an equivalent duty. This is my view of what is called protection.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

Politics

Politics is the science of exigencies.—Theodore Parker.

In politics nothing is contemptible.—Beaconsfield.

The right divine of kings to govern wrong.—Pope.

The many-headed monster of the pit.—Pope.

Vain hope, to make people happy by politics!—Carlyle.

In politics nothing is so absurd as rancor.—Count Cavour.

Party honesty is party expediency.—Grover Cleveland.

The multitude is always in the wrong.—Earl of Roscommon.

Party is the madness of many for the gain of a few.—Pope.

In politics, what begins in fear usually ends in folly.—Coleridge.

Wise men and gods are on the strongest side.—Sir Charles Sedley.

Something is rotten in the state of Denmark.—Shakespeare.

Protection and patriotism are reciprocal.—Calhoun.

There is no perfecter endowment in man than political virtue.—Plutarch.

There is no gambling like politics.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

Politics is a deleterious profession, like some poisonous handicrafts.—Emerson.

A statesman makes the occasion, but the occasion makes the politician.—George S. Hillard.

He serves his party best, who serves the country best.—Rutherford B. Hayes.

The greatest powers cannot injure a man's character whose reputation is unblemished among his party.—Lord Chesterfield.

Of all sciences there is none where first appearances are more deceitful than in politics.—Hume.

Whatever I may believe in theology, I do not believe in the doctrine of vicarious atonement in politics.—Garfield.

There is nothing in which the power of circumstances is more evident than in politics.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

Good humor and generosity carry the day with the popular heart all the world over.—Alexander Smith.

Watch thou, and wake when others be asleep, to pry into the secrets of the state.—Shakespeare.

There is no republican road to safety but in constant distrust.—Wendell Phillips.

Oh that eternal want of peace which vexes public men!—Tennyson.

If you do not know how to lie, cheat, and steal, turn your attention to politics and learn.—H. W. Shaw.

This bodes some strange eruption to our state.—Shakespeare.

Those who think must govern those who toil.—Goldsmith.

Nothing is so uncertain as the minds of the multitude.—Leiz.

As long as I count the votes what are you going to do about it? Say.—Wm. M. Tweed.

There is an infinity of political errors which, being once adopted, become principles.—Abbé Raynal.

It is a condition which confronts us—not a theory.—Grover Cleveland.

Old politicians chew on wisdom past, And totter on in business to the last.—Pope.

A mugwump is a person educated beyond his intellect.—Horace Porter.

Politics, as a trade, finds most and leaves nearly all dishonest.—Abraham Lincoln.

People who declare that they belong to no party certainly do not belong to ours.—J. Petit-Senn.

Political men, like goats, usually thrive best among inequalities.—Lan-dor.

I have doubtless erred more or less in politics, but a crime I never committed.—Napoleon I.

Jarring interests of themselves create the according music of a well-mixed state.—Pope.

Where vice prevails, and impious men bear sway, the post of honor is a private station.—Addison.

The tendency of party spirit has ever been to disguise and propagate and support error.—Whately.

Measures, not men, have always been my mark.—Goldsmith.

Nothing is politically right which is morally wrong.—Daniel O'Connell.

If you do anything above party, the true-hearted ones of all parties sympathize with you.—Charles Kingsley.

Where village statesmen talk'd with looks profound,
And news much older than their ale went round.
—Goldsmith.

A great many political speeches are literary parricides: they kill their fathers.—G. D. Prentice.

A thousand years scarce serve to form a state; an hour may lay it in the dust.—Byron.

A politician thinks of the next election; a statesman, of the next generation.—James Freeman Clarke.

In politics, merit is rewarded by the possessor being raised, like a target, to a position to be fired at.—Bovee.

I will say positively and resolutely that it is impossible an elective monarchy should be so free and absolute as an hereditary.—Bacon.

He knows very little of mankind who expects, by any facts or reasoning, to convince a determined party man.—Lavater.

A politician weakly and amiably in the right is no match for a politician tenaciously in the wrong.—Whipple.

There is an indissoluble union between a magnanimous policy and the solid rewards of public prosperity and felicity.—Washington.

This gives force to the strong—that the multitude have no habit of self-reliance or original action.—Emerson.

There are occasions when the general belief of the people, even though it be groundless, works its effect as sure as truth itself.—Schiller.

In a free country there is much clamor, with little suffering; in a despotic state there is little complaint, but much suffering.—Carnot.

Where the people are well educated, the art of piloting a state is best learned from the writings of Plato.—Bishop Berkeley.

Get thee glass eyes;
And, like a scurvy politician, seem
To see the things thou dost not.
—Shakespeare.

Free trade, one of the greatest blessings which a government can confer on a people, is in almost every country unpopular.—Macaulay.

The freeman casting, with unpurchased hand,
The vote that shakes the turrets of the land.
—O. W. Holmes.

Great political questions stir the deepest nature of one-half the nation; but they pass far above and over the heads of the other half.—Wendell Phillips.

What is a Communist? One who has yearnings
For equal division of unequal earnings.
—Ebenezer Elliot.

A politician must like lightning melt
The very marrow, and not taint the skin;
His ways must not be seen. —Chapman.

I consider biennial elections as a security that the sober, second thought of the people shall be law.—Fisher Ames.

Politics resemble religion; attempting to divest either of ceremony is the most certain mode of bringing either into contempt.—Goldsmith.

The conduct of a wise politician is ever suited to the present posture of affairs. Often by foregoing a part he saves the whole, and by yielding in a small matter secures a greater.—Plutarch.

Political freedom is, or ought to be, the best guaranty for the safety and continuance of spiritual, mental, and civil freedom. It is the combination of numbers to secure the liberty to each one.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Every political sect has its esoteric and its exoteric school—its abstract doctrines for the initiated; its visible symbols, its imposing forms, its myth.

ological fables, for the vulgar.—Macaulay.

There are countries in which it would be as absurd to establish popular governments as to abolish all the restraints in a school or to unite all the strait-waistcoats in a madhouse.—Macaulay.

The very name of a politician, a statesman, is sure to cause terror and hatred; it has always connected with it the ideas of treachery, cruelty, fraud, and tyranny.—Burke.

In politics, it is almost a commonplace, that a party of order or stability, and a party of progress or reform, are both necessary elements of a healthy state of political life.—J. Stuart Mill.

Every great political party that has done this country any good has given to it some immortal ideas that have outlived the members of that party.—James A. Garfield.

Who, born for the universe, narrow'd his mind,

And to party gave up what was meant for mankind. —Goldsmith.

O, that estates, degrees, and offices
Were not deriv'd corruptly, and that clear honour

Were purchased by the merit of the wearer! —Shakespeare.

Your politicians

Have evermore a taint of vanity,
As hasty still to show, and boast a plot
As they are greedy to contrive it.

—Sir W. Davenant.

We are Republicans, and don't propose to leave our party and identify ourselves with the party whose antecedents have been, Rum, Romanism, and Rebellion.—Samuel D. Burchard.

I hate all bungling as I do sin, but particularly bungling in politics, which leads to the misery and ruin of many thousands and millions of people.—Goethe.

The violation of party faith is of itself too common to excite surprise or indignation. Political friendships are so well understood that we can hardly pity the simplicity they deceive. —Junius.

Responsibility educates, and politics is but another name for God's way of teaching the masses ethics, under the responsibility of great present interests.—Wendell Phillips.

There is no Canaan in politics. As health lies in labor, and there is no royal road to it but through toil, so there is no republican road to safety but in constant distrust.—Wendell Phillips.

There is scarcely anything more harmless than political or party malice. It is best to leave it to itself. Opposition and contradiction are the only means of giving it life or duration.—Witherspoon.

If we mean to support the liberty and independence which has cost us so much blood and treasure to establish, we must drive far away the demon of party spirit and local reproach.—Washington.

A statesman, we are told, should follow public opinion. Doubtless, as a coachman follows his horses; having firm hold on the reins, and guiding them.—Hare.

The politics of courts are so mean that private people would be ashamed to act in the same way; all is trick and finesse, to which the common cause is sacrificed.—Nelson.

Men naturally sympathize with the calamities of individuals; but they are inclined to look on a fallen party with contempt rather than with pity.—Macaulay.

The man who can make two ears of corn or two blades of grass grow on the spot where only one grew before, would deserve better of mankind and render more essential service to the country than the whole race of politicians put together.—Swift.

A politician must often talk and act before he has thought and read. He may be very ill informed respecting a question: all his notions about it may be vague and inaccurate; but speak he must. And if he is a man of ability, of tact, and of intrepidity, he soon finds that, even under such circumstances, it is possible to speak successfully.—Macaulay.

It is very rare, indeed, for men to be wrong in their feelings concerning public misconduct; as rare to be right in their speculations upon the cause of it. I have constantly observed that the generality of people are fifty years, at least, behind in their politics.—Burke.

Politicians think that by stopping up the chimney they can stop its smoking. They try the experiment, they drive the smoke back, and there is more smoke than ever; but they do not see that their want of common-sense has increased the evil they would have prevented.—Borne.

The amelioration of the condition of mankind, and the increase of human happiness ought to be the leading objects of every political institution, and the aim of every individual, according to the measure of his power, in the situation he occupies.—Hamilton.

He that aspires to be the head of a party will find it more difficult to please his friends than to perplex his foes. He must often act from false reasons which are weak, because he dares not avow the true reasons which are strong.—Colton.

Perhaps I do not know what I was made for; but one thing I certainly never was made for, and that is to put principles on and off at the dictation of a party, as a lackey changes his livery at his master's command.—Horace Mann.

Listen! John A. Logan is the Head Center, the Hub, the King Pin, the Main Spring, Mogul, and Mugwump of the final plot by which partisanship was installed in the Commission.—Isaac H. Bromley.

The proverbial wisdom of the populace at gates, on roads, and in markets instructs the attentive ear of him who studies man more fully than a thousand rules ostentatiously arranged.—Lavater.

Such, for wise purposes it is presumed, is the turbulence of human passions in party disputes, when victory, more than truth, is the palm contended for, that "the post of honor is a private station."—Washington.

In such a government as ours no man is appointed to an office because he is the fittest for it—nor hardly in any other government—because there are so many connections and dependencies to be studied.—Dr. Johnson.

I accept your nomination in the confident trust that the masses of our countrymen, north and south, are eager to clasp hands across the bloody chasm which has so long divided them.—Horace Greeley.

The strife of politics tends to unsettle the calmest understanding, and ulcerate the most benevolent heart. There are no bigotries or absurdities too gross for parties to create or adopt under the stimulus of political passions.—Whipple.

Real political issues cannot be manufactured by the leaders of political parties, and real ones cannot be evaded by political parties. The real political issues of the day declare themselves, and come out of the depths of that deep which we call public opinion.—Garfield.

Among the lessons taught by the French revolution, there is none sadder or more striking than this—that you may make everything else out of the passions of men except a political system that will work, and that there is nothing so pitilessly and unconsciously cruel as sincerity formulated into dogma.—Lowell.

Popularity disarms envy in well-disposed minds. Those are ever the most ready to do justice to others who feel that the world has done them justice. When success has not this effect in opening the mind, it is a sign that it has been ill deserved.—Hazlitt.

In our country and in our times no man is worthy the honored name of statesman who does not include the highest practicable education of the people in all his plans of administration. He may have eloquence, he may have a knowledge of all history, diplomacy, jurisprudence; and by these he might claim, in other countries, the elevated rank of a statesman: but unless he speaks, plans, labors, at all times and in all places, for the culture and edification of the whole people, he is not, he cannot be, an American statesman.—Horace Mann.

A weapon that comes down as still
As snowflakes fall upon the sod;
But executes a freeman's will.
As lightning does the will of God;
And from its force, nor doors nor locks
Can shield you; 'tis the ballot-box.
—Pierpont.

Who's in or out, who moves the grand machine,
Nor stirs my curiosity, or spleen;
Secrets of state no more I wish to know
Than secret movements of a puppet-show;
Let but the puppets move, I've my desire,
Unseen the hand which guides the master wire.
—Churchill.

A politician weakly and amiably in the right is no match for a politician tenaciously and pugnaciously in the wrong. You cannot, by tying an opinion, to a man's tongue, make him the representative of that opinion; and at the close of any battle for principles, his name will be found neither among the dead nor among the wounded, but among the missing.—Whipple.

Nothing's more dull and negligent
Than an old lazy government,
That knows no interest of state,
But such as serves a present strait,
And, to patch up, or shift, will close
Or break alike with friends or foes;
That runs behindhand, and has spent
Its credit to the last extent;
And, the first time 'tis at a loss,
Has not one true friend, nor one cross.
—Butler.

Some have said that it is not the business of private men to meddle with government—a bold and dishonest saying, which is fit to come from no mouth but that of a tyrant or a slave. To say that private men have nothing to do with government is to say that private men have nothing to do with their own happiness or misery; that people ought not to concern themselves whether they be naked or clothed, fed or starved, deceived or instructed, protected or destroyed.—Cato.

The manna of popular liberty must be gathered each day, or it is rotten. The living sap of to-day outgrows the dead rind of yesterday. The hand intrusted with power becomes, either from human depravity or esprit de corps, the necessary enemy of the people. Only by continual oversight can a Democrat in office be prevented from hardening into a despot; only by unintermitted agitation can a people be kept sufficiently awake to principle not to let liberty be smothered in material prosperity.—Wendell Phillips.

Popularity

Popularity is power.—Macaulay.

Avoid popularity, if you would have peace.—Abraham Lincoln.

Popular applause veers with the wind.—John Bright.

Yet has the popular voice much potency.—Æschylus.

To please the many is to displease the wise.—Plutarch.

Whatever is popular deserves attention.—Mackintosh.

The good opinion of the vulgar is injurious.—Montaigne.

Woe unto you when all men shall speak well of you!—Bible.

Bareheaded, popularly low he bow'd,
And paid the salutations of the crowd.
—Dryden.

The ladies call him sweet;
The stairs, as he treads on them, kiss his feet.
—Shakespeare.

The great secrets of being courted are, to shun others, and seem delighted with yourself.—Bulwer-Lytton.

As inclination changes, thus ebbs and flows the unstable tide of public judgment.—Schiller.

They who are pleased themselves must always please.—Thomson.

There are people who, like new songs, are in vogue only for a time.—Rochefoucauld.

Popular opinion is the greatest lie in the world.—Carlyle.

Our merit gains us the esteem of the virtuous; our star, that of the public.—Rochefoucauld.

Avoid popularity, it has many snares, and no real benefit.—William Penn.

Racine will pass away like the taste for coffee.—Mme. de Sévigné.

Popular opinion is oftenest, what Carlyle pronounced it to be, a lie!—Wendell Phillips.

A habitation giddy and unsure bath he that buildeth on the vulgar heart.—Shakespeare.

Of all the scamps society knows, the traditional good fellow is the most despicable.—J. G. Holland.

The actor's popularity is evanescent; applauded to-day, forgotten to-morrow.—Edwin Forrest.

Public opinion is a courtesan, whom we seek to please without respecting.—J. Petit-Senn.

Those men who are commended by everybody must be very extraordinary men; or, which is more probable, very inconsiderable men.—Lord Greville.

He who can listen pleas'd to such applause,
Buys at a dearer rate than I dare purchase,
And pays for idle air with sense and virtue.—Mallett.

Good-humor and generosity carry the day with the popular heart all the world over.—Alexander Smith.

There is what is called the highway to posts and honors, and there is a cross and by way, which is much the shortest.—Bruyère.

I put no account on him who esteems himself just as the popular breath may chance to raise him.—Goethe.

The rude reproaches of the rascal herd for the selfsame actions, if successful, would be as grossly lavish in their praise.—Thomson.

I do not like the man who squanders life for fame; give me the man who, living, makes a name.—Martial.

O, he sits high in all the people's hearts:
And that, which would appear offence in us,
His countenance, like richest alchymy,
Will change to virtue and to worthiness.—Shakespeare.

And to some men popularity is always suspicious. Enjoying none themselves, they are prone to suspect the validity of those attainments which command it.—Geo. Henry Lewis.

Applause waits on success; the fickle multitude, like the light straw that floats along the stream, glide with the current still, and follow fortune.—Franklin.

It is not so difficult a task to plant new truths as to root out old errors; for there is this paradox in men—they run after that which is new, but are prejudiced in favor of that which is old.—Colton.

The love of popularity seems little else than the love of being beloved; and is only blamable when a person aims at the affections of a people by means in appearance honest, but in their end pernicious and destructive.—Shenstone.

The vulgar and common esteem is seldom happy in hitting right; and I am much mistaken if, amongst the writings of my time, the worst are not those which have most gained the popular applause.—Montaigne.

A generous nation is grateful even for the preservation of its rights, and willingly extends the respect due to the office of a good prince into an affection for his person.—Junius.

Every wretch, pining and pale before Beholding him, plucks comfort from his looks:

A largess universal, like the sun,
His liberal eye doth give to every one,
Thawing cold fear. —Shakespeare.

I wish popularity; but it is that popularity which follows, not that which is run after—it is that popularity which sooner or later never fails to do justice to the pursuit of noble ends by noble means.—Lord Mansfield.

Could the departed, whoever he may be, return in a week after his decease, he would almost invariably find himself at a higher or a lower point than he had formerly occupied on the scale of public appreciation.—Hawthorne.

I have discovered that a famed familiarity in great ones is a note of certain usurpation on the less; for great and popular men feign themselves to be servants to others to make those slaves to them.—Ben Jonson.

The truth, the hope, of any time must be sought in the minorities. Michael Angelo was the conscience of Italy. We grow free with his name, and find it ornamental now, but in his own day his friends were few.—Emerson.

The common people are but ill judges of a man's merits; they are slaves to fame, and their eyes are dazzled with the pomp of titles and large retinue. No wonder, then, that they bestow their honors on those who least deserve them.—Horace.

Please not thyself the flattering crowd to hear;

'Tis fulsome stuff, to please thy itching
ear.

Survey thy soul, not what thou does appear,

But what thou art. —Persius.

Be as far from desiring the popular love as fearful to deserve the popular bate; ruin dwells in both: the one will hug thee to death; the other will crush thee to destruction: to escape the first, be not ambitious; to avoid the second, be not seditious.—Quarles.

Seek not the favor of the multitude:
it is seldom got by honest and lawful means. But seek the testimony of few; and number not voices, but weigh them.—Kant.

Popularity is like the brightness of a falling star, the fleeting splendor of a rainbow, the bubble that is sure to burst by its very inflation.—Chatfield.

The world sees only the reflection of merit; therefore when you come to know a really great man intimately, you may as often find him above as below his reputation.—Goethe.

His joy concealed, he sets himself to show;
On each side bowing popularly low:

His looks, his gestures, and his words he frames,

And with familiar ease repeats their names, Thus formed by nature, furnished out with arts,

He glides unfelt into their secret hearts.
—Dryden.

Some shout him, and some hang upon his car

To gaze in his eyes and bless him. Maid-ens wave

Their 'kerchiefs, and old women weep for joy;

While others not so satisfied, unhorse
The gilded equipage, and turning loose
His steeds, usurp a place they well deserve. —Cowper.

Oh, popular applause! what heart of man
Is proof against thy sweet seducing charms?

The wisest and the best feel urgent need
Of all their caution in thy gentlest gales;
But swell'd into a gust—who then, alas!
With all his canvas set, and inexpert,
And therefore, heedless, can withstand thy power? —Cowper.

The greatness of a popular character is less according to the ratio of his genius than the sympathy he shows with the prejudices and even the ab-surdities of his time. Fanatics do not select the cleverest, but the most fanatical leaders; as was evidenced in the choice of Robespierre by the French Jacobins, and in that of Cromwell by the English Puritans.—Lamar-tine.

They more or less came in with cap and knee,
Met him in boroughs, cities, villages;
Attended him on bridges, stood on lanes,
Laid gifts before him, proffer'd him their oaths,
Gave him their heirs: as pages follow'd him,
Even at his heels, in golden multitudes.
—Shakespeare.

I have no taste
Of popular applause: The noisy praise
Of giddy crowds as changeable as winds;
Still vehement, and still without a cause;
Servants to chance, and blowing in the tide
Of swollen success; but veering with the ebb,
It leaves the channel dry. —Dryden.

Your affections are A sick man's appetite, who desires most that Which would increase his evil. He that depends Upon your favor, swims with fins of lead,
And hews down oaks with rushes. Hang ye!
Trust ye?
With every minute you do change a mind;
And call him noble that was now your hate,
Him vile that was your garland.
—Shakespeare.

Their poet, a sad trimmer, but no less
In company a very pleasant fellow,
Had been the favorite of full many a mess
Of men, and made them speeches when half mellow;
And though his meaning they could rarely guess,
Yet still they deign'd to hiccup or to bellow
The glorious meed of popular applause,
Of which the first ne'er knows the second cause.
—Byron.

I have seen
The dumb men throng to see him, and the blind
To hear him speak: the matrons flung their gloves,
Ladies and maids their scarfs and handkerchiefs,
Upon him as he pass'd: the nobles bended,
As to Jove's statue; and the commons made
A shower and thunder, with their caps and shouts:
I never saw the like.
—Shakespeare.

Then, as I said, the duke, great Bolingbroke,
Mounted upon a hot and fiery steed,
Which his aspiring rider seem'd to know,
With slow but stately pace kept on his course;
While all tongues cry'd, God save thee, Bolingbroke,
You would have thought the very windows spake
So many greedy looks of young and old
Through casements darted their desiring eyes Upon his visage. —Shakespeare.

O breath of public praise,
Short-liv'd and vain! oft gain'd without desert,
As often lost, unmerited; composed
But of extremes: Thou first beginn'st with love Enthusiastic, madness of affection; then (Bounding o'er moderation and o'er reason)
Thou turn'st to hate, as causeless and as fierce.
—Havard.

All tongues speak of him, and the bleared sights
Are spectacted to see him: your prattling nurse
Into a rapture lets her baby cry,
While she chats him: the kitchen malkin pins
Her richest lockram 'bout her reechy neck,
Clambering the walls to eye him: stalls, bulks, windows,
Are smother'd up, leads fill'd, and ridges hors'd
With variable complexions; all agreeing
In earnestness to see him.
—Shakespeare.

Position

I take sanctuary in an honest mediocrity.—Bruyère.

The well-instructed moon flies not from her orbit to seize on the glories of her partner.—Margaret Fuller Ossoli.

The higher we rise the more isolated we become; and all elevations are cold.
—Boufflers.

A great many men—some comparatively small men now—if put in the right position, would be Luthers and Columbuses.—Chapin.

Baron Grimm declared that, as a rule, it was easy for little minds to attain splendid positions, because they devoted all their ability to the one object.—Wendell Phillips.

A true man never frets about his place in the world, but just slides into it by the gravitation of his nature, and swings there as easily as a star.—Chapin.

Where you are is of no moment, but only what you are doing there. It is not the place that ennobles you, but you the place; and this only by doing that which is great and noble.—Petrarch.

In general, it is not very difficult for little minds to attain splendid situations. It is much more difficult for great minds to attain the place to which their merit fully entitles them.—Baron de Grimm.

Woman has gradually risen in the scale of humanity, till she now occupies a position loftier than which her proudest ambition need scarcely aspire—a position, if not equal to what false flatterers may claim to be her due, yet one, if she but improve the opportunities placed within her reach, equal to the moral regeneration of the world.—Alexander Walker.

Since the foundation of the world man has had nearly all the forces on his side, working with him and for him; his intellect has been stimulated, while that of woman has been abased; he has had the run of the world and all quickening and brightening things, while she has sat in the cinders, and until of late been illumined only by his reflected light.—Harriet Prescott Spofford.

Lord Bacon has compared those who move in higher spheres to those heavenly bodies in the firmament, which have much admiration, but little rest. And it is not necessary to invest a wise man with power to convince him that it is a garment bedizened with gold, which dazzles the beholder by its splendor, but oppresses the wearer by its weight.—Colton.

Positiveness

Every one of his opinions appears to himself to be written with sunbeams.—Watts.

Positiveness is a most absurd foible. If you are in the right, it lessens your triumph; if in the wrong, it adds shame to your defeat.—Sterne.

The most positive men are the most credulous, since they most believe themselves, and advise most with their falsest flatterer and worst enemy—their own self-love.—Pope.

Positiveness is a good quality for preachers and orators, because whoever would obtrude his thoughts and reasons upon a multitude will convince others the more, as he appears convinced himself.—Swift.

Possession

All comes from, and will go to others.—George Herbert.

For what one has in black and white,
One can carry home in comfort.
—Goethe.

Property has its duties as well as its rights.—Thomas Drummond.

The sun never sets on the immense empire of Charles V.—Scott.

I die,—but first I have possess'd,
And come what may, I have been bless'd.
—Byron.

As soon as women become ours we are no longer theirs.—Montaigne.

Remember, not one penny can we take with us into the unknown land.—Seneca.

Lord of himself, though not of lands,
And having nothing, yet hath all.
—Sir Henry Wotton.

When we have not what we love,
we must love what we have.—Bussy-Rabutin.

All our possessions are as nothing compared to health, strength, and a clear conscience.—Hosea Ballou.

Aspiration sees only one side of every question; possession, many.—Lowell.

Women are angels, wooing:
Things won are done, joy's soul lies in the doing.
—Shakespeare.

People may have too much of a good thing:
Full as an egg of wisdom thus I sing.
—John Wolcott.

The sweets we wish for, turn to loathed sours,
Even in the moment that we call them ours.
—Shakespeare.

The proud daughter of that monarch to whom when it grows dark (elsewhere) the sun never sets.—Guarini.

Possession means to sit astride of the world,
Instead of having it astride of you.
—Charles Kingsley.

Thus have I had thee, as a dream doth flatter,
In sleep a king, but waking, no such matter.
—Shakespeare.

Of a rich man who was mean and niggardly, he said, "That man does not possess his estate, but his estate possesses him."—Diogenes Laertius.

Cleon hath ten thousand acres,—
Ne'er a one have I;
Cleon dwelleth in a palace,—
In a cottage I. —Charles Mackay.

I ne'er could any lustre see
In eyes that would not look on me;
I ne'er saw nectar on a lip
But where my own did hope to sip.
—R. B. Sheridan.

Our material possessions, like our joys, are enhanced in value by being shared. Hoarded and unimproved property can only afford satisfaction to a miser.—G. D. Prentice.

We only begin to realize the value of our possessions when we commence to do good to others with them. No earthly investment pays so large an interest as charity.—Joseph Cook.

All the good things of this world are no further good than as they are of use; and whatever we may heap up to give to others, we enjoy only as much of as we can use.—De Foe.

In life, as in chess, one's own pawns block one's way. A man's very wealth, ease, leisure, children, books, which should help him to win, more often checkmate him.—Charles Buxton.

That what we have we prize not to the worth
Whiles we enjoy it, but being lack'd and lost,
Why, then we rack the value, then we find
The virtue that possession would not show us
While it was ours. —Shakespeare.

Common people, whether lords or shop-keepers, are slow to understand that possession, whether in the shape of birth or lands or money or intellect, is a small affair in the difference between men.—George MacDonald.

Attainment is followed by neglect, and possession by disgust. The malicious remark of the Greek epigrammatist on marriage may apply to every other course of life—that its two days of happiness are the first and the last.—Dr. Johnson.

It is said, that the thing you possess is worth more than two you may have in the future. The one is sure and the other is not. (A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush.)—La Fontaine.

Possession, why more tasteless than pursuit? Why is a wish far dearer than a crown? that wish accomplished, why the grave of bliss? Because in the great future, buried deep, beyond our plans of empire and renown, lies all that man with ardor should pursue; and He who made him bent him to the right.—Young.

The right of individual property is no doubt the very corner-stone of civilization, as hitherto understood; but I am a little impatient of being told that property is entitled to exceptional consideration because it bears all the burdens of the state. It bears those, indeed, which can be most easily borne, but poverty pays with its person the chief expenses of war, pestilence, and famine.—Lowell.

When I behold what pleasure is pursuit,
What life, what glorious eagerness it is,
Then mark how full possession falls
from this,
How fairer seems the blossom than the fruit,—
I am perplex't, and often stricken mute, Wondering which attained the higher
bliss,
The winged insect, or the chrysalis
It thrust aside with unreluctant foot.
—T. B. Aldrich.

The only test of possession is use.
The talent that is buried is not owned.
The napkin and the hole in the ground are far more truly the man's property, because they are accomplishing something for him, slothful and shameful though it be. And what is a lost soul? Is it not one that God cannot use, or one that cannot use God?
Trustless, prayerless, fruitless, loveless—is it not so far lost? So may a man have a soul that is lost and be dead while he lives.—Maltbie Babcock.

Post (Letters)

The letter, is too long by half a mile.
—Shakespeare.

Let me hear from thee by letters.—
Shakespeare.

Here are a few of the unpleasant'st words
That ever blotted paper! —Shakespeare.

And oft the pangs of absence to remove
By letters, soft interpreters of love.
—Prior.

Soon as thy letters trembling I unclose, That well-known name awakens all my wocs. —Pope.

Ev'n so, with all submission, I * * *
Send you each year a homely letter,
Who may return me much a better.
—Prior.

Tell him there's a post come from my master, with his horn full of good news.—Shakespeare.

A strange volume of real life in the daily packet of the postman. Eternal love and instant payment!—Douglas Jerrold.

Thou bringest * * *
* * * letters unto trembling hands.
—Tennyson.

Jove and my stars be praised!
Here is yet a postscript.—Shake-
speare.

If this letter move him not, his legs cannot.
I'll give 't him. —Shakespeare.

Heav'n first taught letters for some wretch's aid,
Some banish'd lover, or some captive maid.
—Pope.

What! have I 'scaped love-letters in the holiday-time of my beauty, and am I now a subject for them?—
Shakespeare.

Growing one's own choice words and fancies
In orange tubs, and beds of pansies;
One's sighs and passionate declarations,
In odorous rhetoric of carnations.
—Leigh Hunt.

Good-bye—my paper's out so nearly,
I've only room for, Yours sincerely.
—Moore.

Thy letter sent to prove me,
Inflicts no sense of wrong;
No longer wilt thou love me,—
Thy letter, though, is long.
—Heine.

The welcome news is in the letter found;
The carrier's not commission'd to expound;
It speaks itself, and what it does contain,
In all things needful to be known, is plain. —Dryden.

Go, little letter, apace, apace,
Fly;
Fly to the light in the valley below—
Tell my wish to her dewy blue eye.
—Tennyson.

Line after line my gushing eyes o'erflow,
Led thro' a sad variety of woe:
Now warm in love, now with'ring in my bloom,
Lost in a convent's solitary gloom!
—Pope.

A piece of simple goodness—a letter gushing from the heart: a beautiful unstudied vindication of the worth and untiring sweetness of human nature—a record of the invulnerability of man, armed with high purpose, sanctified by truth.—Douglas Jerrold.

I have a letter from her
Of such contents as you will wonder at The mirth whereof so larded with my matter,
That neither singly can be manifested,
Without the show of both.
—Shakespeare.

Kind messages, that pass from land to land;
Kind letters, that betray the heart's deep history,
In which we feel the pressure of a hand,—
One touch of fire,—and all the rest is mystery!
—Longfellow.

I will touch
My mouth unto the leaves, caressingly;
And so wilt thou. Thus, from these lips of mine
My message will go kissingly to thine,
With more than Fancy's load of luxury,
And prove a true love-letter.
—J. G. Saxe.

I read
Of that glad year that once had been,
In those fall'n leaves which kept their
green,
The noble letters of the dead;
And strangely on the silence broke
The silent-speaking words. —Tennyson.

An exquisite invention this,
Worthy of Love's most honeyed kiss,—
This art of writing billet-doux—
In buds, and odors, and bright hues!
In saying all one feels and thinks
In clever daffodils and pinks;
In puns of tulips; and in phrases,
Charming for their truth, of daisies.
—Leigh Hunt.

Every day brings a ship,
Every ship brings a word;
Well for those who have no fear,
Looking seaward well assured
That the word the vessel brings
Is the word they wish to hear.
—Emerson.

Letters, from absent friends, extinguish fear,
Unite division, and draw distance near;
Their magic force each silent wish conveys,
And wafts embodied thought, a thousand ways:
Could souls to bodies write, death's pow'r were mean
For minds could then meet minds with heav'n between. —Aaron Hill.

Belshazzar had a letter,—
He never had but one;
Belshazzar's correspondent
Concluded and begun
In that immortal copy
The conscience of us all
Can read without its glasses
On revelation's wall.
—Emily Dickinson.

Posterity

Time will unveil all things to posterity.—Euripides.

Why should we legislate for posterity? What has posterity ever done for us?—Sir Boyle Roche.

Think of your forefathers! Think of your posterity!—John Q. Adams.

The judgment of posterity is truer, because it is free from envy and malevolence.—Cicero.

People will not look forward to posterity who never look backward to their ancestors.—Burke.

Posterity preserves only what will pack into small compass. Jewels are handed down from age to age; less portable valuables disappear.—Lord Stanley.

We are too careless of posterity; not considering that as they are, so the next generation will be.—William Penn.

If we would amend the world we should mend ourselves; and teach our children to be, not what we are, but what they should be.—William Penn.

Here you would know, and enjoy, what posterity will say of Washington. For a thousand leagues have nearly the same effect with a thousand years.—Benj. Franklin.

The love of posterity is the consequence of the necessity of death. If a man were sure of living forever here, he would not care about his offspring.—Hawthorne.

The drafts which true genius draws upon posterity, although they may not always be honored so soon as they are due, are sure to be paid with compound interest in the end.—Colton.

What does not wasting time change! The age of our parents, worse than that of our grandsires, has brought us forth more impious still, and we shall produce a more vicious progeny.—Horace.

With respect to the authority of great names, it should be remembered that he alone deserves to have any weight or influence with posterity who has shown himself superior to the particular and predominant error of his own time.—Colton.

It is pleasant to observe how free the present age is in laying taxes on the next. "Future ages shall talk of this; they shall be famous to all posterity;" whereas their time and thoughts will be taken up about present things, as ours are now.—Swift.

Poverty

Few, save the poor, feel for the poor.—L. E. Landon.

Poverty is the stepmother of genius.—H. W. Shaw.

To have nothing is not poverty.—Martial.

My poverty, but not my will, consents.—Shakespeare.

The poor man's wisdom is despised.—South.

Whose plenty made him pore.—Spenser.

And plenty makes us poor.—Dryden.

Steep'd me in poverty to the very lips.—Shakespeare.

Poverty often deprives a man of all spirit and virtue.—Benjamin Franklin.

The inevitable consequence of poverty is dependence.—Johnson.

A man guilty of poverty easily believes himself suspected.—Johnson.

Poverty is relative, and, therefore, not ignoble.—Bulwer-Lytton.

As society advances the standard of poverty rises.—Theodore Parker.

There is nothing perfectly secure but poverty.—Longfellow.

Where penury is felt the thought is chain'd,
And sweet colloquial pleasures are but few.
—Cowper.

We think poverty to be infinitely desirable before the torments of covetousness.—Jeremy Taylor.

Who can speak broader than he that has no house to put his head in?—Such may rail against great buildings.—Shakespeare.

The lack of wealth is easily repaired; but the poverty of the soul is irreparable.—Montaigne.

Poverty is the test of civility and the touchstone of friendship.—Hazlitt.

No, madame, 'tis not so well that I am poor; though many of the rich are damned.—Shakespeare.

Thou source of all my bliss and all my woe, that found'st me poor at first, and keep'st me so.—Goldsmith.

There is a noble manner of being poor, and who does not know it will never be rich.—Seneca.

The greatest hardship of poverty is that it tends to make men ridiculous.—Juvenal.

Poverty persuades a man to do and suffer everything that he may escape from it.—Lucian.

To be poor, and to seem poor, is a certain method never to rise.—Goldsmith.

If poverty is the mother of crimes, want of sense is the father of them.—Bruyère.

He travels safe and not unpleasantly who is guarded by poverty and guided by love.—Sir P. Sidney.

Poverty makes people satirical, soberly, sadly, bitterly satirical.—Haines Friswell.

He had a prince's mind imprisoned in a poor man's purse.—Fuller.

Poverty snatches the reins out of the hand of piety.—Saadi.

It is the care of a very great part of mankind to conceal their indignance from the rest.—Dr. Johnson.

Poverty possesses this disease; through want it teaches a man evil.—Euripides.

Perhaps a reasonable apprehension of poverty is more paralyzing than the reality.—James Cotter Morison.

Through tattered clothes small vices do appear; robes and furred gowns hide all.—Shakespeare.

He is not poor who has the use of necessary things.—Horace.

The traveler without money will sing before the robber.—Juvenal.

They say, poor suitors have strong breaths.—Shakespeare.

It is unmistakable madness to live in poverty only to die rich.—Juvenal.

They do not easily rise whose abilities are repressed by poverty at home.—Juvenal.

Poverty is shunned and persecuted all over the globe.—Lucan.

Nor is there on earth a more powerful advocate for vice than poverty.—Goldsmith.

I am as poor as Job, my lord, but not so patient.—Shakespeare.

Rarely they rise by virtue's aid who lie plunged in the depth of helpless poverty.—Juvenal.

Not he who has little, but he who wishes for more, is poor.—Seneca.

The rich know not how hard it is to be of needful rest and needful food debarred.—L. E. Landon.

This mournful truth is everywhere confessed,
Slow rises worth by poverty depressed.
—Dr. Johnson.

Rattle his bones over the stones!
He's only a pauper whom nobody owns!
—Thomas Noel.

The poor trying to imitate the powerful, perish.—Phædrus.

If we from wealth to poverty descend,
Want gives to know the flatterer from the friend.
—Dryden.

But to the world no bugbear is so great,
As want of figure and a small estate.
—Pope.

O God! that bread should be so dear,
And flesh and blood so cheap!
—Hood.

Poverty, when it is voluntary, is never despicable, but takes an heroic aspect.—Hazlitt.

Poverty is the only load which is the heavier the more loved ones there are to assist in supporting it.—Richter.

Chill penury repress'd their noble rage,
And froze the genial current of the soul.
—Gray.

Burns o'er the plough sung sweet his wood-notes wild;
And richest Shakespeare was a poor man's child.
—Ebenezer Elliott.

But poverty, with most who whimper forth
Their long complaints, is self-inflicted woe;
The effect of laziness, or sottish waste.
—Cowper.

Most wretched men
Are cradled into poetry by wrong.
They learn in suffering what they teach in song.
—Shelley.

Be honest poverty thy boasted wealth;
So shall thy friendships be sincere, tho' few,
So shall thy sleep be sound, thy waking cheerful.
—Havard.

All this (wealth) excludes but one evil—poverty.—Samuel Johnson.

Poverty is a bitter weed to most women, and there are few indeed who can accept it with dignity.—E. Lynn Linton.

Ayl idleness! the rich folks never fail To find some reason why the poor deserve Their miseries. —Southey.

Yes, child of suffering, thou may'st well be ^{sure} He who ordained the Sabbath loves the poor. —O. W. Holmes.

In one important respect a man is fortunate in being poor. His responsibility to God is so much the less.—Bovee.

We like the fine extravagance of that philosopher who declared that no man was as rich as all men ought to be.—Whipple.

It is a kind of blindness—poverty. We can only grope through life when we are poor, hitting and maiming ourselves against every angle.—Ouida.

In a change of government the poor change nothing but the name of their masters.—Phædrus.

Gold gives an appearance of beauty even to ugliness; but with poverty everything becomes frightful.—Boileau.

Chill penury weighs down the heart itself; and though it sometimes be endured with calmness, it is but the calmness of despair.—Mrs. Jameson.

Poverty, labor, and calamity are not without their luxuries, which the rich, the indolent, and the fortunate in vain seek for.—Hazlitt.

We should not so much esteem our poverty as a misfortune, were it not that the world treats it so much as a crime.—Bovee.

It requires a great deal of poetry to gild the pill of poverty, and then it will pass current only in theory; the reality is a dead failure.—Madame Deluzy.

Men praise poverty, as the African worships Mumbo Jumbo—from terror of the malign power, and a desire to propitiate it.—Alexander Smith.

Not to be able to bear poverty is a shameful thing, but not to know how to chase it away by work is a more shameful thing yet.—Pericles.

Money never made any man rich, but his mind. He that can order himself to the law of nature, is not only without the sense, but the fear of poverty.—Ben Jonson.

Poverty sits by the cradle of all our great men, and rocks them up to manhood; and this meager foster-mother remains their faithful companion throughout life.—Heine.

Poverty often deprives a man of all spirit and virtue. It is hard for an empty bag to stand upright.—Franklin.

An avowal of poverty is a disgrace to no man; to make no effort to escape from it is indeed disgraceful.—Thucydides.

Without frugality none can be rich, and with it very few would be poor.—Dr. Johnson.

We want fewer things to live in poverty with satisfaction, than to live magnificently with riches.—St. Evremond.

Nature makes us poor only when we want necessities, but custom gives the name of poverty to the want of superfluities.—Johnson.

Poverty palls the most generous spirits; it cows industry, and casts resolution itself into despair.—Addison.

Poverty is very good in poems, but it is very bad in a house. It is very good in maxims and sermons, but it is very bad in practical life.—Henry Ward Beecher.

For a generous and noble spirit cannot be expected to dwell in the breast of men who are struggling for their daily bread.—Dionysius.

One solitary philosopher may be great, virtuous, and happy in the depth of poverty, but not a whole people.—Isaak Iselin.

Want is a bitter and a hateful good,
Because its virtues are not understood;
Yet many things, impossible to thought,
Have been by need to full perfection
brought. —Dryden.

Speak gently, kindly, to the poor;
Let no harsh term be heard;
They have enough they must endure
Without an unkind word.
—David Bates.

O grant me, heav'n, a middle state,
Neither too humble nor too great;
More than enough for nature's ends,
With something left to treat my friends.
—Mallet.

His rawbone cheekes, through penurie and
pine,
Were shronke into his jawes, as he did never dyne. —Spenser.

That some of the indigent among us die of scanty food is undoubtedly true; but vastly more in this community die from eating too much than from eating too little.—Channing.

That man is to be accounted poor, of whatever rank he be, and suffers the pains of poverty, whose expenses exceed his resources; and no man is, properly speaking, poor, but he.—
Paley.

It is impossible to diminish poverty by the multiplication of goods; for,
manage as we may, misery and suffering will always cleave to the border
of superfluity.—Jacobi.

What is even poverty itself, that a man should murmur under it? It is but as the pain of piercing a maiden's ear, and you hang precious jewels in the wound.—Richter.

The extent of poverty in the world is much exaggerated. Our sensitiveness makes half our poverty; our fears—anxieties for ills that never happen—a greater part of the other half.—Bovee.

The real wants of nature are the measure of enjoyments, as the foot is the measure of the shoe. We can call only the want of what is necessary poverty.—St. Clement.

No man is poor who does not think himself so. But if in a full fortune with impatience he desires more, he proclaims his wants and his beggarly condition.—Jeremy Taylor.

How like a railway tunnel is the poor man's life, with the light of childhood at one end, the intermediate gloom, and only the glimmer of a future life at the other extremity!—
Bovee.

It would be a considerable consolation to the poor and discontented could they but see the means whereby the wealth they covet has been acquired, or the misery that it entails.—Zimmermann.

Poverty is only contemptible when it is felt to be so. Doubtless the best way to make our poverty respectable is to seem never to feel it as an evil.—
Bovee.

Resolve not to be poor: whatever you have, spend less. Poverty is a great enemy to human happiness; it certainly destroys liberty, and it makes some virtues impracticable and others extremely difficult.—Johnson.

Stitch! stitch! stitch!
In poverty, hunger, and dirt,
And still with a voice of dolorous pitch,
Would that its tone could reach the Rich,
She sang this "Song of the Shirt!"
—Hood.

O blissful poverty!
Nature, too partial to thy lot, assigns
Health, freedom, innocence, and downy
peace,
Her real goods; and only mocks the great,
With empty pageantries. —Fenton.

Art thou so bare, and full of wretchedness,
And fear'st to die? famine is in thy cheeks,
Need and oppression starveth in thy eyes,
Content and beggary hang upon thy back,
The world is not thy friend, nor the world's law. —Shakespeare.

There is nothing keeps longer than a middling fortune, and nothing melts away sooner than a great one. Poverty treads upon the heels of great and unexpected riches.—Bruyère.

Poor naked wretches, whereso'er you are, that bide the pelting of this pitiless storm, how shall your houseless heads and unfed sides, your looped and windowed raggedness, defend you from seasons such as these?—Shakespeare.

Morality and religion are but words to him who fishes in gutters for the means of sustaining life, and crouches behind barrels in the street for shelter from the cutting blasts of a winter night.—Horace Greeley.

If rich, it is easy enough to conceal our wealth; but, if poor, it is not quite so easy to conceal our poverty. We shall find that it is less difficult to hide a thousand guineas than one hole in our coat.—Colton.

It is only luxury and avarice that make poverty grievous to us; for it is a very small matter that does our business, and when we have provided against cold, hunger, and thirst, all the rest is but vanity and excess.—Seneca.

Poverty must make a match, or make an assignation, or make some bargain scandalous to the man who drives it. More shillings conceded to the making of a shirt would double the religion of mankind.—John Weiss.

Rags, which are the reproach of poverty, are the beggar's robes, and graceful insignia of his profession, his tenure, his full dress, the suit in which he is expected to show himself in public.—Lamb.

Poverty is dishonorable, not in itself, but when it is a proof of laziness, intemperance, luxury, and carelessness; whereas in a person that is temperate, industrious, just and valiant, and who uses all his virtues for the public good, it shows a great and lofty mind.—Plutarch.

It is the great privilege of poverty to be happy unenvied, to be healthy without physic, secure without a guard, and to obtain from the bounty of nature what the great and wealthy are compelled to procure by the help of art.—Johnson.

Things come to the poor that can't get in at the door of the rich. Their money somehow blocks it up. It is a great privilege to be poor—one that no man covets, and but a very few have sought to retain, but one that yet many have learned to prize.—George MacDonald.

The poor man is a kind of money that is not current; the subject of every idle housewife's chat; the off-scum of the people; the dust of the street, first trampled under foot and then thrown on the dunghill; in conclusion, the poor man is the rich man's ass.—Alfarache.

That poverty which is not the daughter of the spirit is but the mother of shame and reproach; it is a disreputation that drowns all the other good parts that are in man; it is a disposition to all kind of evil; it is man's greatest foe.—Alfarache.

Wealth and poverty are seen for what they are. It begins to be seen that the poor are only they who feel poor, and poverty consists in feeling poor. The rich, as we reckon them, and among them the very rich, in a true scale would be found very indigent and ragged.—Emerson.

It is not poverty so much as pretence that harasses a ruined man—the struggle between a proud mind and an empty purse—the keeping up a hollow show that must soon come to an end. Have the courage to appear poor, and you disarm poverty of its sharpest sting.—Mrs. Jameson.

Poverty is, except where there is an actual want of food and raiment, a thing much more imaginary than real. The shame of poverty—the shame of being thought poor—it is a great and fatal weakness, though arising in this country, from the fashion of the times themselves.—Cobbett.

Few things in this world trouble people more than poverty, or the fear of poverty; and indeed it is a sore affliction; but, like all other ills that flesh is heir to, it has its antidote, its reliable remedy. The judicious application of industry, prudence, and temperance is a certain cure.—Hosea Ballou.

Poverty has, in large cities, very different appearances. It is often concealed in splendor, and often in extravagance. It is the care of a very great part of mankind to conceal their indigence from the rest. They support themselves by temporary expedients, and every day is lost in contriving for to-morrow.—Johnson.

Leave the poor
Some time for self-improvement. Let them not
Be forced to grind the bones out of their arms
For bread, but have some space to think and feel Like moral and immortal creatures.
—Bailey.

All I desire is, that my poverty may not be a burden to myself, or make me so to others; and that is the best state of fortune that is neither directly necessitous nor far from it. A mediocrity of fortune, with gentleness of mind, will preserve us from fear or envy; which is a desirable condition; for no man wants power to do mischief.—Seneca.

And mark the wretch, whose wanderings never knew
The world's regard, that soothes, though half untrue;
Whose erring heart the lash of sorrow bore,
But found not pity when it err'd no more.
Yon friendless man, at whose dejected eye
Th' unfeeling proud one looks, and passes
by;
Condemn'd on penury's barren path to
roam, Scorn'd by the world, and left without a home.
—Campbell.

Few save the poor feel for the poor;
The rich know not how hard
It is to be of needful rest
And needful food debarr'd:
They know not of the scanty meal,
With small pale faces round;
No fire upon the cold damp hearth
When snow is on the ground.
—Miss Landon.

There is not such a mighty difference as some men imagine between the poor and the rich; in pomp, show, and opinion there is a great deal, but little as to the pleasures and satisfactions of life: they enjoy the same earth and air and heavens; hunger and thirst make the poor man's meat and drink as pleasant and relishing as all the varieties which cover the rich man's table; and the labor of a poor man is more healthful, and many times more pleasant, too, than the ease and softness of the rich.—Sherlock.

Want is a bitter and a hateful good,
Because its virtues are not understood;
Yet many things, impossible to thought,
Have been by need to full perfection
brought.

The daring of the soul proceeds from thence,
Sharpness of wit, and active diligence;
Prudence at once, and fortitude it gives;
And, if in patience taken, mends our lives.
—Dryden.

Lord God, I thank Thee that Thou hast been pleased to make me a poor and indigent man upon earth. I have neither house nor land nor money, to leave behind me. Thou hast given me wife and children, whom I now restore to Thee. Lord, nourish, teach, and preserve them as Thou hast me.
—Luther.

Power

Patience and gentleness is power.—
Leigh Hunt.

I feel a host in this single arm.—
Schiller.

Power, safely defied, touches its downfall.—Macaulay.

They that govern most make least noise.—John Selden.

Pretension is nothing; power is everything.—Whipple.

He hath no power who hath not power to use.—Bailey.

The balance of power.—Sir Robt.
Walpole.

The desire of power in excess caused the angels to fall.—Bacon.

The highest power may be lost by misrule.—Syrus.

It is godlike to have power, but not to kill.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

We love and live in power.—Bailey.

Power, carried to extremes, is always liable to reaction.—Rufus Choate.

The less power a man has, the more he likes to use it.—J. Petit-Senn.

I know of nothing sublime which is not some modification of power.—Burke.

Even in war, moral power is to physical as three parts out of four.—Napoleon I.

All violence, all that is dreary and repels, is not power, but the absence of power.—Emerson.

Great men are they who see that spiritual is stronger than any material force, that thoughts rule the world.—Emerson.

It is not possible to found a lasting power upon injustice, perjury, and treachery.—Demosthenes.

The man who fears nothing is as powerful as he who is feared by everybody.—Schiller.

Power is seldom innocent, and envy is the yokefellow of eminence.—Tupper.

The awful shadow of some unseen Power Floats, tho' unseen, amongst us. Shelley.

What can power give more than food and drink,
To live at ease and not be bound to think? —Dryden.

The wild boar is often held by a small dog.—Ovid.

Next to the assumption of power was the responsibility of relinquishing it.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

Power * * * is a fretful thing, and hath its wings always spread for flight.—Lew Wallace.

Power is ever stealing from the many to the few.—Wendell Phillips.

A fair woman shall not only command without authority, but persuade without speaking.—Sir P. Sidney.

Power is always right, weakness always wrong. Power is always insolent and despotic.—Noah Webster.

Power acquired by guilt was never used for a good purpose.—Tacitus.

Concentration is the secret of strength in politics, in war, in trade, in short, in all management of human affairs.—Emerson.

Where power is absent we may find the robe of genius, but we miss the throne.—Landor.

We love and live in power; it is the spirit's end. Mind must subdue; to conquer is its life.—Bailey.

Power, in whatever hands, is rarely guilty of too strict limitations on itself.—Burke.

To have what we want is riches; but to be able to do without it is power.—George MacDonald.

Power is the queen of the world, not opinion; but opinion makes use of power.—Pascal.

The hammer and the anvil are the two hemispheres of every true reformer's character.—J. G. Holland.

Power obeys reality, and not appearances; power is according to quality, and not quantity.—Emerson.

Men are never very wise and select in the exercise of a new power.—Wm. Ellery Channing.

The lust of dominion burns with a flame so fierce as to overpower all other affections of the human breast.—Tacitus.

All the elements, whose aid man calls in, will sometimes become his masters.—Emerson.

The height of power in women, so far as manners are concerned, rests in tranquillity.—Mme. de Maintenon.

Want of principle is power. Truth and honesty set a limit to our efforts, which impudence and hypocrisy easily overleap.—Hazlitt.

Calm and serene he drives the furious blast,
And, pleas'd th' Almighty's orders to perform,
Rides in the whirlwind and directs the storm.
—Addison.

She knows her man, and when you rant and swear,
Can draw you to her with a single hair.
—Dryden.

Give me a lever long enough
And a prop strong enough,
I can single handed move the world.
—Archimedes.

As thou directest the power, harm or advantage will follow, and the torrent that swept the valley may be led to turn a mill.—Tupper.

Nothing, indeed, but the possession of some power can with any certainty discover what at the bottom is the true character of any man.—Burke.

The worst thing that can be said of the most powerful is that they can take your life; but the same thing can be said of the most weak.—Colton.

We have more power than will; and it is often by way of excuse to ourselves that we fancy things are impossible.—Rochefoucauld.

Power, like the diamond, dazzles the beholder, and also the wearer; it dignifies meanness; it magnifies littleness; to what is contemptible, it gives authority; to what is low, exaltation.—Colton.

The power of association is stronger than the power of beauty; therefore, the power of association is the power of beauty.—Ruskin.

Woman's power is over the affections. A beautiful dominion is hers; but she risks its forfeiture when she seeks to extend it.—Bovee.

To know the pains of power, we must go to those who have it: to know its pleasures, we must go to those who are seeking it; the pains of power are real, its pleasures imaginary.—Colton.

In his livery
Walk'd crowns and crowns; realms and islands were
As plates dropp'd from his pocket.
—Shakespeare.

Power and courtly influence form an intoxicating draught even when raised to the lips of an ascetic and a saint.—Sir J. Stephen.

We endow those whom we love, in our fond, passionate blindness, with power upon our souls too absolute to be a mortal's trust.—Mrs. Hemans.

She who has beauty might ensnare a conqueror's soul, and make him leave his crown at random, to be scuffled for by slaves.—Otway.

The good old rule
Sufficeth them, the simple plan,
That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can.
—Wordsworth.

Power will intoxicate the best hearts, as wine the strongest heads. No man is wise enough, nor good enough to be trusted with unlimited power.—Colton.

The greater a man is in power above others, the more he ought to excel them in virtue. None ought to govern who is not better than the governed.—Publius Syrus.

Beware of dissipating your powers; strive constantly to concentrate them. Genius thinks it can do whatever it sees others doing, but it is sure to repent of every ill-judged outlay.—Goethe.

All persons possessing any portion of power ought to be strongly and awfully impressed with an idea that they act in trust, and that they are to account for their conduct in that trust to the one great Master, Author, and founder of society.—Burke.

Life is a search after power; and this is an element with which the world is so saturated—there is no chink or crevice in which it is not lodged—that no honest seeker goes unrewarded.—Emerson.

Power, like a desolating pestilence,
Pollutes whate'er it touches; and obedience,
Bane of all genius, virtue, freedom, truth, Makes slaves of men, and of the human frame,
A mechanized automaton. —Shelley.

That magnetism, an unseen agent, is the instrumentality with which women are made more potent than the strongest men, cannot be questioned. It is more than an equivalent for large bones and elephantine muscles. —Dr. J. V. C. Smith.

There are three kinds of power,—wealth, strength, and talent; but as old age always weakens, often destroys, the two latter, the aged are induced to cling with the greater avidity to the former.—Colton.

Experience constantly proves that every man who has power is impelled to abuse it; he goes on till he is pulled up by some limits. Who would say it! virtue even has need of limits.—Montesquieu.

Power is so characteristically calm that calmness in itself has the aspect of power, and forbearance implies strength. The orator who is known to have at his command all the weapons of invective is most formidable when most courteous.—Bulwer-Lytton.

All who become men of power reach their estate by the same self-mastery, the same self-adjustment to circumstances, the same voluntary exercise and discipline of their faculties, and the same working of their life up to and into their high ideals of life.—J. G. Holland.

It is an observation no less just than common, that there is no stronger test of a man's real character than power and authority, exciting, as they do, every passion, and discovering every latent vice.—Plutarch.

Real power has fullness and variety. It is not narrow like lightning, but broad like light. The man who truly and worthily excels in any one line of endeavor, might also under a change of circumstances, have excelled in some other line. Power is a thing of solidity and wholeness.—Roswell D. Hitchcock.

Power exhibits itself under two distinct forms,—strength and force,—each possessing peculiar qualities, and each perfect in its own sphere. Strength is typified by the oak, the rock, the mountain. Force embodies itself in the cataract, the tempest, and the thunder-bolt.—Garfield.

Nothing really succeeds which is not based on reality; sham, in a large sense, is never successful; in the life of the individual, as in the more comprehensive life of the state, pretension is nothing and power is everything.—Whipple.

Unlimited power is helpless, as arbitrary power is capricious. Our energy is in proportion to the resistance it meets. We can attempt nothing great but from a sense of the difficulties we have to encounter: we can persevere in nothing great but from a pride in overcoming them.—Hazlitt.

It is in the faculty of noble, disinterested, unselfish love that lies the true gift and power of womanhood,—a power which makes us, not the equal of men (I never care to claim such equality), but their equivalents; more than their equivalents in a moral sense.—Frances Power Cobbe.

The weakest living creature, by concentrating his powers on a single object, can accomplish something; the strongest, by dispensing his over many, may fail to accomplish anything. The drop, by continually falling, bores its passage through the hardest rock. The hasty torrent rushes over it with hideous uproar, and leaves no trace behind.—Carlyle.

There is always room for a man of force, and he makes room for many. Society is a troop of thinkers, and the best heads among them take the best places. A feeble man can see the farms that are fenced and tilled, the houses that are built. The strong man sees the possible houses and farms. His eye makes estates as fast as the sun breeds clouds.—Emerson.

I will tell you where there is power: where the dew lies upon the hills, and the rain has moistened the roots of the various plants; where the sunshine pours steadily; where the brook runs babbling along, there is a beneficent power.—Chapin.

It is not the weariness of mortality, but the strength of divinity, which we have to recognize in all mighty things; and that is just what we now never recognize, but think that we are to do great things by help of iron bars and perspiration. Alas! we shall do nothing that way but lose some pounds of our own weight.—Ruskin.

There is no surer mark of a low and unregenerate nature than this tendency of power to loudness and wantonness instead of quietness and reverence. To souls baptized in Christian nobleness the largest sphere of command is but a wider empire of obedience, calling them, not to escape from holy rule, but to its full impersonation.—James Martineau.

Odin, thou whirlwind, what a threat is this Thou thetatest what transcends thy might, even thine.
For of all powers the mightiest far art thou,
Lord over men on earth, and Gods in Heaven;
Yet even from thee thyself hath been withheld
One thing—to undo what thou thyself hast ruled.
—Matthew Arnold.

Powerless

If an electric car stands motionless on the tracks, it is nothing against the power of electricity. If an invalid has no appetite, and cannot go out of doors at night, it is no argument against things to eat and the joy of starlit air. If a man does not know a flower by name, or a poem by heart, it is no indictment of the beauty of a rose, or the charm of poetry. If we bear the name of Christ but give no other sign of him, if we go through the forms of godliness, but live powerless lives, it is a thousand reproaches to us. To be powerless when Christ has all power, and we can have all we want, is an arraignment to which we can make no answer that is not self-incriminating.—Maltbie Babcock.

Practice

Practice makes perfect.—Franklin.

His nice fence and his active practice.—Shakespeare.

Theory looks well on paper, but does not amount to anything without practice.—H. W. Shaw.

Theory, from whatever source, is not perfect until it is reduced to practice.—Hosea Ballou.

Ah! if the pulpit would practice what it preaches, then all would be well.—Horace Greeley.

I am little inclined to practise on others, and as little that they should practise on me.—Sir W. Temple.

He sought to have that by practice which he could not by prayer.—Sir P. Sidney.

Things confirmed by long practice and usage have all the force of law.—Hooker.

In church they are taught to love God; after church they are practised to love their neighbor.—Landon.

There is a distinction, but no opposition, between theory and practice. Each to a certain extent supposes the other. Theory is dependent on practice; practice must have preceded theory.—Sir W. Hamilton.

There are two functions of the soul,—contemplation and practice,—according to the general division of objects; some of which only entertain our speculations, others employ our actions.—South.

Praise

The sweetest of all sounds is praise.—Xenophon.

A man who does not love praise is not a full man.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord.—Bible.

Praise undeserved is satire in disguise.—Broadhurst.

Good things should be praised.—
Shakespeare.

He hurts me most who lavishly commends.—Churchill.

Praise is only praise when well addressed.—Gay.

His praise is lost who waits till all commend.—Pope.

Solid pudding against empty praise.
—Pope.

Praise is the best diet for us, after ail.—Sydney Smith.

Earth with her thousand voices praises God.—Coleridge.

He who praises everybody praises
nobody.—Johnson.

The refusal of praise is only the wish to be praised twice.—La Rochefoucauld.

Praise from an enemy smells of craft.—Milton.

Just praise is only a debt, but flattery is a present.—Johnson.

Praise is the reflection of virtue.
—Bacon.

False praise is always confined to the great.—Lord Kames.

What woman can resist the force of praise?—Gav.

He who loves praise, loves temptation.—Thomas Wilson.

The love of praise, howe'er concealed by art,
Reigns more or less and glows in every heart. —Young.

Our continual desire for praise ought to convince us of our mortality, if nothing else will.—H. W. Shaw.

It is not he who searches for praise who finds it.—Rivarol.

For if good were not praised more than ill,
None would chuse goodness of his own free will. —Spenser.

For the good, when praised, feel something of disgust, if to excess commended.—Euripides.

Every ear is tickled with the sweet music of applause.—Barrow.

He who praises you for what you have not, wishes to take from you what you have.—Manuel.

The more you speak of yourself, the more you are likely to lie.—Zimmermann.

Praise, like gold and diamonds, owes its value only to its scarcity.—Dr. Johnson.

For what are men who grasp at praise sublime, but bubbles on the rapid stream of time?—Young.

A little praise is good for a shy temper;
it teaches it to rely on the kindness of others.—Landor.

The praise of a fool is incense to the wisest of us.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

One self-approving hour whole years outweighs of stupid starers and of loud huzzas.—Pope.

Praise begets emulation,—a goodly seed to sow among youthful students
—Horace Mann.

Those who are greedy of praise prove that they are poor in merit.—Plutarch.

Allow no man to be so free with you as to praise you to your face.—
Steele.

Praising what is lost,
Makes the remembrance dear.
—Shakespeare.

It is the greatest possible praise to be praised by a man who is himself deserving of praise.—From the Latin.

None can be pleased without praise, and few can be praised without falsehood.—Dr. Johnson.

Some praise at morning what they blame at night.
But always think the last opinion right.
—Pope.

It is a great happiness to be praised of them that are most praiseworthy.—Sir P. Sidney.

We are all excited by the love of praise, and it is the noblest spirits that feel it most.—Cicero.

Thou mayst be more prodigal of praise when thou writest a letter than when thou speakest in presence.—Fuller.

Too much magnifying of man or matter doth irritate contradiction, and procure envy and scorn.—Bacon.

Desert being the essential condition of praise, there can be no reality in the one without the other.—Washington Allston.

There can hardly, I believe, be imagined a more desirable pleasure than that of praise unmixed with any possibility of flattery.—Steele.

When thou receivest praise, take it indifferently, and return it to God, the giver of the gift, or blesser of the action.—Jeremy Taylor.

The commendation of adversaries is the greatest triumph of a writer, because it never comes unless extorted.—Dryden.

Praise follows Truth afar off; and only overtakes her at the grave; Plausibility clings to her skirts and holds her back till then.—Lowell.

We should not be too niggardly in our praise, for men will do more to support a character than to raise one.—Colton.

Praise is the symbol which represents sympathy, and which the mind insensibly substitutes for its recollection and language.—Mackintosh.

The praises of others may be of use in teaching us, not what we are, but what we ought to be.—Hare.

Sweet is the breath of praise when given by those whose own high merit claims the praise they give.—Hannah More.

Commend a fool for his wit, or a knave for his honesty, and they will receive you into their bosom.—Fielding.

You may be liberal in your praise where praise is due: it costs nothing; it encourages much.—Horace Mann.

One good deed dying tongueless slaughters a thousand waiting upon that. Our praises are our wages.—Shakespeare.

Praise never gives us much pleasure unless it concur with our own opinion, and extol us for those qualities in which we chiefly excel.—Hume.

Let another man praise thee, and not thine own mouth: a stranger, and not thine own lips.—Bible.

Praise is the best auxiliary to prayer; and he who most bears in mind what has been done for him by God will be most emboldened to supplicate fresh gifts from above.—Henry Melvill.

Half-uttered praise is to the curious mind, as to the eye half-veiled beauty is, more precious than the whole.—Joanna Baillie.

It is no flattery to give a friend a due character; for commendation is as much the duty of a friend as reprehension.—Plutarch.

Praise has different effects, according to the mind it meets with; it makes a wise man modest, but a fool more arrogant, turning his weak brain giddy.—Feltham.

What a person praises is perhaps a surer standard, even than what he condemns, of his own character, information and abilities.—Hare.

We are all excited by the love of praise, and the noblest are most influenced by glory.—Cicero.

As the Greek said, "Many men know how to flatter, few men know how to praise."—Wendell Phillips.

What we admire we praise; and when we praise,
Advance it into notice, that its worth Acknowledged, others may admire it too.
—Cowper.

Praise, of all things, is the most powerful excitement to commendable actions, and animates us in our enterprises.—La Bruyère.

The love of praise, howe'er conceal'd by
art,
Reigns, more or less, and glows, in ev'ry
heart:
The proud, to gain it, toils on toils endure;
The modest shun it, but to make it sure.
—Young.

Whenever you commend, add your reasons for doing so: it is this which distinguishes the approbation of a man of sense from the flattery of sycophants and admiration of fools.—Steele.

Praise in the beginning is agreeable enough, and we receive it as a favor: but when it comes in great quantities, we regard it only as a debt, which nothing but our merit could extort.—Goldsmith.

It is singular how impatient men are with overpraise of others, how patient of overpraise of themselves; and yet the one does them no injury, while the other may be their ruin.—Lowell.

Praise, like gold and diamonds, owes its value only to its scarcity. It becomes cheap as it becomes vulgar, and will no longer raise expectation or animate enterprise.—Johnson.

It is always esteemed the greatest mischief a man can do to those whom he loves, to raise men's expectations of them too high by undue and impertinent commendations.—Sprat.

Words of praise, indeed, are almost as necessary to warm a child into a genial life as acts of kindness and affection. Judicious praise is to children what the sun is to flowers.—Bo-vee.

Do not fancy, as too many do, that thou canst praise God by singing hymns to Him in church once a week, and disobeying Him all the week long. He asks of thee works as well as words; and more, He asks of thee works first and words after.—Charles Kingsley.

The passion for praise, which is so very vehement in the fair sex, produces excellent effects in women of sense, who desire to be admired for that which only deserves admiration.—Addison.

We always make our friend appear awkward and ridiculous by giving him a laced suit of tawdry qualifications, which nature never intended him to wear.—Junius.

Speak not in high commendation of any man to his face, nor censure any man behind his back: but if thou knowest anything good of him, tell it unto others; if anything ill, tell it privately and prudently to himself.—Burkitt.

Be not too great a niggard in the commendations of him that professes thy own quality: if he deserve thy praise, thou hast discovered thy judgment; if not, thy modesty: honor either returns or reflects to the giver.—Quarles.

There is a certain virtue in every good man, which night and day stirs up the mind with the stimulus of glory, and reminds it that all mention of our name will not cease at the same time with our lives, but that our fame will endure to all posterity.—Cicero.

Praise consists in the love of God, in wonder at the goodness of God, in recognition of the gifts of God, in seeing God in all things He gives us, ay, and even in the things that He refuses to us; so as to see our whole life in the light of God; and seeing this, to bless Him, adore Him, and glorify Him.—Manning.

There are three kinds of praise,—that which we yield, that which we lend, and that which we pay. We yield it to the powerful from fear, we lend it to the weak from interest, and we pay it to the deserving from gratitude.—Colton.

What a person praises is perhaps a surer standard, even, than what he condemns, of his character, information, and abilities. No wonder, then, that in this prudent country most people are so shy of praising anything.—Hare.

There is a species of ferocity in rejecting indiscriminately all kinds of praises; we should be accessible to those which are given to us by good people, who praise in us sincerely praiseworthy things.—Bruyère.

We are not fond of praising, and never praise any one except from interested motives. Praise is a clever, concealed, and delicate flattery, which gratifies in different ways the giver and the receiver. The one takes it as a recompense of his merit, and the other bestows it to display his equity and discernment.—Rochefoucauld.

To be forward to praise others implies either great eminence, that can afford to part with applause; or great quickness of discernment, with confidence in our own judgments; or great sincerity and love of truth, getting the better of our self-love.—Hazlitt.

The rising winds
And falling springs,
Birds, beasts, all things
Adore him in their kinds.
Thus all is hurl'd
In sacred hymns and order, the great chime
And symphony of nature.
—Henry Vaughan.

I will not much commend others to themselves, I will not at all commend myself to others. So to praise any to their faces is a kind of flattery, but to praise myself to any is the height of folly. He that boasts his own praises speaks ill of himself, and much derogates from his true deserts. It is worthy of blame to affect commendation.—Arthur Warwick.

Who would ever care to do brave deed,
Or strive in virtue others to excel,
If none should yield him his deserved meed
Due praise, that is the spur of doing well?
For if good were not praised more than ill,
None would choose goodness of his own free will.
—Spenser.

Among the smaller duties of life, I hardly know any one more important than that of not praising where praise is not due. Reputation is one of the prizes for which men contend: it is, as Mr. Burke calls it, "the cheap defense and ornament of nations." It produces more labor and more talent than twice the wealth of a country could ever rear up. It is the coin of genius, and it is the imperious duty of every man to bestow it with the most scrupulous justice and the wisest economy.—Sydney Smith.

Prayer

Prayer is the voice of faith.—Horne.

Prayer is the spirit speaking truth to Truth.—Bailey.

Prayer purifies: it is a self-preached sermon.—Richter.

Prayer flies where the eagle never flew.—Thomas Guthrie.

Our prayers are the shadows of mercy.—Spurgeon.

Solicitude is the audience-chamber of God.—Landor.

Prayer ardent opens heaven.—Young.

Making their lives a prayer.—Whittier.

The church converteth the whole world by blood and prayer.—Martin Luther.

The saints will aid if men will call:
For the blue sky bends over all.
—Coleridge.

How can He grant you what you do not desire to receive?—St. Augustine.

Prayer moves the hand which moves the world.—J. A. Wallace.

God's pleasure is at the end of our prayers.—Quarles.

Oh, happy vantage of a kneeling knee!—Shakespeare.

No man ever prayed heartily without learning something.—Emerson.

Labor, you know, is prayer.—Bayard Taylor.

He that will learn to pray, let him go to sea.—Herbert.

The few that pray at all pray oft amiss.—Cowper.

Prayer is a virtue that prevaieth against all temptations.—Bernard.

Let me say amen betimes, lest the devil cross my prayers.—Shakespeare.

Well, if my wind were but long enough to say my prayers, I would repent.—Shakespeare.

In prayer the lips ne'er act the winning part Without the sweet concurrence of the heart.
—Herrick.

Let us pray! God is just, he tries us; God is pitiful, he will comfort us; let us pray!—Joseph Roux.

Battering the gates of heaven with storms of prayer.—Tennyson.

Prayer is the chief thing that man may present unto God.—Hermes.

My words fly up, my thoughts remain below:
Words, without thoughts, never to heaven go.
—Shakespeare.

Let never day nor night unhallow'd pass,
But still remember what the Lord hath done.
—Shakespeare.

Trouble and perplexity drive me to prayer, and prayer drives away perplexity and trouble.—Melancthon.

Our prayers should be for a sound mind in a healthy body.—Juvenal.

Prayer is the breath of a new-born soul, and there can be no Christian life without it.—Rowland Hill.

A life of prayer is a life whose litanies are ever fresh acts of self-devoting love.—F. W. Robertson.

Prayer is a powerful thing; for God has bound and tied himself thereunto.—Martin Luther.

Who goes to bed, and doth not pray,
Maketh two nights to every day!
—Herbert.

Nature with folded hands seemed there, kneeling at her evening prayer.—Longfellow.

A prayer, in its simplest definition, is merely a wish turned heavenward.—Phillips Brooks.

It lightens the stroke to draw near to Him who handles the rod.—Washington Irving.

In prayer it is better to have a heart without words than words without a heart.—Bunyan.

Prayer is the pulse of the renewed soul; and the constancy of its beat is the best test and measure of the spiritual life.—Octavius Winslow.

Embark in no enterprise which you cannot submit to the test of prayer.—Hosea Ballou.

Prayer is a shield to the soul, a sacrifice to God, and a scourge for Satan.—Bunyan.

I was not born for courts or great affairs;
I pay my debts, believe, and say my prayers.
—Pope.

Affliction teacheth a wicked person some time to pray; prosperity, never.—Ben Jonson.

Religion is no more possible without prayer than poetry without language, or music without atmosphere.—James Martineau.

Happy are they who freely mingle prayer and toil till God responds to the one and rewards the other.—S. Irenæus Prime.

A Christian will find his parenthesis for prayer, even through his busiest hours.—Cecil.

Prayers are but the body of the bird; desires are its angel's wings.—Jeremy Taylor.

Let prayer be the key of the morning and the bolt of the evening.—Matthew Henry.

And Satan trembles when he sees
The weakest saint upon his knees.
—Cowper.

A single grateful thought towards heaven is the most complete prayer.—Lessing.

Heaven is never deaf but when man's heart is dumb.—Quarles.

The gift of prayer is not always at our command.—Lessing.

The simple heart that freely asks in love, obtains.—Whittier.

Prayer is not conquering God's reluctance, but taking hold upon God's willingness.—Phillips Brooks.

Expect an answer. If no answer is desired, why pray? True prayer has in it a strong element of expectancy.—R. M. Offord.

In extemporary prayer, what men most admire God least regardeth.—Thomas Fuller.

When we pray to God with entire assurance, it is Himself who has given us the spirit of prayer.—St. Cyprian.

Every praying Christian will find that there is no Gethsemane without its angel.—Binney.

I desire no other evidence of the truth of Christianity than the Lord's Prayer.—Mme. de Staël.

Ah, what is it we send up thither, where our thoughts are either a dis-sonance or a sweetness and a grace?—George MacDonald.

He who prays without confidence cannot hope that his prayers will be granted.—Fénelon.

The Lord's Prayer contains the sum total of religion and morals.—Wellington.

Though I am weak, yet God, when prayed, Cannot withhold his conquering aid.
—Emerson.

Prayer will make a man cease from sin, or sin will entice a man to cease from prayer.—Bunyan.

If He prayed who was without sin, how much more it becometh a sinner to pray!—St. Cyprian.

They never sought in vain that sought the Lord aright.—Burns.

All his mind is bent to holiness,
To number Ave-Maries on his beads.
—Shakespeare.

'Tis heaven alone that is given away: 'tis only God may be had for the asking.—Lowell.

The upward glancing of an eye when none but God is near.—Montgomery.

Nymph, in thy orisons be all my sins remembered!—Shakespeare.

Pray not too often for great favors, for we stand most in need of small ones.—J. L. Basford.

So much of our lives is celestial and divine as we spend in the exercise of prayer.—Hooker.

Ejaculations are short prayers darted up to God on emergent occasions.—Fuller.

All places are the temple of God, for it is the mind that prays to him.—Menander.

Prayer is not conquering God's reluctance, but taking hold of God's willingness.—Phillips Brooks.

It is so natural for a man to pray that no theory can prevent him from doing it.—James Freeman Clarke.

He that loveth little prayeth little; he that loveth much prayeth much.—St. Augustine.

Patience and perseverance are never more thoroughly Christian graces than when features of prayer.—S. Irenæus Prime.

O, still my fervent prayer will be,
"Heaven's choicest blessing rest on thee."
—Miss Gould.

So a good prayer, though often used, is still fresh and fair in the ears and eyes of heaven.—Fuller.

More things are wrought by prayer
Than this world dreams of.
—Tennyson.

He prayeth best who loveth best
All things, both great and small.
—Coleridge.

Prayer is to religion what thinking is to philosophy. To pray is to make religion.—Novalis.

Like an echo from a ruined castle, prayer is an echo from the ruined human soul of the sweet promise of God.—Wm. Arnot.

Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss.—Bible.

The first petition that we are to make to Almighty God is for a good conscience, the next for health of mind, and then of body.—Seneca.

He that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him.—Bible.

God is a spirit: and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth.—Bible.

Cold prayers shall never have any warm answers. God will suit His returns to our requests. Lifeless services shall have lifeless answers.

When men are dull, God will be dumb.
—Thomas Brooks.

Our prayers should be for blessings in general, for God knows best what is good for us.—Socrates.

Prayer is so mighty an instrument that no one ever thoroughly mastered all its keys. They sweep along the infinite scale of man's wants and God's goodness.—Hugh Miller.

Rather let my head
Stoop to the block than these knees bow to any Save to the God of heaven and to my king.
—Shakespeare.

A good man's prayers will from the deepest dungeon climb heaven's height, and bring a blessing down.—Joanna Baillie.

Prayer is the act by which man, detaching himself from the embarrassments of sense and nature, ascends to the true level of his destiny.—H. P. Liddon.

Our prayer and God's mercy are like two buckets in a well; while the one ascends, the other descends.—Bishop Hopkins.

Prayer is an offering up of our desires unto God, for things agreeable to His will, in the name of Christ, with confession of our sins, and thankful acknowledgment of His mercies.—Westminster Catechism.

If you bethink yourself of any crime
Unreconcil'd as yet to heaven and grace,
Solicit for it straight. —Shakespeare.

Prayers are heard in heaven very much in proportion to our faith. Little faith will get very great mercies, but great faith still greater.—Spurgeon.

Between the humble and contrite heart and the majesty of heaven there are no barriers; the only password is prayer.—Hosea Ballou.

The best and sweetest flowers of paradise God gives to His people when they are upon their knees. Prayer is the gate of heaven.—Thomas Brooks.

Let our prayers, like the ancient sacrifices, ascend morning and evening; let our days begin and end with God.—Channing.

Prayer is so necessary, and the source of so many blessings, that he who has discovered the treasure cannot be prevented from having recourse to it, whenever he has an opportunity.—Fénelon.

Prayer is the wing wherewith the soul flies to heaven, and meditation the eye wherewith we see God.—St. Ambrose.

Good prayers never come creeping home. I am sure I shall receive either what I ask or what I should ask.—Bishop Hall.

Our vows are heard betimes! and Heaven takes care
To grant, before we can conclude the prayer.—Dryden.

Leave not off praying to God: for either praying will make thee leave off sinning; or continuing in sin will make thee desist from praying.—Fuller.

The protection of God cannot, without sacrilege, be invoked but in behalf of justice and right.—Kossuth.

For earthly blessings, moderate be thy prayer, and qualified; for light, for strength, for grace, unbounded thy petition.—Hannah More.

For the most part, we should pray rather in aspiration than petition, rather by hoping than requesting.—Leigh Hunt.

Certain thoughts are prayers. There are moments when, whatever be the attitude of the body, the soul is on its knees.—Victor Hugo.

Prayer is a strong wall and fortress of the church; it is a goodly Christian's weapon, which no man knows or finds but only he who has the spirit of grace and of prayer.—Martin Luther.

The universal and insuperable instinct which leads man to prayer is in harmony with this great fact: he who believes in God cannot but have recourse to Him and to pray to Him.—Guizot.

The habit of prayer communicates a penetrating sweetness to the glance, the voice, the smile, the tears,—to all one says, or does, or writes.—Joseph Roux.

Any heart turned Godward feels more joy
In one short hour of prayer, than e'er was raised
By all the feasts of earth since its foundation.—P. J. Bailey.

When we pray for any virtue, we should cultivate the virtue as well as pray for it: the form of your prayers should be the rule of your life: every petition to God is a precept to man.—Jeremy Taylor.

Prayer is innocence's friend; and willingly flieth incessant 'twixt the earth and the sky, the carrier-pigeon of heaven.—Longfellow.

To pray together, in whatever tongue or ritual, is the most tender brotherhood of hope and sympathy that men can contract in this life.—Mme. de Staël.

For spiritual blessings, let our prayers be importunate, perpetual and persevering; for temporal blessings, let them be general, short, conditional and modest.—Jeremy Taylor.

If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not: and it shall be given him. But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering.—Bible.

Be careful for nothing; but in everything by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God.—Bible.

Now I lay me down to take my sleep,
I pray thee, Lord, my soul to keep;
If I should die before I wake, I pray thee, Lord, my soul to take.
—New England Primer.

Let us draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with pure water.—Bible.

And if by prayer
Incessant I could hope to change the will
Of Him who all things can, I would not cease
To weary Him with my assiduous cries.
—Milton.

To pray, * * * is to desire; but it is to desire what God would have us desire.
He who desires not from the bottom of his heart, offers a deceitful prayer.
—Fénelon.

Not what we wish, but what we want,
Oh! let thy grace supply,
The good unask'd, in mercy grant;
The ill, though ask'd, deny.
—Merrick.

Go with me, like good angels, to my end;
And, as the long divorce of steel falls on
me,
Make of your prayers one sweet sacrifice,
And lift my soul to heaven.
—Shakespeare.

If I am right, Thy grace impart,
Still in the right to stay;
If I am wrong, O teach my heart
To find that better way! —Pope.

Father of All! in every age,
In every clime ador'd,
By saint, by savage, and by sage,
Jehovah, Jove, or Lord! —Pope.

Four things which are not in thy treasury,
I lay before thee, Lord, with this petition:—
My nothingness, my wants,
My sins, and my contrition.
—Southey.

Pray to be perfect, though material leaven Forbid the spirit so on earth to be;
But if for any wish thou darest not pray,
Then pray to God to cast that wish away.
—Hartley Coleridge.

Faithful prayer always implies correlative exertion; and no man can ask honestly and hopefully to be delivered from temptation, unless he has himself honestly and firmly determined to do the best he can to keep out of it.—
John Ruskin.

What signifies the sound of words in prayer without the affection of the heart, and a sedulous application of the proper means that may naturally lead us to such an end?—L'Estrange.

Prayer is not eloquence, but earnestness; not the definition of helplessness, but the feeling of it; not figures of speech, but compunction of soul.—
Hannah More.

Be not afraid to pray—to pray is right.
Pray, if thou canst, with hope; but ever
pray,
Though hope be weak or sick with long
delay;
Pray in the darkness, if there be no light.
—Hartley Coleridge.

Did we perfectly know the state of our own condition, and what was most proper for us, we might have reason to conclude our prayers not heard if not answered.—William Wake.

Pray thou for me. The common air
Will stronger, purer seem to be,
And all the world will grow more fair,—
Pray thou for me. —Mary Clemmer.

No man can hinder our private addresses to God; every man can build a chapel in his breast, himself the priest, his heart the sacrifice, and the earth
he treads on the altar.—Jeremy Taylor.

Father of Light! great God of Heaven!
Hear'st thou the accents of despair?
Can guilt like man's be e'er forgiven?
Can vice atone for crimes by prayer?
—Byron.

When thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father, which seeth in secret, shall reward thee openly.—
Bible.

Prayer is the soul's sincere desire,
Uttered or unexpressed,
The motion of a hidden fire
That trembles in the breast.
—Montgomery.

I pray thee, leave me to myself tonight; for I have need of many ori-sons to move the heavens to smile upon my state, which, well thou knowest, is cross and full of sin.—Shakespeare.

The best and sweetest flowers of Paradise God gives to his people when they are upon their knees. Prayer is the gate of heaven, or key to let us in to Paradise.—Rev. T. Brooks.

A sad estate of human wretchedness! so weak is man, so ignorant and blind, that did not God sometimes withhold in mercy what we ask, we should be ruined at our own request.—Hannah More.

Almighty Power, by whose most wise command, helpless, forlorn, uncertain, here I stand, take this faint glimmer of thyself away, or break into my soul with perfect day!—Arbuthnot.

Prayer is the peace of our spirit, the stillness of our thoughts, the evenness of our recollection, the seat of meditation, the rest of our cares, and the calm of our tempest.—Jeremy Taylor.

In desert wilds, in midnight gloom;
In grateful joy, in trying pain;
In laughing youth, or nigh the tomb;
Oh! when is prayer unheard or vain?
—Eliza Cook.

Prayer is the Christian's vital breath,
The Christian's native air;
His watchword at the gates of death,—
He enters heaven with prayer.
—James Montgomery.

He prays best who, not asking God to do man's work, prays penitence, prays resolutions, and then prays deeds—thus supplicating with heart and head and hands.—Theodore Parker.

We should pray with as much earnestness as those who expect everything from God; we should act with as much energy as those who expect everything from themselves.—Colton.

Prayer has a right to the word "ineffable." It is an hour of outpourings which words cannot express,—of that interior speech which we do not articulate, even when we employ it.—Mme. Swetchine.

We, ignorant of ourselves, beg often our own harm, which the wise powers deny us for our good; so find we profit by losing of our prayers.—Shakespeare.

Premeditation of thought and brevity of expression are the great ingredients of that reverence that is required to a pious and acceptable prayer.—South.

There is no burden of the spirit but is lightened by kneeling under it. Little by little, the bitterest feelings are sweetened by the mention of them in prayer. And agony itself stops swelling, if we can only cry sincerely, "My God, my God!"—Wm. Mountford.

Then let us earnest be,
And never faint in prayer;
He loves our importunity,
And makes our cause His care.
—John Newton.

I have been driven many times to my knees, by the overwhelming conviction that I had nowhere else to go. My own wisdom, and that of all about me seemed insufficient for that day.—Abraham Lincoln.

His pure thoughts were borne
Like fumes of sacred incense o'er the clouds,
And wafted thence on angels' wings,
through ways
Of light, to the bright source of all.
—Congreve.

Prayer among men is supposed a means to change the person to whom we pray: but prayer to God doth not change him, but fits us to receive the things prayed for.—Stillingfleet.

Each time thou wishest to decide upon performing some enterprise, raise the eyes to heaven, pray God to bless thy project; if thou canst make that prayer, accomplish thy work.—Leopold Schefer.

O Thou by whom we come to God—
The Life, the Truth, the Way;
The path of prayer Thyself hast trod;
Lord, teach us how to pray.
—J. Montgomery.

We pray for trifles without so much as a thought of the greatest blessings; and we are not ashamed, many times, to ask God for that which we should blush to own to our neighbor.—Seneca.

Prayer pulls the rope below, and the great bell rings above in the ears of God. Some scarcely stir the bell, for they pray so languidly; others give but an occasional pluck at the rope; but he who wins with heaven is the man who grasps the rope boldly and pulls continuously, with all his might.—C. H. Spurgeon.

A certain joyful, though humble, confidence becomes us when we pray in the Mediator's name. It is due to Him; when we pray in His name it should be without wavering. Remember His merits, and how prevalent they must be. "Let us therefore come boldly to the throne of grace."—Nehemiah Adams.

"Prayer," says St. Jerome, "is a groan." Ah! our groans are prayers as well. The very cry of distress is an involuntary appeal to that invisible Power whose aid the soul invokes.—Mme. Swetchine.

We, ignorant of ourselves,
Beg often our own harms, which the wise powers
Deny us for our good; so find we profit,
By losing of our prayers. —Shakespeare.

Accustom yourself gradually to carry prayer into all your daily occupations. Speak, move, work, in peace, as if you were in prayer, as indeed you ought to be. Do everything without excitement, by the spirit of grace.—Fénelon.

Prayer ardent opens heaven, lets down a stream
Of glory on the consecrated hour
Of man, in audience with the Deity:
Who worships the great God, that instant joins
The first in heaven, and sets his foot on hell.
—Young.

How happy it is to believe, with a steadfast assurance, that our petitions are heard even while we are making them; and how delightful to meet with a proof of it in the effectual and actual grant of them.—Cowper.

God answers sharp and sudden on some prayers,
And thrusts the thing we have prayed for
in our face,
A gauntlet with a gift in 't.
—E. B. Browning.

When you lie down close your eyes with a short prayer, committing yourself into the hands of your faithful Creator; and when you have done trust

Him with yourself, as you must do when dying.—Jeremy Taylor.

The Divine Wisdom has given us prayer, not as a means whereby to obtain the good things of earth, but as a means whereby we learn to do without them; not as a means whereby we escape evil, but as a means whereby we become strong to meet it.—F. W. Robertson.

It is as natural and reasonable for a dependent creature to apply to its Creator for what it needs as for a child thus to solicit the aid of a parent who is believed to have the disposition and ability to bestow what it needs.—Archibald Alexander.

Faith builds in the dungeon and lazarhouse its sublimest shrines; and up, through roofs of stone, that shut out the eye of heaven, ascends the ladder where the angels glide to and fro, —prayer.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Prayer moves the hand that moves the universe.
Holy beginning of a holy cause,
When heroes, girt for freedom's combat,
pause
Before high Heaven, and, humble in their might,
Call down its blessing on that coming fight.
—Moore.

O, when the heart is full, when bitter thoughts come crowding thickly up for utterance, and the poor common words of courtesy are such a very mockery, how much the bursting heart may pour itself in prayer!—Willis.

We lay it down as an elemental principle of religion, that no large growth in holiness was ever gained by one who did not take time to be often and long alone with God. No otherwise can the great central idea of God enter into a man's life, and dwell there supreme.—Austin Phelps.

Consider how august a privilege it is, when angels are present, and archangels throng around, when cherubim and seraphim encircle with their blaze the throne, that a mortal may approach with unrestrained confidence, and converse with heaven's dread Sovereign! O, what honor was ever conferred like this?—Chrysostom.

Let one unceasing, earnest prayer
Be, too, for light,—for strength to hear
Our portion of the weight of care,
That crushes into dumb despair
One half the human race.

—Longfellow.

As down in the sunless retreats of the ocean

Sweet flowers are springing no mortal can see,

So deep in my soul the still prayer of devotion

Unheard by the world, rises silent to Thee.

—Moore.

And from the prayer of Want, and plaint
of Woe,

O never, never turn away thine ear!
Forlorn, in this bleak wilderness below,
Ah! what were man, should Heaven refuse to hear!

—Beattie.

The best answer to all objections urged against prayer is the fact that man cannot help praying; for we may be sure that that which is so spontaneous and ineradicable in human nature has its fitting objects and methods in the arrangements of a boundless Providence.—Chapin.

Night comes, with love upon the breeze,
And the calm clock strikes, stilly, "ten!"
I start to hear it beat, for then
I know that thou art on thy knees—
And at that hour, where'er thou be,
Ascends to heaven a prayer for me!

—Willis.

That prayer which does not succeed in moderating our wishes—in changing the passionate desire into still submission, the anxious, tumultuous expectation into silent surrender—is no true prayer, and proves that we have not the spirit of true prayer.—F. W. Robertson.

Prayer is more than the mere outburst of the desires or sorrows of the soul, seeking that satisfaction or consolation which it does not find within itself. It is the expression of a faith, instinctive or reflective, obscure or clear, wavering or steadfast, in the existence, the presence, the power and the sympathy of the Being to whom prayer is addressed.—Guizot.

Are we to suppose that the only being in the universe who cannot answer prayer is that One who alone has all power at His command? The weak theology that professes to believe that prayer has merely a subjective benefit is infinitely less scientific than the action of the child who confidently appeals to a Father in heaven.—Prof.
Dawson.

When first thy eyes unveil, give thy soul leave

To do the like; our bodies but forerun
The spirit's duty. True hearts spread and heave

Unto their God, as flow'rs do to the sun.
Give him thy first thoughts then; so shalt thou keep

Him company all day, and in him sleep.

—Henry Vaughan.

Sometimes a fog will settle over a vessel's deck and yet leave the topmast clear. Then a sailor goes up aloft and gets a lookout which the helmsman on deck cannot get. So prayer sends the soul aloft: lifts it above the clouds in which our selfishness and egotism be-fog us, and gives us a chance to see which way to steer.—C. H. Spurgeon.

True prayer is only another name for the love of God. Its excellence does not consist in the multitude of our words; for our Father knoweth what things we have need of before we ask Him. The true prayer is that of the heart, and the heart prays only for what it desires. To pray, then, is to desire—but to desire what God would have us desire.—Fénelon.

Perfect prayers without a spot or blemish, though not one word be spoken, and no phrases known to mankind be tampered with, always pluck the heart out of the earth and move it softly, like a censor, to and fro beneath the face of heaven.—John Weiss.

Prayer, with our Lord, was a refuge from the storm; almost every word He uttered during that last tremendous scene was prayer; prayer the most earnest, the most urgent, repeated, continued, proceeding from the recesses of the soul, private, solitary; prayer for deliverance, prayer for strength;

above everything prayer for resignation—William Paley.

For the most part, we should pray rather in aspiration than petition, rather by hoping than requesting; in which spirit also we may breathe a devout wish for a blessing on others upon occasions when it might be presumptuous to beg it.—Leigh Hunt.

Fountain of mercy! whose pervading eye Can look within and read what passes there, Accept my thoughts for thanks; I have no words.

My soul o'erfraught with gratitude, rejects The aid of language—Lord!—behold my heart. —Hannah More.

The Lord's Prayer is short, mysterious, and, like the treasures of the spirit, full of wisdom and latent sense: it is not improper to draw forth those excellencies which are intended and signified by every petition, that by so excellent an authority we may know what it is lawful to beg of God.—Jeremy Taylor.

The Lord's Prayer, for a succession of solemn thoughts, for fixing the attention upon a few great points, for suitability to every condition, for sufficiency, for conciseness without obscurity, for the weight and real importance of its petition, is without an equal or a rival.—Paley.

The prayer of Noah,
He cried out in the darkness, Hear, O God,
Hear Him: hear this one; through the gates of death,
If life be all past praying for, O give
To Thy great multitude a way to peace;
Give them to Him. —Jean Ingelow.

More things are wrought by prayer
Than this world dreams of. Wherefore let thy voice Rise like a fountain for me night and day.
For what are men better than sheep or goats
That nourish a blind life within the brain,
If, knowing God, they lift not hands of prayer
Both for themselves and those who call them friend? —Tennyson.

Prayer is the peace of our spirit, the stillness of our thoughts, the evenness of recollection, the seat of meditation, the rest of our cares and the calm of our tempest: prayer is the issue of a quiet mind, of untroubled thoughts; it is the daughter of charity and the sister of meekness.—Jeremy Taylor.

Nearer, my God, to Thee—
Nearer to Thee!
E'en though it be a cross
That raiseth me;
Still all my song shall be Nearer, my God, to Thee,
Nearer to Thee!
—Sarah Flower Adams.

If by prayer
Incessant I could hope to change the will
Of him who all things can, I would not cease
To weary him with my assiduous cries;
But prayer against his absolute decree
No more avails than breath against the wind
Blown stifling back on him that breathes it forth:
Therefore to his great bidding I submit.
—Milton.

We kneel, how weak; we rise, how full of power!
Why, therefore, should we do ourselves
this wrong,
Or others—that we are not always strong,
That we are ever overborne with care,
That we should ever weak or heartless be,
Anxious or troubled, when with us is
prayer,
And joy and strength and courage are with Thee? —Trench.

The Christian life is a long and continual tendency of our hearts toward that eternal goodness which we desire on earth. All our happiness consists in thirsting for it. Now, this thirst is prayer. Ever desire to approach your Creator, and you will never cease to pray. Do not think it is necessary to pronounce many words.—Fénelon.

I ask not a life for the dear ones,
All radiant, as others have done.
But that life may have just enough shadow
To temper the glare of the sun;
I would pray God to guard them from evil,
But my prayer would bound back to myself;
Ah! a seraph may pray for a sinner,
But a sinner must pray for himself.
—Charles M. Dickinson.

Prayer is the first breath of divine life; it is the pulse of the believing soul:—by prayer “we draw water with joy from the wells of salvation;” by prayer faith puts forth its energy, in apprehending the promised blessings, and receiving from the Redeemer's fullness; in leaning on His almighty arm, and making His name our strong tower; and in overcoming the world, the flesh and the devil.—T. Scott.

When we pray for any virtue, we should cultivate the virtue as well as pray for it; the form of your prayers should be the rule of your life; every petition to God is a precept to man. Look not, therefore, upon your prayers as a short method of duty and salvation only, but as a perpetual monition of duty; by what we require of God we see what He requires of us.—Jeremy Taylor.

Father of Light and Life! Thou Good Supreme!
O teach me what is good! teach me Thyself!
Save me from folly, vanity and vice,
From every low pursuit: and feed my soul
With knowledge, conscious peace, and virtue pure;
Sacred, substantial, never-fading bliss.
—Thomson.

Prayer is intended to increase the devotion of the individual, but if the individual himself prays he requires no formula; he pours himself forth much more naturally in self-chosen and connected thoughts before God, and scarcely requires words at all. Real inward devotion knows no prayer but that arising from the depths of its own feelings.—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

In reverence will we speak of those who woo
The ear divine with clear and ready prayer;
And while their voices cleave the Sabbath air,
Know their bright thoughts are winging heavenward too.
Yet many a one,—“the latchet of whose shoe”
These might not loose—will often only dare
Lay some poor words between him and despair—“Father, forgive! we know not what we do.”
—Richard M. Milnes.

We have assurance that we shall be heard in what we pray, because we pray to that God that heareth prayer, and is the rewarder of all that come unto Him; and in His name, to whom

God denieth nothing; and, therefore, howsoever we are not always answered at the present, or in the same kind that we desire, yet, sooner or later, we are sure to receive even above that we are able to ask or think, if we continue to sue unto Him according to His will.—Archbishop Usher.

Lord! Thou art with Thy people still; they see Thee in the night-watches, and their hearts burn within them as Thou talkest with them by the way. And Thou art near to those that have not known Thee; open their eyes that they may see Thee—see Thee weeping over them, and saying, “Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life”—see Thee hanging on the cross and saying, “Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do”—see Thee as Thou wilt come again in Thy glory to judge them at the last. Amen.—George Eliot.

From the violence and rule of passion, from a servile will, and a commanding lust, from pride and vanity, from false opinion and ignorant confidence; from improvidence and prodigality, from envy and the spirit of slander; from sensuality, from presumption and from despair; from a state of temptation and a hardened spirit; from delaying of repentance and persevering in sin; from unthankfulness and irreligion, and from seducing others; from all infatuation of soul, folly and madness; from willfulness, self-love and vain ambition; from a vicious life and an unprovided death, good Lord, deliver us.—Jeremy Taylor.

Worship is the earthly act by which we most distinctly recognize our personal immortality; men who think that they will be extinct a few years hence do not pray. In worship we spread out our insignificant life, which yet is the work of the Creator's hands, and the purchase of the Redeemer's blood, before the Eternal and All-Merciful, that we may learn the manners of a higher sphere, and fit ourselves for companionship with saints and angels, and for the everlasting sight of the face of God.—H. P. Liddon.

As in poetry, so in prayer, the whole subject matter should be furnished by the heart, and the understanding should be allowed only to shape and arrange the effusions of the heart in the manner best adapted to answer the end designed. From the fullness of a heart overflowing with holy affections, as from a copious fountain, we should pour forth a torrent of pious, humble and ardently affectionate feelings; while our understandings only shape the channel and teach the gushing streams of devotion where to flow, and when to stop.—Edward Payson.

When a pump is frequently used, the water pours out at the first stroke, because it is high; but, if the pump has not been used for a long time, the water gets low, and when you want it you must pump a long while; and the water comes only after great efforts. It is so with prayer. If we are instant in prayer, every little circumstance awakens the disposition to pray, and desire and words are always ready; but, if we neglect prayer, it is difficult for us to pray, for the water in the well gets low.—Felix Neff.

God grant me grace my prayers to say:
O God! preserve my mother dear,
In strength and health for many a year;
And O! preserve my father too,
And may I pay him reverence due;
And may I my best thoughts employ
To be my parents' hope and joy;
And O! preserve my brothers both
From evil doings, and from sloth,
And may we always love each other,
Our friends, our father, and our mother,
And still, O Lord, to me impart
An innocent and grateful heart,
That after my last sleep I may Awake to thy eternal day! Amen.
—Coleridge, Child's Evening Prayer.

Preaching

The gracious dew of pulpit eloquence.—Pope.

Sermons in stones and good in every thing.—Shakespeare.

He taught them how to live and how to die.—Wm. Somerville.

The pulpit style of Germany has been always rustically negligent, or bristling with pedantry.—De Quincey.

It is a good divine that follows his own instructions.—Shakespeare.

The life of a pious minister is visible rhetoric.—Hooker.

The world looks at ministers out of the pulpit to know what they mean when in it.—Cecil.

A good discourse is that from which one can take nothing without taking the life.—Fénelon.

Be short in all religious exercises. Better leave the people longing than loathing.—Nathaniel Emmons.

Intelligible discourses are spoiled by too much subtlety in nice divisions.—Locke.

Some clergymen make a motto, instead of a theme, of their texts.—Hosea Ballou.

Preaching, in the first sense of the word, ceased as soon as ever the gospel was written.—Selden.

He who the sword of heaven will bear should be as holy as severe.—Shakespeare.

I preached as never sure to preach again,
And as a dying man to dying men.
—Baxter.

The lilies say: Behold how we Preach without words of purity.
—Christina G. Rossetti.

The Christian ministry is the worst of all trades, but the best of all professions.—Newton.

The pulpit is a clergyman's parade; the parish is his field of active service.—Southey.

Oh for a forty-parson power!—Byron.

A verse may find him who a sermon flies, and turn delight into a sacrifice.—George Herbert.

The minister's brain is often the "poor-box" of the church.—Whipple.

And truths divine came mended from that tongue.—Pope.

To rest, the cushion and soft dean invite, who never mentions hell to ears polite.—Pope.

So clomb the first grand thief into God's fold;
So since into his church lewd hirelings climb.—Milton.

With a little hoard of maxims preaching down a daughter's heart.—Tennyson.

It is by the vicar's skirts that the devil climbs into the belfry.—Longfellow.

Man makes up his mind he will preach, and he preaches.—Bruyère.

Surely that preaching which comes from the soul most works on the soul.—Thomas Fuller.

Sermons are not like curious inquiries after new nothings, but pursuance of old truths.—Jeremy Taylor.

Style is the gossamer on which the seeds of truth float through the world.—George Bancroft.

Elegance of language must give way before simplicity in preaching sound doctrine.—Savonarola.

The orator is thereby an orator that keeps his feet ever on a fact.—R. W. Emerson.

I can easier teach twenty what were good to be done, than to be one of the twenty to follow mine own teachings.—Shakespeare.

Style should be like window-glass, perfectly transparent, and with very little sash.—Emmons.

Let him who would move and convince others, be first moved and convinced himself.—T. L. Cuyler.

If the truth were known, many sermons are prepared and preached with more regard for the sermon than the souls of the hearers.—George F. Pentecost.

O that our prelates would be as diligent to sow the corn of good doctrine, as Satan is to sow cockle and darnel! —Latimer.

This I quarreled at, that he went far from his text to come close to me, and so was faulty himself in telling me of my faults.—Fuller.

Sir, a woman's preaching is like a dog standing on his hinder legs. It is not done well, but you wonder to see it done at all.—Johnson.

Evil ministers of good things are as torches,—a light to others, a waste to none but themselves only.—Hooker.

Pulpit discourses have insensibly dwindled from speaking to reading; a practice of itself sufficient to stifle every germ of eloquence.—Sydney Smith.

Many a meandering discourse one hears, in which the preacher aims at nothing, and—hits it.—Whately.

It requires as much reflection and wisdom to know what is not to be put into a sermon as what is.—Cecil.

As there are certain mountebanks and quacks in physic, so there are much the same also in divinity.—South.

Jest not at preacher's language or expression:
How know'st thou but thy sins made him miscarry? —Herbert.

Remember that God is as near to our mouth when we speak as that man is who leans his ear to our whispers.—Young.

Some plague the people with too long sermons: for the faculty of listening is a tender thing, and soon becomes weary and satiated.—Luther.

He of their wicked ways shall them admonish, and before them set the paths of righteousness.—Milton.

We must judge religious movements, not by the men who make them, but by the men they make.—Joseph Cook.

But Cristes loore, and his Apostles twelve,
He taughte, but first he followed it hymselfe. —Chaucer.

Embellish truth only with a view to gain it the more full and free admission into your hearers' minds; and your ornaments will, in that case, be simple, masculine, natural.—Blair.

Alas for the unhappy man that is called to stand in the pulpit and not give the bread of life!—Emerson.

I would not have preachers torment their hearers, and detain them with long and tedious preaching.—Luther.

Remember, there are only a few model preachers. We have read of only one perfect Model, and He was crucified many centuries ago.—C. H. Fowler.

Always carry with you into the pulpit a sense of the immense consequences which may depend on your full and faithful presentation of the truth.—R. S. Storrs.

Men of God have always, from time to time, walked among men, and made their commission felt in the heart and soul of the commonest hearer.—Emerson.

There goes the parson, oh illustrious spark!
And there, scarce less illustrious, goes the clerk. —Cowper.

Language the most forcible proceeds from the man who is most sincere. The way to speak with power, or to write words that pierce mankind to the quick, is to speak and write honestly.—E. L. Magoon.

The greatest thoughts are wronged, if not linked to beauty; and they win their way most surely and deeply into the soul when arranged in this their natural and fit attire.—W. E. Channing.

Jesus chose this method of extending the knowledge of Himself throughout the world; He taught His truth to a few men, and then He said, "Now go and tell that truth to other men."—Phillips Brooks.

But in his duty prompt at every call,
He watch'd and wept, he pray'd and felt for all. —Goldsmith.

I have taught you, my dear flock, for above thirty years how to live; and I will show you in a very short time how to die.—Sandys.

He of their wicked ways
Shall them admonish, and before them set
The paths of righteousness. —Milton.

I should not like to preach to a congregation who all believed as I believe. I would as lief preach to a basket of eggs in their smooth compactness and oval formality.—Chapin.

When men come with nets in their ears, it is good for the preacher to have neither fish nor fowl in his tongue. But blessed be God, now we need not lie at so close a guard.—Fuller.

A preacher should have the skill to teach the unlearned simply, roundly, and plainly; for teaching is of more importance than exhorting.—Luther.

A minister, without boldness, is like a smooth file, a knife without an edge, a sentinel that is afraid to let off his gun. If men will be bold in sin, ministers must be bold to reprove.—Rev. W. Gurnall.

To endeavor to move by the same discourse hearers who differ in age, sex, position and education, is to attempt to open all locks with the same key.—J. Petit-Senn.

The province of the soul is large enough to fill up every cranny of your time, and leave you much to answer for if one wretch be damned by your neglect.—Dryden.

I would have every minister of the gospel address his audience with the zeal of a friend, with the generous energy of a father, and with the exuberant affection of a mother.—Fénelon.

Grant that I may never rack a Scripture simile beyond the true intent thereof, lest, instead of sucking milk, I squeeze blood out of it.—Fuller.

There are three things to aim at in public speaking: first, to get into your subject; then to get your subject into yourself; and, lastly, to get your subject into your hearers.—Bishop Gregg.

It is a good divine that follows his own instructions. I can easier teach twenty what were good to be done than be one of the twenty to follow mine own teaching.—Shakespeare.

Many preachers shine in the pulpit who lose their brilliancy in common conversation. They require the stimulus and magnetism of an audience to render them forcible and eloquent.—J. L. Basford.

Tell men that God is love; that right is right, and wrong, wrong; let them cease to admire philanthropy, and begin to love men; cease to pant for heaven, and begin to love God; then the spirit of liberty begins.—F. W. Robertson.

Let us never forget that, to be profited, that is, to be spiritually improved in knowledge, faith, holiness, joy and love, is the end of hearing sermons, and not merely to have our taste gratified by genius, eloquence and oratory.—John Angel James.

Every sermon must have a solid rest in Scripture, and the pointedness which comes of a clear subject, and the conviction which belongs to well-thought argument, and the warmth that proceeds from earnest appeal.—Phillips Brooks.

You don't want a diction gathered from the newspapers, caught from the air, common and unsuggestive; but you want one whose every word is full-freighted with suggestion and association, with beauty and power.—Rufus Choate.

A hard and unfeeling manner of denouncing the threatenings of the Word of God is not only barbarous and inhuman, but calculated, by inspiring disgust, to rob them of all their efficacy.—Robert Hall.

He that negotiates between God and man, As God's ambassador, the grand concerns Of judgment and of mercy, should beware Of lightness in his speech.—Cowper.

It is easier to declaim like an orator against a thousand sins in others than to mortify one sin in ourselves; to be more industrious in our pulpits than in our closets; to preach twenty sermons to our people than one to our own hearts.—John Flavel.

As pleasant songs, at morning sung,
The words that dropped from his sweet tongue
Strengthened our hearts; or, heard at night,
Made all our slumbers soft and light.
—Longfellow.

And, as a bird each fond endearment tries
To tempt its new-fledg'd offspring to the skies,
He tried each art, reprov'd each dull delay,
Allur'd to brighter worlds, and led the way.
—Goldsmith.

Hear how he clears the points o' Faith
Wi' rattlin' an' thumpin'!
Now meekly calm, now wild in wrath,
He's stampin', an' he's jumpin'!
—Burns.

Of right and wrong he taught
Truths as refined as ever Athens heard;
And (strange to tell) he practis'd what he preach'd. —John Armstrong.

The object of preaching is constantly to remind mankind of what mankind are constantly forgetting; not to supply the defects of human intelligence, but to fortify the feebleness of human resolutions.—Sydney Smith.

The clergy are at present divided into three sections: an immense body who are ignorant; a small proportion who know and are silent; and a minute minority who know and speak according to their knowledge.—Professor Huxley.

The theater has often been at variance with the pulpit; they ought not to quarrel. How much is it to be wished that in both the celebration of nature and of God were intrusted to none but men of noble minds.—Goethe.

It is a glorious occupation, vivifying and self-sustaining in its nature, to struggle with ignorance, and discover to the inquiring minds of the masses the clear cerulean blue of heavenly truth.—Hosea Ballou.

Whatever is preached to us, and whatever we learn, we should still remember that it is man that gives, and man that receives; it is a mortal hand that presents it to us, it is a mortal hand that accepts it.—Montaigne.

The defects of a preacher are soon spied. Let a preacher be endued with ten virtues, and have but one fault, that one fault will eclipse and darken all his virtues and gifts, so evil is the world in these times.—Luther.

It was said of one who preached very well and lived very ill, "that when he was out of the pulpit it was pity he should ever go into it; and when he was in the pulpit, it was pity he should ever come out of it."—Fuller.

Preachers say, "Do as I say, not as I do." But if a physician had the same disease upon him that I have, and he should bid me do one thing and he do quite another, could I believe him?—Selden.

That is not the best sermon which makes the hearers go away talking to one another, and praising the speaker, but which makes them go away thoughtful and serious, and hastening to be alone.—Burnet.

Do not, as some ungracious pastors do, show me the steep and thorny way to heaven; whiles, like a puffed and reckless libertine, himself the primrose path of dalliance treads, and reck not his own rede.—Shakespeare.

Formerly it was the fashion to preach the natural; now it is the ideal. People too often forget that these things are profoundly compatible; that in a beautiful work of imagination the natural should be ideal, and the ideal natural.—Schlegel.

I venerate the man whose heart is warm, Whose hands are pure, whose doctrine and whose life,
Coincident, exhibit lucid proof
That he is honest in the sacred cause.
—Cowper.

Judge not the preacher; for he is thy judge:
If thou mislike him, thou conceiv'st him
not.
God calleth preaching folly. Do not grudge
To pick out treasures from an earthen pot.
The worst speaks something good.
—Herbert.

At church, with meek and unaffected grace,
His looks adorn'd the venerable place;
Truth from his lips prevailed with double
sway,
And fools, who came to scoff, remain'd to pray.
—Goldsmith.

In England we see people lulled asleep with solid and elaborate discourses of piety, who would be warmed and transported out of themselves by the bellowings and distortions of enthusiasm.—Addison.

Of all sorts of flattery, that which comes from a solemn character and stands before a sermon is the worst-complexioned. Such commendation is a satire upon the author, makes the text look mercenary, and disables the discourse from doing service.—Jeremy Collier.

All things with which we deal preach to us. What is a farm but a mute gospel? The chaff and the wheat, weeds and plants, blight, rain, insects, sun,—it is a sacred emblem from the first furrow of spring to the last stack which the snow of winter overtakes in the fields.—Emerson.

In pulpit eloquence, the grand difficulty lies here,—to give the subject all the dignity it so fully deserves, without attaching any importance to ourselves. The Christian messenger cannot think too highly of his prince, nor too humbly of himself.—Colton.

Settle in your mind, that no sermon is worth much in which the Lord is not the principal speaker. There may be poetry, refinement, historic truth, moral truth, pathos, and all the charms of rhetoric; but all will be lost, for the purposes of preaching, if the word of the Lord is not the staple of the discourse.—John Hall.

I love a serious preacher, who speaks for my sake and not for his own; who seeks my salvation, and not his own vainglory. He best deserves to be heard who uses speech only to clothe his thoughts, and his thoughts only to promote truth and virtue.—Massillon.

There are but few talents requisite to become a popular preacher: for the people are easily pleased if they perceive any endeavors in the orator to please them. The meanest qualifications will work this effect if the preacher sincerely sets about it.—Goldsmith.

Oh, the unspeakable littleness of a soul which, intrusted with Christianity, speaking in God's name to immortal beings, with infinite excitements to the most enlarged, fervent love, sinks down into narrow self-regard, and is chiefly solicitous of his own honor.—Channing.

The things that mount the rostrum with a skip,
And then skip down again, pronounce a text,
Cry hem; and reading what they never wrote
Just fifteen minutes, huddle up their work,
And with a well-bred whisper close the scene! —Cowper.

The meanness of the earthen vessel, which conveys to others the gospel treasure, takes nothing from the value of the treasure. A dying hand may sign a deed of gift of incalculable value. A shepherd's boy may point out the way to a philosopher. A beggar may be the bearer of an invaluable present.—Cecil.

Nothing is text but what is spoken of in the Bible and meant there for person and place; the rest is application; which a discreet man may do well; but it is his scripture, not the Holy Ghost's. First, in your sermons use your logic, and then your rhetoric; rhetoric without logic is like a tree with leaves and blossoms, but no root.—Selden.

When I compare the clamorous preaching and passionate declamation too common in the Christian world with the composed dignity, the deliberate wisdom, the freedom from all extravagance, which characterized Jesus, I can imagine no greater contrast; and I am sure that the fiery zealot is no representative of Christianity.—Channing.

The grand aim of a minister must be the exhibition of gospel truth. Statesmen may make the greatest blunders in the world, but that is not his affair. Like a king's messenger, he must not stop to take care of a person fallen down: if he can render any kindness consistently with his duty, he will do it; if not, he will prefer his office.—Cecil.

Gospel ministers should not only be like dials on watches, or mile-stones upon the road, but like clocks and larums, to sound the alarm to sinners. Aaron wore bells as well as pomegranates, and the prophets were commanded to lift up their voice like a trumpet. A sleeping sentinel may be the loss of the city.—Bishop Hall.

His words had power because they accorded with his thoughts; and his thoughts had reality and depth because they harmonized with the life he had always lived. It was not mere breath that this preacher uttered; they were the words of life, because a life of good deeds and holy love was melted into them. Pearls, pure and rich, had been dissolved into the precious draught.—Nathaniel Hawthorne.

The most intelligent hearers are those who enjoy most heartily the simplest preaching. It is not they who clamor for superlatively intellectual or æsthetic sermons. Daniel Webster used to complain of some of the preaching to which he listened. "In the house of God" he wanted to meditate "upon the simple varieties, and the undoubted facts of religion;" not upon mysteries and abstractions.—Austin Phelps.

The minister should preach as if he felt that although the congregation own the church, and have bought the pews, they have not bought him. His soul is worth no more than any other man's, but it is all he has, and he cannot be expected to sell it for a salary. The terms are by no means equal. If a parishioner does not like the preaching, he can go elsewhere and get another pew, but the preacher cannot get another soul.—Chapin.

The proud he tam'd, the penitent he cheer'd:
Nor to rebuke the rich offender fear'd.
His preaching much, but more his practice, wrought;
(A living sermon of the truths he taught;)
For this by rules severe his life he squar'd:
That all might see the doctrines which they heard. —Dryden.

Skilful alike with tongue and pen,
He preached to all men everywhere
The Gospel of the Golden Rule,
The New Commandment given to men,
Thinking the deed, and not the creed,
Would help us in our utmost need.
—Longfellow.

He was a shrewd and sound divine
Of loud Dissent the mortal terror;
And when, by dint of page and line,
He 'established Truth, or startled Error,
The Baptist found him far too deep,
The Deist sighed with saving sorrow,
And the lean Levite went to sleep
And dreamt of eating pork to-morrow.
—Praed.

Would I describe a preacher,
I would express him simple, grave, sincere;
In doctrine uncorrupt; in language plain,
And plain in manner; decent, solemn,
chaste,
And natural in gesture; much impress'd
Himself, as conscious of his awful charge,
And anxious mainly that the flock he feeds
May feel it too; affectionate in look,
And tender in address, as well becomes A messenger of grace to guilty men.
—Cowper.

Let all your preaching be in the most simple and plainest manner; look not to the prince, but to the plain, simple, gross, unlearned people, of which cloth the prince also himself is made. If I, in my preaching, should have regard to Philip Melancthon and other learned doctors, then should I do but little good. I preach in the simplest manner to the unskillful, and that giveth content to all. Hebrew, Greek and Latin I spare until we learned ones come together.—Luther.

To know whether a minister, young or still in flower, is in safe or dangerous paths, there are two psychometers, a comparison between which will give as infallible a return as the dry and wet bulks of the ingenious "Hygrodeik." The first is the black broadcloth forming the knees of his pantaloons; the second the patch of carpet before his mirror. If the first is unworn and the second is frayed and threadbare, pray for him; if the first is worn and shiny, while the second keeps its pattern and texture, get him to pray for you.—O. W. Holmes.

To get, then, the mind of Christ, and to declare it, is the primary end of the teaching offices of the church. The living body of sympathetic men, saturated with the truth and feeling of the Book, must bring it into contact with other men, through that marvelous organ, the human voice, and with such aid as comes from the subtle sympathy that pervades assemblies of human beings.—John Hall.

Precedent

Precedents are the disgrace of legislation. They are not wanted to justify right measures, are absolutely insufficient to excuse wrong ones. They can only be useful to heralds, dancing masters, and gentlemen ushers. —Sterne.

One precedent creates another. They soon accumulate, and constitute law. What yesterday was fact, to-day is doctrine. Examples are supposed to justify the most dangerous measures; and where they do not suit exactly, the defect is supplied by analogy.—Junius.

Precept

Precept must be upon precept.—Bible.

Human laws made to direct the will ought to give precepts, and not counsels.—Montesquieu.

Precepts are the rules by which we ought to square our lives.—Seneca.

Be brief, that the mind may catch thy precepts, and the more easily retain them.—Horace.

Precepts or maxims are of great weight; and a few useful ones at hand do more toward a happy life than whole volumes that we know not where to find.—Seneca.

He that lays down precepts for the government of our lives and moderating our passions obliges human nature, not only in the present, but in all succeeding generations.—Seneca.

Most precepts that are given are so general that they cannot be applied, except by an exercise of just as much discretion as would be sufficient to frame them.—Whately.

Precept and example, like the blades of a pair of scissors, are admirably adapted to their end when conjoined; separated, they lose the greater portion of their utility.—Chatfield.

Precepts are like seeds; they are little things which do much good; if the mind which receives them has a disposition, it must not be doubted that his part contributes to the generation, and adds much to that which has been collected.—Seneca.

If to do were as easy as to know what were good to do, chapels had been churches, and poor men's cottages, princes' palaces. It is a good divine that follows his own instructions. I can easier teach twenty what were good to be done, than be one of the twenty to follow mine own teaching.—Shakespeare.

It was observed of the Jesuits, that they constantly inculcated a thorough contempt of worldly things in their doctrines, but eagerly grasped at them in their lives. They were wise in their generation; for they cried down worldly things, because they wanted to obtain them, and cried up spiritual things, because they wanted to dispose of them.—Colton.

I thought that to forgive our enemies had been the highest effort of the heathen ethic; but that the returning good for evil was an improvement of the Christian morality. But I had the mortification to meet with that interloper, Socrates, in Plato, enforcing the divine precept of loving our enemies. Perhaps for this reason, among others, he was styled by Erasmus "a Christian before Christianity."—Sterne.

Precocity

Small herbs have grace; great weeds do grow apace.—Shakespeare.

Early genius, like early cabbage, does not head well.—H. W. Shaw.

Maturity is most rapid in the low latitudes, where pineapples and women most do thrive.—N. P. Willis.

It seldom happens that a premature shoot of genius ever arrives at maturity.—Quintilian.

Nothing is less promising than precocity. A young thistle is more like a future tree than is a young oak.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

Preferment

It is the curse of service; preferment goes by letter and affection, not by the old gradation, when each second stood heir to the first.—Shakespeare.

Prejudice

Prejudice is the reason of fools.—Voltaire.

Prejudice is the twin of illiberality.—G. D. Prentice.

The multitude are ruled by prejudices.—Voltaire.

All looks yellow to the jaundiced eye.—Pope.

Prejudice is the child of ignorance.—Hazlitt.

Remember, when the judgment is weak the prejudice is strong.—Kane O'Hara.

There is nothing stronger than human prejudice.—Wendell Phillips.

Prejudices are what rule the vulgar crowd.—Voltaire.

He hears but half who hears one party only.—Æschylus.

Prejudice squints when it looks, and lies when it talks.—Duchess d'Abantes.

Much of our ignorance is of ourselves. Our eyes are full of dust. Prejudice blinds us.—Abraham Coles.

Prejudice is never easy unless it can pass itself off for reason.—Hazlitt.

When we destroy an old prejudice, we have need of a new virtue.—Mme. de Staël.

Opinions founded on prejudice are always sustained with the greatest violence.—Jeffrey.

How immense to us appear the sins we have not committed.—Madame Necker.

Prejudice assumes the garb of reason, but the cheat is too thin.—H. W. Shaw.

Prejudice, which sees what it pleases, cannot see what is plain.—Aubrey de Vere.

Ignorance is less remote from the truth than prejudice.—Diderot.

Women have fewer vices than men; but they have stronger prejudices.—Dr. J. V. C. Smith.

He who knows only his own side of the case knows little of that.—J. Stuart Mill.

Never suffer the prejudice of the eye to determine the heart.—Zimmermann.

Prejudice is a house-plant which is very apt to wilt if you take it out-of-doors among folks.—H. W. Shaw.

We seldom find persons whom we acknowledge to be possessed of good sense, except those who agree with us in opinion.—Rochefoucauld.

National antipathy is the basest, because the most illiberal and illiterate of all prejudices.—Jane Porter.

To divest one's self of some prejudices would be like taking off the skin to feel the better.—Greville.

He who never leaves his country is full of prejudices.—Goldoni.

People have prejudices against a nation in which they have no acquaintances.—Hamerton.

Human nature is so constituted that all see and judge better in the affairs of other men than in their own.—Terence.

To all intents and purposes, he who will not open his eyes is, for the present, as blind as he who cannot.—South.

Prejudice and self-sufficiency naturally proceed from inexperience of the world and ignorance of mankind.—Addison.

Every period of life has its peculiar prejudices; whoever saw old age, that did not applaud the past, and condemn the present times?—Montaigne.

How tartly that gentleman looks! I never can see him but I am heart-burned an hour after.—Shakespeare.

Our estimate of a character always depends much on the manner in which that character affects our own interests and passions.—Macaulay.

They who, without any previous knowledge of us, think amiss of us, do us no harm; they attack not us, but the phantom of their own imagination.—La Bruyère.

To be prejudiced is always to be weak; yet there are prejudices so near to laudable that they have been often praised and are always pardoned.—Johnson.

The rabble estimate few things according to their real value, most things according to their prejudices.—Cicero.

The prejudices of youth pass away with it. Those of old age last only because there is no other age to be hoped for.—Stanislaus.

Even when we fancy we have grown wiser, it is only, it may be, that new prejudices have displaced old ones.—Bovee.

As those who believe in the visibility of ghosts can easily see them, so it is always easy to see repulsive qualities in those we despise and hate.—Frederick Douglass.

The eyes of a man in the jaundice make yellow observations on everything; and the soul tinctured with any passion diffuses a false color over the appearance of things.—Dr. Watts.

They that never peeped beyond the common belief in which their easy understandings were at first indoctrinated are strongly assured of the truth of their receptions.—Glanvill.

There is nothing stronger than human prejudice. A crazy sentimentalism, like that of Peter the Hermit, hurled half of Europe upon Asia, and changed the destinies of kingdoms.—Wendell Phillips.

Prejudice is a mist, which in our journey through the world often dims the brightest and obscures the best of all the good and glorious objects that meet us on our way.—Shaftesbury.

The prejudices of ignorance are more easily removed than the prejudices of interest; the first are all blindly adopted, the second wilfully preferred.—Bancroft.

None are too wise to be mistaken, but few are so wisely just as to acknowledge and correct their mistakes, and especially the mistakes of prejudice.—Barrow.

No wise man can have a contempt for the prejudices of others; and he should even stand in a certain awe of his own, as if they were aged parents and monitors. They may in the end prove wiser than he.—Hazlitt.

The prejudices of men emanate from the mind, and may be overcome; the prejudices of women emanate from the heart and are impregnable.—D'Argens.

To lay aside all prejudice is to lay aside all principles. He who is destitute of principles is governed, theoretically and practically, by whims.—Jacobi.

Removing prejudices is, alas! too often removing the boundary of a delightful near prospect in order to let in a shockingly extensive one.—Lord Greville.

Prejudice is an equivocal term; and may as well mean right opinions taken upon trust and deeply rooted in the mind, as false and absurd opinions so derived, and grown into it.—Hurd.

Reasoning against a prejudice is like fighting against a shadow; it exhausts the reasoner, without visibly affecting the prejudice. Argument cannot do the work of instruction any more than blows can take the place of sunlight.—Charles Mildmay.

Moral prejudices are the stopgaps of virtue; and, as is the case with other stopgaps, it is often more difficult to get either out or in through them than through any other part of the fence.—Hare.

Because a total eclipse of the sun is above my own head, I will not therefore insist that there must be an eclipse in America also; and because snowflakes fall before my own nose, I need not believe that the Gold Coast is snowed up also.—Richter.

Prejudice may be considered as a continual false medium of viewing things, for prejudiced persons not only never speak well, but also never think well, of those whom they dislike, and the whole character and conduct is considered with an eye to that particular thing which offends them.—Butler.

There are truths which some men despise because they have not examined, and which they will not examine because they despise. There is one signal instance on record where this kind of prejudice was overcome by a miracle; but the age of miracles is past, while that of prejudice remains.—Colton.

Prejudice, like the spider, makes everywhere its home. It has neither taste nor choice of place, and all that it requires is room. If the one prepares her food by poisoning it to her palate and her use, the other does the same. Prejudice may be denominated the spider of the mind.—Thomas Paine.

The confirmed prejudices of a thoughtful life are as hard to change as the confirmed habits of an indolent life; and as some must trifle away age because they trifled away youth, others must labor on in a maze of error because they have wandered there too long to find their way out.—Bolingbroke.

When prejudices are caught up from bad passions, the worst of men feel intervals of remorse to soften and disperse them; but when they arise from a generous though mistaken source, they are hugged closer to the bosom, and the kindest and most compassionate natures feel a pleasure in fostering a blind and unjust resentment.—Lord Erskine.

Every one is forward to complain of the prejudices that mislead other men and parties, as if he were free, and had none of his own. This being objected on all sides, it is agreed that it is a fault and a hindrance to knowledge. What now is the cure? No other but this, that every man should let alone others' prejudices and examine his own.—Locke.

Instead of casting away all our old prejudices, we cherish them to a very considerable degree, and, to take more shame to ourselves, we cherish them because they are prejudices; and the longer they have lasted and the more generally they have prevailed, the more we cherish them. We are afraid to put men to live and trade each on his own private stock of reason; because we suspect that this stock in each man is small, and that the individuals would do better to avail themselves of the general bank and capital of nations and of ages.—Burke.

Some persons believe everything that their kindred, their parents, and their tutors believe. The veneration and the love which they have for their ancestors incline them to swallow down all their opinions at once, without examining what truth or falsehood there is in them. Men take their principles by inheritance, and defend them as they would their estates, because they are born heirs to them.—Watts.

Present

The present moment is a powerful deity.—Goethe.

The present eye praises the present object.—Shakespeare.

Live this day as if the last.—Bishop Kerr.

This moment is a flower too fair and brief.—Moore.

Each present joy or sorrow seems the chief.—Shakespeare.

Duty and to-day are ours; results and futurity belong to God.—Horace Greeley.

One of our poets—which is it?—speaks of an everlasting now.—Southey.

Devote each day to the object then in time, and every evening will find something done.—Goethe.

Man—living, feeling man—is the easy sport of the overmastering present.—Schiller.

In the parliament of the present every man represents a constituency of the past.—Lowell.

He who neglects the present moment throws away all he has.—Schiller.

The present is never a happy state to any human being.—Dr. Johnson.

'Tis but a short journey across the isthmus of Now.—Bovee.

We may make our future by the best use of the present. There is no moment like the present.—Miss Edgeworth.

The present is the living sum-total of the whole past.—Carlyle.

It is children only who enjoy the present; their elders either live on the memory of the past or the hope of the future.—Chamfort.

What is really momentous and all-important with us is the present, by which the future is shaped and colored.—Whittier.

Let us attend to the present, and as to the future we shall know how to manage when the occasion arrives.—Corneille.

Let us enjoy the fugitive hour. Man has no harbor, time has no shore; it rushes on, and carries us with it.—Lamartine.

Shakespeare says, we are creatures that look before and after; the more surprising that we do not look around a little, and see what is passing under our very eyes.—Carlyle.

Shun to seek what is hid in the womb of the morrow, and set down as gain in life's ledger whatever time fate shall have granted thee.—Horace.

Every day is a gift I receive from heaven; let us enjoy to-day that which it bestows on me. It belongs not more to the young than to me, and to-morrow belongs to no one.—Mancroix.

Enjoy the blessings of this day if God sends them; and the evils bear patiently and sweetly. For this day only is ours; we are dead to yesterday, and we are not born to to-morrow.—Jeremy Taylor.

Take all reasonable advantage of that which the present may offer you. It is the only time which is ours. Yesterday is buried forever, and to-morrow we may never see.—Victor Hugo.

Try to be happy in this present moment, and put not off being so to a time to come,—as though that time should be of another make from this, which has already come and is ours.—Fuller.

The present hour is always wealthiest when it is poorer than the future ones, as that is the pleasantest site which affords the pleasantest prospect.—Thoreau.

Of the present state, whatever it be, we feel and are forced to confess the misery; yet when the same state is again at a distance, imagination paints it as desirable.—Dr. Johnson.

One of the illusions is that the present hour is not the critical, decisive hour. Write it on your heart that every day is the best day in the year. No man has learned anything rightly, until he knows that every day is Doomsday.—Emerson.

Busy not yourself in looking forward to the events of to-morrow; but whatever may be those of the days Providence may yet assign you neglect not to turn them to advantage.—Horace.

Look upon every day, O youth, as the whole of life, not merely as a section, and enjoy the present without wishing through haste, to spring on to another.—Richter.

The Present, the Present is all thou hast
For thy sure possessing;
Like the patriarch's angel hold it fast
Till it gives its blessing. —Whittier.

If we stand in the openings of the present moment, with all the length and breadth of our faculties unselfishly adjusted to what it reveals, we are in the best condition to receive what God is always ready to communicate.—T. C. Upham.

Men spend their lives in anticipations, in determining to be vastly happy at some period or other, when they have time. But the present time has one advantage over every other—it is our own. Past opportunities are gone, future are not come.—Colton.

Make use of time, if thou lovest eternity; know yesterday cannot be recalled, to-morrow cannot be assured: to-day is only thine; which if thou procrastinate, thou lovest; which lost, is lost forever: one to-day is worth two to-morrows.—Quarles.

Something beyond! The immortal morning stands Above the night, clear shines her prescient brow;
The pendulous star in her transfigured hands Lights up the Now. —Mary Clemmer.

Abridge your hopes in proportion to the shortness of the span of human life; for while we converse, the hours, as if envious of our pleasure, fly away: enjoy, therefore, the present time, and trust not too much to what to-morrow may produce.—Horace.

Let any man examine his thoughts, and he will find them ever occupied with the past or the future. We scarcely think at all of the present; or if we do, it is only to borrow the light which it gives, for regulating the future. The present is never our object: the past and the present we use as means; the future only is our end. Thus, we never live, we only hope to live.—Pascal.

What avails it that indulgent Heaven
From mortal eyes has wrapt the woes to come,

If we, ingenious to torment ourselves,
Grow pale at hideous fictions of our own?
Enjoy the present; nor with needless cares
Of what may spring from blind misfortune's womb,

Appal the surest hour that life bestows,
Serene, and master of yourself, prepare For what may come; and leave the rest to Heaven.
—Armstrong.

Press

This country is not priest-ridden, but press-ridden.—Longfellow.

The press is the foe of rhetoric, but the friend of reason.—Colton.

Did Charity prevail, the press would prove A vehicle of virtue, truth, and love.
—Cowper.

In the long, fierce struggle for freedom of opinion, the press, like the church, counted its martyrs by thousands.—James A. Garfield.

The Reformation was cradled in the printing-press, and established by no other instrument.—Agnes Strickland.

The liberty of the press is the true measure of all other liberty; for all freedom without this must be merely nominal.—Chatfield.

Let it be impressed upon your minds, let it be instilled into your children, that the liberty of the press is the palladium of all the civil, political and religious rights.—Junius.

A journalist is a grumbler, a censor, a giver of advice, a regent or sovereigns, a tutor of nations. Four hostile newspapers are more to be feared than a thousand bayonets.—Napoleon.

When the press is the echo of sages and reformers, it works well; when it is the echo of turbulent cynics, it merely feeds political excitement.—Lamar-tine.

The liberty of the press is a blessing when we are inclined to write against others, and a calamity when we find ourselves overborne by the multitude of our assailants.—Johnson.

What gunpowder did for war, the printing-press has done for the mind; and the statesman is no longer clad in the steel of special education, but every reading man is his judge.—Wendell Phillips.

The productions of the press, fast as steam can make and carry them, go abroad through all the land, silent as snowflakes, but potent as thunder. It is an additional tongue of steam and lightning, by which a man speaks his first thought, his instant argument or grievance, to millions in a day.—Chapin.

The invention of printing added a new element of power to the race. From that hour, in a most especial sense, the brain and not the arm, the thinker and not the soldier, books and not kings, were to rule the world; and weapons, forged in the mind, keen-edged and brighter than the sunbeam, were to supplant the sword and the battle-axe.—Whipple.

How shall I speak thee, or thy power address,

Thou god of our idolatry, the Press?
By thee, religion, liberty, and laws,
Exert their influence, and advance their cause:

By thee, worse plagues than Pharaoh's land befell,

Diffused, make earth the vestibule of hell;
Thou fountain, at which drink the good and wise,

Thou ever bubbling spring of endless lies,
Like Eden's dread probationary tree,
Knowledge of good and evil is from thee! —Cowper.

Presumption

Who dares
To say that he alone has found the truth?
—Longfellow.

Presume to lay their hand upon the ark
Of her magnificent and awful cause.
—Cowper.

How dare the plants look up to heaven,
from whence
They have their nourishment?
—Shakespeare.

It is not so with Him that all things knows
As 'tis with us that square our guess by shows:
But most it is presumption in us when
The help of heaven we count the act of men.
—Shakespeare.

He will steal himself into a man's favor and for a week escape a great deal of discoveries; but when you find him out, you have him ever after.—Shakespeare.

Pretension

When half-gods go, the gods arrive.
—Emerson.

The more honesty a man has, the less he affects the air of a saint.—Lavater.

Pretences go a great way with men that take fair words and magisterial looks for current payment.—L'Es-trange.

One who preserves all the exterior decencies of ignorance.—Samuel Foote.

For in religion as in friendship, they who profess most are ever the least sincere.—Sheridan.

Who makes the fairest show means most deceit.—Shakespeare.

We are only vulnerable and ridiculous through our pretensions.—Mme. de Girardin.

The higher the rank the less pretence, because there is less to pretend to.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Pretension almost always overdoes the original, and hence exposes itself.—Hosea Ballou.

The desire of appearing clever often prevents our becoming so.—La Rochefoucauld.

He who gives himself airs of importance, exhibits the credentials of impotence.—Lavater.

Where there is much pretension, much has been borrowed: nature never pretends.—Lavater.

A snob is that man or woman who is always pretending to be something better—especially richer or more fashionable—than he is.—Thackeray.

Hearts may be attracted by assumed qualities, but the affections are not to be fixed but by those which are real.—De Moy.

True glory strikes root, and even extends itself; all false pretensions fall as do flowers, nor can anything feigned be lasting.—Cicero.

Those who quit their proper character to assume what does not belong to them are, for the greater part, ignorant of both the character they leave and of the character they assume.—Burke.

Some pretences daunt and discourage us, while others raise us to a brisk assurance.—Glanville.

It is no disgrace not to be able to do everything; but to undertake, or pretend to do what you are not made for, is not only shameful, but extremely troublesome and vexatious.—Plutarch.

The greatest cosmopolites are generally the neediest beggars, and they who embrace the entire universe with love, for the most part, love nothing but their narrow self.—Herder.

The most accomplished way of using books at present is to serve them as some do lords, learn their titles, and then boast of their acquaintance.—Swift.

When you see a man with a great deal of religion displayed in his shop window, you may depend upon it he keeps a very small stock of it within.—Spurgeon.

It is worth noticing that those who assume an imposing demeanor and seek to pass themselves off for something beyond what they are, are not unfrequently as much underrated by some as they are overrated by others.—Whately.

It is the care of a very great part of mankind to conceal their indigence from the rest. They support themselves by temporary expedients, and every day is lost in contriving for to-morrow.—Johnson.

A man who knows the world will not only make the most of everything he does know, but of many things he does not know, and will gain more credit by his adroit mode of hiding his ignorance than the pedant by his awkward attempt to exhibit his erudition.—Colton.

Some are so close and reserved that they will not show their wares but by a dark light, and seem always to keep back somewhat; and when they know within themselves they speak of that which they do not well know, would nevertheless seem to others to know of that which they may not well speak.—Bacon.

As a general rule, people who flagrantly pretend to anything are the reverse of that which they pretend to. A man who sets up for a saint is sure to be a sinner; and a man who boasts that he is a sinner is sure to have some feeble, maudlin, snivelling bit of saintship about him which is enough to make him a humbug.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Pride

The never-failing vice of fools.—Pope.

The proud man is forsaken of God.—Plato.

Pride eradicates all vices but itself.—Emerson.

All pride is willing pride.—Shakespeare.

Pride is both a virtue and a vice.—Theodore Parker.

O world, how apt the poor are to be proud!—Shakespeare.

We rise in glory as we sink in pride.—Young.

Pride, the first peer and president of hell.—De Foe.

Some people are proud of their humility.—Beecher.

The proud are ever most provoked by pride.—Cowper.

When pride thaws, look for floods.—Bailey.

Nothing is more short-lived than pride.—Ben Jonson.

In general, pride is at the bottom of all great mistakes.—Ruskin.

Pride and weakness are Siamese twins.—Lowell.

Pride goeth before destruction, and an haughty spirit before a fall.—Bible.

As for environments, the kingliest being ever born in the flesh lay in a manger.—Chapin.

They are proud in humility, proud in that they are not proud.—Burton.

Fancy and pride seek things at vast expense.—Young.

Pride that dines on vanity, sups on contempt.—B. Franklin.

How pomp is followed!—Shakespeare.

Where pride begins, love ceases.—Lavater.

An avenging God closely follows the haughty.—Seneca.

How can there be pride in a contrite heart? Humility is the earliest fruit of religion.—Hosca Ballou.

There is a certain noble pride through which merits shine brighter than through modesty.—Richter.

When pride and presumption walk before, shame and loss follow very closely.—Louis the Eleventh.

Pride requires very costly food—its keeper's happiness.—Colton.

A proud man never shows his pride so much as when he is civil.—Lord Greville.

Pride, of all others the most dangerous fault,
Proceeds from want of sense, or want of thought.—Roscommon.

Pride, which inspires us with so much envy, serves also to moderate it.—Rochefoucauld.

Pride is a vice, which pride itself inclines every man to find in others, and to overlook in himself.—Dr. Johnson.

Pride breakfasted with plenty, dined with poverty, and supped with infamy.—Franklin.

There is none so homely but loves a looking-glass.—South.

The best manners are stained by the addition of pride.—Claudian.

I do hate a proud man, as I hate the engendering of toads.—Shakespeare.

Pride is founded not on the sense of happiness, but on the sense of power.—Hazlitt.

There is much proud humility and humble pride in the world.—J. L. Basford.

What is pride? a whizzing rocket
That would emulate a star.
—Wordsworth.

'Tis pride, rank pride, and haughtiness of soul: I think the Romans call it stoicism.—Addison.

Pride in their port, defiance in their eye,
I see the lords of humankind pass by.
—Goldsmith.

Pride, where wit fails, steps in to our defence, and fills up all the mighty void of sense.—Popc.

Pride is increased by ignorance; those assume the most who know the least.—Gay.

When a proud man thinks best of himself, then God and man think worst of him.—Horace Smith.

Spiritual pride is the most dangerous and the most arrogant of all sorts of pride.—Richardson.

The pride of woman, natural to her, never sleeps until modesty is gone.—Addison.

All that the wisdom of the proud can teach is to be stubborn or sullen under misfortune.—Goldsmith.

There is no pride on earth like the pride of intellect and science.—Roswell D. Hitchcock.

Pride hath no other glass to show itself but pride.—Shakespeare.

Dignity and pride are of too near relationship for intermarriage.—Madame Deluzy.

Pride goes hated, cursed and abominated by all.—Hammond.

Family pride entertains many unsocial opinions.—Zimmermann.

Earthly pride is like the passing flower, that springs to fall, and blossoms but to die.—H. K. White.

How poor a thing is pride! when all, as slaves, Differ but in their fetters, not their graves.—Daniels.

He whose pride oppresses the humble may perhaps be humbled, but will never be humble.—Lavater.

To be proud and inaccessible is to be timid and weak.—Massillon.

The infinitely little have a pride infinitely great.—Voltaire.

Vanity and pride sustain so close an alliance as to be often mistaken for each other.—Gladstone.

There is no passion which steals into the heart more imperceptibly, and covers itself under more disguises, than pride.—Addison.

All other passions do occasional good; but when pride puts in its word everything goes wrong.—Ruskin.

Who cries out on pride that can therein tax any private party? Doth it not flow as hugely as the sea?—Shakespeare.

Pride seems to be equally distributed; the man who owns the carriage and the man who drives it seem to have it just alike.—H. W. Shaw.

The sin of pride is the sin of sins, in which all subsequent sins are included, as in their germ; they are but the unfolding of this one.—Trench.

Pride, in some particular disguise or other—often a secret to be proud himself—is the most ordinary spring of action among men.—Steele.

Men very rarely put off the trappings of pride till they who are about them put on their winding-sheet.—Clarendon.

Ay, do despise me, I'm the prouder for it; I like to be despised.—Brickerstaff.

The most ridiculous of all animals is a proud priest; he cannot use his own tools without cutting his own fingers.—Colton.

Men say, "By pride the angels fell from heaven." By pride they reached a place from which they fell.—Joaquin Miller.

There are proud men of so much delicacy that it almost conceals their pride, and perfectly excuses it.—Landon.

There are no friends more inseparable than pride and hardness of heart, humility and love, falsehood and impudence.—Lavater.

There is this paradox in pride—it makes some men ridiculous, but prevents others from becoming so.—Colton.

If it were ever allowable to forget what is due to superiority of rank, it would be when the privileged themselves remember it.—Madame Swetchine.

The seat of pride is in the heart, and only there; and if it be not there, it is neither in the look nor in the clothes.—Clarendon.

When a beautiful woman yields to temptation, let her consult her pride, though she forgets her virtue.—Junius.

Pride, though it cannot prevent the holy affections of nature from being felt, may prevent them from being shown.—Jeremy Taylor.

Pride, like the magnet, constantly points to one object, self; but, unlike the magnet, it has no attractive pole, but at all points repels.—Colton.

It is pride which fills the world with so much harshness and severity. We are rigorous to offenses as if we had never offended.—Blair.

Haughty people seem to me to have, like the dwarfs, the stature of a child and the face of a man.—Joubert.

If he could only see how small a vacancy his death would leave, the proud man would think less of the place he occupies in his lifetime.—Legouvé.

The haughty woman who can stand alone, and requires no leaning-place in our hearts, loses the spell of her sex.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Men are sometimes accused of pride, merely because their accusers would be proud themselves were they in their places.—Shenstone.

Deep is the sea, and deep is hell, but pride mineth deeper; it is coiled as a poisonous worm about the foundations of the soul.—Tupper.

You who are ashamed of your poverty, and blush for your calling, are a snob; as are you who boast of your pedigree, or are proud of your wealth.—Thackeray.

As in some Irish houses, where things are so-so, One gammon of bacon hangs up for a show;— But, for eating a rasher of what they take pride in, They'd as soon think of eating the par it is fried in. —Goldsmith.

The pride of the heart is the attribute of honest men; pride of manners is that of fools; the pride of birth and rank is often the pride of dupes.—Duclos.

If a man has a right to be proud of anything, it is of a good action done as it ought to be, without any base interest lurking at the bottom of it.—Sterne.

The disesteem and contempt of others is inseparable from pride. It is hardly possible to overvalue ourselves but by undervaluing our neighbors.—Clarendon.

Charity feeds the poor, so does pride; charity builds an hospital, so does pride. In this they differ: charity gives her glory to God; pride takes her glory from man.—Quarles.

The truly proud man knows neither superiors nor inferiors. The first he does not admit of: the last he does not concern himself about.—Hazlitt.

Pride is like the beautiful acacia, that lifts its head proudly above its neighbor plants—forgetting that it too, like them, has its roots in the dirt.—Bovee.

Of all the causes that conspire to blind Man's erring judgment, and misguide the mind,
What the weak head with strongest bias rules,
Is pride, the never-failing vice of fools. —Pope.

Of all the marvelous works of the Deity, perhaps there is nothing that angels behold with such supreme astonishment as a proud man.—Colton.

When flowers are full of heaven-descended dews, they always hang their heads; but men hold theirs the higher the more they receive, getting proud as they get full.—Beecher.

Pride is handsome, economical; pride eradicates so many vices, letting none subsist but itself, that it seems as if it were a great gain to exchange vanity for pride.—Emerson.

To lordlings proud I tune my lay,
Who feast in bower or hall;
Though dukes they be, to dukes I say,
That pride will have a fall. —Gay.

Pride is a vice not only dreadfully mischievous in human society, but perhaps of all others, the most insuperable bar to real inward improvement.—Mrs. E. Carter.

He that is proud eats up himself; pride is his own glass, his own trumpet, his own chronicle; and whatever praises itself but in the deed devours the deed in the praise.—Shakespeare.

Of all human actions, pride seldom obtains its end; for, aiming at honor and reputation, it reaps contempt and derision.—Walker.

Measure not thyself by thy morning shadow, but by the extent of thy grave; and reckon thyself above the earth by the line thou must be contented with under it.—Sir T. Browne.

Pride's chickens have bonny feathers, but they are an expensive brood to rear. They eat up everything, and are always lean when brought to market.—Alexander Smith.

The lofty pine is oftenest agitated by the winds—high towers rush to the earth with a heavier fall—and the lightning most frequently strikes the highest mountains.—Horace.

Yes—the same sin that overthrew the angels.

And of all sins most easily besets Mortals the nearest to the angelic nature: The vile are only vain; the great are proud.
—Byron.

When Adam daffe and Eve spane
To spire of thou may spede, Whare was then the pride of man,
That now merres his meed?
—Richard Rolle de Hampole.

Though Diogenes lived in a tub, there might be, for aught I know, as much pride under his rags, as in the fine-spun garments of the divine Plato.
—Swift.

Ask for what end the heavenly bodies shine,
Earth for whose use? Pride answers, 'Tis for mine
For me kind nature wakes her genial power, Suckles each herb, and spreads out every flower.
—Pope.

Pride is of such intimate connection with ingratitude that the actions of ingratitude seem directly resolvable into pride as the principal reason of them.—South.

A proud woman who has learned to submit carries all her pride to the reinforcement of her submission, and looks down with severe superiority on all feminine assumption as unbecoming.—George Eliot.

The sordid meal of the Cynics contributed neither to their tranquillity nor to their modesty. Pride went with Diogenes into his tub; and there he had the presumption to command

Alexander the haughtiest of all men.—Henry Home.

To acknowledge our faults when we are blamed is modesty; to discover them to one's friends in ingenuousness, is confidence; but to preach them to all the world, if one does not take care, is pride.—Confucius.

Pride, like laudanum and other poisonous medicines, is beneficial in small, though injurious in large quantities. No man who is not pleased with himself, even in a personal sense, can please others.—Frederic Saunders.

It is with nations as with individuals, those who know the least of others think the highest of themselves; for the whole family of pride and ignorance are incestuous, and mutually beget each other.—Colton.

It seems that nature, which has so wisely disposed our bodily organs with a view to our happiness, has also bestowed on us pride, to spare us the pain of being aware of our imperfections.—Rochefoucauld.

Pride is the common forerunner of a fall. It was the devil's sin, and the devil's ruin; and has been, ever since, the devil's stratagem, who, like an expert wrestler, usually gives a man a lift before he gives him a throw.—South.

When a man's pride is subdued it is like the sides of Mount Ætna. It was terrible during the eruption, but when that is over and the lava is turned into soil, there are vineyards and olive trees which grow up to the top.—Beecher.

Vanity is a confounded donkey, very apt to put his head between his legs, and chuck us over; but pride is a fine horse, that will carry us over the ground, and enable us to distance our fellow-travelers.—Marryat.

In reality, there is perhaps no one of our natural passions so hard to subdue as pride. Disguise it, struggle with it, stifle it, mortify it as much as you please, it is still alive, and will every now and then peep out and show itself.—Franklin.

I have ventur'd,
Like little wanton boys that swim on bladders,
This many summers in a sea of glory,
But far beyond my depth: my high-blown pride
At length broke under me.—Shakespeare.

In beginning the world, if you don't wish to get chafed at every turn, fold up your pride carefully, put it under lock and key, and only let it out to air upon grand occasions. Pride is a garment all stiff brocade outside, all grating sackcloth on the side next to the skin.—Lytton.

Oh! Why should the spirit of mortal be proud?
Like a swift-fleeting meteor, a fast flying cloud,
A flash of the lightning, a break of the wave,
Man passes from life to his rest in the grave.—Wm. Knox.

But man, proud man,
Drest in a little brief authority,
Most ignorant of what he's most assur'd,
His glassy essence, like an angry ape,
Plays such fantastic tricks before high heaven,
As make the angels weep.—Shakespeare.

Pride is as loud a beggar as want, and a great deal more saucy. When you have bought one fine thing, you must buy ten more, that your appearance may be all of a piece; but it is easier to suppress the first desire than to satisfy all that follow it.—Franklin.

I think half the troubles for which men go slouching in prayer to God are caused by their intolerable pride. Many of our cares are but a morbid way of looking at our privileges. We let our blessings get mouldy, and then call them curses.—Beecher.

We mortals, men and women, devour many a disappointment between breakfast and dinner time; keep back the tears, and look a little pale about the lips, and in answer to inquiries say, "Oh, nothing!" Pride helps us; and pride is not a bad thing when it only urges us to hide our own hurts, not to hurt others.—George Eliot.

John Bunyan had a great dread of spiritual pride; and once, after he had preached a very fine sermon, and his friends crowded round to shake him by the hand, while they expressed the utmost admiration of his eloquence, he interrupted them, saying: "Ay! you need not remind me of that, for the devil told me of it before I was out of the pulpit!"—Southey.

Spite of all the fools that pride has made,
'Tis not on man a useless burthen laid;
Pride has ennobled some, and some disgraced;
It hurts not in itself, but as 'tis placed;
When right, its views know none but virtue's bound;
When wrong, it scarcely looks one inch around.—Stillingfleet.

Pride counterbalances all our miseries, for it either hides them, or, if it discloses them, boasts of that disclosure. Pride has such a thorough possession of us, even in the midst of our miseries and faults, that we are prepared to sacrifice life with joy, if it may but be talked of.—Pascal.

As Plato entertained some friends in a room where there was a couch richly ornamented, Diogenes came in very dirty, as usual, and getting upon the couch, and trampling on it, said, "I trample upon the pride of Plato." Plato mildly answered, "But with greater pride, Diogenes!"—Erasmus.

There is no one passion which all mankind so naturally give in to as pride, nor any other passion which appears in such different disguises. It is to be found in all habits and all complexions. Is it not a question whether it does more harm or good in the world, and if there be not such a thing as what we may call a virtuous and laudable pride?—Steele.

There are so many things to lower a man's top-sails—he is such a dependent creature—he is to pay such court to his stomach, his food, his sleep, his exercise—that, in truth, a hero is an idle word. Man seems formed to be a hero in suffering, not a hero in action. Men err in nothing more than in the estimate which they make of human labor.—Cecil.

Pride differs in many things from vanity, and by gradations that never blend, although they may be somewhat indistinguishable. Pride may perhaps be termed a too high opinion of ourselves founded on the overrating of certain qualities that we do actually possess; whereas vanity is more easily satisfied, and can extract a feeling of self-complacency from qualifications that are imaginary.—Colton.

What a lesson, indeed, is all history and all life to the folly and fruitlessness of pride! The Egyptian kings had their embalmed bodies preserved in massive pyramids, to obtain an earthly immortality. In the seventeenth century they were sold as quack medicines, and now they are burnt for fuel! The Egyptian mummies, which Cambyzes or time hath spared, avarice now consumeth. Mummy is become merchandise.—Whipple.

It is the nature of man to be proud, when man by nature hath nothing to be proud of. He more adorneth the creature than he adareth the Creator; and makes not only his belly his god, but his body. I am ashamed of their glory whose glory is their shame. If nature will needs have me to be proud of something, I will be proud only of this, that I am proud of nothing.—Arthur Warwick.

In pride, in reas'ning pride, our error lies;
All quit their sphere, and rush into the skies.

Pride still is aiming at the bless'd abodes, Men would be angels, angels would be gods.

Aspiring to be gods, if angels fell,
Aspiring to be angels men rebel;
And who but wishes to invert the laws
Of order, sins against th' Eternal cause.
—Pope.

Pride looks back upon its past deeds, and calculating with nicety what it has done, it commits itself to rest; whereas humility looks to that which is before, and discovering how much ground remains to be trodden, it is active and vigilant. Having gained one height, pride looks down with complacency on that which is beneath it; humility looks up to a higher and yet higher elevation. The one keeps us on this earth, which is congenial to its nature; the other directs our eye, and tends to lift us up to heaven.—James McCosh.

Principle

Principle is a passion for truth.—Hazlitt.

Principles cannot die.—Wade Hampton.

Principle is ever my motto, no expediency.—Benj. Disraeli.

Sacrifice money rather than principle.—Rothschild.

He who knows right principles is not equal to him who loves them.—Confucius.

Ez to my principles, I glory
In hev'n nothin' o' the sort.
—Lowell.

Still it is a fine sight to see a man who has never changed his principles.—Jules Favre.

Principles, like troops of the line, are undisturbed, and stand fast.—Richter.

If they be principles evident of themselves, they need nothing to evidence them.—Tillotson.

A good principle not rightly understood may prove as hurtful as a bad.—Milton.

Let us cling to our principles as the mariner clings to his last plank when night and tempest close around him.—Adam Woolever.

Dangerous principles impose upon our understanding, emasculate our spirits, and spoil our temper.—Jeremy Collier.

Men must have righteous principles in the first place, and then they will not fail to perform virtuous actions.—Luther.

If principle is good for anything, it is worth living up to.—Franklin.

Whoever is right, the persecutor must be wrong.—William Penn.

It is in vain to expect any advantage from our profession of the truth, if we be not sincerely just and honest in our actions.—Rev. Dr. Sharp.

I have all reverence for principles which grow out of sentiments; but as to sentiments which grow out of principles, you shall scarcely build a house of cards thereon.—Jacobi.

Whatever lies beyond the limits of experience, and claims another origin than that of induction and deduction from established data, is illegitimate.—G. H. Lewes.

The value of a principle is the number of things it will explain; and there is no good theory of disease which does not at once suggest a cure.—Emerson.

There is no security in a good disposition if the support of good principles—that is to say, of religion, of Christian faith—be wanting. It may be soured by misfortune, it may be corrupted by wealth, it may be blighted by neediness, it may lose all its original brightness, if destitute of that support.—Southey.

Printing (See Press)

Souls dwell in printer's type.—Joseph Ames.

Printing, which is the preservative of all arts.—Isaiah Thomas.

Ink is the blood of the printing-press.—Milton.

I'll print it, and shame the fools.—Pope.

I am myself a gentleman of the press, and have no other escutcheon.—Beaconsfield.

Though an angel should write, still 'tis devils must print.—Moore.

It is the mission of the printer to diffuse light and knowledge by a judicious intermingling of black with white.—Frederick Douglass.

The press should be the voice of the people, not of party.—James Ellis.

The freedom of the press should be inviolate.—J. Q. Adams.

We live under a government of men and morning newspapers.—Wendell Phillips.

By the device of printing, a Bible can be sold for sixty crowns.—John Faust.

The press is the exclusive literature of the million; to them it is literature, church, and college.—Wendell Phillips.

What have the Germans gained by their boasted freedom of the press, except the liberty of abusing each other as they like?—Goethe.

The liberty of the press is the true measure of all other liberty; for all freedom without this must be merely nominal.—Chatfield.

Every school boy and school girl who has arrived at the age of reflection ought to know something about the history of the art of printing.—Horace Mann.

The press, watchful with more than the hundred eyes of Argus, strong with more than the hundred arms of Briareus, not only guards all the conquests of civilization, but leads the way to future triumphs.—Charles Sumner.

It is beginning to be doubtful whether Parliament and Congress sit in Westminster and Washington, or in the editorial rooms of the leading journals,—so thoroughly is everything debated before the authorized and responsible debaters get on their legs.—Lowell.

Thou hast most traitorously corrupted the youth of the realm in erecting a grammar school; and whereas, before, our forefathers had no other books but the score and the tally, thou hast caused printing to be used, and, contrary to the king, his crown and dignity, thou hast built a paper-mill.—

Shakespeare.

The press is not only free; it is powerful. That power is ours. It is the proudest that man can enjoy. It was not granted by monarchs, it was not gained for us by aristocracies; but it sprang from the people, and, with an immortal instinct, it has always worked for the people.—Beaconsfield.

Blest be the gracious Power, who taught mankind
To stamp a lasting image of the mind!
Beasts may convey, and tuneful birds may sing,
Their mutual feelings, in the opening spring;
But Man alone has skill and power to send
The heart's warm dictates to the distant friend;
'Tis his alone to please, instruct, advise Ages remote, and nations yet to rise.
—Crabbe.

Prison

The living grave of crime.—Joaquin Miller.

Young Crime's finishing-school.—
Mrs. Balfour.

A felon's cell—
The fittest earthly type of hell!
—Whittier.

Shut up in the prison of their own consciences.—Archbishop Usher.

To trial bring her stolen charms,
and let her prison be my arms.—Earl of Egremont.

The worst prison is not of stone. It is of a throbbing heart, outraged by an infamous life.—Beecher.

Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage;
Minds innocent and quiet take
That for an hermitage.—Loveace.

A prison! heav'ns, I loath the hated name,
Famine's metropolis, the sink of shame,
A nauseous sepulchre, whose craving womb
Hourly inters poor mortals in its tomb;
By ev'ry plague and ev'ry ill possess'd,
Ev'n purgatory itself to thee 's a jest.
—Tom Brown.

Procrastination

God has promised forgiveness to your repentance; but He has not promised to-morrow to your procrastination.—St. Augustine.

There is no dallying with God.—
Archbishop Usher.

Lingering labors come to naught.—
Southwell.

Delays have dangerous ends.—
Shakespeare.

For yesterday was once to-morrow.
—Persius.

The man who procrastinates struggles with ruin.—Hesiod.

Never leave that till to-morrow which you can do to-day.—Benjamin Franklin.

Defer not till to-morrow to be wise,
To-morrow's sun to thee may never rise.
—Congreve.

There is, by God's grace, an immeasurable distance between late and too late.—Mme. Swetchine.

Faith in to-morrow, instead of Christ, is Satan's nurse for man's perdition.—Rev. Dr. Cheever.

Procrastination is the thief of time.
—Young.

When things are come to the execution, there is no secrecy comparable to celerity.—Bacon.

Our good purposes foreslowed are become our tormentors upon our death-bed.—Bishop Hall.

Whatever things injure your eye you are anxious to remove; but things which affect your mind you defer.—Horace.

By one delay after another they spin out their whole lives, till there's no more future left for them.—L'Es-trange.

The greatest thief this world has ever produced is procrastination. and he is still at large.—H. W. Shaw.

By the streets of "By and By" one arrives at the house of "Never."—Cervantes.

Procrastination is the kidnapper of souls and the recruiting-officer of hell.—Edward Irving.

We pass our life in deliberation, and we die upon it.—Pasquier Quesnel.

Is not he imprudent, who, seeing the tide making haste towards him apace, will sleep till the sea overwhelms him?—Tillotson.

Indulge in procrastination, and in time you will come to this, that because a thing ought to be done, therefore you can't do it.—Charles Buxton.

Be wise to-day; 'tis madness to defer; Next day the fatal precedent will plead; Thus on, till wisdom is push'd out of life.—Young.

He who prorogues the honesty of to-day till to-morrow, will probably prorogue his to-morrows to eternity.—Lavater.

Let's take the instant by the forward top; for we are old, and on our quick'st decrees the inaudible and noiseless foot of Time steals, ere we can effect them.—Shakespeare.

Procrastination has been called a thief,—the thief of time. I wish it were no worse than a thief. It is a murderer; and that which it kills is not time merely, but the immortal soul.—Nevins.

To procrastinate seems inherent in man, for if you do to-day that you may enjoy to-morrow it is but deferring the enjoyment; so that to be idle or industrious, vicious or virtuous, is but with a view of procrastinating the one or the other.—B. R. Haydon.

There is no moment like the present; not only so, but, moreover, there is no moment at all,—that is, no instant force and energy, but in the present. The man who will not execute his resolutions when they are fresh upon him can have no hope from them afterwards.—Miss Edgeworth.

To be always intending to live a new life, but never to find time to set about it; this is as if a man should put off eating and drinking and sleeping from one day and night to another, till he is starved and destroyed.—Tillotson.

To-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow creeps in this petty pace, from day to day, to the last syllable of recorded time; and all our yesterdays have lighted fools the way to dusty death.—Shakespeare.

Profanity

Ill deeds are doubled with an evil word.—Shakespeare.

The loud type of vulgarity.—Emerson.

Immodest words admit of no defence.—Pope.

To swear is neither brave, polite, nor wise.—Pope.

When a gentleman is disposed to swear it is not for any standers-by to curtail his oaths.—Shakespeare.

Blasphemous words betray the vain foolishness of the speaker.—Sir P. Sidney.

Most people who commit a sin count on some personal benefit to be derived therefrom, but profanity has not even this excuse.—Hosea Ballou.

Nothing is a greater sacrilege than to prostitute the great name of God to the petulance of an idle tongue.—Jeremy Taylor.

None so nearly disposed to scoffing at religion as those who have accustomed themselves to swear on trifling occasions.—Tillotson.

Profaneness is a brutal vice. He who indulges in it is no gentleman, I care not what his stamp may be in society; I care not what clothes he wears, or what culture he boasts.—Chapin.

There are braying men in the world as well as braying asses; for what is loud and senseless talking and swearing any other than braying?—L'Es-trange.

It is difficult to account for a practice which gratifies no passion and promotes no interest.—Robert Hall.

A single profane expression betrays a man's low breeding.—Joseph Cook.

The devil tempts men through their ambition, their cupidity, or their appetite, until he comes to the profane swearer, whom he clutches without any reward.—Horace Mann.

For it comes to pass off that a terrible oath, with a swaggering accent sharply twanged off, gives manhood more approbation than ever proof itself would have earned him.—Shakespeare.

Swearing is properly a superfluity of naughtiness, and can only be considered as a sort of pepper-corn rent, in acknowledgment of the devil's right of superiority.—Robert Hall.

The foolish and wicked practice of profane cursing and swearing is a vice so mean and low that every person of sense and character detests and despises it.—Washington.

From a common custom of swearing men easily slide into perjury; therefore, if thou wouldst not be perjured, do not use thyself to swear.—Hierocles.

Of all the dark catalogue of sins there is not one more vile and execrable than profaneness. It commonly does, and loves to cluster with other sins; and he who can look up and insult his Maker to His face needs but little improvement in guilt to make him a finished devil.—S. H. Cox.

Every one knows the veneration which was paid by the Jews to a name so great, wonderful, and holy. They would not let it enter even into their religious discourses. What can we then think of those who make use of so tremendous a name, in the ordinary expression of their anger, mirth, and most impertinent passions?—Addison.

Progress

Progress,—the stride of God!—Victor Hugo.

Now by St. Paul the work goes bravely on.—Colley Cibber.

Revolutions never go backwards.—Emerson.

Human improvement is from within outwards.—Froude.

Living movement.—Carlyle.

Row on whatever happens.—Rabelais.

We are swinging round the circle.—Andrew Johnson.

All growth that is not towards God is growing to decay.—George MacDonald.

Progress is the law of life,—man is not man as yet.—Robert Browning.

The slowest of us cannot but admit that the world moves.—Wendell Phillips.

All that is human must retrograde if it do not advance.—Gibbon.

Press on!—"for in the grave there is no work
And no device"—Press on! while yet ye may!—N. P. Willis.

I am suffocated and lost when I have not the bright feeling of progression.—Margaret Fuller.

A fresh mind keeps the body fresh. Take in the ideas of the day, drain off those of yesterday.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Humanity, in the aggregate, is progressing, and philanthropy looks forward hopefully.—Hosea Ballou.

Cost is the father and compensation is the mother of progress.—J. G. Holland.

Look up and not down; look forward and not back; look out and not in; and lend a hand.—E. E. Hale.

He who has not the spirit of his age has all the misery of it.—Voltaire.

There is a frightful interval between the seed and the timber.—Johnson.

Moral excellence is the bright consummate flower of all progress.—Charles Sumner.

There is a period of life when we go back as we advance.—Rousseau.

Even Holland and Spain have been positively, though not relatively, advancing.—Macaulay.

Every age has its problem, by solving which humanity is helped forward.—Heinrich Heine.

I must do something to keep my thoughts fresh and growing. I dread nothing so much as falling into a rut and feeling myself becoming a fossil.—James A. Garfield.

We are never present with, but always beyond ourselves. Fear, desire, and hope are still pushing us on towards the future.—Montaigne.

Not because I raise myself above something but because I raise myself to something, do I approve myself.—Jacobi.

Intellectually, as politically, the direction of all true progress is towards greater freedom, and along an endless succession of ideas.—Bovee.

The art of nations is to be accumulative, just as science and history are; the work of living men not superseding, but building itself upon the work of the past.—Ruskin.

Yet I doubt not thro' the ages one increasing purpose runs,
And the thoughts of men are widen'd with the process of the suns.—Tennyson.

We are either progressing or retrograding all the while; there is no such thing as remaining stationary in this life.—James Freeman Clarke.

Political convulsions, like geological upheavings, usher in new epochs of the world's progress.—Wendell Phillips.

If a man is not rising upward to be an angel, depend upon it, he is sinking downward to be a devil. He cannot stop at the beast.—Coleridge.

Nature knows no pause in progress and development, and attaches her curse on all inaction.—Goethe.

Some men so dislike the dust kicked up by the generation they belong to, that, being unable to pass, they lag behind it.—Hare.

The world owes all its onward impulses to men ill at ease. The happy man inevitably confines himself within ancient limits.—Hawthorne.

Every step of progress which the world has made has been from scaffold to scaffold, and from stake to stake.—Wendell Phillips.

Every man who strikes blows for power, for influence, for institutions, for the right, must be just as good an anvil as he is a hammer.—J. G. Holland.

In every department of life—in its business and in its pleasures, in its beliefs and in its theories, in its material developments and in its spiritual connections—we thank God that we are not like our fathers.—Froude.

Let us labor for that larger and larger comprehension of truth, that more and more thorough repudiation of error, which shall make the history of mankind a series of ascending developments.—Horace Mann.

We should so live and labor in our time that what came to us as seed may go to the next generation as blossom, and that what came to us as blossom may go to them as fruit. This is what we mean by progress.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Progress begins with the minority. It is completed by persuading the majority, by showing the reason and the advantage of the step forward, and that is accomplished by appealing to the intelligence of the majority.—George William Curtis.

The true law of the race is progress and development. Whenever civilization pauses in the march of conquest, it is overthrown by the barbarian.—Simms.

The mind naturally makes progress, and the will naturally clings to objects; so that for want of right objects, it will attach itself to wrong ones.—Pascal.

The greatest evils of society are goods that have refused to go on, but have sat down on the highway, saying to the world, "We stop here; do you stop also."—Julia Ward Howe.

Society moves slowly towards civilization, but when we compare epochs half a century or even quarter of a century apart, we perceive many signs that progress is made.—Mrs. L. M. Child.

Our course heavenward is something like the plan of the zealous pilgrims to Jerusalem of old, who for every three steps forward took one backward.—Richter.

Finds progress, man's distinctive mark alone,
Not God's, and not the beast's;
God is, they are,
Man partly is, and wholly hopes to be.
—Robert Browning.

Westward the course of empire takes its way;
The four first acts already past,
A fifth shall close the drama with the day;
Time's noblest offspring is the last.
—Bishop Berkeley.

Every time that a people which has long crouched in slavery and ignorance is moved to its lowest depths there appear monsters and heroes, prodigies of crime and prodigies of virtue.—Lamartine.

It is curious to note the old sea-margins of human thought. Each subsiding century reveals some new mystery; we build where monsters used to hide themselves.—Longfellow.

Indeed, the grandest of all laws is the law of progressive development. Under it, in the wide sweep of things, men grow wiser as they grow older; societies better.—Bovee.

Laws and institutions are constantly tending to gravitate. Like clocks, they must be occasionally cleansed, and wound up, and set to true time.—Henry Ward Beecher.

The individual and the race are always moving, and as we drift into new latitudes new lights open in the heaven more immediately over us.—Chapin.

He only is advancing in life whose heart is getting softer, whose blood warmer, whose brain quicker, whose spirit is entering into living peace.—Ruskin.

Modern invention has banished the spinning-wheel, and the same law of progress makes the woman of to-day a different woman from her grandmother.—Susan B. Anthony.

Any society which is not improving is deteriorating, and the more so the closer and more familiar it is. Even a really superior man almost always begins to deteriorate when he is habitually king of his company.—J. Stuart Mill.

The wisest man may be wiser to-day than he was yesterday, and to-morrow than he is to-day. Total freedom from change would imply total freedom from error; but this is the prerogative of Omniscience alone.—Colton.

All our progress is an unfolding, like the vegetable bud. You have first an instinct, then an opinion, then a knowledge, as the plant has root, bud, and fruit. Trust the instinct to the end, though you can render no reason.—Emerson.

For my own part I am persuaded that everything advances by an unchangeable law through the eternal constitution and association of latent causes, which have been long before predestinated.—Quintus Curtius Rufus.

Progress comes by experiment, and this from ennui that leads to voyages, wars, revolutions, and plainly to change in the arts of expression; that cries out to the imagination, and is the nurse of the invention whereof we term necessity the mother.—Stedman.

Woman has so long been subject to the disabilities and restrictions with which her progress has been embarrassed that she has become enervated, her mind to some extent paralyzed; and like those still more degraded by personal bondage she hugs her chains.—Lucretia Mott.

The progress from infancy to boyhood is imperceptible. In that long dawn of the mind we take but little heed. The years pass by us, one by one, little distinguishable from each other. But when the intellectual sun of our life is risen, we take due note of joy and sorrow.—Barry Cornwall.

All attempts to urge men forward, even in the right path, beyond the measure of their light, are impracticable; and unlawful, if they were practicable; augment their light, conciliate their affections, and they will follow of their own accord.—Robert Hall.

Mankind never loses any good thing, physical, intellectual, or moral, till it finds a better, and then the loss is a gain. No steps backward is the rule of human history. What is gained by one man is invested in all men, and is a permanent investment for all time.—Theodore Parker.

What pains and tears the slightest steps of man's progress have cost! Every hair-breadth forward has been in the agony of some soul, and humanity has reached blessing after blessing of all its vast achievement of good with bleeding feet.—Bartol.

All the best things and treasures of this world are not to be produced by each generation for itself; but we are all intended, not to carve our work in snow that will melt, but each and all of us to be continually rolling a great white gathering snow-ball, higher and higher, larger and larger, along the Alps of human power.—Ruskin.

So long as all the increased wealth which modern progress brings, goes but to build up great fortunes, to increase luxury, and make sharper the contrast between the House of Have and the House of Want, progress is not real and cannot be permanent.—Henry George.

Beneath this starry arch,
Naught resteth or is still;
But all things hold their march
As if by one great will.
Move one, move all:
Hark to the footfall!
On, on, forever.

—Harriet Martineau.

It is for us to discharge the high duties that devolve on us, and carry our race onward. To be no better, no wiser, no greater than the past is to be little and foolish and bad; it is to misapply noble means, to sacrifice glorious opportunities for the performance of sublime deeds, to become cumberers of the ground.—Garrison.

It is always hard to go beyond your public. If they are satisfied with cheap performance, you will not easily arrive at better. If they know what is good, and require it, you will aspire and burn until you achieve it. But from time to time, in history, men are born a whole age too soon.—Emerson.

By the disposition of a stupendous wisdom, moulding together the great mysterious incorporation of the human race, the whole, at one time, is never old, or middle-aged, or young; but, in a condition of unchangeable constancy, moves on through the varied tenor of perpetual decay, fall, renovation, and progression.—Burke.

By a peculiar prerogative, not only each individual is making daily advances in the sciences, and may make advances in morality (which is the science, by way of eminence, of living well and being happy), but all mankind together are making a continual progress in proportion as the universe grows older; so that the whole human race, during the course of so many ages, may be considered as one man, who never ceases to live and learn.—Pascal.

Generations are as the days of toil—some mankind; death and birth are the vesper and the matin bells that summon mankind to sleep and to rise refreshed for new advancement. What the father has made, the son can make and enjoy; but has also work of his own appointed him. Thus all things wax and roll onwards: arts, establishments, opinions, nothing is ever completed, but ever completing.—Carlyle.

However slow the progress of mankind may be, or however imperceptible the gain in a single generation, the advancement is evident enough in the long run. There was a time when the most part of the inhabitants of Britain would have been as much startled at questioning the truth of the doctrine of transubstantiation as they would in this age at the most sceptical doubts on the being of a God.—Locke.

"Can any good come out of Nazareth?" This is always the question of the wiseacres and the knowing ones. But the good, the new, comes from exactly that quarter whence it is not looked for, and is always something different from what is expected. Everything new is received with contempt, for it begins in obscurity. It becomes a power unobserved.—Feuerbach.

It is in the stomach of plants that development begins, and ends in the circles of the universe. 'Tis a long scale from the gorilla to the gentleman,—from the gorilla to Plato, Newton, Shakespeare,—to the sanctities of religion, the refinements of legislation, the summit of science, art, and poetry. The beginnings are slow and infirm, but it is an always accelerated march.—Emerson.

It is wonderful how soon a piano gets into a log-hut on the frontier. You would think they found it under a pine-stump. With it comes a Latin grammar, and one of those tow-head boys has written a hymn on Sunday. Now let colleges, now let senates take heed! for here is one who, opening these fine tastes on the basis of the pioneer's iron constitution, will gather all their laurels in his strong hands.—Emerson.

The first party of painted savages who raised a few huts upon the Thames did not dream of the London they were creating, or know that in lighting the fire on their hearth they were kindling one of the great foci of Time. * * * All the grand agencies which the progress of mankind evolves are formed in the same unconscious way. They are the aggregate result of countless single wills, each of which, thinking merely of its own end, and perhaps fully gaining it, is at the same time enlisted by Providence in the secret service of the world.—James Martineau.

We can trace back our existence almost to a point. Former time presents us with trains of thoughts gradually diminishing to nothing. But our ideas of futurity are perpetually expanding. Our desires and our hopes, even when modified by our fears, seem to grasp at immensity. This alone would be sufficient to prove the progressiveness of our nature, and that this little earth is but a point from which we start toward a perfection of being.—Sir Humphry Davy.

Promise

Any one can be rich in promises.—Ovid.

Promise is most given when the least is said.—George Chapman.

He who promiseth runs in debt.—Talmud.

His promises were, as he then was, mighty; But his performance, as he is now, nothing.—Shakespeare.

A mind that is conscious of its integrity scorns to say more than it means to perform.—Burns.

We promise according to our hopes, and perform according to our fears.—Rochefoucauld.

Magnificent promises are always to be suspected.—Theodore Parker.

An acre of performance is worth the whole world of promise.—Howell.

I had rather do and not promise, than promise and not do.—Arthur Warwick.

He who is the most slow in making a promise is the most faithful in the performance of it.—Rousseau.

I will forethink what I will promise, that I may promise but what I will do.—Warwick.

It is easy to promise, and alas! how easy to forget!—Alfred de Musset.

I do know when the blood burns, how prodigal the soul lends the tongue vows.—Shakespeare.

Promises retain men better than services; for hope is to them a chain, and gratitude a thread.—J. Petit-Senn.

Every brave man is a man of his word; to such base vices he cannot stoop, and shuns more than death the shame of lying.—Corneille.

And be these juggling fiends no more believ'd,
That palter with us in a double sense:
That keep the word of promise to our ear,
And break it to our hope. —Shakespeare.

Thou oughtest to be nice, even to superstition, in keeping thy promises; and therefore thou shouldst be equally cautious in making them.—Fuller.

Promises,—the ready money that was first coined and made current by the law of nature, to support that society and commerce that was necessary for the comfort and security of mankind.—Clarendon.

Liberal of cruelty are those who pamper with promises; promisers destroy while they deceive, and the hope they raise is dearly purchased by the dependence that is sequent to disappointment.—Zimmermann.

Every promise is built upon four pillars:—God's justice or holiness, which will not suffer Him to deceive; His grace or goodness, which will not suffer Him to forget; His truth, which will not suffer Him to change; and His power, which makes Him able to accomplish.—Salter.

Promising is the very air of the time; it opens the eyes of expectation: performance is ever the duller for his act; and, but in the plainer and simpler kind of people, the deed of saying is quite out of use. To promise is most courtly and fashionable; performance is a kind of will, or testament, which argues a great sickness in his judgment that makes it.—Shakespeare.

The man who is wantonly profuse of his promises ought to sink his credit as much as a tradesman would by uttering a great number of promissory notes payable at a distant day. The truest conclusion in both cases is, that neither intend or will be able to pay. And as the latter most probably intends to cheat you of your money, so the former at least designs to cheat you of your thanks.—Fielding.

A promise is a child of the understanding and the will; the understanding begets it, the will brings it forth. He that performs delivers the mother; he that breaks it murders the child. If he be begotten in the absence of the understanding it is a bastard, but the child must be kept. If thou mistrust thy understanding, promise not; if thou hast promised, break it not: it is better to maintain a bastard than to murder a child.—Quarles.

Promptness

The keen spirit seizes the prompt occasion.—Hannah More.

Despatch is the soul of business.—Lord Chesterfield.

Who makes quick use of the moment is a genius of prudence.—Lavater.

Timely service, like timely gifts, is doubled in value.—George MacDonald.

Know the true value of time; snatch, seize, and enjoy every moment of it. No idleness, no laziness, no procrastination.

tionation: never put off till to-morrow what you can do to-day.—Lord Chesterfield.

The flighty purpose never is o'ertook, unless the deed go with it.—Shakespeare.

Property

Property is theft.—Proudhon.

Exclusive property is a theft in nature.—Brissot.

I take my property wherever I find it.—Molière.

Prophecy

Ancestral voices prophesying war.—Coleridge.

O my prophetic soul!
My uncle! —Shakespeare.

I shall always consider the best guesser the best prophet.—Cicero.

The prophet's mantle, ere his flight began,
Dropt on the world—a sacred gift to man.
—Campbell.

Thy voice sounds like a prophet's word;
And in its hollow tones are heard
The thanks of millions yet to be.
—Fitz-Greene Halleck.

Of all the horrid, hideous notes of woe,
Sadder than owl-songs or the midnight blast;
Is that portentous phrase, "I told you so."
—Byron.

There is a history in all men's lives,
Figuring the nature of the times deceas'd,
The which observed, a man may prophesy
With a near aim, of the main chance of things
As yet not come to life, which in their seeds
And weak beginnings lie intresured.
—Shakespeare.

Proposal

'Tis you, alone, can save, or give my doom.—Ovid.

This hand, I cannot but in death resign!—Dryden.

The very thoughts of change I hate,
As much as of despair;
Nor ever covet to be great,
Unless it be for her. —Parnell.

Mutual love the crown of all our bliss!—Milton.

On you, most loved, with anxious fear I wait,
And from your judgment must expect my fate.
—Addison.

Where heart meets heart, reciprocally soft,
Each other's pillow to repose divine.
—Young.

Take my esteem, if you on that can live,
For frankly, sir, 'tis all I have to give.
—Dryden.

Have I not managed my contrivance well
To try your love and make you doubt of mine?
—Dryden.

To prevail in the cause that is dearer than life,
Or, crush'd in its ruins, to die!
—Campbell.

For ever thine, whate'er this world betide,
In youth, in age, thine own, for ever thine.
—A. A. Watts.

Here still is the smile that no cloud can o'ercast,
And the heart, and the hand, all thy own to the last.
—Moore.

Thinkest thou
That I could live, and let thee go,
Who art my life itself?—no—no.
—Moore.

It is not virtue, wisdom, valour, wit,
Strength, comeliness of shape, or amplest merit,
That woman's love can win;
But what it is, hard is to say, harder to hit.
—Milton.

She listen'd with a flitting blush,
With downcast eyes, and modest grace,
For well she knew I could not choose
But gaze upon her face. —Coleridge.

Yet, it is love—if thoughts of tenderness,
Tried in temptation, strengthened by distress,
Unmov'd by absence, firm in every clime,
And yet—oh! more than all!—untir'd by time.
—Byron.

By those tresses unconfin'd,
Woo'd by every gentle wind;
By those lids whose jetty fringe
Kiss thy soft cheek's blooming tinge;
By those wild eyes, like the roe,
Ah! hear my vow before I go—
My dearest life, I love thee!
Can I cease to love thee?—no!
Zoe meus s-as arabo. —Byron

On your hand, that pure altar, I vow, Though I've look'd and have lik'd, and have felt—

That I never have lov'd—till now.
—M. G. Lewis.

Never wedding, ever wooing,
Still a love-lorn heart pursuing,
Read you not the wrong you're doing,
In my cheek's pale hue?
All my life with sorrow strewing,
Wed, or cease to woo.

'Tis not in fate to harm me,
While fate leaves thy love to me;
'Tis not in joy to charm me,
Unless that joy be shar'd with thee.
—Moore.

Prosperity

Prosperity lets go the bridle.—
George Herbert.

Prosperity often presages adversity.—
Hosea Ballou.

Prosperity's the very bond of love.—
Shakespeare.

Watch lest prosperity destroy generosity.—Beecher.

Arrogance is the outgrowth of prosperity.—Plautus.

Prosperity makes few friends.—
Vauvenargues.

Prosperity makes some friends and many enemies.—Vauvenargues.

Prosperity is a feeble reed.—Daniel D'Anchères.

Prosperity, alas! is often but another name for pride.—Mrs. Sigourney.

Prosperity seems to be scarcely safe, unless it be mixed with a little adversity.—Hosea Ballou.

To rejoice in the prosperity of another is to partake of it.—William Austin.

There is a glare about worldly success which is very apt to dazzle men's eyes.—Hare.

They who lie soft and warm in a rich estate seldom come to heat themselves at the altar.—South.

He that swells in prosperity will be sure to shrink in adversity.—Colton.

It shows a weak mind not to bear prosperity as well as adversity with moderation.—Cicero.

It is the bright day that brings forth the adder, and that craves wary walking.—Shakespeare.

Everything in the world may be endured, except only a succession of prosperous days.—Goethe.

O how portentous is prosperity!
How, comet-like, it threatens, while it shines!
—Young.

More in prosperity is reason tost than ships in storms, their helms and anchors lost.—Sir J. Denham.

Prosperity demands of us more prudence and moderation than adversity.—Cicero.

Knives will thrive when honest plainness knows not how to live.—Shirley.

Prosperity doth bewitch men, seeming clear; As seas do laugh, show white, when rocks are near.
—Webster.

In a State, pecuniary gain is not to be considered to be prosperity, but its prosperity will be found in righteousness.—Confucius.

Prosperities can only be enjoyed by those who fear not at all to lose them.—Jeremy Taylor.

Prosperity not seldom begets its opposite, and produces a niggardly spirit.—Henry Giles.

Remorse goes to sleep during a prosperous period and wakes up in adversity.—Rousseau.

The mind that is much elevated and insolent with prosperity, and cast down with adversity, is generally abject and base.—Epicurus.

Take care to be an economist in prosperity; there is no fear of your being one in adversity.—Zimmerman.

It requires a strong constitution to withstand repeated attacks of prosperity.—J. L. Basford.

Prosperity is often an equivocal word denoting merely affluence of possession.—Blair.

In prosperity let us most carefully avoid pride, disdain, and arrogance.—Cicero.

Whilst you are prosperous you can number many friends; but when the storm comes you are left alone.—Ovid.

We must distinguish between felicity and prosperity; for prosperity leads often to ambition, and ambition to disappointment.—Landor.

Prosperity is the touchstone of virtue; for it is less difficult to bear misfortunes, than to remain uncorrupted by pleasure.—Tacitus.

The increase of a great number of citizens in prosperity is a necessary element to the security, and even to the existence, of a civilized people.—Buret.

Greatness stands upon a precipice, and if prosperity carries a man never so little beyond his poise, it overbears and dashes him to pieces.—Seneca.

As riches and favor forsake a man, we discover him to be a fool; but nobody could find it out in his prosperity.—Bruyère.

The mind of man is ignorant of fate and future destiny, and of keeping within due bounds when elated by prosperity.—Virgil.

Prosperity is not without many fears and distastes; and adversity is not without comforts and hopes.—Bacon.

When God has once begun to throw down the prosperous, He overthrows them altogether: such is the end of the mighty.—Seneca.

Happy it were for us all if we bore prosperity as well and as wisely as we endure adverse fortune.—Southey.

If you count the sunny and the cloudy days of the whole year, you will find that the sunshine predominates.—Ovid.

Prosperity is very liable to bring pride among the other goods with which it endows an individual; it is then that prosperity costs too dear.—Hosea Ballou.

Prosperity, in regard of our corrupt inclination to abuse the blessings of Almighty God, doth prove a thing dangerous to the soul of man.—Hooker.

It is one of the worst effects of prosperity to make a man a vortex, instead of a fountain; so that, instead of throwing out, he learns only to draw in.—Beecher.

Many are not able to suffer and endure prosperity; it is like the light of the sun to a weak eye,—glorious indeed in itself, but not proportioned to such an instrument.—Jeremy Taylor.

A weak mind sinks under prosperity as well as under adversity. A strong and deep one has two highest tides,—when the moon is at the full, and when there is no moon.—Hare.

To speak in a mean, the virtue of prosperity is temperance, the virtue of adversity is fortitude, which in morals is the more heroic virtue.—Bacon.

It is in the relaxation of security, it is in the expansion of prosperity, it is in the hour of dilation of the heart, and of its softening into festivity and pleasure that the real character of men is discerned.—Burke.

There is ever a certain languor attending the fulness of prosperity. When the heart has no more to wish, it yawns over its possessions, and the energy of the soul goes out, like a flame that has no more to devour.—Young.

So use prosperity, that adversity may not abuse thee: if in the one, security admits no fears, in the other, despair will afford no hopes; he that in prosperity can foretell a danger can in adversity foresee deliverance.—Quarles.

The temptations of prosperity insinuate themselves after a gentle, but very powerful manner; so that we are but little aware of them and less able to withstand them.—Atterbury.

To bring the best human qualities to anything like perfection, to fill them with the sweet juices of courtesy and charity, prosperity, or, at all events, a moderate amount of it, is required,—just as sunshine is needed for the ripening of peaches and apricots.—Alexander Smith.

Prosperity too often has the same effect on a Christian that a calm at sea has on a Dutch mariner; who frequently, it is said, in those circumstances, ties up the rudder, gets drunk, and goes to sleep.—Bishop Horne.

The fortitude which has encountered no dangers, that prudence which has surmounted no difficulties, that integrity which has been attacked by no temptation, can at best be considered but as gold not yet brought to the test, of which therefore the true value cannot be assigned.—Dr. Johnson.

What Anacharsis said of the vine may aptly enough be said of prosperity. She bears the three grapes of drunkenness, pleasure, and sorrow; and happy is it if the last can cure the mischief which the former work. When afflictions fail to have their due effect, the case is desperate.—Bolingbroke.

Proverbs

The abridgments of wisdom.—Joubert.

Infinite riches in a little room.—Marlowe.

Have at you with a proverb.—Shakespeare.

Sense, shortness, and salt.—James Howell.

For I am proverbied with a grand-sire phrase.—Shakespeare.

Proverbs embody the current and practical philosophy of an age or nation.—William Fleming.

Proverbs are for the most part rules of moral, or, still more properly, of prudential conduct.—Brande.

The wisdom of the wise and the experience of ages.—Disraeli.

The proverbs of a nation furnish the index to its spirit, and the results of its civilization.—J. G. Holland.

Proverbs, like the sacred books of each nation, are the sanctuary of the intuitions.—Emerson.

The genius, wit, and spirit of a nation are discovered by their proverbs.—Bacon.

Proverbs were bright shafts in the Greek and Latin quivers.—Disraeli.

The wit of one man, and the wisdom of many.—Earl Russell.

Proverbs are mental gems gathered in the diamond districts of the mind.—W. R. Alger.

Jewels five words long, that on the stretched forefinger of all Time sparkle forever.—Tennyson.

If you hear a wise sentence or an apt phrase, commit it to your memory.—Sir Henry Sidney.

The study of proverbs may be more instructive and comprehensive than the most elaborate scheme of philosophy.—Motherwell.

The wise men of old have sent most of their morality down the stream of time in the light skiff of apothegm or epigram.—Whipple.

The proverb answers where the sermon fails, as a well-charged pistol will do more execution than a whole barrel of gunpowder idly exploded.—W. G. Simms.

Short, isolated sentences were the mode in which ancient wisdom delighted to convey its precepts for the regulation of human conduct.—Warburton.

I do not say a proverb is amiss when aptly and seasonably applied; but to be forever discharging them, right or wrong, hit or miss, renders conversation insipid and vulgar.—Cervantes.

How many of us have been attracted to reason; first learned to think, to draw conclusions, to extract a moral from the follies of life, by some dazzling aphorism!—Bulwer-Lytton.

Proverbs were anterior to books, and formed the wisdom of the vulgar, and in the earliest ages were the unwritten laws of morality.—Disraeli.

The proverbial wisdom of the populace in the street, on the roads, and in the markets instructs the ear of him who studies man more fully than a thousand rules ostentatiously displayed.—Lavater.

Proverbs are somewhat analogous to those medical formulas which, being in frequent use, are kept ready made up in the chemists' shops, and which often save the framing of a distinct prescription.—Whately.

The Scripture vouches Solomon for the wisest of men; and they are his proverbs that prove him so. The seven wise men of Greece, so famous for their wisdom all the world over, acquired all that fame each of them by a single sentence consisting of two or three words.—South.

We frequently fall into error and folly, not because the true principles of action are not known, but because for a time they are not remembered; he may, therefore, justly be numbered among the benefactors of mankind who contracts the great rules of life into short sentences that may early be impressed on the memory, and taught by frequent recollection to occur habitually to the mind.—Johnson.

I must not quarrel with the will
Of highest dispensation, which herein, Haply had ends above my reach to know.
—Milton.

Surely there are in every man's life certain rubs, doublings, and wrenches, which pass a while under the effects of chance, but at the last, well examined, prove the mere hand of God.—
Sir Thomas Browne.

O God, Thy arm was here;
And not to us, but to Thy arm alone,
Ascribe we all! —Shakespeare.

Providence certainly does not favor individuals, but the deep wisdom of its counsels extends to the instruction and ennoblement of all.—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

It is not given to our weak intellects to understand the steps of Providence as they occur: we comprehend them only as we look back upon them in the far-distant past.—George B.
McClellan.

God's plans, like lilies pure and white, unfold; we must not tear the close-shut leaves apart; time will reveal the calyxes of gold.—May Riley
Smith.

In some time, His good time, I shall arrive;
He guides me and the bird
In His good time. —Robert Browning.

A cockle-fish may as soon crowd the ocean into its narrow shell, as vain man ever comprehend the decrees of God!—Bishop Beveridge.

We sometimes had those little rubs which Providence sends to enhance the value of its favors.—Goldsmith.

Who sees with equal eye, as God of all,
A hero perish, or a sparrow fall,
Atoms or systems into ruin hurl'd,
And now a bubble burst, and now a world.
—Pope.

But he never would believe that Providence had sent a few men into the world, ready booted and spurred to ride, and millions ready saddled and bridled to be ridden.—Richard Rumbold.

Behind the dim unknown, Standeth God within the shadow, keeping watch above His own. —Lowell.

God made bees, and bees made honey,
God made man, and man made money;
Pride made the devil, and the devil made
sin;
So God made a coal-pit to put the devil in.
Transcribed by James Henry Dixon.

That very law which moulds a tear,
And bids it trickle from its source,
That law preserves the earth a sphere,
And guides the planets in their course.
—Sam'l Rogers.

He who ruleth the raging of the sea knows also how to check the designs of the ungodly. I submit myself with reverence to His Holy Will. O Abner, I fear my God, and I fear none but Him.—Racine.

The heavens do not send good baps in handfuls, but let us pick out our good by little, and with care, from out much bad, that still our little world may know its king.—Sir P. Sidney.

I know not where His islands lift
Their fronded palms in air;
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond His love and care.
—Whittier.

All which is real now remaineth,
And fadeth never:
The hand which upholds it now sustaineth
The soul forever. —Whittier.

But every human path leads on to God;
He holds a myriad finer threads than gold,
And strong as holy wishes, drawing us
With delicate tension upward to Himself.
—E. C. Stedman.

We, ignorant of ourselves,
Beg often our own harms, which the wise powers
Deny us for our good; so find we profit,
By losing of our prayers. —Shakespeare.

However benevolent may be the intentions of Providence, they do not always advance the happiness of the individual. Providence has always higher ends in view, and works in a pre-eminent degree on the inner feelings and disposition.—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

Yes, Thou art ever present, Power supremel Not circumscrib'd by time, nor fix'd to space,
Confin'd to altars, nor to temples bound.
In wealth, in want, in freedom, or in chains,
In dungeons or on thrones, the faithful find Thee! —Hannah More.

What in me is dark,
Illumine; what is low, raise and support;
That to the height of this great argument
I may assert eternal Providence,
And justify the ways of God to men.
—Milton.

Duties are ours; events are God's.
This removes an infinite burden from the shoulders of a miserable, tempted, dying creature. On this consideration only can he securely lay down his head and close his eyes.—Cecil.

It is remarkable that Providence has given us all things for our advantage near at hand; but iron, gold, and silver, being both the instruments of blood and slaughter and the price of it, nature has hidden in the bowels of the earth.—Seneca.

I asked a hermit once in Italy how he could venture to live alone, in a single cottage, on 'the top of a mountain, a mile from any habitation? He replied that, "Providence was his very next-door neighbor."—Sterne.

Go, mark the matchless working of the power
That shuts within the seed the future
flower:
Bids these in elegance of form excel,
In colour these, and those delight the smell,
Sends nature forth, the daughter of the skies,
To dance on earth, and charm all human eyes. —Cowper.

He maketh kings to sit in sovereignty;
He maketh subjects to their powre obey;
He pulleth downe, He setteth up on hy:
He gives to this, from that He takes away;
For all we have is His: what He list doe he may. —Spenser.

You may say, "I wish to send this ball so as to kill the lion crouching yonder, ready to spring upon me. My wishes are all right, and I hope Providence will direct the ball." Providence won't.

You must do it; and if you do not, you are a dead man.—
Beecher.

And I will trust that He who heeds
The life that hides in mead and wold,
Who hangs yon alder's crimson beads,
And stains these mosses green and gold,
Will still, as He hath done, incline
His gracious care to me and mine.
—Whittier.

Providence has a wild, rough, incalculable road to its end, and it is of no use to try to whitewash its huge, mixed instrumentalities, or to dress up that terrific benefactor in a clean shirt and white neckcloth of a student in divinity.—Emerson.

Somewhat of goodness, something true
From sun and spirit shining through
All faiths, all worlds, as through the dark
Of ocean shines the lighthouse spark,
Attests the presence everywhere
Of love and providential care.
—Whittier.

Divine Providence tempers His blessings to secure their better effect.
He keeps our joys and our fears on an even balance, that we may neither presume nor despair. By such compositions God is pleased to make both our crosses more tolerable and our enjoyments more wholesome and safe.—W.
Wogan.

The decrees of Providence are inscrutable.
In spite of man's shortsighted endeavors to dispose of events according to his own wishes and his own purposes, there is an Intelligence beyond his reason, which holds the scales of justice, and promotes his well-being, in spite of his puny efforts.
—Morier.

All Nature is but art unknown to thee;
All chance direction, which thou canst not
see;
All discord, harmony not understood;
All partial evil, universal good;
And spite of pride, in erring reason's spite,
One truth is clear, Whatever is is right.
—Pope.

Long may it remain in this mixed world a question not easy of decision, which is the more beautiful evidence of the Almighty's goodness, the soft white hand formed for the ministrations of sympathy and tenderness, or the rough hard hand which the heart softens, teaches, and guides in a moment.—Dickens.

Through heaven and earth
God's will moves freely, and I follow it,
As color follows light. He overflows
The firmamental walls with deity, Therefore with love; His lightnings go abroad,
His pity may do so, His angels must,
Whene'er He gives them charges.

—Mrs. Browning.

To make our reliance upon Providence both pious and rational, we should, in every great enterprise we take in hand, prepare all things with that care, diligence, and activity, as if there were no such thing as Providence for us to depend upon; and again, when we have done all this, we should as wholly and humbly rely upon it, as if we had made no preparations at all.—South.

The ways of heaven are dark and intricate,
Puzzled in mazes, and perplex'd with errors;

Our understanding traces them in vain,
Lost and bewilder'd in the fruitless search;
Nor sees with how much art the windings run,
Nor where the regular confusion ends.

—Addison.

If God but cares for our inward and eternal life, if by all the experiences of this life He is reducing it and preparing for its disclosure, nothing can befall us but prosperity. Every sorrow shall be but the setting of some luminous jewel of joy. Our very morning shall be but the enamel around the diamond; our very hardships but the metallic rim that holds the opal, glancing with strange interior fires.—Beecher.

Round about what is lies a whole mysterious world of what might be—a psychological romance of possibilities and things that do not happen. By going out a few minutes sooner or later, by stopping to speak with a friend at a corner, by meeting this man or that, or by turning down this street instead of the other, we may let slip some great occasion of good, or avoid some impending evil, by which the whole current of our lives would have been changed. There is no possible solution to the dark enigma but the one word "Providence."—Longfellow.

God smiles as He has always smiled;
Ere suns and moons could wax and wane,
Ere stars were thundergirt, or piled
The Heavens, God thought on me His child;
Ordained a life for me, arrayed
Its circumstances, every one
To the minutest; ay, God said
This head this hand should rest upon Thus, ere He fashioned star or sun.

—Robert Browning.

O, all-preparing Providence divine!
In Thy large book what secrets are enroll'd!
What sundry helps doth Thy great power assign,
To prop the course which Thou intend'st to hold?
What mortal sense is able to define
Thy mysteries, Thy counsels many fold?
It is Thy wisdom strangely that extends Obscure proceedings to apparent ends.

—Drayton.

And is there care in heaven? and is there love

In heavenly spirits to the creatures base,
That may compassion of their evils move?
There is; else much more wretched were the case

Of men than beasts. But O! th' exceeding grace

Of highest God that loves His creatures so,
And all His works with mercy doth embrace,

That blessed angels He sends to and fro To serve to wicked man, to serve His wicked foe!

How oft do they their silver bowers leave
To come to succour us that succour want?
How oft do they with golden pinions cleave
The fitting skies, like flying pursuivant,
Against foul fiends to aid us militant?

They for us fight, they watch and duly ward,
And their bright squadrons round about us plant;

And all for love, and nothing for reward:
O why should heavenly God to men have such regard?

—Spenser.

Prudence

The bounds of a man's knowledge are easily concealed, if he has but prudence.—Goldsmith.

The prudence of the best heads is often defeated by the tenderness of the best of hearts.—Fielding.

Prudence is the virtue of the senses.
—Emerson.

I love prudence very little, if it is not moral.—Joubert.

It is prudence that first forsakes the wretched.—Ovid.

It seems as if prudence exhaled a perfume.—Achilles Poincelot.

In everything the middle course is best.—Plautus.

Prudence, like experience, must be paid for.—Sheridan.

According to her cloth she cut her coat.—Dryden.

There must be in prudence also some master virtue.—Aristotle.

Dine on little, and sup on less.—Cervantes.

At a great pennyworth pause a while.—Benjamin Franklin.

If thou art terrible to many, then beware of many.—Ausonius.

When any great design thou dost intend, Think on the means, the manner, and the end.
—Sir J. Denham.

No god is absent where prudence dwells.—Juvenal.

Beware of desperate steps. The darkest day,
Live till to-morrow, will have pass'd away.
—Cowper.

That should be long considered which can be decided but once.—Publius Syrus.

A man exercising no forethought will soon experience present sorrow.—Confucius.

A woman's best qualities are harmful if undiluted with prudence.—Victor Hugo.

Prudence is one of the virtues which were called cardinal by the ancient ethical writers.—William Fleming.

Prudence is the knowledge of things to be sought, and those to be shunned.
—Cicero.

No other protection is wanting, provided you are under the guidance of prudence.—Juvenal.

It becomes a wise man to try negotiation before arms.—Terence.

An army abroad is of little use unless there are prudent counsels at home.—Cicero.

Prudence and love are inconsistent; in proportion as the last increases, the other decreases.—Rochefoucauld.

Put your trust in God, my boys, and keep your powder dry.—Col. Blacker.

When we are young we lay up for old age; when we are old we save for death.—La Bruyère.

The first years of man must make provision for the last.—Samuel Johnson.

Prudence is not poverty; it is the thorny road to wealth.—Charles Reade.

I recommend you to take care of the minutes, for the hours will take care of themselves.—Lord Chesterfield.

We accomplish more by prudence than by force.—Tacitus.

There is no praise we have not lavished upon prudence; and yet she cannot assure to us the most trifling event.—La Rochefoucauld.

Prudence is that virtue by which we discern what is proper to be done under the various circumstances of time and place.—Milton.

Prudence is a necessary ingredient in all the virtues, without which they degenerate into folly and excess.—Jeremy Collier.

Forethought and prudence are the proper qualities of a leader.—Tacitus.

The rules of prudence, like the laws of the stone tables, are for the most part prohibitive. "Thou shalt not" is their characteristic formula.—Cole-ridge.

I knew once a very covetous, sordid fellow, who used to say, Take care of the pence; for the pounds will take care of themselves.—Lord Chesterfield.

Prudence is the virtue of the senses. It is the science of appearances. It is the outmost action of the inward life.—Emerson.

Prudence is not only the first in rank of the virtues political and moral, but she is the director and regulator, the standard of them all.—Burke.

Men are born with two eyes, but with one tongue, in order that they should see twice as much as they say.—Colton.

The virtuous woman flees from danger; she trusts more to her prudence in shunning it than in her strength to overcome it.—J. Petit-Senn.

Prudent and active men, who know their strength and use it with limit and circumspection, alone go far in the affairs of the world.—Goethe.

Prudence is a quality incompatible with vice, and can never be effectively enlisted in its cause.—Burke.

Be prudent, and if you hear
* * * some insult or some threat
* * * have the appearance of not hearing it.—George Sand.

In ancient times all things were cheape,
'Tis good to looke before thou leape,
When corne is ripe 'tis time to reape.
—Martyn Parker.

The great end of prudence is to give cheerfulness to those hours which splendor cannot gild, and acclamation cannot exhilarate.—Johnson.

Be circumspect in your dealings, and let the seed you plant be the offspring of prudence and care; thus fruit follows the fair blossom, as honor follows a good life.—Hosea Ballou.

Prudence supposes the value of the end to be assumed, and refers only to the adaptation of the means. It is the relation of right means for given ends.—Whewell.

If the prudence of reserve and decorum dictates silence in some circumstances, in others prudence of a higher order may justify us in speaking our thoughts.—Burke.

And by a prudent flight and cunning save A life which valour could not, from the grave.
A better buckler I can soon regain,
But who can get another life again?
—Archilochus.

For oaths are straws, men's faiths are wafer-cakes,
And hold-fast is the only dog.
—Shakespeare.

Remember that nothing will supply the want of prudence, and that negligence and irregularity long continued will make knowledge useless, wit ridiculous, and genius contemptible.—Dr. Johnson.

Be advis'd;
Heat not a furnace for your foe so hot
That it do singe yourself: we may outrun,
By violent swiftness, that which we run at,
And lose by over-running.
—Shakespeare.

The richest endowments of the mind are temperance, prudence, and fortitude. Prudence is a universal virtue, which enters into the composition of all the rest; and where she is not, fortitude loses its name and nature.—Voltaire.

Love all, trust a few,
Do wrong to none; be able for thine enemy Rather in power than use, and keep thy friend
Under thy own life's key: be check'd for silence,
But never tax'd for speech.
—Shakespeare.

Spurious prudence, making the senses final, is the god of sots and cowards, and is the subject of all comedy. It is nature's joke, and therefore literature's. True prudence limits this sensualism by admitting the knowledge of an internal and real world.—Emerson.

Have more than thou showest,
Speak less than thou knowest,
Lend less than thou owest,
Ride more than thou goest,
Learn more than thou trowest,
Set less than thou throwest.

—Shakespeare.

In the embers shining bright
A garden grows for thy delight,
With roses yellow, red, and white.

But, O my child, beware, beware!
Touch not the roses growing there,
For every rose a thorn doth bear.

—R. W. Gilder.

Prudence is a duty which we owe ourselves, and if we will be so much our own enemies as to neglect it, we are not to wonder if the world is deficient in discharging their duty to us; for when a man lays the foundation of his own ruin, others too often are apt to build upon it.—Fielding.

In Virgil's account of the good housewife, who rises early in order to measure out the work of the household, and in Solomon's description of the thrifty woman of his time, one sees the value set upon feminine industry and economy in times far removed from our own.—Julia Ward Howe.

All these you may avoid but the Lie Direct; and you may avoid that too, with an If. I knew when seven justices could not take up a quarrel, but when the parties were met themselves, one of them thought but of an If, as "If you said so, then I said so;" and they shook hands and swore brothers. Your If is the only peace-maker; much virtue in If.—Shakespeare.

Those who, in the confidence of superior capacities or attainments, neglect the common maxims of life, should be reminded that nothing will supply the want of prudence; but that negligence and irregularity, long continued, will make knowledge useless, wit ridiculous, and genius contemptible.—Johnson.

Prudery

Prudery is the bastard child of virtue.—Ouida.

Prudery is the hypocrisy of modesty.—Massias.

Prudery is ignorance.—Goldsmith.

Over-niceness may be under-niceness.—Richardson.

Some women don buckler and spear to fight dragons which have no existence.—F. A. Durivage.

There are no greater prudes than those women who have some secret to hide.—George Sand.

Prudery is the innocence of the vicious—external sanctity, assumed as a cover for internal laxity.—Chatfield.

Prudery is often immodestly modest; its habit is to multiply sentinels in proportion as the fortress is less threatened.—G. D. Prentice.

That prudery which survives youth and beauty resembles a scarecrow left in the fields after harvest.—J. Petit-Senn.

A jest that makes a virtuous woman only smile often frightens away a prude; but when real danger forces the former to flee, the latter advances.—Laténa.

Yon ancient prude, whose wither'd features show

She might be young some forty years ago,
Her elbows pinion'd close upon her hips,
Her head erect, her fan upon her lips,
Her eyebrows arch'd, her eyes both gone astray

To watch yon amorous couple in their play.
With bony and unkerchief'd neck defies
The rude inclemency of wintry skies,
And sails, with lappet-head and mincing airs,

Duly at chink of bell to morning prayers.
—Cowper.

Public

The majority of a society is the true definition of the public.—Johnson.

The public is wiser than the wisest critic.—Bancroft.

The public have neither shame nor gratitude.—Hazlitt.

I wish the crowd to feel itself well treated, Especially since it lives and lets me live.
—Goethe.

The public! the public! how many fools does it require to make the public?—Chamfort.

I am very anxious to please the public, particularly as it lives and lets live.—Goethe.

Self-interest, be it enlightened, works indirectly for the public good.
—Prescott.

The public wishes itself to be managed like a woman; one must say nothing to it except what it likes to hear.—Goethe.

He who serves the public is a poor animal; he worries himself to death and no one thanks him for it.—Goethe.

An enlightened self-interest, which, when well understood, they tell us will identify with an interest more enlarged and public.—Burke.

All nations that grew great out of little or nothing did so merely by the public-mindedness of particular persons.—South.

A man, if he be active and energetic, can hardly fail also, be he never so selfish, of benefiting the general public interest.—Benjamin F. Butler.

That is, in a great degree, true of all men, which was said of the Athenians, that they were like sheep, of which a flock is more easily driven than a single one.—Whately.

A thousand wheels of labor are turned by dear affections, and kept in motion by self-sacrificing endurance; and the crowds that pour forth in the morning and return at night are daily processions of love and duty.—Chapin.

In a free and republican government, you cannot restrain the voice of the multitude. Every man will speak as he thinks, or, more properly, without thinking, and consequently will judge of effects without attending to their causes.—Washington.

Punctuality

Strict punctuality is a cheap virtue.
—Franklin.

Regularity is unity; unity is godlike.
—Richter.

It is of no use running; to set out betimes is the main point.—La Fontaine.

I have always been a quarter of an hour before my time, and it has made a man of me.—Lord Nelson.

Punctuality is the stern virtue of men of business, and the graceful courtesy of princes.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Strict punctuality is perhaps the cheapest virtue which can give force to an otherwise utterly insignificant character.—J. F. Boyes.

If I have made an appointment with you, I owe you punctuality; I have no right to throw away your time, if I do my own.—Cecil.

The most indispensable qualification of a cook is punctuality. The same must be said of guests.—Brillat-Savarin.

Unfaithfulness in the keeping of an appointment is an act of clear dishonesty. You may as well borrow a person's money as his time.—Horace Mann.

Lost wealth may be replaced by industry, lost knowledge by study, lost health by temperance or medicine; but lost time is gone forever.—Samuel Smiles.

I give it as my deliberate and solemn conviction that the individual who is habitually tardy in meeting an appointment will never be respected or successful in life.—Rev. W. Fisk.

I could never think well of a man's intellectual or moral character if he was habitually unfaithful to his appointments.—Emmons.

Method and punctuality are so little natural to man that where they exist they are commonly the effect of education or discipline.—W. B. Clulow.

Punishment

Though punishment be slow, still it comes.—George Herbert.

Punishment follows close on crime.—Horace.

Gold must be beaten, and a child scourged.—Ben Sira.

The power of punishment is to silence, not to confute.—Johnson.

And still adore the hand that gives the blow.—John Pomfret.

Unrespited, unpitied, unrepriev'd.—Milton.

That is the bitterest of all—to wear the yoke of our own wrong-doing.—George Eliot.

The schoolmaster deserves to be beaten himself who beats nature in a boy for a fault.—Thomas Fuller.

The public have more interest in the punishment of an injury than he who receives it.—Cato.

The only effect of public punishment is to show the rabble how bravely it can be borne.—Landor.

The work of eradicating crimes is not by making punishment familiar, but formidable.—Goldsmith.

We do not correct the man we hang; we correct others by him.—Montaigne.

Corporeal punishment falls far more heavily than most weighty pecuniary penalty.—Seneca.

Every great example of punishment has in it some injustice; but the suffering individual is compensated by the public good.—Tacitus.

The object of punishment is prevention from evil; it never can be made impulsive to good.—Horace Mann.

When men of talents are punished, authority is strengthened.—Tacitus.

There is nothing that more displeaseth God

Than from their children to spare the rod.—Skelton.

Heaven is not always angry when He strikes,

But most chastises those whom most He likes.—John Pomfret.

An avenging God closely follows the haughty.—Seneca.

The time that precedes punishment is the severest part of it.—Seneca.

The sins committed by many pass unpunished.—Lucan.

A variety in punishment is of utility, as well as a proportion.—Washington.

Punishment, that is the justice for the unjust.—St. Augustine.

There is no greater punishment than that of being abandoned to one's self.—Pasquier Quesnel.

God is on the side of virtue; for whoever dreads punishment suffers it, and whoever deserves it, dreads it.—Colton.

If punishment reaches not the mind and makes not the will supple, it hardens the offender.—Locke.

The best of us being unfit to die, what an inexpressible absurdity to put the worst to death!—Hawthorne.

Punishment is a fruit that, unsuspected, ripens within the flower of the pleasure that concealed it.—Emerson.

There is no future pang can deal that justice on the self-condemned he deals on his own soul.—Byron.

One man meets an infamous punishment for that crime which confers a diadem upon another.—Juvenal.

To leave no interval between the sentence and the fulfillment of it doth beseech God only, the Immutable!—Coleridge.

A just chastisement may benefit a man, though it seldom does; but an unjust one changes all his blood to gall.—Ouida.

The severity of laws prevents their execution. When the penalty is excessive, one is forced to prefer impunity.—Montesquieu.

There is no greater punishment of wickedness than that it is dissatisfied with itself and its deeds.—Seneca.

The punishment of criminals should be of use; when a man is hanged he is good for nothing.—Voltaire.

If Jupiter hurled his thunderbolt as often as men sinned, he would soon be out of thunderbolts.—Ovid.

It is hard, but it is excellent, to find the right knowledge of when correction is necessary and when grace doth most avail.—Sir P. Sidney.

Just prophet, let the damn'd one dwell
Full in the sight of Paradise, Beholding heaven and feeling hell.
—Moore.

Every instance of a man's suffering the penalty of the law is an instance of the failure of that penalty in effecting its purpose, which is to deter.—Whately.

Never yet were the feelings and instincts of our nature violated with impunity; never yet was the voice of conscience silenced without retribution.—Mrs. Jameson.

That kind of discipline whose pungent severity is in the manifestations of paternal love, compassion, and tenderness is the most sure of its object.—Hosea Ballou.

It is as expedient that a wicked man be punished as that a sick man be cured by a physician; for all chastisement is a kind of medicine.—Plato.

Care should be taken that the punishment does not exceed the guilt; and also that some men do not suffer for offenses for which others are not even indicted.—Cicero.

Faults of the head are punished in this world, those of the heart in another; but as most of our vices are compound, so also is their punishment.—Colton.

Crime and punishment grow out of one stem. Punishment is a fruit that, unsuspected, ripens within the flower of the pleasure that concealed it.—Emerson.

If the people be led by laws, and uniformity sought to be given them by punishments, they will try to avoid the punishment, but have no sense of shame.—Confucius.

The only effect of public punishment is to show the rabble how bravely it can be borne; and that every one who hath lost a toe-nail hath suffered worse.—Landor.

Even legal punishments lose all appearance of justice, when too strictly inflicted on men compelled by the last extremity of distress to incur them.—Junius.

Don't let us rejoice in punishment, even when the hand of God alone inflicts it. The best of us are but poor wretches, just saved from shipwreck. Can we feel anything but awe and pity when we see a fellow-passenger swallowed by the waves?—George Eliot.

The goodness of God to mankind is no less evinced in the chastisement with which He corrects His children than in the smiles of His providence; for the Lord will not cast off forever, but though He cause grief, yet will He have compassion according to the multitude of His mercies.—Hosea Ballou.

To make punishments efficacious, two things are necessary. They must never be disproportioned to the offence, and they must be certain.—Simms.

There are dreadful punishments enacted against thieves; but it were much better to make such good provisions, by which every man might be put in a method how to live, and so to be preserved from the fatal necessity of stealing and dying for it.—Moore.

A sincere acquaintance with ourselves teaches us humility; and from humility springs that benevolence which compassionates the transgressors we condemn, and prevents the punishments we inflict from themselves partaking of crime, in being rather the wreakings of revenge than the chastisements of virtue.—Jane Porter.

Our measure of rewards and punishments is most partial and incomplete, absurdly inadequate, utterly worldly; and we wish to continue it into the next world. Into that next and awful world we strive to pursue men, and send after them our impotent paltry verdicts of condemnation or acquittal. We set up our paltry little rod to measure heaven immeasurable.—Thackeray.

The twig is so easily bended,
I have banished the rule and the rod;
I have taught them the goodness of knowledge.

They have taught me the goodness of God;
My heart is the dungeon of darkness,
Where I shut them for breaking a rule;
My frown is sufficient correction;
My love is the law of the school.
—Charles M. Dickinson.

Whatever is worthy to be loved for anything is worthy of preservation. A wise and dispassionate legislator, if any such should ever arise among men, will not condemn to death him who has done or is likely to do more service than injury to society. Blocks and gibbets are the nearest objects with legislators, and their business is never with hopes or with virtues.—Landor.

Purity

Blessed be the pure in heart, for they shall see God.—Bible.

Purity in person and in morals is true godliness.—Hosea Ballou.

The smallest speck is seen on snow.—Gay.

Pure and chaste as the falling snow.—T. B. Read.

Every pure thought is a glimpse of God.—Bartol.

Purity of mind and conduct is the first glory of a woman.—Mme. de Staël.

Purity lives and derives its life solely from the Spirit of God.—Colton.

Cleanse the fountain if you would purify the streams.—A. Bronson Alcott.

The stream is always purer at its source.—Pascal.

Only the heart without a stain knows perfect ease.—Goethe.

Be purity of life the test, leave to the heart, to heaven the rest.—Sprague.

Purity is the feminine, truth the masculine, of honor.—Hare.

There's nothing ill can dwell in such a temple.—Shakespeare.

There dwelleth in the sinlessness of youth a sweet rebuke that vice may not endure.—Mrs. Embury.

An angel might have stoop'd to see,
And bless'd her for her purity.
—Dr. Mackay.

While our hearts are pure, our lives are happy and our peace is sure.—William Winter.

Purity of heart is the noblest inheritance, and love the fairest ornament, of woman.—Matthias Claudius.

Let thy mind's sweetness have its operation upon thy body, clothes, and habitation.—George Herbert.

As pure in thought as angels are, to know her was to love her.—Rogers.

I pray Thee, O God, that I may be beautiful within.—Socrates.

The man who in this world can keep the whiteness of his soul is not likely to lose it in any other.—Alexander Smith.

'Tis said the lion will turn and flee
From a maid in the pride of her purity.
—Byron.

The sun, though it passes through dirty places, yet remains as pure as before.—Sir E. Coke.

He that has light within his own clear breast may sit in the center, and enjoy bright day.—Milton.

God be thanked that there are some in the world to whose hearts the barnacles will not cling.—J. G. Holland.

Her form was fresher than the morning
rose
When the dew wets its leaves; unstained and pure
As is the lily, or the mountain snow.
—Thomson.

The love of woman is a precious treasure. Tenderness has no deeper source, devotion no purer shrine, sacrifice no more saintlike abnegation.—Saint-Foix.

The chaste mind, like a polished plane, may admit foul thoughts, without receiving their tincture.—Sterne.

A spirit pure as hers,
Is always pure, even while it errs:
As sunshine, broken in the rill,
Though turned astray, is sunshine still.
—Moore.

The purer the golden vessel, the more readily is it bent; the higher worth of woman is sooner lost than that of man.—Richter.

Who has a breast so pure but some uncleanly apprehensions keep leets and law-days and in session sit with meditations lawful?—Shakespeare.

If a woman be herself pure and noble-hearted, she will come into every circle as a person does into a heated room, who carries with him the freshness of the woods where he has been walking.—Frances Power Cobbe.

By the ancients, courage was regarded as practically the main part of virtue; by us, though I hope we are not less brave, purity is so regarded now.—J. C. Hare.

And steal immortal kisses from her lips;
Which even in pure and vestal modesty,
Still blush as thinking their own kisses sin.
—Shakespeare.

Spring has no blossom fairer than thy form;
Winter no snow-wreath purer than thy mind;

The dew-drop trembling to the morning beam
Is like thy smile, pure, transient, heaven-refin'd. —Mrs. Lydia Jane Pierson.

Around her shone
The light of love, the purity of grace,
The mind, the music breathing from her
face;
The heart whose softness harmonized the
whole;
And, oh! that eye was in itself a soul!
—Byron.

Purpose

Purpose is what gives life a meaning.—Charles H. Parkhurst.

Purpose directs energy, and purpose makes energy.—Charles H. Parkhurst.

Childhood may do without a grand purpose, but manhood cannot.—J. G. Holland.

Life, to be worthy of a rational being, must be always in progression; we must always purpose to do more or better than in time past.—Johnson.

A man's longest purposes will be his best purposes. It is true, life is short and uncertain; but it is better to live on the short arc of a large circle than to describe the whole circumference of a small circle.—Charles H. Parkhurst.

Make thick my blood,
Stop up the access and passage to remorse;
That no compunctious visitings of nature
Shake my fell purpose. —Shakespeare.

There is no action so slight, nor so mean, but it may be done to a great purpose, and ennobled therefore; nor is any purpose so great but that slight actions may help it, and may be so done as to help it much, most especially that chief of all purposes, the pleasing of God.—Ruskin.

Purse

Avarice fills its purse at the expense of its belly.—Haliburton.

I can get no remedy against this consumption of the purse; borrowing only lingers and lingers it out, but the disease is incurable.—Shakespeare.

The man whose purse is empty can cheerfully sing before the robber.—Juvenal.

How, without clothes, could we possess the master organ, soul's seat and true pineal gland of the body social—I mean a purse?—Carlyle.

Q

Quacks
Quacks pretend to cure other men's disorders, but fail to find a remedy for their own.—Cicero.

Take the humbug out of this world, and you haven't much left to do business with.—H. W. Shaw.

Out, you impostors, quack-salving, cheating mountebanks! Your skill is to make sound men sick, and sick men kill.—Massinger.

We do not think it necessary to prove that a quack medicine is poison; let the vender prove it to be sanative.—Macaulay.

From powerful causes spring the empiric's gains,
Man's love of life, his weakness, and his pains;
These first induce him the vile trash to try,
Then lend his name that other men may buy.—Crabbe.

When a man puts on a character he is a stranger to, there is as much difference between what he appears and what he is in reality as there is between a visor and a face.—Bruyere.

Nothing more strikingly betrays the credulity of mankind than medicine. Quackery is a thing universal, and universally successful. In this case it becomes literally true that no imposition is too great for the credulity of men.—Thoreau.

"To elevate and surprise" is the great art of quackery and puffing; to raise a lively and exaggerated image in the mind, and take it by surprise before it can recover breath.—Hazlitt.

Heroes have gone out; quacks have come in; the reign of quacks has not ended with the nineteenth century. The sceptre is held with a firmer grasp; the empire has a wider boundary. We are all the slaves of quackery in one shape or another. Indeed, one portion of our being is always playing the successful quack to the other.—Carlyle.

Void of all honor, avaricious, rash,
The daring tribe compound their boasted trash—
Tincture of syrup, lotion, drop, or pill;
All tempt the sick to trust the lying bill.—Crabbe.

No class escapes them,—from the poor man's pay.
The nostrum takes no trifling part away;
Time, too, with cash is wasted; 'tis the fate
Of real helpers, to be called too late;
This find the sick, when (time and patience gone)
Death with a tenfold terror hurries on.—Crabbe.

I have heard they are the most lewd impostors,
Made of all terms and shreds, no less beliers
Of great men's favours than their own vile medicines,
Which they will utter upon monstrous oaths;
Selling that drug for two pence ere they part,
Which they have valued at twelve crowns before.—Ben Jonson.

Quality
Come, give us a taste of your quality.—Shakespeare.

Quality, not quantity, is my measure.—Douglas Jerrold.

The best is the cheapest.—Franklin

Nothing endures but personal qualities.—Walt Whitman.

Innocence in genius, and candor in power, are both noble qualities.—Madame de Staël.

That air and harmony of shape express,
Fine by degrees, and beautifully less.
—Prior.

The rank is but the guinea's stamp,
The man's the gowd for a' that.
—Burns.

Things that have a common quality ever quickly seek their kind.—Marcus Aurelius.

Judge not by the number, but by the weight.—Cicero.

Be not dazzled by beauty, but look for those inward qualities which are lasting.—Seneca.

Many individuals have, like uncut diamonds, shining qualities beneath a rough exterior.—Juvenal.

You cannot judge by outward appearances; the soul is only transparent to its Maker.—Hosea Ballou.

All her excellences stand in her so silently as if they had stolen upon her without her knowledge.—Sir T. Over-bury.

Wood burns because it has the proper stuff in it; and a man becomes famous because he has the proper stuff in him.—Goethe.

Woman was formed to admire; man to be admirable. His are the glories of the sun at noonday; hers the softened splendors of the midnight moon.
—Sir P. Sidney.

Shining outward qualities, although they may excite first-rate expectations, are not unusually found to be the companions of second-rate abilities.—Colton.

Beautiful to Ledyard, stiffening in the cold of a northern winter, seemed the diminutive, smoke-stained women of Lapland, who wrapped him in their furs, and ministered to his necessities with kindness and gentle words.—

Whittier.

A man or a woman may be highly irritable, and yet be sweet, tender, gentle, loving, sociable, kind, charitable, thoughtful for others, unselfish, generous.—Charles Buxton.

It is the qualities of the heart, not those of the face, that should attract us in women, because the former are durable, the latter transitory. So lovable women, like roses, retain their sweetness long after they have lost their beauty.—Lamartine.

Quarrels

In a false quarrel there is no true valor.—Shakespeare.

Thy head is as full of quarrels as an egg is full of meat.—Shakespeare.

The quarrel is a very pretty quarrel
as it stands.—Sheridan.

I won't quarrel with my bread and butter.—Swift.

Jars concealed are half reconciled.—
Thomas Fuller.

The best quarrels, in the heat, are cursed by those that feel their sharpness.—Shakespeare.

I thought your love eternal. Was it tied so loosely that a quarrel could divide?—Dryden.

Quarrels would not last long if the fault was only on one side.—La Roche-
foucauld.

Beware of entrance to a quarrel;
but, being in, bear it, that the opposer may beware of thee.—Shake-
speare.

We often quarrel with the unfortunate to get rid of pitying them.—
Vauvenargues.

I consider your very testy and quarrelsome people in the same light as I do a loaded gun, which may, by accident, go off and kill one.—Shenstone.

When two men quarrel, who owns the cooler head is the more to blame.—Goethe.

Persons unmask their vilest qualities when they do quarrel.—George Herbert.

O we fell out, I know not why,
And kiss'd again with tears.
—Tennyson.

It requires two indiscreet persons to institute a quarrel; one individual cannot quarrel alone.—Aimé-Martin.

Those who in quarrels interpose,
Must often wipe a bloody nose.
—Gay.

If he had two ideas in his head, they would fall out with each other.—Johnson.

Women always find their bitterest foes among their own sex.—J. Petit-Senn.

Weakness on both sides is, as we know, the motto of all quarrels.—Voltaire.

When worthy men fall out, only one of them may be faulty at the first; but if strife continue long, commonly both become guilty.—Fuller.

We are sure to be losers when we quarrel with ourselves; it is a civil war, and in all such contentions, triumphs are defeats.—Colton.

He that blows the coals in quarrels he has nothing to do with has no right to complain if the sparks fly in his face.—Franklin.

I wish it were never one's duty to quarrel with anybody; I do so hate it: but not to do it sometimes is to smile in the devil's face.—George MacDonald.

One should not quarrel with a dog without a reason sufficient to vindicate one through all the courts of morality.—Goldsmith.

Coarse kindness is at least better than coarse anger; and in all private quarrels the duller nature is triumphant by reason of its dullness.—George Eliot.

In love quarrels the party that loves the most is always most willing to acknowledge the greater fault.—Sir Walter Scott.

Contention, like a horse full of high feeding, madly hath broke loose, and bears down all before him.—Shakespeare.

The quarrels of lovers are like summer storms; everything is more beautiful when they have passed.—Madame Necker.

Thou! why, thou wilt quarrel with a man that hath a hair more, or a hair less, in his beard than thou hast. Thou wilt quarrel with a man for cracking nuts, having no other reason but because thou hast hazel eyes.—Shakespeare.

What stronger breastplate than a heart untainted!
Thrice is he arm'd that hath his quarrel just;
And he but naked, though lock'd up in steel,
Whose conscience with injustice is corrupted.
—Shakespeare.

If I can fasten but one cup upon him,
With that which he hath drunk to-night already,
He'll be as full of quarrel and offense
As my young mistress' dog.
—Shakespeare.

A man may quarrel with himself alone; that is, by controverting his better instincts and knowledge when brought face to face with temptation.—Channing.

In most quarrels there is a fault on both sides. A quarrel may be compared to a spark, which cannot be produced without a flint, as well as steel. Either of them may hammer on wood forever; no fire will follow.—Colton.

If you cannot avoid a quarrel with a blackguard, let your lawyer manage it, rather than yourself. No man sweeps his own chimney, but employs a chimney-sweeper, who has no objection to dirty work, because it is his trade.—Colton.

Two things, well considered, would prevent many quarrels: first, to have it well ascertained whether we are not disputing about terms, rather than things; and, secondly, to examine whether that on which we differ is worth contending about.—Colton.

I never love those salamanders that are never well but when they are in the fire of contentions. I will rather suffer a thousand wrongs than offer one. I have always found that to strive with a superior is injurious; with an equal, doubtful; with an inferior, sordid and base; with any, full of unquietness.—Bishop Hall.

Dissensions, like the small streams are first begun, Scarce seen they rise, but gather as they run; So lines that from their parallel decline, More they proceed the more they still disjoin. —Garth.

Quietness

Study to be quiet.—Bible.

The noonday quiet holds the hill.—Tennyson.

It is tranquil people who accomplish much.—Thoreau.

Silken, chaste, and hushed.—Keats.

A gentleman makes no noise.—Emerson.

The grandest operations, both in nature and grace, are the most silent and imperceptible.—Cecil.

Fullness is always quiet: agitation will answer for empty vessels only.—Alcott.

The heart that is to be filled to the brim with holy joy must be held still.—Bowes.

Coolness and absence of heat and haste indicate fine qualities.—Emerson.

I have often said that all the misfortunes of men spring from their not knowing how to live quietly at home, in their own rooms.—Pascal.

Be it mine to draw from wisdom's fount, pure as it flows, that calm of soul which virtue only knows.—Æschylus.

Coolness, and absence of heat and haste, indicate fine qualities. A gentleman makes no noise, a lady is serene.—Emerson.

Stillness of person and steadiness of features are signal marks of good breeding. Vulgar persons can't sit still, or, at least, they must work their limbs or features.—Holmes.

My notions of life are much the same as they are about traveling; there is a good deal of amusement on the road; but, after all, one wants to be at rest.—Southey.

Remember always in painting, as in eloquence, the greater your strength the quieter will be your manner and the fewer your words; and in painting, as in all the arts and acts of life, the secret of high success will be found, not in a fretful and various excellence, but in a quiet singleness of justly chosen aim.—Ruskin.

The grandest operations, both in nature and in grace, are the most silent and imperceptible. The shallow brook babbles in its passage, and is heard by every one; but the coming on of the seasons is silent and unseen. The storm rages and alarms, but its fury is soon exhausted, and its effects are partial and soon remedied; but the dew, though gentle and unheard, is immense in quantity, and the very life of large portions of the earth. And these are pictures of the operations of grace in the church and in the soul.—Cecil.

Tranquillity consisteth in a steadiness of the mind; and how can that vessel that is beaten upon by contrary waves and winds, and tottereth to either part, be said to keep a steady course? Resolution is the only mother of security.—Bishop Hall.

Quill

The quill hath a good tongue.—
Yriarte.

A quill hath proved the noblest gift to man.—Byron.

A little instrument of mighty power.
—Cervantes.

At the point of the pen is the focus of the mind.—J. L. Basford.

Oh! Nature's noblest gift—my gray-goose quill!—Byron.

Let there be gall enough in thy ink;
though thou write with a goose-pen,
no matter.—Shakespeare.

A witty writer is like a porcupine;
his quill makes no distinction between friend and foe.—H. W. Shaw.

Quills are things that are sometimes taken from the pinions of one goose to spread the opinions of another.—
Chatfield.

The feather whence the pen was shaped that traced the lives of these good men, dropped from an angel's wing.—Wordsworth.

Quotations

Apt quotations carry conviction.—
Gladstone.

Backed his opinion with quotations.
—Prior.

The devil can cite scripture for his purpose.—Shakespeare.

With just enough of learning to mis-quote.—Byron.

Our best thought came from others.
—Emerson.

Quotation confesses inferiority.—
Emerson.

Full of wise saws and modern instances.—Shakespeare.

I quote others only in order the better to express myself.—Montaigne.

Why read a book which you cannot quote?—Bentley.

Have at you with a proverb.—
Shakespeare.

A verse may find him who a sermon flies.—George Herbert.

Fine words! I wonder where you stole them.—Swift.

Great authorities are arguments.—
Daniel Webster.

One must be a wise reader to quote wisely and well.—A. Bronson Alcott.

The mind will quote whether the tongue does or not.—Emerson.

Quotation, like much better things, has its abuses. One may quote till one compiles.—Isaac Disraeli.

Quotations are best brought in to confirm some opinion controverted.—
Swift.

Next to the originator of a good sentence is the first quoter of it.—
Emerson.

Some for renown on scraps of learning dote, and think they grow immortal as they quote.—Young.

Classical quotation is the parole of literary men all over the world.—
Johnson.

It is as difficult to appropriate the thoughts of others as it is to invent.—
Emerson.

A great man quotes bravely, and will not draw on his invention when his memory serves him with a word as good.—Emerson.

A fine quotation is a diamond on the finger of a man of wit, and a pebble in the hand of a fool.—Joseph Roux.

The wisdom of the wise and the experience of ages may be preserved by quotation.—Isaac Disraeli.

They have been at a great feast of languages, and stolen the scraps.—Shakespeare.

A book which hath been culled from the flowers of all books.—George Eliot.

The profoundest thought or passion sleeps as in a mine, until an equal mind and heart finds and publishes it.—Emerson.

I will pick up a few straws here and there over the broad field, and ask you a few moments to look at them.—Garfield.

What is said upon a subject is gathered from an hundred people.—Dr. Johnson.

We are as much informed of a writer's genius by what he selects as by what he originates.—Emerson.

Every quotation contributes something to the stability or enlargement of the language.—Sam'l Johnson.

By necessity, by proclivity, and by delight we quote.—Emerson.

To select well among old things is almost equal to inventing new ones.—Abbe Trublet.

Let the writer's thought so ripen in thee that it becomes, as it were, thy own thought.—Chu-hi.

A good saying often runs the risk of being thrown away when quoted as the speaker's own.—La Bruyère.

There is no less invention in aptly applying a thought found in a book, than in being the first author of the thought.—Bayle.

The multiplicity of facts and writings is become so great that everything must soon be reduced to extracts.—Voltaire.

The art of quotation requires more delicacy in the practice than those conceive who can see nothing more in a quotation than an extract.—Isaac Disraeli.

The wise men of old have sent most of their morality down the stream of time in the light skiff of apothegm or epigram.—Whipple.

The obscurest sayings of the truly great are often those which contain the germ of the profoundest and most useful truths.—Mazzini.

A couplet of verse, a period of prose, may cling to the rock of ages as a shell that survives a deluge.—Bulwer-Lytton.

A beautiful verse, an apt remark, or a well-turned phrase, appropriately quoted, is always effective and charming.—Mme. du Deffand.

I have here only made a nosegay of culled flowers, and have brought nothing of my own but the thread that ties them.—Montaigne.

Every book is a quotation, and every house is a quotation out of all forests and mines and stone-quarries, and every man is a quotation from all his ancestors.—Emerson.

When we would prepare the mind by a forcible appeal, an opening quotation is a symphony preluding on the chords those tones we are about to harmonize.—Disraeli.

He presents me with what is always an acceptable gift who brings me news of a great thought before unknown. He enriches me without impoverishing himself.—Bovee.

The proverb answers where the sermon fails as a well-charged pistol will do more execution than a whole barrel of gunpowder idly exploded in the air.—Simms.

I have somewhere seen it observed that we should make the same use of a book that the bee does of a flower; she steals sweets from it, but does not injure it.—Colton.

Luminous quotations atone, by their interest, for the dullness of an inferior book, and add to the value of a superior work by the variety which they lend to its style and treatment.—Bovee.

This field is so spacious that it were easy for a man to lose himself in it; and if I should spend all my pilgrimage in this walk, my time would soon-end than my way.—Bishop Hall.

To appreciate and use correctly a valuable maxim requires a genius, a vital appropriating exercise of mind, closely allied to that which first created it.—W. R. Alger.

I pluck up the good lissome herbs of sentences by pruning, eat them by reading, digest them by musing, and lay them up at length in the high seat of memory.—Queen Elizabeth.

Let every book worm, when in any fragrant, scarce old tome he discovers a sentence, a story, an illustration, that does his heart good, hasten to give it.—Coleridge.

He that borrows the aid of an equal understanding doubles his own; he that uses that of a superior elevates his own to the stature of that he contemplates.—Burke.

A man, groundly learned already, may take much profit himself in using by epitome to draw other men's works, for his own memory sake, into short room.—Roger Ascham.

Of things that be strange
Who loveth to read,
In this book let him range,
His fancy to feed.

—R. Robinson.

Reader, now I send thee, like a bee, to gather honey out of flowers and weeds; every garden is furnished with either, and so is ours. Read and meditate.—H. Smith.

The greater part of our writers, * * * have become so original, that no one cares to imitate them: and those who never quote in return are seldom quoted.—Isaac Disraeli.

It has been said that death ends all things. This is a mistake. It does not end the volume of practical quotations, and it will not until the sequence of the alphabet is so materially changed as to place D where Z now stands.—Harper's Bazar.

A good thought is a great boon, for which God is to be first thanked, then he who is the first to utter it, and then, in a lesser, but still in a considerable degree, the man who is the first to quote it to us.—Bovee.

Abstracts, abridgments, summaries, etc., have the same use with burning glasses, to collect the diffused rays of wit and learning in authors, and make them point with warmth and quickness upon the reader's imagination.—Swift.

Many useful and valuable books lie buried in shops and libraries unknown and unexamined, unless some lucky compiler opens them by chance, and finds an easy spoil of wit and learning.—Dr. Johnson.

It is good to respect old thoughts in the newest books, because the old works in which they stand are not read. New translations of many truths, as of foreign standard works, must be given forth every half-century.—Richter.

All truly wise thoughts have been thought already thousands of times; but to make them truly ours, we must think them over again honestly, till they take firm root in our personal experience.—Goethe.

All minds quote. Old and new make the warp and woof of every moment. There is no thread that is not a twist of these two strands. * * * We quote not only books and proverbs, but art, sciences, religion, customs, and laws; nay, we quote temples and houses, tables and chairs, by imitation. * * * —Emerson.

If these little sparks of holy fire which I have thus heaped up together do not give life to your prepared and already enkindled spirit, yet they will sometimes help to entertain a thought, to actuate a passion, to employ and hallow a fancy.—Jeremy Taylor.

Whatever we may say against such collections, which present authors in a disjointed form, they nevertheless bring about many excellent results. We are not always so composed, so full of wisdom, that we are able to take in at once the whole scope of a work according to its merits. Do we not mark in a book passages which seem to have a direct reference to ourselves? Young people especially, who have failed in acquiring a complete cultivation of mind, are roused in a praiseworthy way by brilliant passages.—Goethe.

We ought never to be afraid to repeat an ancient truth, when we feel that we can make it more striking by a neater turn, or bring it alongside of another truth, which may make it clearer, and thereby accumulate evidence. It belongs to the inventive faculty to see clearly the relative state of things, and to be able to place them in connection, but the discoveries of ages gone by belong less to their first authors than to those who make them practically useful to the world.—Vauvenargues.

of all and learning in nature and make their point with wealth and richness upon the reader's imagination.—Swift.

Many useful and valuable books lie buried in shops and libraries unknown and unperused unless some lucky compiler comes upon them and puts a new roll of will and persistence.—H. Johnson.

It is good to rummage old libraries in the newest books, because the old works in which they stand are not read. New translations of many treatises of foreign standard works must be given forth every half-century.—Hibbard.

All truly wise thoughts have been thought already thousands of times; but to make them truly ours, we must think them over again honestly, till they take firm root in our personal experience.—Woodward.

All minds quote Old and new make the warp and woof of every movement. There is no thread that is not a twist of these two strands. Of these two strands, one is the warp and the other the woof; and the warp is the old and the woof is the new; and the warp is the old and the woof is the new; and the warp is the old and the woof is the new.—Emerson.

If these little scraps of half the which I have thus heaped up together do not give life to your prepared and already embosomed spirit, yet they will sometimes help to entertain a thought to stimulate a passion to employ an action a fancy.—Henry Taylor.

I place up the good passages of authors in a notebook and then I read them up at leisure in the quiet of memory.—Oscar Elia.

Let every book come when it may, and let every book go when it may. I have a great many books, but I do not read them all. I have a great many books, but I do not read them all. I have a great many books, but I do not read them all.—Columbus.

The first part of the art of collecting is to know what to collect. The second part is to know how to collect. The third part is to know when to collect. The fourth part is to know where to collect. The fifth part is to know how to use the collection.—Lavoisier.

A man, properly, learned, and rich, is a man who has a great many books, but who does not read them all. He is a man who has a great many books, but who does not read them all. He is a man who has a great many books, but who does not read them all.—H. Johnson.

Of books that are worth reading, I have a great many. I have a great many books, but I do not read them all. I have a great many books, but I do not read them all. I have a great many books, but I do not read them all.—R. Robinson.

Remember, now I said that, like a bee, to gather honey out of flowers and to make wax out of them, is the duty of every man. He is a man who has a great many books, but who does not read them all. He is a man who has a great many books, but who does not read them all.—H. Smith.

The greater part of our wisdom is not in our heads, but in our hands. It is not in our heads, but in our hands. It is not in our heads, but in our hands. It is not in our heads, but in our hands.—L. M. Dyer.

It has been said that death ends all things. This is a mistake. It does not end the volume of practical knowledge, but it ends the volume of practical knowledge.—H. Johnson.

R

Radicalism

Radicalism is but the desperation of logic.—Lamartine.

I am trying to do two things,— dare to be a radical, and not be a fool;
which, if I may judge by the exhibitions around me, is a matter of no small difficulty.—James A. Garfield.

To redeem a world sunk in dishonesty has not been given them. Solely over one man therein thou hast quite absolute control. Him redeem, him make honest.—Carlyle.

Rage

Rage is a short-lived fury.—J. Petit-Senn.

Rage is mental imbecility.—Hosea
Ballou.

Rage is essentially vulgar.—Coleridge.

Deaf rage that hears no leader.—
Schiller.

Oppose not rage while rage is in its force, but give it way awhile and let it waste.—Shakespeare.

Hasty wrath and heedless hazardry do breed repentance late and lasting infamy.—Spenser.

They could neither of them speak for rage, and so fell a-sputtering at one another like two roasting apples.
—Congreve.

'T was grief no more, or grief and rage were one within her soul; at last 't was rage alone.—Dryden.

When one is transported by rage, it is best to observe attentively the effects on those who deliver themselves over to the same passion.—Plutarch.

My rage is not malicious; like a spark
Of fire by steel inforced out of a flint.
It is no sooner kindled, but extinct.
—Goffe.

The pain is in my head; 'tis in my heart;
'Tis everywhere; it rages like a madness,
And I most wonder how my reason holds.
—Otway.

'Tis all in vain, this rage that tears thy bosom!
Like a bird that flutters in her cage;
Thou beat'st thyself to death. —Rowe.

There is not in nature
A thing that makes man so deform'd, so beastly,
As doth intemp'rate anger. —Webster.

Rage is the shortest passion of our souls,
Like narrow brooks that rise with sudden
showers,
It swells in haste, and falls again as soon.
Still as it ebbs, the softer thoughts flow in,
And the deceiver, love, supplies its place.
—Rowe.

Her colour changed, her face was not the same,
And hollow groans from her deep spirit came;
Her hair stood up; convulsive rage possess'd
Her trembling limbs, and heaved her la-b'ring breast. —Dryden.

Rain

The kind refresher of the summer heats.—Thomson.

And now the thickened sky like a dark ceiling stood: down rushed the rain impetuous.—Milton.

For the rain it raineth every day.
—Shakespeare.

Clouds dissolved the thirsty ground supply.—Roscommon.

The rain comes when the wind calls.
—Emerson.

The hooded clouds, like friars, tell their beads in drops of rain.—Longfellow.

Nature, like man, sometimes weeps for gladness.—Beaconsfield.

A little rain will fill the lily's cup, which hardly moistens the field.—Edwin Arnold.

Foul with stains of gushing torrents and descending rains.—Addison.

The spongy clouds are filled with gathering rain.—Dryden.

I know Sir John will go, though he was sure it would rain cats and dogs.—Swift.

The day is dark and cold and dreary; it rains, and the wind is never weary.—Longfellow.

He shall come down like rain upon the mown grass: as showers that water
the earth.—Bible.

Like a river down the gutter roars
the rain, the welcome rain!—Longfellow.

Vexed sailors curse the rain for which poor shepherds prayed in vain.
—Waller.

When the splitting wind makes flexible the knees of knotted oaks.—
Shakespeare.

The mighty Rain
Holds the vast empire of the sky alone.
—William Cullen Bryant.

Prelusive drops, let all their moisture flow in large effusion o'er the freshened world.—Thomson.

If there be one righteous person,
the rain falls for his sake.—Buddha.

O earth! I will befriend thee more with rain than youthful April shall with all his showers; in summer's drought I'll drop upon thee still.—
Shakespeare.

The rain-drops' showery dance and rhythmic beat,
With tinkling of innumerable feet.
—Abraham Coles.

He first that useful secret did explain,
That pricking corns foretold the gathering
rain.
—Gay.

All nature mourns, the skies relent in showers; hushed are the birds, and closed the drooping flowers.—Pope.

See daily show'rs rejoice the thirsty earth—
And bless the flow'ry buds' succeeding birth.
—Prior.

Remember that every drop of rain that falls bears into the bosom of the earth a quality of beautiful fertility.—G. H. Lewes.

I think rain is as necessary to the mind as to vegetation. My very thoughts become thirsty, and crave the moisture.—John Burroughs.

The clouds consign their treasures to the fields, and, softly shaking on the dimpled pool prelude drops, let all their moisture flow in large effusion o'er the freshening world.—
Thomson.

The rain is playing its soft pleasant tune fitfully on the skylight, and the shade of the fast-flying clouds across my book passed with delicate change.—N. P. Willis.

I bring fresh showers for the thirsting
flowers,
From the seas and the streams;
I bear light shade for the leaves when laid
In their noonday dreams. —Shelley.

Drip, drip, the rain comes falling,
Rain in the woods, rain on the sea;
Even the little waves, beaten, come crawling
ing
As if to find shelter here with me.
—James Herbert Morse.

All day the rain bathed the dark hyacinths in vain; the flood may pour from morn till night, nor wash the pretty Indian white.—Hafiz.

Dashing in big drops on the narrow pane,
And making mournful music for the
mind,
While plays his interlude the wizzard
wind,
I hear the singing of the frequent rain.
—William H. Burleigh.

The later rain,—it falls in anxious haste
Upon the sun-dried fields and branches
bare,
Loosening with searching drops the rigid
waste,
As if it would each root's lost strength repair.
—Jones.

We knew it would rain, for the poplars showed
The white of their leaves, the amber grain Shrunk in the wind,—and the lightning
now
Is tangled in tremulous skeins of rain.
—T. B. Aldrich.

Be still, sad heart, and cease repining;
Behind the clouds the sun is shining;
Thy fate is the common fate of all,
Into each life some rain must fall,
Some days must be dark and dreary.
—Longfellow.

The day is cold, and dark, and dreary;
It rains, and the wind is never weary;
The vine still clings to the mouldering wall,
But at every gust the dead leaves fall,
And the day is dark and dreary.
—Longfellow.

When the black'ng clouds in sprinkling
showers
Distil, from the high summits down the rain
Runs trickling, with the fertile moisture
cheer'd,
The orchards smile, joyous the farmers see Their thriving plants, and bless the heavenly dew.
—Philips.

How it pours, pours, pours,
In a never-ending sheet!
How it drives beneath the doors!
How it soaks the passer's feet!
How it rattles on the shutter!
How it rumples up the lawn!
How 'twill sigh, and moan, and mutter,
From darkness until dawn.
—Rossiter Johnson.

'Twas so; I saw thy birth. That drowsy lake
From her faint bosom breath'd thee, the disease
Of her sick waters, and infectious ease.
But now at even,
Too gross for heaven,
Thou fall'st in tears, and weep'st for thy mistake.
—Henry Vaughan.

Last night, above the whistling wind,
I heard the welcome rain,—
A fusillade upon the roof,
A tattoo on the pane:
The keyhole piped; the chimney-top
A warlike trumpet blew. —Bret Harte.

The rain is o'er—How densely bright
Yon pearly clouds reposing lie!
Cloud above cloud, a glorious sight,
Contrasting with the deep-blue sky!
In grateful silence earth receives
The general blessing; fresh and fair
Each flower expands its little leaves,
As glad the common joy to share.
—Andrew Norton.

Rainbow

God's glowing covenant.—Hosea
Ballou.

God's illumined promise.—Longfel-
low.

Born of the shower, and colored by the sun.—J. C. Prince.

Be thou the rainbow to the storms
of life.—Byron.

Bright pledge of peace and sunshine.
—Henry Vaughan.

The smiling daughter of the storm.
—Colton.

Rain, rain, and sun! a rainbow in the sky!—Tennyson.

And, lo! in the dark east, expanded high,
The rainbow brightens to the setting Sun.
—Beattie.

Triumphant arch, that fill'st the sky when storms prepare to part!—
Campbell.

Be thou the rainbow to the storms
of life! the evening beam that smiles the clouds away and tints to-morrow with prophetic ray!—Byron.

So shines the setting sun on adverse skies, and paints a rainbow on the storm.—Dr. Watts.

Conspicuous, with three listed colors gay, betokening peace from God, and covenant new.—Milton.

Faithful to its sacred page, Heaven still rebuilds thy span.—Campbell.

That gracious thing, made up of tears and light.—Coleridge.

My heart leaps up when I behold
A rainbow in the sky! —Wordsworth.

Mild arch of promise! on the evening sky
Thou shinest fair with many a lovely ray,
Each in the other melting. —Southey.

'Tis sweet to listen as the night winds creep
From leaf to leaf; 'tis sweet to view on high
The rainbow, based on ocean, span the sky.
—Byron.

What skilful limner e'er would choose
To paint the rainbow's varying hues,
Unless to mortal it were given
To dip his brush in dyes of heaven?
—Scott.

A rainbow in the morning
Is the Shepherd's warning;
But a rainbow at night
Is the Shepherd's delight.
—Old Weather Rhyme.

Hung on the shower that fronts the golden
West,
The rainbow bursts like magic on mine
eyes!
In hues of ancient promise there imprest;
Frail in its date, eternal in its guise.
—Charles Tennyson Turner.

Over her hung a canopy of state,
Not of rich tissue, nor of spangled gold,
But of a substance, though not animate,
Yet of a heavenly and spiritual mould,
That only eyes of spirits might behold.
—Giles Fletcher.

Meantime, refracted from yon eastern
cloud,
Bestriding earth, the grand ethereal bow
Shoots up immense; and every hue unfolds,
In fair proportion, running from the red
To where the violet fades into the sky.
—Thomson.

When thou dost shine, darkness looks
white and fair,
Forms turn to music, clouds to smiles and
air;
Rain gently spends his honey-drops, and pours
Balm on the cleft earth, milk on grass and
flowers.
Bright pledge of peace and sunshine!
—Henry Vaughan.

Look upon the rainbow, and praise
Him that made it; very beautiful it is in the brightness thereof; it compasseth the heaven about with a glorious circle, and the hands of the Most High have bended it.—Ecclesiasticus.

O beautiful rainbow;—all woven of light!
There's not in thy tissue one shadow of
night;
Heaven surely is open when thou dost appear,
And, bending above thee, the angels draw near,
And sing,—“The rainbow! the rainbow!
The smile of God is here.”
—Mrs. Sarah J. Hale.

Hail, many-colored messenger, that ne'er
Dost disobey the wife of Jupiter;
Who, with thy saffron wings, upon my
flowers
Diffusest honey-drops, refreshing showers;
And with each end of thy blue bow dost
crown
My bosky acres, and my unshrubbed down,
Rich scarf to my proud earth.
—Shakespeare.

Bright pledge of peace and sunshine! the sure tie
Of thy Lord's hand, the object of His eye!
When I behold thee, though my light be dim,
Distinct and low, I can in thine see Him
Who looks upon thee from His glorious throne,
And minds the covenant between all and One.
—Vaughan.

Rank

Rank is a great beautifier.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Rank and riches are chains of gold,
but still chains.—Ruffini.

To be vain of one's rank or place is to disclose that one is below it.—
Stanislaus.

The rank is but the guinea's stamp;
the man's the gowd for a' that.—
Burns.

Of the king's creation you may be;
but he who makes a count ne'er made a man.—Southern.

Every error of the mind is the more conspicuous and culpable in proportion to the rank of the person who commits it.—Juvenal.

If it were ever allowable to forget what is due to superiority of rank, it would be when the privileged themselves remember it.—Mme. Swetchine.

I weigh the man, not his title; 't is not the king's stamp can make the metal better.—Wycherley.

The finest lives, in my opinion, are those who rank in the common model, and with the human race, but without miracle, without extravagance.—Montaigne.

There are no persons more solicitous about the preservation of rank than those who have no rank at all. Observe the humors of a country christening, and you will find no court in Christendom so ceremonious as the quality of Brentford.—Shenstone.

Quality and title have such allurements that hundreds are ready to give up all their own importance, to cringe, to flatter, to look little, and to pall every pleasure in constraint, merely to be among the great, though without the least hopes of improving their understanding or sharing their generosity. They might be happier among their equals.—Goldsmith.

Rapture

Sweet the young muse with love intense,
Which smiles o'er sleeping innocence.
—Smart.

Not the poet in the moment
Fancy lightens on his e'e,
Kens the pleasure, feels the rapture,
That thy presence gies to me.
—Burns.

An infant when it gazes on the light,
A child the moment when it drains the breast,
A devotee when soars the Host in sight,
An Arab with a stranger for a guest,
A sailor when the prize has struck in fight,
A miser filling his most hoarded chest,
Feel rapture; but not such true joy are reaping
As they who watch o'er what they love while sleeping.
—Byron.

Rarity

A lucky man is rarer than a white crow.—Juvenal.

Rarity gives a charm: thus early fruits are most esteemed; thus winter roses obtain a higher price; thus coyness sets off an extravagant mistress; a door ever open attracts no young sultor.—Martial.

Rashness

Haste and rashness are storm and tempest.—Thomas Fuller.

Rashness and haste make all things insecure.—Sir J. Denham.

Reckless haste makes poor speed.—Franklin.

Rashness is not always fortunate.—Livy.

Let us not throw the rope after the bucket.—Cervantes.

Rashness brings success to few, misfortune to many.—Phædrus.

I was too hasty to condemn unheard; and you perhaps too prompt in your replies.—Dryden.

The human race afraid of nothing, rushes on through every crime.—Horace.

Blind fortune treads on the steps of inconsiderate rashness.—La Fontaine.

Must one rash word, the infirmity of age, throw down the merit of my better years?—Addison.

Rashness is the fruitful but unhappy parent of misfortune.—Thomas Fuller.

Rashness is oftener the resort of cowardice than of courage.—Welling-ton.

None are rash when they are not seen by anybody.—Stanislaus.

To be rash is to be bold without shame and without skill.—Roger Ascham.

Haste and rashness are storms and tempests, breaking and wrecking business; but nimbleness is a full, fair wind, blowing it with speed to the haven.—Fuller.

We may outrun by violent swiftness that which we run at, and lose by overrunning.—Shakespeare.

Nothing is more unreasonable than to entangle our spirits in wildness and amazement; like a partridge fluttering in a net, which she breaks not, though she breaks her wings.—Jeremy Taylor.

Raven

The croaking raven doth bellow for revenge.—Shakespeare.

The Raven's house is built with reeds,—
Sing woe, and alas is me!
And the Raven's couch is spread with weeds.

High on the hollow tree;
And the Raven himself, telling his beads
In penance for his past misdeeds, Upon the top I see.

—Thos. Darcy McGee.

And the Raven, never flitting,
Still is sitting, still is sitting On the pallid bust of Pallas
Just above my chamber door;
And his eyes have all the seeming
Of a demon's that is dreaming,
And the lamplight o'er him streaming Throws his shadow on the floor,
And my soul from out that shadow,
That lies floating on the floor,
Shall be lifted—nevermore.

—Poe.

Reading

Reading maketh a full man.—Bacon.

Read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest.—Collect.

Graceful, ingenious, illuminative reading.—Carlyle.

He that runs may read.—Tennyson.

Read much, but not many works.—Sir W. Hamilton.

I cannot sit and think; books think for me.—Lamb.

A great work always leaves us in a state of musing.—Isaac Disraeli.

There is creative reading as well as creative writing.—Emerson.

In science, read by preference the newest works; in literature, the oldest. The classic literature is always modern.—Bulwer-Lytton.

To read without reflecting is like eating without digesting.—Burke.

How well he is read, to reason against reading!—Shakespeare.

No man can read with profit that which he cannot learn to read with pleasure.—Noah Porter.

Learn to read slow; all other graces Will follow in their proper places.
—Wm. Walker.

He that I am reading seems always to have the most force.—Montaigne.

Digressions incontestably are the sunshine; they are the life, the soul of reading.—Sterne.

Sentences are like sharp nails which force truth upon our memory.—Diderot.

A man who attempts to read all the new productions must do as the flea does,—skip.—Rogers.

If a man read little, he had need have much cunning to seem to know that he doth not.—Bacon.

Force yourself to reflect on what you read, paragraph by paragraph.—Coleridge.

By conversing with the mighty dead we imbibe sentiment with knowledge.—Hazlitt.

Much reading is like much eating,—wholly useless without digestion.—South.

If we encountered a man of rare intellect, we should ask him what books he read.—Emerson.

Reading is a dissuasion from immorality. Reading stands in the place of company.—Henry Ward Beecher.

When the last reader reads no more.—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Reading Chaucer is like brushing through the dewy grass at sunrise.—Lowell.

The man who is fond of books is usually a man of lofty thought and of elevated opinions.—George Dawson.

We should accustom the mind to keep the best company by introducing it only to the best books.—Sydney Smith.

Many readers judge of the power of a book by the shock it gives their feelings.—Longfellow.

Uncertain whose the narrowest span,—the clown unread, or half-read gentleman.—Dryden.

Men must read for amusement as well as for knowledge.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Our high respect for a well-read man is praise enough of literature.—Emerson.

Books afford the surest relief in the most melancholy moments.—Zimmermann.

He is a worthy gentleman, exceedingly well read and profited in strange concealments.—Shakespeare.

Reading furnishes the mind only with materials of knowledge; it is thinking makes what we read ours.—John Locke.

'T is the good reader that makes the good book: a good head cannot read amiss.—Emerson.

And better had they ne'er been born,
Who read to doubt, or read to scorn.
—Scott.

No entertainment is so cheap as reading, nor any pleasure so lasting.—Lady M. W. Montagu.

Banqueting with gods on the ambrosia and nectar of the mind.—W. R. Alger.

He that loves reading has everything within his reach. He has but to desire, and he may possess himself of every species of wisdom to judge and power to perform.—William Godwin.

We have not read an author till we have seen his object, whatever it may be, as he saw it.—Carlyle.

Reading nourisheth the wit; and when it is wearied with study, it refresheth it, yet not without study.—Seneca.

Read, read, sirrah, and refine your appetite; learn to live upon instruction; frost your mind and mortify your flesh.—Congreve.

We are now in want of an art to teach how books are to be read rather than to read them. Such an art is practicable.—Disraeli.

The love of reading enables a man to exchange the wearisome hours of life which come to every one for hours of delight.—Montesquieu.

The delight of opening a new pursuit, or a new course of reading, imparts the vivacity and novelty of youth even to old age.—Isaac Disraeli.

What blockheads are those wise persons who think it necessary that a child should comprehend everything it reads!—Southey.

By reading a man does, as it were, antedate his life, and make himself contemporary with past ages.—Jeremy Collier.

Read and take your nourishment in at your eyes; shut up your mouth, and chew the cud of understanding.—Congreve.

Given the books of a man, it is not difficult, I think, to detect therein the personality of the man, and the station in life to which he was born.—Stoddard.

He found shelter among books, which insult not, and studies that ask no questions of a youth's finances.—Lamb.

When I am reading a book, whether wise or silly, it seems to me to be alive and talking to me.—Swift.

If thou wilt receive profit, read with humility, simplicity, and faith; and seek not at any time the fame of being learned.—Thomas à Kempis.

A man ought to read just as Inclination leads him; for what he reads as a task will do him little good.—Sam'l Johnson.

Studious let me sit,
And hold high converse with the mighty Dead.—Thomson.

Let us read with method, and propose to ourselves an end to what our studies may point. The use of reading is to aid us in thinking.—Gibbon.

Some will read only old books, as if there were no valuable truths to be discovered in modern publications; others will only read new books, as if some valuable truths are not among the old. Some will not read a book because they know the author: others would also read the man.—Disraeli.

Half the gossip of society would perish if the books that are truly worth reading were but read.—Dawson.

My early and invincible love of reading. * * * I would not exchange for the treasures of India.—Gibbon.

Read not to contradict and confute, nor to believe and take for granted, nor to find talk and discourse; but to weigh and consider.—Bacon.

In a polite age almost every person becomes a reader, and receives more instruction from the press than the pulpit.—Goldsmith.

Thou mayest as well expect to grow stronger by always eating, as wiser by always reading. Too much overcharges nature, and turns more into disease than nourishment.—Fuller.

A good reader is nearly as rare as a good writer. People bring their prejudices, whether friendly or adverse. They are lamp and spectacles, lighting and magnifying the page.—Willmott.

Resolve to edge in a little reading every day, if it is but a single sentence. If you gain fifteen minutes a day, it will make itself felt at the end of the year.—Horace Mann.

I should as soon think of swimming across the Charles River when I wish to go to Boston, as of reading all my books in originals, when I have them rendered for me in my mother tongue.—Emerson.

The first time I read an excellent book, it is to me just as if I had gained a new friend. When I read over a book I have perused before, it resembles the meeting with an old one.—Goldsmith.

Every reader reads himself out of the book that he reads; nay, has he a strong mind, reads himself into the book, and amalgamates his thoughts with the author's.—Goethe.

It is manifest that all government of action is to be gotten by knowledge, and knowledge best, by gathering many knowledges, which is reading.—Sir P. Sidney.

Read Homer once, and you can read no more,
For all books else appear so mean, so poor,
Verse will seem prose; but still persist to read,
And Homer will be all the books you need.
—John Sheffield.

We never read without profit if with the pen or pencil in our hand we mark such ideas as strike us by their novelty, or correct those we already possess.—Zimmermann.

When what you read elevates your mind and fills you with noble aspirations, look for no other rule by which to judge a book; it is good, and is the work of a master-hand.—La Bruyère.

As a man may be eating all day, and for want of digestion is never nourished, so these endless readers may cram themselves in vain with intellectual food.—Dr. I. Watts.

No man reads a book of science from pure inclination. The books that we do read with pleasure are light compositions, which contain a quick succession of events.—Dr. Johnson.

Nothing, in truth, has such a tendency to weaken not only the powers of invention, but the intellectual powers in general, as a habit of extensive and various reading without reflection.—Dugald Stewart.

'Tis the good reader that makes the good book; a good head cannot read amiss, in every book he finds passages which seem confidences or asides hidden from all else and unmistakably meant for his ear.—Emerson.

The art of reading is to skip judiciously. Whole libraries may be skipped in these days, when we have the results of them in our modern culture without going over the ground again.—Hamerton.

If a man begins to read in the middle of a book, and feels an inclination to go on, let him not quit it to go to the beginning. He may perhaps not feel again the inclination.—Dr. Johnson.

It is curious how tyrannical the habit of reading is, and what shifts we make to escape thinking. There is no bore we dread being left alone with so much as our own minds.—Lowell.

A discursive student is almost certain to fall into bad company. Ten minutes with a French novel or a German rationalist have sent a reader away with a fever for life.—Willmott.

One of the amusements of idleness is reading without the fatigue of close attention; and the world, therefore, swarms with writers whose wish is not to be studied, but to be read.—Johnson.

Milton almost requires a solemn service of music to be played before you enter upon him. But he brings his music, to which who listen had need bring docile thoughts and purged ears.—Lamb.

The mind should be accustomed to make wise reflections, and draw curious conclusions as it goes along; the habitude of which made Pliny the Younger affirm that he never read a book so bad but he drew some profit from it.—Sterne.

People seldom read a book which is given to them; and few are given. The way to spread a work is to sell it at a low price. No man will send to buy a thing that costs even sixpence without an intention to read it.—Johnson.

Reading maketh a full man, conference a ready man, and writing an exact man. * * * Histories make men wise; poets, witty; the mathematics, subtle; natural philosophy, deep; moral, grave; logic and rhetoric, able to contend.—Bacon.

When in reading we meet with any maxim that may be of use, we should take it for our own, and make an immediate application of it, as we would of the advice of a friend whom we have purposely consulted.—Colton.

It is not the reading of many books which is necessary to make a man wise or good, but the well-reading of a few, could he be sure to have the best. And it is not possible to read over many on the same subject without a great deal of loss of precious time.—Richard Baxter.

Much depends upon when and where you read a book. In the five or six impatient minutes before the dinner is quite ready, who would think of taking up the Faerie Queen for a stop-gap, or a volume of Bishop Andrews's Sermons?—Lamb.

The mind, relaxing into needful sport,
Should turn to writers of an abler sort,
Whose wit well managed, and whose classic style,
Give truth a lustre, and make wisdom smile.
—Cowper.

He hath never fed of the dainties that are bred in a book; he hath not eat paper, as it were; he hath not drunk ink; his intellect is not replenished; he is only an animal, only sensible in the duller parts.—Shakespeare.

I read hard, or not at all; never skimming, never turning aside to merely inviting books; and Plato, Aristotle

Butler, Thucydides, Sterne, Jonathan Edwards, have passed like the iron atoms of the blood into my mental constitution.—F. W. Robertson.

I love to lose myself in other men's minds. When I am not walking, I am reading. I cannot sit and think; books think for me. I have no repugnances. Shaftesbury is not too genteel for me, nor Jonathan Wild too low.—Lamb.

Some read books only with a view to find fault, while others read only to be taught; the former are like venomous spiders, extracting a poisonous quality, where the latter, like the bees, sip out a sweet and profitable juice.—L'Estrange.

I seek in the reading of my books only to please myself by an irreproachable diversion; or if I study it is for no other science than that which treats of the knowledge of myself, and instructs me how to die and live well.—Montaigne.

Reading is to the mind what exercise is to the body. As by the one, health is preserved, strengthened, and invigorated; by the other, virtue (which is the health of the mind) is kept alive, cherished, and confirmed.—Addison.

By reading a man does, as it were, antedate his life, and make himself contemporary with the ages past; and this way of running up beyond one's nativity is better than Plato's pre-existence.—Jeremy Collier.

There was, it is said, a criminal in Italy who was suffered to make his choice between Guicciardini and the galleys. He chose the history. But the war of Pisa was too much for him; he changed his mind, and went to the oars.—Macaulay.

Now, my young friends to whom I am addressing myself, with reference to this habit of reading, I make bold to tell you that it is your pass to the greatest, the purest, and the most perfect pleasure that God has prepared for His creatures.—Anthony Trollope.

There is a gentle, but perfectly irresistible coercion in a habit of reading well directed, over the whole tenor of a man's character and conduct, which is not the less effectual because it works insensibly, and because it is really the last thing he dreams of.—Sir John Herschel.

If I were to pray for a taste which should stand me in stead under every variety of circumstances, and be a source of happiness and cheerfulness to me through life, and a shield against its ills, however things might go amiss, and the world frown upon me, it would be a taste for reading.—Sir John Herschel.

Reading without purpose is sauntering, not exercise. More is got from one book on which the thought settles for a definite end in knowledge, than from libraries skimmed over by a wandering eye. A cottage flower gives honey to the bee, a king's garden none to the butterfly.—Bulwer-Lytton.

When I take up a book I have read before, I know what to expect; the satisfaction is not lessened by being anticipated. I shake hands with, and look our old tried and valued friend in the face,—compare notes and chat the hour away.—Hazlitt.

There are three classes of readers: some enjoy without judgment; others judge without enjoyment; and some there are who judge while they enjoy, and enjoy while they judge. The latter class reproduces the work of art on which it is engaged. Its numbers are very small.—Goethe.

Many books, Wise men have said, are wearisome; who reads incessantly, and to his reading brings not A spirit and judgment equal or superior, Uncertain and unsettled still remains—Deep versed in books, and shallow in himself.—Milton.

Authors have a greater right than any copyright, though it is generally unacknowledged or disregarded. They have a right to the reader's civility. There are favorable hours for reading a book, as for writing it, and to these the author has a claim. Yet many people think that when they buy a book they buy with it the right to abuse the author.—Longfellow.

From numberless books the fluttering reader, idle and inconstant, bears away the bloom that only clings to the outer leaf; but genius has its nectaries, delicate glands, and secretaries of sweetness, and upon these the thoughtful mind must settle in its labor, before the choice perfume of fancy and wisdom is drawn forth.—Willmott.

A man who has any relish for fine writing either discovers new beauties or receives stronger impressions from the masterly strokes of a great author every time he peruses him; besides that he naturally wears himself into the same manner of speaking and thinking.—Addison.

Learn to be good readers, which is perhaps a more difficult thing than you imagine. Learn to be discriminative in your reading; to read faithfully, and with your best attention, all kinds of things which you have a real interest in,—a real, not an imaginary,—and which you find to be really fit for what you are engaged in.—Carlyle.

The habit of reading is the only enjoyment I know in which there is no alloy. It lasts when all other pleasures fade. It will be there to support you when all other resources are gone. It will be present to you when the energies of your body have fallen away from you. It will last you until your death. It will make your hours pleasant to you as long as you live.—Trollope.

If there were no readers there certainly would be no writers. Clearly, therefore, the existence of writers depends upon the existence of readers; and, of course, as the cause must be antecedent to the effect, readers existed before writers. Yet, on the other hand, if there were no writers there could be no readers, so it should appear that writers must be antecedent to readers.—Paul Chatfield, M.D.

The man whose bosom neither riches nor luxury nor grandeur can render happy may, with a book in his hand, forget all his torments under the friendly shade of every tree; and experience pleasures as infinite as they are varied, as pure as they are lasting, as lively as they are unfading, and as compatible with every public duty as they are contributory to private happiness.—Zimmermann.

There is a world of science necessary in choosing books. I have known some people in great sorrow fly to a novel, or the last light book in fashion. One might as well take a rose-draught for the plague! Light reading does not do when the heart is really heavy. I am told that Goethe, when he lost his son, took to study a science that was new to him. Ah! Goethe was a physician who knew what he was about.—Bulwer-Lytton.

By conversing with the mighty dead, we imbibe sentiment with knowledge. We become strongly attached to those who can no longer either hurt or serve us, except through the influence which they exert over the mind. We feel the presence of that power which gives immortality to human thoughts and actions, and catch the flame of enthusiasm from all nations and ages.—Hazlitt.

Have you ever rightly considered what the mere ability to read means? That it is the key which admits us to the whole world of thought and fancy and imagination? to the company of saint and sage, of the wisest and the wittiest at their wisest and wittiest moment? That it enables us to see with the keenest eyes, hear with the finest ears, and listen to the sweetest voices of all time? More than that, it annihilates time and space for us.—Lowell.

They that have read about everything are thought to understand everything too; but it is not always so. Reading furnishes the mind only with the materials of knowledge; it is thinking that makes what we read ours. We are of the ruminating kind, and it is not enough to cram ourselves with a great load of collections,—we must chew them over again.—Channing.

Mr. Johnson had never, by his own account, been a close student, and used to advise young people never to be without a book in their pocket, to be read at bye-times, when they had nothing else to do. "It has been by that means," said he to a boy at our house one day, "that all my knowledge has been gained, except what I have picked up by running about the world with my wits ready to observe, and my tongue ready to talk."—Mrs. Piozzi.

His classical reading is great: he can quote Horace, Juvenal, Ovid, and Martial by rote. He has read Metaphysics * * * Spinoza and Kant; And Theology too; I have heard him descant Upon Basil and Jerome. Antiquities, art, He is fond of. He knows the old masters by heart, And his taste is refined.

—Bulwer-Lytton.

The first class of readers may be compared to an hour-glass, their reading being as the sand; it runs in and runs out, and leaves not a vestige behind. A second class resembles a sponge, which imbibes everything, and returns it in nearly the same state, only a little dirtier. A third class is like a jelly-bag, which allows all that is pure to pass away, and retains only the refuse and dregs. The fourth class may be compared to the slave of Golconda, who, casting aside all that is worthless, preserves only the pure gems.—Coleridge.

Reality

Things are sullen, and will be as they are, whatever we think them or wish them to be.—Cudworth.

Reality surpasses imagination; and we see, breathing, brightening, and moving before our eyes sights dearer to our hearts than any we ever beheld in the land of sleep.—Goethe.

Reason

Reason is mistress and queen of all things.—Cicero.

Reason may cure illusions, but not suffering.—Alfred de Musset.

Reason lies between the spur and the bridle.—George Herbert.

Reason gains all men by compelling none.—Aaron Hill.

The feast of reason and the flow of soul.—Pope.

Love reasons without reason.—Shakespeare.

Strong reasons make strong actions.—Shakespeare.

But it is not reason that governs love.—Molière.

Every why hath a wherefore.—Shakespeare.

What is reason now was passion heretofore.—Ovid.

Good reasons must, of force, give place to better.—Shakespeare.

Men possessed with an idea cannot be reasoned with.—Froude.

If I go to heaven I want to take my reason with me.—R. G. Ingersoll.

Remember always, that man is a creature whose reason is often darkened with error.—Sir P. Sidney.

Now see that noble and most sovereign reason, like sweet bells jangled, out of tune and harsh.—Shakespeare.

He is next to the gods whom reason, and not passion, impels.—Claudian.

Nothing can be lasting when reason does not rule.—Quintus Curtius Rufus.

I have no other but a woman's reason: I think him so, because I think him so.—Shakespeare.

Wouldst thou subject all things to thyself? Subject thyself to reason.—Seneca.

There is no opposing brutal force to the stratagems of human reason.—L'Estrange.

Reason can tell how love affects us, but cannot tell what love is.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Reason is a very light rider, and easily shook off.—Swift.

Who reasons wisely, is not therefore wise, His pride in reasoning, not in acting lies.
—Pope.

Reason's progressive; instinct is complete; swift instinct leaps; slow reason feebly climbs.—Young.

There is a just Latin axiom, that he who seeks a reason for everything subverts reason.—Epes Sargent.

Neither great poverty nor great riches will hear reason.—Fielding.

Indued with sanctity of reason.—Milton.

It is not from reason and prudence that people marry, but from inclination.—Dr. Johnson.

There is occasions and causes why and wherefore in all things.—Shakespeare.

Reason can discover things only near,—sees nothing that's above her.—Quarles.

The philosophy of reasoning, to be complete, ought to comprise the theory of bad as well as of good reasoning.—John Stuart Mill.

Give you a reason on compulsion! If reasons were as plentiful as blackberries, I would give no man a reason upon compulsion.—Shakespeare.

When a man has not a good reason for doing a thing, he has one good reason for letting it alone.—Walter Scott.

I will it, I so order, let my will stand for a reason.—Juvenal.

Reason is a permanent blessing of God to the soul. Without it there can be no large religion.—Henry Ward Beecher.

An idle reason lessens the weight of the good ones you gave before.—Swift.

Human reason is like a drunken man on horseback; set it up on one side, and it tumbles over on the other.—Luther.

We love without reason, and without reason we hate.—Regnard.

Say first, of God above or man below, What can we reason but from what we know?
—Pope.

Reason can in general do more than blind force.—Corn Gallus.

Reason is the test of ridicule—not ridicule the test of truth.—Warburton.

The reasoning of the strongest is always the best.—La Fontaine.

And what is reason? Be she thus defined: Reason is upright stature in the soul.
—Young.

Reason cannot show itself more reasonable than to cease reasoning on things above reason.—Sir P. Sidney.

Reason is an historian, but the passions are actors.—Rivarol.

But for tradition, we walk evermore to higher paths by brightening reason's lamp.—George Eliot.

Reason raise o'er instinct as you can, In this 'tis God directs, in that 'tis man.
—Pope.

Reason is a bee, and exists only on what it makes; his usefulness takes the place of beauty.—Joubert.

Reason is as it were a light to lighten our steps and guide us through the journey of life.—Cicero.

If reason justly contradicts an article, it is not of the household of faith.—Jeremy Taylor.

If you will not hear Reason, she will surely rap your knuckles.—Benjamin Franklin.

Reason will by degrees submit to absurdity, as the eye is in time accommodated to darkness.—Dr. Johnson.

Let our reason, and not our senses, be the rule of our conduct; for reason will teach us to think wisely, to speak prudently, and to behave worthily.— Confucius.

Reason is the glory of human nature, and one of the chief eminences whereby we are raised above the beasts, in this lower world.—Dr. Watts.

Wise men are instructed by reason; men of less understanding by experience; the most ignorant, by necessity, and beasts, by nature.—Cicero.

Reason exercises merely the function of preserving order, is, so to say, the police in the region of art. In life it is mostly a cold arithmetician summing up our follies.—Heine.

While Reason drew the plan, the Heart informed
The moral page and Fancy lent it grace,
—Thompson.

What can give us more sure knowledge than our senses? How else can we distinguish between the true and the false?—Lucretius.

Reason, however able, cool at best, Cares not for service, or but serves when prest,
Stays till we call, and then not often near.
—Pope.

Yea, marry, now it is somewhat, for now it is rhyme; before it was neither rhyme nor reason.—Sir Thos. More.

Subdue
By force, who reason for their law refuse,
Right reason for their law. —Milton.

There are few things reason can discover with so much certainty and ease as its own insufficiency.—Jeremy Collier.

He that will not reason is a bigot;
he that cannot reason is a fool and he that dares not reason is a slave.—Sir W. Drummond.

Sound and sufficient reason falls,
after all, to the share of but few men,
and those few men exert their influence in silence.—Goethe.

Reasons are the pillars of the fabric of a sermon, but similitudes are the windows which give the best light.—

Fuller.

Reason! how many eyes hast thou to see evils, and how dim, nay, blind, thou art in preventing them.—Sir P. Sidney.

Every sect, as far as reason will help them, gladly use it; when it fails them, they cry out it is a matter of faith, and above reason.—Locke.

The proper work of man, the grand drift of human life, is to follow reason, that noble spark kindled in us from heaven.—Barrow.

God enters by a private door into every individual. Long prior to reflection is the thinking of the mind.—
Emerson.

Reason is the director of man's will, discovering in action what is good; for the laws of well-doing are the dictates of right reason.—Hooker.

The weakness of human reason appears more evidently in those who know it not than in those who know it.—Pascal.

Man is not the prince of creatures,
But in reason; fail that, he is worse Than horse or dog, or beast of wilderness.
—Field.

Clear-sighted reason, wisdom's judgment leads; and sense, her vassal, in her footsteps treads.—Sir J. Denham.

Without an helm or pilot her to sway;
Full sad and dreadful is that ship's event,
So is the man that wants intendment.
—Spenser.

To be rational is so glorious a thing that two-legged creatures generally content themselves with the title.—
Locke.

Many are destined to reason wrongly;
others, not to reason at all; and others, to persecute those who do reason.—
Voltaire.

His reasons are two grains of wheat hid in two bushels of chaff; you shall seek all day ere you find them; and when you have them, they are not worth the search.—Shakespeare.

Polished steel will not shine in the dark; no more can reason, however refined, shine efficaciously, but as it reflects the light of Divine truth, shed from heaven.—Foster.

Reason the hoary dotard's dull directress,
That loses all, because she hazards nothing;
Reason! the tim'rous pilot, that, to shun
The rocks of life, forever flies the port.
—Dr. Johnson.

Though reason is not to be relied upon as universally sufficient to direct us what to do, yet it is generally to be relied upon and obeyed where it tells us what we are not to do.—South.

Reason is progressive; instinct, stationary. Five thousand years have added no improvement to the hive of the bee, nor the house of the beaver.—Colton.

Whether with reason or with instinct blest, Know, all enjoy that power which suits them best;
To bliss alike by that direction tend,
And find the means proportion'd to their end.
—Pope.

As reason is a rebel unto faith, so passion unto reason; as the propositions of faith seem absurd unto reason, so the theories of reason unto passion.—Sir Thomas Browne.

The soul is cured of its maladies by certain incantations; these incantations are beautiful reasons, from which temperance is generated in souls.—Socrates.

Sir, you are giving a reason for it; but that will not make it right. You may have a reason why two and two should make five; but they will still make but four.—Johnson.

There are those who never reason on what they should do, but what they have done; as if Reason had her eyes behind, and could only see backwards.—Fielding.

Reason elevates our thoughts as high as the stars, and leads us through the vast space of this mighty fabric; yet it comes far short of the real extent of our corporeal being.—Johnson.

Women never reason, or, if they do, they either draw correct inferences from wrong premises, or wrong inferences from correct premises; and they always poke the fire from the top.—Whately.

Within the brain's most secret cells,
A certain lord chief justice dwells,
Of sov'reign power, whom one and all,
With common voice we reason call.
—Churchill.

Let cavillers deny that brutes have reason; sure 't is something more: 't is heaven direct, and statagems inspire, beyond the short extent of human thought.—William Somerville.

He is not a reasonable man who by chance stumbles upon reason, but he who derives it from knowledge, from discernment, and from taste.—Rochefoucauld.

Let us not dream that reason can ever be popular. Passions, emotions, may be made popular; but reason remains ever the property of an elect few.—Goethe.

The authority of reason is far more imperious than that of a master; for he who disobeys the one is unhappy, but he who disobeys the other is a fool.—Pascal.

He that speaketh against his own reason speaks against his own conscience, and therefore it is certain no man serves God with a good conscience who serves Him against his reason.—Jeremy Taylor.

Sure, He that made us with such large discourse,
Looking before and after, gave us not
That capability and god-like reason
To fust in us unus'd.
—Shakespeare.

The voice of reason is more to be regarded than the bent of any present inclination; since inclination will at length come over to reason, though we can never force reason to comply with inclination.—Addison.

In the matter of faith, we have the added weight of hope to that of reason in the convictions which we sustain relating to a future state.—Chapin.

Reason can no more influence the will, and operate as a motive, than the eyes which show a man his road can enable him to move from place to place, or that a ship provided with a compass can sail without a wind.—Whately.

Revelation may not need the help of reason, but man does, even when in possession of revelation. Reason may be described as the candle in the man's hand, to which revelation brings the necessary flame.—Simms.

Men do not often dare to avow, even to themselves, the slow progress reason has made in their minds; but they are ready to follow it if it is presented to them in a lively and striking manner, and forces them to recognize it.—Condorcet.

The way to subject all things to thyself is to subject thyself to reason; thou shalt govern many, if reason govern thee. Wouldst thou be crowned the monarch of a little world? command thyself.—Quarles.

Philosophers have done wisely when they have told us to cultivate our reason rather than our feelings, for reason reconciles us to the daily things of existence; our feelings teach us to yearn after the far, the difficult, the unseen.—Bulwer-Lytton.

He that takes away reason to make way for revelation puts out the light of both, and does much the same as if he would persuade a man to put out his eyes, the better to receive the remote light of an invisible star by a telescope.—Locke.

I do not call reason that brutal reason which crushes with its weight what is holy and sacred, that malignant reason which delights in the errors it succeeds in discovering, that unfeeling and scornful reason which insults credulity.—Joubert.

Reason ought not, like vanity, to adorn herself with ancient parchments, and the display of a genealogical tree; more dignified in her proceedings, and proud of her immortal nature, she ought to derive everything from herself.—Mme. Necker.

Some persons there are who intellectually are reasonable enough, but whose life is quite irrational; and there are, on the other hand, those whose life is rational, and whose minds are devoid of reason.—Joubert.

The thread and train of consequences in intellectual ratiocination is often long, and chained together by divers links, which cannot be done in imaginative ratiocination, by some attributed to brutes.—Sir M. Hale.

All reason is retrospect; it consists in the application of facts and principles previously known. This will show the very great importance of knowledge, especially that kind which is called experience.—John Foster.

Thought
Precedes the will to think, and error lives
Ere reason can be born. Reason, the power To guess at right and wrong, the twinkling lamp
Of wand'ring life, that winks and wakes by turns
Fooling the follower 'twixt shade and shining.
—Congreve.

But all was false and hollow; though his tongue
Dropt manna, and could make the worse appear
The better reason, to perplex and dash Maturest counsels.
—Milton.

He that follows the advice of reason has a mind that is elevated above the reach of injury; that sits above the clouds, in a calm and quiet ether, and with a brave indifferency hears the rolling thunders grumble and burst under his feet.—Walter Scott.

When my reason is afloat, my faith cannot long remain in suspense, and I believe in God as firmly as in any other truth whatever; in short, a thousand motives draw me to the consolatory side, and add the weight of hope to the equilibrium of reason.—Rousseau.

How often do we contradict the right rules of reason in the whole course of our lives! Reason itself is true and just, but the reason of every particular man is weak and wavering, perpetually swayed and turned by his interests, his passions, and his vices.—Swift.

We are afraid to put men to live and trade each on his own private stock of reason; because we suspect that this stock in each man is small, and that the individuals would do better to avail themselves of the general bank and capital of nations and of ages.—Burke.

'Tis reason's part
To govern and to guard the heart;
To lull the wayward soul to rest;
When hopes and fears distract the breast;
Reason may calm this doubtful strife,
And steer thy bark through various life.
—Cotton.

Those who follow the banners of Reason are like the well-disciplined battalions which, wearing a more sober uniform and making a less dazzling show than the light troops commanded by Imagination, enjoy more safety, and even more honor, in the conflicts of human life.—Sir Walter Scott.

Two angels guide
The path of man, both aged and yet young,
As angels are, ripening through endless years,
On one he leans; some call her Memory,
And some Tradition; and her voice is sweet,
With deep mysterious accords; the other,
Floating above, holds down a lamp which streams
A light divine and searching on the earth, Compelling eyes and footsteps. Memory yields,
Yet clings with loving check, and shines anew,
Reflecting all the rays of that bright lamp
Our angel Reason holds. We had not walked But for Tradition; we walk evermore
To higher paths by brightening Reason's lamp.
—George Eliot.

Reason was given to curb our headstrong will,
And yet but shows a weak physician's skill;
Gives nothing while the raging fit doth last,
But stays to cure it when the worst is past;
Reason's a staff for age, when nature's gone,
But youth is strong enough to walk alone.
—Dryden.

No doubt the testimony of natural reason, on whatever exercised, must, of necessity, stop short of those truths which it is the object of revelation to make known; still it places the existence and personal attributes of the Deity on such grounds as to render doubts absurd and atheism ridiculous.

—Sir John Herschel.

Accurate and just reasoning is the only catholic remedy, fitted for all persons and all dispositions; and is alone able to subvert that abstruse philosophy and metaphysical jargon, which, being mixed up with popular superstition, renders it in a manner impenetrable to careless reasoners, and gives it the air of science and wisdom.—Hume.

Rebellion

Unthread the rude eye of rebellion.
—Shakespeare.

Quell rebellion before it spreads.—Vespasian.

Rebellion to tyrants is obedience to God.—Anonymous.

The most seditious is the most cowardly.—Tacitus.

This word, "rebellion," it had froze them up, as fish are in a pond.—Shakespeare.

The rude rabble are enraged; now firebrands and stones fly.—Virgil.

I hate every violent overthrow, because as much is destroyed as is gained by it.—Goethe.

To resist violence is implanted in the nature of man.—Tacitus.

When all other rights are taken away, the right of rebellion is made perfect.—Thomas Paine.

Now let it work: Mischief, thou art afoot, Take thou what course thou wilt!
—Shakespeare.

The hearts
Of all his people shall revolt from him,
And kiss the lips of unacquainted change.
—Shakespeare.

There is little hope of equity where rebellion reigns.—Sir P. Sidney.

Men seldom, or rather never for a length of time and deliberately, rebel against anything that does not deserve rebelling against.—Carlyle.

Contention, like a horse
Full of high feeding, madly hath broke loose,
And bears down all before him.
—Shakespeare.

The worst of rebels never arm
To do their king or country harm,
But draw their swords to do them good,
As doctors cure by letting blood.
—Butler.

Reciprocity

Life cannot subsist in society but by reciprocal concessions.—Johnson.

Half the misery of human life might be extinguished, would men alleviate the general curse they lie under, by mutual offices of compassion, benevolence, and humanity.—Addison.

Recklessness

Who falls from all he knows of bliss,
Cares little into what abyss. —Byron.

I am one, my liege,
Whom the vile blows and buffets of the world
Have so incens'd that I am reckless what I do to spite the world. —Shakespeare.

Reckoning

I am ill at reckoning; it fits the spirit of a tapster.—Shakespeare.

Ruminates like an hostess that hath no arithmetic but her brain to set down her reckoning.—Shakespeare.

So comes a reck'ning when the banquet's o'er,
The dreadful reck'ning, and men smile no more.
—Gay.

Reconciliation

Forget, forgive; conclude, and be agreed.—Shakespeare.

Let not the sun go down upon your wrath!—Bible.

God pardons like a mother who kisses the offence into everlasting forgetfulness.—Beecher.

How many a knot of mystery and misunderstanding would be untied by one word spoken in simple and confident truth of heart! How many a solitary place would be made glad if love were there, and how many a dark dwelling would be filled with light!—Dewey.

Every relation to mankind, of hate or scorn or neglect, is full of vexation and torment.—Dewey.

If you bethink yourself of any crime, unreconciled as yet to heaven and grace, solicit for it straight.—Shakespeare.

It is more easy to forgive the weak who have injured us than the powerful whom we have injured.—Colton.

It is much safer to reconcile an enemy than to conquer him; victory may deprive him of his poison, but reconciliation of his will.—Feltham.

Never can true reconciliation grow,
Where wounds of deadly hate have pierc'd so deep.
—Milton.

Oh, my dear friends,—you who are letting miserable misunderstandings run on from year to year, meaning to clear them up some day,—if you only could know and see and feel that the time is short, how it would break the spell! How you would go instantly and do the thing which you might never have another chance to do!—Phillips Brooks.

To be a finite being is no crime, and to be the Infinite is not to be a creditor. As man was not consulted he does not find himself a party in a bargain, but a child in the household of love. Reconciliation, therefore, is not the consequence of paying a debt, or procuring atonement for an injury, but an organic process of the human life.—John Weiss.

Wherein is it possible for us, wicked and impious creatures, to be justified, except in the only Son of God? O sweet reconciliation! O untraceable ministry! O unlooked-for blessing! that the wickedness of many should be hidden in one godly and righteous man, and the righteousness of one justify a host of sinners!—Justin Martyr.

As thro' the land at eve we went,
And pluck'd the ripen'd ears,
We fell out, my wife and I,
We fell out I know not why,
And kiss'd again with tears.

And blessings on the falling out
That all the more endears,
When we fall out with those we love
And kiss again with tears!

For when we came where lies the child
We lost in other years,
There above the little grave,
Oh, there above the little grave,
We kiss'd again with tears.

—Tennyson.

Recreation

He that will make a good use of any part of his life must allow a large portion of it to recreation.—Locke.

Amusements to virtue are like breezes of air to the flame—gentle ones will fan it, but strong ones will put it out.—David Thomas.

For the bow cannot possibly stand always bent, nor can human nature or human frailty subsist without some lawful recreation.—Cervantes.

Recreation is intended to the mind as whetting is to the scythe, to sharpen the edge of it, which otherwise would grow dull and blunt,—as good no scythe as no edge.—Bishop Hall.

Sweet recreation barred, what doth ensue but moody and dull melancholy, kinsman to grim and comfortless despair; and at their heels, a huge infectious troop of pale distemperatures and foes to life.—Shakespeare.

Men cannot labor on always. They must have intervals of relaxation. They cannot sleep through these intervals. What are they to do? Why, if they do not work or sleep, they must have recreation. And if they have not recreation from healthful sources, they will be very likely to take it from the poisoned fountains of intemperance. Or, if they have pleasures, which, though innocent, are forbidden by the maxims of public morality, their very pleasures are liable to become poisoned fountains.—Orville Dewey.

Redemption

Condemned into everlasting redemption for this.—Shakespeare.

Welcome the hour that may put me where a man cannot take a dollar in exchange for a soul!—John Weiss.

Underneath all the arches of Scripture history, throughout the whole grand temple of the Scriptures, these two voices ever echo; man is ruined, man is redeemed.—C. D. Foss.

O, if there be any kind of life most sad, and deepest in the scale of pity, it is the dry, cold impotence of one, who has honestly set to the work of his own self-redemption.—Horace Bushnell.

We are made partakers of the redemption purchased by Christ, by the effectual application of it to us by His Holy Spirit.—Westminster Catechism.

Christ is redemption only as He actually redeems and delivers our nature from sin. If He is not the law and spring of a new spirit of life, He is nothing. "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God,"—as many, no more.—Horace Bushnell.

And on his brest a bloodie crosse he bore,
The deare remembrance of His dying Lord,
For whose sweete sake that glorious badge
He wore. —Spenser.

Why, all the souls that are were forfeit once;
And He that might the vantage best have took Found out the remedy. —Shakespeare.

Look, therefore, which way we will, whether at the direct Scriptural statements of death as the penalty of sin, or at the agony of the cross as a means of rescue, or at the joy of the angels of God over a rescue; we see from either that it must be a work of infinite and eternal consequence—the work of redemption.—Herrick Johnson.

Is it not an amazing thing, that men shall attempt to investigate the mystery of the redemption, when, at the same time that it is propounded to us as an article of faith solely, we are told that "the very angels have desired to pry into it in vain"?—Sterne.

And now without redemption all mankind Must have been lost, adjudged to death and hell
By doom severe. —Milton.

By Christ's purchasing redemption, two things are intended, His satisfaction and His merit. All is done by the price that Christ lays down, which does two things: it pays our debt, and so it satisfies; by its intrinsic value, and by the agreement between the Father and the Son it procures our title, and so it merits. The satisfaction of Christ is to free us from misery, and the merit of Christ is to purchase happiness for us.—Jonathan Edwards.

Say, heavenly pow'rs, where shall we find such love?
Which of ye will be mortal to redeem Man's mortal crime, and just th' unjust to save? —Milton.

Upon the present theological computation, ten souls must be lost for one that is saved. At which rate of reckoning, heaven can raise but its cohorts while hell commands its legions. From which sad account it would appear, that, though our Saviour had conquered death by the resurrection, he had not yet been able to overcome sin by the redemption.—Sterne.

As God carries on the work of converting the souls of fallen men through all ages, so He goes on to justify them, to blot out all their sins, and to accept them as righteous in His sight through the righteousness of Christ. He goes on to adopt and receive them from being the children of Satan to be His own children, to carry on the work of His grace which He has begun in them, to comfort them with the consolations of His Spirit, and to bestow upon them, when their bodies die, that eternal glory which is the fruit of Christ's purchase.—Jonathan Edwards.

Refinement

To refine and polish is a part of our work in this world.—J. T. Headley.

Refinement is superior to beauty.—Lascaris.

Too great refinement is false delicacy.—Rochefoucauld.

A woman must be truly refined to incite chivalry in the heart of a man.—Mme. Necker.

Refinement that carries us away from our fellow-men is not God's refinement.—Beecher.

It is in refinement and elegance that the civilized man differs from the savage.—Dr. Johnson.

Refinement is the delicate aroma of Christianity.—Charlotte M. Yonge.

That only can with propriety be styled refinement which, by strengthening the intellect, purifies the manners.—Coleridge.

That alone can be called true refinement which elevates the soul of man, purifying the manners by improving the intellect.—Hosea Ballou.

Refinement is just as much a Christian grace in a man as in a woman; but he is not such a hateful, unsexed creature without it as a woman is.—Charlotte M. Yonge.

Among all the accomplishments of life none are so important as refinement; it is not, like beauty, a gift of Nature, and can only be acquired by cultivation and practice.—James Ellis.

The expressive word "quiet" defines the dress, manners, bow, and even physiognomy of every true denizen of St. James and Bond street.—N. P. Willis.

True delicacy, as true generosity, is more wounded by an offence from itself—if I may be allowed the expression—than to itself.—Greville.

Far better, and more cheerfully, I could dispense with some part of the downright necessities of life, than with certain circumstances of elegance and propriety in the daily habits of using them.—De Quincy.

Refinement creates beauty everywhere. It is the grossness of the spectator that discovers anything like grossness in the object.—Hazlitt.

Refinement is the lifting of one's self upwards from the merely sensual; the effort of the soul to etherealize the common wants and uses of life.—Beecher.

If refined sense, and exalted sense, be not so useful as common sense, their rarity, their novelty, and the nobleness of their objects, make some compensation, and render them the admiration of mankind.—Hume.

Ages of ignorance and simplicity are thought to be ages of purity. But the direct contrary I believe to be the case. Rude periods have that grossness of manners, which is as unfriendly to virtue as luxury itself. Men are less ashamed as they are less polished.—Warton.

No improvement that takes place in either sex can possibly be confined to itself. Each is a universal mirror to each, and the respective refinement of the one will always be in reciprocal proportion to the polish of the other.—Colton.

Reflection

Think on thy sins.—Shakespeare.

But with the morning cool reflections came.—Scott.

The learn'd reflect on what before they knew.—Pope.

There is one art of which man should be master,—the art of reflection.—Coleridge.

A soul without reflection, like a pile
Without inhabitants, to ruin runs.

—Young.

They only babble who practice not reflection,

I shall think—and thought is silence.

—Sheridan.

Reflection makes men cowards. There is no object that can be put in competition with life, unless it is viewed through the medium of passion, and we are hurried away by the impulse of the moment.—Hazlitt.

Whoever thinks a faultless piece to see,
Thinks what ne'er was, nor is, nor ne'er shall be. —Pope.

The custom of frequent reflection will keep their minds from running adrift, and call their thoughts home from useless unattentive roving.—Locke.

Reflection is a flower of the mind, giving out wholesome fragrance; but revery is the same flower, when rank and running to seed.—Tupper.

The advice of a scholar, whose piles of learning were set on fire by imagination, is never to be forgotten. Proportion an hour's reflection to an hour's reading, and so dispirit the book into the student.—Willmott.

The solitary side of our nature demands leisure for reflection upon subjects on which the dash and whirl of daily business, so long as its clouds rise thick about us, forbid the intellect to fasten itself.—Froude.

When I look upon the tombs of the great, every motion of envy dies; when I read the epitaphs of the beautiful, every inordinate desire forsake me; when I meet with the grief of parents upon a tombstone, my heart melts with compassion; when I see the tombs of the parents themselves, I reflect how vain it is to grieve for those whom we must quickly follow; when I see kings lying beside those who deposed them, when I behold rival wits placed side by side, or the holy men who divided the world with their contests and disputes, I reflect with sorrow and astonishment on the frivolous competitions, factions, and debates of mankind.—Addison.

Reformation

He who reforms, God assists.—Cervantes.

Reform, like charity, must begin at home.—Carlyle.

Force is no remedy.—John Bright

Each year one vicious habit rooted out, in time might make the worst man good.—Franklin.

Sin, that amends, is but patched with virtue.—Shakespeare.

The oyster-women lock'd their fish up,
And trudged away to cry, No Bishop.
—Butler.

Whatever you dislike in another person take care to correct in yourself.—Sprat.

Many hope that the tree will be felled who hope to gather chips by the fall.—Fuller.

My desolation does begin to make
A better life. —Shakespeare.

All zeal for a reform, that gives offence
To peace and charity, is mere pretence.
—Cowper.

But 'tis the talent of our English nation,
Still to be plotting some new reformation.
—Dryden.

Bad men excuse their faults; good men will leave them.—Ben Jonson.

Long is the way and hard, that out of hell leads up to light.—Milton.

The best reformers the world has ever seen are those who have commenced on themselves.—H. W. Shaw.

Necessity reforms the poor, and satiety reforms the rich.—Tacitus.

He who reforms himself has done more toward reforming the public than a crowd of noisy, impotent patriots.—Lavater.

It is easier to enrich ourselves with a thousand virtues than to correct ourselves of a single fault.—Bruyère.

Public reformers had need first practice on their own hearts that which they purpose to try on others.—Charles I.

I'll have no more beggars. Fools shall have wealth, and the learned shall live by his wits. I'll have no more bankrupts.—Geo. Chapman.

Time yet serves, wherein you may redeem your tarnished honors, and restore yourselves into the good thoughts of the world again.—Shakespeare.

Attempts at reform, when they fail, strengthen despotism; as he that struggles, tightens those cords he does not succeed in breaking.—Colton.

Reform is a work of time; a national taste, however wrong it may be, cannot be totally changed at once.—Sir J. Reynolds.

Conscious remorse and anguish must be felt, to curb desire, to break the stubborn will, and work a second nature in the soul.—Rowe.

It is my great desire to reform my subjects, and yet I am ashamed to confess that I am unable to reform myself.—Peter the Great.

They say, best men are moulded out of faults, and, for the most, become much more the better for being a little bad!—Shakespeare.

In regard of our deliverance past, and our danger present and to come, let us look up to God, and every man reform his own ways.—Bacon.

Men and nations can only be reformed in their youth; they become incorrigible as they grow old.—Rousseau.

Like bright metal on a sullen ground, my reformation, glittering over my fault, shall show more goodly and attract more eyes than that which hath no foil to set it off.—Shakespeare.

Charles Fox said that restorations were the most bloody of all revolutions; and he might have added that reformations are the best mode of preventing the necessity of either.—Colton.

What lasting progress was ever made in social reformation, except when every step was insured by appeals to the understanding and the will?—Wm. Matthews.

The discontent with the existing order of things pervaded the atmosphere, wherever the conditions were favorable, long before Columbus, seeking the back door of Asia, found himself knocking at the front door of America.—Lowell.

We are reformers in spring and summer; in autumn and winter we stand by the old,—reformers in the morning, conservatives at night. Reform is affirmative, conservatism is negative; conservatism goes for comfort, reform for truth.—Emerson.

He that has energy enough in his constitution to root out a vice should go a little further, and try to plant a virtue in its place; otherwise he will have his labor to renew. A strong soil that has produced weeds may be made to produce wheat with far less difficulty than it would cost to make it produce nothing.—Colton.

Reform, like charity, must begin at home. Once well at home, how will it radiate outwards, irrepressible, into all that we touch and handle, speak and work,—kindling ever new light by incalculable contagion; spreading, in geometric ratio, far and wide; doing good only, wherever it spreads, and not evil.—Carlyle.

He bought a Bible of the new translation, And in his life he show'd great reformation;

He walk'd mannerly and talk'd meekly; He heard three lectures and two sermons weekly;

He vow'd to shun all companions unruly, And in his speech he used no oath but "truly,"

And zealously to keep the Sabbath's rest.

—Sir John Harrington.

Reform is a good replete with paradox; it is a cathartic which our political quacks, like our medical, recommend to others, but will not take themselves; it is admired by all who cannot effect it, and abused by all who can; it is thought pregnant with danger, for all time that is present, but would have been extremely profitable for that which is past, and will be highly salutary for that which is to come.—Colton.

Regeneration

Regeneration is, we know, instantaneous; but the steps that lead to it are often very gradual; and none of them, so far as we can see, can be spared.—T. W. Chambers.

Embrace in one act the two truths—thine own sin, and God's infinite mercy in Jesus Christ.—Alexander Maclaren.

Creed, or the belief in a certain amount of doctrine, has made Christendom, but never made a Christian. "Ye must be born again."—W. P. Mackay.

Regeneration is the beginning of holiness in the soul, and admits of no progression; sanctification is carried on progressively in the heart of the renewed, and will be continued until it is completed in the concluding moment of life.—Charles Backus.

Do you think that a man is renewed by God's Spirit, when except for a few religious phrases, and a little more outside respectability, he is just the old man, the same character at heart he ever was?—Charles Kingsley.

One has said that Christ excelled all other moralists in this, that He puts the padlock not upon the hand, but upon the heart. But He does not use the padlock at all, He renders such a thing unnecessary. He takes the tiger from the heart, and replaces it with the lamb.—Edward Thomson.

The regeneration of a sinner is an evidence of power in the highest sphere—moral nature; with the highest prerogative—to change nature; and operating to the highest result—not to create originally, which is great; but to create anew, which is greater.—William Arthur.

While the agent of renovation is the Divine Spirit, and the condition of renovation is our cleaving to Christ, the medium of renovation and the weapon which the transforming grace employs is "the word of the truth of the gospel," whereby we are sanctified.—Alexander Maclaren.

He that is once "born of God shall overcome the world," and the prince of this world too, by the power of God in him. Holiness is no solitary, neglected thing; it hath stronger confederacies, greater alliances, than sin and wickedness. It is in league with God and the universe; the whole creation smiles upon it; there is something of God in it, and therefore it must needs be a victorious and triumphant thing.—Cudworth.

Content not thyself with a bare forbearance of sin, so long as thy heart is not changed, nor thy will changed, nor thy affections changed; but strive to become a new man, to be transformed by the renewing of thy mind, to hate sin, to love God, to wrestle against thy secret corruptions, to take delight in holy duties, to subdue thine understanding, and will, and affections, to the obedience of faith and godliness.—Bp. Sanderson.

Regeneration is the ransacking of the soul, the turning of a man out of himself, the crumbling to pieces of the old man, and the new moulding of it into another shape; it is the turning of stones into children, and a drawing of the lively portraiture of Jesus Christ upon that very table that before represented only the very image of the devil. * * * Art thou thus changed? Are all old things done away, and all things in thee become new? Hast thou a new heart and renewed affections? And dost thou serve God in newness of life and conversation? If not,—what hast thou to do with hopes of heaven? Thou art yet without Christ, and so consequently without hope.—Bishop Hopkins.

Regret

It is folly to shiver over last year's snow.—Whately.

Regrets over the past should chasten the future.—James Ellis.

Something will be gathered from the tablets of the most faultless day for regrets.—Mrs. Sigourney.

Hopes and regrets are the sweetest links of existence.—L. E. Landon.

There is an aching that is worse than any pain.—George MacDonald.

Let us not burthen our remembrance with a heaviness that's gone.—Shakespeare.

One of the sweetest pleasures of a woman is to cause regret.—Gavarni.

For of all sad words of tongue or pen,
The saddest are these: "It might have been!" —Whittier.

Thou wilt lament
Hereafter, when the evil shall be done
And shall admit no cure. —Homer.

Keen were his pangs, but keener far to feel,
He nursed the pinion, which impell'd the steel. —Byron.

Could not all this flesh keep in a little life? Poor Jack, farewell! I could have better spared a better man.—Shakespeare.

We often regret we did not do otherwise, when that very otherwise would, in all probability, have done for us.—Colton.

For who, alas! has lived,
Nor in the watches of the night recalled Words he has wished unsaid and deeds undone. —Samuel Rogers.

O lost days of delight, that are wasted in doubting and waiting!
O lost hours and days in which we might have been happy! —Longfellow.

Why is it that a blessing only when it is lost cuts as deep into the heart as a sharp diamond? Why must we first weep before we can love so deeply that our hearts ache?—Richter.

A wrong act followed by just regret and thoughtful caution to avoid like errors, makes a man better than he would have been if he had never fallen.—Horatio Seymour.

The present only is a man's possession; the past is gone out of his hand wholly, irrevocably. He may suffer from it, learn from it,—in degree, perhaps, expiate it; but to brood over it is utter madness.—Miss Mulock.

The business of life is to go forward; he who sees evil in prospect meets it in his way, and he who catches it by retrospection turns back to find it. That which is feared may sometimes be avoided, but that which is regretted to-day may be regretted again to-morrow.—Dr. Johnson.

A feeling of sadness and longing
That is not akin to pain,
And resembles sorrow only
As the mist resembles the rain.
—Longfellow.

Dear as remembered kisses after death,
And sweet as those by hopeless fancy feigned
On lips that are for others; deep as love,
Deep as first love; and wild with all regret;
O death in life! the days that are no more.
—Tennyson.

When I remember something which I had,
But which is gone, and I must do without,
I sometimes wonder how I can be glad,
Even in cowslip time when hedges sprout;
It makes me sigh to think on it,—but yet
My days will not be better days, should I forget.
—Jean Ingelow.

Religion

The source of all good and of all comfort.—Burke.

Religion is life essential.—George MacDonald.

Religion, richest favor of the skies.
—Cowper.

Religion is the pious worship of God.—Cicero.

A religious life is a struggle, and not a hymn.—Mme de Staël.

Restore to God His due in tithe and time.—George Herbert.

Religion is civilization, the highest.
—Earl of Beaconsfield.

The best religion is the most tolerant.—Mme. de Girardin.

Religion to be permanently influential must be intelligent.—E. L. Magoon.

Sacred religion! Mother of Form and Fear!—Sam'l Daniel.

Religion implies revelation.—Roswell D. Hitchcock.

To be of no Church is dangerous.—Sam'l Johnson.

Religion is not a dogma, nor an emotion, but a service.—Roswell D. Hitchcock.

Religion is the best armor in the world, but the worst cloak.—Bunyan.

We are religious by nature.—Charles H. Parkhurst.

Religion gives a dignity to distress.
—James Hervey.

A man has no more religion than he acts out in his life.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Religion without joy,—it is no religion.—Theodore Parker.

Religion is using everything for God.—Henry Ward Beecher.

No religion but blasphemes a little.
—Victor Hugo.

Religion is no more national than conscience.—Mirabeau.

I am sorry to see how small a piece of religion will make a cloak.—Sir William Waller.

A man devoid of religion, is like a horse without a bridle.—From the Latin.

Never trust anybody not of sound religion, for he that is false to God can never be true to man.—Lord Burleigh.

All true religion must stand on true morality.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Let us think less of men and more of God.—Bailey.

Religion crowns the statesman and the man,
Sole source of public and of private peace.—Young.

Religion, if in heavenly truths attired,
Needs only to be seen to be admired.—Cowper.

Nothing but religion is capable of changing pains into pleasures.—Stanislaus.

He wears his faith but as the fashion of His hat; it ever changes with the next block.—Shakespeare.

Religion is not in want of art; it rests on its own majesty.—Goethe.

Nowhere would there be consolation, if religion were not.—Jacobi.

The religion of one age is the literary entertainment of the next.—Emerson.

The greatest vicissitude of things amongst men, is the vicissitude of sects and religions.—Bacon.

It [Calvanism] established a religion without a prelate, a government without a king.—George Bancroft.

Persecution is a bad and indirect way to plant religion.—Sir Thomas Browne.

Religion does not censure or exclude Unnumbered pleasures, harmlessly pursued.—Cowper.

An Atheist's laugh's a poor exchange
For Deity offended! —Burns.

Religion stands on tiptoe in our land,
Ready to pass to the American strand.—Herbert.

If we make religion our business,
God will make it our blessedness.—H. G. J. Adam.

Systems of faith are different, but God is one.—Vemana.

Obedience is a part of religion, and an element of peace.—Sewell.

If men are so wicked with religion, what would they be without it?—Franklin.

Measure not men by Sundays, without regarding what they do all the week after.—Fuller.

Religion must always be a crab fruit; it cannot be grafted, and keep its wild beauty.—Emerson.

A house without family worship has neither foundation nor covering.—Mason.

Religion is fire which example keeps alive, and which goes out if not communicated.—Joubert.

Religion should be the rule of life, not a casual incident of it.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

Nothing can be hostile to religion which is agreeable to justice.—Gladstone.

Religion is the only metaphysic that the multitude can understand and adopt.—Joubert.

Where religion is a trade, morality is a merchandise.—H. W. Shaw.

When religion doth with virtue join,
it makes a hero like an angel shine.—Waller.

The dispute about religion, and the practice of it, seldom go together.—Young.

There lives more faith in honest doubt,
Believe me, than in half the creeds.—Tennyson.

Not he who scorns the Saviour's yoke
Should wear His cross upon the heart.—Schiller.

As if Religion were intended
For nothing else but to be mended.—Butler.

It is religion that has formed the Bible, and not the Bible which has formed religion.—Raphael D' C. Levin.

I am of the religion of all those who are brave and good.—Henry IV.

Nothing can inspire religious duty or animation but religion.—Lord Cockburn.

He whom God chooseth, out of doubt doth well:
What they that choose their God do, who can tell? —Lord Brooke.

Religion is only in the service of the people; it is not in the rosary and the prayer-carpet.—Saadi.

There is nothing solid and substantial in this world but religious ideas.—Royer-Collard.

Difference of religion breeds more quarrels than difference of politics.—Wendell Phillips.

What a solace Christianity must be to one who has an undoubted conviction of its truth!—Napoleon I.

We may as well tolerate all religions, since God Himself tolerates all.—Fénelon.

Be sure that religion cannot be right that a man is the worse for having.—William Penn.

Thicken your religion a little. It is evaporating altogether by being subtilized.—Mme. de Sévigné.

When kings interfere in matters of religion, they enslave instead of protecting it.—Fénelon.

Religion is the hospital of the souls that the world has wounded.—J. Petit-Senn.

In religion, as in friendship, they who profess most are ever the least sincere.—Sheridan.

Which is more misshapen,—religion without virtue, or virtue without religion?—Joubert.

Religion, blushing, veils her sacred fires,
And unawares Morality expires. —Pope.

Place not thy amendment only in increasing thy devotion, but in bettering thy life.—Thomas Fuller.

The Puritan did not stop to think; he recognized God in his soul, and acted.—Wendell Phillips.

For virtue's self may too much zeal be had;
The worst of madmen is a saint run mad. —Pope.

Genuine religion is matter of feeling rather than matter of opinion.—Bo-vee.

Religion converts despair, which destroys, into resignation, which submits.—Lady Blessington.

The religions of the world are the ejaculations of a few imaginative men.—Emerson.

Educate men without religion, and you make them but clever devils.—Duke of Wellington.

Religion intrinches upon some of our privileges, invades none of our pleasures.—South.

Every religion is good that teaches man to be good.—Thomas Paine.

The rigid saint, by whom no mercy's shown
To saints whose lives are better than his own. —Churchill.

His religion at best is an anxious wish,—like that of Rabelais, a great Perhaps.—Carlyle.

Religion is the fruit of the Spirit, a Christian character, a true life.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Religion contracts the circle of our pleasures, but leaves it wide enough for her votaries to expatiate in.—Addison.

The religious instinct will never be replaced by law or even philanthropy.—Hugh R. Haweis.

Some persons, instead of making a religion for their God, are content to make a god of their religion.—Sir Arthur Helps.

There was never law, or sect, or opinion did so magnify goodness as the Christian religion doth.—Bacon

The ground of all religion, that which makes it possible, is the relation in which the human soul stands to God.—J. C. Shairp.

To judge religion we must have it—not stare at it from the bottom of a seemingly interminable ladder.—George MacDonald.

Religion is the basis of civil society, and the source of all good and of all comfort.—Burke.

Religion, in one sense, is a life of self-denial, just as husbandry, in one sense, is a work of death.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Religion and liberty are inseparable. Religion is voluntary, and cannot and ought not to be forced.—Philip Schaff.

Men will wrangle for religion; write for it; fight for it; die for it; anything but live for it.—Colton.

Human things must be known to be loved; but Divine things must be loved to be known.—Pascal.

A man who feels that his religion is a slavery has not begun to comprehend the real nature of religion.—J. G. Holland.

Of all joyful, smiling, ever-laughing experiences, there are none like those which spring from true religion.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Religion is the tie that connects man with his Creator, and holds him to His throne.—Daniel Webster.

Religion is such a belief of the Bible as maintains a living influence on the heart.—Richard Cecil.

By religion I mean perfected manhood,—the quickening of the soul by the influence of the Divine Spirit.—H. W. Beecher.

The body of all true religion consists, to be sure, in obedience to the will of the Sovereign of the world, in a confidence in His declarations, and in imitation of His perfections.—Burke.

It is well said, in every sense, that a man's religion is the chief fact with regard to him.—Carlyle.

Sacrifice is the first element of religion, and resolves itself in theological language into the love of God.—Froude.

The language of religion can alone suit every situation and every mode of feeling.—Mme. de Staël.

The true office of religion is to bring out the whole nature of man in harmonious activity.—W. E. Channing.

The secret of a man's nature lies in his religion, in what he really believes about this world and his own place in it.—Froude.

All the sobriety which religion needs or requires is that which real earnestness produces.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Ah! what a divine religion might be found out if charity were really made the principle of it instead of faith!—Shelley.

Nothing exposes religion more to the reproach of its enemies than the worldliness and hard-heartedness of the professors of it.—Matthew Henry.

Religion is neither a theology nor a theosophy; it is more than that, it is a discipline, a law, a yoke, an indissoluble engagement.—Joubert.

The flower of youth never appears more beautiful than when it bends towards the Sun of Righteousness.—Matthew Henry.

The main object of the gospel is to establish two principles,—the corruption of nature, and the redemption by Christ Jesus.—Pascal.

A man's religion is himself. If he is right-minded toward God, he is religious; if the Lord Jesus Christ is his schoolmaster, then he is Christianly religious.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Things divine are not attainable by mortals who understand sensual things.—Zoroaster.

True religion and virtue give a cheerful and happy turn to the mind, admit of all true pleasures, and even procure for us the highest.—Addison.

It is not the church we want, but the sacrifice; not the emotion of admiration, but the act of adoration; not the gift, but the giving.—Ruskin.

Take away God and religion, and men live to no purpose, without proposing any worthy end of life to themselves.—Tillotson.

It is not the business of religion in these days to isolate herself from the world like John the Baptist. She must go down into the world like Jesus Christ.—Hugh R. Haweis.

Religion must be loved as a kind of country and nursing-mother. It was religion that nourished our virtues, that showed us heaven, that taught us to walk in the path of duty.—Joubert.

An everlasting lodestar, that beams the brighter in the heavens the darker here on earth grows the night.—Carlyle.

The religions we call false were once true. They also were affirmations of the conscience correcting the evil customs of their times.—Emerson.

Religion is the eldest sister of Philosophy; on whatever subjects they may differ, it is unbecoming in either to quarrel, and most so about their inheritance.—Landor.

Religion is, in its essence, the most gentlemanly thing in the world. It will alone gentlize, if unmixed with cant; and I know nothing else that will, alone.—Coleridge.

True religion is the foundation of society. When that is once shaken by contempt, the whole fabric cannot be stable nor lasting.—Burke.

I believe in religion against the religious; in the pitifulness of orisons, and in the sublimity of prayer.—Victor Hugo.

Religion finds the love of happiness and principle of duty separated in us and its mission is to unite them.

Mystery, such as is given of God, is beyond the power of human penetration, yet not in opposition to it.—Mme. de Staël.

Unless we place our religion and our treasure in the same thing, religion will always be sacrificed.—Epictetus.

Religion is life, philosophy is thought; religion looks up, friendship looks in. We need both thought and life, and we need that the two shall be in harmony.—James Freeman Clarke.

None but God can satisfy the longings of the immortal soul; that as the heart was made for Him, so He only can fill it.—Trench.

Sincerity is the indispensable ground of all conscientiousness, and by consequence of all heartfelt religion.—Kant.

He who thinks to save anything by his religion, besides his soul, will be a loser in the end.—Bishop Barlow.

The writers against religion, whilst they oppose every system, are wisely careful never to set up any of their own.—Burke.

A man in whom religion is an inspiration, who has surrendered his being to its power, who drinks it, breathes it, bathes in it, cannot speak otherwise than religiously.—J. G. Holland.

It has been said that true religion will make a man a more thorough gentleman than all the courts of Europe.—Charles Kingsley.

The religion of Christ is peace and good-will,—the religion of Christendom is war and ill-will.—Landor.

Where true religion has prevented one crime, false religions have afforded a pretext for a thousand.—Colton.

The Word of God proves the truth of religion; the corruption of man, its necessity; government, its advantages.—Stanislaus.

High on the world, see where religion stands

And bears the open volume in her hands. —W. Holmes.

All who have been great and good without Christianity, would have been much greater and better with it.—Colton.

"Drink deep or taste not," is a direction fully as applicable to religion, if we would find it a source of pleasure, as it is to knowledge.—Wilberforce.

Religion finds the love of happiness and the principles of duty separated in us; and its mission, its masterpiece, is to reunite them.—Vinet.

It is a great disgrace to religion, to imagine that it is an enemy to mirth and cheerfulness, and a severe exactor of pensive looks and solemn faces.—Walter Scott.

Pure religion may generally be measured by the cheerfulness of its professors, and superstition by the gloom of its victims.—Chatfield.

Over all the movements of life religion scatters her favors, but reserves the choicest, her divine blessing, for the last hour.—Logan.

All belief which does not render more happy, more free, more loving, more active, more calm, is, I fear, an erroneous and superstitious belief.—Lavater.

Religion is the mortar that binds society together; the granite pedestal of liberty; the strong backbone of the social system.—Guthrie.

Religion consists not so much in joyous feelings as in a constant exercise of devotedness to God.—Stewart.

It is rare to see a rich man religious; for religion preaches restraint, and riches prompt to unlicensed freedom.—Feltham.

If there be not a religious element in the relations of men, such relations are miserable and doomed to ruin.—Carlyle.

The sum and substance of the preparation needed for a coming eternity is that you believe what the Bible tells you, and do what the Bible bids you.—Chalmers.

The body of all true religion consists, to be sure, in obedience to the will of the Sovereign of the world, in a confidence in His declarations, and an imitation of His perfections.—Edmund Burke.

Religion is faith in an infinite Creator, who delights in and enjoins that rectitude which conscience commands us to seek. This conviction gives a Divine sanction to duty.—W. E. Channing.

There is something in religion when rightly comprehended that is masculine and grand. It removes those little desires which are the constant hectic of a fool.—Richard Cecil.

Speak low to me, my Saviour, low and sweet,
From out the hallelujahs, sweet and low,
Lest I should fear and fall, and miss Thee
so
Who art not missed by any that entreat.
—E. B. Browning.

Wonderful! that the Christian religion, which seems to have no other object than the felicity of another life, should also constitute the happiness of this.—Montesquieu.

The only impregnable citadel of virtue is religion; for there is no bulwark of mere morality, which some temptation may not overtop or undermine, and destroy.—Jane Porter.

God is not dumb, that He should speak no more;
If thou hast wanderings in the wilderness
And find'st not Sinai, 'tis thy soul is poor.
—Lowell.

But our captain counts the image of God, nevertheless, His image—cut in ebony as if done in ivory; and in the blackest Moors he sees the representation of the King of heaven.—Fuller.

My principles in respect of religious interest are two,—one is, that the Church shall not meddle with politics, and the government shall not meddle with religion.—Kossuth.

Religion cannot change, though we do; and, if we do, we have left God; and whither he can go that goes from God, his own sorrows will soon enough instruct him.—Jeremy Taylor.

My Fathers and Brethren, this is never to be forgotten that New England is originally a plantation of religion, not a plantation of trade.—John Higginson.

Other hope had she none, nor wish in life,
but to follow
Meekly, with reverent steps, the sacred feet of her Saviour. —Longfellow.

Dresse and undresse thy soul; mark the decay
And growth of it; if, with thy watch, that too
Be down, then wind up both; since we shall be Most surely judged, make thy accounts agree. —Herbert.

We do ourselves wrong, and too meanly estimate the holiness above us, when we deem that any act or enjoyment good in itself, is not good to do religiously.—Nath. Hawthorne.

Puritanism, believing itself quick with the seed of religious liberty, laid, without knowing it, the egg of democracy.—Lowell.

The Cross!

There, and there only (though the deist rave,
And atheist, if Earth bears so base a slave);
There and there only, is the power to save.
—Cowper.

Near, so very near to God,
Nearer I cannot be;
For in the person of His Son
I am as near as he.
—Catesby Paget.

If we subject everything to reason, our religion will have nothing mysterious or supernatural. If we violate the principles of reason, our religion will be absurd and ridiculous.—Pascal.

The solitary monk who shook the world
From pagan slumber, when the gospel trump Thunder'd its challenge from his dauntless lips
In peals of truth.

—Robert Montgomery.

Our religious needs are our deepest needs. There is no peace till they are satisfied and contented. The attempt to stifle them is in vain. If their cry be drowned by the noise of the world, they do not cease to exist. They must be answered.—I. T. Hecker.

Religion is the answer to that cry of Reason which nothing can silence, that aspiration of the soul which no created thing can meet, that want of the heart which all creation cannot supply.—I. T. Hecker.

Too soon did the doctors of the church forget that the heart—the moral nature—was the beginning and the end, and that truth, knowledge, and insight were comprehended in its expansion.—S. T. Coleridge.

Religion is like the fashion. One man wears his doublet slashed, another laced, another plain; but every man has a doublet. So every man has his religion. We differ about trimming.—John Selden.

A religion that never suffices to govern a man, will never suffice to save him. That which does not distinguish him from a sinful world, will never distinguish him from a perishing world.—John Howe.

Religion is the fear of God, and its demonstration good works; and faith is the root of both: "For without faith we cannot please God;" nor can we fear what we do not believe.—William Penn.

When we take our last remove, I fear that we shall find that a great deal which we call religion, and which we were at the trouble of lugging about with us through our whole pilgrimage, is perfectly worthless, fit only to be burned.—Wm. Goodell.

The pleasure of the religious man is an easy and portable pleasure, such an one as he carries about in his bosom, without alarming either the eye or the envy of the world.—South.

Natural religion supplies still all the facts which are disguised under the dogma of popular creeds. The progress of religion is steadily to its identity with morals.—Emerson.

I have lived long enough to know what I did not at one time believe,—that no society can be upheld in happiness and honor without the sentiment of religion.—La Place.

Whether religion be true or false, it must be necessarily granted to be the only wise principle and safe hypothesis for a man to live and die by.—Tillotson.

There are three modes of bearing the ills of life; by indifference, which is the most common; by philosophy, which is the most ostentatious; and by religion, which is the most effectual.—Colton.

We cannot change the profound and restless tendencies of the age toward religious liberty. It is our business to guide and control their application.—Gladstone.

A true religious instinct never deprived man of one single joy; mournful faces and a sombre aspect are the conventional affectations of the weak-minded.—Hosea Ballou.

Leave the matter of religion to the family altar, the church, and the private school, supported entirely by private contributions; keep the Church and the State forever apart.—U. S. Grant.

There are a good many pious people who are as careful of their religion as of their best service of china, only using it on holy occasions, for fear it should get chipped or flawed in working-day wear.—Douglas Jerrold.

All the principles which religion teaches, and all the habits which it forms, are favorable to strength of mind. It will be found that whatever purifies fortifies also the heart.—Blair.

Too many people embrace religion from the same motives that they take a companion in wedlock, not from true love of the person, but because of a large dowry.—Hosea Ballou.

To have religion upon authority, and not upon conviction, is like a finger-watch, to be set forwards or backwards, as he pleases that has it in keeping.—William Penn.

To what excesses do men rush for the sake of religion, of whose truth they are so little persuaded, and to whose precepts they pay so little regard!—Bruyère.

Religion is, in fact, the dominion of the soul; it is the hope, the anchor of safety, the deliverance from evil. What a service has Christianity rendered to humanity!—Napoleon I.

Religion is indeed woman's panopoly; no one who wishes her happiness would divest her of it; no one who appreciates her virtues would weaken her best security.—Bartol.

Man without religion is a diseased creature, who would persuade himself he is well and needs not a physician; but woman without religion is raging and monstrous.—Lavater.

Religion, if it be true, is central truth; and all knowledge which is not gathered round it, and quickened and illuminated by it, is hardly worthy the name.—Channing.

It is the great beauty of true religion that it shall be universal, and a departure in any instance from universality is a corruption of religion itself.—Glanvill.

True religion teaches us to reverence what is under us, to recognize humility and poverty, and, despite mockery and disgrace, wretchedness, suffering, and death, as things divine.—Goethe.

You may discover tribes of men without policy, or laws, or cities, or any of the arts of life; but nowhere will you find them without some form of religion.—Blair.

I take possession of man's mind and deed,
I care not what the sects may brawl;
I sit as God, holding no form of creed,
But contemplating all. —Tennyson.

Without religion the highest endowments of intellect can only render the possessor more dangerous if he be ill disposed; if well disposed, only more unhappy.—Southey.

No ritual is too much, provided it is subsidiary to the inner work of worship; and all ritual is too much unless it ministers to that purpose.—Gladstone.

Diversity of worship has divided the human race into seventy-two nations. From among all their dogmas, I have selected one,—Divine Love.—Omar Khayam.

There is nothing wanting to make all rational and disinterested people in the world of one religion, but that they should talk together every day.—Pope.

Freedom of religion is one of the greatest gifts of God to man, without distinction of race and color. He is the author and lord of conscience, and no power on earth has a right to stand between God and the conscience.—Philip Schaff.

The duties of religion, sincerely and regularly performed, will always be sufficient to exalt the meanest and to exercise the highest understanding.—Dr. Johnson.

The ship retains her anchorage, yet drifts with a certain range, subject to wind and tide; so we have for an anchorage the cardinal truths of the gospel.—Gladstone.

Lukewarm persons think they may accommodate points of religion by middle ways and witty reconcilements,—as if they would make an arbitrament between God and man.—Bacon.

The true religion of Jesus Christ our Saviour is that which penetrates, and which receives all the warmth of the heart, and all the elevation of the soul, and all the energies of the understanding, and all the strength of the will.—Dean Stanley.

How religious the whole creation becomes as Science passes to and fro, touching the swarms of facts with her wand of order, to make them fall into line and present their thoughts.—John Weiss.

A man's religion consists, not of the many things he is in doubt of and tries to believe, but of the few he is assured of and has no need of effort for believing.—Carlyle.

Our Saviour hath enjoined us a reasonable service; all His laws are in themselves conducive to the temporal interest of them that observe them.—Bentley.

Religion in a magistrate strengthens his authority, because it procures veneration, and gains a reputation to it. In all the affairs of this world, so much reputation is in reality so much power.—Tillotson.

The religion of a sinner stands on two pillars; namely, what Christ did for us in the flesh, and what He performs in us by His Spirit. Most errors arise from an attempt to separate these two.—Cecil.

Test each sect by its best or its worst, as you will,—by its high-water mark of virtue or its low-water mark of vice. But falsehood begins when you measure the ebb of any other religion against the flood-tide of your own.—T. W. Higginson.

Children of men! the unseen Power, whose eye
Forever doth accompany mankind,
Hath look'd on no religion scornfully
That men did ever find.
—Matthew Arnold.

At bottom every religion is anti-Christian which makes the form, the thing, the letter, the substance. Such a materialistic religion, in order to be at all consistent, ought to maintain a material infallibility.—Jacobi.

Humility and love, whatever obscurities may involve religious tenets, constitute the essence of true religion. The humble is formed to adore; the loving, to associate with eternal love.—Lavater.

"When I was young, I was sure of many things; there are only two things of which I am sure now; one is, that I am a miserable sinner; and the other, that Jesus Christ is an all sufficient Saviour." He is well taught who gets these two lessons.—John Newton.

Religion is for the man in humble life, and to raise his nature, and to put him in mind of a state in which the privileges of opulence will cease, when he will be equal by nature, and may be more than equal by virtue.—Burke.

In a word, the free Church in a free State has been the programme which led me to my first efforts, and which I continue to regard as just and true, reasonable and practical, after the studies of thirty years.—Count Cavour.

All natural results are spontaneous. The diamond sparkles without effort, and the flowers open impulsively beneath the summer rain. And true religion is a spontaneous thing,—as natural as it is to weep, to love, or to rejoice.—Chapin.

The external part of religion is doubtless of little value in comparison with the internal, and so is the cask in comparison with the wine contained in it: but if the cask be staved in, the wine must perish.—Bishop Horne.

The faith that does not throw a warmth as of summer around the sympathies and charities of the heart, and drop invigorations like showers upon the conscience and the will is as false as it is unsatisfying.—Paul Potter.

There are but two religions,—Christianity and paganism, the worship of God and idolatry. A third between these is not possible. Where idolatry ends, there Christianity begins; and where idolatry begins, there Christianity ends.—Jacobi.

Religion, like its votaries, while it exists on earth, must have a body as well as a soul. A religion purely spiritual might suit a being as pure, but men are compound animals; and the body too often lords it over the mind.—Colton.

There are at bottom but two possible religions—that which rises in the moral nature of man, and which takes shape in moral commandments, and that which grows out of the observation of the material energies which operate in the external universe.—Froude.

Living religion grows not by the doctrines but by the narratives of the Bible: the best Christian religious doctrine is the life of Christ, and after that the sufferings and deaths of His followers, even those not related in Holy Writ.—Richter.

Religion is not a method, it is a life, a higher and supernatural life, mystical in its root and practical in its fruits; a communion with God, a calm and deep enthusiasm, a love which radiates, a force which acts, a happiness which overflows.—Amiel.

'Tis some relief, that points not clearly known,
Without much hazard may be let alone;
And, after hearing what our Church can say,
If still our reason runs another way,
That private reason 'tis more just to curb,
Than by disputes the public peace disturb;
For points obscure are of small use to learn,
But common quiet is mankind's concern.
—Dryden.

If it be the characteristic of a worldly man that he desecrates what is holy, it should be of the Christian to consecrate what is secular, and to recognize a present and presiding Divinity in all things.—Chalmers.

I have now disposed of all my property to my family. There is one thing more I wish I could give them.

and that is the Christian religion. If they had that, and I had not given them one shilling, they would have been rich; and if they had not that, and I had given them all the world, they would be poor.—Patrick Henry.

The spirit of true religion breathes gentleness and affability; it gives a native, unaffected ease to the behavior; it is social, kind, cheerful; far removed from the cloudy and illiberal disposition which clouds the brow, sharpens the temper, and dejects the spirit.—Blair.

The way to judge of religion is by doing our duty. Religion is rather a Divine life than a Divine knowledge. In heaven, indeed, we must first see, and then love; but here, on earth, we must first love, and love will open our eyes as well as our hearts, and we shall then see and perceive and understand.—Jeremy Taylor.

On the whole we must repeat the often repeated saying, that it is unworthy a religious man to view an irreligious one either with alarm or aversion; or with any other feeling than regret, and hope, and brotherly commiseration.—Carlyle.

If we are told a man is religious, we still ask, What are his morals? But if we hear at first that he has honest morals, and is a man of natural justice and good temper, we seldom think of the other question, whether he be religious and devout.—Shaftesbury.

In vain do science and philosophy pose as the arbiters of the human mind, of which they are in fact only the servants. Religion has provided a conception of life, and science travels in the beaten path. Religion reveals the meaning of life, and science only applies this meaning to the course of circumstances.—Tolstoi.

If I have read religious history aright, faith, hope, and charity have not always been found in a direct ratio with a sensibility to the three concords; and it is possible, thank heaven! to have very erroneous theories and very sublime feelings.—George Eliot.

G— knows I'm no the thing I should be,
Nor am I even the thing I could be,
But twenty times I rather would be An atheist clean,
Than under gospel colours hid be,
Just for a screen. —Burns.

Religions are not proved, are not demonstrated, are not established, are not overthrown by logic! They are, of all the mysteries of nature and the human mind, the most mysterious and most inexplicable; they are of instinct and not of reason.—Lamartine.

If we traverse the world, it is possible to find cities without walls, without letters, without kings, without wealth, without coin, without schools and theatres; but a city without a temple, or that practiseth not worship, prayer, and the like, no one ever saw.—Plutarch.

True religion is always mild, propitious, and humble; plays not the tyrant, plants no faith in blood, nor bears destruction on her chariot-wheels; but stoops to polish, succor, and redress, and builds her grandeur on the public good.—James Miller.

Religion, in its purity, is not so much a pursuit as a temper; or rather it is a temper, leading to the pursuit of all that is high and holy. Its foundation is faith; its action, works; its temper, holiness; its aim, obedience to God in improvement of self, and benevolence to men.—J. Edwards.

Religion, to have any force upon men's understandings,—indeed, to exist at all,—must be supposed paramount to law, and independent for its substance upon any human institution, else it would be the absurdest thing in the world,—an acknowledged cheat.—Burke.

A religion giving dark views of God, and infusing superstitious fear of innocent enjoyment, instead of aiding sober habits, will, by making men abject and sad, impair their moral force and prepare them for intemperance as a refuge from depression or despair.—

Channing.

Religion is the final centre of repose; the goal to which all things tend; apart from which man is a shadow, his very existence a riddle, and the stupendous scenes of nature which surround him as unmeaning as the leaves which the sibyl scattered in the wind.—Robert Hall.

All our scourging of religion
Began with tumult and sedition;
When hurricanes of fierce commotion
Became strong motives to devotion,
As carnal seamen, in a storm,
Turn pious converts and reform.

—Butler.

Let us accept different forms of religion among men, as we accept different languages, wherein there is still but one human nature expressed. Every genius has most power in his own language, and every heart in its own religion.—Richter.

He who possesses religion finds a providence not more truly in the history of the world than in his own family history; the rainbow, which hangs a glistening circle in the heights of heaven, is also formed by the same sun in the dew-drop of a lowly flower.—Richter.

People of gayety and fashion have occasionally a feeling that a little easy quantity of religion would be a good thing; because, after all, we cannot stay in this world always, and there may be hardish matters to settle in the other place.—John Foster.

Man, being not only a religious, but also a social being, requires for the promotion of his rational happiness religious institutions, which, while they give a proper direction to devotion, at the same time make a wise and profitable improvement of his social feelings.—Hosea Ballou.

Most religion-mongers have bated their paradises with a bit of toasted cheese. They have tempted the body with large promises of possessions in their transmortal El Dorado. Sancho Panza will not quit his chimney-corner, but under promise of imaginary islands to govern.—Lowell.

See, then, how powerful religion is; it commands the heart, it commands the vitals. Morality,—that comes with a pruning-knife, and cuts off all sproutings, all wild luxuriations; but religion lays the axe to the root of the tree. Morality looks that the skin of the apple be fair; but religion searcheth to the very core.—Nathaniel Culverwell.

He that has not religion to govern his morality is not a dram better than my mastiff dog; so long as you stroke him, and please him, and do not pinch him, he will play with you as fine as may be,—he is a very good moral mastiff; but if you hurt him, he will fly in your face, and tear out your throat.—Selden.

Religion's lustre is, by native innocence
Divinely pure, and simple from all arts;
You daub and dress her like a common mistress,
The harlot of your fancies; and by adding False beauties, which she wants not, make the world
Suspect her angel's face is foul beneath,
And will not bear all lights. —Rowe.

When in our days Religion is made a political engine, she exposes herself to having her sacred character forgotten. The most tolerant become intolerant towards her. Believers, who believe something else besides what she teaches, retaliate by attacking her in the very sanctuary itself.—Béranger.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert those pillars of human happiness, those firmest props of the duties of men and citizens.—Washington.

A man with no sense of religious duty is he whom the Scriptures describe in such terse but terrific language, as living "without God in the world." Such a man is out of his proper being, out of the circle of all his duties, out of the circle of all his happiness, and away, far, far away, from the purposes of his creation.—

Webster.

Many people make their own God;
and he is much what the French may mean when they talk of le bon Dieu, —very indulgent, rather weak, near at hand when we want anything, but far away out of sight when we have a mind to do wrong. Such a God is as much an idol as if he were an image of stone.—J. C. Hare.

Religion does what philosophy could never do; it shows the equal dealings of Heaven to the happy and the unhappy, and levels all human enjoyments to nearly the same standard. It gives to both rich and poor the same happiness hereafter, and equal hopes to aspire after it.—Goldsmith.

I extend the circle of real religion very widely. Many men fear God, and love God, and have a sincere desire to serve him, whose views of religious truth are very imperfect, and in some points utterly false. But may not many such persons have a state of heart acceptable before God?
—Cecil.

Let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.—Washington.

My idea of the Christian religion is, that it is an inspiration and its vital consequences—an inspiration and a life—God's life breathed into a man and breathed through a man—the highest inspiration and the highest life of every soul which it inhabits; and, furthermore, that the soul which it inhabits can have no high issue which is not essentially religious.—J. G. Holland.

Carry religious principles into common life, and common life will lose its transitoriness. The world passes away. The things seen are temporal.

Soon business, with all its cares and anxieties, the whole "unprofitable stir and fever of the world" will be to us a thing of the past. But religion does something better than sigh and moan over the perishableness of earthly things. It finds in them the seeds of immortality.—John Caird.

Forth from his dark and lonely hiding
place,
(Portentous sight) the owl atheism,
Sailing on obscene wings athwart the noon,
Drops his blue-fring'd lids, and holds them
close,
And hooting at the glorious sun in Heaven,
Cries out, "Where is it?" —Coleridge.

I do not find that the age or country makes the least difference; no, nor the language the actors spoke, nor the religion which they professed, whether Arab in the desert or Frenchman in the Academy, I see that sensible men and conscientious men all over the world were of one religion.—Emerson.

A prince who loves and fears religion is a lion who stoops to the hand that strokes or to the voice that appeases him. He who fears and hates religion is like the savage beast that growls and bites the chain, which prevents his flying on the passenger. He who has no religion at all is that terrible animal who perceives his liberty only when he tears in pieces, and when he devours.—Montesquieu.

There are those to whom a sense of religion has come in storm and tempest; there are those whom it has summoned amid scenes of revelry and idle vanity; there are those, too, who have heard its "still small voice" amid rural leisure and placid retirement.
But perhaps the knowledge which causeth not to err is most frequently impressed upon the mind during the season of affliction.—Walter Scott.

It has been said that men carry on a kind of coasting trade with religion.
In the voyage of life, they profess to be in search of heaven, but take care not to venture so far in their approximations to it, as entirely to lose sight of the earth; and should their frail vessel be in danger of shipwreck, they will gladly throw their darling vices overboard, as other mariners their treasures, only to fish them up again when the storm is over.—Colton.

It has been said that true religion will make a man a more thorough gentleman than all the courts in Europe. And it is true; you may see simple laboring men as thorough gentlemen as any duke, simply because they have learned to fear God; and, fearing Him, to restrain themselves, which is the very root and essence of all good-breeding.—Rev. C. Kingsley.

Religion is as necessary to reason as reason is to religion. The one cannot exist without the other. A reasoning being would lose his reason, in attempting to account for the great phenomena of nature, had he not a Supreme Being to refer to; and well has it been said, that if there had been no God, mankind would have been obliged to imagine one.—Washington.

Pour the balm of the Gospel into the wounds of bleeding nations. Plant the tree of life in every soil, that suffering kindgdoms may repose beneath its shade and feel the virtue of its healing leaves, till all the kindred of the human family shall be bound together in one common bond of amity and love, and the warrior shall be a character unknown but in the page of history.—Thomas Raffles.

I endeavor in vain to give my parthloners more cheerful ideas of religion; to teach them that God is not a jealous, childish, merciless tyrant; that He is best served by a regular tenor of good actions, not by bad singing, ill-composed prayers, and eternal apprehensions. But the luxury of false religion is to be unhappy!—Sydney Smith.

It is the property of the religious spirit to be the most refining of all influences. No external advantages, no culture of the tastes, no habit of command, no association with the elegant, or even depth of affection, can bestow that delicacy and that grandeur of bearing which belong only to the mind accustomed to celestial conversation,—all else is but gilt and cosmetics, beside this, as expressed in every look and gesture.—Emerson.

Let a man choose what condition he will, and let him accumulate around him all the goods and all the gratifications seemingly calculated to make him happy in it; if that man is left at any time without occupation or amusement, and reflects on what he is, the meagre, languid felicity of his present lot will not bear him up. He will turn necessarily to gloomy anticipations of the future; and except, therefore, his occupation calls him out of himself, he is inevitably wretched.—Pascal.

Religion is universal; theology is exclusive,—religion is humanitarian; theology is sectarian,—religion unites mankind; theology divides it,—religion is love, broad and all-comprising as God's love; theology preaches love and practises bigotry. Religion looks to the moral worth of man; theology to his creed and denomination. Religion is light and love, and virtue and peace, unadulterated and immaculate; but theology is the apple of discord, which disunites and estranges one from another.—Dr. M. Lilienthal.

There is a great deal we never think of calling religion that is still fruit unto God, and garnered by Him in the harvest. The fruits of the Spirit are love, joy, peace, long suffering, gentleness, patience, goodness. I affirm that if these fruits are found in any form, whether you show your patience as a woman nursing a fretful child, or as a man attending to the vexing detail of a business, or as a physician following the dark mazes of sickness, or as a mechanic fitting the joints and valves of a locomotive; being honest and true besides, you bring forth truth unto God.—Robert Collyer.

Religion is not a perpetual moping over good books. Religion is not even prayer, praise, holy ordinances,—these are necessary to religion—no man can be religious without them. But religion is mainly and chiefly the glorifying God amid the duties and trials of the world; the guiding of our course amid adverse winds and currents of temptation by the sunlight of duty and the compass of Divine truth, the bearing up manfully, wisely, courageously, for the honor of Christ, our great Leader in the conflict of life.—John Caird.

True religion is not what men see and admire; it is what God sees and loves; the faith which clings to Jesus in the darkest hour; the sanctity which shrinks from the approach of evil; the humility which lies low at the feet of the Redeemer, and washes them with tears; the love which welcomes every sacrifice; the cheerful consecration of all the powers of the soul; the worship which, rising above all outward forms, ascends to God in the sweetest, dearest communion—a worship often too deep for utterance, and than which the highest heaven knows nothing more sublime.—Richard Fuller.

Could not that wisdom which first broached
the wine,
Have thicken'd it with definitions?
And jagg'd his seamless coat, had that been fine,
With curious questions and divisions?
But all the doctrine which he taught and gave
Was clear as heav'n, from whence it came:
At least those beams of truth, which only save,
Surpass in brightness any flame,
Love God, and love your neighbor; watch and pray;
Do as you would be done unto:
O dark instructions, ev'n dark as day!
Who can these gordian knots undo?
—Herbert.

Remembrance

Remembrance wakes with all her busy train.—Goldsmith.

Keep this remembrance for thy Julia's sake.—Shakespeare.

Riveted,
Screwed to my memory.
—Shakespeare.

Remembrance is the only paradise out of which we cannot be driven away.—Richter.

O, it comes over my memory, as doth the raven over the infected house, boding to all.—Shakespeare.

She sent him rosemary, to the intent that he should hold her in remembrance.—Drayton.

The leafy blossoming present time springs from the whole past, remembered and unrememberable.—Carlyle.

Praising what is lost,
Makes the remembrance dear.
—Shakespeare.

His years with others must the sweeter be
For those brief days he spent in loving me.
—George Eliot.

Every one can remember that which has interested himself.—Plautus.

I cannot but remember such things were
That were most precious to me.
—Shakespeare.

You can't order remembrance out of the mind; and a wrong that was a wrong yesterday must be a wrong tomorrow.—Thackeray.

Some people regret that they have poor memories. Alas! it is much more difficult to forget.—Mme. Deluzy.

Remembrance of the dead soon fades. Alas! in their tombs they decay more slowly than in our hearts.—Victor Hugo.

Let never day nor night unhallow'd pass,
But still remember what the Lord has done.
—Shakespeare.

She plac'd it sad, with needless fear,
Lest time should shake my wavering soul—
Unconscious that her image there Held every sense in fast control.
—Byron.

What is excellent,
As God lives, is permanent;
Hearts are dust, hearts' loves remain,
Heart's love will meet thee again.
—Emerson.

Sooner shall the blue ocean melt to air,
Sooner shall earth resolve itself to sea,
Than I resign thine image, oh, my fair!
Or think of anything, excepting thee.
—Byron.

Remembrances last longer than present reality, as I have conserved blossoms many years, but never fruits.

Yes, there are tender female souls which intoxicate themselves only among the blossoms of the vineyard of joy, as others do only with the berries of the vinehill.—Richter.

This is the place. Stand still, my steed,
Let me review the scene,
And summon from the shadowy Past
The forms that once have been.

—Longfellow.

Departed suns their trails of splendor drew Across departed summers: whispers came
From voices, long ago resolved again
Into the primeval Silence, and we twain, Ghosts of our present selves, yet still the
same,
As in a spectral mirror wandered there.

—Bayard Taylor.

Go where glory waits thee;
But while fame elates thee,
O, still remember me.
When the praise thou meetest,
To thine ear is sweetest,
O, then remember me.

—Moore.

Oh! only those Whose souls have felt this one idolatry,
Can tell how precious is the slightest thing
Affection gives and hallows! A dead flower
Will long be kept, remembrancer of looks
That made each leaf a treasure.

—Miss Landon.

Man hath a weary pilgrimage,
As through the world he wends;
On every stage, from youth to age,
Still discontent attends;
With heaviness he casts his eye
Upon the road before,
And still remembers with a sigh,
The days that are no more.

—Robert Southey.

I see the lights of the village
Gleam through the rain and the mist,
And a feeling of sadness comes o'er me
That my soul cannot resist:
A feeling of sadness and longing,
That is not akin to pain,
And resembles sorrow only
As the mist resembles the rain.

—Longfellow.

Strange to me now are the forms I meet
When I visit the dear old town;
But the native air is pure and sweet,
And the trees that o'ershadow each well-known street,

As they balance up and down,
Are singing the beautiful song,
Are sighing and whispering still:
"A boy's will is the wind's will,
And the thoughts of youth are long, long thoughts."

—Longfellow.

I remember, I remember,
The fir-trees dark and high:
I used to think their slender tops
Were close against the sky;
It was a childish ignorance,
But now 'tis little joy
To know I'm farther off from heaven
Than when I was a boy. —Hood.

O years, gone down into the past,
What pleasant memories come to me
Of your untroubled days of peace,
And hours almost of ecstasy.

—Phæbe Cary.

Remorse

Remorse is the fruit of crime.—
Juvenal.

Remorse, the fatal egg by pleasure laid.—Cowper.

Remorse is the echo of a lost virtue.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Remorse is virtue's root.—Bryant.

Remorse weeps tears of blood.—
Coleridge.

So writhes the mind remorse hath riven.—Byron.

Remorse turns us against ourselves
—Chamfort.

Remorse is the pain of sin.—Theodore Parker.

Remorse sleeps in the atmosphere of prosperity.—Rousseau.

The hell within him.—Milton.

I believe that remorse is the least active of all a man's moral senses.—
Thackeray.

One of those terrible moments when the wheel of passion stands suddenly still.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Abandon all remorse;
On horror's head horrors accumulate.

—Shakespeare.

To be left alone, and face to face with my own crime, had been just retribution.—Longfellow.

God speaks to our hearts through the voice of remorse.—De Bernis

Judgment hath bred a kind of remorse in me.—Shakespeare.

Farewell, remorse: all good to me is lost;
Evil, be thou my good. —Milton.

That is the bitterest of all,—to wear the yoke of our own wrongdoing.—George Eliot.

I am afraid to think what I have done; look on it again I dare not.—Shakespeare.

Remorse is virtue's root; its fair increase are fruits of innocence and blessedness.—Bryant.

To consume an honest soul with remorse is the greatest of all crimes.—Mademoiselle Clairon.

Remorse of conscience is like an old wound; a man is in no condition to fight under such circumstances.—Jeremy Collier.

There is no heart without remorse, no life without some misfortune, no one but what is something stained with sin.—James Ellis.

Sin and hedgehogs are born without spikes; but how they prick and wound after their birth, we all know.—Richter.

A man's first care should be to avoid the reproaches of his own heart; his next, to escape the censures of the world.—Addison.

There is anguish in the recollection that we have not adequately appreciated the affection of those whom we have loved and lost.—Beaconsfield.

It is better to be affected with a true penitent sorrow for sin than to be able to resolve the most difficult cases about it.—Thomas à Kempis.

We can prostrate ourselves in the dust when we have committed a fault, but it is not best to remain there.—Chateaubriand.

There is no man that is knowingly wicked and is guilty to himself; and there is no man that carries guilt about him but he receives a sting in his soul. Tillotson.

For my part, I believe that remorse is the least active of all a man's moral senses,—the very easiest to be deadened when awakened, and in some never awakened at all.—Thackeray.

To be left alone
And face to face with my own crime, had been
Just retribution. —Longfellow.

Urge them while their souls are capable of this ambition, lest zeal, now melted by the windy breath of soft petitions, pity and remorse, cool and congeal again to what it was.—Shakespeare.

Remorse is the punishment of crime; repentance, its expiation. The former appertains to a tormented conscience; the later to a soul changed for the better.—Joubert.

High minds, of native pride and force,
Most deeply feel thy pangs, Remorse!
Fear, for their scourge, mean villains have,
Thou art the torturer of the brave! —Scott.

Remorse, the fatal egg by pleasure laid,
In every bosom where her nest is made,
Hatched by the beams of truth, denies him
rest,
And proves a raging scorpion in his breast. —Cowper.

There is a mental fatigue which is a spurious kind of remorse, and has all the anguish of the nobler feeling. It is an utter weariness and prostration of spirit, a sickness of heart and mind, a bitter longing to lie down and die.—Miss M. E. Braddon.

Remorse is as the heart in which it grows,
If that be gentle, it drops balmy dews
Of true repentance; but if proud and gloomy,
It is the poison tree that, pierced to the inmost,
Weeps only tears of poison. —Coleridge.

The greatest chastisement that a man may receive who hath outraged another, is to have done the outrage; and there is no man who is so rudely punished as he that is subject to the whip of his own repentance.—Seneca.

There are evil spirits who suddenly fix their abode in man's unguarded breast, causing us to commit devilish deeds, and then, hurrying back to their native hell, leave behind the stings of remorse in the poisoned bosom.—Schiller.

Unnatural deeds

Do breed unnatural troubles: infected minds To their deaf pillows will discharge their secrets:
More needs she the divine than the physician.—Shakespeare.

So do the dark in soul expire,
Or live like scorpion girt by fire;
So writhes the mind remorse hath riven,
Unfit for earth, undoom'd for heaven,
Darkness above, despair beneath,
Around it flame, within it death.

—Byron.

Not sharp revenge, nor hell itself can find,
A fiercer torment than a guilty mind,
Which day and night doth dreadfully accuse,
Condemns the wretch, and still the charge renews.—Dryden.

Remorse is a man's dread prerogative, and is the natural accompaniment of his constitution as a knowing, voluntary agent, left in trust with his own welfare and that of others. Remorse, if we exclude the notion of responsibility, is an enigma in human nature never to be explained.—Isaac Taylor.

Cruel Remorse! where Youth and Pleasure sport,
And thoughtless Folly keeps her court,—
Crouching 'midst rosy bowers thou lurk'st unseen;
Slumbering the festal hours away,
While Youth disports in that enchanting scene;

Till on some fated day
Thou with a tiger-spring dost leap upon thy prey,
And tear his helpless breast, o'erwhelmed with wild dismay.

—Anna Letitia Barbauld.

Not even for an hour can you bear to be alone, nor can you advantageously apply your leisure time, but you endeavor, a fugitive and wanderer, to escape from yourself, now vainly seeking to banish remorse by wine, and now by sleep; but the gloomy companion presses on you, and pursues you as you fly.—Horace.

Sharp and fell remorse, the offspring of my sin! Why do you, O God, lacerate my heart so late? Why, O boding cries, that scream so close to me,—why do I listen to you now, and never heard you before?—Metastasio.

Renown

It is not possible to be regarded with tenderness, except by a few. That merit which gives greatness and renown diffuses its influence to a wide compass, but acts weakly on every single breast; it is placed at a distance from common spectators, and shines like one of the remote stars, of which the light reaches us, but not the heat.—Johnson.

Repartee

Repartee is the soul of conversation.—Dryden.

Repartee is altogether a natural endowment, and is the lightning of the mind.—Alfred de Musset.

The impromptu reply is precisely the touchstone of the man of wit.—Molière.

A talent for repartee is one that increases with practice.—J. L. Motley.

Those repartees are best which turn your adversary's weapons against himself.—Chatfield.

The artful injury, whose venom'd dart scarce wounds the hearing, while it stabs the heart.—Hannah More.

Repartee is perfect, when it effects its purpose with a double edge. Repartee is the highest order of wit, as it bespeaks the coolest yet quickest exercise of genius at a moment when the passions are roused.—Colton.

The cynic who twitted Aristippus by observing that the philosopher who could dine on herbs might despise the company of a king, was well replied to by Aristippus, when he remarked that the philosopher who could enjoy the company of a king might also despise a dinner of herbs.—Colton.

Repentance

True repentance is to cease from sin.—St. Ambrose.

Repentance is accepted remorse.—Madame Swetchine.

Repentance follows hasty counsels.—Syrus.

And wet his grave with my repentant tears.—Shakespeare.

But with the morning cool repentance came.—Scott.

To grieve over sin is one thing, to repent is another.—F. W. Robertson.

True repentance also involves reform.—Hosea Ballou.

Repentance is second innocence.—De Bonald.

Repentance is but another name for aspiration.—Beecher.

Illusion is brief, but repentance is long.—Schiller.

Repentance is heart sorrow, and a clear life ensuing.—Shakespeare.

He who is sorry for having sinned is almost innocent.—Seneca.

He who seeks repentance for the past, should woo the angel virtue for the future.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Sorrow for past ills, doth restore frail man To his first innocence.—Nabbs.

Before God can deliver us from ourselves, we must undeceive ourselves.—St. Augustine.

Repentance is a goddess and the preserver of those who have erred.—Julian.

Our greatest glory consists not in never falling, but in rising every time we fall.—Goldsmith.

Our hearts must not only be broken with sorrow, but be broken from sin, to constitute repentance.—Dewey.

If thy brother trespass against thee, rebuke him; and if he repent, forgive him.—Bible.

Repentance clothes in grass and flowers the grave in which the past is laid.—Sterling.

If you would be good, first believe that you are bad.—Epictetus.

Let us be quick to repent of injuries while repentance may not be a barren anguish.—Dr. Johnson.

Repentance is not so much remorse for what we have done as the fear of consequences.—Rochefoucauld.

Repentance must be something more than mere remorse for sins: it comprehends a change of nature befitting heaven.—Lew Wallace.

Sins may be forgiven through repentance, but no act of wit will ever justify them.—Sherlock.

Late repentance is seldom true, but true repentance is never too late.—R. Venning.

Self-condemnation is God's absolution; and pleading guilty, acquittal at his bar.—Bartol.

Repentance is a magistrate that exacts the strictest duty and humility.—Clarendon.

Every one goes astray, but the least imprudent are they who repent the soonest.—Voltaire.

True repentance consists in the heart being broken for sin, and broken from sin.—Thornton.

Sweet tastes have sour closes; and he repents on thorns that sleeps in beds of roses.—Quarles.

Of all acts is not, for a man, repentance the most divine? The greatest of faults is to be conscious of none.—Carlyle.

The strongest proof of repentance is the endeavor to atone.—Miss Braddon.

That golden key that opes the palace of eternity.—Milton.

It is foolish to lay out money in the purchase of repentance.—Franklin.

None but the guilty know the withering pains of repentance.—Hosea Ballou.

Repentance, without amendment, is like continually pumping without mending the leak.—Dilwyn.

Slight sorrow for sin is sufficient, provided it at the same time produces amendment.—Colton.

Who after his transgression doth repent, Is halfe, or altogether, innocent.
—Herrick.

Once again I do receive thee honest. Who by repentance is not satisfied is nor of heaven nor earth.—Shakespeare.

What is past is past. There is a future left to all men, who have the virtue to repent and the energy to atone.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The slightest sorrow for sin is sufficient, if it produces amendment; and the greatest is insufficient, if it does not.—Colton.

If hearty sorrow be a sufficient ransom for offence, I tender it here; I do as truly suffer, as ever I did commit.—Shakespeare.

Whatever stress some may lay upon it, a death-bed repentance is but a weak and slender plank to trust our all upon.—Sterne.

All of us who are worth anything spend our manhood in unlearning the follies, or expiating the mistakes of our youth.—Shelley.

Under your good correction, I have seen, When, after execution, judgment hath Repented o'er his doom. —Shakespeare.

To err is human; but contrition felt for the crime distinguishes the virtuous from the wicked.—Alfieri.

True repentance has a double aspect; it looks upon things past with a weeping eye, and upon the future with a watchful eye.—South.

When a man has been guilty of any vice or folly, I think the best atonement he can make for it is to warn others not to fall into the like.—Addison.

God hath promised pardon to him that repenteth, but he hath not promised repentance to him that sinneth.—St. Anselm.

We look to our last sickness for repentance, unmindful that it is during a recovery men repent, not during a sickness.—Hare.

When the scourge
Inexorable, and the torturing hour
Calls us to penance. —Milton.

Repentance is no other than a recanting of the will, and opposition to our fancies, which lead us which way they please.—Montaigne.

Come, fair repentance, daughter of the skies!
Soft harbinger of soon returning virtue!
The weeping messenger of grace from heav'n! —Brown.

Repentance is for pale faces; they killed Christ, the good man. If Christ had come to red men, we would not have killed him.—Red Jacket.

They say, best men are moulded out of faults;
And, for the most, become much more the better
For being a little bad. —Shakespeare.

The seeds of repentance are sown in youth by pleasure, but the harvest is reaped in age by pain.—Colton.

Many believe the article of remission of sins, but they believe it without the condition of repentance or the fruits of holy life.—Jeremy Taylor.

It is never too late with us, so long as we are still aware of our faults and bear them impatiently,—so long as noble propensities, greedy of conquest, stir within us.—Jacobi.

He that waits for repentance waits for that which cannot be had as long as it is waited for. It is absurd for a man to wait for that which he himself has to do.—Nevins.

Confess yourself to Heaven; repent what is past; avoid what is to come; and do not spread the compost on the weeds, to make them ranker.—Shakespeare.

Virtue is the daughter of Religion; Repentance, her adopted child,—a poor orphan who, without the asylum which she offers, would not know where to hide her sole treasure, her tears!—Madame Swetchine.

Right actions for the future are the best explanations or apologies for wrong ones in the past; the best evidence of regret for them that we can offer, or the world receive.—T. Edwards.

The effect of every burden laid down is to leave us relieved: and when the soul has laid down that of its faults at the feet of God, it feels as though it had wings.—Eugénie de Guérin.

A wounded conscience is often inflicted as a punishment for lack of true repentance; great is the difference betwixt a man's being frightened at and humbled for his sins.—Fuller.

Neither angel nor archangel, nor yet even the Lord Himself (who alone can say, "I am with you"), can, when we have sinned, release us, unless we bring repentance with us.—St. Ambrose.

Well, I'll repent, and that suddenly, while I am in some liking; I shall be out of heart shortly, and then I shall have no strength to repent.—Shakespeare.

Repentance is true and genuine, if we are grieved for sin as it is offensive to God, if we are forsaking and turning from it both in heart and life, and, particularly, if we are deeply affected with the sin of unbelief.—Fisher's Catechism.

Repentance,
A salve, a comfort, and a cordial;
He that hath her, the keys of heaven hath:
This is the guide, this is the post, the path.
—Drayton.

Presume not that I am the thing I was:
For heaven doth know, so shall the world perceive,
That I have turned away my former self;
So will I those that kept me company.
—Shakespeare.

Ah! gracious Heaven gives us eyes to see our own wrong, however dim age may make them; and knees not too stiff to kneel, in spite of years, cramp, and rheumatism.—Thackeray.

A heart renewed—a loving heart—a penitent and humble heart—a heart broken and contrite, purified by love—that and only that is the rest of men. Spotlessness may do for angels, repentance unto life is the highest that belongs to man.—F. W. Robertson.

It will require more than a few hours of fasting and prayer to cast out such demons as selfishness, worldliness, and unbelief. Repentance, to be of any avail, must work a change of heart and of conduct.—T. L. Cuyler.

The law stops every man's mouth. God will have a man humble himself down on his face before Him, with not a word to say for himself. Then God will speak to him, when he owns that he is a sinner, and gets rid of all his own righteousness.—D. L. Moody.

True repentance has as its constituent elements not only grief and hatred of sin, but also an apprehension of the mercy of God in Christ. It hates the sin, and not simply the penalty; and it hates the sin most of all because it has discovered God's love.—Wm. M. Taylor.

Repentance hath a purifying power, and every tear is of a cleansing virtue; but these penitential clouds must be still kept dropping: one shower will not suffice; for repentance is not one single action, but a course.—South.

Some tears belong to us because we are unfortunate; others, because we are humane; many because we are mortal. But most are caused by our being unwise. It is these last only that of necessity produce more.—Leigh Hunt.

It is one thing to mourn for sin because it exposes us to hell, and another to mourn for it because it is an infinite evil. It is one thing to mourn for it because it is injurious to ourselves; another, to mourn for it because it is offensive to God. It is one thing to be terrified; another, to be humbled.—Gardiner Spring.

Repentance does not consist in one single act of sorrow, though that, being the first and leading act, gives denomination to the whole: but in doing works meet for repentance, in a sincere obedience to the law of Christ for the remainder of our lives.—Locke.

The scriptural doctrine in regard to repentance is not, that a man must repent in order to his being qualified to go to Christ; it is rather that he must go to Christ in order to his being able to repent. From Him comes the grace of contrition as well as the cleansing of expiation.—Henry Melvill.

As it is never too soon to be good, so it is never too late to amend: I will, therefore, neither neglect the time present, nor despair of the time past. If I had been sooner good, I might perhaps have been better; if I am longer bad, I shall, I am sure, be worse.—Arthur Warwick.

Repentance, however difficult to be practiced, is, if it be explained without superstition, easily understood. Repentance is the relinquishment of any practice from the conviction that it has offended God.—Dr. Johnson.

Vice leaves repentance in the soul, like an ulcer in the flesh, which is always scratching and lacerating itself; for reason effaces all other griefs and sorrows, but it begets that of repentance.—Montaigne.

Place not thy amendment only in increasing thy devotion, but in bettering thy life. This is the damning hypocrisy of this age; that it slightes all good morality, and spends its zeal in matters of ceremony, and a form of godliness without the power of it.—Fuller.

O wretched state! O bosom black as death! O lined soul that, struggling to be free, art more engaged! Help, angels! Make assay! Bow, stubborn knees! and, heart with strings of steel, be soft as sinews of the new-born babe!—Shakespeare.

Is it not in accordance with divine order that every mortal is thrown into that situation where his hidden evils can be brought forth to his own view, that he may know them, acknowledge them, struggle against them, and put them away?—Anna Cora Mowatt.

'Tis not, to cry God mercy, or to sit And droop, or to confess that thou hast fail'd:

'Tis to bewail the sins thou didst commit; And not commit those sins thou hast bewail'd.

He that bewails and not forsakes them too; Confesses rather what he means to do.

—Quarles.

I will to-morrow, that I will,

I will be sure to do it;

To-morrow comes, to-morrow goes,

And still thou art to do it.

Thus still repentance is deferred,

From one day to another:

Until the day of death is come,

And judgment is the other.

—Drexelius.

Some well-meaning Christians tremble for their salvation, because they have never gone through that valley of tears and sorrow, which they have been taught to consider as an ordeal that must be passed through before they can arrive at regeneration. To satisfy such minds, it may be observed that the slightest sorrow for sin is sufficient, if it produce amendment, and that the greatest is insufficient, if it do not.—Colton.

Repentance is not like the summer fruits, fit to be taken a little and in their own time; it is like bread, the provisions and support of life, the entertainment of every day; but it is the bread of affliction to some, and the bread of carefulness to all; and he that preaches this with the greatest severity, it may be, takes the liberty of an enemy, but he gives the counsel and the assistance of a friend.—Jeremy Taylor.

Before

We end our pilgrimage, 'tis fit that we Should leave corruption, and foul sin, behind us,
But wash'd feet and hands, the heathens dar' not Enter their profane temples; and for me
To hope my passage to eternity
Can be made easy, till I have shook off
The burthen of my sins in free confession, Aided with sorrow, and repentance for them,
Is against reason.

—Massinger.

My Saviour, mid life's varying scene
Be Thou my stay;
Guide me, through each perplexing path,
To perfect day.
In weakness and in sin I stand;
Still faith can clasp Thy mighty hand,
And follow at Thy dear command.
My Saviour, I have nought to bring Worthy of Thee;
A broken heart Thou wilt not spurn;
Accept of me,
I need Thy righteousness Divine,
I plead Thy promises as mine,
I perish if I am not Thine.

—Elizabeth A. E. Godwin.

Habitual evils change not on a sudden,
But many days must pass, and many sorrows;
Conscious remorse, and anguish must be felt,
To curb desire, to break the stubborn will,
And work a second nature in the soul,
Ere virtue can resume the place she lost.

—Rowe.

Alas! it is not till time with reckless hand has torn out half the leaves
from the book of human life, to light the fires of passion with from day to day, that man begins to see that the leaves which remain are few in number, and to remember faintly at first, and then more clearly, that upon the early pages of that book was written a story of happy influence which he would fain read over again.—Longfellow.

Repose

Power rests in tranquillity.—Cecil.

A gentleman makes no noise; a lady is serene.—Emerson.

Our foster-nurse of nature is repose.—Shakespeare.

The toils of honor dignify repose.—
Hoole.

Vulgar people can't be still.—O. W.
Holmes.

What sweet delight a quiet life affords.—Drummond.

But quiet to quick bosoms is a hell.
—Byron.

Too much rest itself becomes a pain.
—Homer.

There is no mortal truly wise and restless at once; wisdom is the repose of minds.—Lavater.

The heart that is to be filled to the brim with holy joy must be held still.
—Bovee.

When a man finds not repose in himself it is in vain for him to seek it elsewhere.—From the French.

These should be hours for necessities,
Not for delights; times to repair our nature
With comforting repose, and not for us
To waste these times. —Shakespeare.

Repose without stagnation is the state most favorable to happiness.
"The great felicity of life," says Seneca, "is to be without perturbations."
—Bovee.

The gravest events dawn with no more noise than the morning star makes in rising.—Beecher.

Repose and cheerfulness are the badge of the gentleman—repose in energy. The Greek battle pieces are calm; the heroes, in whatever violent actions engaged, retain a serene aspect.—Emerson.

To husband out life's taper at the close,
And keep the flames from wasting by repose. —Goldsmith.

Have you known how to compose your manners? You have done a great deal more than he who has composed books. Have you known how to take repose? You have done more than he who has taken cities and empires.—Montaigne.

The best of men have ever loved repose;
They hate to mingle in the filthy fray;
Where the soul sours, and gradual rancour grows,
Imbitter'd more from peevish day to day.
—Thomson.

The wind breath'd soft a lover's sigh,
And, oft renew'd, seem'd oft to die
With breathless pause between,
O who, with speech of war and woes,
Would wish to break the soft repose
Of such enchanting scene! —Scott.

As unity demanded for its expression what at first might have seemed its opposite—variety: so repose demands for its expression the implied capability of its opposite—energy. It is the most unfailing test of beauty; nothing can be ignoble that possesses it, nothing right that has it not.—Ruskin.

The repose necessary to all beauty is repose, not of inanition, nor of luxury, nor of irresolution, but the repose of magnificent energy and being; in action, the calmness of trust and determination; in rest, the consciousness of duty accomplished and of victory won; and this repose and this felicity can take place as well in the midst of trial and tempest, as beside the waters of comfort.—Ruskin.

Reproach (See Reproof)

True invective requires great imagination.—George William Curtis.

Reproach is infinite, and knows no end.—Homer.

Few love to hear the sins they love to act.—Shakespeare.

Reproach is usually honest, which is more than can be said of praise.—Balzac.

If merited, no courage can stand against its just indignation.—Colton.

Thou wear a lion's hide! doff it for shame,
And hang a calf-skin on those recreant limbs! —Shakespeare.

No reproach is like that we clothe in a smile, and present with a bow.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The reproach of a friend should be strictly just, but not too frequent.—Budgell.

The severest punishment suffered by a sensitive mind, for injury inflicted upon another, is the consciousness of having done it.—Hosea Ballou.

When a man feel the reprehension of a friend seconded by his own heart, he is easily heated into resentment.—Dr. Johnson.

Men are almost always cruel in their neighbors' faults; and make others' overthrow the badge of their own ill-masked virtue.—Sir P. Sidney.

Reproof, especially as it relates to children, administered in all gentleness, will render the culprit not afraid, but ashamed to repeat the offence.—Hosea Ballou.

If you have a thrust to make at your friend's expense, do it gracefully, it is all the more effective. Some one says the reproach that is delivered with hat in hand is the most telling.—Haliburton.

Before thou reprehend another, take heed thou art not culpable in what thou goest about to reprehend. He that cleanses a blot with blotted fingers makes a greater blur.—Quarles.

The silent upbraiding of the eye is the very poetry of reproach; it speaks at once to the imagination.—Mrs. Balfour.

I never was fit to say a word to a sinner, except when I had a broken heart myself; when I was subdued and melted into penitence, and felt as though I had just received pardon for my own soul, and when my heart was full of tenderness and pity.—Payson.

Too much reproach "o'erleaps itself, and falls on t' other side." Pricked up too sharply, the delinquent, like a goaded bull, grows sullen and savage, and, the persecution continuing, ends in rushing madly on the spear that wounds him.—Bovee.

Does a man reproach thee for being proud or ill-natured, envious or conceited, ignorant or detracting? Consider with thyself whether his reproaches are true. If they are not, consider that thou art not the person whom he reproaches, but that he reviles an imaginary being, and perhaps loves what thou really art, though he hates what thou appearest to be.—Epictetus.

Reproof (See Reproach)

Reproof on her lip, but a smile in her eye.—Samuel Lover.

Reprove thy friend privately; commend him publicly.—Solon.

I will chide no breather in the world but myself, against whom I know most faults.—Shakespeare.

There is an oblique way of reproof which takes off from the sharpness of it.—Steele.

For not the anger of the wise to raise;
Those best can bear reproof who merit praise.
—Pope.

Better a little chiding than a great deal of heart-break.—Shakespeare.

Aversion from reproof is not wise. It is a mark of a little mind. A great aan can afford to lose; a little insignificant fellow is afraid of being snuffed out.—Cecil.

Reproof is a medicine like mercury or opium; if it be improperly administered, it will do harm instead of good.—Horace Mann.

Chide him for faults, and do it reverently, When you perceive his blood inclined to mirth.
—Shakespeare.

He had such a gentle method of reproving their faults that they were not so much afraid as ashamed to repeat them.—Atterbury.

The severest punishment suffered by a sensitive mind, for injury inflicted upon another, is the consciousness of having done it.—Hosea Ballou.

Forbear sharp speeches to her; she's a lady,
So tender of rebukes that words are strokes,
And strokes death to her. —Shakespeare.

Some persons take reproof good-humoredly enough, unless you are so unlucky as to hit a sore place. Then they wince and writhe, and start up and knock you down for your impertinence, or wish you good morning.—Hare.

Whenever anything is spoken against you that is not true, do not pass by or despise it because it is false; but forthwith examine yourself, and consider what you have said or done that may administer a just occasion of reproof.—Plutarch.

Reprove not in their wrath incensed men;
Good counsel comes clean out of reason then,
But when his fury is appeased and past,
He will conceive his fault, and mend at last.
When he is cool, and calm, then utter it;
No man gives physic in the midst o' the fit.
—Randolph.

Republic

Republicanism and ignorance are in bitter antagonism.—Lamartine.

Happiness is more effectually dispensed to mankind under a republ can form of government than any other.—Washington.

At twenty every one is republican.—Lamartine.

Republics come to an end by luxurious habits; monarchies, by poverty.—Montesquieu.

Kings are for nations in their swaddling clothes: France has attained her majority.—Victor Hugo.

The same fact that Boccaccio offers in support of religion might be adduced in behalf of a republic: "It exists in spite of its ministers."—Heinrich Heine.

Republics, like individuals, who are benefited by personal sacrifices, are proverbially ungrateful.—Epes Sargent.

A republic properly understood is a sovereignty of justice, in contradistinction to a sovereignty of will.—Thomas Paine.

Republicanism is not the phantom of a deluded imagination. On the contrary, laws, under no form of government, are better supported, liberty and property better secured, or happiness more effectually dispensed to mankind.—Washington.

Though I admire republican principles in theory, yet I am afraid the practice may be too perfect for human nature. We tried a republic last century, and it failed. Let our enemies try next. I hate political experiments.—Walpole.

Equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political; peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations,—entangling alliances with none; the support of the State governments in all their rights, as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns, and the surest bulwarks against anti-republican tendencies; the preservation of the General Government in its whole constitutional vigor, as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad; * * * freedom of religion; freedom of the press; freedom of person under the protection of habeas corpus; and trials by juries impartially selected,—these principles form the bright constellation which has gone before us, and guided our steps through an age of revolution and reformation.—Thomas Jefferson.

Reputation

O reputation! dearer far than life.—Lowell.

The honor of a maid is her name.—Shakespeare.

Faithfully guard your reputation.—Rothschild.

A good name is better than precious ointment.—Bible.

A good name is better than bags of gold.—Cervantes.

A lost good name is ne'er retriev'd.—Gay.

I would rather make my name than inherit it.—Thackeray.

He that is disrespectful in his courses oft sells his reputation at cheap market.—Ben Jonson.

Good-will, like a good name, is got by many actions, and lost by one.—Jeffrey.

Reputation is a jewel which nothing can replace; it is ten thousand times more valuable capital than your diamonds.—Laboulaye.

How many worthy men have we seen survive their own reputation!—Montaigne.

For a strolling damsel a doubtful reputation bears.—Goethe.

I see my reputation is at stake:
My fame is shrewdly got'd.
—Shakespeare.

One may be better than his reputation or his conduct, but never better than his principles.—Laténa.

A reputation for good judgment, for fair dealing, for truth, and for rectitude, is itself a fortune.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Reputation is what men and women think of us; character is what God and angels know of us.—Thomas Paine.

Say nothing good of yourself, you will be distrusted: say nothing bad of yourself, you will be taken at your word.—Joseph Roux.

An eminent reputation is as dangerous as a bad one.—Tacitus.

How difficult it is to save the bark of reputation from the rocks of ignorance.—Petrarch.

The way to gain a good reputation is to endeavor to be what you desire to appear.—Socrates.

Time never fails to bring every exalted reputation to a strict scrutiny.—Fisher Ames.

In all the affairs of this world, so much reputation is in reality so much power.—Tillotson.

Convey a libel in a frown,
And wink a reputation down!
—Swift.

I would thou and I knew where a commodity of good names were to be bought.—Shakespeare.

How many people live on the reputation of the reputation they might have made!—Holmes.

Good name in man and woman, dear my lord, is the immediate jewel of their souls.—Shakespeare.

The blaze of reputation cannot be blown out, but it often dies in the socket.—Dr. Johnson.

Die two months ago, and not forgotten yet? Then there's hope a great man's memory may outlive his life half a year.—Shakespeare.

Reputation, like beavers and cloaks, shall last some people twice the time of others.—Douglas Jerrold.

I have offended reputation,
A most un noble swerving.
—Shakespeare.

Gain at the expense of reputation is manifest loss.—Publius Syrus.

It is the duty of every one to strive to gain and deserve a good reputation.—Atterbury.

It is a maxim with me that no man was ever written out of reputation but by himself.—Monk.

The world knows the worst of me, and I can say that I am better than my fame.—Schiller.

You have lost no reputation at all, unless you repute yourself such a loser.—Shakespeare.

Men's evil manners live in brass; their virtues we write in water.—Shakespeare.

The tenure of a literary reputation is the most uncertain and fluctuating of all.—Charles Dudley Warner.

Associate with men of good quality, if you esteem your own reputation; for it is better to be alone than in bad company.—George Washington.

Thy credit wary keep, 'tis quickly gone; Being got by many actions, lost by one.
—Randolph.

The purest treasure mortal times afford,
Is spotless reputation; that away,
Men are but gilded loam, or painted clay.
—Shakespeare.

O, I have lost my reputation!
I have lost the immortal part of myself
And what remains is bestial.
—Shakespeare.

A man's reputation draws eyes upon him that will narrowly inspect every part of him.—Addison.

Reputation is an idle and most false imposition: oft got without merit, and lost without deserving.—Shakespeare.

It is a wretched thing to lean on the reputation of others, lest the pillars being withdrawn the roof should fall in ruins.—Juvenal.

I consider him of no account who esteems himself just as the popular breath may chance to raise him.—Goethe.

But he that filches from me my good name
Robs me of that which not enriches him
And makes me poor indeed.

—Shakespeare.

Reputation is but a synonyme of popularity: dependent on suffrage, to be increased or diminished at the will of the voters.—Mrs. Jameson.

The dark grave, which knows all secrets, can alone reclaim the fatal doubt once cast on a woman's name.—George Herbert.

My name and memory I leave to men's charitable speeches, to foreign nations, and to the next age.—Bacon.

Some men's reputation seems like seed-wheat, which thrives best when brought from a distance.—Whately.

A just person knows how to secure his own reputation without blemishing another's by exposing his faults.—Quesnel.

Reputation is in itself only a farthing-candle, of wavering and uncertain flame, and easily blown out, but it is the light by which the world looks for and finds merit.—Lowell.

The two chief things that give a man reputation in counsel, are the opinion of his honesty, and the opinion of his wisdom; the authority of those two will persuade.—Ben Jonson.

A man's reputation is not in his own keeping, but lies at the mercy of the profligacy of others. Calumny requires no proof.—Hazlitt.

The reputation of a man is like his shadow,—gigantic when it precedes him, and pygmy in its proportions when it follows.—Talleyrand.

The reputation of a woman may also be compared to a mirror of crystal, shining and bright, but liable to be sullied by every breath that comes near it.—Cervantes.

There are few persons of greater worth than their reputation; but how many are there whose worth is far short of their reputation!—Stanislaus.

Whatever disgrace we have merited, it is almost always in our power to re-establish our reputation.—Rochefoucauld.

The great difficulty is first to win a reputation; the next to keep it while you live; and the next to preserve it after you die, when affection and interest are over, and nothing but sterling excellence can preserve your name.—B. R. Haydon.

Nothing so uncertain as general reputation. A man injures me from humor, passion, or interest; hates me because he has injured me; and speaks ill of me because he hates me.—Henry Home.

Reputation is rarely proportioned to virtue. We have seen a thousand people esteemed, either for the merit they had not yet attained or for that they no longer possessed.—St. Evremond.

When a man has once forfeited the reputation of his integrity, he is set fast; and nothing will then serve his turn, neither truth nor falsehood.—Tillotson.

An honest reputation is within the reach of all men; they obtain it by social virtues, and by doing their duty. This kind of reputation, it is true, is neither brilliant nor startling, but it is often the most useful for happiness.—Duclos.

"A good name is like precious ointment"; it filleth all round about, and will not easily away; for the odors of ointments are more durable than those of flowers.—Bacon.

The reputation of a man is like his shadow:—It sometimes follows and sometimes precedes him, it is sometimes longer and sometimes shorter than his natural size.—French Proverb.

Had he unjustly fallen, your name had then been stain'd to latest times with foul reproach; and what more dreadful, more to be abhorred, than to be known with infamy forever?—Paterson.

There are two ways of establishing your reputation,—to be praised by honest men, and to be abused by rogues. It is best, however, to secure the former, because it will be invariably accompanied by the latter.—Colton.

The two most precious things on this side the grave are our reputation and our life. But it is to be lamented that the most contemptible whisper may deprive us of the one, and the weakest weapon of the other.—Colton.

He that tears away a man's good name tears his flesh from his bones, and, by letting him live, gives him only a cruel opportunity of feeling his misery, of burying his better part, and surviving himself.—South.

A good name is properly that reputation of virtue that every man may challenge as his right and due in the opinions of others, till he has made forfeit of it by the viciousness of his actions.—South.

O, reputation! dearer far than life,
Thou precious balsam, lovely, sweet of smell,
Whose cordial drops once spilt by some rash hand,
Not all the owner's care, nor the repenting toil
Of the rude spiller, ever can collect
To its first purity and native sweetness.
—Sewell.

Garments that have once one rent in them are subject to be torn on every nail, and glasses that are once cracked are soon broken; such is man's good name once tainted with just reproach.—Bishop Hall.

A fair reputation is a plant, delicate in its nature, and by no means rapid in its growth. It will not shoot up in a night like the gourd of the prophet; but, like that gourd, it may perish in a night.—Jeremy Taylor.

In various talk th' instructive hours they past,
Who gave the ball, or paid the visit last;
One speaks the glory of the British queen,
And one describes a charming Indian screen;
A third interprets motions, looks, and eyes;
At every word a reputation dies.
—Pope.

There is nothing more necessary to establish reputation than to suspend the enjoyment of it. He that cannot bear the sense of merit with silence must of necessity destroy it; for fame being the genial mistress of mankind, whoever gives it to himself insults all to whom he relates any circumstance to his own advantage.—Steele.

If a man were only to deal in the world for a day, and should never have occasion to converse more with mankind, never more need their good opinion or good word, it were then no great matter (speaking as to the concerns of this world), if a man spent his reputation all at once, and ventured it at one throw; but if he be to continue in the world, and would have the advantage of conversation while he is in it, let him make use of truth and sincerity in all his words and actions; for nothing but this will last and hold out to the end.—Tillotson.

Request

The sequence of requests is obligation.—Junius.

It is hard to ask: it is sweet to give.
—Mme. de Girardin.

Polite beggary is too common.—W. R. Alger.

He who goes round about in his requests wants commonly more than he chooses to appear to want.—Lavater

No music is so charming to my ear as the requests of my friends, and the supplications of those in want of my assistance.—Caesar.

Resentment

Resentment gratifies him who intended an injury, and pains him unjustly who did not intend it.—Johnson.

There is a spirit of resistance implanted by the Deity in the breast of man, proportioned to the size of the wrongs he is destined to endure.—C. J. Fox.

Resentment seems to have been given us by nature for defence, and for defence only; it is the safeguard of justice, and the security of innocence.—Adam Smith.

Resentment is a union of sorrow with malignity; a combination of a passion which all endeavor to avoid with a passion which all concur to detest.—Johnson.

Resentment is, in every stage of the passion, painful, but it is not disagreeable, unless in excess; pity is always painful, yet always agreeable; vanity, on the contrary, is always pleasant, yet always disagreeable.—Home.

Reserve

Reserve may be pride fortified in ice; dignity is worth reposing on truth.—W. R. Alger.

Reserve is the truest expression of respect towards those who are its objects.—De Quincey.

Reserve is no more essentially connected with understanding than a church organ with devotion, or wine with good-nature.—Shenstone.

There is nothing more allied to the barbarous and savage character than sullenness, concealment, and reserve.—Parke Godwin.

There would not be any absolute necessity for reserve if the world were honest; yet even then it would prove expedient. For, in order to attain any degree of deference, it seems necessary that people should imagine you have more accomplishments than you discover.—Shenstone.

Resignation

Resignation is a daily suicide.—Balzac.

Kiss the rod.—Shakespeare.

The law of common sense.—Mme. Swetchine.

Fearless of fortune, and resigned to fate.—Dryden.

Leave to Heaven the measure and the choice.—Johnson.

That what cannot be repaired is not to be regretted.—Johnson.

If God be appeased, I cannot be wretched.—Ovid.

Resignation is the courage of Christian sorrow.—Professor Vinet.

It is the Lord: let Him do what seemeth Him good.—Bible.

Let that please man which has pleased God.—Seneca.

The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away: blessed be the name of the Lord.—Bible.

What destiny sends, bear! Whoever perseveres will be crowned.—Herder.

It were no virtue to bear calamities if we did not feel them.—Madame Necker.

A man that fortune's buffets and rewards hast ta'en with equal thanks.—Shakespeare.

That's best Which God sends. 'Twas His will: it is mine. Lord Lytton.

No cloud can overshadow a true Christian, but his faith will discern a rainbow in it.—Bishop Horne.

What is resignation? It is putting God between one's self and one's grief.
—Madame Swetchine.

Thus ready for the way of life or death,
I wait the sharpest blow.
—Shakespeare.

Vulgar minds refuse to crouch beneath their load; the brave bear theirs
without repining.—Thomson.

What's gone and what's past help
Should be past grief. —Shakespeare.

Things without remedy,
Should be without regard: what's done is done. —Shakespeare.

Act well your given part; the choice rests not with you.—Epictetus.

One alleviation in misfortune is to endure and submit to necessity.—Seneca.

Well—peace to thy heart, tho' another's
it be;
And health to that cheek, tho' it bloom
not for me. —Moore.

We must learn to suffer what we cannot evade.—Montaigne.

Obedience and resignation are our personal offerings upon the altar of duty.—Hosea Ballou.

As you can not do what you wish,
you should wish what you can do.—
Terence.

We bear it calmly, though a ponderous woe,
And still adore the hand that gives the blow. —Pomfret.

O Lord, I do most cheerfully commit all unto Thee.—Fénelon.

Resignation is the name of the angel who carries most of our soul's burdens.—J. L. Basford.

Give what thou canst, without thee we are poor;
And with thee rich, take what thou wilt away. —Cowper.

Believe that each day which shines upon you is the last.—Horace.

The evil which one suffers patiently as inevitable seems insupportable as soon as he conceives the idea of escaping from it.—De Tocqueville.

But Heaven hath a hand in these events;
To whose high will we bound our calm contents. —Shakespeare.

We cannot conquer fate and necessity, yet we can yield to them in such a manner as to be greater than if we could.—Landor.

An old man, broken with the storms of state,
Is come to lay his weary bones among ye;
Give him a little earth for charity!
—Shakespeare.

I pray God that I may never find my will again. Oh, that Christ would subject my will to His, and trample it under His feet.—Rutherford.

Misfortunes, in fine, cannot be avoided; but they may be sweetened, if not overcome, and our lives made happy by philosophy.—Seneca.

To will what God doth will, that is the only science
That gives us any rest. —Malherbe.

Man yields to death; and man's sublimest works
Must yield at length to Time.
—Thomas Love Peacock.

Now he is dead, wherefore should
I fast? can I bring him back again?
I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me.—Bible.

Like the plants that throw their fragrance from the wounded part, breathe sweetness out of woe.—
Moore.

He is greedy of life who is not willing to die when the world is perishing around him.—Seneca.

Whate'er my doom;
It cannot be unhappy: God hath given me
The boon of resignation. —Wilson.

Let God do with me what He will, anything He will; and whatever it be, it will be either heaven itself, or some beginning of it.—Mountford.

The good we have enjoyed from Heaven's free will, and shall we murmur to endure the ill?—Dryden.

When a misfortune is impending, I cry, "God forbid"; but when it falls upon me, I say, "God be praised."—Sterne.

Demand not that events should happen as you wish; but wish them to happen as they do happen, and you will go on well.—Epictetus.

To be resigned when ills betide, patient when favors are denied, and pleased with favors given.—Nathaniel Cotton.

Wait, then, my soul! submissive wait,
Prostrate before His awful seat;
And 'mid the terrors of His rod,
Trust in a wise and gracious God!
—Beddome.

We are content to take what Thou shalt give,
To work or suffer as Thy choice shall be;
Forsaking what Thy wisdom bids us leave,
Glad in the thought that we are pleasing Thee.
—Eva Travers.

Bends to the grave with unperceived decay,
While resignation gently slopes the way;
And, all his prospects brightening to the last,
His heaven commences ere the world be past.
—Goldsmith.

Suffering becomes beautiful when any one bears great calamities with cheerfulness, not through insensibility, but through greatness of mind.—Aristotle.

Sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one that wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.
—Bryant.

Is it reasonable to take it ill, that anybody desires of us that which is their own? All we have is the Almighty's; and shall not God have His own when He calls for it?—William Penn.

It is a higher exhibition of Christian manliness to be able to bear trouble than to get rid of it.—Beecher.

With a sigh for what we have not, we must be thankful for what we have, and leave to One wiser than ourselves the deeper problems of the human soul and of its discipline.—Gladstone.

Here's a sigh to those who love me,
And a smile to those who hate;
And whatever sky's above me,
Here's a heart for every fate.
—Byron.

"My will, not thine, be done," turned Paradise into a desert. "Thy will, not mine, be done," turned the desert into a paradise, and made Gethsemane the gate of heaven.—Pressensé.

Take what He gives, since to rebel is vain;
The bad grows better, which we well sustain;
And could we choose the time, and choose aright,
'Tis best to die, our honor at the height.
—Dryden.

When remedies are past, the griefs are ended,
By seeing the worst, which late on hopes depended.
To mourn a mischief that is past and gone
Is the next way to draw new mischief on.
—Shakespeare.

We should be able to see without sadness our most holy wishes fade like sunflowers, because the sun above us still forever beams, eternally makes new, and cares for all.—Richter.

Valincourt said, when his library was destroyed by fire, "A man must have profited very little by his books who has not learned how to part with them."—Chapin.

And peradventure we have more cause to thank Him for our loss than for our winning; for His wisdom better seeth what is good for us than we do ourselves.—Sir Thomas More.

"Rest in the Lord; wait patiently for him." In Hebrew, "Be silent to God, and let him mould thee." Keep still, and He will mould thee to the right shape.—Martin Luther.

Make up your mind to the prospect of sustaining a certain measure of pain and trouble in your passage through life. By the blessing of God this will prepare you for it.—J. H. Newman.

Resignation,—not to a whirlwind of inexorable forces, not to powers that cannot see or hear or feel, but to One who lives forever, and who loves us well, and who has given us all that we have, ay, life itself, that we may at His bidding freely give it back to Him.—H. P. Liddon.

Dare to look up to God and say: "Deal with me in the future as thou wilt. I am of the same mind as thou art; I am thine. I refuse nothing that pleases Thee. Lead me where Thou wilt; clothe me in any dress Thou choosest."—Epictetus.

If God send thee a cross, take it up willingly and follow him. Use it wisely, lest it be unprofitable. Bear it patiently, lest it be intolerable. If it be light, slight it not. If it be heavy, murmur not. After the cross is the crown.—Quarles.

Resignation is, to some extent, spoiled for me by the fact that it is so entirely conformable to the laws of common-sense. I should like just a little more of the supernatural in the practice of my favorite virtue.—Madame Swetchine.

So long as we do not take even the injustice which is done us, and which forces the burning tears from us,—so long as we do not take even this for just and right, we are in the thickest darkness without dawn.—Rabel.

Probably Providence has implanted peevishness and ill-temper in sick and old persons, in compassion to the friends or relations who are to survive; as it must naturally lessen the concern they might otherwise feel for their loss.—Sterne.

Sanctified afflictions are an evidence of our adoption: we do not prune dead trees to make them fruitful, nor those which are planted in a desert; but such as belong to the garden, and possess life.—Arrowsmith.

It has been well said that no man ever sank under the burden of the day. It is when to-morrow's burden is added to the burden of to-day that the weight is more than a man can bear.—George MacDonald.

And I said in underbreath—
All our life is mixed with death,—
And who knoweth which is best?
And I smiled to think God's greatness
Flowed around our incompleteness,— Round our restlessness, His rest.
—Mrs. E. B. Browning.

To-morrow! the mysterious, unknown guest,
Who cries to me: "Remember Barmecide,
And tremble to be happy with the rest."
And I make answer: "I am satisfied;
I dare not ask; I know not what is best;
God hath already said what shall betide."
—Longfellow.

To be resign'd when ills betide,
Patient when favours are denied.
And pleased with favours given;—
Dear Chloe, this is wisdom's part;
This is that incense of the heart
Whose fragrance smells to heaven.
—Nathaniel Cotton.

I have heard a good story of Charles Fox. When his house was on fire, he found all efforts to save it useless, and, being a good draughtsman, he went up to the next hill to make a drawing of the fire,—the best instance of philosophy I ever heard of.—Southey.

Nature has made us passive, and to suffer is our lot. While we are in the flesh every man has his chain and his clog; only it is looser and lighter to one man than to another, and he is more at ease who takes it up and carries it than he who drags it.—Seneca.

Ye noble few! who here unbending stand
Beneath life's pressure, yet bear up awhile,
And what your bounded view, which only saw
A little part, deemed evil, is no more:
The storms of wintry time will quickly pass.
And one unbounded Spring encircle all.
—Thomson.

Our nature is like the sea, which gains by the flow of the tide in one place what it has lost by the ebb in another. A man may acquiesce in the method which God takes to mortify his pride; but he is in danger of growing proud of the mortification.—Cecil.

My soul was not only brought into harmony with itself and with God, but with God's providence. In the exercise of faith and love, I endured and performed whatever came in God's providence, in submission, in thankfulness, and silence.—Mme. Guyon.

There is more courage needed oftentimes to accept the onward flow of existence, bitter as the waters of Marah, black and narrow as the channel of Jordan, than there is ever needed to bow down the neck to the sweep of the death-angel's sword.—Ouida.

Patience and submission are very carefully to be distinguished from cowardice and indolence. We are not to repine, but we may lawfully struggle; for the calamities of life, like the necessities of nature, are calls to labor and exercise of diligence.—Dr. Johnson.

True resignation, which always brings with it the confidence that unchangeable goodness will make even the disappointment of our hopes, and the contradictions of life, conducive to some benefit, casts a grave but tranquil light over the prospect of even a toilsome and troubled life.—Humboldt.

There is but one way to tranquility of mind and happiness; let this, therefore, be always ready at hand with thee, both when thou wakest early in the morning, and all the day long, and when thou goest late to sleep, to account no external things thine own, but to commit all these to God.—Epictetus.

Pain and pleasure, good and evil, come to us from unexpected sources. It is not there where we have gathered up our brightest hopes, that the dawn of happiness breaks. It is not there where we have glanced our eye with affright, that we find the deadliest gloom. What should this teach us? To bow to the great and only

Source of light, and live humbly and with confiding resignation.—Goethe.

It is resignation and contentment that are best calculated to lead us safely through life. Whoever has not sufficient power to endure privations, and even suffering, can never feel that he is armor proof against painful emotions,—nay, he must attribute to himself, or at least to the morbid sensitiveness of his nature, every disagreeable feeling he may suffer.—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

Remember that you are an actor in a drama of such sort as the Author chooses. If short, then in a short one; if long, then in a long one. If it be His pleasure that you should act a poor man, see that you act it well; or a cripple, or a ruler, or a private citizen. For this is your business to act well the given part; but to choose it, belongs to another.—Epictetus.

I take this pain, Lord Jesus,
From Thine own hand;
The strength to bear it bravely
Thou wilt command.
I am too weak for effort,
So let me rest,
In hush of sweet submission
On Thine own breast.
—F. R. Havergal.

It seem'd so hard at first, mother, to leave the blessed sun,
And now it seems as hard to stay—and yet
His will be done!
But still I think it can't be long before I find release;
And that good man, the clergyman, has told me words of peace. —Tennyson.

I have been a great deal happier since I have given up thinking about what is easy and pleasant, and being discontented because I could not have my own will. Our life is determined for us; and it makes the mind very free when we give up wishing, and only think of bearing what is laid upon us and doing what is given us to do.—George Eliot.

Teach us to submit ourselves to Thy chastenings, believing Thy love in them all. Thou hast given us Christ, and in Him eternal life. Oh, how can we think Thou wouldst withhold from us anything else if it were good for us! Lord, let us not choose for ourselves. Choose Thou for us in Thy wisdom and love, and let our hearts approve Thy choice. Be Thou our portion, our light, and our joy in Christ Jesus. Help us ever watchfully to cherish a meek and quiet spirit, ever looking unto Him who was meek and lowly of heart, that we may find rest unto our souls.—Hall's Family Prayers.

We are to take no counsel with flesh and blood; give ear to no vain cavils, vain sorrows and wishes; to know that we know nothing, that the worst and cruelest to our eyes is not what it seems, that we have to receive whatsoever befalls us as sent from God above, and say, "It is good and wise,—God is great! Though He slay me, yet I trust in Him." Islam means, in its way, denial of self. This is yet the highest wisdom that heaven has revealed to our earth.—Carlyle.

"A little way!"—this sentence I repeat, Hoping and longing to extract some sweet To mingle with the bitter; from Thy hand I take the cup I cannot understand, And in my weakness give myself to Thee.

Strike! Thou the Master, we Thy keys,
The anthem of the destinies!
The minor of Thy loftier strain,
Our hearts shall breathe the old refrain—
"Thy will be done!"

—John G. Whittier.

I cannot speak
In happy tones; the tear drops on my cheek
Show I am sad;
But I can speak
Of grace to suffer with submission meek,
Until made glad.

I cannot feel
That all is well, when dark'ning clouds conceal
The shining sun;
But then I know
God lives and loves; and say, since it is so,
"Thy will be done."

—F. G. Browning.

Resistance

When time and need require, we should resist with all our might, and prefer death to slavery and disgrace.—Cicero.

Resolution

Resolve, and thou art free.—Longfellow.

A good resolve will make any port.—Horace.

Never tell your resolution beforehand.—John Selden.

He only is a well-made man who has a good determination.—Emerson.

Every tub must stand upon its own bottom.—Bunyan.

For what I will, I will, and there an end.—Shakespeare.

And hearts resolved and hands prepared
The blessings they enjoy to guard.
—Smollett.

Resolves perish into vacancy, that, if executed, might have been noble works.—Henry Giles.

I will be as harsh as truth and as uncompromising as justice.—William Lloyd Garrison.

When resolution hath prepar'd the will;
It wants no helps to further any ill.
—Mirror for Magistrates.

Experience teacheth us that resolution is a sole help in need.—Shakespeare.

Put on
The dauntless spirit of resolution.
—Shakespeare.

For ebbing resolution ne'er returns,
But falls still further from its former shore.
—Home.

Attempt the end, and never stand to doubt,
Nothing's so hard but search will find it out.
—Herrick.

Tell your master that if there were as many devils at Worms as tiles on its roofs, I would enter.—Martin Luther.

Sudden resolutions, like the sudden rise of the mercury in the barometer, indicate little else than the changeableness of the weather.—Hare.

I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse—I will not retreat a single inch; and I will be heard.—William Lloyd Garrison.

Do not, for one repulse, forego the purpose That you resolv'd to effect.—Shakespeare.

My resolution's plac'd, and I have nothing Of woman in me: Now from head to foot I am marble-constant.—Shakespeare.

Hast thou attempted greatness?
Then go on;
Back-turning slackens resolution.
—Herrick.

In truth there is no such thing in man's nature as a settled and full resolve either for good or evil, except at the very moment of execution.—Nath. Hawthorne.

The native hue of resolution
Is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought;
And enterprises of great pith and moment,
With this regard, their currents turn awry,
And lose the name of action.
—Shakespeare.

Let come what will, I mean to bear it out,
And either live with glorious victory,
Or die with fame, renown'd for chivalry:
He is not worthy of the honey-comb,
That shuns the hive because the bees have stings.
—Shakespeare.

A good inclination is but the first rude draught of virtue, but the finishing strokes are from the will; which, if well disposed, will by degrees perfect,—if ill disposed, will by the superinduction of ill habits quickly deface it.—South.

If we have need of a strong will in order to do good, it is more necessary still for us in order not to do evil; from which it often results that the most modest life is that where the force of will is most exercised.—Count Mole.

Be not too slow in the breaking of a sinful custom; a quick, courageous resolution is better than a gradual deliberation; in such a combat he is the bravest soldier that lays about him without fear or wit. Wit pleads, fear disheartens; he that would kill

Hydra had better strike off one neck than five heads: fell the tree, and the branches are soon cut off.—Quarles.

In life's small things be resolute and great
To keep thy muscle trained: know'st thou when Fate

Thy measure takes, or when she'll say to thee,

"I find thee worthy; do this deed for me?"
—Lowell.

For when two
Join in the same adventure, one perceives
Before the other how they ought to act;
While one alone, however prompt, resolves
More tardily and with a weaker will.
—Homer.

All the soul
Of man is resolution; which expires
Never from valiant men, till their last breath;
And then with it, like a flame extinguish'd
For want of matter; it does not die, but Rather ceases to live.
—Chapman.

Experience teacheth us
That resolution's a sole help at need:
And this, my lord, our honour teacheth us,
That we be bold in every enterprise:
Then since there is no way, but fight or die,
Be resolute, my lord, for victory.
—Shakespeare.

Be stirring as the time; be fire with fire;
Threaten the threat'ner and outface the brow
Of bragging horror: so shall inferior eyes,
That borrow their behaviours from the great,
Grow great by your example and put on
The dauntless spirit of resolution.
—Shakespeare.

I was acquainted once with a gallant soldier who assured me that his only measure of courage was this: upon the first fire, in an engagement, he immediately looked upon himself as a dead man. He then bravely fought out the remainder of the day, perfectly regardless of all manner of danger, as becomes a dead man to be. So that all the life or limbs he carried back again to his tent he reckoned as clear gains, or, as he himself expressed it, so much out of the fire.
—Sterne.

Respect

Respect is better procured by executing than soliciting it.—Greville.

Self-respect is the best of all.—Hosea Ballou.

He who respects others is respected by them.—Mencius.

The icy precepts of respect.—Shakespeare.

Women seldom forfeit their claims to respect to men whom they respect.—Bovee.

To be capable of respect is wellnigh as rare at the present day as to be worthy of it.—Joubert.

He who has no pleasure in looking up, is not fit so much as to look down.—Washington Allston.

Respect is a serious thing in him who feels it, and the height of honor for him who inspires the feeling.—Mme. Swetchine.

Some men use no other means to acquire respect than by insisting on it; and it sometimes answers their purpose, as it does a highwayman's in regard to money.—Shenstone.

Be fearful only of thyself, and stand in awe of none more than of thine own conscience. There is a Cato in every man, a severe censor of his manners; and he that reverences this judge will seldom do anything he need repent of.—Thomas Fuller.

Responsibility

Every one of us shall give account of himself to God.—Bible.

Responsibility walks hand in hand with capacity and power.—J. G. Holland.

Nature holds an immense uncollected debt over every man's head.—Beecher.

And how his audit stands who knows, save Heaven?—Shakespeare.

Much misconstruction and bitterness are spared to him who thinks naturally upon what he owes to others, rather than what he ought to expect from them.—Madame Guizot.

Posterity pays for the sins of their fathers.—Quintus Curtius Rufus.

The plea of ignorance will never take away our responsibilities.—Ruskin.

If the master takes no account of his servants, they will make small account of him, and care not what they spend, who are never brought to an audit.—Fuller.

We are a compound of both here and hereafter; we shall be made responsible for the actions of both while here. Anything beyond this is beyond our power to prove, and would be of no real value if we could.—B. R. Haydon.

Every human being has a work to carry on within, duties to perform abroad, influences to exert, which are peculiarly his, and which no conscience but his own can teach.—Channing.

Rest

Rest is the sweet sauce of labor.—Plutarch.

Rest is the fitting of self to its sphere.—John Dwight.

God giveth quietness at last.—Whittier.

Absence of occupation is not rest.—Cowper.

Thou hadst, for weary feet, the gift of rest.—William Watson.

On every mountain height
Is rest.—Goethe.

Rest is sweet after strife.—Lord Lytton.

The word "rest" is not in my vocabulary.—Horace Greeley.

Straining breaks the bow, and relaxation relieves the mind.—Syrus.

Silken rest tie all my cares up.—
Beaumont.

Let the weary at length possess quiet rest.—Seneca.

For too much rest itself becomes a pain.—Homer.

Thou hast made us for Thyself, and the heart never resteth till it findeth rest in Thee.—St. Augustine.

Take rest; a field that has rested gives a bountiful crop.—Ovid.

Weariness can snore upon the flint, when resty sloth finds the down pillow hard.—Shakespeare.

Diogenes found more rest in his tub than Alexander on his throne.
—Quarles.

Repose demands for its expression
the implied capability of its opposite, —energy.—Ruskin.

Where can a frail man hide him? In what arms shall a short life enjoy a little rest?—Fanshawe.

That they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them.
—Bible.

Calm on the bosom of thy God,
Fair spirit! rest thee now!
—Mrs. Hemans.

Come, lay thy head upon my breast,
And I will kiss thee into rest.
—Byron.

Men, in whatever anxiety they may be, if they are men, sometimes indulge in relaxation.—Cicero.

It is not in understanding a set of doctrines; not in outward comprehension of the "scheme of salvation," that rest and peace are to be found, but in taking up, in all lowliness and meekness, the yoke of the Lord Jesus Christ.
—F. W. Robertson.

If thou seek rest in this life, how wilt thou then attain to the everlasting rest? Dispose not thyself for much rest, but for great patience. Seek true peace—not in earth, but in heaven;

not in men, nor in any other creature,
but in God alone.—Thomas à Kempis.

And rest, that strengthens unto virtuous
deeds,
Is one with Prayer. —Bayard Taylor.

Sleepe after toyle, port after stormie seas, Ease after warre, death after life, does greatly please. —Spenser.

It is not the placidity of stupid ease that we should covet, but the repose that is requisite for the renewal of exhausted strength, the serenity that succeeds the storm, and the salubrity that repays its ravages.—E. L. Magoon.

Oh, give Thine own sweet rest to me,
That I may speak with soothing power
A word in season, as from Thee,
To weary ones in needful hour.
—F. R. Havergal.

O rest! thou soft word! autumnal flower of Eden! moonlight of the spirit! Rest of the soul, when wilt thou hold our head that it may cease beating?—Richter.

Rest is a fine medicine. Let your stomachs rest, ye dyspeptics; let your brain rest, you wearied and worried men of business; let your limbs rest, ye children of toil!—Carlyle.

Now is done thy long day's work;
Fold thy palms across thy breast,
Fold thine arms, turn to thy rest.
Let them rave. —Tennyson.

For me, my heart, that erst did go
Most like a tired child at a show,
That sees through tears the mummers leap,
Would now its wearied vision close,
Would childlike on His love repose,
Who giveth His Beloved, sleep.
—Mrs. E. B. Browning.

The Princess Elizabeth, of England, was found dead with her head resting on her Bible, open at these words,
"Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." So may we all fall asleep at last when the day's work for Jesus is over, and wake up in heaven to find ourselves in the delicious rest that remaineth for the people of God.—T. L. Cuyler.

O, what is more sweet than when the mind, set free from care, lays its burden down; and, when spent with distant travel, we come back to our home and rest our limbs on the wished-for bed? This, this alone, repays such toils as these!—Catullus.

Of all our loving Father's gifts
I often wonder which is best,
And cry: Dear God, the one that lifts
Our soul from weariness to rest,
The rest of silence—that is best.
—Mary Clemmer.

Oh, some seek bread—no more—life's mere subsistence,
And some seek wealth and ease—the common quest;
And some seek fame, that hovers in the distance;
But all are seeking rest.
—Frederick Langbridge.

Thousands of toiling hands
Where theirs have ceased from their labours,
Thousands of aching brains
Where theirs are no longer busy.
Thousands of weary feet
Where theirs have completed their journey,
Thousands of throbbing hearts
Where theirs are at rest for ever.
—Longfellow.

Rest, weary heart,
From all Thy silent griefs and secret pain,
Thy profitless regrets, and longings vain;
Wisdom and love have ordered all the past,
All shall be blessedness and joy at last;
Cast off the cares that have so long oppressed;
Rest, sweetly rest! —Jane Borthwick.

Results

The end must justify the means.—Prior.

O most lame and impotent conclusion!—Shakespeare.

A bad ending follows a bad beginning.—Euripides.

From little spark may burst a mighty flame.—Dante.

The evening shows the day, and death crowns life.—Webster.

Things had begun make strong themselves by ill.—Shakespeare.

Great floods have flown
From simple sources.—Shakespeare.

What dire offence from am'rous causes
springs,
What mighty contests rise from trivial things.
—Pope.

That from small fires comes oft no small mishap.—Herbert.

O! lady, we receive but what we give,
And in our life alone doth nature live;
Ours is her wedding-garment, ours her shroud!
—Coleridge.

The blood will follow where the knife is driven,
The flesh will quiver where the pincers tear.
—Young.

From hence, let fierce contending nations know,
What dire effects from civil discord flow.
—Addison.

So comes a reckoning when the banquet's o'er,
The dreadful reckoning, and men smile no more.
—Gay.

Who soweth good seed shall surely reap;
The year grows rich as it groweth old;
And life's latest sands are its sands of gold.
—Julia C. R. Dorr.

Sure of the Spring that warms them into birth,
The golden germs thou trustest to the Earth;
Heed'st thou as well to sow in Time the seeds
Of Wisdom for Eternity—good deeds?
—Schiller.

The thorns which I have reap'd are of the tree
I planted,—they have torn me, and I bleed:
I should have known what fruit would spring from such a seed. —Byron.

We shape ourselves the joy or fear
Of which the coming life is made,
And fill our Future's atmosphere
With sunshine or with shade.
—Whittier.

Is not this a lamentable thing, that of the skin of an innocent lamb should be made parchment? that parchment, being scribbled o'er, should undo a man?—Shakespeare.

The present is the living sum-total of the whole past.—Carlyle.

Consequences are un pitying. Our deeds carry their terrible consequences, quite apart from any fluctuations that went before—consequences that are hardly ever confined to ourselves.—George Eliot.

Resurrection

Almighty God, who, through thine only-begotten Son, Jesus Christ, hast overcome death, and opened unto us the gate of everlasting life.—Collect for Easter Day.

I see the Judge enthroned; the flaming guard:
The volume open'd!—open'd every heart!
—Young.

The diamond which shines in the Saviour's crown shall burn in unquenched beauty at last on the forehead of every human soul.—Theodore Parker.

The last loud trumpet's wondrous sound,
Shall thro' the rending tombs rebound,
And wake the nations under ground.
—Wentworth Dillon.

Happy are we if on the body of the resurrection we can bear the face with which victorious Christians leave the earth.—Samuel Willoughby Duffield.

Our Lord has written the promise of the resurrection, not in books alone, but in every leaf in spring-time.—Luther.

And there, in Abraham's bosom, whatever it be which that bosom signifies, lives my sweet friend. For what other place is there for such a soul?—St. Augustine.

Shall man alone, for whom all else revives, No resurrection know? Shall man alone, Imperial man! be sown in barren ground, Less privileged than grain, on which he feeds?
—Young.

The resurrection morning is a true sun-rising, the inbursting of a cloudless sky on all the righteous dead. They wake transfigured, at their Maker's call, with the fashion of their countenance altered and shining like His own.—Horace Bushnell.

The trumpet! the trumpet! the dead have all heard:
Lo, the depths of the stone-cover'd charnels are stirr'd:
From the sea, from the land, from the south and the north,
The vast generations of man are come forth.
—Milman.

The resurrection state is the culmination of glorified humanity; is the change of the earthly for the heavenly; is the putting off of flesh and blood, and the putting on of the spiritual body. The body of the resurrection is the body with which the spirit is clothed for its celestial life.—Bishop R. S. Foster.

How divinely full of glory and pleasure shall that hour be when all the millions of mankind that have been redeemed by the blood of the Lamb of God shall meet together and stand around Him, with every tongue and every heart full of joy and praise! How astonishing will be the glory and the joy of that day when all the saints shall join together in one common song of gratitude and love, and of everlasting thankfulness to this Redeemer! With that unknown delight, and inexpressible satisfaction, shall all that are saved from the ruins of sin and hell address the Lamb that was slain, and rejoice in His presence! —Isaac Watts.

Retirement

Modesty and dew love the shade.—Lamartine.

Love prefers twilight to daylight.—O. W. Holmes.

The statesman, lawyer, merchant, man of trade, pants for the refuge of some rural shade.—Cowper.

To fly from, need not be to hate, mankind; all are not fit with them to stir and toil.—Byron.

Domestic worth, that shuns too strong a light.—Lord Lyttleton.

Scipio, great in his triumphs, in retirement great.—Pope.

That woman is happiest whose life is passed in the shadow of a manly, loving heart.—Mme. Necker.

Full many a flower is born to blush unseen, and waste its sweetness on the desert air.—Gray.

Virtues that shun the day, and lie concealed in the smooth seasons and the calm of life.—Addison.

Woman is a flower that breathes its perfume in the shade only.—Lamennais.

O happiness of sweet retir'd content!
To be at once secure and innocent.
—Denham.

Retiring from the popular noise, I seek This unfrequented place to find some ease.
—Milton.

No noise, no care, no vanity, no strife; men, woods and fields, all breathe untroubled life.—Thomson.

Remote from man, with God he passed the days,
Prayer all his business, all his pleasure praise.
—Parnell.

Oh, blest retirement! friend to life's decline, how blest is he who crowns, in shades like these, a youth of labor with an age of ease!—Goldsmith.

Hath not old custom made this life more sweet
Than that of painted pomp? Are not these woods
More free from peril than the envious court?
—Shakespeare.

How miserable a thing is a great man:
Take noisy vexing greatness they that please,
Give me obscure, and safe, and silent ease.
—Crown.

How much they err who, to their interest blind, slight the calm peace which from retirement flows!—Mrs. Tighe.

How use doth breed a habit in a man! This shadowy desert, unfrequented woods, I better brook than flourishing peopled towns.—Shakespeare.

O sacred solitude! divine retreat!
Choice of the prudent! envy of the great!
By thy pure stream, or in thy waving shade,
We court fair Wisdom, that celestial maid.
—Young.

Welcome, ye shades! ye bowery thickets,
hail!
Ye lofty pines! ye venerable oaks!
Ye ashes wild, resounding o'er the steep!
Delicious is your shelter to the soul.
—Thomson.

An elegant sufficiency, content,
Retirement, rural quiet, friendship, books,
Ease and alternate labor, useful life,
Progressive virtue, and approving heaven!
—Thomson.

Happy the man, whose wish and care
A few paternal acres bound,
Content to breathe his native air
In his own ground.
—Pope.

The fall of waters and the song of birds,
And hills that echo to the distant herds,
Are luxuries excelling all the glare
The world can boast, and her chief favorites share.
—Cowper.

He who lives wisely to himself and his own heart looks at the busy world through the loopholes of retreat, and does not want to mingle in the fray.—Hazlitt.

Nature I'll court in her sequester'd haunts,
By mountain, meadow, streamlet, grove or cell;
Where the poised lark his evening ditty chaunts,
And health, and peace, and contemplation dwell.
—Smollett.

Now purer air
Meets his approach, and to the heart inspires
Vernal delight and joy, able to drive
All sadness but despair: Now gentle gales
Fanning their odoriferous wings, dispense Native perfumes, and whisper whence they stole Those balmy spoils.
—Milton.

Depart from the highway, and transplant thyself in some enclosed ground; for it is hard for a tree that stands by the wayside to keep her fruit till it be ripe.—St. Chrysostom.

Demean thyself more warily in thy study than in the street. If thy public actions have a hundred witnesses, thy private have a thousand. The multitude looks but upon thy actions; thy conscience looks into them; the multitude may chance to excuse thee, if not acquit thee; thy conscience will accuse thee, if not condemn thee.—Quarles.

Exert your talents and distinguish yourself, and don't think of retiring from the world until the world will be sorry that you retire. I hate a fellow whom pride or cowardice or laziness drives into a corner, and who does nothing when he is there but sit and growl. Let him come out as I do, and bark.—Johnson.

Thy shades, thy silence, now be mine,
Thy charms my only theme;
My haunt the hollow cliff, whose pine Waves o'er the gloomy stream.
Where the sacred owl, on pinions gray,
Breaks from the rustling boughs,
And down the lone vale sails away,
To more profound repose. —Beatrice.

The fall of kings,
The rage of nations, and the crush of states,
Move not the man, who, from the world
Escap'd,
In still retreats, and flowery solitudes,
To Nature's voice attends, from month to month,
And day to day, through the revolving
year;
Admiring, sees her in her every shape;
Feels all her sweet emotions at his heart;
Takes what she liberal gives, nor thinks of more, —Thomson.

The statesman, lawyer, merchant, man of trade
Pants for the refuge of some rural shade,
Where all his long anxieties forgot
Amid the charms of a sequester'd spot,
Or recollected only to gild o'er
And add a smile to what was sweet before,
He may possess the joys he thinks he sees,
Lay his old age upon the lap of ease,
Improve the remnant of his wasted span,
And having lived a trifler, die a man.
—Cowper.

Retribution

The sword is ever suspended.—Voltaire.

Whoso diggeth a pit shall fall therein.—Bible.

O heaven, that such companions thou 'dst unfold, and put in every honest hand a whip to lash the rascals naked through the world.—Shakespeare.

God's mill grinds slow, but sure.—
George Herbert.

His enemies shall lick the dust.—
Bible.

Sin let loose speaks punishment at hand.—Cowper.

Nemesis is one of God's handmaids.
—W. R. Alger.

A bad ending follows a bad beginning.—Euripides.

"One soweth and another reapeth," is a verity that applies to evil as well as good.—George Elliot.

Old age seizes upon an ill-spent youth like fire upon a rotten house.—
South.

Heaven never defaults. The wicked are sure of their wages, sooner or later.—Chapin.

I should have known what fruit would spring from such a seed.—
Byron.

Heaven often regulates effects by their causes, and pays the wicked what they have deserved.—Corneille.

He whom God hath gifted with a love of retirement possesses, as it were, an extra sense.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Let fierce contending nations know what dire effects from civil discord flow.—Addison.

To be left alone
And face to face with my own crime, had been just retribution. —Longfellow.

Though the mills of God grind slowly, yet they grind exceeding small;
Though with patience He stands waiting,
with exactness grinds He all,
—Friedrich Von Logau.

Passing too eagerly upon a provocation loses the guard and lays open the body; calmness and leisure and deliberation do the business much better.—

Jeremy Collier.

In vain we attempt to clear our conscience by affecting to compensate for fraud or cruelty by acts of strict religious homage towards God.—Blair.

Nothing is more common than for great thieves to ride in triumph when small ones are punished. But let wickedness escape as it may, at the law it never fails of doing itself justice; for every guilty person is his own hangman.—Seneca.

My lord cardinal (Cardinal Richelieu), there is one fact which you seem to have entirely forgotten. God is a sure paymaster. He may not pay at the end of every week or month or year; but I charge you, remember that He pays in the end.—Anne of Austria.

Nemesis is lame; but she is of colossal stature, like the gods, and sometimes, while her sword is not yet unsheathed, she stretches out her huge left arm and grasps her victim. The mighty hand is invisible, but the victim totters under the dire clutch.—George Eliot.

Society is like the echoing hills. It gives back to the speaker his words; groan for groan, song for song. Wouldst thou have thy social scenes to resound with music? then speak ever in the melodious strains of truth and love. "With what measure ye mete it shall be measured to you again."—Dr. David Thomas.

Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord:
He is trampling out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored;
He hath loosed the fateful lightning of his terrible swift sword;
His truth is marching on.

—Julia Ward Howe.

The world cannot afford to damn its sinners, nor will it be saved without their help. Humanity is one, and not till Lazarus is cured of his sores will Dives be safe. Whoever will thrust Magdalen into the pit will find that he has dropped with her into the flames the key that should have opened heaven for him, and assuredly shall he remain outside until she, her purification completed, shall take pity on him and bring it thence.—Celia Burleigh.

The essence of justice is mercy. Making a child suffer for wrong-doing is merciful to the child. There is no mercy in letting the child have its own will, plunging headlong to destruction with the bits in its mouth. There is no mercy to society nor to the criminal if the wrong is not repressed and the right vindicated. We injure the culprit who comes up to take his proper doom at the bar of justice, if we do not make him feel that he has done a wrong thing. We may deliver his body from the prison, but not at the expense of justice nor to his own injury.—Chapin.

Shall man alone, whose fate, whose final fate,
Hangs on that hour, exclude it from his thoughts?
I think of nothing else—I see, I feel it!
All nature like an earthquake, trembling round!
All deities, like summer's swarms on wing,
All basking in the full meridian blaze!
I see the Judge enthroned, the flaming guard!
The volume open'd—open'd every heart!
A sunbeam pointing out each secret thought!
No patron! intercessor none! now past
The sweet, the clement mediatorial hour!
For guilt! no plea! to pain no pause! no bound!
Inexorable all! and all extreme!—Young.

Retrospect

By our remembrances of days foregone.—Shakespeare.

And oft a retrospect delights the mind.—Dante.

Pleasure is the flower that fades; remembrance is the lasting perfume.—Boufflers.

It is the only paradise out of which we cannot be driven.—Richter.

Of no day can the retrospect cause pain to a good man.—Martial.

In our lonely hours we awake those sleeping images with which our memories are stored, and vitalize them again.—Mme. de Genlis.

In that sweet mood when pleasant thoughts bring sad thoughts to the mind.—Wordsworth.

A lively retrospect summons back to us once more our youth, with vivid reflex of its early joys and unstained pleasures.—Alfred de Musset.

If our past actions reproach us, they cannot be atoned for by our own severe reflections so effectually as by a contrary behavior.—Steele.

Thought and her shadowy brood thy call obey, and place and time are subject to thy sway.—Rogers.

The greatest comfort of my old age, and that which gives me the highest satisfaction, is the pleasing remembrance of the many benefits and friendly offices I have done to others.—Cato.

A man advanced in years, that thinks fit to look back upon his former life, and call that only life which was passed with satisfaction and enjoyment, excluding all parts which were not pleasant to him, will find himself very young, if not in his infancy.—Steele.

'Tis greatly wise to talk with our past hours,
And ask them what report they've borne to heaven,
And how they might have borne more welcome news,
Their answers form what men experience call;
If wisdom's friend, her best; if not, worst foe.
—Young.

Where is the one who hath not had
Some anguish-trial, long gone by,
Steal, spectre-like, all dark and sad
On busy thought, till the full eye
And aching breast, betray'd too well,
The past still held undying spell?
—Eliza Cook.

He possesses dominion over himself and is happy, who can every day say, "I have lived." To-morrow the Heavenly Father may either involve the world in dark clouds or cheer it with clear sunshine; he will not, however, render ineffectual the things which have already taken place.—Horace.

Had we a privilege of calling up by the power of memory only such passages as were pleasing, unmixed with such as were disagreeable, we might then excite at pleasure an ideal happiness, perhaps more poignant than actual sensation.—Tuckerman.

Revelation

Nature is a revelation of God;
Art a revelation of man.
—Longfellow.

'Tis Revelation satisfies all doubts,
Explains all mysteries except her own,
And so illuminates the path of life,
That fools discover it, and stray no more.
—Cowper.

Lochiel, Lochiel! beware of the day;
For, dark and despairing, my sight I may seal
But man cannot cover what God would reveal;
'Tis the sunset of life gives me mystical lore,
And coming events cast their shadows before.
—Campbell.

I am verily persuaded the Lord has more truth yet to break forth out of His holy word. * * * I beseech you, remember (it is an article of your church covenant) that you be ready to receive whatever truth shall be made known to you from the word of God.—John Robinson.

Revenge

Revenge is a kind of wild justice.—Bacon.

Revenge is profitable.—Gibbon.

Sweet is revenge—especially to women.—Byron.

The malevolent have hidden teeth.—Publius Syrus.

To revenge is no valor, but to bear.—Shakespeare.

Which, if not victory, is yet revenge.—Milton.

Revenge is lost in agony, and wild remorse to rage succeeds.—Byron.

The whirligig of time brings in his revenges.—Shakespeare.

Révenge is an inhuman word.—Seneca.

Revenge, at first though sweet, bitter ere long, back on itself recoils.—Milton.

Revenge, the attribute of gods! they stamped it with their great image on our natures.—Otway.

A readiness to resent injuries is a virtue only in those who are slow to injure.—Sheridan.

Had all his hairs been lives, my great revenge had stomach for them all.—Shakespeare.

Revenge, we find, the abject pleasure of an abject mind.—Juvenal.

Revenge is the naked idol of the worship of a semi-barbarous age.—Shelley.

He that studieth revenge keepeth his own wounds green.—Bacon.

The best sort of revenge is not to be like him who did the injury.—Marcus Antoninus.

To work a fell revenge a man's a fool, if not instructed in a woman's school.—Fletcher.

In taking revenge a man is but equal to his enemy, but in passing it over he is his superior.—Bacon.

Why revenge an enemy when you can outwit him?—Xolotl.

It is a quarrel most unnatural.
To be reveng'd on him that loveth thee.
—Shakespeare.

Honour hath her degrees: there is excess
In all revenge, that may be done with less.

No man ever did me so much good, or enemy so much harm, but I repaid him with interest.—Sulla.

Revenge is sweeter than life itself.
So think fools.—Juvenal.

He is below himself that's not above an injury.—Quarles.

If I can catch him once upon the hip,
I will feed fat the ancient grudge I bear him.
—Shakespeare.

'Tis sweet to love; but when with scorn we meet,
Revenge supplies the loss with joys as great.
—Lord Lansdowne.

There is no passion of the human heart that promises so much and pays so little as revenge.—H. W. Shaw.

The indulgence of revenge tends to make men more savage and cruel.—Lord Kames.

Revenge, that thirsty dropsy of our souls, makes us covet that which hurts us most.—Massinger.

Those who plot the destruction of others often fall themselves.—Phædrus.

While you are meditating revenge, the devil is meditating a recruit.—Malherbe.

O, that the slave had forty thousand lives;
One is too poor, too weak for my revenge.
—Shakespeare.

Revenge is a debt, in the paying of which the greatest knave is honest and sincere, and, so far as he is able, punctual.—Colton.

Revenge is an act of passion; vengeance, of justice: injuries are revenged; crimes are avenged.—Dr. Johnson.

If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head.—Bible.

In one consort there sat cruel revenge and rancorous despite, disloyal treason and heart-burning hate.—Spenser.

What is revenge but courage to call in our honor's debts, and wisdom to convert others' self-love into our own protection?—Young.

There are some professed Christians who would gladly burn their enemies, but yet who forgive them merely because it is heaping coals of fire on their heads.—F. A. Durivage.

Vengeance to God alone belongs;
But, when I think of all my wrongs,
My blood is liquid flame. —Scott.

Pleasure and revenge
Have ears more deaf than adds to the voice
Of any true decision. —Shakespeare.

I will not be revenged, and this I owe to my enemy; but I will remember, and this I owe to myself.—Colton.

An act by which we make one friend and one enemy is a losing game; because revenge is a much stronger principle than gratitude.—Colton.

Revenge is barren of itself; itself is the dreadful food it feeds on; its delight is murder, and its safety, despair.—Schiller.

Nothing is more ruinous for a man than when he is mighty enough in any part to right himself without right.—Jacobi.

Haste me to know it; that I with wings as swift as meditation, or the thoughts of love, may sweep to my revenge.—Shakespeare.

Revenge is fever in our own blood, to be cured only by letting the blood of another; but the remedy too often produces a relapse, which is remorse—a malady far more dreadful than the first disease, because it is incurable.—Colton.

Revenge, which, like envy, is an instinct of justice, does but take into its own hands the execution of that natural law which precedes the social.—Chatfield.

The vengeful thought that has root merely in the mind is but a dream of idlest sort which one clear day will dissipate; while revenge, the passion, is a disease of the heart which climbs up, up to the brain, and feeds itself on both alike.—Lew Wallace.

Heat not a furnace for your foe so hot that it doth singe yourself. We may outrun by violent swiftness that which we run at, and lose by overrunning.—Shakespeare.

In revenge a man is but even with his enemy; for it is a princely thing to pardon, and Solomon saith it is the glory of a man to pass over a transgression.—Bacon.

Neither is it safe to count upon the weakness of any man's understanding, who is thoroughly possessed of the spirit of revenge to sharpen his invention.—Swift.

Revenge commonly hurts both the offerer and sufferer; as we see in a foolish bee, which in her anger invenometh the flesh and loseth her sting, and so lives a drone ever after.—Bishop Hall.

Not to be provoked is best; but if moved, never correct till the fume is spent; for every stroke our fury strikes is sure to hit ourselves at last.—William Penn.

It is through madness that we hate an enemy, and think of revenging ourselves; and it is through indolence that we are appeased, and do not revenge ourselves.—Bruyère.

A pure and simple revenge does in no way restore man towards the felicity which the injury did interrupt; for revenge is but doing a simple evil, and does not, in its formality, imply reparation.—Jeremy Taylor.

There are things
Which make revenge a virtue by reflection,
And not an impulse of mere anger; though
The laws sleep, justice wakes, and injur'd souls
Oft do a public right with private wrong.
—Byron.

The best manner of avenging ourselves is by not resembling him who has injured us; and it is hardly possible for one man to be more unlike another than he that forbears to avenge himself of wrong is to him who did the wrong.—Jane Porter.

He that thinks he shows boldness or height of mind by a scurrilous reply to a scurrilous provocation measures himself by a false standard, and acts not the spirit of a man, but the spleen of a wasp.—South.

'Tis an old tale, and often told;
But did my fate and wish agree,
Ne'er had been read, in story old,
Of maiden true betray'd for gold,
That loved, or was avenged, like me!
—Scott.

If we do but watch the hour,
There never yet was human power
Which could evade, if unforgiven,
The patient search and vigil long
Of him who treasures up a wrong.
—Byron.

To hell, allegiance! vows, to the blackest
devill Conscience, and grace, to the profoundest pit!
I dare damnation: To this point I stand,—
That both the worlds I give to negligence, Let come what comes; only I'll be re-veng'd.
—Shakespeare.

We can more easily avenge an injury than requite a kindness; on this account, because there is less difficulty in getting the better of the wicked than in making one's self equal with the good.—Cicero.

If you are affronted, it is better to pass it by in silence, or with a jest, though with some dishonor, than to endeavor revenge. If you can keep reason above passion, that and watchfulness will be your best defendants.—Newton.

But if for wrongs we needs revenge must have,
Then be our vengeance of the noblest kind:
Do we his body from our fury save,
And let our hate prevail against his mind?
What can 'gainst him a greater vengeance
be,
Than make his foe more worthy far than
he.
—Lady Elizabeth Carew.

On him that takes revenge revenge shall be taken, and by a real evil he shall dearly pay for the goods that are but airy and fantastical; it is like a rolling stone, which, when a man hath forced up a hill, will return upon him with a greater violence, and break those bones whose sinews gave it motion.—Jeremy Taylor.

If anything can legalize revenge, it should be injury from an extremely obliged person; but revenge is so absolutely the peculiar of heaven that no consideration whatever can empower even the best men to assume the execution of it.—South.

The most tolerable sort of revenge is for those wrongs which there is no law to remedy. But then let a man take heed that the revenge be such as there is no law to punish; else a man's enemy is still beforehand, and is two for one.—Bacon.

Revenge is a common passion; it is the sin of the uninstructed. The savage deems it noble; but Christ's religion, which is the sublime civilizer, emphatically condemns it. Why? Because religion ever seeks to ennoble man; and nothing so debases him as revenge.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Few things are more agreeable to self-love than revenge, and yet no cause so effectually restrains us from revenge as self-love. And this paradox naturally suggests another; that the strength of the community is not unfrequently built upon the weakness of those individuals that compose it.—Colton.

Some philosophers would give a sex to revenge, and appropriate it almost exclusively to the female mind. But, like most other vices, it is of both genders; yet, because wounded vanity and slighted love are the two most powerful excitements to revenge, it has been thought, perhaps, to rage with more violence in the female heart.—Colton.

All the ends of human felicity are secured without revenge, for without it we are permitted to restore ourselves; and therefore it is against natural reason to do an evil that no way co-operates the proper and perfect end of human nature. And he is a miserable person, whose good is the evil of his neighbor; and he that revenges in many cases does worse than he that did the injury; in all cases as bad.—Jeremy Taylor.

Reverence

Henceforth the Majesty of God revere; Fear him and you have nothing else to fear.
—Fordyce.

If we wish ourselves to be high, we should treat that which is over us as high.—Trollope.

To yield reverence to another, to hold ourselves and our lives at his disposal, is not slavery; often, it is the noblest state in which a man can live in this world.—Ruskin.

What a sweet reverence is that when a young man deems his mistress a little more than mortal and almost chides himself for longing to bring her close to his heart.—Nath. Hawthorne.

When once thy foot enters the church, be bare.
God is more there than thou: for thou art
there
Only by His permission. Then beware,
And make thyself all reverence and fear.
—Herbert.

Reverses

A man that fortune's buffets and rewards has taken with equal thanks.—Shakespeare.

It is the amends of a short and troublesome life, that doing good and suffering ill entitles man to one longer and better.—William Penn.

He who sows, even with tears, the precious seed of faith, hope and love shall "doubtless come again with joy and bring his sheaves with him"; because it is in the very nature of that seed to yield, under the kindly influence secured to it, a joyful harvest.—Cecil.

Every duty brings its peculiar delight, every denial its appropriate compensation, every thought its recompense, every love its elysium, every cross its crown; pay goes with performance as effect with cause. Meanness overreaches itself; vice vitiates whoever indulges in it; the wicked wrong their own souls; generosity greatens; virtue exalts; charity transfigures; and holiness is the essence of angelhood. God does not require us to live on credit; he pays us what we earn as we earn it, good or evil, heaven or hell, according to our choice.

—Charles Mildmay.

Revery

Revery is when ideas float in our mind without reflection or regard of the understanding.—Locke.

Sit in revery, and watch the changing color of the waves that break upon the idle sea-shore of the mind.—Longfellow.

To lose one's self in revery, one must be either very happy or very unhappy. Revery is the child of extreme.—Rivarol.

Revery, which is thought in its nebulous state, borders closely upon the land of sleep, by which it is bounded as by a natural frontier.—Victor Hugo.

Revolution

Revolution is the larva of civilization.—Victor Hugo.

The worst of revolutions is a restoration.—C. J. Fox.

At last I perceive that in revolutions the supreme power finally rests with the most abandoned.—Danton.

General rebellions and revolts of a whole people never were encouraged, now or at any time. They are always provoked.—Burke.

In seasons of tumult and discord bad men have most power; mental and moral excellence require peace and quietness.—Tacitus.

Nothing has ever remained of any revolution but what was ripe in the conscience of the masses.—Ledru Rollin.

When Marmontel was regretting the excesses of the period, Chamfort asked: "Do you think that revolutions are made with rose-water?"—Wendell Phillips.

It is only by instigation of the wrongs of men that what we call the rights of men become turbulent and dangerous.—Lowell.

It is a rule in games of chance that "the cards beat all the players;" and revolutions disconcert and outwit all the insurgents.—Emerson.

Revolutions are like the most noxious dunghills, which bring into life the noblest vegetables.—Napoleon.

Stimulants do not give strength, comets do not give heat, and revolutions do not give liberty.—Philarete Chasles.

Great revolutions are the work rather of principles than of bayonets, and are achieved first in the moral, and afterwards in the material sphere.—Mazzini.

All experience hath shown that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed.—Jefferson.

The iron harrow of revolution crushes men like the clods of the field, but in the blood-stained furrows germinates a new generation, and the soul agrieved believes again.—Guizot.

As men are affected in all ages by the same passions, the occasions which bring about great changes are different, but the causes are always the same.—Montesquieu.

The best security against revolution is in constant correction of abuses and introduction of needed improvements. It is the neglect of timely repair that makes rebuilding necessary.—Whately.

Insurrection, never so necessary, is a most sad necessity; and governors who wait for that to instruct them are surely getting into the fatalest course.—Carlyle.

Revolutions are not made, they come. A revolution is as natural a growth as an oak. It comes out of the past. Its foundations are laid far back.—Wendell Phillips.

We deplore the outrages which accompany revolutions. But the more violent the outrages, the more assured we feel that a revolution was necessary.—Macaulay.

The working of revolutions misleads me no more; it is as necessary to our race as its waves to the stream, that it may not be a stagnant marsh. Ever renewed in its forms, the genius of humanity blossoms.—Herder.

It is far more easy to pull down than to build up, and to destroy than to preserve. Revolutions have on this account been falsely supposed to be fertile of great talent; as the dregs rise to the top during a fermentation, and the lightest things are carried highest by the whirlwind.—Colton.

Those who give the first shock to a state are naturally the first to be overwhelmed in its ruin. The fruits of public commotion are seldom enjoyed by the man who was the first to set it a going; he only troubles the water for another's net.—Montaigne.

Rhetoric

Rhetoric is nothing but reason well dressed and argument put in order.—Jeremy Collier.

The two best rules for a system of rhetoric are: first, have something to say; and next, say it.—George Emmons.

Rhetoric is the creature of art, which he who feels least will most excel in; it is the quackery of eloquence, and deals in nostrums, not in cures.—Colton.

There is a truth and beauty in rhetoric; but it oftener serves ill turns than good ones.—William Penn.

Rhetoric in serious discourses is like the flowers in corn; pleasing to those who come only for amusement, but prejudicial to him who would reap profit from it.—Swift.

Riches

A mask of gold hides all deformities.—Decker.

A great fortune is a great slavery.—Seneca.

The heart contracts as the pocket expands.—Bovee.

Common sense among men of fortune is rare.—Juvenal.

Riches are able to solder up abundance of flaws.—Cervantes.

No good man ever became suddenly rich.—Syrus.

It is better to live rich than to die rich.—Johnson.

Riches are not an end of life, but an instrument of life.—Henry Ward Beecher.

The care of a large estate is an unpleasant thing.—Juvenal.

Riches either serve or govern the possessor.—Horace.

He that maketh haste to be rich shall not be innocent.—Bible.

Riches, rightly used, breed delight.—Plautus.

The ungovernable passion for wealth.—Ovid.

If all were rich, gold would be peniless.—Bailey.

Satiety comes of riches and contumaciousness of satiety.—Solon.

A man's true wealth is the good he does in this world.—Mohammed.

Nothing is so hard for those who abound in riches as to conceive how others can be in want.—Swift.

To be thought rich is as good as to be rich.—Thackeray.

Riches are well, if gotten well and spent well.—Vespasian.

If a man wishes to become rich he must appear to be rich.—Goldsmith.

The smallness of our desires may contribute reasonably to our wealth.—Cobbett.

The rich fool is like a pig that is choked by its own fat.—Confucius.

How many threadbare souls are to be found under silken cloaks and gowns!—Thomas Brooks.

He hath riches sufficient who hath enough to be charitable.—Sir Thomas Browne.

Riches are of no value in themselves; their use is discovered only in that which they procure.—Dr. Johnson.

Everything, virtue, glory, honor, things human and divine, all are slaves to riches.—Horace.

Riches are apt to betray a man into arrogance.—Addison.

In this world, it is not what we take up, but what we give up, that makes us rich.—Beecher.

Rich men without wisdom and learning are called sheep with golden fleeces.—Solon.

Riches for the most part are hurtful to them that possess them.—Plutarch.

Therefore, if at great things thou wouldst arrive,
Get riches first, get wealth. —Milton.

Wealth is not his that has it, but his that enjoys it.—Franklin.

Ah, if the rich were rich as the poor fancy riches!—Emerson.

That man is the richest whose pleasures are the cheapest.—Thoreau.

Riches without law are more dangerous than is poverty without law.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Riches exclude only one inconvenience—that is, poverty.—Dr. Johnson.

Increasing wealth is attended by care and by the desire of greater increase.—Horace.

Superfluity comes sooner by white hairs, but competency lives longer.—Shakespeare.

In these times gain is not only a matter of greed, but of ambition.—Joubert.

Riches cannot rescue from the grave, which claims alike the monarch and the slave.—Dryden.

His best companions innocence and health, and his best riches ignorance of wealth.—Goldsmith.

Great abundance of riches cannot of any man be both gathered and kept without sin.—Erasmus.

It is more pitiable once to have been rich than not to be rich now.—J. Petit-Senn.

Riches, perhaps, do not so often produce crimes as incite accusers.—Johnson.

Riches expose a man to pride and luxury, and a foolish elation of heart.—Addison.

Few men are both rich and generous; fewer are both rich and humble.—Cardinal Manning.

Riches are of little avail in many of the calamities to which mankind are liable.—Cervantes.

Riches do not exhilarate us so much with their possession as they torment us with their loss.—Gregory.

However rich or elevated, a nameless something is always wanting to our imperfect fortune.—Horace.

O, my God! withhold from me the wealth to which tears and sighs and curses cleave. Better none at all than wealth like that.—Christian Scriver.

No man can make haste to be rich without going against the will of God, in which case it is the one frightful thing to be successful.—George MacDonald.

Riches do not consist in having more gold and silver, but in having more in proportion than our neighbors.—Locke.

It was wisely said, by a man of great observation, that there are as many miseries beyond riches as on this side of them.—Izaak Walton.

Men who have great riches and little culture rush into business, because they are weary of themselves.—Horace Greeley.

Of all the riches that we hug, of all the pleasures we enjoy, we can carry no more out of this world than out of a dream.—Bonnell.

Riches without charity are nothing worth. They are a blessing only to him who makes them a blessing to others.—Fielding.

Men who could willingly resign the luxuries and sensual pleasures of a large fortune cannot consent to live without the grandeur and the homage.—Johnson.

It is not the greatness of a man's means that makes him independent, so much as the smallness of his wants.—Cobbett.

We see how much a man has, and therefore we envy him; did we see how little he enjoys, we should rather pity him.—Seed.

For everything divine and human, virtue, fame and honor, now obey the alluring influence of riches.—Horace.

As riches and favor forsake a man, we discover him to be a fool, but nobody could find it out in his prosperity.

—La Bruyère.

Seek not proud riches, but such as thou may'st get justly use soberly, distribute cheerfully, and leave contentedly; yet have no abstract nor friarly contempt of them.—Bacon.

The use we make of our fortune determines its sufficiency. A little is enough if used wisely, and too much if expended foolishly.—Bovee.

Riches amassed in haste will diminish; but those collected by hand and little by little will multiply.—Goethe.

Men leave their riches either to their kindred or their friends, and moderate portions prosper best in both.—Bacon.

Noble descent and worth, unless united with wealth, are esteemed no more than seaweed.—Horace.

If we are rich with the riches which we neither give nor enjoy, we are rich with the riches which are buried in the caverns of the earth.—Veeshnoo Sarma.

The god of this world is riches, pleasure and pride, wherewith it abuses all the creatures and gifts of God.—Luther.

High-built abundance, heap on heap! for what?
To breed new wants, and beggar us the more,
Then, make a richer scramble for the throng.
—Young.

If I have but enough for myself and family, I am steward only for myself: if I have more, I am but a steward of that abundance for others.—George Herbert.

Worldly wealth is the devil's bait; and those whose minds feed upon riches, recede, in general, from real happiness, in proportion as their stores increase.—Burton.

Riches should be admitted into our houses, but not into our hearts; we may take them into our possession, but not into our affections.—Charron.

There is one way whereby we may secure our riches, and make sure friends to ourselves of them,—by laying them out in charity.—Tillotson.

Labor not to be rich; * * * for riches certainly make themselves wings; they fly away as an eagle toward heaven.—Bible.

May I deem the wise man rich, and may I have such a portion of gold as none but a prudent man can either bear or employ.—Plato.

He is rich whose income is more than his expenses; and he is poor whose expenses exceed his income.—Bruyère.

The rich and poor meet together: the Lord is the maker of them all.—Bible.

The rich are like beasts of burden, carrying treasure all day, and at the night of death unladen; they carry to their grave only the bruises and marks of their toil.—St. Augustine.

Never respect men merely for their riches, but rather for their philanthropy; we do not value the sun for its height, but for its use.—Bailey.

But Christian faith knows that wealth means responsibility, and that responsibility may come to mean only heavy arrears of sin.—H. P. Liddon.

He is the rich man who can avail himself of all men's faculties. He is the richest man who knows how to draw a benefit from the labors of the greatest number of men,—of men in distant countries and in past times.—Emerson.

The greatest and most amiable privilege which the rich enjoy over the poor is that which they exercise the least—the privilege of making them happy.—Colton.

Of riches it is not necessary to write the praise. Let it, however, be remembered that he who has money to spare has it always in his power to benefit others, and of such power a good man must always be desirous.—

Johnson.

The greatest luxury of riches is that they enable you to escape so much good advice. The rich are always advising the poor; but the poor seldom venture to return the compliment.—
Sir Arthur Helps.

No man can tell whether he is rich or poor by turning to his ledger. It is the heart that makes a man rich. He is rich or poor according to what he is, not according to what he has.—
Beecher.

If thou art rich, thou art poor; for, like an ass, whose back with ingots bows, thou bearest thy heavy riches but a journey, and death unloads thee.—
Shakespeare.

We see but the outside of a rich man's happiness; few consider him to be like the silkworm, that, when she seems to play, is at the very same time consuming herself.—Izaak Walton.

Extol not riches then, the toil of fools,
The wise man's cumbrance, if not snare,
more apt

To slacken virtue, and abate her edge,
Than prompt her to do aught may merit
praise. —Milton.

To whom can riches give repute or trust.
Content or pleasure, but the good and just?
Judges and senates have been bought for
gold,

Esteem and love were never to be sold.
—Pope.

The contempt of riches in the philosophers was a concealed desire of revenging on fortune the injustice done to their merit, by despising the good she denied them.—Rochefoucauld.

Riches, though they may reward virtues, yet they cannot cause them; he is much more noble who deserves a benefit than he who bestows one.— Feltham.

The ways to enrich are many, and most of them foul. Parsimony is one of the best, and yet is not innocent; for it withholdeth men from works of liberality and charity.—Bacon.

Riches in their acquisition bring pain and suffering, in their loss manifold trouble and sorrow, in their possession a wild intoxication. How can we say that they confer happiness?—
Hitopadesa.

An eager pursuit of fortune is inconsistent with a severe devotion to truth. The heart must grow tranquil before the thought can become searching.—Bovee.

When we see the shameful fortunes amassed in all quarters of the globe, are we not impelled to exclaim that Judas' thirty pieces of silver have fructified across the centuries?—Mme. Swetchine.

Worldly riches are like nuts; many clothes are torn in getting them, many a tooth broke in cracking them, but never a belly filled with eating them.—
R. Venning.

Riches, honors and pleasures are the sweets which destroy the mind's appetite for its heavenly food; poverty, disgrace and pain are the bitters which restore it.—Bishop Horne.

Misery assails riches, as lightning does the highest towers; or as a tree that is heavy laden with fruit breaks its own boughs, so do riches destroy the virtue of their possessor.—Burton.

Wouldst thou multiply thy riches? diminish them wisely; or wouldst thou make thy estate entire? divide it charitably. Seeds that are scattered increase; but, hoarded up, they perish.—
Quarles.

There is a burden of care in getting riches, fear in keeping them, temptation in using them, guilt in abusing them, sorrow in losing them, and a burden of account at last to be given up concerning them.—Matthew Henry.

If the search for riches were sure to be successful, though I should become a groom with a whip in my hand to get them, I will do so. As the search may not be successful, I will follow after that which I love.—Confucius.

If by the consecration of my earthly possessions to some extent I can make the Christian character practically more lovely, and illustrate, in my own case, that the highest enjoyments here are promoted by the free use of the good things intrusted to us, what so good use can I make of them?—Amos Lawrence.

The rich man's son inherits cares:
The bank may break, the factory burn,
A breath may burst his bubble shares,
And soft white hands could hardly earn
A living that would serve his turn.
—James Russell Lowell.

The riches of a country are to be valued by the quantity of labor its inhabitants are able to purchase, and not by the quantity of silver and gold they possess; which will purchase more or less labor, and therefore is more or less valuable, as is said before, according to its scarcity or plenty.—Benjamin Franklin.

Some of God's noblest sons, I think, will be selected from those that know how to take wealth, with all its temptations, and maintain godliness therewith. It is hard to be a saint standing in a golden niche.—Beecher.

Plenty and indigence depend upon the opinion every one has of them; and riches, no more than glory or health, have no more beauty or pleasure than their possessor is pleased to lend them.—Montaigne.

What real good does an addition to a fortune already sufficient prove? Not any. Could the great man, by having his fortune increased, increase also his appetites, then precedence might be attended with real amusement.—Goldsmith.

My purse is very slim, and very few
The acres that I number;
But I am seldom stupid, never blue,
My riches are an honest heart and true,
And quiet slumber. —Epes Sargent.

Riches are for the comfort of life, and not life for the accumulation of riches. I asked a holy wise man, "Who is fortunate and who is unfortunate?" He replied: "He was fortunate who ate and sowed, and he was unfortunate who died without having enjoyed."—Saadi.

O grievous folly to heap up estate,
Losing the days you see beneath the sun,
When, sudden, comes blind unrelenting Fate,
And gives th' untasted portion you have won
With ruthless toil, and many a wretch undone,
To those who mock you, gone to Pluto's reign. —Thomson.

Why lose we life in anxious cares,
To lay in hoards for future years?
Can those (when tortur'd by disease),
Clear our sick hearts, or purchase ease?
Can those prolong one gasp of breath,
Or calm the troubled hour of death?
—Gay.

If thou art rich, then show the greatness of thy fortune, or what is better, the greatness of thy soul, in the meekness of thy conversation; condescend to men of low estate, support the distressed and patronize the neglected. Be great.—Sterne.

Sir, money, money, the most charming of all things—money, which will say more in one moment than the most eloquent lover can in years. Perhaps you will say a man is not young, I answer, he is rich; he is not genteel, handsome, witty, brave, good-humored, but he is rich, rich, rich, rich, rich—that one word contradicts everything you can say against him.—Fielding.

I cannot call riches better than the baggage of virtue; the Roman word is better, impedimenta; for as the baggage is to an army, so is riches to virtue; it cannot be spared nor left behind, but it hindereth the march; yea, and the care of it sometimes loseth or disturbeth the victory; of great riches there is no real use, except it be in the distribution; the rest is but conceit.—Bacon.

Riches are the pettiest and least worthy gifts which God can give a man. What are they to God's word? Yea, to bodily gifts, such as beauty and health, or to the gifts of the mind, such as understanding, skill, wisdom? Yet men toil for them day and night and take no rest. Therefore our Lord God commonly gives riches to foolish people to whom He gives nothing else.—Martin Luther.

Let us not repine, or so much as think the gifts of God unequally dealt, if we see another abound with riches, when, as God knows, the cares that are the keys that keep those riches hang often so heavily at the rich man's girdle that they dog him with weary days and restless nights, even when others sleep quietly.—Izaak Walton.

Believe not much them that seem to despise riches; for they despise them that despair of them; and none are worse when they come to them. Be not penny-wise; riches have wings, and sometimes they fly away of themselves, sometimes they must be set flying to bring in more.—Bacon.

Do we, mad as we all are after riches, hear often enough from the pulpit the spirit of those words in which Dean Swift, in his epitaph on the affluent and profligate Colonel Chartres, announces the small esteem of wealth in the eyes of God, from the fact of His thus lavishing it upon the meanest and basest of His creatures?—Whipple.

Providence has decreed that those common acquisitions—money, gems, plate, noble mansions and dominion—should be sometimes bestowed on the indolent and unworthy; but those things which constitute our true riches, and which are properly our own, must be procured by our own labor.—Erasmus.

Man was born to be rich, or inevitably grows rich by the use of his faculties, by the union of thought with nature. Property is an intellectual production. The game requires coolness, right reasoning, promptness and patience in the players. Cultivated labor drives out brute labor.—Emerson.

He who recognizes no higher logic than that of the shilling may become a very rich man, and yet remain all the while an exceedingly poor creature; for riches are no proof whatever of moral worth, and their glitter often serves only to draw attention to the worthlessness of their possessor, as the glow-worm's light reveals the grub.—Samuel Smiles.

Riches oftentimes, if nobody takes them away, make to themselves wings and fly away; and truly, many a time the undue sparing of them is but letting their wings grow, which makes them ready to fly away; and the contributing a part of them to do good only clips their wings a little and makes them stay the longer with their owner.—Leighton.

I take him to be the only rich man that lives upon what he has, owes nothing, and is contented; for there is no determinate sum of money, nor quantity of estate, that can denote a man rich, since no man is truly rich that has not so much as perfectly satiates his desire of having more; for the desire of more is want, and want is poverty.—Howe.

Riches are valuable at all times, and to all men, because they always purchase pleasures such as men are accustomed to and desire; nor can anything restrain or regulate the love of money but a sense of honor and virtue, which, if it be not nearly equal at all times, will naturally abound most in ages of knowledge and refinement.—Hume.

We are all of us richer than we think we are; but we are taught to borrow and to beg, and brought up more to make use of what is another's than our own. Man can in nothing fix and conform himself to his mere necessity. Of pleasure, wealth and power he grasps at more than he can hold; his greediness is incapable of moderation.—Montaigne.

A great estate is a great disadvantage to those who do not know how to use it, for nothing is more common than to see wealthy persons live scandalously and miserably; riches do them no service in order to virtue and happiness; therefore 'tis precept and principle, not an estate, that makes a man good for something.—Antoninus.

A man hath riches. Whence came they, and whither go they? for this is the way to form a judgment of the esteem which they and their possessor deserve. If they have been acquired by fraud or violence, if they make him proud and vain, if they minister to luxury and intemperance, if they are avariciously hoarded up and applied to no proper use, the possessor becomes odious and contemptible.—Bishop Jortin.

Riches are oft by guilt and baseness earn'd;
Or dealt by chance to shield a lucky knave,
Or throw a cruel sunshine on a fool.
But for one end, one much-neglected use,
Are riches worth your care; (for nature's wants

Are few, and without opulence supplied;)
This noble end is, to produce the soul;
To show the virtues in their fairest light;
To make humanity the minister
Of bounteous Providence; and teach the breast

The generous luxury the gods enjoy.
—Armstrong.

Much learning shows how little mortals know;

Much wealth, how little worldlings can enjoy:

At best, it babies us with endless toys,
And keeps us children till we drop to dust.
As monkeys at a mirror stand amazed,
They fail to find what they so plainly see;
Thus men, in shining riches, see the face
Of happiness, nor know it is a shade;
But gaze, and touch, and peep, and peep again,

And wish, and wonder it is absent still.
—Young.

Nature does not conquer the world to God. It never has. It never will. In America, with its vast abounding wealth, its grand expanse of prairie, its reach of river, and its exuberant productiveness, there is danger that our riches will draw us away from God, and fasten us to earth; that they will make us not only rich, but mean; not only wealthy, but wicked. The grand corrective is the cross of Christ, seen in the sanctuary where the life and light of God are exhibited, and where the reverberation of the echoes from the great white throne are heard.

—R. S. Storrs.

Ridicule

Nothing is more ridiculous than ridicule.—Shaftesbury.

Cervantes smiled Spain's chivalry away.—Byron.

Your sayer of smart things has a bad heart.—Pascal.

Ridicule is often employed with more power and success than severity.—Horace.

He who brings ridicule to bear against truth finds in his hand a blade without a hilt.—Landor.

Ridicule has followed the vestiges of truth, but never usurped her place.—Landor.

Raillery is a mode of speaking in favor of one's wit against one's good-nature.—Montesquieu.

A profound conviction raises a man above the feeling of ridicule.—J. Stuart Mill.

The tongues of mocking wenches are as keen as is the razor's edge invisible.—Shakespeare.

To the man of thought almost nothing is really ridiculous.—Goethe.

Ridicule often cuts the Gordian knot more effectively than the severity of satire.—Horace.

If ridicule were employed to laugh men out of vice and folly, it might be of some use.—Addison.

Truth, 'tis supposed, may bear all lights; and one of those bright lights . . . by which things are to be viewed . . . is ridicule itself.—Shaftesbury.

Derision is never so agonizing as when it pounces on the wanderings of misguided sensibility.—Lord Jeffrey.

For man learns more readily and remembers more willingly what excites his ridicule than what deserves esteem and respect.—Horace.

Ridicule is generally made use of to laugh men out of virtue and good sense, by attacking everything praiseworthy in human life.—Addison.

Raillery is more insupportable than wrong; because we have a right to resent injuries, but are ridiculous in being angry at a jest.—Rochefoucauld.

How comes it to pass, then, that we appear such cowards in reasoning, and are so afraid to stand the test of ridicule?—Shaftesbury.

Sneering springs out of the wish to deny; and wretched must that state of mind be that wishes to take refuge in doubt.—L. E. Landon.

I have lived one hundred years; and I die with the consolation of never having thrown the slightest ridicule upon the smallest virtue.—Fontenelle.

Ridicule is a weak weapon, when levelled at a strong mind;
But common men are cowards, and dread an empty laugh. —Tupper.

Ridicule, which chiefly arises from pride, a selfish passion, is but at best a gross pleasure, too rough an entertainment for those who are highly polished and refined.—Henry Home.

It is easy for a man who sits idle at home, and has nobody to please but himself, to ridicule or censure the common practices of mankind.—Johnson.

Betray mean terror of ridicule, thou shalt find fools enough to mock thee; but answer thou their language with contempt, and the scoffers will lick thy feet.—Tupper.

Some men are, in regard to ridicule, like tin-roofed buildings in regard to hail: all that hits them bounds rattling off; not a stone goes through.—Beecher.

Ridicule, the weapon of all others most feared by enthusiasts of every description, and which, from its predominance over such minds, often checks what is absurd, and fully as often smotherers that which is noble.—Walter Scott.

But touch me, and no minister so sore.
Whoe'er offends, at some unlucky time
Slides into verse, and hitches in a rhyme,
Sacred to ridicule his whole life long,
And the sad burthen of some merry song.
—Pope.

The talent of turning men into ridicule, and exposing to laughter those one converses with, is the gratification of little minds and ungenerous tempers. A young man with this cast of mind cuts himself off from all manner of improvement.—Addison.

It is a good plan, with a young person of a character to be much affected by ludicrous and absurd representations, to show him plainly by examples that there is nothing which may not be thus represented. He will hardly need to be told that everything is not a mere joke.—Whately.

The raillery which is consistent with good-breeding is a gentle animadversion of some foible, which, while it raises the laugh in the rest of the company, doth not put the person rallied out of countenance, or expose him to shame or contempt. On the contrary, the jest should be so delicate that the object of it should be capable of joining in the mirth it occasions.—Fielding.

We can learn to read and write, but we cannot learn raillery; that must be a particular gift of nature; and, to tell the truth, I esteem him happy who does not wish to acquire it. The character of sarcasm is dangerous; although this quality makes those laugh whom it does not wound, it, nevertheless, never procures esteem.—Oxenstiern.

It is commonly said, and more particularly by Lord Shaftesbury, that ridicule is the best test of truth; for that it will not stick where it is not just. I deny it. A truth learned in a certain light, and attacked in certain words, by men of wit and humor, may, and often doth, become ridiculous, at least so far that the truth is only remembered and repeated for the sake of the ridicule.—Chesterfield.

The fatal fondness of indulging in a spirit of ridicule, and the injurious and irreparable consequences which sometimes attend the too severe reply, can never be condemned with more asperity than it deserves. Not to offend is the first step towards pleasing. To give pain is as much an offence against humanity as against good-breeding, and surely it is as well to abstain from an action because it is sinful, as because it is unpolite.—Blair.

Right

Sir, I would rather be right than be president.—Henry Clay.

There is a higher law than the constitution.—W. H. Seward.

Heaven itself has ordained the right.—Washington.

Right is the eternal sun; the world cannot delay its coming.—Wendell Phillips.

Hooking both right and wrong to the appetite, to follow as it draws.—Shakespeare.

Woman already controls by not seeming to do so. Talk no more of her rights.—Ouida.

Reparation for our rights at home, and security against the like future violations.—William Pitt.

Let us have faith that right makes might, and in that faith let us dare to do our duty as we understand it.—Lincoln.

The proof of a thing's being right is that it has power over the heart; that it excites us, wins us, or helps us.—Ruskin.

So I like life and I like righteousness; if I cannot keep the two together, I will let life go and choose righteousness.—Mencius.

Right is more beautiful than private affection, and is compatible with universal wisdom.—Emerson.

The glittering and sounding generalities of natural right which make up the declaration of independence.—Rufus Choate.

The Saviour comes in the strength of righteousness. Righteousness is at the bottom of all things. Righteousness is thorough; it is the very spirit of unsparing truth.—Phillips Brooks.

Of all "rights" which command attention at the present time among us, woman's rights seem to take precedence.—Horace Mann.

No man's conscience can tell him the rights of another man; they must be known by rational investigation or historical inquiry.—Johnson.

If men would only take the chances of doing right because it is right, instead of the immediate certainty of the advantage of doing wrong, how much happier would their lives be.—B. R. Haydon.

For the ultimate notion of right is that which tends to the universal good; and when one's acting in a certain manner has this tendency he has a right thus to act.—Francis Hutcheson.

For right is right, since God is God,
And right the day must win;
To doubt would be disloyalty,
To falter would be sin.

—F. W. Faber.

Rightness expresses of actions what straightness does of lines; and there can no more be two kinds of right action than there can be two kinds of straight lines.—Herbert Spencer.

We hold these truths to be self-evident—that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.—Thomas Jefferson.

Woman's rights should come by evolution, and not by revolution. I want a little woman's right tried first, and then, if the experience is bad, we can go back on our track; if good, forward.—Joseph Cook.

Among the natural rights of the colonists are these: First, a right to life, secondly to liberty, thirdly to property; together with the right to defend them in the best manner they can.—Samuel Adams.

I believe in the admission of women to the full rights of citizenship and share in government, on the express grounds that few women keep house so badly or with such wastefulness as chancellors of the exchequer keep the state.—Theodore Parker.

If on one day we find the fast-spreading recognition of popular rights accompanied by a silent, growing perception of the rights of women, we also find it accompanied by a tendency towards a system of non-coercive education—that is, towards a practical illustration of the rights of children.—Herbert Spencer.

We hear in these days a great deal respecting rights—the rights of private judgment, the rights of labor, the rights of property, and the rights of man. Rights are grand things, divine things in this world of God's; but the way in which we expound these rights, alas! seems to me to be the very incarnation of selfishness. I can see nothing very noble in a man who is forever going about calling for his own rights. Alas! alas! for the man who feels nothing more grand in this wondrous, divine world than his own rights.—Frederick W. Robertson.

Rigor

Rigor pushed too far is sure to miss its aim, however good, as the bow snaps that is bent too stiffly.—Schiller.

Rivalry

Emulation adds its spur.—Lucan.

Rivalry and envy are Siamese twins.—H. W. Shaw.

Two stars keep not their motion in one sphere.—Shakespeare.

Women always find their bitterest foes among their own sex.—J. Petit-Senn.

Women see faults much more readily in each other than they can discover perfections.—Chamfort.

Women do not disapprove their rivals; they hate them.—James Par-ton.

If there's delight in love, 'tis when I see the heart which others bleed for bleed for me.—Congreve.

Emulation is not rivalry. Emulation is the child of ambition; rivalry is the unlovable daughter of envy.—Balzac.

If one must be rejected, one succeed, make him my lord within whose faithful breast is fixed my image, and who loves me best.—Dryden.

It is the privilege of posterity to set matters right between those antagonists who, by their rivalry for greatness, divided a whole age.—Addison.

It is impossible for authors to discover beauties in one another's works: they have eyes only for spots and blemishes.—Addison.

It is a fact capable of amiable interpretation that ladies are not the worst disposed towards a new acquaintance of their own sex, because she has points of inferiority.—George Eliot.

In ambition, as in love, the successful can afford to be indulgent towards their rivals. The prize our own, it is graceful to recognize the merit that vainly aspired to it.—Bovee.

It may be laid down as a general rule that no woman who hath any great pretensions to admiration is ever well pleased in a company where she perceives herself to fill only a second place.—Fielding.

Women of the world never use harsh expressions when condemning their rivals. Like the savage they hurl elegant arrows, ornamented with feathers of purple and azure, but with poisoned points.—De Finod.

River

The river knows the way to the sea:
Without a pilot it runs and falls,
Blessing all lands with its charity.

—Emerson.

See the rivers, how they run,
Changeless to the changeless sea.

—Charles Kingsley.

The Nile, forever new and old,
Among the living and the dead,
Its mighty, mystic stream has rolled.

—Longfellow.

A little stream came tumbling from the height,
And struggling into ocean as it might.
Its bounding crystal frolick'd in the ray,
And gush'd from cliff to crag with saltless spray.

—Byron.

And see the rivers how they run
Through woods and meads, in shade and sun;

Sometimes swift, sometimes slow,
Wave succeeding wave, they go
A various journey to the deep,
Like human life, to endless sleep!

—Dyer.

Oh, river, gentle river! gliding on
In silence underneath this starless sky!
Thine is a ministry that never rests
Even while the living slumber.

Thou pausest not in thine allotted task,
Oh, darkling river!

—William Cullen Bryant.

Oh, river! darkling river! what a voice
Is that thou utterest while all else is still—
The ancient voice that, centuries ago, Sounded between thy hills, while Rome was yet

A weedy solitude by Tiber's stream!

—William Cullen Bryant.

Robbery

He that is robb'd, not wanting what is stolen,
Let him not know't, and he's not robb'd
at all.

—Shakespeare.

The robbed that smiles steals something from the thief.—Shakespeare.

Robin

Poor Robin sits and sings alone,
When showers of driving sleet,
By the cold winds of winter blown,
The cottage casement beat.

—Rev. Wm. Lisle Bowles.

The wood-robin sings at my door,
And her song is the sweetest I hear From all the sweet birds that incessantly pour

Their notes through the noon of the year.

—James G. Clarke.

Poor robin, driven in by rain-storms wild
To lie submissive under household hands With beating heart that no love understands,

And scared eye, like a child
Who only knows that he is all alone.
And summer's gone.

—D. M. Mulock.

Bearing His cross, while Christ passed forth forlorn,
His God-like forehead by the mock crown torn,

A little bird took from that crown one thorn.

To soothe the dear Redeemer's throbbing
head,

That bird did what she could; His blood,
'tis said,

Down dropping, dyed her tender bosom
red.

Since then no wanton boy disturbs her nest;

Weasel nor wild cat will her young molest;
All sacred deem the bird of ruddy breast.

—Hoskyns-Abraham.

On fair Britannia's isle, bright bird,

A legend strange is told of thee,—
'Tis said thy blithesome song was hushed

While Christ toiled up Mount Calvary, Bowed 'neath the sins of all mankind;

And bumped to the very dust

By the vile cross, while viler man

Mocked with a crown of thorns the Just.
Pierced by our sorrows, and weighed down

By our transgressions,—faint and weak,
Crushed by an angry judge's frown,

And agonies no word can speak,—

'Twas then, dear bird, the legend says

That thou, from out His crown, didst tear

The thorns, to lighten the distress,

And ease the pain that he must bear.

While pendant from thy tiny beak

The gory points thy bosom pressed,

And crimsoned with thy Saviour's blood

The sober brownness of thy breast!

Since which proud hour for thee and thine

As an especial sign of grace

God pours like sacramental wine

Red signs of favor o'er thy race!

—Delle W. Norton.

Rogue

The rogue has everywhere the advantage.—Goethe.

One rogue leads another.—Homer.

Great rogues hang the little ones.—Mazarin.

When rogues fall out honest men get their own.—Sir M. Hale.

There is no den in the wide world to hide a rogue.—Emerson.

Rogues are prone to find things before they are lost.—Douglas Jerrold.

Roguery is thought by some to be cunning and laughable: it is neither; it is devilish.—Carlyle.

There is nothing but roguery to be found in villanous men.—Shakespeare.

Many a man would have turned rogue if he knew how.—Hazlitt.

Rogues in rags are kept in countenance by rogues in ruffles.—Pope.

After a long experience of the world, I affirm, before God, I never knew a rogue who was not unhappy.—Junius.

Rogues are always found out in some way. Whoever is a wolf will act like a wolf, that is most certain.—La Fontaine.

An honest man you may form of windle-straws, but to make a rogue you must have grist.—Schiller.

Make yourself an honest man, and then you may be sure that there is one rascal less in the world.—Carlyle.

I have known men who have been sold and bought a hundred times, who have only got very fat and very comfortable in the process of exchange.—Ouida.

Romance

Romances, in general, are calculated rather to fire the imagination than to inform the judgment.—Richardson.

Romance is the poetry of literature.—Mme. Necker.

In the meanest hut is a romance, if you knew the hearts there.—Varnhagen von Ense.

Romance has been elegantly defined as the offspring of fiction and love.—Disraeli.

There will always be romance in the world so long as there are young hearts in it.—Bovee.

A tale which holdeth children from play, and old men from the chimney-corner.—Sir P. Sidney.

The twilight that surrounds the border-land of old romance.—Longfellow.

In this commonplace world every one is said to be romantic who either admires a fine thing or does one.—Pope.

Romances paint at full length people's wooings.

But only give a bust of marriages: For no one cares for matrimonial cooings, There's nothing wrong in a connubial kiss. Think you, if Laura had been Petrarch's wife,

He would have written sonnets all his life? —Byron.

Imagination, whatever may be said to the contrary, will always hold a place in history, as truth does in romance. Has not romance been penned with history in view?—Arsène Houssaye.

What philosopher of the schoolroom, with the mental dowry of four summers, ever questions the power of the wand that opened the dark eyes of the beautiful princess, or subtracts a single inch from the stride of seven leagues?—Willmott.

I despair of ever receiving the same degree of pleasure from the most exalted performances of genius which I felt in childhood from pieces which my present judgment regards as trifling and contemptible.—Burke.

Romance is always young.—Whittier.

Parent of golden dreams, Romance!
—Byron.

He loved the twilight that surrounds
The border-land of old romance;
Where glitter hauberk, helm, and lance,
And banner waves, and trumpet sounds,
And ladies ride with hawk on wrist,
And mighty warriors sweep along,
Magnified by the purple mist,
The dusk of centuries and of song.
—Longfellow.

Romance is the truth of imagination and boyhood. Homer's horses clear the world at a bound. The child's eye needs no horizon to its prospect. The oriental tale is not too vast. Pearls dropping from trees are only falling leaves in autumn. The palace that grew up in a night merely awakens a wish to live in it. The impossibilities of fifty years are the commonplaces of five.—Willmott.

Rome

O Rome! my country! city of the soul!—Byron.

When falls the Coliseum, Rome shall fall;
And when Rome falls—the world.
—Byron.

See the wild waste of all-devouring years!
How Rome her own sad sepulchre appears,
With nodding arches, broken temples spread!

The very tombs now vanish'd like their dead!
—Pope.

I am in Rome! Oft as the morning ray Visits these eyes, waking at once I cry, Whence this excess of joy? What has befallen me?

And from within a thrilling voice replies, Thou art in Rome! A thousand busy
thoughts

Rush on my mind, a thousand images;
And I spring up as girt to run a race!
—Sam'l Rogers.

It was the calm and silent night!
Seven hundred years and fifty-three Had Rome been growing up to might
And now was queen of land and sea.
No sound was heard of clashing wars,
Peace brooded o'er the hushed domain.
Apollo, Pallas, Jove and Mars, Held undisturbed their ancient reign,
In the solemn midnight,
Centuries ago.
—Alfred Domett.

Rome, Rome, thou art no more
As thou hast been!
On thy seven hills of yore
Thou sat'st a queen.
—Mrs. Hemans.

Roses

The smiles of God's goodness.—
Wilberforce.

Behold the glowing blush upon the rose.—T. B. Read.

And I will make the beds of roses.
—Marlowe.

The budding rose above the rose full blown.—Wordsworth.

From off this brier pluck a white rose with me.—Shakespeare.

The red rose on triumphant brier.—
Shakespeare.

Blown roses hold their sweetness to the last.—Dryden.

A white rosebud for a guerdon.—
E. B. Browning.

Roses were sette of sweete savour,
With many roses that thei bere.
—Chaucer.

Yon rose-buds in the morning dew,
How pure among the leaves sae green!
—Burns.

When love came first to earth, the spring spread rose-beds to receive him.
—Campbell.

The rose that lives its little hour is prized beyond the sculptured flower.
—Bryant.

The gathered rose and the stolen heart can charm but for a day.—
Emma C. Embury.

Happy are they who can create a rose-tree, or erect a honeysuckle.—
Gray.

And 'tis my faith that every flower enjoys the air it breathes.—Wordsworth.

'Tis the last rose of summer, left blooming alone.—Moore.

O'ercanopied with luscious woodbine, with sweet musk-roses, and with eglantine.—Shakespeare.

The rose is wont with pride to swell, and ever seeks to rise.—Goethe.

It never rains roses; when we want more roses, we must plant more trees.—George Eliot.

The seasons alter; hoary-headed frosts fall in the fresh lap of the crimson rose.—Shakespeare.

All June I bound the rose in sheaves. Now, rose by rose, I strip the leaves.—Robert Browning.

Proud be the rose, with rain and dew her head impearling.—Wordsworth.

Rose of the desert! thus should woman be Shining uncourted, lone and safe, like thee.—Moore.

The coming spring would first appear, and all this place with roses strew, if busy feet would let them grow.—Waller.

Mild May's eldest child, the coming musk-rose, full of dewy wine, the murmurous haunt of flies on summer eves.—Keats.

The rosebuds lay their crimson lips together, and the green leaves are whispering to themselves.—Amelia B. Welby.

And half in shade and half in sun;
The rose sat in her bower,
With a passionate thrill in her crimson heart.—Bayard Taylor.

For those roses bright, oh, those roses bright!

I have twined them in my sister's locks
That are hid in the dust from sight.—Phebe Cary.

Gather ye rosebuds while ye may,
Old Time is still a-flying;
And this same flower that smiles to-day
To-morrow will be dying.—Herrick.

A wreath of dewy roses, fresh and sweet, just brought from out the garden's cool retreat.—Julia C. R. Dorr.

Rose of the garden! such is woman's lot—Worshipp'd while blooming—when she fades, forgot.—Moore.

And when the parent-rose decays and dies,
With a resembling face the daughter-buds arise.—Prior.

The rose distils a healing balm
The heating pulse of pain to calm.—Moore.

The rose is fairest when 'tis budding new,
And hope is brightest when it dawns from fears;

The rose is sweetest wash'd with morning
dew,
And love is loveliest when embalm'd in tears.—Scott.

The rose saith in the dewy morn,
I am most fair;
Yet all my loveliness is born
Upon a thorn.—Christina G. Rossetti.

O, how much more doth Beauty beauteous seem,
By that sweet ornament which truth doth give!
The rose looks fair, but fairer we it deem,
For that sweet odor which doth in it live.—Shakespeare.

The rose Propt at the cottage door with careful hands,
Bursts its green bud, and looks abroad for May.—Thos. Buchanan Read.

I am the one rich thing that morn
Leaves for the ardent noon to win;
Grasp me not, I have a thorn,
But bend and take my being in.—Harriet Prescott Spofford.

Rose! thou art the sweetest flower,
That ever drank the amber shower;
Rose! thou art the fondest child
Of dimpled Spring, the wood-nymph wild.—Moore.

Woo on, with odour wooing me,
Faint rose with fading core;
For God's rose-thought, that blooms in
thee,
Will bloom forevermore.—George MacDonald.

What would the rose with all her pride be worth,
Were there no sun to call her brightness forth?—Moore.

It is written on the rose
In its glory's full array:
Read what those buds disclose—
"Passing away."—Mrs. Hemans.

I wish I might a rose-bud grow And thou wouldst cull me from the bower,
To place me on that breast of snow
Where I should bloom a wintry flower —Dionysius.

And the rose like a nymph to the bath ad-
drest,
Which unveiled the depth of her glowing
breast,
Till, fold after fold, to the fainting air,
The soul of her beauty and love lay bare.
—Shelley.

I watched a rose-bud very long
Brought on by dew and sun and shower,
Waiting to see the perfect flower:
Then when I thought it should be strong
It opened at the matin hour
And fell at even-song.
—Christina G. Rossetti.

We bring roses, beautiful fresh roses,
Dewy like the morning and coloured like
the dawn;
Little tents of odour, where the bee reposes, Swooning in sweetness of the bed he dreams upon.
—Thos. Buchanan Read.

The roses that in yonder hedge appear Outdo our garden-buds which bloom within;
But since the hand may pluck them every
day,
Unmarked they bud, bloom, drop, and drift away.
—Jean Ingelow.

A sunbeam warm'd thee into bloom;
A zephyr's kiss thy blushes gave:
The tears of ev'ning shed perfume,
And morn will beam upon thy grave.
How like to thee, thou transient flower,
The doom of all we love on earth;
Beauty, like thee, but decks an hour,
Decay feeds on it from its birth.—Bohn.

If on creation's morn the king of heaven
To shrubs and flowers a sovereign lord had given,
O beauteous rose, he had anointed thee
Of shrubs and flowers the sovereign lord to be;
The spotless emblem of unsullied truth,
The smile of beauty and the glow of youth,
The garden's pride, the grace of vernal
bowers,
The blush of meadows, and the eye of flowers.
—Bohn.

Long, long be my heart with such memories fill'd!
Like the vase, in which roses have once been distill'd—
You may break, you may shatter the vase
if you will,
But the scent of the roses will hang round it still.
—Moore.

O beautiful, royal Rose,
O Rose, so fair and sweet!
Queen of the garden art thou,
And I—the Clay at thy feet!

Yet, O thou beautiful Rose!
Queen rose, so fair and sweet,
What were lover or crown to thee
Without the Clay at thy feet?
—Julia C. R. Dorr.

It was nothing but a rose I gave her,— Nothing but a rose
Any wind might rob of half its savor,
Any wind that blows.

Withered, faded, pressed between these pages,

Crumpled, fold on fold,—
Once it lay upon her breast, and ages Cannot make it old!
—Harriet Prescott Spofford.

You love the roses—so do I. I wish
The sky would rain down roses, as they
rain
From off the shaken bush. Why will it
not?
Then all the valleys would be pink and
white,
And soft to tread on. They would fall as light
As feathers, smelling sweet; and it would
be
Like sleeping and yet waking, all at once.
Over the sea, Queen, where we soon shall go,
Will it rain roses?
—George Eliot.

How fair is the Rose! what a beautiful flower.
The glory of April and May!
But the leaves are beginning to fade in an hour,
And they wither and die in a day.
Yet the Rose has one powerful virtue to boast,
Above all the flowers of the field;
When its leaves are all dead, and fine
colours are lost,
Still how sweet a perfume it will yield!
—Isaac Watts.

Royalty

Ay, every inch a king.—Shake-
speare.

Ah! vainest of all things
Is the gratitude of kings.
—Longfellow.

The trappings of a monarchy would set up an ordinary commonwealth.—
Samuel Johnson.

Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown.—Shakespeare.

In that fierce light which beats upon a throne.—Tennyson.

For monarchs seldom sigh in vain.
—Scott.

Every citizen is king under a citizen king.—Favart.

The state!—it is I!—Attributed to Louis XIV. of France.

The king reigns but does not govern.—Thiers.

Every subject's duty is the king's;
but every subject's soul is his own.—
Shakespeare.

As yourselves your empires fall,
And every kingdom hath a grave.
—William Habington.

What is a king? a man condemn'd to bear
The public burthen of the nation's care.
—Prior.

Every noble crown is, and on earth will forever be, a crown of thorns.—
Carlyle.

Kings are like stars—they rise and set,
they have
The worship of the world, but no repose.
—Shelley.

There's such divinity doth hedge a king,
That treason can but peep to what it would.
—Shakespeare.

Clemency is the surest proof of a true monarch.—Corneille.

Every monarch is subject to a mightier one.—Seneca.

They (Americans) equally detest the pageantry of a king and the supercilious hypocrisy of a bishop.— Junius.

Of the many is ^{The rule} well. One must be ^{chief}
In war and one the king. —Homer.

A man's a man,
But when you see a king, you see the work
Of many thousand men.—George Eliot.

They say princes learn no art truly, but the art of horsemanship. The reason is; the brave beast is no flatterer. He will throw a prince as soon as his groom.—Ben Jonson.

God save our gracious king!
Long live our noble king!
God save the king!

—Henry Carey.

Yet looks he like a king; behold, his eye,
As bright as is the eagle's, lightens forth Controlling majesty. —Shakespeare.

The first king was a successful soldier;
He who serves well his country has no need of ancestors. —Voltaire.

A substitute shines brightly as a king
Until a king be by, and then his state
Empties itself, as doth an inland brook
Into the main of waters. —Shakespeare.

A crown! what is it?
It is to bear the miseries of a people!
To hear their murmurs, feel their discon-tents,
And sink beneath a load of splendid care!
—Hannah More.

Here lies our sovereign lord, the king,
Whose word no man relies on,
Who never said a foolish thing,
And never did a wise one.
—Said by a Courtier of Charles II.

Princes have but their titles for their glories,
An outward honor for an inward toil;
And, for unfelt imaginations,
They often feel a world of restless cares.
—Shakespeare.

God gives not kings the stile of gods in vaine,
For on his throne his sceptre do they
sway;
And as their subjects ought them to obey,
So kings should feare and serve their God again. —King James.

Let us sit upon the ground
And tell sad stories of the death of kings:
How some have been depos'd, some slain in war,
Some haunted by the ghosts they have depos'd,
Some poison'd by their wives, some sleeping kill'd,
All murder'd. —Shakespeare.

The king-becoming graces,
As justice, verity, temperance, stableness,
Bounty, perseverance, mercy, lowliness,
Devotion, patience, courage, fortitude,
I have no relish of them.—Shakespeare

A crown,
Golden in show, is but a wreath of thorns, Brings dangers, troubles, cares, and sleepless nights
To him who wears the regal diadem.
—Milton.

Princes that would their people should do well
Must at themselves begin, as at the head;
For men, by their example, pattern out
Their imitations, and regard of laws:
A virtuous court a world to virtue draws.
—Ben Jonson.

O, how wretched
Is that poor man that hangs on princes' favours!
There is, betwixt that smile we would aspire to,
That sweet aspect of princes, and their ruin,
More pangs and fears than wars and women have;
And when he falls, he falls like Lucifer,
Never to hope again. —Shakespeare.

O wretched state of kings! O doleful fate!
Greatness misnamed, in misery only great!
Could men but know the endless woe it brings,

The wise would die before they would be kings.

Think what a king must do! It tasks the best

To rule the little world within his breast,
Yet must he rule it, and the world beside,
Or king is none, undone by power and pride.

Think what a king must be! What burdens bear

From birth to death! His life is one long care.

It wears away in tasks that never end.
He has ten thousand foes, but not one friend.
—R. H. Stoddard.

Rudeness

Spite and ill-nature are among the most expensive luxuries in life.—Dr.
Johnson.

Nothing is more silly than the pleasure some people take in "speaking their minds." A man of this make will say a rude thing for the mere pleasure of saying it, when an opposite behavior, full as innocent, might have preserved his friend, or made his fortune.—Steele.

A man has no more right to say an uncivil thing than to act one; no more right to say a rude thing to another than to knock him down.—Johnson.

Irony is to the high-bred what billingsgate is to the vulgar; and when one gentleman thinks another gentleman an ass, he does not say it point-blank, he implies it in the politest terms he can invent.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Discourtesy does not spring merely from one bad quality, but from several —from foolish vanity, from ignorance of what is due to others, from indolence, from stupidity, from distraction of thought, from contempt of others, from jealousy.—La Bruyère.

Society is infected with rude, cynical, restless, and frivolous persons who prey upon the rest, and whom no public opinion concentrated into good manners, forms accepted by the sense of all, can reach; the contradictors and railers at public and private tables, who are like terriers, who conceive it the duty of a dog of honor to growl at any passer-by, and do the honors of the house by barking him out of sight.—Emerson.

Ruins

Mile-stones on the road of time.—
Chamfort.

The legendary tablets of the past.—
Walter Scott.

The monuments of mutability.—Riv-arol.

Black-letter record of the ages.—
Diderot.

Tully was not so eloquent as thou, thou nameless column with the buried base.—Byron.

The ruins of a house may be repaired; why cannot those of the face?
—La Fontaine.

The ruins of himself! now worn away
With age, yet still majestic in decay.
—Homer.

Stern Ruin's ploughshare drives elate,
Full on thy bloom. —Burns.

The broken eggshell of a civilization which time has hatched and devoured.
—Julia Ward Howe.

Final Ruin fiercely drives
Her ploughshare o'er creation.
—Young.

Prostrate the beauteous ruin lies; and all That shared its shelter, perish in its fall.
—Wm. Pitt.

For, to make deserts, God, who rules mankind,
Begins with kings, and ends the work by wind.
—Victor Hugo.

There is a temple in ruin stands,
Fashion'd by long forgotten hands:
Two or three columns, and many a stone,
Marble and granite, with grass o'ergrown!
—Byron.

* * * For such a numerous host Fled not in silence through the frightened deep
With ruin upon ruin, rout on rout,
Confusion worse confounded. —Milton.

All things decay with time; the forest sees
The growth and downfall of her aged trees:
That timber tall, which threescore lustres stood
The proud dictator of the state-like wood—
I mean the sov'reign of all plants, the oak, Droops, dies, and falls without the cleaver's stroke.
—Herrick.

Ye glorious Gothic scenes! how much ye strike
All phantasies, not even excepting mine:
A gray wall, a green ruin, rusty pike,
Make my soul pass the equinoctial line Between the present and past worlds, and hover
Upon their airy confines, half-seas over.
—Byron.

There is given Unto the things of earth, which Time hath bent,
A spirit's feeling, and where he hath leant
His hand, but broke his scythe, there is a power
And magic in the ruined battlement;
For which the palace of the present hour Must yield its pomp, and wait till ages are its dower.
—Byron.

As I stand here this pleasant afternoon, looking up at the old chapel
(the Mission Dolores), its ragged senility contrasting with the smart spring sunshine, its two gouty pillars with the plaster dropping away like tattered bandages, its rayless windows, its crumbling entrances, the leper spots on its whitewashed wall eating through the dark adobe—I give the poor old mendicant but a year longer to sit by the highway and ask alms in the names of the blessed saints.—Bret Harte.

How rev'rend is the face of this tall pile,
Whose ancient pillars rear their marble
heads,
To bear aloft its arch'd and pond'rous roof!
By its own weight made steadfast and immovable.
Looking tranquillity! It strikes an awe
And terror to my aching sight! The tombs
And monumental caves of death look cold,
And shoot a chillness to my trembling heart.
—Congreve.

I do love these ancient ruins:
We never tread upon them, but we set
Our foot upon some rev'rend history;
And questionless, here in this open court,
Which now lies naked to the injuries
Of stormy weather, some lie interr'd, who Lov'd the church so well, and gave so largely to't,
They thought it should have canopy'd their bones
Till doomsday: but all things have their
end;
Churches and cities, which have diseases
like to men,
Must have like death that we have.
—Webster.

'Tis now the raven's bleak abode;
'Tis now the apartment of the toad;
And there the fox securely feeds;
And there the poisonous adder breeds,
Conceal'd in ruins, moss and weeds;
While, ever and anon, there falls
Huge heaps of hoary moulder'd walls.
Yet time has seen, which lifts the low,
And level lays the lofty brow,
Has seen the broken pile complete,
Big with the vanity of state;
But transient is the smile of fate!
A little rule, a little sway,
A sunbeam in a winter's day,
Is all the proud and mighty have Between the cradle and the grave.
—Dyer.

Ruins in some countries indicate prosperity; in others, decay. In Egypt, Greece and Italy they record the decline and fall of great empires; in England, Scotland and Wales they mark abolition of feudal tyranny, the establishment of popular freedom, and the consolidation of national strength.
The lawless power formerly dispersed among petty chiefs is now concentrated in the legal magistrate. The elegant villa has succeeded to the frowning castle. Where the wild deer roamed the corn now waves; the sound of the hammer has drowned the war-cry of the henchman.—R. Anderson.

Rumor

Rumor is the food of gossip.—Antoine Bret.

False rumors die of their own stench.—Chatfield.

At every word a reputation dies.—Pope.

A long-tongued, babbling gossip!—Shakespeare.

Stuffing the ears of men with false reports.—Shakespeare.

Bring me no more reports.—Shakespeare.

Rumor has winged feet like Mercury.—Beecher.

Rumor is like bees: the more you fight them the more you don't get rid of them.—H. W. Shaw.

Rumor is a vagrant without a home, and lives upon what it can pick up.—H. W. Shaw.

It flourishes by its very activity, and gains new strength by its movements.—Virgil.

Idle rumors were also added to well-founded apprehension.—Lucan.

Rumor, once started, rushes on like a river, until it mingles with, and is lost in the sea.—Rivarol.

Enemies carry a report in a quite different form from the original.—Plautus.

It is among uneducated women that we may look for the most confirmed gossips.—Chamfort.

In every ear it spread, on every tongue it grew.—Pope.

Nine-tenths of the world is entertained by scandalous rumors, which are never dissected until they are dead.

and, when pricked, collapse like an empty bladder.—Horace Greeley.

Rumour doth double, like the voice and echo,
The numbers of the fear'd.—Shakespeare.

Rumor does not always err; it sometimes even elects a man.—Tacitus.

Rumour was the messenger
Of defamation, and so swift, that none
Could be the first to tell an evil tale.
—Pollok.

If it were not for a goodly supply of rumors, half true and half false, what would the gossips do?—Hali-burton.

Many a wretch has rid on a hurdle who has done less mischief than utterers of forged tales, coiners of scandal, and clippers of reputation.—Sheridan.

The tale-bearer and the tale-hearer should be both hanged up, back to back, one by the tongue, the other by the ear.—South.

How violently do rumors blow the sails of popular judgments! How few there be that can discern between truth and truth-likeness, between shows and substance!—Sir P. Sidney.

The flying rumours gather'd as they roll'd,
Scarce any tale was sooner heard than told;
And all who told it added something new,
And all who heard it made enlargements too.
—Pope.

Some report elsewhere whatever is told them; the measure of fiction always increases, and each fresh narrator adds something to what he has heard.—Ovid.

Rumor is a pipe blown by surmises, jealousies, conjectures, and of so easy and so plain a stop that the blunt monster with uncounted heads, the still-discordant wavering multitude, can play upon it.—Shakespeare.

He that easily believes rumors has the principle within him to augment rumors. It is strange to see the raw enous appetite with which some devourers of character and happiness fix upon the sides of the innocent and unfortunate.—Jane Porter.

Curse the tongue
Whence slanderous rumour, like the adder's drop,
Distills her venom, withering friendship's faith,
Turning love's favour. —Hillhouse.

The art of spreading rumors may be compared to the art of pin-making. There is usually some truth, which I call the wire; as this passes from hand to hand, one gives it a polish, another a point, others make and put on the head, and at last the pin is completed.—John Newton.

Straightway throughout the Libyan cities flies rumor—the report of evil things than which nothing is swifter; it flourishes by its very activity and gains new strength by its movements; small at first through fear, it soon raises itself aloft and sweeps onward along the earth. Yet its head reaches the clouds. * * * A huge and horrid monster covered with many feathers: and for every plume a sharp eye, for every pinion a biting tongue. Everywhere its voices sound, to every thing its ears are open.—Virgil.

S

Sabbath

On Sunday heaven's gates stand open.—George Herbert.

Perpetual memory of the Maker's rest.—Bishop Mant.

Peaceful sleep out the Sabbath of the tomb.—Pope.

The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath.—Bible.

The poor man's day.—Grahame.

Sunday is the golden clasp that binds together the volume of the week.—Longfellow.

He who ordained the Sabbath loved the poor.—O. W. Holmes.

Let it ever be the most joyful and praiseful day of the seven.—Beecher.

I feel as if God had, by giving the Sabbath, given fifty-two springs in every year.—Coleridge.

The Sabbath is not a day to feast our bodies, but to feed our souls.—Empress Josephine.

The Sabbath-day is the savings-bank of humanity.—Frederic Saunders.

The Sabbaths of Eternity,
One Sabbath deep and wide.
—Tennyson.

The longer I live the more highly do I estimate the Christian Sabbath, and the more grateful do I feel towards those who impress its importance on the community.—Daniel Webster.

O day most calm, most bright, the fruit of this, the next world's bud.—George Herbert.

Sweet day, so cool, so calm, so bright,
The bridal of the earth and sky.
—George Herbert.

There are many persons who think Sunday is a sponge with which to wipe out the sins of the week.—H. W. Beecher.

Thou art my single day, God lends to heaven
What were all earth else, with a feel of heaven.
—Robert Browning.

So sang they, and the empyrean rung
With Hallelujahs. Thus was Sabbath kept.
—Milton.

Students of every age and kind, beware of secular study on the Lord's day.—Professor Miller.

See Christians, Jews, one heavy Sabbath keep,
And all the western world believe and sleep.
—Pope.

How still the morning of the hallow'd day!
Mute is the voice of rural labour, hush'd
The ploughboy's whistle, and the milkmaid's song.
—Grahame.

Sunday observe; think, when the bells do chime, 'tis angels' music; therefore come not late.—George Herbert.

There is a Sunday conscience as well as a Sunday coat; and those who make religion a secondary concern put the coat and conscience carefully by to put on only once a week.—Charles Dickens.

Now, really, this appears the common case Of putting too much Sabbath into Sunday— But what is your opinion, Mrs. Grundy?
—Hood.

Sunday, that day so tedious to the triflers of earth, so full of beautiful repose of calmness and strength for the earnest and heavenly minded.—Maria J. McIntosh.

He that remembers not to keep the Christian Sabbath at the beginning of the week will be in danger to forget before the end of the week that he is a Christian.—Sir Edmund Turner.

O day of rest! how beautiful, how fair, how welcome to the weary and the old! day of the Lord! and truce of earthly care! day of the Lord, as all our days should be.—Longfellow.

A world without a Sabbath would be like a man without a smile, like a summer without flowers, and like a homestead without a garden. It is the joyous day of the whole week.—Beecher.

The Sunday is the core of our civilization, dedicated to thought and reverence. It invites to the noblest solitude and to the noblest society.—Emerson.

Let us escape! This is our holiday—
God's day, devote to rest; and through the wood
We'll wander, and perchance find heavenly food,
So, profitless it shall not pass away.
—W. G. Simms.

The green oasis, the little grassy meadow in the wilderness, where, after the week-days' journey, the pilgrim halts for refreshment and repose.—Dr. Reade.

We believe that the first day of the week is the Lord's day, or Christian Sabbath; and is to be kept sacred to religious purposes, by abstaining from all secular labor and sinful recreations; by the devout observance of all the means of grace, both private and public; and by preparation for that rest that remaineth for the people of God.—Baptist Church Manual.

The happiness of heaven is the constant keeping of the Sabbath. Heaven is called a Sabbath, to make those who have Sabbaths long for heaven, and those who long for heaven love Sabbaths.—Philip Henry.

If the Sunday had not been observed as a day of rest during the last three centuries, I have not the slightest doubt that we should have been at this moment a poorer people and less civilized.—Macaulay.

The Sundaies of man's life,
Thredded together on time's string,
Make bracelets to adorn the wife
Of the eternal, glorious King.
On Sunday heaven's gates stand ope;
Blessings are plentiful and rife,
More plentiful than hope.
—Herbert.

Fresh glides the brook and blows the gale,
Yet yonder halts the quiet mill;
The whirling wheel, the rushing sail
How motionless and still!
Six days stern Labour shut the poor
From nature's careless banquet-hall;
The seventh, an Angel opes the door,
And, smiling, welcomes all!
—Bulwer.

Life and blessing will attend the man who observes the Sabbath. The Sabbath of rest is a continual lesson to him to turn his eye from all created objects, and look to that heavenly rest into which God is entered, and which is promised to man.—J. Milner.

Gently on tiptoe Sunday creeps,
Cheerfully from the stars he peeps,
Mortals are all asleep below,
None in the village hears him go;
E'en chanticleer keeps very still,
For Sunday whispered, 'twas his will.
—John Peter Hebel.

O what a blessing is Sunday, interposed between the waves of worldly business like the divine path of the Israelites through Jordan! There is nothing in which I would advise you to be more strictly conscientious than in keeping the Sabbath day holy. I can truly declare that to me the Sabbath has been invaluable.—Wilberforce.

Hail, Holy Day! the blessing from above
Brightens thy presence like a smile of love,
Smoothing, like oil upon a stormy sea,
The roughest waves of human destiny—
Cheering the good, and to the poor oppress'd

Bearing the promise of their heavenly rest.
—Mrs. Hale.

O day most calm, most bright,
The fruit of this, the next world's bud,
Th' indorsement of supreme delight,
Writ by a friend, and with his blood;
The couch of time, care's balm and bay;
The week were dark, but for thy light;
Thy torch doth show the way.
—George Herbert.

Bright shadows of true rest! some shoots of bliss;
Heaven once a week;
The next world's gladness prepossess in this;

A day to seek;
Eternity in time; the steps by which We climb above all ages: lamps that light Man through his heap of dark days; and the rich
And full redemption of the whole week's fight.
—Henry Vaughan.

For, bless the gude mon, gin he had his
ain way,
He'd na let a cat on the Sabbath say
"mew," Nae birdie maun whistle, nae lambie maun
play,
An' Phœbus himsel' could na travel that
day.
As he'd find a new Joshua in Andie
Agnew.
—Moore.

The seventh day this; the jubilee of man:
London! right well thou know'st the day
of prayer:
Then thy spruce citizen, wash'd artisan,
And smug apprentice gulp their weekly air:
The coach of hackney, whiskey, one-horse
chair,
And humblest gig, through sundry suburbs
whirl;
To Hampstead, Brentford, Harrow, make repair;
Till the tired jade the wheel forgets to hurl,
Provoking envious gibe from each pedestrian churl.
—Byron.

Nothing draws along with it such a glory as the Sabbath. Never has it unfolded without some witness and welcome, some song and salutation.
It has been the coronation day of martyrs—the first day of saints. It has been from the first day till now the sublime day of the church of God; still the outgoings of its morning and evening rejoice. Let us then remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy.—

James Hamilton.

Oh! welcome to the wearied Earth
The Sabbath resting comes,
Gathering the sons of toil and care
Back to their peaceful homes;
And, like a portal to the skies,
Opens the House of God,
Where all who seek may come and learn
The way the Saviour trod.
But holier to the wanderer seems
The Sabbath on the deep,
When on, and on, in ceaseless course,
The toiling bark must keep,
And not a trace of man appears
Amid the wilderness
Of waters—then it comes like dove Direct from heaven to bless.
—Mrs. Hale.

But, chiefly, man the day of rest enjoys,
Hail, Sabbath! thee I hail, the poor man's
day:
On other days, the man of toil is doom'd
To eat his joyless bread, lonely, the ground Both seat and board—screen'd from the winter's cold
And summer's heat, by neighbouring hedge or tree;
But on this day, embosom'd in his home,
He shares the frugal meal with those he loves;
With those he loves he shares the heartfelt joy
Of giving thanks to God,—not thanks of form,
A word and a grimace, but reverently,
With cover'd face and upward earnest eye.
Hail, Sabbath! thee I hail, the poor man's
day.
The pale mechanic now has leave to breathe
The morning air pure from the city's smoke,
As wandering slowly up the river's bank,
He meditates on Him whose powers he marks
In each green tree that proudly spreads the bough,
And in the tiny dew-bent flowers that bloom
Around the roots; and while he thus surveys
With elevated joy each rural charm,
He hopes, (yet fears presumption in the hope,)
That heaven may be one Sabbath without end.
—Grahame.

Sacrament (See Communion)

He who receives a sacrament does not perform a good work, he receives a benefit.—Martin Luther.

Sacraments, ordained of Christ, are not only badges or tokens of Christian men's profession; but rather they are certain signs of grace, and God's goodwill towards us, by the which He doth work invisibly in us, and doth not only quicken, but also strengthen and confirm our faith in Him.—Articles of Methodist Episcopal Church.

Sacrifice

You cannot win without sacrifice.—Charles Buxton.

It is easier to sacrifice great than little things.—Montaigne.

Who lives for humanity, must be content to lose himself.—O. B. Frothingham.

Upon such sacrifices the gods themselves throw incense.—Shakespeare.

It is what we give up, not what we lay up, that adds to our lasting store.—Hosea Ballou.

The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; a broken and contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise.—Bible.

What you most repent of is a lasting sacrifice made under an impulse of good-nature. The goodness goes; the sacrifice sticks.—Charles Buxton.

Teach self-denial, and make its practice pleasurable, and you create for the world a destiny more sublime than ever issued from the brain of the wildest dreamer.—Sir Walter Scott.

A good man not only forbears those gratifications which are forbidden by reason and religion, but even restrains himself in unforbidden instances.—Atterbury.

Our virtues are dearer to us the more we have had to suffer for them. It is the same with our children. All profound affection admits a sacrifice.—Vauvenargues.

Would we codify the laws that should reign in households, and whose daily transgression annoys and mortifies us, and degrades our household life, we must adorn every day with sacrifices. Good manners are made up of petty sacrifices.—Emerson.

The great foundation of civil virtue is self-denial; and there is no one above the necessities of life but has opportunities of exercising that noble quality, and doing as much as his circumstances will bear for the ease and convenience of other men.—Steele.

The opportunities of making great sacrifices for the good of mankind are of rare occurrence; and he who remains inactive till it is in his power to confer signal benefits or yield important services is in imminent danger of incurring the doom of the slothful servant.—Robert Hall.

Sadness

The ground of all great thoughts is sadness.—Bailey.

Our sadness is not sad, but our cheap joys.—Thoreau.

'Tis impious in a good man to be sad.—Young.

Too much sadness hath congealed your blood.—Shakespeare.

Our sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest thoughts.—Shelley.

They praise my rustling show, and never see my heart is breaking for a little love.—Christina G. Rossetti.

There is a chord in every human heart that has a sigh in it if touched aright.—Ouida.

Alas that we must dwell, my heart and I, so far asunder!—Christina G. Rossetti.

Of all tales 'tis the saddest—and more sad, Because it makes us smile. —Byron.

A plague of sighing and grief! It blows a man up like a bladder.—Shakespeare.

Take my word for it, the saddest thing under the sky is a soul incapable of sadness.—Mme. de Gasparin.

Dim sadness did not spare that time celestial visages; yet, mixed with pity, violated not their bliss.—Milton.

Some people habitually wear sadness, like a garment, and think it a becoming grace. God loves a cheerful worshipper.—Chapin.

Child of mortality, whence comest thou? Why is thy countenance sad, and why are thine eyes red with weeping?—Anna Letitia Barbauld.

A man cannot be cheerful and good-natured unless he is also honest; which is not to be said of sadness.—Steele.

Be sad, good brothers, for, by my faith, it very well becomes you: sorrow so royally in you appears, that I will deeply put the fashion on.—
Shakespeare.

A feeling of sadness and longing,
That is not akin to pain,
And resembles sorrow only
As the mist resembles the rain.
—Longfellow.

We look before and after,
And sigh for what is not,
Our sincerest laughter
With some pain is fraught:
Our sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest thought. —Shelley.

It is quite deplorable to see how many rational creatures, or at least who are thought so, mistake suffering for sanctity, and think a sad face and a gloomy habit of mind propitious offerings to that Deity whose works are all light and lustre and harmony and loveliness.—Lady Morgan.

Sailor (See Ship)

Poor child of danger, nursling of the storm,
Sad are the woes that wreck thy manly
form!
Rocks, waves, and winds, the shatter'd bark
delay,
Thy heart is sad, thy home is far away.
—Campbell.

O Thou, who in Thy hand dost hold
The winds and waves that wake or sleep,
Thy tender arms of mercy fold Around the seamen on the deep.
—Hannah F. Gould.

I love the sailor; his eventful life—
His generous spirit—his contempt of danger—
His firmness in the gale, the wreck, the strife;
And though a wild and reckless ocean-
ranger,
God grant he make the port, when life is o'er,
Where storms are hush'd, and billows break no more. —Walter Colton.

Hark to the Boatswain's call, the cheering
cry!
While through the seaman's hand the tackle
glides;
Or schoolboy Midshipman that, standing by,
Strains his shrill pipe as good or ill betides,
And well the docile crew that skilful urchin guides. —Byron.

There's one whose fearless courage yet has never failed in fight;
Who guards with zeal our country's weal,
Our freedom, and our right;
But though his strong and ready arm spreads havoc in its blow; Cry "Quarter!" and that arm will be the first to spare its foe.
He recks not though proud Glory's shout
may be the knell of death;
The triumph won, without a sigh he yields his parting breath.
He's Britain's boast, and claims a toast!
"In peace, my boys, or war, Here's to the brave upon the wave, the gallant English Tar." —Eliza Cook.

Saint Patrick's Day

It is not a bad thing, it is an exceedingly good thing, that on this one day of the year at least, people of Irish nativity and race, with guests of other nations, should assemble around the festive board and in the lecture hall to hear something that shall take them out of the ruts of to-day, take them away from the miserable, selfish thought of their business, of their own even laudable, though at the same time, petty domestic cares, and remind them of their ancestors, to tell them something of the place of their race and nation in the history of the world, and in the work that the universal Father surely has to do for each of the races that He has placed upon earth, as He has given work for each of the individual children that He sends into the world. It is a good thing for them to revive the memory of their history, to be filled with a noble emulation of the glories of their fathers that shall make them examin-

their own consciences, as it were, to see whether they are degenerate sons of illustrious sires, shall inspire them with a firm resolve to transmit to a remote posterity the blessings of religion or character of whatsoever kind they have inherited from their fathers. And it is peculiarly pleasing for us in this sweet land of America, in this our beloved country, where Celt and Saxon and Latin come together to form the magnificent race of the future, that shall be, we may well believe, the race that shall dominate the world and hasten and make speedier the coming of the day foreseen by the poet and prayed for by sage and saint, when the whole human family shall be literally one, and when wars shall cease among men, when the miserable race prejudices shall be things of the barbarous past and the whole world shall be composed of one magnificent family of which the various nations, if they shall still retain their individuality, shall be but members, speaking one language, largely assimilated in blood, and with no rivalry but the magnificent holy emulation to show forth the glory of the Father by the wondrous work of the heart and hand of His human children.—Dr. Edward McGlynn.

It is somewhat suggestive that the apostle of Ireland was himself a foreign-born citizen. He acquired a better right to speak for Ireland than any man that was ever born in it, before or since. And that should be a lesson to moderate certain Irish patriots who would have it that there is nothing good that does not come from Ireland. There are good things, always have been and always will be, out of Ireland, as well as every country, as well as in it, and while it is permissible for us on this one day of the year to blow our own horn a little, it is well for us to be modest enough to acknowledge and to be thankful for the apostle who was not an Irishman and yet was the best Irishman that ever lived.—Dr. Edward McGlynn.

Saints

As no roads are so rough as those that have just been mended, so no sinner is so intolerant as those that have just turned out saints.—Colton.

For virtue's self may too much zeal be had;
The worst of madmen is a saint run mad.
—Pope.

But jest apart—what virtue canst thou trace
In that broad brim that hides thy sober face?

Does that long-skirted drab, that over-nice
And formal clothing, prove a scorn of vice?
Then for thine accent—what in sound can
be

So void of grace as dull monotony?

—Crabbe.

In the wicked there's no vice,
Of which the saints have not a spice,
And yet that thing that's pious in
The one, in the other is a sin.
Is it not ridiculous, and nonsense,
A saint should be a slave to conscience?

—Butler.

Salutation

As a man's salutation, so is the total of his character; in nothing do we lay ourselves so open as in our manner of meeting and salutation.—Lavater.

Salvation

The condition of salvation is that kind of belief in Jesus Christ which authenticates itself in repentance for the past and in an amendment of life for the future.—L. L. Noble.

None shall be saved by Christ but those only who work out their own salvation while God is working in them by His truth and His Holy Spirit. We cannot do without God; and God will not do without us.—Matthew Henry.

"But what can mortal man do to secure his own salvation?" Mortal man can do just what God bids him do. He can repent and believe. He can arise and follow Christ as Matthew did.—W. Gladden.

The waters of salvation, welling forth from the mercy-seat above, have descended in copious floods to refresh and bless the earth. And will you refuse to drink of the river of life which flows full and free before you, proffering health and gladness to your famished soul, because you cannot discover every thing pertaining to it?

source, far, far away in the recesses of the Eternal Mind?—G. B. Ide.

We believe that the blessings of salvation are made free to all by the gospel: that it is the immediate duty of all to accept them by a cordial, penitent, and obedient faith; and that nothing prevents the salvation of the greatest sinner on earth but his own inherent depravity and voluntary rejection of the gospel; which rejection involves him in an aggravated condemnation.—Baptist Church Manual.

What hinders that you should be a child of God? Is not salvation free? Is not the invitation to it flung out to you on every page of the New Testament? Is not Christ offered to you in all His offices? and are you not welcome to all His benefits if you want them? Is not the Holy Spirit promised to them that ask Him? Nothing can hinder you from being a Christian, but your own worldly, selfish, proud, obstinate, unworthy, and self-righteous heart.—Ichabod Spencer.

Sarcasm

Sarcasm poisons reproof.—E. Wigglesworth.

Sarcasm, I now see to be, in general, the language of the devil.—Carlyle.

A sneer is the weapon of the weak. Like other devil's weapons, it is always cunningly ready to our hand, and there is more poison in the handle than in the point.—Lowell.

At the best, sarcasms, bitter irony, scathing wit, are a sort of sword-play of the mind. You pink your adversary, and he is forthwith dead; and then you deserve to be hung for it.—Bovee.

He that cometh to seek after knowledge with a mind to scorn and censure shall be sure to find matter for his humor, but none for his instruction.—Bacon.

He who rests satisfied in merely defending himself against sarcasm and abuse is always a loser.—Goethe.

A true sarcasm is like a sword-stick; it appears, at first sight, to be much more innocent than it really is, till, all of a sudden, there leaps something out of it—sharp and deadly and incisive—which makes you tremble and recoil.—Sydney Smith.

Satan

Satan, as a master, is bad; his work much worse; and his wages worst of all.—Fuller.

Here we may reign secure; and in my choice

To reign is worth ambition, though in hell.
Better to reign in hell than serve in heaven.
—Milton.

The infernal serpent; he it was, whose guile,
Stirr'd up with envy and revenge, deceiv'd
The mother of mankind. —Milton.

If Satan doth fetter us, 'tis indifferent to him whether it be by a cable or by a hair; nay, perhaps the smallest sins are his greatest stratagems.

Meanwhile the adversary of God and man,
Satan, with thoughts inflam'd of highest design,

Puts on swift wings, and towards the gates of Hell

Explores his solitary flight; sometimes
He scours the right hand coast, sometimes the left:

Now soars with level wing the deep; then

Up to the fiery concave, tow'ring high.
—Milton.

Satiety

In all pleasure there is satiety.—Hakewill.

Passion raves herself to rest, or flies.
—Byron.

All surfeit is the father of much fast.—Shakespeare.

Satiety is a neighbor to continued pleasures.—Quintilian.

With pleasure drugged he almost longed for woe.—Byron.

To loathe the taste of sweetness, whereof little more than a little is by much too much.—Shakespeare.

With much we surfeit; plenty makes us poor.—Drayton.

The wholesomest meats that are will breed satiety.—Sir John Harrington.

The same stale viands, served up over and over, the stomach nauseates.—R. Wynne.

I hold this to be the rule of life, "Too much of anything is bad."—Terence.

In everything satiety closely follows the greatest pleasures.—Cicero.

But thy words, with grace divine imbued, bring to their sweetness no satiety.—Milton.

We grow tired of ourselves, much more of other people.—Hazlitt.

Pleasure and satiety live next door to each other.—J. Petit-Senn.

If I had a lover who wanted to hear from me every day, I would break with him.—Mme. de la Fayette.

A surfeit of the sweetest things the deepest loathing to the stomach brings.—Shakespeare.

Love dies by satiety, and forgetfulness inters it.—Du Cœur.

Everything that is in superabundance overflows from the full bosom.—Horace.

The longest absence is less perilous to love than the terrible trials of incessant proximity.—Ouida.

The flower which we do not pluck is the only one which never loses its beauty or its fragrance.—W. R. Alger.

The ear is cloyed unto satiety with honeyed strains, that daily from the fount of Helicon flow murmuring.—William Herbert.

Attainment is followed by neglect, possession by disgust; and the malicious remark of the Greek epigram-matist on marriage may be applied to every other course of life, that its two days of happiness are the first and the last.—Johnson.

Some are cursed with the fullness of satiety; and how can they bear the ills of life when its very pleasures fatigue them?—Colton.

Satiety comes of too frequent repetition; and he who will not give himself leisure to be thirsty can never find the true pleasure of drinking.—Montaigne.

For ennui is a growth of English root, Though nameless in our language:—we retort
The fact for words, and let the French translate That awful yawn which sleep cannot abate.—Byron.

The fruition of what is unlawful must be followed by remorse. The core sticks in the throat after the apple is eaten, and the sated appetite loathes the interdicted pleasure for which innocence was bartered.—Jane Porter.

Pleasure, when it is a man's chief purpose, disappoints itself; and the constant application to it palls the faculty of enjoying it, though it leaves the sense of our inability for that we wish, with a disrelish of everything else.—Steele.

The most voluptuous and loose person breathing, were he tied to follow his hawks and his hounds, his dice and his courtships every day, would find it the greatest torment and calamity that could befall him; he would fly to the mines and galleys for his recreation.—South.

Who riseth from a feast,
With that keen appetite that he sits down?
Where is the horse, that doth untread again
His tedious measures with the unabated fire,
That he did pave them first? all things that are,
Are with more spirit chased than enjoy'd.—Shakespeare.

There is no sense of weariness like that which closes in a day of eager and unintermittent pursuit of pleasure. The apple is eaten, but "the core sticks in the throat." Expectation has then given way to ennui, appetite to satiety.—Bovee.

But passion raves herself to rest, or flies;
And vice, that digs her own voluptuous tomb
Had buried long his hopes, no more to rise:
Pleasure's pall'd victim! life-abhorring gloom
Wrote on his faded brow curst Cain's unresting doom. —Byron.

'Twas strange—in youth all action and all life,
Burning for pleasure, not averse from strife;
Woman—the field—the ocean—all that gave Promise of gladness, peril of a grave,
In turn he tried—he ransack'd all below,
And found his recompense in joy or woe,
No tame trite medium; for his feelings sought
In that intenseness an escape from thought:
The tempest of his heart in scorn had gazed
On that the feebler elements hath rais'd;
The rapture of his heart had look'd on high,
And ask'd if greater dwelt beyond the sky:
Chain'd to excess, the slave of such extreme,
How woke he from the wildness of that dream,
Alas! he told not—but he did awake
To curse the wither'd heart that would not break. —Byron.

Satire

Satire is the disease of art.—Chamfort.

Wit larded with malice.—Shakespeare.

No sword bites so fiercely as an evil tongue.—Sir P. Sidney.

The empty vessel makes the greatest sound.—Shakespeare.

Cervantes smiled Spain's chivalry away.—Byron.

Thou shining supplement of public law! —Young.

Pointed satire runs him through and through.—Oldham.

Among those who are able to understand it, satire has a power of fascination that no other written thing possesses.—Stanley Lane-Poole.

To lash the vices of a guilty age.—Churchill.

Satirists do expose their own ill nature.—Dr. Watts.

Undeserved merit is satire.—S. S. Cox.

Fools are my theme; let satire be my song.—Byron.

Let there be gall enough in thy ink; though thou write with a goose-pen, no matter.—Shakespeare.

Satire shou'd, like a polished razor keen, wound with a touch that is scarcely felt or seen.—Mary Wortley Montagu.

In the present state of the world it is difficult not to write lampoons.—Juvenal.

A bitter jest, when the satire comes too near the truth, leaves a sharp sting behind.—Tacitus.

The feathered arrow of satire has oft been wet with the heart's blood of its victims.—Disraeli.

Satire or sense, alas! can it feel?
Who breaks a butterfly upon a wheel? —Pope.

Satire's my weapon, but I'm too discreet
To run amuck and tilt at all I meet. —Pope.

Satire lies about men of letters during their lives, and eulogy after their death.—Voltaire.

When dunces are satiric, I take it for a panegyric.—Swift.

In general satire, every man perceives
A slight attack, yet neither fears nor grieves. —Crabbe.

By satire kept in awe, shrink from ridicule, though not from law.—Byron.

Men are more satirical from vanity than from malice.—La Rochefoucauld.

Satire among the Romans, but not among the Greeks, was a bitter invective poem.—Dryden.

Satire often proceeds less from ill nature than a desire to display wit.—Lady Blessington.

Satire that is seasonable and just is often more effectual than law or gospel.—H. W. Shaw.

Satire is a kind of poetry in which human vices are reprehended.—Dryden.

The laughter which it creates is impish and devilish, the very mirth of fiends, and its wit the gleam and glare of infernal light.—E. P. Whipple.

Satire recoils whenever charged too high; round your own fame the fatal splinters fly.—Young.

You must not think that a satiric style allows of scandalous and brutish words; the better sort abhor scurrility.—Roscommon.

It is as hard to satirize well a man of distinguished vices as to praise well a man of distinguished virtues.—Swift.

He that hath a satirical vein, as he maketh others afraid of his wit, so he had need be afraid of others' memory.—Bacon.

In my youth I thought of writing a satire on mankind! but now in my age I think I should write an apology for them.—Horace Walpole.

Lampoons and satires, that are written with wit and spirit, are like poisoned darts, which not only inflict a wound, but make it incurable.—Addison.

Lampoons, like squibs, may make a present blaze; but time and thunder pay respect to bays.—Waller.

Friendly satire may be compared to a fine lancet, which gently breathes a vein for health's sake.—Richardson.

Of a bitter satirist it might be said that the person or thing on which his satire fell shriveled up as if the devil had spit on it.—Hawthorne.

A little wit and a great deal of ill-nature will furnish a man for satire; but the greatest instance of wit is to commend well.—Tillotson.

Satire is a sort of glass wherein beholders do generally discover everybody's face but their own, which is the chief reason for that kind reception it meets with in the world.—Swift.

Satires and lampoons on particular people circulate more by giving copies in confidence to the friends of the parties, than by printing them.—Sheridan.

Simonides, a poet famous in his generation, is, I think, author of the oldest satire that is now extant, and, as some say, of the first that was ever written.—Addison.

Truth is quite beyond the reach of satire. There is so brave a simplicity in her that she can no more be made ridiculous than an oak or a pine.—Lowell.

When satire flies abroad on falsehood's wing,
Short is her life, and impotent her sting;
But when to truth allied, the wound she gives Sinks deep, and to remotest ages lives.
—Churchill.

A satire should expose nothing but what is corrigible, and should make a due discrimination between those that are and those that are not the proper objects of it.—Addison.

In fashionable circles general satire, which attacks the fault rather than the person, is unwelcome; while that which attacks the person and spares the fault is always acceptable.—Richter.

Satire is a composition of salt and mercury; and it depends upon the different mixture and preparation of these ingredients, that it comes out a noble medicine or a rank poison.—Jeffrey.

Satire is at once the most agreeable and most dangerous of mental qualities. It always pleases when it is refined, but we always fear those who use it too much; yet satire should be allowed when unmixed with spite, and when the person satirized can join in the satire.—La Rochefoucauld.

The end of satire is the amendment of vices by correction; and he who writes honestly is no more an enemy to the offender than the physician to the patient when he prescribes harsh remedies.—Dryden.

Why should we fear? and what? The laws? They all are armed in Virtue's cause; And aiming at the self-same end, Satire is always Virtue's friend.

—Churchill.

Though folly, robed in purple, shines,
Though vice exhausts Peruvian mines,
Yet shall they tremble and turn pale
When satire wields her mighty flail.

—Churchill.

Whose wound no salve can cure. Each blow doth leave
A lasting sear, that with a poison eats
Into the marrow of their fame, and lives;
Th' eternal ulcer to their memories.

—Randolph.

Curst be the verse, how well soe'er it flow,
That tends to make one worthy man my foe,
Give virtue scandal, innocence a fear,
Or from the soft-ey'd virgin steal a tear.

—Pope.

Wycherley in his writings is the sharpest satirist of his time, but in his nature he has all the softness of the tenderest dispositions. In his writings he is severe, bold, undertaking; in his nature, gentle, modest, inoffensive.—Granville.

Her caustic manner of speaking of friends as well as foes caused Madame du Deffand to be compared to the physician who said: "My friend fell sick—I attended him; he died—I dissected him."—J. A. Bent.

Should a writer single out and point his raillery at particular persons, or satirize the miserable, he might be sure of pleasing a great part of his readers, but must be a very ill man if he could please himself.—Addison.

Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer,
And without sneering, teach the rest to sneer;
Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike,
Just hint a fault, and hesitate dislike;
Alike reserv'd to blame, or to commend,
A tim'rous foe, and a suspicious friend.

—Pope.

Enough of satire; in less harden'd times
Great was her force, and mighty were her rhymes.
I've read of men, beyond man's daring brave,
Who yet have trembled at the strokes she gave;
Whose souls have felt more terrible alarms
From her one line, than from a world in arms.

—Churchill.

Most satirists are indeed a public scourge;
Their mildest physis is a farrier's purge;
Their acrid temper turns, as soon as stirr'd,
The milk of their good purpose all to curd.
Their zeal begotten, as their works rehearse,
By lean despair upon an empty purse.

—Cowper.

For a young and presumptuous poet a disposition to write satires is one of the most dangerous he can encourage. It tempts him to personalities, which are not always forgiven after he has repented and become ashamed of them.—Southey.

It is certain that satirical poems were common at Rome from a very early period. The rustics, who lived at a distance from the seat of government, and took little part in the strife of factions, gave vent to their petty local animosities in coarse Fescennine verse.—Macaulay.

The men of the greatest character in this kind were Horace and Juvenal. There is not, that I remember, one ill-natured expression in all their writings, not one sentence of severity, which does not apparently proceed from the contrary disposition.—Steele.

Satire is, indeed, the only sort of composition in which the Latin poets whose works have come down to us were not mere imitators of foreign models; and it is therefore the sort of composition in which they have never been excelled.—Macaulay.

Among the writers of antiquity there are none who instruct us more openly in the manners of their respective times in which they lived than those who have employed themselves in satire, under whatever dress it may appear.—Addison.

Of satires I think as Epictetus did, "If evil be said of thee, and if it be true, correct thyself; if it be a lie, laugh at it." By dint of time and experience I have learned to be a good post-horse; I go through my appointed daily stage, and I care not for the curs who bark at me along the road.—Frederick the Great.

As men neither fear nor respect what has been made contemptible, all honor to him who makes oppression laughable as well as detestable. Armies cannot protect it then; and walls which have remained impenetrable to cannon have fallen before a roar of laughter or a hiss of contempt.—Whipple.

When scandal has new-minted an old lie,
Or tax'd invention for a fresh supply,
'Tis call'd a satire, and the world appears Gathering around it with erected ears;
A thousand names are toss'd into the crowd,
Some whisper'd softly, and some twang'd aloud,
Just as the sapience of an author's brain,
Suggests it safe or dangerous to be plain.
—Cowper.

The tongues of mocking wenches are as keen

As is the razor's edge invisible,
Cutting a smaller hair than may be seen
Above the sense of sense; so sensible Seemeth their conference; their conceits have wings
Fleeter than arrows, bullets, wind, thought, swifter things. —Shakespeare.

But the most annoying of all public reformers is the personal satirist. Though he may be considered by some few as a useful member of society, yet he is only ranked with the hangman, whom we tolerate because he executes the judgment we abhor to do ourselves, and avoid with a natural detestation of his office. The pen of the one and the cord of the other are inseparable in our minds.—Jane Porter.

Satire, whilst envy and ill-humor sway
The mind of man, must always make her way;
Nor to a bosom, with discretion fraught,
Is all her malice worth a single thought.
The wise have not the will, nor fools the power,
To stop her headstrong course; within the hour
Left to herself, she dies; opposing strife Gives her fresh vigor, and prolongs her life.
—Churchill.

Satirical writers and speakers are not half so clever as they think themselves, nor as they are thought to be. They do winnow the corn, it is true, but it is to feed upon the chaff. I am sorry to add that they who are always speaking ill of others are also very apt to be doing ill to them. It requires some talent and some generosity to find out talent and generosity in others, though nothing but self-conceit and malice are needed to discover or to imagine faults. It is much easier for an ill-natured man than for a good-natured man to be smart and witty.—Rev. Dr. Sharpe.

Savage

The most savage people are also the ugliest.—Mary Somerville.

Wolves and bears, they say, casting their savagery aside, have done like offices of pity.—Shakespeare.

The leading characteristic of the savage state is its refusal or avoidance of industry.—Brisbane.

When man is not properly trained, he is the most savage animal on the face of the globe.—Plato.

Man is neither by birth nor disposition a savage, nor of unsocial habits, but only becomes so by indulging in vices contrary to his nature.—Plutarch.

Scaffold

It is the toilet of death, but it leads to immortality.—Charlotte Corday.

I had rather be guillotined than a guillotiner.—Danton.

I hope the edge of your guillotine is sharper than your scissors.—Duclos.

That a scaffold of execution should grow a scaffold of coronation.—Sir P. Sidney.

They are sending me to the scaffold. Well, my friends, we must go to it gayly.—Danton.

When they go smiling to the scaffold, it is time to break in pieces the sickle of death.—Danton.

Pardon, gentles all, the flat unraised spirits that have dared on this unworthy scaffold to bring forth so great an object.—Shakespeare.

I will never, for the future, paint the portrait of a tyrant until his head lies before me on the scaffold.—J. L. David.

Scandal

At every word a reputation dies.—Pope.

Believe that story false that ought not to be true.—Sheridan.

Dead scandals form good subjects for dissection.—Byron.

A man dishonored is worse than dead.—Cervantes.

No scandal about Queen Elizabeth, I hope.—Shakespeare.

Her tea she sweetens, as she sips, with scandal.—Rogers.

Love and scandal are the best sweeteners of tea.—Fielding.

Praise undeserved is scandal in disguise.—Pope.

On eagle's wings immortal scandals fly, while virtue's actions are but born and die.—Stephen Harvey.

If hours did not hang heavy, what would become of scandal?—Bancroft.

There's a lust in man, no charm can tame, of loudly publishing our neighbor's shame.—Juvenal.

Flavia, most tender of her own good name, is rather careless of a sister's fame.—Cowper.

Ye prime adepts in scandal's school, who rail by precept and detract by rule!—Sheridan.

Skilled by a touch to deepen scandal's tints with all the high mendacity of hints.—Byron.

No particular scandal one can touch but it confounds the breather.—Shakespeare.

A cruel story runs on wheels, and every hand oils the wheels as they run.—Ouida.

The scandal of the world is what makes the offence; it is not sinful to sin in silence.—Molière.

Scandal is the sport of its authors, the dread of fools, and the contempt of the wise.—W. B. Clulow.

Scandal has something so piquant, it is a sort of cayenne to the mind.—Byron.

Convey a libel in a frown, and wink a reputation down.—Swift.

He rams his quill with scandal and with scoff,
But 'tis so very foul, it won't go off.
—Young.

Scandal, like a reptile crawling over a bright grass, leaves a trail and a stain.—Cunningham.

Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and evil speaking be put away from you, with all malice.—Bible.

Detraction's a bold monster and fears not
To wound the fame of princes if it find But any blemish in their lives to work on.
—Massinger.

A good word is an easy obligation; but not to speak ill requires only out silence, which costs us nothing.—Tillotson.

That I do fawn on men, and hug them hard,
And after scandal them.
—Shakespeare.

If there is any person to whom you feel dislike, that is the person of whom you ought never to speak.—Cecil.

A little scandal is an excellent thing; nobody is ever brighter or happier of tongue than when he is making mischief of his neighbors.—Ouida.

Scandals are like dandelion seeds—they are arrow-headed, and stick where they fall, and bring forth and multiply fourfold.—Ouida.

Scandal is what one-half the world takes pleasure in inventing, and the other half in believing.—Chatfield.

Many a wretch has rid on a hurdle who has done less mischief than utterers of forged tales, coiners of scandal, and clippers of reputation.—Sheridan.

The tale-bearer and the tale-hearer should be both hanged up, back to back, one by the tongue, the other by the ear.—South.

I never listen to calumnies, because, if they are untrue, I run the risk of being deceived, and if they are true, of hating persons not worth thinking about.—Montesquieu.

No one loves to tell of scandal except to him who loves to hear it. Learn, then, to rebuke and check the detracting tongue by showing that you do not listen to it with pleasure.—St. Jerome.

Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike,
Just hint a fault, and hesitate dislike;
Alike reserv'd to blame, or to commend,
A tim'rous foe, and a suspicious friend.
—Pope.

Scandal breeds hatred; hatred begets division; division makes faction, and faction brings ruin.—Quarles.

No might nor greatness in mortality can censure escape; backwounding calunmy the whitest virtue strikes; what king so strong, can tie the gall up in the slanderous tongue?
—Shakespeare.

Assail'd by scandal and the tongue of strife,
His only answer was a blameless life;
And he that forged, and he that threw the dart,
Had each a brother's interest in his heart.
—Cowper.

I find great numbers of moderately good people who think it fine to talk scandal. They regard it as a sort of evidence of their own goodness.—F. W. Faber.

Socrates, when informed of some derogating speeches one had used concerning him behind his back, made only this facetious reply, "Let him beat me too when I am absent."—La Fontaine.

It is a certain sign of an ill heart to be inclined to defamation. They who are harmless and innocent can have no gratification that way; but it ever arises from a neglect of what is laudable in a man's self.—Steele.

There are a set of malicious, prating, prudent gossips, both male and female, who murder characters to kill time; and will rob a young fellow of his good name before he has years to know the value of it.—Sheridan.

Queen Mary had a way of interrupting tattle about elopements, duels, and play debts, by asking the tattlers, very quietly yet significantly, whether they had ever read her favorite sermon—Dr. Tillotson on Evil Speaking.—Macaulay.

It is not good to speak evil of all whom we know bad; it is worse to judge evil of any who may prove good. To speak ill upon knowledge shows a want of charity; to speak ill upon suspicion shows a want of honesty.—Warwick.

Malice may empty her quiver, but cannot wound; the dirt will not stick, the jests will not take. Without the consent of the world, a scandal doth not go deep; it is only a slight stroke upon the injured party, and returneth with the greater force upon those that gave it.—Saville.

A tale of scandal is as fatal to the credit of a prudent lady as a fever is generally to those of the strongest constitutions. But there is a sort of puny, sickly reputation, that is always ailing, yet will wither the robust characters of a hundred prudes.—Sheridan.

The improbability of a malicious story serves but to help forward the currency of it, because it increases the scandal. So that, in such instances, the world is like the pious St. Austin, who said he believed some things because they were absurd and impossible.—Sterne.

As every one is pleased with imagining that he knows something not yet commonly divulged, secret history easily gains credit; but it is for the most part believed only while it circulates in whispers, and when once it is openly told, is openly refuted.—Dr. Johnson.

Tears are copiously showered over frailties the discoverer takes a malicious delight in circulating; and thus, all granite on one side of the heart, and all milk on the other, the unsexed scandal-monger hies from house to house, pouring balm from its weeping eyes on the wounds it inflicts with its stabbing tongue.—Whipple.

These are the spiders of society;
They weave their petty webs of lies and sneers,
And lie themselves in ambush for the spoil,
The web seems fair, and glitters in the sun,
And the poor victim winds him in the toil
Before he dreams of danger or of death.
—L. E. Landon.

It generally takes its rise either from an ill-will to mankind, a private inclination to make ourselves esteemed, an ostentation of wit, and vanity of being thought in the secrets of the world; or from a desire of gratifying any of these dispositions of mind in those persons with whom we converse.

—Addison.

The circle smil'd, then whisper'd, and then sneer'd;
The misses bridled, and the matrons
frown'd;
Some hoped things might not turn out as they fear'd;
Some would not deem such women could be found;
Some ne'er believ'd one half of what they heard;
Some look'd perplex'd, and others look'd profound;
And several pitied, with sincere regret,
Poor Lord Augustus Fitz-Plantagenet.
—Byron.

Be deaf unto the suggestions of tale-bearers, calumniators, pick-thank or malevolent detractors, who, while quiet men sleep, sowing the tares of discord and division, distract the tranquillity of charity and all friendly society. These are the tongues that set the world on fire—cankerers of reputation, and, like that of Jonah's gourd, wither a good name in a single night.
—Sir T. Browne.

The world with calumny abounds,
The whitest virtue slander wounds;
There are whose joy is, night and day,
To talk a character away:
Eager from rout to rout they haste,
To blast the generous and the chaste,
And hunting reputations down,
Proclaim their triumphs through the town
What mind's in such a base employment
To feel the slightest self-enjoyment!
—Pope.

Scars

A scar nobly got is a good livery of honor.—Shakespeare.

The scars of the body—what are they, compared to the hidden ones of the heart?—Madame de Maintenon.

Who has not raised a tombstone, here and there, over buried hopes and dead joys, on the road of life? Like the scars of the heart, they are not to be obliterated.—Ninon de Lenclos.

Scepticism

Sceptics are yet the most credulous
—Goethe.

Sceptics are generally ready to believe anything, provided it is sufficiently improbable.—Von Knebel.

Human knowledge is the parent of doubt.—Greville.

Freethinkers are generally those who never think at all.—Sterne.

Scepticism is a barren coast, without a harbor or lighthouse.—Beecher.

It is men of faith, not sceptics, who have made the world aware that they were in it.—Channing.

The sceptic only stumbles at matter of fact.—Von Knebel.

Improbability is the food upon which scepticism is nourished.—Locke.

It is ever the improbable that the sceptic is the most ready to give ear to.—Voltaire.

I will listen to any one's convictions; but, pray, keep your doubts to yourself.—Goethe.

An atheist is more reclaimable than a papist, as ignorance is sooner cured than superstition.—Sterne.

I know not any crime so great that a man could contrive to commit as poisoning the sources of eternal truth.—Dr. Johnson.

Scepticism has never founded empires, established principles, or changed the world's heart. The great doers in history have always been men of faith.—Chapin.

The sceptic, when he plunges into the depths of infidelity, like the miser who leaps from the shipwreck, will find that the treasures which he bears about him will only sink him deeper in the abyss.—Colton.

I would rather dwell in the dim fog of superstition than in air rarefied to nothing by the air-pump of unbelief; in which the panting breast expires, vainly and convulsively gasping for breath.—Richter.

Scepticism commonly takes up the room left by defect of imagination, and is the very quality of mind most likely to seek for sensual proof of supersensual things. If one came from the dead it could not believe; and yet it longs for such a witness, and will put up with a very dubious one.—Lowell.

This a sacred rule we find
Among the nicest of mankind, (Which never might exception brook
From Hobbes even down to Bolingbroke,)
To doubt of facts, however true,
Unless they know the causes too.
—Churchill.

Let no presuming impious railer tax
Creative Wisdom, as if aught was formed
In vain, or not for admirable ends,
Shall little haughty ignorance pronounce His works unwise, of which the smallest part Exceed the narrow vision of her mind?
—Thomson.

As a man of pleasure, by a vain attempt to be more happy than any man can be, is often more miserable than most men are, so the sceptic, in a vain attempt to be wise beyond what is permitted to man, plunges into a darkness more deplorable, and a blindness more incurable than that of the common herd, whom he despises, and would fain instruct.—Colton.

Oh! lives there, Heaven! beneath thy dread expanse,
One hopeless, dark idolater of chance,
Content to feed with pleasures unrefin'd,
The lukewarm passions of a lowly mind;
Who mouldering earthward, 'reft of every trust,
In joyless union wedded to the dust,
Could all his parting energy dismiss,
And call this barren world sufficient bliss?
—Campbell.

Scholarship

A scholar has no ennui.—Richter.

Scholarship, save by accident, is never the measure of a man's power.—J. G. Holland.

To talk in public, to think in solitude, to read and to hear, to inquire and answer inquiries, is the business of a scholar.—Johnson.

In the true literary man there is thus ever, acknowledged or not by the world, a sacredness; he is the light of the world; the world's priest—guiding it, like a sacred pillar of fire, in its dark pilgrimage through the waste of time.—Carlyle.

The resources of the scholar are proportioned to his confidence in the attributes of the intellect.—Emerson.

The mind of the scholar, if you would have it large and liberal, should come in contact with other minds. It is better that his armor should be somewhat bruised by rude encounters, even, than hang forever rusting on the wall.—Longfellow.

A great scholar, in the highest sense of the term, is not one who depends simply on an infinite memory, but also on an infinite and electrical power of combination; bringing together from the four winds, like the Angel of the Resurrection, what else were dust from dead men's bones, into the unity of breathing life.—De Quincey.

Scholars are men of peace; they bear no arms, but their tongues are sharper than Actius's sword, their pens carry further, and give a louder report than thunder. I had rather stand in the shock of a basilisk than in the fury of a merciless pen.—Sir Thomas Browne.

School

The modest temple of wisdom.—Franklin.

Public instruction should be the first object of government.—Napoleon I.

Not only the needle-gun, but the schools have won our battles.—Leh-nert.

The Prussian schoolmaster won the battle of Sadowa.—Moltke.

Whoe'er excels in what we prize, appears a hero in our eyes.—Shen-stone.

A great school is very trying; it never can present images of rest and peace.—Dr. T. Arnold.

Whose school-hours are all days and nights of our existence.—Carlyle.

To him and all of us the expressly appointed schoolmaster and schoolings are as nothing.—Carlyle.

Yet he's gentle, never schooled and yet learned.—Shakespeare.

To sentence a man of true genius to the drudgery of a school is to put a race-horse in a mill.—Colton.

Then the whining schoolboy, with his satchel,
And shining morning face, creeping like snail
Unwillingly to school. —Shakespeare.

What made our revolution a fore-gone conclusion was the act of the general court, passed in May, 1647, which established the system of common schools.—Lowell.

More is learned in a public than in a private school, from emulation. There is the collision of mind with mind, or the radiation of many minds pointing to one center.—Dr. Johnson.

Alas! regardless of their doom,
The little victims play,
No sense have they of ills to come,
No care beyond to-day. —Gray.

Whipping, that's virtue's governess,
Tutored of arts and sciences;
That mends the gross mistakes of nature,
And puts new life into dull matter;
That lays foundation for renown,
And all the honours of the gown. —Butler.

Of in the lone churchyard at night I've seen,
By glimpse of moonshine, chequering
through the trees,
The school-boy with his satchel in his hand,
Whistling aloud to hear his courage up;
And lightly tripping o'er the long flat stones,
(With nettles skirted, and with moss o'er-grown,
That tell in homely phrase who lie below;) Sudden he starts! and hears, or thinks he hears,
The sound of something purring at his heels. —Blair.

Let the soldier be abroad if he will; he can do nothing in this age. There is another personage abroad—a person less imposing—in the eyes of some, perhaps, insignificant. The schoolmaster is abroad; and I trust to him, armed with his primer, against the soldier in full military array.— Brougham.

To every class we have a school assign'd, Rules for all ranks, and food for every
mind:

Yet one there is, that small regard to rule
Or study pays, and still is deem'd a school;
That, where a deaf, poor, patient widow sits,

And awes some thirty infants as she knits;
Infants of humble, busy wives, who pay
Some trifling price for freedom through the day.

At this good matron's hut the children
meet,

Who thus becomes the mother of the street. —Crabbe.

Lord, let me make this rule
To think of life as school,
And try my best
To stand each test,
And do my work,
And nothing shirk.

Should someone else outshine
This dullard head of mine,
Should I be glad?
I will be glad.
To do my best
Is Thy behest.

Some day the bell will sound,
Some day my heart will bound,
As with a shout
That school is out
And lessons done,
I homeward run.
—Maltbie Babcock.

Beside yon straggling fence that skirts the
way

With blossom'd furze, unprofitably gay,
There, in his noisy mansion, skill'd to rule,
The village master taught his little school:
A man severe he was, and stern to view,
I knew him well, and every truant knew;
Well had the boding tremblers learn'd to trace

The day's disasters in his morning's face;
Full well they laugh'd with counterfeited glee

At all his jokes, for many a joke had he;
Full well the busy whisper, circling round, Convey'd the dismal tidings when he
frown'd;

Yet he was kind, or if severe in aught,
The love he bore to learning was in fault,
The village all declar'd how much he knew;
'T was certain he could write and cypher
too.

Lands he could measure, terms and tides
presage;

And e'en the story ran, that he could gauge. —Goldsmith.

The opening of the first grammar-school was the opening of the first trench against monopoly in church and state; the first row of trammels and pothooks which the little Shear-jashubs and Elkanahs blotted and blubbered across their copy-books was the preamble to the Declaration of Independence.—Lowell.

Science

Science is the topography of ignorance.—O. W. Holmes.

Science dissects death.—Frederick
W. Robertson.

Human science is uncertain guess.—
Prior.

Toil of science swells the wealth of art.—Schiller.

Science does not know its debt to imagination.—Emerson.

Steam, that great civilizer.—Freeman Hunt.

While bright-eyed Science watches round.—Gray.

We hail science as man's truest friend and noblest helper.—Moses Harvey.

Science has but one fashion—to lose nothing once gained.—Stedman.

Who thinks all science, as all virtue, vain.—Dryden.

Science is the systematic classification of experience.—George Henry Lewes.

Science is the natural ally of religion.—Theodore Parker.

One science only will one genius fit,
So vast is art, so narrow human wit.
—Pope.

Science when well digested is nothing but good sense and reason.—Stanislaus.

Science sees signs: poetry, the thing signified.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

For science is * * * like virtue, its own exceeding great reward.—Chas. Kingsley.

O star-eyed Science, hast thou wander'd there,
To waft us home the message of despair?
—Campbell.

Science is busy with the hither-end of things, not the thither-end.—Chas. H. Parkhurst.

In the earliest ages science was poetry, as in the latter poetry has become science.—Lowell.

Steam is no stronger now than it was a hundred years ago, but it is put to better use.—Emerson.

Science deals exclusively with things as they are in themselves.—Ruskin.

The birth of science was the death of superstition.—Huxley.

The work of science is to substitute facts for appearances, and demonstrations for impressions.—Ruskin.

Science seldom renders men amiable; women, never.—Beauchêne.

Nothing tends so much to the corruption of science as to suffer it to stagnate.—Burke.

How many wells of science there are in whose depths there is nothing but clear water!—J. Petit-Senn.

The only hope of science is genuine induction.—Bacon.

What cannot art and industry perform, When science plans the progress of their toil!
—Beattie.

Old sciences are unraveled like old stockings, by beginning at the foot.—Swift.

Science ever has been, and ever must be, the safeguard of religion.—Sir David Brewster.

Our science, so called, is always more barren and mixed with error than our sympathies.—Thoreau.

Art and science have their meeting-point in method.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Science and art are the handmaids of religion.—François Delsarte.

Science surpasses the old miracles of mythology.—Emerson.

'Twas thus by the glare of false science
betray'd,
That leads to bewilder, and dazzles to blind.
—Beattie.

Science is teaching man to know and reverence truth, and to believe that only as far as he knows and loves it can he live worthily on earth, and vindicate the dignity of his spirit.—Moses Harvey.

Science is simply common sense at its best—that is, rigidly accurate in observation, and merciless to fallacy in logic.—Huxley.

There cannot be a body of rules without a rationale, and this rationale constitutes the science.—Sir G. C. Lewis.

Through all God's works there runs a beautiful harmony. The remotest truth in His universe is linked to that which lies nearest the throne.—E. H. Chapin.

What are the sciences but maps of universal laws, and universal laws but the channels of universal power; and universal power but the outgoings of a universal mind?—Edward Thomson.

Science is a good piece of furniture for a man to have in an upper chamber, provided he has common sense on the ground floor.—O. W. Holmes.

Science confounds everything; it gives to the flowers an animal appetite, and takes away from even the plants their chastity.—Joubert.

Science * * * necessitates a faith commensurate with the grander orbits and universal laws which it discloses. Yet it does not surprise the moral sentiment. That was older, and awaited expectant these larger insights.—Emerson.

When man seized the loadstone of science, the loadstar of superstition vanished in the clouds.—W. R. Alger.

Extinguished theologians lie about the cradle of every science, as the strangled snakes besides that of Hercules.—Professor Huxley.

I value science—none can prize it more.
It gives ten thousand motives to adore:
Be it religious, as it ought to be,
The heart it humbles, and it bows the knee.
—Abraham Coles.

The sciences are said, and they are truly said, to have a mutual connection, that any one of them may be the better understood, for an insight into the rest.—Bishop Horsley.

Science has penetrated the constitution of nature, and unrolled the mysterious pages of its history, and started again many, as yet, unanswered questions in respect to the mutual relations of matter and spirit, of nature and of God.—Noah Porter.

We cannot but think there is something like a fallacy in Mr. Buckle's theory that the advance of mankind is necessarily in the direction of science, and not in that of morais.—Lowell.

Science—in other words, knowledge—is not the enemy of religion; for, if so, then religion would mean ignorance. But it is often the antagonist of school-divinity.—Holmes.

Nothing has tended more to retard the advancement of science than the disposition in vulgar minds to vilify what they cannot comprehend.—Johnson.

The sciences throw an inexpressible grace over our compositions, even where they are not immediately concerned; as their effects are discernible where we least expect to find them.—Pliny.

Shun no toil to make yourself remarkable by some talent or other; yet do not devote yourself to one branch exclusively. Strive to get clear notions about all. Give up no science entirely; for science is but one.—Seneca.

Science corrects the old creeds, sweeps away, with every new perception, our infantile catechisms, and necessitates a faith commensurate with the grander orbits and universal laws which it discloses.—Emerson.

But when science, passing beyond its own limits, assumes to take the place of theology, and sets up its own conception of the order of nature as a sufficient account of its cause, it is invading a province of thought to which it has no claim, and not unreasonably provokes the hostility of its best friends.—M. B. Carpenter.

The sciences are of a sociable disposition, and flourish best in the neighborhood of each other; nor is there any branch of learning but may be helped and improved by assistance drawn from other arts.—Blackstone.

They may say what they like; everything is organized matter. The tree is the first link of the chain; man is the last. Men are young; the earth is old. Vegetable and animal chemistry are still in their infancy. Electricity, galvanism,—what discoveries in a few years!—Napoleon I.

Blessings on Science! When the earth seem'd old,
When Faith grew doting, and the Reason
cold,
'Twas she discover'd that the world was
young,
And taught a language to its lisping tongue:
'Twas she disclosed a future to its view.
And made old knowledge pale before the new.
—Charles Mackay.

Blessings on Science, and her handmaid Steam!
They make Utopia only half a dream;
And show the fervent, of capacious souls,
Who watch the ball of Progress as it rolls,
That all as yet completed, or begun,
Is but the dawning that precedes the sun.
—Charles Mackay.

To the natural philosopher, to whom the whole extent of nature belongs, all the individual branches of science constitute the links of an endless chain, from which not one can be detached without destroying the harmony of the whole.—Friedrich Schoedler.

Our abiding belief is that just as the workmen in the tunnel of St. Gothard, working from either end, met at last to shake hands in the very central root of the mountain, so students of nature and students of Christianity will yet join hands in the unity of reason and faith, in the heart of their deepest mysteries.—Lemuel Moss.

Science is knowledge certain and evident in itself, or by the principles from which it is deducted, or with which it is certainly connected. It is subjective, as existing in the mind; objective, as embodied in truths; speculative, as leading to do something, as in practical science.—William Fleming.

It is certain that a serious attention to the sciences and liberal arts softens and humanizes the temper, and cherishes those fine emotions in which true virtue and honor consist. It rarely, very rarely happens that a man of taste and learning is not, at least, an honest man, whatever frailties may attend him.—Hume.

The strength of all sciences, which consisteth in their harmony, each supporting the other, is as the strength of the old man's fagot in the band; for were it not better for a man in a fair room to set up one great light, or branching candlestick of lights, than to go about with a small watch-candle into every corner?—Bacon.

Science is, I believe, nothing but trained and organized common-sense, differing from the latter only as a veteran may differ from a raw recruit; and its methods differ from those of common-sense only so far as the guardsman's cut and thrust differ from the manner in which a savage wields his club.—Professor Huxley.

To me there never has been a higher source of earthly honor or distinction than that connected with advances in science. I have not possessed enough of the eagle in my character to make a direct flight to the loftiest altitudes in the social world; and I certainly never endeavored to reach those heights by using the creeping powers of the reptile, who, in ascending, generally chooses the dirtiest path, because it is the easiest.—Sir H. Davy.

Trace science then, with modesty thy guide;
First strip off all her equipage of pride;
Deduct what is but vanity, or dress,
Or learning's luxury, or idleness;
Or tricks to show the stretch of human brain,
Mere curious pleasure, or ingenious pain;
Expunge the whole, or lop th' excrescent parts
Of all our vices have created arts;
Then see how little the remaining sum Which serv'd the past, and must the times to come. —Pope.

I have spent much time in the study of the abstract sciences; but the paucity of persons with whom you can communicate on such subjects disgusted me with them. When I began to study man, I saw that these abstract sciences are not suited to him, and that in diving into them, I wandered farther from my real object than those who knew them not, and I forgave them for not having attended to these things. I expected then, however, that I should find some companions in the study of man, since it was so specifically a duty. I was in error. There are fewer students of man than of geometry.—Pascal.

Holding then to science with one hand—the left hand—we give the right hand to religion, and cry: "Open Thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things, more wondrous than the shining worlds can tell." Obedient to the promise, religion does awaken faculties within us, does teach our eyes to the beholding of more wonderful things. Those great worlds blazing like suns die like feeble stars in the glory of the morning, in the presence of this new light. The soul knows that an infinite sea of love is all about it, throbbing through it, everlasting arms of affection lift it, and it bathes itself in the clear consciousness of a Father's love.—Bishop H. W. Warren.

Scolding

No man was ever scolded out of his sins.—Cowper.

The utmost that severity can do is to make men hypocrites; it can never make them converts.—Dr. John Moore.

Scorn

Scorn at first, makes after-love the more.—Shakespeare.

Disdain and scorn ride sparkling in her eyes.—Shakespeare.

A dismal, universal hiss, the sound of public scorn.—Milton.

I had rather be a dog, and bay the moon, Than such a Roman. —Shakespeare.

So let him stand, through ages yet unborn, Fix'd statue on the pedestal of scorn! —Byron.

Infamous wretch! so much below my scorn, I dare not kill thee. —Dryden.

Alas! to make me
The fixed figure of the time, for scorn
To point his slow and moving finger at.
—Shakespeare.

Thou mayst from law, but not from scorn escape. The pointed finger, cold, averted eye, insulted virtue's hiss, thou canst not fly.—Charles Sprague.

Scotland

Stands Scotland where it did?—Shakespeare.

Hear, Land o' Cakes and brither Scots Frae Maiden Kirk to Johnny Groat's.
—Burns.

Give me but one hour of Scotland;
Let me see it ere I die.
—Wm. E. Aytoun.

That garret of the earth—that knuckle end of England—that land of Calvin, oatcakes and sulphur.—Sydney Smith.

From scenes like these old Scotia's grandeur springs.—Burns.

O Scotia! my dear, my native soil!
For whom my warmest wish to heaven is sent!
Long may thy hardy sons of rustic toil
Be blest with health, and peace, and sweet content. —Burns.

The Scots are poor, cries surly English
pride,
True is the charge, nor by themselves denied,
Are they not, then, in strictest reason
clear,
Who wisely come to mend their fortunes
here. —Churchill.

Scots, wha hae wi' Wallace bled,
Scots, wham Bruce has aften led;
Welcome to your gory bed,
Or to victory! —Burns.

O Caledonia! stern and wild,
Meet nurse for a poetic child!
Land of brown heath and shaggy wood,
Land of the mountain and the flood,
Land of my sires! what mortal hand
Can e'er untie the filial band,
That knits me to thy rugged strand!
—Scott.

And though, as you remember, in a fit
Of wrath and rhyme, when juvenile and curly,
I railed at Scots to show my wrath and
wit,
Which must be owned was sensitive and surly,
Yet 'tis in vain such sallies to permit,
They cannot quench young feelings fresh and early:
I "scotched, not killed" the Scotchman in my blood,
And love the land of "mountain and of flood." —Byron.

2 Peter iii. 10.

But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night.

1 John iv. 18.

There is no fear in love; but perfect love casteth out fear.

Revelation ii. 27.

He shall rule them with a rod of iron.

Revelation xxii. 13.

I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last.

Revelation ii. 10.

Be thou faithful unto death.

Scripture

This book of stars lights to eternal bliss.—George Herbert.

The history of every man should be a Bible.—Novalis.

The illumined record of celestial truth.—Hosea Ballou.

A Bible and a newspaper in every house.—Franklin.

Writ in the climate of heaven, and in the language spoken by angels.—Longfellow.

But Thy good word informs my soul
How I may climb to heaven.—Watts.

It was a common saying among the Puritans,
"Brown bread and the Gospel is good fare."
—Matthew Henry.

Out from the heart of nature rolled
The burdens of the Bible old.
—Emerson.

Shallows where a lamb could wade and depths where an elephant would drown.—Matthew Henry.

A stream where alike the elephant may swim, and the lamb may wade.
—Gregory the Great.

We must not only read the Scriptures, but we must make their rules of life our own.—Hosea Ballou.

Revealed religion first informed thy sight, and reason saw not till faith sprung to light.—Dryden.

The Bible is a book of faith, and a book of doctrine, and a book of morals, and a book of religion, of especial revelation from God.—Daniel Webster.

The majesty of the Scriptures strikes me with admiration, as the purity of the gospel has its influence on my heart.—Rousseau.

The devil can cite Scripture for his purpose. An evil soul producing holy witness is like a villain with a smiling cheek.—Shakespeare.

There are no songs comparable to the songs of Zion, no orations equal to those of the prophets.—Milton.

The truths of the Scriptures are so marked and inimitable, that the inventor would be more of a miraculous character than the hero.—Rousseau.

Thus I clothe my naked villany with old odd ends, stolen out of holy writ;
and seem a saint when most I play
the devil.—Shakespeare.

Whence but from heaven could men
unskilled in arts, in several ages born, in several parts, weave such agreeing truths?—Dryden.

We account the Scriptures of God to be the most sublime philosophy.
I find more sure marks of authenticity in the Bible than in any profane history whatever.—Isaac Newton.

How glad the heathens would have been,
That worship idols, wood and stone,
If they the book of God had seen.
—Watts.

A glory gilds the sacred page,
Majestic like the sun,
It gives a light to every age,
It gives, but borrows none.
—Cowper.

And that the Scriptures, though not every where
Free from corruption, or entire, or clear,
Are uncorrupt, sufficient, clear, entire,
In all things which our needful faith require.
—Dryden.

I have read it through many times;
I now make a practice of going through it once a year. It is a book of all others for lawyers, as well as divines; and I pity the man who cannot find in it a rich supply of thought and rule for conduct.—Daniel Webster.

Most wondrous book! bright candle of the Lord!
Star of Eternity! The only star
By which the bark of man could navigate
The sea of life, and gain the coast of bliss Securely.
—Pollok.

A noble book! All men's book! It is our first, oldest statement of the never-ending problem,—man's destiny, and God's ways with him here on earth; and all in such free-flowing outlines,—grand in its sincerity, in its simplicity, in its epic melody, and repose of reconciliation.—Carlyle.

Within that awful volume lies
The mystery of mysteries!
Happiest they of human race,
To whom God has granted grace
To read, to fear, to hope, to pray,
To lift the latch, and force the way:
And better had they ne'er been born,
Who read to doubt, or read to scorn.
—Scott.

The word unto the prophet spoken
Was writ on tablets yet unbroken;
The word by seers or sibyls told,
In groves of oak or fanes of gold,
Still floats upon the morning wind,
Still whispers to the willing mind.
—Emerson.

Cities fall, empires come to nothing, kingdoms fade away as smoke. Where is Numa, Minos, Lycurgus? Where are their books? and what has become of their laws? But that this book no tyrant should have been able to consume, no tradition to choke, no heretic maliciously to corrupt; that it should stand unto this day, amid the wreck of all that was human, without the alteration of one sentence so as to change the doctrine taught therein,—surely there is a very singular providence, claiming our attention in a most remarkable manner.—Bishop Jewell.

Scrupulousness

Generals are not to be too scrupulous.—Napoleon I.

Scrupulous people are not suited to great affairs.—Turgot.

No man, I fear, can effect great benefits for his country without some sacrifice of the minor virtues.—Sydney Smith.

Sculpture

Milton was a genius that could cut a colossus from a rock, but could not carve heads upon cherry-stones.—Dr. Johnson.

Such is the strength of art, rough things to shape.—James Howell.

And the cold marble leapt to life, a god.—Milman.

Here the marble statues breathe in rows.—Addison.

Then marble, soften'd into life, grew warm.—Pope.

Like the Grecian, woos the image he himself has wrought.—Prior.

It was Dante who called this noble art God's grandchild.—Washington Allston.

He, like Amphion, makes those quarries leap into fair figures from a confused heap.—Waller.

Thy shape in every part so clean as might instruct the sculptor's art.—Dryden.

Then sculpture and her sister arts revived; stones leaped to form, and rocks began to live.—Pope.

Madame de Staël pronounced architecture to be frozen music; so is statuary crystallized spirituality.—Alcott.

Where are the forms the sculptor's soul hath seized? In him alone. Can nature show as fair?—Byron.

The value of statuary is owing to its difficulty. You would not value the finest head cut upon a carrot.—Dr. Johnson.

The statue lies hid in a block of marble; and the art of the statuary only clears away the superfluous matter, and removes the rubbish.—Addison.

The marble index of a mind forever
Voyaging through strange seas of thought, alone. —Wordsworth.

Sculpture is more than painting. It is greater
To raise the dead to life than to create Phantoms that seem to live.—Longfellow.

The sculptor does not work for the anatomist, but for the common observer of life and nature.—Ruskin.

The beauty of a plastic work is, above all, plastic; and an art always degenerates when, discarding its own peculiar means for exciting interest, it borrows those of another art.—Taine.

A sculptor wields
The chisel, and the stricken marble grows
To beauty. —Bryant.

So stands the statue that enchants the world,
So bending tries to veil the matchless boast,
The mingled beauties of exulting Greece. —Thomson.

Sculpture is not the mere cutting of the form of anything in stone; it is the cutting of the effect of it. Very often the true form, in the marble, would not be in the least like itself.—Ruskin.

Sculptors are obliged to follow the manners of the painters, and to make many ample folds, which are unsufferable hardness, and more like a rock than a natural garment.—Dryden.

The idea of the painter and the sculptor is undoubtedly that perfect and excellent example of the mind, by imitation of which imagined form all things are represented which fall under human sight.—Dryden.

Moral beauty is the basis of all true beauty. This foundation is somewhat covered and veiled in Nature. Art brings it out, and gives it more transparent forms.—Victor Cousin.

The stone unhewn and cold
Becomes a living mould,
The more the marble wastes
The more the statue grows.
—Michael Angelo.

The sculptor must paint with his chisel; half his touches are not to realize, but to put power into, the form. They are touches of light and shadow, and raise a ridge, or sink a hollow, not to represent an actual ridge or hollow, but to get a line of light, or a spot of darkness.—Ruskin.

In sculpture did ever anybody call the Apollo a fancy piece? Or say of the Laocoön how it might be made different? A masterpiece of art has in the mind a fixed place in the chain of being, as much as a plant or a crystal.—Emerson.

The ideal is to be obtained by selecting and assembling in one whole the beauties and perfections which are usually seen in different individuals, excluding everything defective or unseemly, so as to form a type or model of the species.—William Fleming.

Sculpture is more divine, and more like Nature,
That fashions all her works in high relief,
And that is Sculpture. This vast ball, the Earth,
Was moulded out of clay, and baked in fire;
Men, women, and all animals that breathe
Are statues, and not paintings.
—Longfellow.

Sea

Mystery of waters,—never slumbering sea!—Montgomery.

He maketh the deep to boil like a pot.—Bible.

He that will learn to pray, let him go to sea.—George Herbert.

Praise the sea, but keep on land.—George Herbert.

The sea, that home of marvels.—W. E. Gladstone.

The sea drinks the air and the sun the sea.—Anacreon.

The sea is certainly common to all.—Plautus.

There is sorrow on the sea; it cannot be quiet.—Bible.

O'er the glad waters of the dark blue sea,
Our thoughts as boundless, and our souls
as free,
Far as the breeze can bear, the billows
foam,
Survey our empire, and behold our home!
—Byron.

The garrulous sea is talking to the shore; let us go down and hear the graybeard's speech.—Alexander Smith.

Surely oak and threefold brass surrounded his heart who first trusted a frail vessel to the merciless ocean.—

Horace.

The ocean's surfy, slow, deep, mellow voice, full of mystery and awe, moaning over the dead it holds in its bosom, or lulling them to unbroken slumbers in the chambers of its vasty depths.—Haliburton.

Ours are the tears, though few, sincerely
shed,
While ocean shrouds and sepulchres our dead. —Byron.

A wet sheet and a flowing sea,
A wind that follows fast,
And fills the white and rustling sail,
And bends the gallant mast.
—Allan Cunningham.

Tumultuous waves embroil'd the bellowing
flood,
All trembling, deafen'd, and aghast we
stood!
No more the vessel plough'd the dreadful wave,
Fear seized the mighty, and unnerved the brave. —Pope.

The sea! the sea! the open sea!
The blue, the fresh, the ever free!
Without a mark, without a bound,
It runneth the earth's wide region round,
It plays with the clouds; it mocks the skies,
Or like a cradled creature lies.
—Barry Cornwall.

There shrinks no ebb in that tideless sea,
Which changeless rolls eternally;
So that wildest of waves, in their angriest mood,
Scarce break on the bounds of the land
for a rood;
And the powerless moon beholds them
flow,
Heedless if she come or go. —Byron.

Then rose from sea to sky the wild farewell—
Then shriek'd the timid, and stood still
the brave,
Then some leap'd overboard with dreadful
yell,
As eager to anticipate their grave;
And the sea yawn'd around her like a hell,
And down she suck'd with her the whirling wave,
Like one who grapples with his enemy,
And strives to strangle him before he die.
—Byron.

The sea has been called deceitful and treacherous, but there lies in this trait only the character of a great natural power, which, to speak according to our own feelings, renews its strength, and, without reference to joy or sorrow, follows eternal laws which are imposed by a higher Power.

—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

He knows enough, the mariner, who knows Where lurk the shelves, and where the whirlpools boil,
What signs portend the storm: to subtil minds
He leaves to scan, from what mysterious cause
Charybdis rages in the Ionian wave; Whence those impetuous currents in the main
Which neither oar nor sail can stem; and why
The roughening deep expects the storm, as sure
As red Orion mounts the shrouded heaven.
—Armstrong.

I saw a thousand fearful wracks:
A thousand men that fishes gnaw'd upon:
Wedges of gold, great anchors, heaps of pearl,
Inestimable stones, unvalued jewels,
All scatter'd in the bottom of the sea.
Some lay in dead men's skulls; and in those holes
Where eyes did once inhabit there were crept,
As 'twere in scorn of eyes, reflecting gems,
That woo'd the slimy bottom of the deep,
And mock'd the dead bones that lay scatter'd by. —Shakespeare.

In the vast archipelago of the east, where Borneo and Java and Sumatra lie, and the Molucca Islands, and the Philippines, the sea is often fanned only by the land and sea breezes, and is like a smooth bed, on which these islands seem to sleep in bliss,—islands in which the spice and perfume gardens of the world are embowered, and where the bird of paradise has its home, and the golden pheasant, and a hundred others of brilliant plumage, whose flight is among thickets so luxuriant, and scenery so picturesque, that European strangers find there the fair land of their youthful dreams.—
Marryat.

Season

In the journey of the year, the autumn is Venice, spring is Naples, certainly, and the majestic maturity of summer is Rome.—George William Curtis.

The autumn with its fruits provides disorders for us, and the winter's cold turns them into sharp diseases, and the spring brings flowers to strew our hearses, and the summer gives green turf and brambles to bind up our graves.—Jeremy Taylor.

Ah! well away!
Seasons flower and fade.
—Tennyson.

How many things by season seasoned are
To their right praise, and true perfection!
—Shakespeare.

Perceiv'st thou not the process of the year,
How the four seasons in four forms appear,
Resembling human life in ev'ry shape they wear?
Spring first, like infancy, shoots out her
head,
With milky juice requiring to be fed: * * *
Proceeding onward whence the year began,
The Summer grows adult, and ripens into man.
Autumn succeeds, a sober, tepid age,
Not froze with fear, nor boiling into
rage;
Last, Winter creeps along with tardy pace,
Sour is his front, and furrowed is his face.
—Dryden.

O, Winter! Put away thy snowy pride; O, Spring! Neglect the cowslip and the bell;
O, Summer! Throw thy pears and plums
aside;
O, Autumn! Bid the grape with poison swell.
—Chatterton.

These, as they change, Almighty Father, these
Are but the varied God. The rolling year
Is full of Thee. Forth in the pleasing
Spring
Thy beauty walks, thy tenderness and love.
Then comes Thy glory in the Summer months,
With light and heat refulgent. Then Thy sun
Shoots full perfection through the swelling year;
* * * * *

Thy bounty shines in Autumn unconfined,
And spreads a common feast for all that live.
In Winter awful Thou! with clouds and storms
Around Thee thrown, tempest o'er tempest
roll'd,
Majestic darkness! on the whirlwind's wing,
Riding sublime.
—Thomson.

Our seasons have no fixed returns,
Without our will they come and go;
At noon our sudden summer burns,
Ere sunset all is snow. —Lowell.

January grey is here,
Like a sexton by her grave;
February bears the bier,
March with grief doth howl and rave,
And April weeps—but, O ye hours!
Follow with May's fairest flowers.
—Shelley.

Autumn to winter, winter into spring,
Spring into summer, summer into fall,— So rolls the changing year, and so we change;
Motion so swift, we know not that we move.
—D. M. Mulock.

When spring unlocks the flowers to paint
the laughing soil;
When summer's balmy showers refresh the
mower's toil;
When winter binds in frosty chains the fallow and the flood,
In God the earth rejoiceth still, and owns his Maker good.
—Heber.

The Summer comes and the Summer goes;
Wild-flowers are fringing the dusty lanes,
The shallows go darting through fragrant rains,
Then, all of a sudden—it snows.
—T. B. Aldrich.

Secrecy

Neither hear nor tell secrets.—Fuller.

Secrecy is the chastity of friendship.—Jeremy Taylor.

Be thine own privy counsellor.—
Beaconsfield.

Deep in my shut and silent heart.—
Byron.

Keep your misfortunes to yourself.—
Hazlitt.

Two may keep counsel putting one away!—Shakespeare.

Fire that is closest kept burns most of all.—Shakespeare.

What thou seest, speak of with caution.—Solon.

If you wish to preserve your secret, wrap it up in frankness.—Alexander
Smith.

The secret known to two is no longer a secret.—Ninon de Lenclos.

Three may keep a secret, if two of them are dead.—Benjamin Franklin.

Let thy discontents be thy secrets.—Benjamin Franklin.

Two may keep counsel when the third's away.—Shakespeare.

Men conceal the past scenes of their lives.—Lucretius.

The desert is mute, and dead men tell no tales.—Laboulaye.

He only is secret who never was trusted.—Congreve.

Conceal thy domestic ills.—Thales.

A secret at home is like rocks under tide.—D. M. Mulock.

There is a secret drawer in every woman's heart.—Victor Hugo.

And whatsoever else shall hap to-night,
Give it an understanding, but no tongue.
—Shakespeare.

What thou intendest to do, speak not of before thou doest it.—Pittachus.

To keep your secret is wisdom; but to expect others to keep it is folly.—Holmes.

'Tis in my memory lock'd,
And you yourself shall keep the key of it.
—Shakespeare.

He who trusts a secret to his servant makes his own man his master.—Dryden.

I vow and protest there's more plague than pleasure with a secret.—Colman.

A secret is seldom safe in more than one breast.—Swift.

We confide our secrets in friendship, but they escape us in love.—Du Cœur.

He deserves small trust who is not privy counsellor to himself.—Forde.

Know not what you know, and see not what you see.—Plautus.

He who gives up the smallest part of a secret has the rest no longer in his power.—Richter.

Where secrecy or mystery begins, vice or roguery is not far off.—Johnson.

Secrecy in suits goes a great way towards success.—Bacon.

No disguise can long conceal love where it really exists, nor feign it where it is not.—Rochefoucauld.

A secret is too little for one, enough for two, and too much for three.—Howell.

Sell your confidence at a high price, if at all; to be strong, keep your own counsel.—Dumas, Père.

In that corroding secrecy which gnaws the heart to show the effect, out not the cause.—Byron.

When a secret is revealed, it is the fault of the man who has intrusted it.—Bruyère.

The truly wise man should have no keeper of his secret but himself.—Guizot.

Who shall be true to us, when we are so unsecret to ourselves?—Shakespeare.

What is mine, even to my life, is hers I love; but the secret of my friend is not mine!—Sir P. Sidney.

It is safer to be silent than to reveal one's secret to any one, and telling him not to mention it.—Saadi.

Secrecy is the element of all goodness; even virtue, even beauty is mysterious.—Carlyle.

When we desire to confine our words, we commonly say they are spoken under the rose.—Browne.

How can we expect another to keep our secret if we cannot keep it ourselves.—La Rochefoucauld.

To whom you betray your secret you sell your liberty.—Franklin.

Secrecy is best taught by commencing with ourselves.—Chamfort.

It is always a poor way of reading the hearts of others to try to conceal our own.—Rousseau.

Secret enmities are more to be feared than open ones.—Cicero.

You are in a pitiable condition when you have to conceal what you wish to tell.—Syrus.

When I am in danger of bursting, I will go and whisper among the reeds.—Swift.

Everybody knows worse of himself than he knows of other men.—Dr. Johnson.

Thou art sworn as deeply to affect what we intend as closely to conceal what we impart.—Shakespeare.

A woman can keep one secret,—the secret of her age.—Voltaire.

Secrets with girls, like guns with boys, are never valued till they make a noise.—Crabbe.

In love we are not only liable to betray ourselves, but also the secrets of others.—J. Petit-Senn.

Thou hast betrayed thy secret as a bird betrays her nest, by striving to conceal it.—Longfellow.

The wise man tells not what he knows. It is not prudent to sport with one's head by revealing the king's secrets.—Saadi.

Be thou assur'd, if words be made of breath,
And breath of life, I have no life to breathe
What thou hast said to me.—Shakespeare.

Under every guilty secret there is hidden a brood of guilty wishes, whose unwholesome infecting life is cherished by the darkness.—George Eliot.

A secret in his mouth,
Is like a wild bird put into a cage;
Whose door no sooner opens, but 'tis out.
—Johnson.

People addicted to secrecy are so without knowing why; they are not so for cause, but for secrecy's sake.—Hazlitt.

None are so fond of secrets as those who do not mean to keep them; such persons covet secrets as a spendthrift covets money, for the purpose of circulation.—Colton.

Women and young men are very apt to tell what secrets they know from the vanity of having been intrusted.—Chesterfield.

Constant you are, but yet a woman; and for secrecy, no lady closer; for I well believe thou wilt not utter what thou dost not know.—Shakespeare.

I have played the fool, the gross fool, to believe the bosom of a friend would hold a secret mine could not contain.—Massinger.

Secrecy is for the happy,—misery, hopeless misery, needs no veil; under a thousand suns it dares act openly.—Schiller.

A secret is like silence: you cannot talk about it, and keep it. It is like money; when once you know there is any concealed, it is half discovered.—Paul Chatfield.

A man can keep another person's secret better than his own; a woman, on the contrary, keeps her secret though she blabs all others.—Bruyère.

There are inscriptions on our hearts which, like that on Dighton rock, are never to be seen except at dead-low tide.—O. W. Holmes.

Then stop if you're wise, nor the secret let fall,
For a secret once told is no secret at all.
—P. J. Searle.

Trust him not with your secrets who, when left alone in your room, turns over your papers.—Lavater.

When two friends part they should lock up one another's secrets, and interchange their keys.—Feltham.

God preserve us! If men knew what is done in secret, no one would be free from the interference of others.—Saadi.

If a fool knows a secret, he tells it because he is a fool; if a knave knows one, he tells it wherever it is his interest to tell it.—Chesterfield.

He was a wise fellow, and had good discretion, that, being bid to ask what he would of the king, desired he might know none of his secrets.—Shakespeare.

But that I am forbid,
To tell the secrets of my prison-house,
I could a tale unfold whose lightest word
Would harrow up thy soul.

—Shakespeare.

Nothing is so oppressive as a secret; women find it difficult to keep one long; and I know a goodly number of men who are women in this regard.—La Fontaine.

Never inquire into another man's secret; but conceal that which is intrusted to you, though pressed both by wine and anger to reveal it.—Horace.

Secrecy is the soul of all great designs. Perhaps more has been effected by concealing our own intentions than by discovering those of our enemy.—Colton.

Never confide your secrets to paper; it is like throwing a stone in the air; and if you know who throws the stone, you do not know where it may fall.—Calderon.

He that discovers himself, till he hath made himself master of his desires, lays himself open to his own ruin, and makes himself prisoner to his own tongue.—Quarles.

Generally he perceived in men of devout simplicity this opinion: that the secrets of nature were the secrets of God,—part of that glory into which man is not to press too boldly.—Bacon.

The yearnings of a woman's solitary spirit, the outgoings of her shrinking sensibility, the cravings of her alienated heart, are indulged only in the quiet loneliness of her solitude.—Bethmont.

Connoisseur says that every secret he tells to one of the fair sex is a sticking-plaster, which attaches him to her, and often begets a second secret.—Richter.

To tell your own secrets is generally folly, but that folly is without guilt; to communicate those with which we are intrusted is always treachery, and treachery for the most part combined with folly.—Dr. Johnson.

I find she loves him because she hides it. Love teaches cunning even to innocence; and when he gets possession, his first work is to dig deep within a heart, and there lie hid, and like a miser in the dark, feast alone.—Dryden.

I will govern my life and my thoughts as if all the world were to see the one and to read the other; for what does it signify to make anything a secret to my neighbor, when to God all our privacies are open?—Seneca.

A resolution that is communicated is no longer within thy power; thy intentions become now the plaything of chance; he who would have his commands certainly carried out must take man by surprise.—Goethe.

We must regard all matter as an intrusted secret which we believe the person concerned would wish to be considered as such. Nay, further still, we must consider all circumstances as secrets intrusted which would bring scandal upon another if told.—Leigh Hunt.

Everyone agrees that a secret should be kept intact, but everyone does not agree as to the nature and importance of secrecy. Too often we consult ourselves as to what we should say, what we should leave unsaid. There are few permanent secrets, and the scruple against revealing them will not last forever.—La Rochefoucauld.

Secrecy of design, when combined with rapidity of execution, like the column that guided Israel in the deserts, becomes the guardian pillar of light and fire to our friends, a cloud of overwhelming and impenetrable darkness to our enemies.—Colton.

You cannot hide any secret. If the artist succor his flagging spirits by opium or wine, his work will characterize itself as the effect of opium or wine. If you make a picture or a statue, it sets the beholder in that state of mind you had when you made it. If you spend for show, on building, or gardening, or on pictures, or on equipages, it will so appear. We are all physiognomists and penetrators of character, and things themselves are detective.—Emerson.

The rules that I shall propose concerning secrecy, and from which I think it not safe to deviate without long and exact deliberation, are, never to solicit the knowledge of a secret,—not willingly, nor without many limitations, to accept such confidence when it is offered; when a secret is once admitted, to consider the trust as of a very high nature, important as society and sacred as truth, and therefore not to be violated for any incidental convenience, or slight appearance of contrary fitness.—Johnson.

Sects

Sects differ more in name than tenets.—Balzac.

Fierce sectarianism breeds fierce latitudinarianism.—De Quincey.

The effective strength of sects is not to be ascertained merely by counting heads.—Macaulay.

But since our sects in prophecy grow higher,
The text inspires not them, but they the text inspire. —Dryden.

His liberal soul with every sect agreed,
Unheard their reasons, he received their creed. —Crabbe.

For forms of faith let graceless zealots fight; his can't be wrong whose life is in the right.—Pope.

Few sects have derived their sentiments purely from sacred oracles, but are the emanations of distinguished leaders.—Robert Hall.

The Japanese, who have but two systems of religion,—namely, that of Buddhism and Shintoism,—have yet many sects under each.—Henry Mason.

All sects are different, because they come from men; morality is everywhere the same, because it comes from God.—Voltaire.

Security

He who stands upon his own strength will never stand.—Thomas Brooks.

How easy it is for men to be swollen with admiration of their own strength and glory, and to be lifted up so high as to lose sight both of the ground whence they rose, and the hand that advanced them.—Bishop Hall.

When life has been well spent; when there is a conscience without reproach; when there is faith in the Saviour; when there is a well-founded hope of heaven, there can be nothing that should disquiet us.—Albert Barnes.

When you have overcome one temptation, you must be ready to enter the lists with another. As distrust, in some sense, is the mother of safety, so security is the gate of danger. A man had need to fear this most of all, that he fears not at all.—Thomas Brooks.

Self (See Self-love, Selfishness, etc.)

Of all mankind each loves himself the best.—Terence.

Born to myself, I like myself alone.—Rochester.

I to myself am dearer than a friend.—Shakespeare.

And though all cry down self, none means His ownself in a literal sense.—Butler.

Do you want to know the man against whom you have most reason to guard yourself? Your looking-glass will give you a very fair likeness of his face.—Whately.

We have this principal desire implanted in us by nature, that our first wish is to preserve ourselves.—Yonge.

Love took up the harp of Life, and smote on all the chords with might;
Smote the chord of Self, that, trembling, pass'd in music out of sight.

—Tennyson.

Explore the dark recesses of the mind,
In the soul's honest volume read mankind,
And own, in wise and simple, great and small,
The same grand leading principle in all,
* * * and by whatever name we call
The ruling tyrant, self is all in all.

—Churchill.

Self-conceit

Self-contemplation is apt to end in self-conceit.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Even dress is apt to inflame a man's opinion of himself.—Henry Home.

In one thing men of all ages are alike; they have believed obstinately in themselves.—Jacobi.

We can bear to be deprived of everything but our self-conceit.—Hazlitt.

The less a man thinks or knows about his virtues the better we like him.—Emerson.

There is a generation that are pure in their own eyes, and yet is not washed from their filthiness.—Bible.

Many men spend their lives in gazing at their own shadows, and so dwindle away into shadows thereof.—Hare.

In the same degree that we overrate ourselves, we shall underrate others; for injustice allowed at home is not likely to be corrected abroad.—Washington Allston.

Prize not thyself by what thou hast, but by what thou art; he that values a jewel by her golden frame, or a book by her silver clasps, or a man by his vast estate, errs; if thou art not worth more than the world can make thee, thy Redeemer had a bad pennyworth, or thou an uncurious Redeemer.—Quarles.

I have sometimes thought that people are, in a sort, happy, that nothing can put out of countenance with themselves, though they neither have nor merit other people's.—William Penn.

He that fancies himself very enlightened because he sees the deficiencies of others may be very ignorant, because he has not studied his own.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Self-conceit is a weighty quality, and will sometimes bring down the scale when there is nothing else in it. It magnifies a fault beyond proportion, and swells every omission into an outrage.—Jeremy Collier.

To be infatuated with the power of one's own intellect is an accident which seldom happens but to those who are remarkable for the want of intellectual power. Whenever Nature leaves a hole in a person's mind, she generally plasters it over with a thick coat of self-conceit.—Longfellow.

And yet we are very apt to be full of ourselves, instead of Him that made what we so much value, and but for whom we can have no reason to value ourselves. For we have nothing that we can call our own, no, not ourselves; for we are all but tenants, and at will too, of the great Lord of ourselves, and the rest of this great farm, the world that we live upon.—William Penn.

Those who, either from their own engagements and hurry of business, or from indolence, or from conceit and vanity, have neglected looking out of themselves, as far as my experience and observation reach, have from that time not only ceased to advance, and improve in their performances, but have gone backward. They may be compared to men who have lived upon their principal, till they are reduced to beggary, and left without resources.—Sir Joshua Reynolds.

Self-confidence

Self-confidence is the first requisite to great undertakings.—Johnson.

Self-confidence is either a petty pride in our own narrowness, or a realization of our duty and privilege as one of God's children.—Phillips Brooks.

Self-confidence is not hope; it is the self-judgment of your own internal forces in their relation to the world without, which results from the failure of many hopes and the non-realization of many fears.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The great characteristic of men of active genius is a sublime self-confidence, springing not from self-conceit, but from an intense identification of the man with his object, which lifts him altogether above the fear of danger and death, which gives to his enterprise a character of insanity to the common eye, and which communicates an almost superhuman audacity to his will.—E. P. Whipple.

Self-control

I will be lord over myself.—Goethe.

Who to himself is law no law doth need.—Chapman.

Self-control is only courage under another form.—Samuel Smiles.

He that ruleth his spirit is better than he that taketh a city.—Bible.

Those who can command themselves command others.—Hazlitt.

Most powerful is he who has himself in his power.—Seneca.

The constancy of sages is nothing but the art of locking up their agitation in their hearts.—Rochefoucauld.

What is the best government? That which teaches us to govern ourselves.—Goethe.

He overcomes a stout enemy that overcomes his own anger.—Chilo.

Real glory springs from the silent conquest of ourselves.—Thomson.

No conflict is so severe as his who labors to subdue himself.—Thomas à Kempis.

Self-reverence, self-knowledge, self-control, These three alone lead life to sovereign power.—Tennyson.

No man is such a conqueror as the man who has defeated himself.—Henry Ward Beecher.

He who reigns within himself, and rules passions, desires, and fears, is more than a king.—Milton.

In the supremacy of self-control consists one of the perfections of the ideal man.—Herbert Spencer.

Resolve to be thyself; and know that he who finds himself, loses his misery.—Matthew Arnold.

No man is free who cannot command himself.—Pythagoras.

He is a fool who cannot be angry; but he is a wise man who will not.—English Proverb.

Chain up the unruly legion of thy breast. Lead thine own captivity captive, and be Cæsar within thyself.—Sir T. Browne.

It is in length of patience and endurance and forbearance that so much of what is good in mankind and womankind is shown.—Arthur Helps.

Better conquest never canst thou make than arm thy constant and thy nobler parts against giddy, loose suggestions.—Shakespeare.

May I govern my passions with absolute sway,
And grow wiser and better as my strength
* * * wears away,
* * * by a gentle decay.
—Dr. Walter Pope.

I think the first virtue is to restrain the tongue; he approaches nearest to the gods who knows how to be silent even though he is in the right.—Cato.

Conquer thyself. Till thou hast done that thou art a slave; for it is almost as well for thee to be in subjection to another's appetite as thy own.—Burton.

When Alexander had subdued the world, and wept that none were left to dispute his arms, his tears were an involuntary tribute to a monarchy that he knew not,—man's empire over himself.—Jane Porter.

The Romans rightly employed the same word (virtus) to designate courage, which is, in a physical sense, what the other is in a moral; the highest virtue of all being victory over ourselves.—Samuel Smiles.

Who, in the midst of just provocation to anger, instantly finds the fit word which settles all around him in silence is more than wise or just; he is, were he a beggar, of more than royal blood, he is of celestial descent.—Lavater.

It is not the man who is beside himself, but he who is cool and collected,—who is master of his countenance, of his voice, of his actions, of his gestures, of every part of his play,—who can work upon others at his pleasure.—Diderot.

Over the time thou hast no power; to redeem a world sunk in dishonesty has not been given thee; solely over one man therein thou hast a quite absolute, uncontrollable power; him redeem, him make honest.—Carlyle.

The man who could withstand, with his fellow-men in single line, a charge of cavalry may lose all command of himself on the occurrence of a fire in his own house, because of some homely reminiscence unknown to the observing bystander.—Helps.

Self-deceit

Who has deceived thee so often as thyself?—Franklin.

Every man is his own greatest dupe.—W. R. Alger.

We cheat ourselves in order to enjoy a calm conscience without possessing virtue.—St. Lambert.

The coward reckons himself cautious, the miser frugal.—Henry Home.

We deceive and flatter no one by such delicate artifices as we do ourselves.—Schopenhauer.

To be deceived by our enemies or betrayed by our friends is insupportable; yet by ourselves are we often content to be so treated.—Rochefoucauld.

What man, in his right mind, would conspire his own hurt? Men are beside themselves, when they transgress against their convictions.—William Penn.

The greatest of fools is he who imposes on himself, and in his greatest concern thinks certainly he knows that which he has least studied, and of which he is most profoundly ignorant.—Shaftesbury.

Nothing is so easy as to deceive one's self; for what we wish, that we readily believe; but such expectations are often inconsistent with the real state of things.—Demosthenes.

From the beginning of the world to this day there was never any great villainy acted by men, but it was in the strength of some great fallacy put upon their minds by a false representation of evil for good or good for evil.—South.

Many a man has a kind of a kaleidoscope, where the bits of broken glass are his own merits and fortunes; and they fall into harmonious arrangements, and delight him, often most mischievously and to his ultimate detriment; but they are a present pleasure.—Helps.

Self-defence

Self-defence is a virtue,
Sole bulwark of all right. —Byron.

To kill, I grant, is sin's extremest gust;
But, in defence, by mercy, 'tis most just.
—Shakespeare.

The smallest worm will turn, being trodden on;
And doves will peck in safeguard of their brood.
—Shakespeare.

Self-denial

There is nothing fruitful except sacrifice.—Lacordaire.

Self-denial is a monkish virtue.—Hume.

Whoso lives for humanity must be content to lose himself.—O. B. Frothingham.

Self-denial is the best riches.—Seneca.

The more a man denies himself the more he shall obtain from God.—Horace.

The first lesson in Christ's school is self-denial.—Matthew Henry.

Great is self-denial! * * * Life goes all to ravel and tatters where that enters not.—Carlyle.

Self-denial is often the sacrifice of one sort of self-love for another.—Colton.

Self-denial is the quality of which Jesus Christ set us the example.—Ary Scheffer.

Pure self-denial is our good angel's hand barring the gates of sin.—Abbé Mollois.

How happy one would be if one could throw off one's self as one throws off others!—Mme. du Deffand.

In common things the law of sacrifice takes the form of positive duty.—Froude.

The worst education which teaches self-denial is better than the best which teaches everything else, and not that.—John Sterling.

Self-denial is a virtue of the highest quality, and he who has it not, and does not strive to acquire it, will never excel in anything.—Conybeare.

Self-denial is indispensable to a strong character, and the loftiest kind thereof comes only of a religious stock,—from consciousness of obligation and dependence upon God.—Theodore Parker.

Brave conquerors! for so you are,
That war against your own affections,
And the huge army of the world's desires.
—Shakespeare.

Only the soul that with an overwhelming impulse and a perfect trust gives itself up forever to the life of other men, finds the delight and peace which such complete self-surrender has to give.—Phillips Brooks.

There never did and never will exist anything permanently noble and excellent in a character which was a stranger to the exercise of resolute self-denial.—Walter Scott.

It is certainly much easier wholly to decline a passion than to keep it within just bounds and measures; and that which few can moderate almost anybody may prevent.—Charron.

Self-denial does not belong to religion as characteristic of it; it belongs to human life; the lower nature must always be denied when you are trying to rise to a higher sphere.—Beecher.

The lives of men who have been always growing are strewn along their whole course with the things they have learned to do without.—Phillips Brooks.

Alas! this time is never the time for self-denial, it is always the next time. Abstinence is so much more pleasant to contemplate upon the other side of indulgence.—George MacDonald.

The only conclusive evidence of a man's sincerity is that he gives himself for a principle. Words, money, all things else, are comparatively easy to give away; but when a man makes a gift of his daily life and practice, it is plain that the truth, whatever it may be, has taken possession of him.—Lowell.

Self-esteem

A great man is an abstraction of some one excellence; but whoever fancies himself an abstraction of excellence, so far from being great, may be sure that he is a blockhead, equally ignorant of excellence or defect of himself or others.—Hazlitt.

A self-made man? Yes; and worships his creator.—Henry Clapp.

He who, to be happy, needs nothing but himself, is happy.—Auerbach.

Other people are least satisfied with those women who are best satisfied with themselves.—Mme. de Salm.

He who does not think too much of himself is much more esteemed than he imagines.—Goethe.

Blinded as they are as to their true character by self-love, every man is his own first and chiefest flatterer.—Plutarch.

We are so little and vain that the esteem of five or six persons about us is enough to content and amuse us.—Pascal.

All men who know not where to look for truth, save in the narrow well of self, will find their own image at the bottom, and mistake it for what they are seeking.—Lowell.

I look upon the too good opinion that man has of himself to be the nursing-mother of all the false opinions, both public and private.—Montaigne.

We censure others but as they disagree from that humor which we fancy laudable in ourselves, and commend others but for that wherein they seem to quadrate and consent with us.—Sir T. Browne.

Let a man's talents and virtues be what they may, we only feel satisfaction in his society as he is satisfied in himself. We cannot enjoy the good qualities of a friend if he seems to be none the better for them.—Hazlitt.

Could all mankind lay claim to that estimate which they pass upon themselves, there would be little or no difference betwixt lapsed and perfect humanity; and God might again review His image with paternal complacency, and still pronounce it good.—Bishop Norris.

I do profess to be no less than I seem; to serve him truly that will put me in trust; to love him that is honest, to converse with him that is wise, and says little; to fear judgment; to fight, when I cannot choose; and to eat no fish.—Shakespeare.

Every man, in judging of himself, is his own contemporary. He may feel the gale of popularity, but he cannot tell how long it will last. His opinion of himself wants distance, wants time, wants numbers, to set it off and confirm it.—Hazlitt.

Self-examination

He who knows himself knows others.—Colton.

Know thyself; this is the great object.—Seneca.

Oh, the difficulty of fixing the attention of men on the world within them! —Coleridge.

It is easy to look down on others; to look down on ourselves is the difficulty.—Landor.

What the superior man seeks is in himself; what the small man seeks is in others.—Confucius.

There are two persons in the world we never see as they are,—one's self and one's other self.—Arsène Houssaye.

I study myself more than any other subject; it is my metaphysic, it is my physic.—Montaigne.

I will chide no breather in the world but myself, against whom I know most faults.—Shakespeare.

We neither know nor judge ourselves; others may judge, but cannot know us; God alone judges, and knows too.—Wilkie Collins.

Though not always called upon to condemn ourselves, it is always safe to suspect ourselves.—Whately.

Observe thyself as thy greatest enemy would do; so shalt thou be thy greatest friend.—Jeremy Taylor.

A man has generally the good or ill qualities which he attributes to mankind.—Shenstone.

Go to your bosom;
Knock there, and ask your heart what it doth know. —Shakespeare.

One self-approving hour whole years outweighs
Of stupid starers and of loud huzzas. —Pope.

There is a luxury in self-dispraise;
And inward self-disparagement affords
To meditative spleen a grateful feast. —Wordsworth.

Whatever you dislike in another person, take care to correct in yourself by the gentle reproof.—Sprat.

O that you could turn your eyes towards the napes of your necks, and make but an interior survey of your good selves!—Shakespeare.

How shall we learn to know ourselves? By reflection? Never; but only through action. Strive to do thy duty; then shalt thou know what is in thee.—Goethe.

Speak no more:
Thou turn'st mine eyes into my very soul;
And there I see such black and grained spots
As will not leave their tinct.—Shakespeare.

It is greatly wise to talk with our past hours, and ask them what report they bore to heaven, and how they might have borne more welcome news.—Young.

When you descant on the faults of others, consider whether you be not guilty of the same. To gain knowledge of ourselves, the best way is to convert the imperfections of others into a mirror for discovering our own.—Henry Home.

Inspect the neighborhood of thy life; every shelf, every nook of thy abode; and, nestling in, quarter thyself in the farthest and most domestic winding of thy snail-house!—Richter.

If any speak ill of thee, fly home to thy own conscience and examine thy heart. If thou art guilty, it is a just correction; if not guilty, it is a fair instruction.—George Herbert.

Never lose sight of this important truth, that no one can be truly great until he has gained a knowledge of himself, a knowledge which can only be acquired by occasional retirement.—Zimmermann.

It belongs to every large nature, when it is not under the immediate power of some strong unquestioning emotion, to suspect itself, and doubt the truth of its own impressions, conscious of possibilities beyond its own horizon.—George Eliot.

We should every night call ourselves to an account: What infirmity have I mastered to-day? what passion opposed? what temptation resisted? what virtue acquired? Our vices will abate of themselves if they be brought every day to the shrift.—Seneca.

Of all literary exertitions, whether designed for the use or entertainment of the world, there are none of so much importance, or so immediately our concern, as those which let us into the knowledge of our own nature. Others may exercise the understanding or amuse the imagination; but these only can improve the heart and form the human mind to wisdom.—Bishop Warburton.

Let not sleep fall upon thy eyes till thou hast thrice reviewed the transactions of the past day. Where have I turned aside from rectitude? What have I been doing? What have I left undone, which I ought to have done? Begin thus from the first act, and proceed; and, in conclusion, at the ill which thou hast done, be troubled, and rejoice for the good.—Pythagoras.

If thou seest anything in thyself which may make thee proud, look a little further and thou shalt find enough to humble thee; if thou be wise, view the peacock's feathers with his feet, and weigh thy best parts with thy imperfections.—Quarles.

In order to judge of the inside of others, study your own; for men in general are very much alike, and though one has one prevailing passion, and another has another, yet their operations are much the same; and whatever engages or disgusts, pleases, or offends you in others, will, mutatis mutandis, engage, disgust, please, or offend others in you.—Chesterfield.

Never let us be discouraged with ourselves. It is not when we are conscious of our faults that we are the most wicked; on the contrary, we are less so. We see by a brighter light; and let us remember for our consolation, that we never perceive our sins till we begin to cure them.—Fénelon.

Summe up at night what thou hast done by day;
And in the morning what thou hast to do.
Dresse and undresse thy soul; mark the decay
And growth of it: if, with thy watch, that too
Be down, then winde up both; since we shall be Most surely judg'd, make thy accounts agree.—Herbert.

Self-help

God helps them that help themselves.
—Benjamin Franklin.

No grace can save any man unless he helps himself.—Henry Ward Beecher.

God gives every bird its food, but does not throw it into the nest.—J. G. Holland.

The faculty of self-help is that which distinguished man from animals; that it is the Godlike element, or holds within itself the Godlike element, of his constitution.—J. G. Holland.

Help thyself, and God will help thee.
—George Herbert.

Self-interest

As far as the stars are from the earth, and as different as fire is from water, so much do self-interest and integrity differ.—Lucan.

Self-interest is the most ingenious and persuasive of all the agents that deceive our consciences, while by means of it our unhappy and stubborn prejudices operate in their greatest force.—Bryant.

For the world is only governed by self-interest.—Schiller.

The virtues are lost in self-interest, as rivers in the sea.—Rochefoucauld.

Selfishness

That household god, a man's own self.—Flavel.

The force of selfishness is inevitable.—Hillard.

Be not in the desire of thine own ease.—Saadi.

No man is more cheated than the selfish man.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Offended self-love never forgives.—Vizée.

Selfishness at the expense of others' happiness is demonism.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Selfishness, if but reasonably tempered with wisdom, is not such an evil trait.—Ruffini.

Where all are selfish, the sage is no better than the fool, and only rather more dangerous.—Froude.

Selfishness is that detestable vice which no one will forgive in others, and no one is without in himself.—Henry Ward Beecher.

It is difficult to persuade mankind that the love of virtue is the love of themselves.—Cicero.

If a man fancies that he loves his mistress for her own sake, he is very much mistaken.—Rochefoucauld.

Selfishness, when it is punished by the world, is mostly punished because it is connected with egotism.—Sir Arthur Helps.

No indulgence of passion destroys the spiritual nature so much as respectable selfishness.—George MacDonald.

Selfishness in art, as in other things, is sensibility kept at home.—Washington Allston.

The same people who can deny others everything are famous for refusing themselves nothing.—Leigh Hunt.

Selfishness is the making a man's self his own centre, the beginning and end of all he doeth.—John Owen.

To be selfish is to sacrifice the nobler for the meaner ends, and to be sordidly content.—Hugh R. Haweis.

Less, less of self each day,
And more, my God, of Thee!
—Horatius Bonar.

And though all cry down self, none means His own self in a literal sense.—Butler.

All the good maxims which are in the world fail when applied to one's self.—Pascal.

"I am always nearest to myself," says the Latin proverb.—Macaulay.

Beware of no man more than of yourself; we carry our worst enemies within us.—C. H. Spurgeon.

It is self-love and its offspring self-deception, which shut the gates of heaven, and lead men, as if in a delicious dream, to hell.—Christian Scriver.

How pleased is every paltry elf
To prate about that thing, himself!
—Churchill.

Each one wishes for his own advantage, rather than that of others.—Terence.

Hence we cannot see our own faults; when others transgress we become censurs.—Phædrus.

To be saved is only this,—salvation from our own selfishness.—Whittier.

It is to be doubted whether he will ever find the way to heaven who desires to go thither alone.—Feltham.

We can neither change nor overpower God's eternal suffrage against selfishness and meanness.—James Martineau.

I learned that no man in God's wide earth is either willing or able to help any other man.—Pestalozzi.

It is astonishing how well men wear when they think of no one but themselves.—Bulwer-Lytton.

In the North the first words are, Help me; in the South, Love me.—Rousseau.

What can one possibly introduce into a mind that is already full, and full of itself?—Joubert.

O my God, how true it is that we may have of Thy gifts and yet may be full of ourselves!—Mme. Guyon.

The fondness we have for self furnishes another long rank of prejudices.—Dr. Watts.

Lo! now, what hearts have men! they never mount as high as woman in her selfless mood.—Tennyson.

We erect the idol self, and not only wish others to worship, but worship ourselves.—Cecil.

Be, as many now are, luxurious to yourself, parsimonious to your friends.—Juvenal.

Everyone for his home, everyone for himself.—M. Dupin.

It never enters the lady's head that the wet-nurse's baby probably dies.—Harriet Martineau.

Where all are selfish, the sage is no better than the fool, and only rather more dangerous.—Froude.

The force of selfishness is as inevitable and as calculable as the force of gravitation.—Hillard.

We wish to constitute all the happiness, or, if that cannot be, the misery of the one we love.—Bruyère.

It is very natural for a young friend and a young lover to think the persons they love have nothing to do but to please them.—Pope.

Selfishness, not love, is the actuating motive of the gallant.—Mme. Roland.

The selfish man suffers more from his selfishness than he from whom that selfishness withholds some important benefit.—Emerson.

The fawning courtier and the surly squire often mean the same thing,—each his own interest.—Bishop Berkeley.

It is not truth, justice, liberty, which men seek; they seek only themselves. And O that they knew how to seek themselves aright!—Jacobi.

If we look only to self even in spiritual things, it is still selfishness, though possibly on a somewhat higher plane than before.—A. P. Van Giesen.

Thorough selfishness destroys or paralyzes enjoyment. A heart made selfish by the contest for wealth is like a citadel stormed in war, utterly shattered.—Henry Ward Beecher.

If you seek in the spirit of selfishness, to grasp all as your own, you shall lose all, and be driven out of the world, at last, naked and forlorn, to everlasting poverty and contempt.—Jonathan Edwards.

Our selfishness is so robust and many-clutching that, well encouraged, it easily devours all sustenance away from our poor little scruples.—George Eliot.

A vice utterly at variance with the happiness of him who harbors it, and, as such, condemned by self-love.—Mackintosh.

Take the selfishness out of this world and there would be more happiness than we should know what to do with.—H. W. Shaw.

We can neither change nor overpower God's eternal suffrage against selfishness and meanness.—James Martineau.

Behold the fine appointment he makes with me; that man never did love anyone but himself.—Mme. de Maintenon.

No man is much pleased with a companion who does not increase, in some respect, his fondness for himself.—Dr. Johnson.

The selfish heart deserves the pain it feels; More generous sorrow, while it sinks, exalts,
And conscious virtue mitigates the pang.
—Young.

The very heart and root of sin is in an independent spirit. We erect the idol self; and not only wish others to worship, but worship ourselves.—Richard Cecil.

There are some people who think that all the world should share their misfortune, although they do not share in the sufferings of anybody else.—Achilles Poincelot.

There is an ill-breeding to which, whatever our rank and nature, we are almost equally sensitive,—the ill-breeding that comes from want of consideration for others.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Self-interest, that leprosy of the age, attacks us from infancy, and we are startled to observe little heads calculate before knowing how to reflect.—Mme. de Girardin.

Milton has carefully marked in his Satan the intense selfishness, the alcohol of egotism, which would rather reign in hell than serve in heaven.—Coleridge.

The essence of true nobility is neglect of self. Let the thought of self pass in, and the beauty of a great action is gone, like the bloom from a soiled flower.—Froude.

Sordid selfishness doth contract and narrow our benevolence, and cause us, like serpents, to infold ourselves within ourselves, and to turn out our stings to all the world besides.—Walter Scott.

A long experience impresses me with the belief that selfishness does not grow in intensity as we move downward in society from class to class.—Gladstone.

Enough of self, that darling luscious theme,
O'er which philosophers in raptures dream;
Of which with seeming disregard they write Then prizing most when most they seem to slight. —Churchill.

How often, in this cold and bitter world, is the warm heart thrown back upon itself! Cold, careless, are we of another's grief; we wrap ourselves in sullen selfishness.—L. E. Landon.

As frost to the bud, and blight to the blossom, even such is self-interest to friendship; for confidence cannot dwell where selfishness is porter at the gate.—Tupper.

How much that the world calls selfishness is only generosity with narrow walls,—a too exclusive solicitude to maintain a wife in luxury, or make one's children rich.—T. W. Higginson.

Our infinite obligations to God do not fill our hearts half as much as a petty uneasiness of our own; nor His infinite perfections as much as our smallest wants.—Hannah More.

Glory, built
On selfish principles, is shame and guilt;
The deeds that men admire as half divine,
Stark naught, because corrupt in their design. —Cowper.

The selfish man cuts away the sand from under his own feet, he digs his own grave; and every time, from the beginning of the world until now, God Almighty pushes him into the grave and covers him up.—C. H. Fowler.

We are too much haunted by ourselves; we project the central shadow of ourselves on everything around us. And then comes in the gospel to rescue us from this selfishness. Redemption is this—to forget self in God.—F. W. Robertson.

Formerly thy soul was great, ardent, vast; the entire circle of the universe found place in thy heart. O Charles, that thou hast become small, that thou hast become miserable, since thou lovest no one but thyself!—Schiller.

There are too many who reverse both the principles and the practice of the Apostles; they become all things to all men, not to serve others, but themselves; and they try all things only to hold fast that which is bad.—Colton.

There are some tempers—how shall I describe them—formed either of such impenetrable matter, or wrought up by habitual selfishness to such an utter insensibility of what becomes of the fortunes of their fellow-creatures, as if they were not partakers of the same nature, or had no lot or connection at all with the species.—Sterne.

Aristotle has said that man is by nature a social animal, and he might have added, a selfish one too. Heroism, self-denial, and magnanimity in all instances, where they do not spring from a principle of religion, are but splendid altars on which we sacrifice one kind of self-love to another.—Colton.

Despite those titles, power, and pelf,
The wretch, concentrated all in self,
Living, shall forfeit fair renown,
And, doubly dying, shall go down
To the vile dust from whence he sprung,
Unwept, unhonour'd and unsung.—Scott.

Explore the dark recesses of the mind,
In the soul's honest volume read mankind,
And own, in wise and simple, great and small,
The same grand leading principle in all;

For parent and for child, for wife and friend,
Our first great mover, and our last great end
Is one; and by whatever name we call
The ruling tyrant, Self, is all in all. —Churchill.

Self-knowledge

Man, know thyself! all wisdom centres there.—Young.

Go to your bosom, knock there, and ask your heart what it doth know.—Shakespeare.

Marry, sir, they praise me, and make an ass of me; now my foes tell me plainly I am an ass; so that by my foes, sir, I profit in the knowledge of myself.—Shakespeare.

The only thing a man knows is himself.—Alexander Smith.

To know thyself—in others self-concern;
Would'st thou know others? read thyself—
and learn! —Schiller.

The most difficult thing in life is to know yourself.—Thales.

That man must daily wiser grow,
Whose search is bent himself to know.
—Gay.

Man's science is the culture of his heart;
And not to lose his plummet in the depths
Of nature, or the more profound of God.
—Young.

He that knows himself, knows others;
and he that is ignorant of himself could not write a very profound lecture on other men's heads.—Colton.

You are surprised at your imperfections,—why? I should infer from that, that your self-knowledge is small. Surely you might rather be astonished that you do not fall into more frequent and more grievous faults, and thank God for His upholding grace.—Jean Nicolas Grou.

Self-love

Love thyself last.—Shakespeare.

Reservation is self-love.—Bettina.

Offended self-love never forgives.—Vigée.

True self-love and social are the same.—Pope.

Self-love is the greatest of flatterers.—Rochefoucauld.

In all time self-love has blinded the wisest.—Villefré.

A prudent consideration for Number One.—Bulwer-Lytton.

I to myself am dearer than a friend.—Shakespeare.

Would you hurt a man keenest, strike at his self-love.—Lew Wallace.

The world is governed by love,—self-love.—Rivarol.

Self-love was born before love.—De Finod.

Self-love is a busy prompter.—Johnson.

Self-love and reason to one end aspire.—Pope.

Love yourself; and in that love not unconsidered leave your honor.—Shakespeare.

Self-love is the most inhibited sin in the canon.—Shakespeare.

Self-love, as it happens to be well or ill conducted, constitutes virtue and vice.—Rochefoucauld.

Self-love leads men of narrow minds to measure all mankind by their own capacity.—Jane Porter.

Self-love exaggerates our faults as well as our virtues.—Goethe.

There are wounds of self-love which one does not confess to one's dearest friends.—J. Petit-Senn.

Our self-love can be resigned to the sacrifice of everything but itself.—La Harpe.

Our self-love is ever ready to revolt from our better judgment, and join the enemy within.—Steele.

Self-love makes as many tyrants, perhaps, as love.—Imbert.

O impudent! regardful of thy own, whose thoughts are centred on thyself alone!—Dryden.

Self is the great antichrist and anti-God in the world, that sets up itself above all else.—Charnock.

The most amiable people are those who least wound the self-love of others.—Bruyère.

Almost every one flatters himself that he and his are exceptionable.—Alphonse Karr.

Self-love is not so vile a sin as self-neglecting.—Shakespeare.

Men indulge those opinions and practices that favor their pretensions.—L'Estrange.

Of all mankind, each loves himself the best.—Terence.

Self-love is more cunning than the most cunning man in the world.—La Rochefoucauld.

Cut out the love of self, like an autumn lotus with thy hand!—Buddha.

All other love is extinguished by self-love; beneficence, humanity, justice, philosophy, sink under it.—Epicurus.

Whatever discoveries we may have made in the regions of self-love, there still remain many unknown lands.—Rochefoucauld.

It is the nature of extreme self-lovers as they will set an house on fire and it were but to roast their eggs.—Bacon.

Blind self-love, vanity, lifting aloft her empty head, and indiscretion, prodigal of secrets more transparent than glass, follow close behind.—Horace.

A man who loves only himself and his pleasures is vain, presumptuous, and wicked even from principle.—Vauvenargues.

Plato said that of all things in the world we should beware of that folly by which most men please themselves and despise a better judgment.—Jeremy Taylor.

Esteeming others merely for their agreement with us in religion, opinion, and manner of living is only a less offensive kind of self-adoration.—Rev. T. Adam.

It is falling in love with our own mistaken ideas that makes fools and beggars of half mankind.—Young.

Nothing is so capable of diminishing self-love as the observation that we disapprove at one time what we approve at another.—Rochefoucauld.

Man's that savage beast whose mind, from reason to self-love declined, delights to prey upon his kind.—Sir J. Denham.

Self-love is an instrument useful but dangerous; it often wounds the hand which makes use of it, and seldom does good without doing harm.—Rousseau.

Every man is prompted by the love of himself to imagine that he possesses some qualities superior, either in kind or degree, to those which he sees allotted to the rest of the world.—Dr. Johnson.

A gentleman is one who understands and shows every mark of deference to the claims of self-love in others, and exacts it in return from them.—Hazlitt.

That man alone loves himself rightly who procures the greatest possible good to himself through the whole of his existence, and so pursues pleasure as not to give for it more than it is worth.—Benjamin Franklin.

Self-love is the instrument of our preservation; it resembles the provision for the perpetuity of mankind. It is necessary, it is dear to us, it gives us pleasure, and we must conceal it.—Voltaire.

O villainous! I have looked upon the world for four times seven years; and since I could distinguish betwixt a benefit and an injury, I never found man that knew how to love himself.—Shakespeare.

Self-love is a principle of action; but among no class of human beings has nature so profusely distributed this principle of life and action as through the whole sensitive family of genius.—Isaac Disraeli.

Such is the infatuation of self-love, that, though in the general doctrine of the vanity world all men agree, yet almost everyone flatters himself that his own case is to be an exception from the common rule. Blair.

The secret of our self-love is just the same as that of our liberality and candor. We prefer ourselves to others only because we have a more intimate consciousness and confirmed opinion of our own claims and merits than of any other person's.—Hazlitt.

That the principle of self-love (or, in other words, the desire of happiness) is neither an object of approbation nor of blame, is sufficiently obvious. It is inseparable from the nature of man as a rational and a sensitive being.—Dugald Stewart.

Every man, like Narcissus, becomes enamored of the reflection of himself, only choosing a substance instead of a shadow. His love for any particular woman is self-love at second-hand, vanity reflected, compound egotism.—Horace Smith.

Self-love, in a well-regulated breast, is as the steward of the household, superintending the expenditure, and seeing that benevolence herself should be prudential, in order to be permanent, by providing that the reservoir which feeds should also be fed.—Colton.

Those who have affirmed self-love to be the basis of all our sentiments and all our actions are much in the right. There is no occasion to demonstrate that men have a face; as little need is there of proving to them that they are actuated by self-love.—Voltaire.

Self-love is, in almost all men, such an over-weight that they are incredulous of a man's habitual preference of the general good to his own; but when they see it proved by sacrifices of ease, wealth, rank, and of life itself, there is no limit to their admiration.—Emerson.

Oh, the incomparable contrivance of Nature, who has ordered all things in so even a method that wherever she has been less bountiful in her gifts, there she makes it up with a larger dose of self-love, which supplies the former deficits and makes all even.—Erasmus.

It is allowed that the cause of most actions, good or bad, may be resolved into the love of ourselves; but the self-love of some men inclines them to please others, and the self-love of others is wholly employed in pleasing themselves. This makes the great distinction between virtue and vice.—Swift.

The most notorious swindler has not assumed so many names as self-love, nor is so much ashamed of his own. She calls herself patriotism, when at the same time she is rejoicing at just as much calamity to her native country as will introduce herself into power, and expel her rivals.—Colton.

It is this unquiet self-love that renders us so sensitive. The sick man, who sleeps ill, thinks the night long. We exaggerate, from cowardice, all the evils which we encounter; they are great, but our sensibility increases them. The true way to bear them is to yield ourselves up with confidence to God.—Fénelon.

If we listen to our self-love, we shall estimate our lot less by what it is than by what it is not; shall dwell upon its hindrances and be blind to its possibilities; and, comparing it only with imaginary lives, shall indulge in flattering dreams of what we should do if we had but power, and give if we had but wealth, and be if we had no temptations.—James Martineau.

Self-love, the spring of motion, acts the soul;
Reason's comparing balance rules the whole.
Man, but for that, no action could attend,
And, but for this, were active to no end:
Fix'd like a plant on his peculiar spot,
To draw nutrition, propagate, and rot;
Or, meteor-like, flame lawless thro' the void,
Destroying others, by himself destroy'd.
—Pope.

The cause of all the blunders committed by man arises from this excessive self-love. For the lover is blinded by the object loved; so that he passes a wrong judgment on what is just, good and beautiful, thinking that he ought always to honor what belongs to himself in preference to truth. For he who intends to be a great man ought to love neither himself nor his own things, but only what is just, whether it happens to be done by himself, or by another.—Plato.

Self-praise

A man's praises have very musical and charming accents in another's mouth, but very flat and untunable in his own.—Xenophon.

Self-preservation

No evangelical precept jostles out that of a lawful self-preservation.—South.

Self-reliance

The basis of good manners is self-reliance.—Emerson.

Time and I against any two.—Philip the Second.

For they can conquer who believe they can.—Virgil.

Doubt whom you will, but never yourself.—Bovee.

Do thine own work, and know thyself.—Plato.

Think wrongly, if you please, but in all cases think for yourself.—Lessing.

Our remedies oft in ourselves do lie, which we ascribe to Heaven.—Shakespeare.

No man should part with his own individuality and become that of another.—Channing.

If you would have a faithful servant, and one that you like, serve yourself.—Franklin.

Let every eye negotiate for itself, and trust no agent.—Shakespeare.

It is seldom that we find out how great are our resources until we are thrown upon them.—Bovee.

Welcome evermore to gods and men is the self-helping man.—Emerson.

If women only knew the extent of their power!—Alphonse Karr.

Trust not overmuch to the blessed Magdalen; learn to protect yourself.—Beaconsfield.

A person under the firm persuasion that he can command resources virtually has them.—Livy.

The weakest spot in every man is where he thinks himself to be the wisest.—Nathaniel Emmons.

The supreme fall of falls is this,—the first doubt of one's self.—Mme. de Gasparin.

If there be a faith that can remove mountains, it is faith in one's own power.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

He is best served who has no occasion to put the hand of others at the end of his arms.—Cervantes.

I have ever held it as a maxim never to do that through another which it was possible for me to execute myself.—Montesquieu.

Our own opinion of ourselves should be lower than that formed by others, for we have a better chance at our imperfections.—Thomas à Kempis.

Though we best know and cannot deny our imperfections, it is not for us to lose our self-reliance and true manhood.—Chamfort.

Help from without is often enfeebling in its effects, but help from within invariably invigorates.—Samuel Smiles.

Look well into thyself; there is a source which will always spring up if thou wilt always search there.—Marcus Antoninus.

Opposition is what we want and must have, to be good for anything. Hardship is the native soil of manhood and self-reliance.—John Neal.

Great is the strength of an individual soul true to its high trust; mighty is it, even to the redemption of a world.—Mrs. L. M. Child.

In life, as in whist, hope nothing from the way cards may be dealt to you. Play the cards, whatever they be, to the best of your skill.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Thoroughly to believe in one's own self, so one's self were thorough, were to do great things.—Tennyson.

As it is in himself alone that man can find true and enduring happiness, so in himself alone can he find true and efficient consolation in misfortune.—Babo.

Forget not that the man who cannot enjoy his own natural gifts in silence, and find his reward in the exercise of them, will generally find himself badly off.—Goethe.

He who thinks he can find within himself the means of doing without others is much mistaken; but he who thinks that others cannot do without him is still more mistaken.—Roche-foucauld.

We must calculate not on the weather, nor on fortune, but upon God and ourselves. He may fail us in the gratification of our wishes, but never in the encounter with our exigencies.—Simms.

Watch over yourself. Be your own accuser, then your judge; ask yourself grace sometimes, and, if there is need, impose upon yourself some pain.—Seneca.

Humility is the part of wisdom, and is most becoming in men. But let no one discourage self-reliance; it is, of all the rest, the greatest quality of true manliness.—Kossuth.

It is for little souls, that truckle under the weight of affairs, not to know how clearly to disengage themselves, and not to know how to lay them aside and take them up again.—Montaigne.

Providence has done, and I am persuaded is disposed to do, a great deal for us; but we are not to forget the fable of Jupiter and the countryman.—Washington.

It's right to trust in God; but, if you don't stand to your halliards your craft'll miss stays, and your faith'll be blown out of the bolt-ropes in the turn of a marlinspike.—George MacDonald.

It is impossible you should take true root but by the fair weather that you make yourself; it is needful that you frame the season for your own harvest.—Shakespeare.

Self-distrust is the cause of most of our failures. In the assurance of strength there is strength, and they are the weakest, however strong, who have no faith in themselves or their powers.—Bovee.

Men on all occasions throw themselves upon foreign assistances to spare their own, which are the only certain and sufficient ones with which they can arm themselves.—Montaigne.

It is at the approach of extreme danger when a hollow puppet can accomplish nothing, that power falls into the mighty hands of nature, of the spirit giant-born, who listens only to himself, and knows nothing of compacts.—Schiller.

Confidence in one's self is the chief nurse of magnanimity, which confidence, notwithstanding, doth not leave the care of necessary furniture for it; and therefore, of all the Grecians, Homer doth ever make Achilles the best armed.—Sir P. Sidney.

The human mind, in proportion as it is deprived of external resources, sedulously labors to find within itself the means of happiness, learns to rely with confidence on its own exertions, and gains with greater certainty the power of being happy.—Zimmermann.

Nine times out of ten, the best thing that can happen to a young man is to be tossed overboard and compelled to sink or swim for himself. In all my acquaintance I never knew a man to be drowned who was worth the saving.—James A. Garfield.

Both poetry and philosophy are prodigal of eulogy over the mind which ransoms itself by its own energy from a captivity to custom, which breaks the common bounds of empire, and cuts a Simplicon over mountains of difficulty for its own purposes, whether of good or of evil.—Horace Mann.

Whatever your sex or position, life is a battle in which you are to show your pluck; and woe be to the coward! Whether passed on a bed of sickness or a tented field, it is ever the same fair play, and admits no foolish distinctions. Despair and postponement are cowardice and defeat. Men were born to succeed, not to fail.—Thoreau.

For the man who makes everything that leads to happiness, or near to it, to depend upon himself, and not upon other men, on whose good or evil actions his own doings are compelled to hinge,—such a one, I say, has adopted the very best plan for living happily. This is the man of moderation; this is the man of manly character and of wisdom.—Plato.

Philosophers have very justly remarked that the only solid instruction is that which the pupil brings from his own depths; that the true instruction is not that which transmits notions wholly formed, but that which renders him capable of forming for himself good opinions. That which they have said in regard to the intellectual faculties applies equally to the moral faculties. There is for the soul a spontaneous culture, on which depends all the real progress in perfection.—Degerando.

Men seem neither to understand their riches nor their strength; of the former they believe greater things than they should; of the latter much less. Self-reliance and self-denial will teach a man to drink out of his own cistern, and eat his own sweet bread, and to learn and labor truly to get his living, and carefully to expend the good things committed to his trust.—Lord Bacon.

Self-respect

The truest self-respect is not to think of self.—Beecher.

Above all things, reverence yourself.—Pythagoras.

Self-respect,—the corner-stone of all virtue.—Sir John Herschel.

A man who is not ashamed of himself need not be ashamed of his early condition.—Daniel Webster.

Who will adhere to him that abandons himself?—Sir P. Sidney.

Let us respect gray Lairs, but, above all, our own.—J. Petit-Senn.

Content to do the best work he could, to preserve his own dignity, and leave the rest to future.—Hamerton.

Self-respect is, next to religion, the chiefest bridle of all vices.—Bacon.

All must respect those who respect themselves.—Beaconsfield.

Every man stamps his value on himself; the price we challenge for ourselves is given us.—Schiller.

Let a man use great reverence and manners to himself.—Pythagoras.

Self-respect governs morality: respect for others governs our behavior.—Ségur.

I care not so much what I am in the opinion of others as what I am in my own; I would be rich of myself and not by borrowing.—Montaigne.

To have a respect for ourselves guides our morals; and to have a deference for others governs our manners.—Sterne.

No more important duty can be urged upon those who are entering the great theater of life than simple loyalty to their best convictions.—Chapin

Be noble-minded? Our own heart, and not other men's opinions of us, forms our true honor.—Schiller.

When thou hast profited so much that thou respectest even thyself, thou mayst let go thy tutor.—Seneca.

A man can do without his own approbation in much society, but he must make great exertions to gain it when he lives alone.—Sydney Smith.

I will have a care of being a slave to myself, for it is a perpetual, a shameful, and the heaviest of all servitudes; and this may be done by moderate desires.—Seneca.

It has been said that self-respect is the gate of heaven, and the most cursory observation shows that a degree of reserve adds vastly to the latent force of character.—Tuckerman.

The pious and just honoring of ourselves may be thought the radical moisture and fountain-head from whence every laudable and worthy enterprise issues forth.—Milton.

Have not too low thoughts of thyself. The confidence a man hath of his being pleasant in his demeanor is a means whereby he infallibly cometh to be such.—Burton.

Never violate the sacredness of your individual self-respect. Be true to your own mind and conscience, your heart and your soul; so only can you be true to God.—Theodore Parker.

Self-respect is the noblest garment with which a man may clothe himself,—the most elevating feeling with which the mind can be inspired. One of Pythagoras' wisest maxims, in his Golden Verses, is that in which he enjoins the pupil to "reverence himself."—Samuel Smiles.

Be and continue poor, young man, while others around you grow rich by fraud and disloyalty; be without place or power, while others beg their way upwards; bear the pain of disappointment and hopes, while others gain theirs by flattery; forego the gracious pressure of the hand, for which others cringe and crawl. Wrap yourself in your own virtue, and seek a friend and your daily bread. If you have, in such a course, grown gray with unbleached honor, bless God and die.—Heinzelmann.

It may be no less dangerous to claim, on certain occasions, too little than too much. There is something captivating in spirit and intrepidity, to which we often yield as to a resistless power; nor can we often yield as to a resistless power; nor can he reasonably expect the confidence of others who too apparently distrusts himself.—Johnson.

Self-righteousness

Regret not that which is past; and trust not to thine own righteousness.—St. Anthony.

Never have I greater reason for suspicion that when I am particularly pleased with myself, my faith, my progress, and my alms.—Christian Scriver.

Let us pray God that He would root out of our hearts every thing of our own planting, and set out there, with His own hands, the tree of life, bearing all manner of fruits.—Fénelon.

You can always tell when a man is a great ways from God—he is always talking about himself, how good he is. But the moment he sees God by the eye of faith, he is down on his knees, and, like Job, he cries, "Behold I am vile."—D. L. Moody.

There is nothing so small but that we may honor God by asking His guidance of it, or insult Him by taking it into our own hands; and what is true of the Deity is equally true of His revelation.—Ruskin.

For when man comes to front the everlasting God, and look the splendor of His judgments in the face, personal integrity, the dream of spotlessness and innocence, vanishes into thin air: your decencies and your church-goings and your regularities and your attachment to a correct school and party, your gospel formulas of sound doctrine

—what is all that, in front of the blaze of the wrath to come?—F. W. Robertson.

To depend partly upon Christ's righteousness and partly upon our own is to set one foot upon a rock and another in the quicksands. Christ will either be to us all in all in point of righteousness, or else nothing at all.—Thomas Erskine.

God has nothing to say to the self-righteous. Unless you humble yourself before Him in the dust, and confess before Him your iniquities and sins, the gate of heaven, which is open only for sinners, saved by grace, must be shut against you forever.—D. L. Moody.

A man may as certainly miscarry by his seeming righteousness and supposed graces, as by gross sins; and that is, when a man doth trust in these as his righteousness before God, for the satisfying His justice, appeasing His wrath, procuring His favor, and obtaining his own pardon.—Joseph Alleine.

What self-righteous persons take to themselves, is the same work that Christ was engaged in when He was in His agony and bloody sweat, and when He died on the cross, which was the greatest thing that ever the eyes of angels beheld. Christ could accomplish other parts of this work without cost; but this cost Him His life, as well as innumerable pains and labors. Yet this is the part which self-righteous persons go about to accomplish for themselves.—Jonathan Edwards.

Self-sacrifice

Happy the man whom indulgent fortune allows to pay to virtue what he owes to nature, and to make a generous gift of what must otherwise be ravished from him by cruel necessity.—Hume.

Contempt of all outward things, which come in competition with duty, fulfills the ideal of human greatness. This conviction, that readiness to sacrifice life's highest material good and life itself, is essential to the elevation of human nature, is no illusion of ardent youth, nor outburst of blind enthusiasm. It does not yield to growing wisdom. It is confirmed by all experience. It is sanctioned by conscience—that universal and eternal lawgiver whose chief dictate is, that every thing must be yielded up for the right.—W. E. Channing.

That which especially distinguishes a high order of man from a low order of man, that which constitutes human goodness, human nobleness, is surely not the degree of enlightenment with which men pursue their own advantage; but it is self-forgetfulness; it is self-sacrifice; it is the disregard of personal pleasure, personal indulgence, personal advantage, remote or present, because some other line of conduct is more right.—J. A. Froude.

Self-sufficiency

An obstinate, ungovernable self-sufficiency plainly points out to us that state of imperfect maturity at which the graceful levity of youth is lost and the solidity of experience not yet acquired.—Junius.

Self-will

Lawless are they that make their wills their law.—Shakespeare.

Self-will is so ardent and active that it will break a world to pieces to make a stool to sit on.—Cecil.

Be not under the dominion of thine own will; it is the vice of the ignorant, who vainly presume on their own understanding.—Cervantes.

Weakness has many stages. There is a difference between feebleness by the impotency of the will, of the will to the resolution, of the resolution to the choice of means, of the choice of the means to the application.—Cardinal de Retz.

Sense

What thin partitions sense from thought divide!—Pope.

The hand of little employment hath the daintier sense.—Shakespeare.

You are an annihilator of sense.—
Congreve.

He had used the word in his Pickwickian sense.—Dickens.

You cram these words into mine ears, against the stomach of my sense.
—Shakespeare.

Whatsoever contradicts my sense,
I hate to see, and never can believe.
—Roscommon.

He who loses not his senses in certain things has no senses to lose.— Lessing.

The trouble with men of sense is that they are so dreadfully in earnest all the while.—Bovee.

'Tis use alone that sanctifies expense
And splendor borrows all her rays from sense.
—Pope.

Good sense, which only is the gift of
heaven,
And though no science, fairly worth the seven.
—Pope.

If Poverty is the Mother of Crimes, want of Sense is the Father.—De La Bruyère.

Good sense and good nature are never separated, though the ignorant world has thought otherwise.—Dryden.

How many people there are who are desperate by too quick a sense of a constant infelicity!—Jeremy Taylor.

Him of the western dome, whose weighty sense
Flows in fit words and heavenly eloquence.
—Dryden.

Of plain sound sense life's current coin is made;
With that we drive the most substantial trade.
—Young.

It is commonly a dangerous thing for a man to have more sense than his neighbors. Socrates paid for his superiority with his life; and if Aristotle saved his skin, it was by taking to his heels in time.—Wieland.

Fine sense and exalted sense are not half so useful as common sense;
there are forty men of wit for one man of good sense; and he that will carry nothing about with him but gold, will be every day at a loss for readier change.—Addison.

Sense is our helmet, wit is but the plume;
The plume exposes, 'tis our helmet saves.
Sense is the diamond, weighty, solid, sound;
When cut by wit, it casts a brighter beam;
Yet, wit apart, it is a diamond still.
—Young.

To act with common sense, according to the moment, is the best wisdom
I know; and the best philosophy, to do one's duties, to take the world as it comes, submit respectfully to one's lot, bless the goodness that has given us so much happiness with it, whatever it is, and despise affectation.—Horace Walpole.

All the beautiful orders of architecture and creations of the pencil, all the conceptions of the beautiful in nature and art and humanity, are inventions extorted, as it were, from the mind to extend and increase the pleasures of sense.—Elihu Burritt.

Sensibility

Sensibility is nature's celestia spring.—Sir Walter Scott.

Men have marble, women waxen, minds.—Shakespeare.

Breasts that beat, and cheeks that glow.—Dr. Johnson.

Feeling loves a subdued light.—
Mme. Swetchine.

And the touch'd needle trembles to the pole.—Pope.

Susceptible persons are more affected by a change of tone than by unexpected words.—George Eliot.

Too much sensibility creates unhappiness, too much insensibility creates crime.—Talleyrand.

The heart that is soonest awake to the flowers is always the first to be touched by the thorns.—Moore.

Excessive sensibility is only another name for morbid self-consciousness.—Bovee.

The really sensitive are too sensitive to ever talk about it.—Mme. de Rieux.

Chords that vibrate sweetest pleasure,
Thrill the deepest notes of woe.—Burns.

Where bright imagination reigns,
the fine-wrought spirit feels acuter pains.—Hannah More.

Sensibility cannot be acquired; people are born thus, or they have it not.—Mme. de Genlis.

Dearly bought the hidden treasure finer feelings can bestow.—Burns.

The soul of music slumbers in the shell,
till waked and kindled by the master's spell.—Rogers.

That chastity of honor that felt a stain like a wound.—Burke.

Women are more susceptible to pain than to pleasure.—Montaigne.

Women are ever the dupes or victims of their extreme sensitiveness.—Balzac.

It appears to me that strong sense and acute sensibility together constitute genius.—G. P. Morris.

The wild-flower wreath of feeling, the sunbeam of the heart.—Halleck.

The wounded limb shrinks even from the gentlest touch, and to the nervous the smallest shadow excites alarm.—Ovid.

Feeling hearts—touch them but lightly—
pour
A thousand melodies unheard before.—Rogers.

Sensibility would be a good portress if she had but one hand; with her right she opens the door to pleasure, but with her left to pain.—Colton.

It is with feeling as with religion; if a man really have any, he will have "none to speak of."—H. N. Hudson.

Forbear sharp speeches to her; she's a lady so tender of rebukes that words are strokes, and strokes death to her.—Shakespeare.

If sensuality were happiness, beasts were happier than men; but human felicity is lodged in the soul, not in the flesh.—Seneca.

How many women are born too finely organized in sense and soul for the highway they must walk with feet unshod!—O. W. Holmes.

The sensibility of man to trifles, and his insensibility to great things, are the marks of a strange inversion.—Pascal.

There are moments when petty slights are harder to bear than even a serious injury. Men have died of the festering of a gnat-bite.—Cecil Danby.

Laughter and tears are meant to turn the wheels of the same machinery of sensibility; one is wind-power, and the other water-power, that is all.—Holmes.

Prompt sense of equity! to thee belongs
The swift redress of unexamined wrongs.
Eager to serve, the cause perhaps untried,
But always apt to choose the suffering side!—Hannah More.

Nor peace, nor ease the heart can know
Which, like the needle true,
Turns at the touch of joy or woe,
But turning, trembles too.—Mrs. Greville

A sensitive plant in a garden grew,
And the young winds fed it with silver dew,
And it opened its fan-like leaves to the light,
And closed them beneath the kisses of night.—Shelley.

Women endowed with remarkable sensibilities enjoy much, but they also suffer much. The greater the light, the stronger will be the shadow.—Anna Cora Mowatt.

Men's feelings are always purest and most glowing in the hour of meeting and of farewell; like the glaciers, which are transparent and rosy-hued only at sunrise and sunset, but throughout the day gray and cold.—Richter.

It seem'd as if each thought and look
And motion were that minute chain'd Fast to the spot such root she took,
And—like a sunflower by a brook,
With face upturn'd—so still remain'd!
—Moore.

The hearts of some women tremble like leaves at every breath of love which reaches them, and they are still again. Others, like the ocean, are moved only by the breath of a storm, and not so easily lulled to rest.—Longfellow.

We care not how many see us in choler, when we rave and bluster, and make as much noise and bustle as we can; but if the kindest and most generous affection comes across us, we suppress every sign of it, and hide ourselves in nooks and covert.—Landor.

Since trifles make the sum of human things,
And half our misery from our foibles springs;
Since life's best joys consist in peace and ease,
And though but few can serve, yet all may please;
Oh, let th' ungente spirit learn from hence,
A small unkindness is a great offence.
—Hannah More.

Sensibility appears to me to be neither good nor evil in itself, but in its application. Under the influence of Christian principle, it makes saints and martyrs; ill-directed, or uncontrolled, it is a snare, and the source of every temptation; besides, as people cannot get it if it is not given them, to descant on it seems to me as idle as to recommend people to have black eyes or fair complexions.—Hannah More.

Where virtue is, sensibility is the ornament and becoming attire of virtue. On certain occasions it may almost be said to become virtue. But sensibility and all the amiable qualities may likewise become, and too often have become, the panders of vice and the instruments of seduction.—Coleridge.

Sensuality

Sensuality is the death of the soul.—Balzac.

Sin is the mother, and shame the daughter of lewdness.—Sir P. Sidney.

The body of a sensualist is the coffin of a dead soul.—Rovee.

A youth of sensuality and intemperance delivers over a worn-out body to old age.—Cicero.

Sensuality not only debases both body and mind, but dulls the keen edge of pleasure.—Fielding.

If sensuality were happiness beasts were happier than men; but human felicity is lodged in the soul, not in the flesh.—Seneca.

If sensuality be our only happiness we ought to envy the brutes, for instinct is a surer, shorter, safer guide to such happiness than reason.—Colton.

Ingrateful man with liquorish draughts, and morsels unctuous, greases his pure mind that from it all consideration slips.—Shakespeare.

When the cup of any sensual pleasure is drained to the bottom, there is always poison in the dregs. Anacreon himself declares that "the flowers swim at the top of the bowl!"—Jane Porter.

Though selfishness hath defiled the whole man, yet sensual pleasure is the chief part of its interest, and therefore by the senses it commonly works, and these are the doors and the windows by which iniquity entereth into the soul.—Baxter.

Sordid and infamous sensuality, the most dreadful evil that issued from the box of Pandora, corrupts every heart, and eradicates every virtue. Fly! wherefore dost thou linger? Fly, cast not one look behind thee; nor let even thy thought return to the accursed evil for a moment.—Fénelon.

Those wretches who never have experienced the sweets of wisdom and virtue, but spend all their time in revels and debauches, sink downward day after day, and make their whole life one continued series of errors.—Plato.

I have read of a glass kept in an idol temple in Smyrna that would make beautiful things appear deformed, and deformed things appear beautiful; carnal sense is such a glass to wicked men, it makes heavenly things which are beautiful to appear deformed, and earthly things which are deformed to appear beautiful.—R. Venning.

For, in the language of Heraclitus, the virtuous soul is pure and unmixed light, springing from the body as a flash of lightning darts from the cloud. But the soul that is carnal and immersed in sense, like a heavy and dank vapor, can with difficulty be kindled, and caused to raise its eyes heavenward.—Plutarch.

If any sensual weakness arise, we are to yield all our sound forces to the overthrowing of so unnatural a rebellion; wherein how can we want courage, since we are to deal against so feeble an adversary, that in itself is nothing but weakness? Nay, we are to resolve that if reason direct it, we must do it, and if we must do it, we will do it; for to say "I cannot" is childish, and "I will not" is womanish.—Sir P. Sidney.

Sentiment

Sentiment is the ripened fruit of fancy.—Mme. Deluzy.

Sentiment is the poetry of the imagination.—Lamartine.

A woman should not paint sentiment till she has ceased to inspire it.—Lady Blessington.

Sentiment has a kind of divine alchemy, rendering grief itself the source of tenderest thoughts and far-reaching desires, which the sufferer cherishes as sacred treasures.—Talfourd.

One can impose silence on sentiment, but one cannot give it limits.—Mme. Necker.

Sentiment is intellectualized emotion; emotion precipitated, as it were, in pretty crystals by the fancy.—Lowell.

All sentiment is sight; because sentiment has a reference to nothing beyond itself, and is always real wherever a man is conscious of it. But all determinations of the understanding are not right.—Hume.

A general loftiness of sentiment, independence of men, consciousness of good intentions, self-oblivion in great objects, clear views of futurity: thoughts of the blessed companionship of saints and angels, trust in God as the friend of truth and virtue,—these are the states of mind in which I should live.—Channing.

Sentiment and principle are often mistaken for each other, though, in fact, they widely differ. Sentiment is the virtue of ideas, and principle the virtue of action. Sentiment has its seat in the head; principle, in the heart. Sentiment suggests fine harangues and subtle distinctions; principle conceives just notions, and performs good actions in consequence of them. Sentiment refines away the simplicity of truth, and the plainness of piety, and, as Voltaire, that celebrated wit, has remarked of his no less celebrated contemporary, Rousseau, "gives us virtue in words, and vice in deeds." Sentiment may be called the Athenian who knew what was right; and principle, the Lacedæmonian who practiced it.—Blair.

Sentimentalism

What we mean by sentimentalism is that state in which a man speaks deep and true sentiments not because he feels them strongly, but because he perceives that they are beautiful, and that it is touching and fine to say them, —things which he fain would feel, and fancies that he does feel.—F. W. Robertson.

Sentiments (Miscellaneous)

Foul words and foul thoughts make a foul soul.

Hate sin as you would a poisonous snake.

Be gentle, genteel, genuine and generous.

Be happy if you can, but do not despise those who are otherwise, for you know not their troubles.

They that do nothing are in the readiest way to do that which is worse than nothing.

Kick a barking dog and he will bark the more. Never notice him, and he will shut up.

Speak to living ears as you will wish you had spoken when they are dead.

The boy who uses vulgar words will be shunned by all right-minded boys.

Do you want true peace with men? Make your peace with God.

The fewer the thoughtless words spoken, the less regret.

When other people are fretful, do you be merciful and patient.

Beauty is a quality of the heart. It is more than skin deep.

Every person has two educations—one which he receives from others, and one more important, which he gives himself.

It many times falls out that we deem ourselves much deceived by others because we first deceive ourselves.

If you are going to do a good thing, do it now; if you are going to do a mean thing, wait till to-morrow.

Man is not born to solve the problem of the universe; but to find out what he has to do, and to restrain himself within the limits of his comprehension.

He who is false to present duty breaks a thread in the loom, and will find the flaw when he may have forgotten its cause.

Separation

The divorced were never truly married.—J. L. Basford.

Short retirement urges sweet return.—Milton.

The relations of all living end in separation.—Mahabharata.

Short absence quickens love.—Mira-beau.

There exists no cure for a heart wounded with the sword of separation. Hitopadesa.

Indifferent souls never part; impassioned souls part, and return to one another.—Mme. Swetchine.

For since mine eyes your joyous sight did miss, my cheerful day is turned to cheerless night.—Spenser.

Thy soul * * *
Is as far from my grasp, is as free,
As the stars from the mountain-tops be,
As the pearl in the depths of the sea,
From the portionless king that would wear it.
—E. C. Stedman.

The limner's art may trace the absent feature,
And give the eye of distant weeping faith
To view the form of its idolatry;
But oh! the scenes 'mid which they met and parted;
The thoughts—the recollections sweet and bitter,
Th' Elysian dreams of lovers, when they loved,
Who shall restore them? —Maturin.

O thou that dost inhabit in my breast, leave not the mansion so long tenantless; lest, growing ruinous, the building fall and leave no memory of what it was!—Shakespeare.

When loving hearts are separated, not the one which is exhaled to heaven, but the survivor, it is which tastes the sting of death.—Duchess de Praslin.

When two loving hearts are torn asunder, it is a shade better to be the one that is driven away into action than the bereaved twin that petrifies at home.—Charles Reade.

I quit Paris unwillingly, because I must part from my friends; and I quit the country unwillingly, because I must part from myself.—Joubert.

Sermon (See Preaching)

I would not have preachers torment their hearers, and detain them with long and tedious preaching.—Luther.

A divine ought to calculate his sermons as an astrologer does his almanac—to the meridian of the place and people where he lives.—Hughes.

Reasons are the pillars of the fabric of a sermon, but similitudes are the windows which give the best light. The faithful minister avoids such stories whose mention may suggest bad thoughts to the auditors, and will not use a light comparison to make there-of a grave application, for fear lest his poison go further than his antidote.—Fuller.

Servants

Servant of God, well done.—Milton.

A pampered menial drove me from the door.—Thomas Moss.

Master, go on, and I will follow thee
To the last gasp, with truth and loyalty.
—Shakespeare.

If thou hast a loitering servant, send him of thy errand just before his dinner.—Fuller.

From kings to cobblers 'tis the same;
Bad servants wound their masters' fame.
—Gay.

Reward a good servant well; and rather get quit of a bad one than disquiet thyself with him.—Fuller.

Be not too familiar with thy servants; at first it may beget love, but in the end 'twill breed contempt.—Fuller.

Perfect servants would be the worst of all for certain masters, whose happiness consists in finding fault with them.—J. Petit-Senn.

—From the king
To the beggar, by gradation, all are servants;
And you must grant, the slavery is less
To study to please one, than many.
—Massinger.

Be not served with kinsman, or friends, or men intreated to stay; for they expect much, and do little; nor with such as are amorous, for their heads are intoxicated; and keep rather too few, than one too many.—Lord Burleigh.

Expect not more from servants than is just; Reward them well, if they observe their trust,
Nor with them cruelty or pride invade;
Since God and nature them our brothers made.
—Denham.

Let thy servants be such as thou mayest command, and entertain none about thee but yeomen, to whom thou givest wages; for those that will serve thee without thy hire will cost thee treble as much as they that know thy fare.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Service

My heart is ever at your service.—Shakespeare.

They also serve who only stand and wait.—Milton.

You know that love
Will creep in service where it cannot go.
—Shakespeare.

They serve God well,
Who serve his creatures.
—Mrs. Norton.

Who seeks for aid
Must show how service sought can be repaid.
—Lord Lytton.

I am an ass, indeed, you may prove it by my long ears. I have served him from the hour of my nativity to this instant, and have nothing at his hands for my service but blows. When I am cold, he heats me with beating.—Shakespeare.

Had I but serv'd my God with half the zeal I serv'd my king, he would not in mine age have left me naked to mine enemies.—Shakespeare.

We are his,
To serve him nobly in the common cause,
True to the death, but not to be his slaves.—Cowper.

And ye shall succor men;
'Tis nobleness to serve;
Help them who cannot help again:
Beware from right to swerve.—Emerson.

Small service is true service while it lasts:
Of humblest friends, bright Creature! scorn not one;
The Daisy, by the shadow that it casts,
Protects the lingering dew-drop from the Sun.—Wordsworth.

When I have attempted to join myself to others by services, it proved an intellectual trick,—no more. They eat your service like apples, and leave you out. But love them, and they feel you, and delight in you all the time.—Emerson.

Servility

A nod from a lord is a breakfast for a fool.—Franklin.

O villains, vipers, dogs, easily won to fawn on any man!—Shakespeare.

Servility is to devotion what hypocrisy is to virtue.—Mme. de Girardin.

With that can creep, and pride that licks the dust.—Pope.

The politics of courtiers resemble their shadows; they cringe and turn with the sun of the day.—J. Petit-Senn.

Servility is disgusting to a truly noble character, and engenders only contempt.—Hosea Ballou.

Servitude

It is fit and necessary that some persons in the world should be in love with a splendid servitude.—South.

Corrupted freemen are the worst of slaves.—Garrick.

Servitude seizes on few, but many seize on her.—Seneca.

Slavery is as ancient as war, and war as human nature.—Voltaire.

Servitude is inherent; we are all slaves to duty or to force.—Marguerite de Valois.

All are born to observe laws; few are born to establish them.—Carlyle.

We become willing servants to the good by the bonds their virtues lay upon us.—Sir P. Sidney.

To use the hands in making quicklime into mortar is better than to cross them on the breast in attendance on a prince.—Saadi.

I have been formerly so silly as to hope that every servant I had might be made a friend; I am now convinced that the nature of servitude generally bears a contrary tendency. People's characters are to be chiefly collected from their education and place in life; birth itself does but little.—Shenstone.

Men in great places are thrice servants,—servants of the sovereign or state, servants of fame, and servants of business; so that they have no freedom, neither in their persons, nor in their actions, nor in their times.—Bacon.

Shadows

Come like shadows, so depart!—Shakespeare.

Thus shadow owes its birth to light.—Gay.

Across the singing waves the shadows creep.—Celia Thaxter.

What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue.—Burke.

Like black hulks the shadows of the great trees ride at anchor on the billowy sea of grass.—Longfellow.

The very shadows seem to listen.—
Anna Katharine Green.

Some there be that shadows kiss;
Such have but a shadow's bliss.
—Shakespeare.

Follow a shadow, it still flies you:
Seem to fly it, it will pursue.
—Ben Jonson.

Shine out, fair sun, till I have bought a glass,
That I may see my shadow as I pass.
—Shakespeare.

We stand in our own light wherever we go, and fight our own shadows forever.—Owen Meredith.

No, no! I am but shadow of myself:
You are deceived, my substance is not here.
—Shakespeare.

Shadows are in reality, when the sun is shining, the most conspicuous thing in a landscape, next to the highest lights.—Ruskin.

Shadows tonight
Have struck more terror to the soul of Richard
Than can the substance of ten thousand soldiers
Armed in proof, and led by shallow Richmond.
—Shakespeare.

The shadows of the mind are like those of the body. In the morning of life they lie behind us; at noon, we trample them under foot; and in the evening they stretch long, broad and deepening before us.—Longfellow.

Shakespeare

Shakespeare has had neither equal nor second.—Macaulay.

The sage and seer of the human heart.—Henry Giles.

Shakespeare is an intellectual miracle.—Chalmers.

He was not of an age, but for all time.—Ben Jonson.

Or sweetest Shakespeare, Fancy's child!—Milton.

* * * Thou hadst small Latin and less Greek.—Ben Jonson.

No man is too busy to read Shakespeare.—Charles Buxton.

And rival all but Shakespeare's name below.—Campbell.

Our myriad-minded Shakespeare.—
Coleridge.

The genius of Shakespeare was an innate university.—Keats.

To him the mighty mother did unveil her awful face.—Gray.

He was honest, and of an open and free nature.—Ben Jonson.

The man whom nature's self had made to mock herself, and truth to imitate.—Spenser.

Nor sequent centuries could hit Orbit and sum of Shakespeare's wit.
—Emerson.

To see Kean act was like reading
Shakespeare by flashes of lightning.—
Coleridge.

Shakespeare is not our poet, but the world's,
Therefore on him no speech!
—Walter Savage Landor.

Nature listening stood, whilst Shakespeare
play'd,
And wonder'd at the work herself had made.
—Churchill.

Whatever can be known of the heart of man may be found in Shakespeare's plays.—Goethe.

Shakespeare's magic could not copied be;
Within that circle none durst walk but he,
—Dryden.

Corneille is to Shakespeare as a clipped hedge is to a forest.—Dr.
Johnson.

Soul of the age! the applause, delight, the wonder of our stage.—Ben Jonson.

I think most readers of Shakespeare sometimes find themselves thrown into exalted mental conditions like those produced by music.—O. W. Holmes.

Those who accuse him to have wanted learning give him the greater commendation.—Dryden.

It is not so correct to say that he speaks from nature as that she speaks through him.—Pope.

Sweet Swan of Avon! What a sight it were To see thee in our water yet appear.
—Ben Jonson.

In his comic scenes, Shakespeare seems to produce, without labor, what no labor can improve.—Dr. Johnson.

There, Shakespeare, on whose forehead climb
The crowns o' the world. Oh, eyes sublime,
With tears and laughters for all time!
—Mrs. Browning.

Shakespeare, Butler and Bacon have rendered it extremely difficult for all who come after them to be sublime, witty or profound.—Colton.

Shakespeare is one of the best means of culture the world possesses. Whoever is at home in his pages is at home everywhere.—H. N. Hudson.

Others abide our question. Thou art free. We ask and ask—Thou smilest and art still, Out-topping knowledge.—Matthew Arnold.

Shakespeare is a great psychologist, and whatever can be known of the heart of man may be found in his plays.—Goethe.

There is only one writer in whom I find something that reminds me of the directness of style which is found in the Bible. It is Shakespeare.—Heinrich Heine.

The imitators of Shakespeare, fixing their attention on his wonderful power of expression, have directed their imitation to this.—Matthew Arnold.

If ever Shakespeare rants, it is not when his imagination is hurrying him along, but when he is hurrying his imagination along.—Macaulay.

Shakespeare was naturally learned; he needed not the spectacles of the books to read nature; he looked inward, and found her there.—Dryden.

Shakespeare is dangerous to young poets; they cannot but reproduce him, while they fancy that they produce themselves.—Goethe.

We are apt to consider Shakespeare only as a poet; but he was certainly one of the greatest moral philosophers that ever lived.—Lady Montagu.

In strength of intellect he was a demigod; in profundity of view; a prophet; in all-seeing wisdom, a protecting spirit.—Schlegel.

The stream of time, which is constantly washing the dissoluble fabrics of other poets, passes without injury by the adamant of Shakespeare.—Dr. Johnson.

Shakespeare (whom you and every play house bill
Style the divine, the matchless, what you will)
For gain, not glory, wing'd his roving flight
And grew immortal in his own despite.
—Pope.

What needs my Shakespeare for his hon-
or'd bones,
The labor of an age in pilèd stones?

Thou in our wonder and astonishment
Hast built thyself a livelong monument.
—Milton.

Then to the well-trod stage anon
If Jonson's learned sock be on,
Or sweetest Shakespeare, Fancy's child,
Warble his native wood-notes wild.
—Milton.

Nature herself was proud of his designs,
And joyed to wear the dressing of his lines!

Which were so richly spun, and woven so fit,
As since, she will vouchsafe no other wit.
—Ben Jonson.

Now you who rhyme, and I who rhyme,
Have not we sworn it, many a time,
That we no more our verse would scrawl,
For Shakespeare he had said it all!
—R. W. Gilder.

When Shakespeare is charged with debts to his authors, Landor replies, "Yet he was more original than his originals. He breathed upon dead bodies and brought them into life."—Emerson.

In the plays of Shakespeare man appears as he is, made up of a crowd of passions which contend for the mastery over him, and govern him in turn.—Macaulay.

The passages of Shakespeare that we most prize were never quoted until within this century.—Emerson.

It was said of Euripides, that every verse was a precept; and it may be said of Shakespeare, that from his works may be collected a system of civil and economical prudence.—Dr. Johnson.

In Shakespeare one sentence begets the next naturally; the meaning is all inwoven. He goes on kindling like a meteor through the dark atmosphere.—Coleridge.

Shakespeare's personages live and move as if they had just come from the hand of God, with a life that, though manifold, is one, and, though complex, is harmonious.—Mazzini.

Scorn not the Sonnet. Critic, you have frowned, Mindless of its just honours; with this key Shakespeare unlocked his heart.
—Wordsworth.

This was Shakespeare's form;
Who walked in every path of human life,
Felt every passion; and to all mankind
Doth now, will ever, that experience yield Which his own genius only could acquire.
—Akerside.

Admirable as he was in all parts of his art, we most admire him for this, that while he has left us a greater number of striking portraits than all other dramatists put together, he has scarcely left us a single caricature.—Macaulay.

I remember, the players have often mentioned it as an honor to Shakespeare, that in his writing (whatsoever he penned) he never blotted out a line. My answer hath been, would he had blotted a thousand.—Ben Jonson.

Highest among those who have exhibited human nature by means of dialogue stands Shakespeare. His variety is like the variety of nature,—endless diversity, scarcely any monstrosity.—Macaulay.

Whatever other learning he wanted, he was master of two books unknown to many profound readers, though books which the last conflagration can alone destroy,—I mean the book of nature and that of man.—Young.

If I say that Shakespeare is the greatest of intellects, I have said all concerning him. But there is more in Shakespeare's intellect than we have yet seen. It is what I call an unconscious intellect; there is more virtue in it than he himself is aware of.—Carlyle.

If he had sorrows, he has made them the woof of everlasting consolation to his kind; and if, as poets are wont to whine, the outward world was cold to him, its biting air did but trace itself in loveliest frostwork of fancy on the many windows of that self-centred and cheerful soul.—Lowell.

His imperial muse tosses the creation like a bauble from hand to hand, to embody any capricious thought that is uppermost in her mind. The remotest spaces of nature are visited, and the farthest sundered things are brought together by a subtle spiritual connection.—Emerson.

Shakespeare is of no age, nor, I may add, of any religion or party or profession. The body and substance of his works come out of the unfathomable depths of his own oceanic mind; his observation and reading supplied him with the drapery of his figures.—Coleridge.

No nation has produced anything like his equal. There is no quality in the human mind, there is no class of topics, there is no region of thought, in which he has not soared or descended, and none in which he has not said the commanding word.—Emerson.

Vast objects of remote altitude must be looked at a long while before they are ascertained. Ages are the telescope tubes that must be lengthened out for Shakespeare; and generations of men serve but a single witness to his claims.—Landor.

What king has he not taught state, as Talma taught Napoleon? What maiden has not found him finer than her delicacy? What lover has he not outloved? What sage has he not outseen? What gentleman has he not instructed in the rudeness of his behavior?—Emerson.

When Learning's triumph o'er her barb'rous foes
First rear'd the stage, immortal Shakespeare rose;
Each change of many-colored life he drew,
Exhausted worlds, and then imagin'd new;
Existence saw him spurn her bounded reign,
And panting Time toil'd after him in vain,
His powerful strokes presiding Truth impress'd,
And unresisted Passion storm'd the breast.
—Dr. Johnson.

Shakespeare stands alone. His want of erudition was a most happy and productive ignorance; it forced him back upon his own resources, which were exhaustless. If his literary qualifications made it impossible for him to borrow from the ancients, he was more than repaid by the powers of his invention, which made borrowing unnecessary.—Colton.

For a good poet's made, as well as born,
And such wast thou! Look how the father's face Lives in his issue; even so the race
Of Shakespeare's mind and manners brightly shine
In his well-turned and true-fil'd lines;
In each of which he seems to shake a lance,
As brandished at the eyes of ignorance.
—Ben Jonson.

There is something so wild, and yet so solemn, in the speeches of his ghosts, fairies, witches, and the like imaginary persons, that we cannot forbear thinking them natural, though we have no rule by which to judge of them, and must confess, if there are such beings in the world, it looks highly probable they should talk and act as he has represented them.—Addison.

When great poets sing,
Into the night new constellations spring,
With music in the air that dulls the craft Of rhetoric. So when Shakespeare sang or laughed
The world with long, sweet Alpine echoes thrilled
Voiceless to scholars' tongues no muse had filled
With melody divine. —C. P. Cranch.

This figure that thou here seest put,
It was for gentle Shakespeare cut,
Wherein the graver had a strife
With Nature, to outdo the life:
Oh, could he but have drawn his wit
As well in brass, as he has hit
His face, the print would then surpass
All that was ever writ in brass;
But since he cannot, reader, look
Not on his picture, but his book.
—Ben Jonson.

In the first seat, in robe of various dyes,
A noble wildness flashing from his eyes,
Sat Shakespeare: in one hand a wand he bore,
For mighty wonders fam'd in days of yore:
The other held a globe, which to his will Obedient turn'd, and own'd the master's skill:
Things of the noblest kind his genius drew,
And look'd through nature at a single view:
A loose he gave to his unbounded soul,
And taught new lands to rise, new seas to roll;
Call'd into being scenes unknown before,
And passing nature's bounds, was something more.
—Churchill.

Among the English authors, Shakespeare has incomparably excelled all others. That noble extravagance of fancy, which he had in so great perfection, thoroughly qualified him to touch the weak, superstitious part of his readers' imagination, and made him capable of succeeding where he had nothing to support him besides the strength of his own genius.—Addison.

Shame

O shame! where is thy blush?—
Shakespeare.

Those who fear not guilt yet start at shame.—Churchill.

Hide, for shame, Romans, your grandsires' images, that blush at their degenerate progeny!—Dryden.

A nightingale dies for shame if another bird sings better.—Burton.

I count him lost who is lost to shame.—Plautus.

False shame only is harmful.—Livy.

Where shame is, there is also fear.—Milton.

Conscience is a blushing, shame-faced spirit.—Shakespeare.

Shame is the dying embers of virtue.—H. W. Shaw.

Shame sticks ever close to the ribs of honor.—Middleton.

Nature's hasty conscience.—Miss Edgeworth.

Shame is a feeling of profanation.—Novalis.

If not yet lost to all the sense of shame.—Homer.

The most curious offspring of shame is shyness.—Sydney Smith.

To disregard what the world thinks of us is not only arrogant but utterly shameless.—Cicero.

Of all evils to the generous, shame is the most deadly pang.—Thomson.

The worst kind of shame is being ashamed of frugality or poverty.—Livy.

I am ashamed of my master and not of my servitude.—Seneca.

While shame keeps its watch, virtue is not wholly extinguished from the heart.—Burke.

It is the guilt, not the scaffold, which constitutes the shame.—Corneille.

I know not how to tell thee! Shame rises in my face, and interrupts the story of my tongue!—Otway.

Shame greatly hurts or greatly helps mankind.—Homer.

Shame may restrain what law does not prohibit.—Seneca.

In shame there is no comfort but to be beyond all bounds of shame.—Sir P. Sidney.

Shame is like the weaver's thread; if it breaks in the net, it is wholly imperfect.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Mortifications are often more painful than real calamities.—Goldsmith.

As soon as she (woman) begins to be ashamed of what she ought not, she will not be ashamed of what she ought.—Livy.

Nothing is truly infamous, but what is wicked; and therefore shame can never disturb an innocent and virtuous mind.—Sherlock.

He that blushes not at his crime, but adds shamelessness to shame, hath nothing left to restore him to virtue.—Thomas Fuller.

Love taught him shame, and shame, with love at strife,
Soon taught the sweet civilities of life.—Dryden.

All is confounded, all!
Reproach and everlasting shame Sits mocking in our plumes.
—Shakespeare.

But 'neath yon crimson tree,
Lover to listening maid might breathe his flame,
Nor mark, within its roseate canopy,
Her blush of maiden shame.
—Bryant.

The bold defiance of a woman is the certain sign of her shame; when she has once ceased to blush, it is because she has too much to blush for.—Talleyrand.

There are two restraints which God has laid upon human nature, shame and fear: shame is the weaker, and has place only in those in whom there are some reminders of virtue.—Tillotson.

I can bear scorpion's stings, tread fields of fire, in frozen gulfs of cold eternal lie, be tossed aloft through tracts of endless void, but cannot live in shame.—Joanna Baillie.

For often vice, provoked to shame, borrows the color of a virtuous deed;
thus libertines are chaste, and misers good, a coward valiant, and a priest sincere.—Sewell.

That holy shame, which ne'er forgets
What clear renown it us'd to wear;
Whose blush remains when virtue sets,
To show her sunshine has been there.
—Moore.

And there's a lust in man no charm can tame
Of loudly publishing our neighbor's shame;
On eagle's wings immortal scandals fly,
While virtuous actions are but born and die.
—Juvenal.

The only art her guilt to cover,
To hide her shame from every eye,
To give repentance to her lover,
And wring his bosom, is—to die.
—Goldsmith.

He was not born to shame:
Upon his brow shame was asham'd to sit;
For 'tis a throne where honour may be crown'd
Sole monarch of the universal earth.
—Shakespeare.

When knaves and fools combin'd o'er all prevail,
When justice halts, and right begins to fail,
E'en then the boldest start from public sneers,
Afraid of shame—unknown to other fears.
More darkly sin, by satire kept in awe,
And shrink from ridicule, though not from law.
—Byron.

Shame is a feeling of profanation.
Friendship, love and piety ought to be handled with a sort of mysterious secrecy; they ought to be spoken of only in the rare moments of perfect confidence,—to be mutually understood in silence. Many things are too delicate to be thought,—many more, to be spoken.—Novalis.

Shamrock

O, the Shamrock, the green, immortal
Shamrock!
Chosen leaf
Of bard and chief,
Old Erin's native Shamrock. —Moore.

I'll seek a four-leaved shamrock in all the fairy dells,
And if I find the charmed leaves, oh, how I'll weave my spells!
—Samuel Loyer.

Ships

The true ship is the ship builder.—
Emerson.

And let our barks across the pathless flood Hold different courses. —Scott.

Ships, dim discovered, dropping from the clouds.—Thomson.

Like ships that have gone down at sea,
When heaven was all tranquillity. —Moore.

And the wind plays on those great sonorous harps, the shrouds and masts of ships.—Longfellow.

Being in a ship is being in a jail, with the chance of being drowned.—
Samuel Johnson.

Ships that sailed for sunny isles,
But never came to shore.
—Thos. Hervey.

She walks the waters like a thing of life,
And seems to dare the elements to strife.
—Byron.

She bears her down majestically near,
Speed on her prow, and terror in her tier.
—Byron.

A rotten carcass of a boat, not rigged,
Nor tackle, sail, nor mast; the very rats
Instinctively have quit it.—Shakespeare.

There's not a ship that sails the ocean,
But every climate, every soil,
Must bring its tribute, great or small,
And help to build the wooden wall!
—Longfellow.

Build me straight, O worthy Master!
Staunch and strong, a goodly vessel
That shall laugh at all disaster,
And with wave and whirlwind wrestle!
—Longfellow.

And the stately ships go on
To their haven under the hill;
But O for the touch of a vanish'd hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still.
—Tennyson.

Behold the threaden sails,
Borne with the invisible and creeping wind,
Draw the huge bottoms through the fur-
row'd sea,
Breasting the lofty surge.—Shakespeare.

Heaven speed the canvas, gallantly unfurl'd,
To furnish and accommodate a world,
To give the Pole the produce of the sun,
And knit th' unsocial climates into one.
—Cowper.

Upon the gale she stoop'd her side,
And bounded o'er the swelling tide,
As she were dancing home;
The merry seamen laugh'd to see
Their gallant ship so lustily
Furrow the green-sea foam. —Scott.

The barge she sat in, like a burnish'd thorne,
Burn'd on the water: the poop was beaten
gold;
Purple the sails, and so perfumed that The winds were love-sick with them: the oars were silver,
Which to the tune of flutes kept stroke,
and made
The water which they beat to follow faster,
As amorous of their strokes.—Shakespeare.

Shipwreck

He who has suffered shipwreck, fears to sail
Upon the seas, though with a gentle gale.
—Herrick.

Or shipwrecked, kindles on the coast
False fires, that others may be lost.
—Wordsworth.

Some hoisted out the boats, and there was one
That begged Pedrillo for an absolution,
Who told him to be damn'd,—in his confusion.
—Byron.

Then rose from sea to sky the wild farewell—
Then shriek'd the timid, and stood still
the brave,—
Then some leap'd overboard with fearful
yell,
As eager to anticipate their grave.
—Byron.

O, I have suffer'd
With those that I saw suffer! a brave vessel,
Who had no doubt some noble creature in
her,
Dash'd all to pieces. O, the cry did knock Against my very heart! poor souls! they perish'd.
—Shakespeare.

But hark! what shriek of death comes in the gale,
And in the distant ray what glimmering
sail
Bends to the storm?—Now sinks the note of fear!
Ah! wretched mariners!—no more shall
day Unclose his cheering eye to light ye on your way! —Mrs. Radcliffe.

And fast through the midnight dark and drear,
Through the whistling sleet and snow,
Like a sheeted ghost, the vessel swept Towards the reef of Norman's Woe.
—Longfellow.

In vain, alas! the sacred shades of yore
Would arm the mind with philosophic lore,
In vain they'd teach us, at the latest
breath,
To smile serene amid the pangs of death.
—Falconer.

Again she plunges! hark! a second shock
Bilges the splitting vessel on the rock;
Down on the vale of death, with dismal cries,
The fated victims shuddering cast their
eyes
In wild despair; while yet another stroke
With strong convulsion rends the solid oak:
Ah heaven!—behold her crashing ribs divide!
She loosens, parts, and spreads in ruin o'er the tide.
—Falconer.

Sickness

If there be a regal solitude, it is a sick-bed. How the patient lords it there!—Lamb.

Sickness is a sort of early old age;
it teaches us a diffidence in our earthly state.—Pope.

Few spirits are made better by the pain and languor of sickness; as few great pilgrims become eminent saints.
—Thomas à Kempis.

In sickness let me not so much say, am I getting better of my pain? as am
I getting better for it?—Shakespeare.

What, is Brutus sick,
And will he steal out of his wholesome bed,
To dare the vile contagion of the night?
—Shakespeare.

A malady Preys on my heart that medicine cannot reach.
—Maturin.

Some maladies are rich and precious and only to be acquired by the right of inheritance or purchased with gold.—
Nathaniel Hawthorne.

In sickness the soul begins to dress herself for immortality. And first she unties the strings of vanity that made her upper garments cleave to the world and sit uneasy.—Jeremy Taylor.

It is with diseases of the mind as with those of the body; we are half dead before we understand our disorders, and half cured when we do.—Colton.

The best of remedies is a beefsteak
Against sea-sickness; try it, sir, before
You sneer, and I assure you this is true,
For I have found it answer—so may you.
—Byron.

Sickness is the mother of modesty, as it puts us in mind of our mortality, and while we drive on heedlessly in the full career of worldly pomp and jollity, kindly pulls us by the ear, and brings us to a sense of our duty.—Burton.

Of all the know-nothing persons in this world, commend us to the man who has "never known a day's illness." He is a moral dunce, one who has lost the greatest lesson in life; who has skipped the finest lecture in that great school of humanity, the sick-chamber.—Hood.

It is in sickness that we most feel the need of that sympathy which shows how much we are dependent one upon another for our comfort, and even necessities. Thus disease, opening our eyes to the realities of life, is an indirect blessing.—Hosea Ballou.

When a man is laboring under the pain of any distemper, it is then that he recollects there is a God, and that he himself is but a man. No mortal is then the object of his envy, his admiration or his contempt; and, having no malice to gratify, the tales of slander excite him not.—Pliny.

He had a fever when he was in Spain,
And when the fit was on him, I did mark
How he did shake; 'tis true, this god did shake:
His coward lips did from their colour fly,
And that same eye whose bend doth awe
the world
Did lose his lustre. —Shakespeare.

As I see in the body, so I know in the soul; they are oft most desperately sick who are least sensible of their disease; whereas he that fears each light wound for mortal seeks a timely cure, and is healed. I will not reckon it my happiness that I have many sores, but since I have them, I am glad they grieve me. I know the cure is not the more dangerous because my wounds are more grievous; I should be more sick if I complained less.—Arthur Warwick.

The delicate face where thoughtful care already mingled with the winning grace and loveliness of youth, the too bright eye, the spiritual head, the lips that pressed each other with such high resolve and courage of the heart, the slight figure, firm in its bearing and yet so very weak.—Dickens.

Lemira's sick; make haste, the doctor call,
He comes: but where's his patient?—at the ball;
The doctor stares; her woman curtsies low,
And cries, "My lady, sir, is always so:
Diversions put her maladies to flight;
True, she can't stand, but she can dance
all night:
I've known my lady (for she loves a tune)
For fevers take an opera in June;
And, though perhaps you'll think the practice bold,
A midnight park is sov'reign for a cold."
—Young.

Disease generally begins that equality which death completes; the distinctions which set one man so much above another are very little perceived in the gloom of a sick-chamber, where it will be vain to expect entertainment from the gay, or instruction from the wise; where all human glory is obliterated, the wit is clouded, the reasoner perplexed, and the hero subdued; where the highest and brightest of mortal beings finds nothing left him but the consciousness of innocence.—Johnson.

Sighs

To sigh, yet feel no pain.—Moore.

Implores the passing tribute of a sigh.—Gray.

He sighed;—the next resource is the full moon.
Where all sighs are deposited; and now
It happen'd luckily, the chaste orb shone.
—Byron.

My soul has rest, sweet sigh! alone in thee.—Petrarch.

Sped the soft intercourse from soul to soul,
And waft a sigh from Indus to the Pole.

—Pope.

Sighs

Which perfect Joy, perplexed for utterance, Stole from her sister Sorrow.

—Tennyson.

But sighs subside, and tears (e'en widows')
shrink,

Like Arno in the summer, to a shallow
So narrow as to shame their wintry brink,
Which threatens inundations deep and yellow!

Such diff'rence do a few months make.

You'd think

Grief a rich field that never would lie fallow;

No more it doth; its ploughs but change their boys,

Who furrow some new soil to sow for joys.

—Byron.

Yet sighes, deare sighes, indeede true friends you are

That do not leave your left friend at the wurst,

But, as you with my breast, I oft have nurst

So, gratefull now, you waite upon my care.

—Sir Philip Sidney.

Sight

And for to se, and eek for to be seye.—Chaucer.

There is none so blind as they that won't see.—Swift.

And every eye
Gaz'd as before some brother of the sky.

—Homer.

Then purg'd with euphrasy and rue
The visual nerve, for he had much to see.

—Milton.

For sight is woman-like and shuns the old.
(Ah! he can see enough, when years are told,
Who backwards looks). —Victor Hugo.

And finds with keen, discriminating sight, Black's not so black;—nor white so very white.

—Canning.

For any man with half an eye,
What stands before him may espy;
But optics sharp it needs I ween,
To see what is not to be seen.

—John Trumbull.

Our sight is the most perfect and most delightful of all our senses; it fills the mind with the largest variety of ideas;—converses with its objects at the greatest distance, and continues the longest in action without being tired or satiated with its proper enjoyments.—

Addison.

Sight is by much the noblest of the senses. We receive our notices from the other four, through the organs of sensation only. We hear, we feel, we smell, we taste, by touch. But sight rises infinitely higher. It is refined above matter, and equals the faculty of spirit.—Sterne.

Signs

The sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken.

—Bible.

The goats ran from the mountains, and the herds
Were strangely clamorous, to the frighted fields.

—Shakespeare.

And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear.

—Bible.

Hung be the heavens with black, yield day
to night!

Comets, importing change of times and states,

Brandish your crystal tresses in the sky;
And with them scourge the bad revolting

stars,

That have consented unto Henry's death!

—Shakespeare.

At my nativity
The front of heaven was full of fiery shapes,

Of burning cressets; and, at my birth,
The frame and huge foundation of the earth

Shaked like a coward.

—Shakespeare.

Silence

Keep thou the door of my lips.—
Bible.

Silence is a true friend who never betrays.—Confucius.

Give thy thoughts no tongue.—
Shakespeare.

Silence is the sanctuary of prudence.—Balthasar Gracian.

Silence is more eloquent than words.
—Carlyle.

Silence! the pride of reason.—
Holmes.

Great souls suffer in silence.—
Schiller.

Speech is great, but silence is greater.—
Carlyle.

Silence does not always mean wisdom.—
Coleridge.

Silence is the mother of truth.—Earl
of Beaconsfield.

Silence more musical than any song.
—Christina G. Rossetti.

Silence in times of suffering is the best.—Dryden.

Silence never yet betrayed any one!
—Rivarol.

To women silence gives their proper grace.—Sophocles.

Silence is the perfect herald of joy.
—Shakespeare.

Not much talk,—a great, sweet silence.—Henry James, Jr.

Speech is of time, silence is of eternity.—Carlyle.

Come then, expressive Silence.—
Thomson.

Silence is the best resolve for him who distrusts himself.—La Roche-
foucauld.

The unspoken word never does harm.
—Kossuth.

Silence sweeter is than speech.—
D. M. Mulock.

There is no diplomacy like silence.
—Beaconsfield.

The Muses were dumb while Apollo lectured.—Lamb.

Silence,—the applause of real and durable impressions.—Lamartine.

Still people are dangerous.—La Fontaine.

Nothing is more useful than silence.
—Menander.

Silence never makes any blunders.
—H. W. Shaw.

Silence that spoke, and eloquence of eyes.—Homer.

Silence in woman is like speech in man.—Ben Jonson.

Speak fitly, or be silent wisely.—
George Herbert.

Silence, beautiful voice.—Tennyson.

Let us be silent, so we may hear the whisper of the gods.—Emerson.

Silent anguish is the more dangerous.—Racine.

I'll speak to thee in silence.—Shake-
speare.

Be silent and safe—silence never betrays you.—John Boyle O'Reilly.

The silent man still suffers wrong.
—J. P. Collier.

Silence is the eternal duty of man.
—Carlyle.

The silence that is in the starry sky.—Wordsworth.

Still as the peaceful walks of ancient night; silent as are the lamps that burn on tombs.—Shakespeare.

Silence is not only never thirsty, but also never brings pain or sorrow.
—Hippocrates.

Silently as a dream the fabric rose;
No sound of hammer or of saw was there.
—Cowper.

Shallow brookes murmur moste, deepe silent slide away.—Sir Philip Sidney.

There are some silent people who are more interesting than the best talkers.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

And they three passed over the white sands, between the rocks, silent as the shadows.—Coleridge.

Three Silences there are: the first of speech,
The second of desire, the third of thought.
—Longfellow.

With silence, nephew, be thou politic.—Shakespeare.

Silence holds the door against the strife of tongue and all the impertinences of idle conversation.—James Hervey.

And silence, like a poultice, comes
To heal the blows of sound.
—O. W. Holmes.

Silence is learned by the many misfortunes of life.—Seneca.

If a word be worth one shekel, silence is worth two.—Rabbi Ben Azai.

The deepest rivers make least din,
The silent soule doth most abound in care.
—Earl of Stirling.

By silence, I hear other men's imperfections and conceal my own.—Zeno.

Silence has been given to woman the better to express her thoughts.—Desnoyers.

To be silent is but a small virtue; but it is a serious fault to reveal secrets.—Ovid.

Silence is a figure of speech, unanswerable, short, cold, but terribly severe.—Theodore Parker.

Silence and simplicity obtrude on no one, but are yet two unequalled attractions in woman.—Lamartine.

Silence is only commendable
In a neat's tongue dried, and a maid not vendible.
—Shakespeare.

Stillborn silence! thou that art
Flood-gate of the deeper heart!
—Richard Fleckno.

Even a fool, when he holdeth his peace, is counted wise.—Bible.

The nobleness of silence. The highest melody dwells only in silence,—the sphere melody, the melody of health.—Carlyle.

The silence of the people is a lesson for kings.—Soanen.

What shall I say to you? What can I say Better than silence is? —Longfellow.

It is only reason that teaches silence. The heart teaches us to speak.—Richter.

As we must account for every idle word, so we must for every idle silence.—Franklin.

We may give more offense by our silence than even by impertinence.—Hazlitt.

I regret often that I have spoken, never that I have been silent.—Publius Syrus.

Her full heart—its own interpreter—translates itself in silence on her cheek.—Amelia B. Welby.

None preaches better than the ant, and she says nothing.—Franklin.

A judicious silence is always better than truth spoken without charity.—De Sales.

If thou desire to be held wise, be so wise as to hold thy tongue.—Quarles.

What manly eloquence could produce such an effect as woman's silence?—Michelet.

There is nothing wherein their womanliness is more honestly garnished than with silence.—Nicholas Udall.

There is likewise a reward for faithful silence.—Horace.

Be silent always, when you doubt your sense,
And speak, tho' sure, with seeming diffidence.
—Pope.

True gladness doth not always speak; joy bred and born but in the tongue is weak.—Ben Jonson.

To check the starts and sallies of the soul, and break off all its commerce with the tongue.—Addison.

After speech, silence is the greatest power in the world.—Lacordaire.

Silence is the understanding of fools and one of the virtues of the wise.—Bernard de Bonnard.

Silence is like nightfall; objects are lost in it insensibly.—Madame Swetchine.

The temple of our purest thoughts is—silence!—Mrs. Hale.

A beggar that is dumb, you know, may challenge double pity.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

There is an eloquent silence which serves to approve or to condemn: there is a silence of discretion and of respect.—La Rochefoucauld.

Silence, when nothing need be said, is the eloquence of discretion.—Bovee.

Silence is deep as eternity; speech is shallow as time.—Carlyle.

Be checked for silence, but never taxed for speech.—Shakespeare.

We can refute assertions, but who can refute silence?—Dickens.

Learn to hold thy tongue. Five words cost Zacharias forty weeks' silence.—Fuller.

Silence often of pure innocence
Persuades, when speaking fails.
—Shakespeare.

Nothing at times is more expressive than silence.—George Eliot.

Do you think a woman's silence can be natural?—Farquhar.

Not every one who has the gift of speech understands the value of silence.—Lavater.

Silence often expresses more powerfully than speech the verdict and judgment of society.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

I shall leave the world without regret, for it hardly contains a single good listener.—Fontenelle.

Be silent, or say something better than silence.—Pythagoras.

Deep vengeance is the daughter of deep silence.—Alfieri.

The great silent man! Looking round on the noisy inanity of the world,—words with little meaning, actions with little worth,—one loves to reflect on the great Empire of Silence.—Carlyle.

O, my Antonio, I do know of these,
That therefore only are reputed wise,
For saying nothing.—Shakespeare.

It is always observable that silence propagates itself, and that the longer talk has been suspended the more difficult it is to find anything to say.—Johnson.

Let me silent be;
For silence is the speech of love,
The music of the spheres above.
—R. H. Stoddard.

That silence is one of the great arts of conversation is allowed by Cicero himself, who says there is not only an art, but an eloquence in it.—Hannah More.

Silence, the great Empire of Silence: higher than all stars; deeper than the Kingdom of Death! It alone is great; all else is small.—Carlyle.

It is better to remain silent than to speak the truth ill-humoredly, and spoil an excellent dish by covering it with bad sauce.—St. Francis de Sales.

A person that would secure to himself great deference will, perhaps, gain his point by silence as effectually as by anything he can say.—Shenstone.

Of every noble work the silent part is best,
Of all expression, that which cannot be expressed.
—W. W. Story.

It has been said with some meaning that if men would but rest in silence, they might always hear the music of the spheres.—Arthur Helps.

The people, doubtless, have the right to murmur, but they have also the right to be silent, and their silence is the lesson of kings.—Jean de Beauvais.

He who cannot withal keep his mind to himself cannot practice any considerable thing whatsoever.—Carlyle.

There is a silence which hath been no sound; there is a silence which no sound may be—in the cold grave.—Hood.

Silence is the safest response for all the contradiction that arises from impertinence, vulgarity, or envy.—Zimmermann.

If the prudence of reserve and decorum sometimes dictates silence, at others prudence of a higher order may justify speaking.—Burke.

When wit and reason both have fail'd to Kind looks and actions, (from success) do Ev'n silence may be eloquent in love.
—Congreve.

Silence is a trick when it imposes. Pedants and scholars, churchmen and physicians, abound in silent pride.—Zimmermann.

Silence never shows itself to so great an advantage as when it is made the reply to calumny and defamation, provided that we give no just occasion for them.—Addison.

Silence is one of the hardest kind of arguments to refute. There is no good substitute for wisdom; but silence is the best that has yet been discovered.—H. W. Shaw.

The deepest life of nature is silent and obscure; so often the elements that move and mould society are the results of the sister's counsel and the mother's prayer.—Chapin.

To be silent is sometimes an art, yet not so great a one as certain people would have us believe, who are wisest when they are most silent.—Wieland.

I think the first virtue is to restrain the tongue; he approaches nearest to the gods who knows how to be silent, even though he is in the right.—Cato.

A man's profundity may keep him from opening on a first interview, and his caution on a second; but I should suspect his emptiness, if he carried on his reserve to a third.—Colton.

God's poet is silence! His song is unspoken,
And yet so profound, so loud, and so far,
It fills you, it thrills you with measures unbroken,
And as soft, and as fair, and as far as a star.
—Joaquin Miller.

No one can take less pains than to hold his tongue. Hear much, and speak little; for the tongue is the instrument of the greatest good and greatest evil that is done in the world.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Striving to tell his woes, words would not come;
For light cares speak, when mighty griefs are dumb.
—Samuel Daniel.

What; gone without a word
Ay, so true love should do: it cannot speak;
For truth hath better deeds than words to grace it.
—Shakespeare.

Silence is the element in which great things fashion themselves together, that, at length, they may emerge, full-formed and majestic, into the daylight of life, which they are henceforth to rule.—Carlyle.

He knows not how to speak who cannot be silent; still less how to act with vigor and decision. Who hastens to the end is silent; loudness is impotence.—Lavater.

The more a man desirous to pass at a value above his worth can contrast, by dignified silence, the garrulity of trivial minds, the more the world will give him credit for the wealth which he does not possess.—Bulwer-Lytton.

I like better for one to say some foolish thing upon important matters than to be silent. That becomes the subject of discussion and dispute, and the truth is discovered.—Diderot.

Nature, which has given us one organ for speaking, has given us two for hearing, that we may learn that it is better to hear than to speak.—Nabi Effendi.

Silence! coeval with eternity! thou wert ere Nature's self began to be; thine was the sway ere heaven was formed on earth, ere fruitful thought conceived creation's birth.—Pope.

Well might the ancients make silence a god; for it is the element of all godhood, infinitude, or transcendental greatness,—at once the source and the ocean wherein all such begins and ends.—Carlyle.

There are moments when silence, prolonged and unbroken, More expressive may be than all words ever spoken.

It is when the heart has an instinct of what in the heart of another is passing.

—Owen Meredith.

True silence is the rest of the mind, and is to the spirit what sleep is to the body, nourishment and refreshment. It is a great virtue: it covers folly, keeps secrets, avoids disputes, and prevents sin.—William Penn.

Of all our loving Father's gifts,
I often wonder which is best,—
And cry: Dear God, the one that lifts
Our soul from weariness to rest,
The rest of Silence,—that is best.

—Mary Clemmer.

Down through the starry intervals,
Upon this weary-laden world,
How soft the soul of Silence falls!
How deep the spell wherewith she thralls,
How wide her mantle is unfurled.

—Mary Clemmer.

There is a silence, the child of love, which expresses everything, and proclaims more loudly than the tongue is able to do; there are movements that are involuntary proofs of what the soul feels.—Alfieri.

It is better either to be silent, or to say things of more value than silence. Sooner throw a pearl at hazard than an idle or useless word; and do not say a little in many words, but a great deal in a few.—Pythagoras.

Speech is often barren; but silence also does not necessarily brood over a full nest. Your still fowl, blinking at you without remark, may all the while be sitting on one addled nest-egg; and when it takes to cackling, will have nothing to announce but that addled delusion.—George Eliot.

Silence! Oh, well are Death and Sleep and Thou Three brethren named, the guardians gloomy-winged,
Of one abyss, where life and truth and joy
Are swallowed up. —Shelley.

When a woman has the gift of silence she possesses a quality above the vulgar. It is a gift of Heaven seldom bestowed; without a little miracle it cannot be accomplished; and Nature suffers violence when Heaven puts a woman in the humor of observing silence.—Corneille.

They are the strong ones of the earth, the mighty food for good or evil,—those who know how to keep silence when it is a pain and a grief to them; those who give time to their own souls to wax strong against temptation, or to the powers of wrath to stamp upon them their withering passage.—Emerson.

Silence is one of the great arts of conversation, as allowed by Cicero himself, who says "there is not only an art, but an eloquence in it"; and this opinion is confirmed by a great modern, Lord Bacon. For a well-bred woman may easily and effectually promote the most useful and elegant conversation without speaking a word. The modes of speech are scarcely more variable than the modes of silence.—Blair.

Euripides was wont to say, silence was an answer to a wise man; but we seem to have greater occasion for it in our dealing with fools and unreasonable persons; for men of breeding and sense will be satisfied with reason and fair words.—Plutarch.

Simile

A good simile,—as concise as a king's declaration of love.—Sterne.

A good smile is the sunshine of wisdom.—Hosea Ballou.

Simplicity

Simplicity is the great friend of Nature.—Sterne.

Simplicity is a jewel rarely found.—Ovid.

Simplicity is a delicate imposition.—Rochefoucauld.

The expression of truth is simplicity.—Seneca.

Simplicity is oftentimes an adroit pretence.—Mme. de Lambert.

There is a majesty in simplicity.—Pope.

The greatest truths are the simplest. Hosea Ballou.

Plain living and high thinking.—Wordsworth.

Affected simplicity is refined imposture.—Rochefoucauld.

We have exchanged the Washingtonian dignity for the Jeffersonian simplicity.—Bishop Potter.

There is a majesty in simplicity which is far above the quantities of wit.—Pope.

Simplicity, of all things, is the hardest to be copied.—Steele.

Generally nature hangs out a sign of simplicity in the face of a fool.—Fuller.

Nothing is more simple than greatness; indeed, to be simple is to be great.—Emerson.

There is one show of breeding vulgarity seldom assumes,—simplicity.—George MacDonald.

Simplicity is an exact medium between too little and too much.—Sir Joshua Reynolds.

The feeling heart, simplicity of life and elegance and taste.—Thomson.

Upright simplicity is the deepest wisdom, and perverse craft the merest shallowness.—Barrow.

The greatest truths are the simplest; and so are the greatest men.—Hare.

The fewer our wants, the nearer we resemble the gods.—Socrates.

There are certain occasions when, in art, simplicity is an audacious originality.—Achilles Poincelot.

Never anything can be amiss when simpleness and duty tender it.—Shakespeare.

In character, in manners, in style, in all things, the supreme excellence is simplicity.—Longfellow.

Whose nature is so far from doing harm, That he suspects none.—Shakespeare.

An honest tale speeds best, being plainly told.—Shakespeare.

The simple-hearted and sincere never do more than half deceive themselves.—Joubert.

To me more dear, congenial to my heart, one native charm, than all the gloss of art.—Goldsmith.

Simplicity of character is the natural result of profound thought.—Hazlitt.

How many undervalue the power of simplicity! But it is the real key to the heart.—Wordsworth.

Simplicity is a captivating grace in woman, as rare as it is attractive.—De Finod.

Simplicity is that grace which frees the soul from all unnecessary reflections upon itself.—Fénelon.

Genuine simplicity of heart is a healing and cementing principle.—Burke.

True elegance becomes the more so as it approaches simplicity.—Beecher.

Simplicity is Nature's first step, and the last of Art.—P. J. Bailey.

Nothing so truly becomes feminine beauty as simplicity.—Mme. Deluzy.

The mother of good spirits and companion of repose!—Nicolas Fontaine.

When a thought is too weak to be simply expressed, it is a clear proof that it should be rejected.—Vauvenargues.

Simplicity is the great friend to nature, and if I would be proud of anything in this silly world, it should be of this honest alliance.—Sterne.

How desirable is this simplicity! who will give it to me? I will quit all else; it is the pearl of great price.—Fénelon.

The true friend of truth and good loves them under all forms, but he loves them most under the most simple form.—Lavater.

A childlike mind in its simplicity practises that science of good to which the wise may be blind.—Schiller.

He alone is a man who can resist the genius of the age, the tone of fashion, with vigorous simplicity and modest courage.—Lavater.

Be simple and modest in your deportment, and treat with indifference whatever lies between virtue and vice.—Marcus Antoninus.

If you wish to be like a little child, study what a little child could understand,—Nature; and do what a little child could do,—love.—Charles Kingsley.

Her head was bare:

But for her native ornament of hair;
Which in a simple knot was tied above,
Sweet negligence, unheeded bait of love!
—Ovid.

It is far more difficult to be simple than to be complicated; far more difficult to sacrifice skill and cease exertion in the proper place, than to expend both indiscriminately.—Ruskin.

The fairest lives, in my opinion, are those which regularly accommodate themselves to the common and human model, without miracle, without extravagance.—Montaigne.

Albert Durer, the famous painter, used to say he had no pleasure in pictures that were painted with many colors, but in those which were painted with a choice simplicity. So it is with me as to sermons.—Luther.

Purity and simplicity are the two wings with which man soars above the earth and all temporary nature. Simplicity is in the intention, purity in the affection; simplicity turns to God; purity unites with and enjoys him.—Thomas à Kempis.

When a man is made up wholly of the dove, without the least grain of the serpent in his composition, he becomes ridiculous in many circumstances of life, and very often discredits his best actions.—Addison.

The farther we advance in knowledge, the more simplicity shall we discover in those primary rules that regulate all the apparently endless, complicated, and multifarious operations of the Godhead.—Colton.

The world could not exist if it were not simple. This ground has been tilled a thousand years, yet its powers remain ever the same; a little rain, a little sun, and each spring it grows green again.—Goethe.

If thou hadst simplicity and purity, thou wouldst be able to comprehend all things without error, and behold them without danger. The pure heart safely pervades not only heaven, but hell.—Thomas à Kempis.

The best painters, as they progress in reputation and towards perfection, are found to dispense more and more with the technique of the art, for simpler methods. Simplicity never fails to charm.—Balzac.

Simplicity is the law of Nature for man as well as for flowers. When the tapestry (corolla) of the nuptial bed (calyx) is excessive, luxuriant, it is unproductive. The fertile flowers are single, not double.—Thoreau.

I am convinced, both by faith and experience, that to maintain one's self on this earth is not a hardship but a pastime, if we will live simply and wisely; as the pursuits of the simpler nations are still the sports of the more artificial.—Thoreau.

Simplicity is the character of the spring of life, costliness becomes its autumn; but a neatness and purity, like that of the snow-drop or lily of the valley, is the peculiar fascination of beauty, to which it lends enchantment, and gives what amiability is to the mind.—Longfellow.

Simplicity is doubtless a fine thing, but it often appeals only to the simple. Art is the only passion of true artists. Palestrina's music resembles the music of Rossini, as the song of the sparrow is like the cavatina of the nightingale. Choose!—Mme. de Girardin.

The most agreeable of all companions is a simple, frank man, without any high pretensions to an oppressive greatness,—one who loves life, and understands the use of it; obliging alike at all hours; above all, of a golden temper, and steadfast as an anchor. For such an one we gladly exchange the greatest genius, the most brilliant wit, the profoundest thinker.—Lessing.

Simplicity is the straightforwardness of a soul which refuses itself any reaction with regard to itself or its deeds. This virtue differs from and surpasses sincerity. We see many people who are sincere without being simple. They do not wish to be taken for other than what they are; but they are always fearing lest they should be taken for what they are not.—Fénelon.

Sin

Sin is essentially a departure from God.—Luther.

Sin is disease, deformity, and weakness.—Plato.

It is not the back, but the heart, that must bleed for sin.—South.

Death from sin no power can separate.—Milton.

'Sin is a state of mind, not an outward act.—Sewell.

Sin will pluck on sin.—Shakespeare.

Sin and her shadow, death.—Milton.

Sin let loose speaks punishment at hand.—Cowper.

To step aside is human!—Burns.

Sin is ashamed of sin.—Chapman.

Every man has his devilish minutes.—Lavater.

So many laws argue so many sins.—Milton.

Pain is the outcome of sin.—Buddha.

Some sins do bear their privilege on earth.—Shakespeare.

Age whitens hairs, but not sin.—J. Petit-Senn.

'T is the will that makes the action good or ill.—Herrick.

Every sin provokes its punishment.—A. Bronson Alcott.

Fears of sinning let in thoughts of sin.—Crabbe.

And love the sin for the dear sinner's sake.—Juvenal.

Few love to hear the sins they love to act.—Shakespeare.

But the trail of the serpent is over them all.—Moore.

Secret sins commonly lie nearest the heart.—Thomas Brooks.

Pride and conceit were the original sin of man.—Le Sage.

Nothing emboldens sin so much as mercy.—Shakespeare.

Sin is free, or you cannot make sin at of it.—Joseph Cook.

Cut off even in the blossoms of my sin.—Shakespeare.

O sin, what hast thou done to this fair earth!—Dana.

Sin writes histories; goodness is silent.—Goethe.

Sin, every day, takes out a patent for some new invention.—E. P. Whipple.

Poverty and wealth are comparative sins.—Victor Hugo.

There is the seed of all sins—of the vilest and worst of sins—in the best of men.—Thomas Brooks.

Nature has no promise for society, least of all, any remedy for sin.—Horace Bushnell.

O, 'tis the cunning livery of hell,
The damned'st body to invest and cover
In princely guards. —Shakespeare.

God hath yoked to guilt her pale tormentor, misery.—Bryant.

Sin is the only thing in the world which never had an infancy, that knew no minority.—South.

Where is the thief who cannot find bad when he hunts for it?—St. Augustine.

Vice is attended with temporary felicity, piety with eternal joy.—Bayard.

He that hath slight thoughts of sin never had great thoughts of God.—Rev. Dr. Owen.

Other men's sins are before our eyes, our own are behind our back.—Seneca.

Sin hath broke the world's sweet peace—
unstrung
Th' harmonious chords to which the angels sung. —Dana.

I could not live in peace if I put the shadow of a wilful sin between myself and God.—George Elliot.

Sin may be clasped so close, we cannot see its face.—Trench.

The greater part of mankind are angry with the sinner and not with the sin.—Seneca.

I am a man
More sinned against than sinning.
—Shakespeare.

O, what authority and show of truth
Can cunning sin cover itself withal!
—Shakespeare.

Suffer anything from man, rather than sin against God.—Sir Henry Vane.

See sin in state, majestically drunk;
Proud as a peeress, prouder as a punk.
—Pope.

How shall I lose the sin yet keep the sense,
And love th' offender, yet detest the offence?
—Pope.

In Adam's fall—
We sinned all.
—From the New England Primer.

Law can discover sin, but not remove,
Save by those shadowy expiations weak.
—Milton.

Every sin deserveth God's wrath and curse, both in this life and that which is to come.—Westminster Catechism.

Be not familiar with the idea of wrong, for sin in fancy mothers many an ugly fact.—Theodore Parker.

How immense appear to us the sins that we have not committed!—Madame Necker.

There are sins of omission as well as those of commission.—Mme. Deluzy.

Sin is not taken out of man, as Eve was out of Adam, by putting him to sleep.—Wendell Phillips.

It is not alone what we do, but also what we do not do, for which we are accountable.—Molière.

Where lives the man that hath not tried how mirth can into folly glide, and folly into sin?—Sir Walter Scott

A great sin is a course of wickedness abridged into one act.—South.

Angels for the good man's sin wept to record, and blushed to give it in.—Campbell.

Sin is the fruitful parent of distempers, and ill lives occasion good physicians.—South.

He is no man on whom perfections wait, That, knowing sin within, will touch the gate. —Shakespeare.

Yes, every sin is a mistake, and the epitaph for the sinner is, "Thou fool." —Alexander Maclaren.

He that avoideth not small faults, by little and little falleth into greater. —Thomas à Kempis.

Besides the guilt of sin and the power of sin, there is the stain of sin. —Nathaniel Culverwell.

O, what authority and show of truth can cunning sin cover itself withal! —Shakespeare.

A man does not necessarily sin who does that which our reason and our conscience condemn.—J. G. Holland.

Drudgery and knowledge are of a kin, And both descended from one parent sin. —Butler.

Let guilty men remember their black deeds do lean on crutches made of slender reeds.—John Webster.

If we desire to judge justly, we must persuade ourselves that none of us is without sin.—Seneca.

It is the sin which we have not committed which seems the most monstrous.—Boileau.

The knowledge of my sin
Is half-repentance.
—Bayard Taylor.

There is no harder work in the world than sin.—South.

I have learned what a sin is against an infinite imperishable being, such as is the soul of man.—Coleridge.

Sin spoils the spirit's delicacy, and unwillingness deadens its susceptibility. —Charles H. Parkhurst.

The fact is that sin is the most unmanly thing in God's world. You never were made for sin and selfishness. You were made for love and obedience.—J. G. Holland.

Some rise by sin, and some by virtue fall;
Some run from breaks of ice, and answer none;
And some condemned for a fault alone. —Shakespeare.

Our sins, like to our shadows when our day is in its glory, scarce appeared; towards our evening how great and monstrous they are! —Suckling.

My sin is the black spot which my bad act makes, seen against the disk of the Sun of Righteousness. Hence religion and sin come and go together. —Charles H. Parkhurst.

As sins proceed they ever multiply, and like figures in arithmetic, the last stands for more than all that went before it.—Sir Thomas Browne.

Evil courses can yield pleasure no longer than while thought and reflection can be kept off.—Richardson.

Foul deeds will rise,
Though all the earth o'erwhelm them, to men's eyes. —Shakespeare.

Men scanning the surface count the wicked happy; they see not the frightful dreams that crowd a bad man's pillow.—Tupper.

Sin is never at a stay; if we do not retreat from it, we shall advance in it; and the farther on we go, the more we have to come back.—Barrow.

Not only commission makes a sin. A man is guilty of all those sins he hateth not. If I cannot avoid all, yet I will hate all.—Bishop Hall.

If we did not first take great pains to corrupt our nature, our nature would never corrupt us.—Clarendon.

There is a vast difference between sins of infirmity and those of presumption.

tion, as vast as between inadvertency and deliberation.—South.

Sin is the insurrection and rebellion of the heart against God; it turns from Him, and turns against Him; it takes up arms against God.—Richard Alleine.

No sin is small. It is a sin against an infinite God, and may have consequences immeasurable. No grain of sand is small in the mechanism of a watch.—Jeremy Taylor.

I learn the depth to which I have sunk from the length of the chain let down to up-draw me. I ascertain the mightiness of the ruin by examining the machinery for restoration.—Henry Melvill.

There is no immunity from the consequences of sin; punishment is swift and sure to one and all.—Hosea Balou.

Cast out thy Jonah—every sleeping and secure sin that brings a tempest upon thy ship, vexation to thy spirit.—Reynolds.

He who has it in his power to commit sin, is less inclined to do so. The very idea of being able, weakens the desire.—Ovid.

We are all sinful. Therefore whatever we blame in another we shall find in our own bosoms.—Seneca.

A man cannot practise sin and be a good citizen. Burke says very truly: "Whatever disunites man from God disunites man from man."—Chapin.

If ye do well, to your own behoof will ye do it; and if ye do evil, against yourselves will ye do it.—Koran.

When thou art preparing to commit a sin, think not that thou wilt conceal it; there is a God that forbids crimes to be hidden.—Tibullus.

God made sin possible just as he made all lying wonders possible, but he never made it a fact, never set anything in his plan to harmonize with it. Therefore it enters the world as a forbidden fact against everything that God has ordained.—Horace Bushnell.

Confess thee freely of thy sin; for to deny each article with oath, cannot remove nor choke the strong conception that I do groan withal.—Shakespeare.

Never let any man imagine that he can pursue a good end by evil means, without sinning against his own soul! Any other issue is doubtful; the evil effect on himself is certain.—Southey.

Sin is dark and loves the dark, still hides from itself in gloom, and in the darkest hell is still itself the darkest hell and the severest woe.—Pollok.

The wicked are wicked, no doubt, and they go astray and they fall, and they come by their deserts; but who can tell the mischief which the very virtuous do?—Thackeray.

Thou wilt not chronicle our sand-like sins; For sin is small, and mean, and barren.

Good

Only is great, and generous, and fruitful. Number the mountains, not the sands, O God!

—Bailey.

Earnest toil and strong endeavour

Of a spirit which within

Wrestles with familiar evil

And besetting sin. —Whittier.

Know'st thou not all germs of evil

In thy heart await their time?

Not thyself, but God's restraining,

Stays their growth of crime.

—Whittier.

Think not for wrongs like these uncourged to live;

Long may ye sin, and long may Heaven forgive;

But when ye least expect, in sorrow's day, Vengeance shall fall more heavy for delay.

—Churchill.

Anger and just rebuke, and judgment given,

That brought into this world a world of woe,

Sin and her shadow Death, and Misery,

Death's harbinger. —Milton.

Let him that sows the serpent's teeth not hope to reap a joyous harvest. Every crime has, in the moment of its perpetration, its own avenging angel,—dark misgivings at the inmost heart.—Schiller.

Man-like is it to fall into sin,
Fiend-like is it to dwell therein,
Christ-like is it for sin to grieve,
God-like is it all sin to leave.
—Friedrich von Logau.

Come, now again, thy woes impart,
Tell all thy sorrows, all thy sin;
We cannot heal the throbbing heart Till we discern the wounds within.
—Crabbe.

The sin that now rises to memory as your bosom sin, let this first of all be withstood and mastered. Oppose it instantly by a detestation of it, by a firm will to conquer it, by reflection, by reason, and by prayer.—W. E. Channing.

Every single gross act of sin is much the same thing to the conscience that a great blow or fall is to the head; it stuns and bereaves it of all use of its senses for a time.—South.

Although a man has so well purged his mind that nothing can trouble or deceive him any more, yet he reached his present innocence through sin.—Seneca.

I am in process of bringing all my sins to light for the purpose of getting rid of them. We never know how rich we are until we break up house-keeping!—Hénault.

No man can be stark naught at once. Let us stop the progress of sin in our soul at the first stage, for the farther it goes the faster it will increase.—Fuller.

There are some sins which are more justly to be deominated surprises than infidelities. To such the world should be lenient, as, doubtless, Heaven is forgiving.—Massillon.

It should console us for the fact that sin has not totally disappeared from the world, that the saints are not wholly deprived of employment.—Simms.

He that falls into sin is a man, that grieves at it is a saint, that boasteth of it is a devil; yet some glory in that shame, counting the stains of sin the best complexion of their souls.—Fuller.

If thou wouldst conquer thy weakness, thou must never gratify it. No man is compelled to evil: his consent only makes it his. It is no sin to be tempted, but to be overcome.—William Penn.

It is the goodly outside that sin puts on which tempteth to destruction. It has been said that sin is like the bee, with honey in its mouth, but a sting in its tail.—Hosea Ballou.

A sturdy, hardened sinner shall advance to the utmost pitch of impiety, with less reluctance than he took the first step while his conscience was yet vigilant and tender.—Atterbury.

The greatest penalty of evil-doing is to grow into the likeness of bad men, and, growing like them, to fly from the conversation of the good, and be cut off from them, and cleave to and follow after the company of the bad.—Plato.

The whole sum and substance of human history may be reduced to this maxim: that when man departs from the divine means of reaching the divine end, he suffers harm and loss.—Theodore Parker.

They say sin touches not a man so near As shame a woman; yet he too should be Part of the penance, being more deep than she Set in the sin. —Swinburne.

Though some of you with Pilate wash your hands
Showing an outward pity; yet you Pilates
Have here deliver'd me to my sour cross,
And water cannot wash away your sin.
—Shakespeare.

Sin first is pleasing, then it grows easy, then delightful, then frequent, then habitual, then confirmed; then the man is impenitent, then he is obstinate, then he is resolved never to repent, and then he is ruined.—Leighton.

Many afflictions will not cloud and obstruct peace of mind so much as one sin: therefore, if you would walk cheerfully, be most careful to walk holly. All the winds about the earth make not an earthquake, but only that within.—Archbishop Leighton.

Were the visage of sin seen at a full light, undressed and unpainted, it were impossible, while it so appeared, that any one soul could be in love with it, but would rather flee from it as hideous and abominable.—Leighton.

Robes and furr'd gowns hide all. Plate sin with gold,
And the strong lance of justice hurtless breaks;
Arm it in rags, a pigmy's straw doth pierce it.
—Shakespeare.

Remember that every guilty compliance with the humors of the world, every sinful indulgence of our own passions, is laying up cares and fears for the hour of darkness; and that the remembrance of ill-spent time will strew our sick-bed with thorns, and rack our sinking spirits with despair.
—Bishop Heber.

St. Augustine used to say that, but for God's grace, he should have been capable of committing any crime; and it is when we feel this sincerely, that we are most likely to be really improving, and best able to give assistance to others without moral loss to ourselves.—H. P. Liddon.

'Tis fearful building upon any sin;
One mischief enter'd, brings another in:
The second pulls a third, the third draws more.
And they for all the rest set ope the door:
Till custom take away the judging sense,
That to offend we think it no offence.
—Smith.

Of all the ingenious mistakes into which erring man has fallen, perhaps none have been so pernicious in their consequences, or have brought so many evils into the world, as the popular opinion that the way of the transgressor is pleasant and easy.—Hosea Ballou.

O sin, how you paint your face! how you flatter us poor mortals on to death! You never appear to the sinner in your true character; you make fair promises, but you never fulfil one; your tongue is smother than oil, but the poison of asps is under your lip!

—Hosea Ballou.

Some voluntary castaways there will always be, whom no fostering kindness and no parental care can preserve from self-destruction; but if any are lost for want of care and culture, there is a sin of omission in the society to which they belong.—Southey.

An Italian proverb says, "In men every mortal sin is venial; in woman every venial sin is mortal." And a German axiom, that "There are only two good women in the world: one of them is dead, and the other is not to be found."—G. A. Sala.

A few sensual and voluptuous persons may for a season eclipse this native light of the soul, but can never so wholly smother and extinguish it but that, at some lucid intervals, it will recover itself again, and shine forth to the conviction of their conscience.—Bentley.

Sin is a basilisk whose eyes are full of venom. If the eye of thy soul see her first, it reflects her own poison and kills her; if she see thy soul, unseen, or seen too late, with her poison, she kills thee: since therefore thou canst not escape thy sin, let not thy sin escape thy observation.—Quarles.

Take steadily some one sin, which seems to stand out before thee, to root it out, by God's grace, and every fibre of it. Purpose strongly, by the grace and strength of God, wholly to sacrifice this sin or sinful inclination to the love of God, to spare it not, until thou leave of it none remaining, neither root nor branch.—E. B. Pusey.

Every man has a paradise around him until he sins, and the angel of an accusing conscience drives him from his Eden. And even then there are holy hours, when this angel sleeps, and man comes back, and with the innocent eyes of a child looks into his lost paradise again.—Longfellow.

You cannot stay the shell in its flight; after it has left the mortar, it goes on to its mark, and there explodes, dealing destruction all around. Just as little can you stay the consequences of a sin after it has been committed. You may repent of it, you may even be forgiven for it, but still it goes on its deadly and desolating way. It has passed entirely beyond your reach; once done, it cannot be undone.—Wm. M. Taylor.

Her rash hand in evil hour Forth reaching to the fruit, she pluck'd,
she eat;
Earth felt the wound, and Nature from her seat
Sighing through all her works gave signs
of woe
That all was lost. —Milton.

Use sin as it will use you; spare it not, for it will not spare you; it is your murderer, and the murderer of the whole world. Use it, therefore, as a murderer should be used; kill it before it kills you; and though it brings you to the grave, as it did your head, it shall not be able to keep you there. You love not death; love not the cause of death.—Baxter.

From love of grace,
Lay not that flatt'ring unction to your soul,
That not your trespass, but my madness speaks:
It will but skin and film the ulc'rous place;
Whilst rank corruption, mining all within,
Infects unseen; confess yourself to heav'n;
Repent what's past, avoid what is to come;
And do not spread the compost on the weeds
To make them ranker. —Shakespeare.

O the dangerous siege
Sin lays about us! And the tyranny
He exercises when he hath expung'd,
Like to the horror of a winter's thunder,
Mix'd with a gushing storm; that suffers nothing
To stir abroad on earth, but their own rages,
Is sin, when it hath gather'd head above
us:
No roof, no shelter can secure us so,
But he will drown our cheeks in fear or woe. —Chapman.

Sin! Sin! Thou art a hateful and horrible thing, that abominable thing which God hates. And what wonder? Thou hast insulted His holy majesty; thou hast bereaved Him of beloved children; thou hast crucified the Son of His infinite love; thou hast vexed His gracious Spirit; thou hast defied

His power; thou hast despised His grace; and in the body and blood of Jesus, as if that were a common thing, thou hast trodden under foot His matchless mercy. Surely, brethren, the wonder of wonders is, that sin is not that abominable thing which we also hate.—Thomas Guthrie.

We are saved from nothing if we are not saved from sin. Little sins are pioneers of hell. The backslider begins with what he foolishly considers trifling with little sins. There are no little sins. There was a time when all the evil that has existed in the world was comprehended in one sinful thought of our first parent; and all the now evil is the numerous and horrid progeny of one little sin.—Howell.

Sincerity

Private sincerity is a public welfare.—Bartol.

Sincerity is the most compendious wisdom.—Chesterfield.

Weak persons cannot be sincere.—Rochefoucauld.

Sincerity is religion personified.—Chapin.

Faithfulness and sincerity first of all.—Confucius.

Her words are trusty heralds to her mind.—John Ford.

Sweet is true love, though given in vain.—Tennyson.

Loss of sincerity is loss of vital power.—Bovee.

Don't be "consistent." but be simply true.—Holmes.

Bashful sincerity and comely love.—Shakespeare.

Sincerity is the face of the soul, as dissimulation is the mask.—Sanial-Dubay.

There is no time so miserable but a man may be true.—Shakespeare.

To God, thy country, and thy friend be true.—Henry Vaughan.

A silent address is the genuine eloquence of sincerity.—Goldsmith.

Frank sincerity, though no invited guest, is free to all, and brings his welcome with him.—Havard.

Better is the wrong with sincerity, rather than the right with falsehood.—Tupper.

Sincerity is the way of heaven; to think how to be sincere is the way of man.—Mencius.

The only conclusive evidence of a man's sincerity is that he give himself for a principle.—Lowell.

Sincerity is impossible unless it pervade the whole being; and the pretence of it saps the very foundation of character.—Lowell.

The superior man * * * in regard to his speech * * * is anxious that it should be sincere.—Confucius.

There is no greater delight than to be conscious of sincerity on self-examination.—Mencius.

The true measure of life is not length, but honesty.—John Lyly.

Those who love with purity consider not the gift of the lover, but the love of the giver.—Thomas à Kempis.

Never apologize for showing feeling. My friend, remember that when you do so you apologize for truth.—Beaconsfield.

I should say sincerity, a deep, great, genuine sincerity, is the first characteristic of all men in any way heroic.—Carlyle.

Sincerity is the indispensable ground of all conscientiousness, and by consequence of all heartfelt religion.—Kant.

Let us then be what we are, and speak what we think, and in all things keep ourselves loyal to truth, and the sacred professions of friendship.—Longfellow.

It is with sincere affection or friendship as with ghosts and apparitions,—a thing that everybody talks of, and scarce any hath seen.—Rochefoucauld.

The more honesty a man has, the less he affects the air of a saint. The affectation of sanctity is a blotch on the face of piety.—Lavater.

Truth and fidelity are the pillars of the temple of the world; when these are broken, the fabric falls, and crushes all to pieces.—Owen Feltham.

He hath a heart as sound as a bell and his tongue is the clapper, for what his heart thinks his tongue speaks.—Shakespeare.

Men should be what they seem;
Or those that be not, would they might seem none! —Shakespeare.

Sincerity is to speak as we think, to do as we pretend and profess, to perform and make good what we promise, and really to be what we would seem and appear to be.—Tillotson.

I hope I shall always possess firmness and virtue enough to maintain, what I consider the most enviable of all titles, the character of an "honest man."—Washington.

I think you will find that people who honestly mean to be true really contradict themselves much more rarely than those who try to be "consistent."—Holmes.

Sincerity is an openness of heart; it is found in a very few people, and that which we see commonly is not it, but a subtle dissimulation, to gain the confidence of others.—Rochefoucauld.

An inward sincerity will of course influence the outward deportment; but where the one is wanting, there is great reason to suspect the absence of the other.—Sterne.

A silent, great soul; he was one of those who cannot but be in earnest;

whom Nature herself has appointed to be sincere.—Carlyle.

His nature is too noble for the world:
He would not flatter Neptune for his trident,
Or Jove for's power to thunder. His heart's his mouth;
What his breast forges that his tongue must vent. —Shakespeare.

He that does as well in private between God and his own soul as in public, hath given himself a testimony that his purposes are full of honesty, nobleness, and integrity.—Jeremy Taylor.

The whole faculties of man must be exerted in order to call forth noble energies; and he who is not earnestly sincere lives in but half his being, selfmutilated, self-paralyzed.—Coleridge.

If the show of any thing be good for any thing, I am sure sincerity is better; for why does any man dissemble, or seem to be that which he is not, but because he thinks it good to have such a quality as he pretends to?
—Tillotson.

Sincerity and honesty carry one through many difficulties which all the arts he can invent would never help him through.—Stillingleet.

The happy talent of pleasing either those above or below you seems to be wholly owing to the opinion they have of your sincerity * * * There need be no more said in honor of it than that it is what forces the approbation of your opponents.—Steele.

You know I say
Just what I think, and nothing more nor less,
And, when I pray, my heart is in my prayer.
I cannot say one thing and mean another:
If I can't pray, I will not make believe!
—Longfellow.

Let grace and goodness be the principal loadstone of thy affections; for love which hath ends will have an end, whereas that which is founded on true love will always continue.—Dryden.

The only conclusive evidence of a man's sincerity is that he gives himself for a principle. Words, money, all things else, are comparatively easy to give away; but when a man makes a gift of his daily life and practice, it is plain that the truth whatever it may be, has taken possession of him.—

Lowell.

Sincerity is the most compendious wisdom, an excellent instrument for the speedy despatch of business. It creates confidence in those we have to deal with, saves the labor of many inquiries, and brings things to an issue in few words.—Chesterfield.

He who is sincere hath the easiest task in the world, for, truth being always consistent with itself, he is put to no trouble about his words and actions; it is like traveling in a plain road, which is sure to bring you to your journey's end better than byways in which many lose themselves.
—Tillotson.

No man can produce great things who is not thoroughly sincere in dealing with himself, who would not exchange the finest show for the poorest reality, who does not so love his work that he is not only glad to give himself for it, but finds rather a gain than a sacrifice in the surrender.—Lowell.

Sincerity,
Thou first of virtues, let no mortal leave Thy onward path, although the earth should gape,
And from the gulf of hell destruction
rise,
To take dissimulation's winding way.
—Home.

Sincerity's my chief delight,
The darling pleasure of the mind;
O that I could to her invite,
All the whole race of human kind;
Take her, mortals, she's worth more Than all your glory, all your fame,
Than all your glittering boasted store,
Than all the things that you can name,
She'll with her bring a joy divine,
All that's good, and all that's fine.
—Lady Chudleigh.

Now the best way in the world to seem to be anything is really to be what we would seem to be. Besides that it is many times as troublesome to make good the pretence of a good quality as to have it, and if a man have it not it is ten to one but he is discovered to want it, and then all his pains and labor to seem to have it is lost.—Tillotson.

I remember a passage of one of Queen Elizabeth's great men, as advice to his friend. "The advantage," says he, "I had upon others at court was that I always spoke as I thought; which being not believed by them, I both preserved a good conscience, and suffered no damage from that freedom"; which, as it shows the vice to be older than our times, so does it that gallant man's integrity to be the best way of avoiding it.—William Penn.

Singers

He the sweetest of all singers.—Longfellow.

O! she will sing the savageness out of a bear.—Shakespeare.

His tongue is now a stringless instrument.—Shakespeare.

I do but sing because I must,
And pipe but as the linnets sing.
—Tennyson.

When God helps all the workers for His world,
The singers shall have help of Him, not last.
—Mrs. Browning.

For my voice, I have lost it with hollaing and singing of anthems.—Shakespeare.

Thou hast by moonlight at her window sung
With feigning voice verses of feigning love.
—Shakespeare.

But one Puritan amongst them, and he sings psalms to hornpipes.—Shakespeare.

Forever singing, as they shine,
The hand that made us is divine.
—Addison.

Sweetest the strain when in the song
The singer has been lost.
—Elizabeth Stuart Phelps.

So she poured out the liquid music of her voice to quench the thirst of his spirit.—Nath. Hawthorne.

I love a ballad but even too well; if it be doleful matter, merrily set down, or a very pleasant thing indeed, and sung lamentably.—Shakespeare.

Sang in tones of deep emotion,
Songs of love and songs of longing.
—Longfellow.

* * * Songs of that high art
Which, as winds do in the pine,
Find an answer in each heart.
—Longfellow.

I send my heart up to thee, all my heart
In this my singing!
For the stars help me, and the sea bear part.
—Robert Browning.

Singing has nothing to do with the affairs of this world: it is not for the law. Singers are merry, and free from sorrows and cares.—Martin Luther.

Or bid the soul of Orpheus sing
Such notes as, warbled to the string,
Drew iron tears down Pluto's cheek.
—Milton.

God sent His Singers upon earth
With songs of sadness and of mirth,
That they might touch the hearts of men,
And bring them back to Heaven again.
—Longfellow.

Olympian bards who sung
Divine ideas below,
Which always find us young
And always keep us so.
—Emerson.

At every close she made, th' attending throng
Replied, and bore the burden of the song:
So just, so small, yet in so sweet a note,
It seem'd the music melted in the throat.
—Dryden.

Three merry boys, and three merry boys,
And three merry boys are we,
As ever did sing in a hempen string
Under the gallow-tree.
—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Above the clouds I lift my wing
To hear the bells of Heaven ring;
Some of their music, though my flights be wild,
To Earth I bring;
Then let me soar and sing!
—E. C. Stedman.

Among all the instruments which sound in Haydn's child's concerts, that best serves the purposes of educational music which is born with the performer,—the voice. In the childhood of nations speaking was singing.

—Richter.

Sing, seraph with the glory! heaven is high.
Sing, poet with the sorrow! earth is low.
The universe's inward voices cry
"Amen" to either song of joy and woe.
Sing, seraph, poet! sing on equally!
—Mrs. Browning.

Sing again, with your dear voice revealing
A tone
Of some world far from ours,
Where music and moonlight and feeling
Are one. —Shelley.

Every night he comes
With musics of all sorts and songs compos'd
To her unworthiness: it nothing steads us
To chide him from our eaves; for he persists
As if his life lay on't. —Shakespeare.

But would you sing, and rival Orpheus' strain.
The wond'ring forests soon should dance again;
The moving mountains hear the powerful call.
And headlong streams hang listening in their fall!
—Pope.

The tenor's voice is spoilt by affectation,
And for the bass, the beast can only bel-
low;
In fact, he had no singing education,
An ignorant, noteless, timeless, tuneless fellow;
But being the prima donna's near relation,
Who swore his voice was very rich and mellow,
They hired him, though to hear him you'd believe
An ass was practicing recitative.
—Byron.

O Carril, raise again thy voice! let me hear the song of Selma, which was sung in my halls of joy, when Fingal, king of shields, was there, and glowed at the deeds of his fathers.—Ossian.

Singularity

No two on earth in all things can agree;
All have some darling singularity:
Women and men, as well as girls and boys,
In gewgaws take delight, and sigh for toys,
Your sceptres and your crowns, and such like things,
Are but a better kind of toys for kings.
In things indifferent reason bids us choose,
Whether the whim's a monkey or a muse.
—Churchill.

He who would be singular in his apparel had need have something superlative to balance that affectation.—Feltham.

Let those who would affect singularity with success first determine to be very virtuous, and they will be sure to be very singular.—Colton.

Skull

Where be your gibes now? your gambols? your songs? your flashes of merriment that were wont to set the table on a roar?—Shakespeare.

Look on its broken arch, its ruined wall,
Its chambers desolate, its portals foul;
Yes, this was once ambition's airy hall,
The dome of thought, the palace of the soul.
—Byron.

Thou hollow skull! what meanings lurk
Beneath that grin? 'tis but to say
Thy brain like mine was once at work
With thoughts that led thee far astray:
Longing for truth, you sought the day's clear light,
But miserably stray'd in gloom and night.
—Goethe.

O empty vault of former glory!
Where'er thou wert in time of old,
Thy surface tells thy living story
Though now so hollow, dead, and cold:
For in thy form is yet descried
The traces left of young desire;
The painter's art, the statesman's pride,
The muse's song, the poet's fire;
But these, forsooth, now seem to be Mere lumps on thy periphery.
—Dr. Forster.

These various organs show the place
Where friendship lov'd, where passion glow'd,
Where veneration grew in grace,
Where justice sway'd, where man was proud—Whence wit its slippery sallies threw
On vanity, thereby defeated;
Where hope's imaginary view
Of things to come (fond fool) is seated;
Where circumspection made us fear,
'Mid gleams of joy some danger near.
—Dr. Forster.

Sky

The starry cope of heaven.—Milton.

The silence that is in the starry sky.—Wordsworth.

Green calm below, blue quietness above.—Whittier.

The sky is full of tokens which speak to the intelligent.—Hugh Miller.

This majestic roof, fretted with golden fire.—Shakespeare.

To understand that the sky is everywhere blue, we need not go round the world.—Goethe.

How bravely autumn paints upon the sky the gorgeous fame of summer which is fled!—Hood.

The heavens are nobly eloquent of the Deity, and the most magnificent heralds of their Maker's praise.—James Hervey.

That golden sky, which was the doubly blessed symbol of advancing day and of approaching rest.—George Eliot.

And they were canopied by the blue sky, so cloudless, clear, and purely beautiful, that God alone was to be seen in heaven.—Byron.

The soft blue sky did never melt
Into his heart; he never felt
The witching of the soft blue sky!
—Wordsworth.

The mountain at a given distance
In amber lies;
Approached, the amber flits a little,—
And that's the skies!
—Emily Dickinson.

Sometimes gentle, sometimes capricious, sometimes awful, never the same for two minutes together: almost human in its passions, almost spiritual in its tenderness, almost divine in its infinity.—Ruskin.

When I look into the blue sky, it seems so deep, so peaceful, so full of a mysterious tenderness, that I could lie for centuries, and wait for the dawning of the face of God out of the awful loving-kindness.—George MacDonald.

Heaven's ebon vault,
Studded with stars unutterably bright,
Through which the moon's unclouded grandeur rolls,
Seems like a canopy which love has spread
To curtain her sleeping world.
—Shelley.

The starry heaven, though it occurs so very frequently to our view, never fails to excite an idea of grandeur.

This cannot be owing to anything in the stars themselves, separately considered. The number is certainly the cause. The apparent disorder augments the grandeur; for the appearance of care is highly contrary to our ideas of magnificence. Besides, the stars lie in such apparent confusion as makes it impossible, on ordinary occasions, to reckon them. This gives them the advantage of a sort of infinity.—Burke.

The moon has set
In a bank of jet
That fringes the Western sky,
The pleiads seven
Have sunk from heaven
And the midnight hurries by;
My hopes are flown
And alas! alone
On my weary couch I lie. —Sappho.

Sky is the part of creation in which Nature has done more for the sake of pleasing man, more for the sole and evident purpose of talking to him and teaching him, than in any other of her works, and it is just the part in which we least attend to her.—Ruskin.

Slander

Slander is the solace of malignity.
—Joubert.

On Rumor's tongue continual slanders ride.—Shakespeare.

Speak not evil one of another, brethren.—Bible.

Slander is the balm of malignity.—Chamfort.

There is no protection against slander.—Molière.

Cut men's throats with whisperings.—Ben Jonson.

Done to death by slanderous tongues.—Shakespeare.

No sword bites so fiercely as an evil tongue.—Sir P. Sidney.

I hate the man who builds his name
On ruins of another's fame. —Gay.

Read not my blemishes in the world's report.—Shakespeare.

A generous heart repairs a slanderous tongue.—Homer.

Slander is a complication, a comp^{ri}sal and sum of all wickedness.—Barrow.

Never throw mud. You may miss your mark, but you must have dirty hands.—Joseph Parker.

Soft-buzzing Slander; silly moths that eat
An honest name. —Thomson.

The tongue of slander is too prompt with wanton malice to wound the stranger.—Æschylus.

They talk as they are wont, not as I merit; traduce by custom, as most dogs do bark.—Ben Jonson.

Thou wrong'st a gentleman who is as far from thy report as thou from honor.—Shakespeare.

Quick-circulating slanders mirth afford; and reputation bleeds in every word.—Churchill.

Slander lives upon succession, forever housed where it gets possession.—Shakespeare.

Calumny would soon starve and die of itself if nobody took it in and gave it lodging.—Leighton.

Slander is the revenge of a coward, and dissimulation his defence.—Johnson.

There would not be so many open mouths if there were not so many open ears.—Bishop Hall.

Slander meets no regard from noble minds; only the base believe what the base only utter.—Beller.

If slander be a snake, it is a winged one. It flies as well as creeps.—Douglas Jerrold.

The slander of some people is as great a recommendation as the praise of others.—Fielding.

Slanderers do not hurt me, because they do not hit me.—Socrates.

Where it concerns himself, who is angry at a slander makes it true.—Ben Jonson.

There is no slander in an allowed fool, though he do nothing but rail.—Shakespeare.

He rams his quill with scandal and with scoff;
But 'tis so very foul, it won't go off.
—Young.

What have I done, that thou dar'st wag thy tongue
In noise so rude against me?
—Shakespeare.

Slander is a most serious evil; it implies two who do wrong, and one who is doubly wronged.—Herod.

Does not the law of Heaven say blood for blood?
And he who taints kills more than he who sheds it.
—Byron.

I am disgrac'd, impeach'd, and baffled here;
Pierc'd to the soul with slander's venom'd spear.
—Shakespeare.

One doth not know
How much an ill word may empoison liking.
—Shakespeare.

Those who murder fame
Kill more than life destroyers. —Savage.

'Twas slander filled her mouth with lying words;
Slander, the foulest whelp of Sin.
—Pollok.

A slander is like a hornet; if you cannot kill it dead the first blow, better not strike at it.—H. W. Shaw.

All slander must still be strangled in its birth, or time will soon conspire to make it strong enough to overcome the truth.—Sir W. Davenant.

When will talkers refrain from evil-speaking? When listeners refrain from evil-hearing.—Hare.

Have patience awhile; slanders are not long-lived. Truth is the child of Time; ere long she shall appear to vindicate thee.—Kant.

Slander, whose whisper over the world's diameter, as level as the cannon to its blank, transports his poisoned shot.—Shakespeare.

The proper way to check slander is to despise it; attempt to overtake and refute it, and it will outrun you.—Alex. Dumas.

The best way is to slander Valentine with falsehood, cowardice, and poor descent,—three things that women highly hold in hate.—Shakespeare.

There is nobody so weak of invention that cannot make some little stories to villify his enemy.—Addison.

As by flattery a man opens his bosom to his mortal enemy; so by detraction and slander he shuts the same to his best friends.—South.

Slander is a vice that strikes a double blow, wounding both him that commits and him against whom it is committed.—Saurin.

When the tongue of slander stings thee, let this be thy comfort,—they are not the worst fruits on which the wasps alight.—Bürger.

Remember, when incited to slander, that it is only he among you who is without sin that may cast the first stone.—Hosea Ballou.

The worthiest people are the most injured by slander, as we usually find that to be the best fruit which the birds have been pecking at.—Swift.

Set a watch over thy mouth, and keep the door of thy lips, for a tale-bearer is worse than a thief.—Bible.

Slander soaks into the mind as water into low and marshy places, where it becomes stagnant and offensive.—Confucius.

It is always to be understood, that a lady takes all you detract from the rest of her sex to be a gift to her.—Addison.

Enemies carry about slander, not in the form in which it took its rise. * * * The scandal of men is everlasting:

even then does it survive when you would suppose it to be dead.—Plautus.

Curse the tongue whence slanderous rumor, like the adder's drop, distills her venom, withering friendship's faith, turning love's favor.—James A. Hillhouse.

There are * * * robberies that leave man or woman forever beggared of peace and joy, yet kept secret by the sufferer.—George Eliot.

If I can do it
By aught that I can speak in his dispraise,
She shall not long continue love to him.
—Shakespeare.

It is a busy talking world,
That with licentious breath blows like the
wind
As freely on the palace, as the cottage.
—Rowe.

Slander, in the strict meaning of the term, comes under the head of lying; but it is a kind of lying which, like its antithesis flattery, ought to be set apart for special censure. —Washington Gladden.

What is slander? A verdict of "guilty" pronounced in the absence of the accused, with closed doors, without defense or appeal, by an interested and prejudiced judge.—Joseph Roux.

Slugs crawl and crawl over our cabages, like the world's slander over a good name. You may kill them, it is true; but there is the slime.—Douglas Jerrold.

Oh! many a shaft, at random sent,
Finds mark the archer little meant;
And many a word, at random spoken,
May soothe or wound a heart that's broken.
—Walter Scott.

In all cases of slander currency, whenever the forger of the lie is not to be found, the injured parties should have a right to come on any of the indorsers.—Sheridan.

Those men who carry about and who listen to accusations should all be hanged, if so it could be at my decision —the carriers by their tongues, the listeners by their ears.—Plautus.

The surest method against scandal is to live it down by perseverance in well-doing, and by prayer to God that He would cure the distempered mind of those who traduce and injure us.—Boerhaave.

No might nor greatness in mortality can censure 'scape; back-wounding calumny the whitest virtue strikes. What king so strong can tie the gall up in the slanderous tongue?—Shakespeare.

Fond of those hives where folly reigns,
And cards and scandal are the chains,
Where the pert virgin slights a name,
And scorns to redder into shame.

—Swift.

Slander is perhaps the only vice which no circumstance can palliate, as well as being one which we are most ingenious in concealing from ourselves.—Massillon.

Believe nothing against another, but on good authority; nor report what may hurt another, unless it be a greater hurt to another to conceal it.—William Penn.

Slanderers are at all events economical for they make a little scandal go a great way, and rarely open their mouths except at the expense of other people.—Chatfield.

There is a lust in man no charm can tame,
Of loudly publishing his neighbour's shame;
On eagle's wings immortal scandals fly;
While virtuous actions are but born and die.

—Harvey.

The feeblest vermin can destroy,
As sure as stoutest beasts of prey;
And only with their eyes and breath
Infect, and poison men to death.

—Butler.

Malicious slander never would have leisure
To search, with prying eyes, for faults
abroad,
If all, like me, consider'd their own hearts,
And wept the sorrows which they found at home.

—Rowe.

It is a pretty general rule that the médisante is a termagant in her household; and as for our own sex, in nine cases out of ten, the evil tongue belongs to a disappointed man.—Bancroft.

What indulgence does the world extend to those evil-speakers who, under the mask of friendship, stab indiscriminately with the keen, though rusty blade of slander!—Mme. Roland.

Those who, without knowing us, think or speak evil of us, do no harm; it is not us they attack, but the phantom of their own imagination.—Bruyère.

Life would be a perpetual flea-hunt if a man were obliged to run down all the innuendoes, inверacities, insinuations and suspicions which are uttered against him.—Beecher.

Listen not to a tale-bearer or slanderer, for he tells thee nothing out of good-will; but as he discovereth of the secrets of others, so he will of thine in turn.—Socrates.

There is nothing which wings its flight so swiftly as calumny, nothing which is uttered with more ease; nothing is listened to with more readiness, nothing dispersed more widely.—Cicero.

I will be hang'd, if some eternal villain,
Some busy and insinuating rogue,
Some cogging, cozening slave, to get some office,
Have not devis'd this slander.

—Shakespeare.

If Parliament were to consider the sporting with reputation of as much importance as sporting on manors, and pass an act for the preservation of fame as well as game, there are many who would thank them for the bill.—Sheridan.

So fruitful is slander in variety of expedients to satiate as well as disguise itself. But if these smother weapons cut so sore, what shall we say of open and unblushing scandal, subjected to no caution, tied down to no restraints?—Sterne.

There is evil enough in man, God knows; but it is not the mission of every young man and woman to detail and report it all. Keep the atmosphere as pure as possible, and fragrant with gentleness and charity.—John Hall.

Close thine ear against him that shall open his mouth secretly against another. If thou receivest not his words, they fly back and wound the reporter. If thou dost receive them, they fly forward and wound the receiver.—Lavater.

Slander'd to death by villains,
That dare as well answer a man indeed
As I dare take a serpent by the tongue:
Boys, apes, braggarts, Jacks, milksops!
—Shakespeare.

If any one tells you that such a person speaks ill of you, do not make excuse about what is said of you, but answer: "He was ignorant of my other faults, else he would not have mentioned these alone."—Epictetus.

The whisper'd tale,
That, like the fabling Nile, no fountain
knows;
Fair-faced Deceit, whose wily conscious eye Ne'er looks direct; the tongue that licks the dust,
But, when it safely dares, as prompt to sting. —Thomson.

When a mean wretch cannot vie with another in virtue, out of his wickedness he begins to slander. The abject envious wretch will slander the virtuous man when absent, but when brought face to face his loquacious tongue becomes dumb.—Saadi.

Slander's mark was ever yet the fair;
The ornament of beauty is suspect,
A crow that flies in heaven's sweetest air.
So thou be good, slander doth but approve Thy worth the greater. —Shakespeare.

We must not stint
Our necessary actions, in the fear
To cope malicious censurers; which ever,
As ravenous fishes, do a vessel follow
That is new trimm'd. —Shakespeare.

If any speak ill of thee, flee home to thy own conscience, and examine thy heart: if thou be guilty, it is a just correction; if not guilty, it is a fair instruction: make use of both; so shalt thou distil honey out of gall, and out of an open enemy create a secret friend.—Quarles.

Any one who is much talked of must be much maligned. This seems to be a harsh conclusion; but when you consider how much more given men are to depreciate than to appreciate, you will acknowledge that there is some truth in the saying.—Helps.

Slander is a poison which extinguishes charity, both in the slanderer and in the person who listens to it; so that a single calumny may prove fatal to an infinite number of souls; since it kills not only those who circulate it, but also all those who do not reject it.—St. Bernard.

Whence proceeds this weight we lay
On what detracting people say?
Their utmost malice cannot make
Your head, or tooth, or finger ache;
Nor spoil your shapes, distort your face,
Or put one feature out of place.
—Swift.

Slander,
Whose edge is sharper than the sword;
whose tongue
Out-venoms all the worms of Nile; whose
breath
Rides on the posting winds, and doth belie
All corners of the world: kings, queens, and states,
Maids, matrons, nay, the secrets of the grave
This viperous slander enters.
—Shakespeare.

Skilled by a touch to deepen scandal's tints,
With all the kind mendacity of hints,
While mingling truth with falsehood, sneers with smiles,
A thread of candor with a web of wiles;
A plain blunt show of briefly-spoken seem-
ing,
To hide her bloodless heart's soul-harden'd
scheming;
A lip of lies, a face formed to conceal;
And, without feeling, mock at all who feel:
With a vile mask the Gorgon would disown,
A cheek of parchment, and an eye of stone.
—Byron.

Nor do they trust their tongues alone,
But speak a language of their own;
Can read a nod, a shrug, a look,
Far better than a printed book;
Convey a libel in a frown,
And wink a reputation down;
Or, by the tossing of a fan,
Describe the lady and the man. —Swift.

How frequently is the honesty and integrity of a man disposed of by a smile or shrug! How many good and generous actions have been sunk into oblivion by a distrustful look, or stamped with the imputation of proceeding from bad motives, by a mysterious and seasonable whisper!—Sterne.

To be continually subject to the breath of slander will tarnish the purest virtue, as a constant exposure to the atmosphere will obscure the brightness of the finest gold; but in either case the real value of both continues the same, although the currency may be somewhat impeded.—Colton.

Slavery

Corrupted freemen are the worst of slaves.—David Garrick.

Base is the slave that pays.—Shakespeare.

Nothing in the world is lawless except a slave.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

How great would be our peril if our slaves began to number us!—Seneca.

It is an irrepressible conflict between opposing and enduring forces.—William H. Seward.

Good kings are slaves, and their people are free.—Marie Leszczinski.

Not the Christian religion only, but nature herself, cries out against the state of slavery.—Leo X.

Thou art a slave, whom fortune's tender arm
With favour never clasp'd; but bred a dog.
—Shakespeare.

* Slavery tolerates no freedom of the press, no freedom of speech, no freedom of opinion.—Hinton Rowan Helper.

Freedom and slavery! the one is the name of virtue, and the other of vice, and both are acts of the will.—Epictetus.

They (the blacks) had no rights which the white man was bound to respect.—Roger B. Taney.

Where slavery is there liberty cannot be, and where liberty is there slavery cannot be.—Charles Sumner.

A soil whose air is deemed too pure for slaves to breathe in.—Lofft.

Disguise thyself as thou wilt, still,
Slavery! said I—still thou art a bitter draught.
—Sterne.

Where bastard Freedom waves
Her fustian flag in mockery over slaves.
—Moore.

I believe this government cannot endure permanently half slave and half free.—Abraham Lincoln.

Whatever day
Makes man a slave, takes half his worth away.
—Homer.

No more slave states and no more slave territory.—Simon P. Chase.

That execrable sum of all villainies commonly called the slave-trade.—John Wesley.

Slavery is also as ancient as war, and war as human nature.—Voltaire.

In giving freedom to the slave we assure freedom to the free—honorable alike in what we give and what we preserve.—Abraham Lincoln.

The man who gives me employment which I must have or suffer, that man is my master, let me call him what I will.—Henry George.

By the law of slavery, man, created in the image of God, is divested of the human character, and declared to be a mere chattel.—Chas. Sumner.

Mechanic slaves
With greasy aprons, rules, and hammers, shall Uplift us to the view.
—Shakespeare.

The slave power dares anything, and it can be conquered only by the united masses of the people. From Congress to the people, I appeal.—Charles Sumner.

Slavery is the parent of ignorance, and ignorance begets a whole brood of follies and vices; and every one of these is inevitably hostile to literary culture.—Hinton Rowan Helper.

Slavery it is that makes slavery; freedom, freedom. The slavery of women happened when the men were slaves of kings.—Emerson.

Slaves cannot breathe in England; if their lungs
Receive our air, that moment they are free:
They touch our country and their shackles fall. —Cowper.

There is not a man living who wishes more sincerely than I do to see a plan adopted for the abolition of slavery.—Washington.

And ne'er shall the sons of Columbia be slaves,
While the earth bears a plant, or the sea rolls its waves. —Robert Paine.

They are slaves who fear to speak
For the fallen and the weak;
* * *

They are slaves who dare not be
In the right with two or three. —Lowell.

I would not have a slave to till my ground,
To carry me, to fan me while I sleep,
And tremble when I wake, for all the wealth
That sinews bought and sold have ever earn'd. —Cowper.

What! mothers from their children riven!
What! God's own image bought and sold!
Americans to market driven,
And bartered as the brute for gold!
—Whittier.

Our fellow-countrymen in chains!
Slaves—in a land of light and law!
Slaves—crouching on the very plains
Where rolled the storm of Freedom's war! —Whittier.

He finds his fellow guilty of a skin
Not color'd like his own, and having pow'r
T' enforce the wrong, for such a worthy cause
Dooms and devotes him as his lawful prey.
—Cowper.

A Christian! going, gone!
Who bids for God's own image?—for His grace,
Which that poor victim of the marketplace

Hath in her suffering won?
—Whittier.

This is a world of compensations, and he who would be no slave must consent to have no slave. Those who deny freedom to others deserve it not for themselves, and, under a just God, they cannot long retain it.—Lincoln.

Sharp penury afflicts these wretched isles!
There hope ne'er dawns, and pleasure never smiles.
The vassal wretch contented drags his chain,
And hears his famish'd babes lament in vain. —Falconer.

Measure slavery by the golden rule, and where is it? * * * It stands in the way of that automatic instinct of progress which is eternal in the human race and irresistible in human history.—Theodore Parker.

Enslave a man and you destroy his ambition, his enterprise, his capacity.
In the constitution of human nature,
the desire of bettering one's condition is the mainspring of effort. The first touch of slavery snaps this spring.—
Horace Mann.

You have among you many a purchas'd slave,
Which, like your asses, and your dogs, and mules,
You use in abject and in slavish parts
Because you bought them. —Shakespeare.

The very mudsills of society. * * *
We call them slaves. * * * But I will not characterize that class at the north with that term; but you have it.
It is there, it is everywhere, it is eternal.—James H. Hammond.

Resolved, That the compact which exists between the North and the South is a covenant with death and an agreement with hell; involving both parties in atrocious criminality, and should be immediately annulled.—Wm. Lloyd Garrison.

The hearts within thy valleys bred,
The fiery souls that might have led Thy sons to deeds sublime,
Now crawl from cradle to the grave,
Slaves—nay, the bondsmen of a slave,
And callous, save to crime. —Byron.

I never mean, unless some particular circumstances should compel me to do it, to possess another slave by purchase, it being among my first wishes to see some plan adopted by which slavery in this country may be abolished by law.—George Washington.

Slavery destroys, or vitiates, or pollutes, whatever it touches. No interest of society escapes the influence of its clinging curse. It makes Southern religion a stench in the nostrils of Christendom; it makes Southern politics a libel upon all the principles of republicanism; it makes Southern literature a travesty upon the honorable profession of letters.—Hinton Rowan Helper.

O execrable son! so to aspire
Above his brethren, to himself assuming Authority usurp'd, from God not given.
He gave us only over beast, fish, fowl,
Dominion absolute; that right we hold
By his donation; but man over men
He made not lord; such title to himself Reserving, human left from human free.
—Milton.

A crowd of shivering slaves of every nation,
And age, and sex, were in the market
rang'd;
Each bevy with the merchant in his station:
Poor creatures! their good looks were sadly chang'd;
All save the blacks seem'd jaded with vexation,
From friends, and home, and freedom far estrang'd.
The negroes more philosophy display'd,— Used to it, no doubt, as eels are to be flay'd.
—Byron.

Ill-fated race! the softening arts of peace,
Whate'er the humanizing muses teach;
The godlike wisdom of the tempered breast;
Progressive truth, the patient force of thought;
Investigation calm, whose silent powers Command the world; the light that leads to
heaven;
Kind equal rule, the government of laws,
And all-protecting freedom, which alone
Sustains the name and dignity of man:
These are not theirs. —Thomson.

Slavery is no scholar, no improver;
it does not love the whistle of the railroad;
it does not love the newspaper, the mailbag, a college, a book or a preacher who has the absurd whim of saying what he thinks; it does not increase the white population; it does not improve the soil; everything goes to decay.—Emerson.

Sleep

How sweet, though lifeless, yet with rife to lie; and without dying, oh, how sweet to die!—John Wolcott.

He giveth His beloved sleep.—
Bible.

Night's sepulchre.—Byron.

Heaven trims our lamps while we sleep.—Alcott.

Tired nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep!—Young.

Scott.

Downy sleep, death's counterfeit.—
Shakespeare.

Sleep, the antechamber of the grave.
—Richter.

Our foster-nurse of nature is repose.
—Shakespeare.

Sleep, that sometimes shuts up sorrow's eye.—Shakespeare.

Sweet nurse of nature, over the senses creep.—Churchill.

Voluptuous as the first approach of sleep.—Byron.

Sleep, thou most gentle of the deities.—Ovid.

Inviting sleep and soft forgetfulness.
—Wordsworth.

I let fall the windows of mine eyes.
—Shakespeare.

Thou driftest gently down the tides
of sleep.—Longfellow.

After life's fitful fever he sleeps well.—Shakespeare.

At my feet the city slumbered.—
Longfellow.

The mystery of folded sleep.—Tennyson.

He sleeps well who is not conscious that he sleeps ill.—Bacon.

The soul shares not the body's rest.
—Maturin.

Enjoy the honey-heavy dew of slumber.
—Shakespeare.

Fatigue is the best pillow.—Franklin.

Be sure they sleep not whom God needs.—Robert Browning.

No; death is not an eternal sleep.—Robespierre.

How many sleep who keep the world awake!—Young.

Sleep is the best cure for waking troubles.—Cervantes.

The world of sleep has an existence of its own.—Victor Hugo.

Sleepless themselves to give their readers sleep.—Pope.

I pray you, let none of your people stir me;
I have an exposition of sleep come upon me.
—Shakespeare.

The timely dew of sleep, now falling with soft slumbrous weight, inclines our eyelids.—Milton.

The drowsy frightened steeds that draw the litter of close-curtained sleep.—Milton.

Sleep, riches, and health are only truly enjoyed after they have been interrupted.—Richter.

Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep.—Bible.

O sleep, why dost thou leave me? why thy visionary joys remove?—Congreve.

Weariness can snore upon the flint, when restive sloth finds the down pillow hard.—Shakespeare.

Sleep is a generous thief; he gives to vigor what he takes from time.—Elizabeth, Queen of Roumania.

God gives sleep to the bad, in order that the good may be undisturbed.—Saadi.

One hour's sleep before midnight is worth two after.—Fielding.

As fast lock'd up in sleep, as guiltless labor, When it lies starkly in the traveller's bones.
—Shakespeare.

Sweet sleep fell upon his eyelids, unwakeful, most pleasant, the nearest like death.—Homer.

Deep rest, and sweet, most like indeed to death's own quietness.—Virgil.

A holy thing is sleep, on the worn spirit shed, and eyes that wake to weep.—Mrs. Hemans.

Sleep, to the homeless thou art home; the friendless find in thee a friend.—Ebenezer Elliott.

Balm of hurt minds, great nature's second course, chief nourisher in life's feast.—Shakespeare.

Great eaters and great sleepers are incapable of anything else that is great.—Henry IV. of France.

Sleep the sleep that knows not breaking, Morn of toil, nor night of waking.
—Scott.

O sleep, thou ape of death, lie dull upon her And be her sense but as a monument.
—Shakespeare.

Sleep shall neither night nor day Hang upon his pent-house lid.
—Shakespeare.

Creation sleeps. 'Tis as the general pulse Of life stood still, and nature made a pause.
—Young.

It seldom visits sorrow; when it doth, It is a comforter.
—Shakespeare.

And to tired limbs and over-busy thoughts Inviting sleep and soft forgetfulness.
—Wordsworth.

Be thy sleep Silent as night is, and as deep.
—Longfellow.

Macbeth does murder sleep, the innocent sleep.—Shakespeare.

No one but an adventurous traveler can know the luxury of sleep.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

Sleep and death, two twins of winged race,
Of matchless swiftness, but of silent pace.
—Pope.

What probing deep
Has ever solved the mystery of sleep?
—T. B. Aldrich.

And on their lids * * *
The baby Sleep is pillowed. —Shelley.

Balow, my babe, lye still and sleipe,
It grieves me sair to see thee weipe.
—Percy.

O sleep! it is a gentle thing,
Beloved from pole to pole.
—Coleridge.

Strange state of being! (for 'tis still to be) Senseless to feel, and with seal'd eyes to see. —Byron.

What all so soon asleep; I wish mine eyes Would with themselves shut up my thoughts. —Shakespeare.

There are a kind of men so loose of soul,
That in their sleeps will mutter their affairs.
—Shakespeare.

Thou hast been called, O sleep! the friend
of woe;
But 'tis the happy who have called thee so.
—Southey.

Care keeps his watch in every old man's
eye,
And where care lodges, sleep will never lie.
—Shakespeare.

Sleep dwell upon thine eyes, peace in thy
breast!
Would I were sleep and peace, so sweet to rest. —Shakespeare.

Sleep will bring thee dreams in starry number—
Let him come to thee and be thy guest.
—Aytoun.

Near the Cimmerians, in his dark abode, deep in a cavern dwells the drowsy god.—Dryden.

Sleep is pain's easiest salve, and doth fulfill all offices of death, except to kill.—Donne.

The baiting-place of wit, the balm of woe, the poor man's wealth, the prisoner's release.—Sir P. Sidney.

All sense of hearing and of sight en-fold in the serene delight and quietude
of sleep.—Longfellow.

The deep of night is crept upon our talk,
And Nature must obey necessity.

Life's nurse, sent from heaven to create us anew day by day.—Reade.

When in the down I sink my head, Sleep, Death's twin-brother, times my breath. —Tennyson.

Winding up days with toil and nights with sleep.—Shakespeare.

Sleep is death's younger brother, and so like him, that I never dare trust him without my prayers.—Sir
Thomas Browne.

Shake off this downy sleep, death's counterfeit,
And look on death itself! —Shakespeare.

Sleep, the fresh dew of languid love, the
rain
Whose drops quench kisses till they burn again. —Shelley.

Take thou of me, sweet pillowes, sweetest bed;
A chamber deafe of noise, and blind of
light,
A rosie garland and a weary hed.
—Sir Philip Sidney.

Kind sleep affords
The only boon the wretched mind can feel;
A momentary respite from despair.
—Murphy.

Bid them come forth and hear me.
Or at their chamber-door I'll beat the drum
Till it cry sleep to death. —Shakespeare.

There is one sweet lenitive at least for evils, which nature holds out; so I took it kindly at her hands, and fell asleep.—Sterne.

O gentle sleep! my welcome breath shall hail thee midst our mortal strife, who art the very thief of life, the very portraiture of death.—Alonzo de Ledesma.

Sleep is no servant of the will; it has caprices of its own: when courted most, it lingers still; when most pursued, 'tis swiftly gone.—Bowring.

Sleep hath its own world, a boundary between the things misnamed death and existence.—Byron.

Well the art thou knowest in soft forgetfulness to steep the eyes which sorrow taught to watch and weep.—Mrs. Tighe.

Balm that tames all anguish, saint that evil thoughts and aims takest away, and into souls dost creep, like to a breeze from heaven.—Wordsworth.

In a sound sleep the soul goes home to recruit her strength, which could not else endure the wear and tear of life.—Rahel.

Sleep is a god too proud to wait in palaces, and yet so humble too as not to scorn the meanest country cottages.—Cowley.

The long sleep of death closes our scars, and the short sleep of life our wounds. Sleep is the half of time which heals us.—Richter.

O magic sleep! O comfortable bird
That brooded o'er the troubled sea of the mind
Till it is hush'd and smooth! —Keats.

Care-charmer Sleep, son of the sable Night,
Brother to Death, in silent darkness born;
Relieve my languish, and restore the light.
—Samuel Daniel.

To bed, to bed; sleep kill those pretty eyes,
And give as soft attachment to thy senses,
As infants empty of all thought.
—Shakespeare.

When the sheep are in the fauld, and a' the kye at hame,
And all the weary world to sleep are gane.
—Lady Ann Barnard.

Even sleep is characteristic. How beautiful are children in their lovely innocence! how angel-like their blooming features! and how painful and anxious is the sleep of the guilty!—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

Sleep, the type of death, is also, like that which it typifies, restricted to the earth. It flies from hell, and is excluded from heaven.—Colton.

Put off thy cares with thy clothes; so shall thy rest strengthen thy labor; and so shall thy labor sweeten thy rest.—Quarles.

Sleep lingers all our lifetime about our eyes, as night hovers all day in the boughs of the fir-tree.—Emerson.

We sleep, but the loom of life never stops; and the pattern which was weaving when the sun went down is weaving when it comes up to-morrow.—Beecher.

I never take a nap after dinner but when I have had a bad night, and then the nap takes me.—Samuel Johnson.

Sleep, that knits up the raveled sleeve of care, the death of each day's life, sore labor's bath, balm of hurt minds, great nature's second course, chief nourisher in life's feast.—Shakespeare.

Alike to the slave and his oppressor cometh night with sweet refreshment, and half of the life of the most wretched is gladdened by the soothing of sleep.—Tupper.

Sleep, gentle sleep, nature's soft nurse, how have I frighted thee, that thou no more wilt weigh my eyelids down, and steep my senses in forgetfulness?—Shakespeare.

Canst thou, O partial sleep, give thy repose to the wet sea-boy in an hour so rude, and in the calmest and most stillest night, with all appliances and means to boot, deny it to a king? —Shakespeare.

Sleep! to the homeless, thou art home
The friendless find in thee a friend;
And well is, wheresoe'er he roams,
Who meets thee at his journey's end.
—Ebenezer Elliott.

Oh, sleep! sweet sleep!
Whatever form thou takest, thou art fair,
Holding unto our lips thy goblet filled
Out of oblivion's well, a healing draught.
—Longfellow.

We wake sleeping, and sleep waking. I do not see so clearly in my sleep; but as to my being awake, I never found it clear enough and free from clouds.—Montaigne.

For next to Death is Sleep to be compared;
Therefore his house is unto his annex:
Here Sleep, ther Richesse, and hei-gate them both betwext. —Spenser.

Thou lead them thus,
Till o'er their brows death-counterfeiting
sleep
With leaden legs and batty wings doth creep. —Shakespeare.

Not poppy, nor mandragora,
Nor all the drowsy syrups of the world
Shall ever medicine thee to that sweet
sleep
Which thou ow'dst yesterday.
—Shakespeare.

Oh! lightly, lightly tread!
A holy thing is sleep,
On the worn spirit shed,
And eyes that wake to weep.
—Mrs. Hemans.

Sleep is a death, O make me try,
By sleeping, what it is to die:
And as gently lay my head
On my grave, as now my bed.
—Sir Thomas Browne.

O sleep! in pity thou art made
A double boon to such as we;
Beneath closed lids and folds of deepest shade
We think we see. —Frothingham.

These should be hours for necessities, not for delights; times to repair our nature with comforting repose, and not for us to waste these times.—
Shakespeare.

O soft embalmer of the still midnight!
Shutting, with careful fingers and benign,
Our gloom-pleased eyes, embower'd from the light,
Enshaded in forgetfulness divine.
—Keats.

O peaceful Sleep! until from pain released
I breathe again uninterrupted breath!
Ah, with what subtle meaning did the Greek
Call thee the lesser mystery, at the feast
Whereof the greater mystery is death.
—Longfellow.

Leave your bed upon the first desertion of sleep; it being ill for the eyes to read lying, and worse for the mind to be idle; since the head during that laziness is commonly a cage for unclean thoughts.—F. Osborn.

In due season he betakes himself to his rest; he (the Christian) presumes not to alter the ordinance of day and night, nor dare confound, where distinctions are made by his Maker.—
Bishop Hall.

O sleep, we are beholden to thee, sleep;
Thou bearest angels to us in the night, Saints out of heaven with palms. Seen by thy light Sorrow is some old tale that goeth not deep;
Love is a pouting child.
—Jean Ingelow.

Let youth cherish sleep, the happiest of earthly boons, while yet it is at its command; for there cometh the day to all when "neither the voice of the lute nor the birds" shall bring back the sweet slumbers that fell on their young eyes as unbidden as the dews.—Bulwer-Lytton.

There are many ways of inducing sleep—the thinking of purling rills, or waving woods; reckoning of numbers; droppings from a wet sponge fixed over a brass pan, etc. But temperance and exercise answer much better than any of these succedaneums.—
Sterne.

Of all the thoughts of God that are Borne inward into souls afar,
Along the Psalmist's music deep,
Now tell me if that any is,
For gift or grace, surpassing this—
"He giveth His beloved sleep?"

His dews drop mutely on the hill,
His cloud above it saileth still,
Though on its slope men sow and reap.
More softly than the dew is shed,
Or cloud is floated overhead,
"He giveth His beloved sleep."
—Mrs. Browning.

Is there aught in sleep can charm the wise?
To lie in dead oblivion, losing half
The fleeting moments of too short a life;
Total extinction of th' enlighten'd soul,

Who would in such a gloomy state remain
Longer than nature craves? —Thomson.

We are somewhat more than ourselves in our sleep; and the slumber of the body seems to be but the waking of the soul. It is the ligation of sense, but the liberty of reason; and our waking conceptions do not match the fancies of our sleep.—Sir T. Browne.

Sleep, thou repose of all things;
sleep, thou gentlest of the deities; thou peace of the mind, from which care flies; who doest soothe the hearts of men wearied with the toils of the day, and refittest them for labor.—Ovid.

Beauties, when disposed to sleep,
Should from the eye of keen inspector keep:
The lovely nymph who would her swain surprise,
May close her mouth, but not conceal her
eyes;
Sleep from the fairest face some beauty takes,
And all the homely features homelier makes. —Crabbe.

Softly, O midnight hours!
Move softly o'er the bowers
Where lies in happy sleep a girl so fair:
For ye have power, men say,
Our hearts in sleep to sway
And cage cold fancies in a moonlight snare.
—Aubrey Thos. De Vere.

To sleep, perchance to dream; ay, there's the rub;
For in that sleep of death what dreams may come
When we have shuffled off this mortal coil,
Must give us pause. —Shakespeare.

O polish'd perturbation! golden care!
That keep'st the ports of slumber open wide
To many a watchful night! sleep with it
now!
Yet not so sound and half so deeply sweet
As he whose brow with homely biggen bound SnORES out the watch of night.
—Shakespeare.

On your eyelids crown the god of sleep,
Charming your blood with pleasing heaviness, Making such difference 'twixt wake and
sleep
As is the difference betwixt day and night
The hour before the heavenly-harness'd team Begins his golden progress in the east.
—Shakespeare.

"God bless the man who first invented
sleep!"
So Sancho Panza said and so say I;
And bless him, also, that he didn't keep His great discovery to himself, nor try To make it,—as the lucky fellow might—
A close monopoly by patent right.
—J. G. Saxe.

The breath of peace was fanning her glorious brow, her head was bowed a very little forward, and a tress, escaping from its bonds, fell by the side of her pure white temple, and close to her just opened lips; it hung there motionless! no breath disturbed its repose! She slept as an angel might sleep, having accomplished the mission of her God.—Hawthorne.

For I am weary, and am overwrought With too much toil, with too much care
distraught,
And with the iron crown of anguish crowned.
Lay thy soft hand upon my brow and check,
O peaceful Sleep!
—Longfellow.

On eyes that watch as well as eyes that weep
Descends the solemn mystery of sleep,
Toiling and climbing to the very close,
The weary Body, longing for repose,
On the gained level of the day's ascent,
Halts for the night and pitches there its tent. —Abraham Coles.

Visit her, gentle Sleep! with wings of healing.
And may this storm be but a mountain-
birth,
May all the stars hang bright above her dwelling, Silent as though they watched the sleeping Earth! —Coleridge.

What means this heaviness that hangs upon
me?
This lethargy that creeps through all my senses?
Nature, oppress'd and harass'd out with
care,
Sinks down to rest. —Addison.

'Tis the voice of the sluggard; I hear him complain;
"You've waked me too soon, I must slumber again."
* * * * *
A little more sleep and a little more slumber." —Watts.

How he sleepeth! having drunken Weary childhood's mandragore,
From his pretty eyes have sunken Pleasures to make room for more—Sleeping near the withered nosegay which he pulled the day before.
—E. B. Browning.

One-half of life is admitted by us to be passed in sleep, in which, however, it may appear otherwise, we have no perception of truth, and all our feelings are delusions; who knows but the other half of life, in which we think we are awake, is a sleep also, but in some respects different from the other, and from which we wake when we, as we call it, sleep. As a man dreams often that he is dreaming, crowding one dreamy delusion on another.—Pascal.

Sleep on, Baby, on the floor.
Tired of all the playing,
Sleep with smile the sweeter for
That you dropped away in!
On your curls' full roundness stand
Golden lights serenely—
One cheek, pushed out by the hand,
Folds the dimple inly.
—E. B. Browning.

She sleeps: her breathings are not heard
In palace chambers far apart,
The fragrant tresses are not stirr'd
That lie upon her charmed heart.
She sleeps: on either hand upswells
The gold fringed pillow lightly prest:
She sleeps, nor dreams, but ever dwells
A perfect form in perfect rest.
—Tennyson.

All gifts but one the jealous God may keep From our soul's longing, one he cannot—
sleep.

This, though he grudge all other grace to
prayer,
This grace his closed hand cannot choose but spare. —Swinburne.

Why rather, sleep, liest thou in smoky cribs,
Upon uneasy pallets stretching thee
And hushed with buzzing night-flies to thy slumber,
Than in the perfum'd chambers of the great,
Under the canopies of costly state,
And lull'd with sound of sweetest melody?
—Shakespeare.

How happy he whose toil
Has o'er his languid pow'rless limbs diffus'd
A pleasing lassitude; he not in vain
Invokes the gentle Deity of dreams.
His pow'rs the most voluptuously dissolve
In soft repose; on him the balmy dews
Of Sleep with double nutriment descend.
—Armstrong.

O sleep! O sleep!
Do not forget me. Sometimes come and sweep,
Now I have nothing left, thy healing hand
Over the lids that crave thy visits bland,
Thou kind, thou comforting one.
For I have seen his face, as I desired,
And all my story is done.
O, I am tired. —Jean Ingelow.

Where, in the sharp lineaments of rigid and unsightly death, is the calm beauty of slumber; telling of rest for the waking hours that are past, and gentle hopes and loves for those which are to come? Lay death and sleep down, side by side, and say who shall find the two akin. Send forth the child and childish man together, and blush for the pride that libels our own old happy state, and gives its title to an ugly and distorted image.—Dickens.

She bids you
Upon the wanton rushes lay you down,
And rest your gentle head upon her lap,
And she will sing the song that pleaseth
you,
And on your eyelids crown the god of
sleep,
Charming your blood with pleasing heaviness, Making such difference 'twixt wake and
sleep
As is the difference 'twixt day and night.
—Shakespeare.

Man's rich restorative; his balmy bath,
That supples, lubricates, and keep in play
The various movements of this nice machine,
Which asks such frequent periods of repair,
When tir'd with vain rotations of the day,
Sleep winds us up for the succeeding dawn;
Fresh we spin on, till sickness clogs our wheels,
Or death quite breaks the spring, and motion ends. —Young.

It is a delicious moment, certainly, that of being well nestled in bed, and feeling that you shall drop gently to sleep. The good is to come, not past;
the limbs have just been tired enough to render the remaining in one posture delightful; the labor of the day is gone. A gentle failure of the perceptions creeps over you; the spirit of consciousness disengages itself once more, and with slow and hushing degrees, like a mother detaching her hand from that of a sleeping child, the mind seems to have a balmy lid closing over it, like the eye—it is closed—the mysterious spirit has gone to take its airy rounds.—Leigh Hunt.

Now, blessings light on him that first invented this same sleep! it covers a man all over, thoughts and all, like a cloak; it is meat for the hungry, drink for the thirsty, heat for the cold, and cold for the hot. It is the current coin that purchases all the pleasures of the world cheap; and the balance that sets the king and the shepherd, the fool and the wise man, even. There is only one thing, which somebody once put into my head, that I dislike in sleep; it is, that it resembles death; there is very little difference between a man in his first sleep, and a man in his last sleep.—Cervantes.

The unchecked thought
Wanders at will upon enchanted ground,
Making no sound
In all the corridors * * *
The bell sleeps in the belfry—from its tongue
A drowsy murmur floats into the air,
Like thistle-down. Slumber is everywhere.
The rook's asleep, and, in its dreaming,
caws;
And silence mopes where nightingales have sung;
The Sirens lie in grottos cool and deep,
The Naiads in the streams.
—T. B. Aldrich.

To sleep—there is a drowsy mellifluence in the very word that would almost serve to interpret its meaning—to shut up the senses and hoodwink the soul; to dismiss the world; to escape from one's self; to be in ignorance of our own existence; to stagnate upon the earth; just breathing out the hours, not living them—"doing no mischief, only dreaming of it;" neither merry nor melancholy, something between both, and better than either. Best friend of frail humanity, and, like all other friends, it is best estimated in its loss.—Longfellow.

Sloth

Prosperity engenders sloth.—Livy.

Drowsiness shall clothe a man with rags.—Bible.

Sloth * * * never arrived at the attainment of a good wish.—Cervantes.

Sloth, like rust, consumes faster than labor wears, while the key often used is always bright.—Franklin.

Many are idly busy.—Domitian was busy, but then it was catching flies.—Jeremy Taylor.

Flee sloth; for the indolence of the soul is the decay of the body.—Cato.

Sloth is the torpidity of the mental faculties; the sluggard is a living insensible.—Zimmermann.

That destructive syren sloth is ever to be avoided.—Horace.

So fixed are our spirits in slothfulness and cold indifference that we seldom overcome so much as one evil habit.—Thomas à Kempis.

As sloth seldom bringeth actions to good birth; so hasty rashness always makes them abortive ere well formed.—Arthur Warwick.

A sluggish, dawdling, and dilatory man may have spasms of activity, but he never acts continuously and consecutively with energetic quickness.—George S. Hillard.

Slovenliness is a lazy and beastly negligence of a man's own person, whereby he becomes so sordid as to be offensive to those about him.—Theophrastus.

Sloth is an inlet to disorder, and makes way for licentiousness. People that have nothing to do are quickly tired of their own company.—Jeremy Collier.

Excess is not the only thing which breaks men in their health, and in the comfortable enjoyment of themselves; but many are brought into a very ill and languishing habit of body by mere sloth; and sloth is in itself both a great sin, and the cause of many more.—South.

The very soul of the slothful does effectually but lie drowsing in his body, and the whole man is totally given up to his senses.—L'Estrange.

Smiles

A tender smile, our sorrow's only balm.—Young.

With a smile on her lips, and a tear in her eye.—Scott.

Smiles are the language of love.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

The smile that was childlike and bland.—Bret Harte.

One may smile, and smile, and be a villain.—Shakespeare.

The face that cannot smile is never fair.—Martial.

Their smiles and censures are to me the same.—Dryden.

The smiler with the knife under his cloak.—Chaucer.

A smile recures the wounding of a frown.—Shakespeare.

A villain with a smiling cheek.—Shakespeare.

I can smile, and murder while I smile.—Shakespeare.

Loose now and then a scattered smile, and that I will live upon.—Shakespeare.

Softness of smile indicates softness of character.—Lavater.

Eternal smiles his emptiness betray,
As shallow streams run dimpling all the way.—Pope.

For smiles from reason flow
To brute deny'd, and are of love the food.—Milton.

A smile that glow'd
Celestial rosy red, love's proper hue.—Milton.

Her very frowns are fairer far
Than smiles of other maidens are.—Hartley Coleridge.

Sweet intercourse of looks and smiles; for smiles from reason flow.—Milton.

Struck blind with beauty! shot with a woman's smile.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

In came Mrs. Fezziwig, one vast substantial smile.—Dickens.

Many a withering thought lies hid, not lost, in smiles that least befit those who wear them most.—Byron.

The smiles of infants are said to be the first fruits of human reason.—H. N. Hudson.

She turned to him and smiled, but in that sort which makes not others smile.—Byron.

The Italians say that a beautiful woman by her smiles draws tears from our purse.—N. P. Willis.

Smiles are smiles only when the heart pulls the wire.—Theodore Winthrop.

There are few faces that can afford to smile: a smile is sometimes bewitching, in general vapid, often a contortion.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

The cheek may be tinged with a warm sunny smile, though the cold heart to ruin runs darkly the while.—Moore.

Something of a person's character may be discovered by observing when and how he smiles. Some people never smile; they merely grin.—Bovee.

A soul only needs to see a smile in a white-crape bonnet in order to enter the palace of dreams.—Victor Hugo.

He smiled as men smile when they will not speak, because of something bitter in the thought.—Mrs. Brown-ing.

Is it not a thing divine to have a smile which, none know how, has the power to lighten the weight of that enormous chain which all the living in common drag behind them?—Victor Hugo.

A man I knew who lived upon a smile;
And well it fed him: he look'd plumb and fair,
While rankest venom foam'd through every vein.—Dr. Young.

A smile is ever the most bright and beautiful with a tear upon it. What is the dawn without the dew? The tear is rendered by the smile precious above the smile itself.—Landon.

The smile of her I love is like the dawn
Whose touch makes Memnon sing:
O see where wide the golden sunlight
flows—

The barren desert blossoms as the rose!
—R. W. Glider.

Seldom he smiles, and smiles in such a sort
As if he mock'd himself, and scorn'd his spirit

That could be mov'd to smile at anything.
—Shakespeare.

A beautiful smile is to the female countenance what the sunbeam is to the landscape; it embellishes an inferior face and redeems an ugly one.
—Lavater.

It is a proof of boorishness to confer a favor with a bad grace; it is the act of giving that is hard and painful. How little does a smile cost!—
Bruyère.

Those happy smiles that played on her ripe lip seemed not to know what guests were in her eyes; which parted thence as pearls from diamonds dropped.—Shakespeare.

A woman has two smiles that an angel might envy—the smile that accepts a lover afore words are uttered, and the smile that lights on the first-born baby.—Haliburton.

The harper smiled, well pleased; for ne'er
Was flattery lost on poet's ear:
A simple rascal they waste their toil
For the vain tribute of a smile. —Scott.

What smiles! They were the effluence of fine intellect, of true courage;
they lit up her marked lineaments, her thin face, her sunken gray eye, like reflections from the aspect of an angel.
—Charlotte Brontë.

It is the color which love wears,
and cheerfulness, and joy—these three.
It is the light in the window of the face by which the heart signifies to father, husband, or friend that it is at home and waiting.—Beecher.

The passing years had drunk a portion of the light from her eyes, and left their traces on her cheeks, as birds that drink at lakes leave their footprints on the margin. But the pleasant smile reminded him of the bygone days.—Longfellow.

What a sight there is in that word
"smile!" it changes like a chameleon.
There is a vacant smile, a cold smile, a smile of hate, a satiric smile, an affected smile; but, above all, a smile of love.—Haliburton.

Loud laughter is the mirth of the mob, who are only pleased with silly things; for true wit or good sense never excited a laugh since the creation of the world. A man of parts and fashion is therefore only seen to smile, but never heard to laugh.—
Chesterfield.

Nobly he yokes
A smiling with a sigh, as if the sigh
Was that it was, for not being such a smile:
The smile mocking the sigh, that it would fly

From so divine a temple, to commix
With winds that sailors rail at.

—Shakespeare.

What sun is there within us that shoots his rays with so sudden a vigor?
To see the soul flash in the face at this rate one would think would convert an atheist. By the way, we may observe that smiles are much more becoming than frowns. This seems a natural encouragement to good-humor; as much as to say, if people have a mind to be handsome, they must not be peevish and untoward.—Jeremy Collier.

Her smile was prodigal of summery
shine,—

Gaily persistent,—like a morn in June That laughs away the clouds, and up and down

Goes making merry with the ripening
grain.

That slowly ripples,—its bent head drooped down.

With golden secret of the sheathed seed.

—Margaret J. Preston.

There are many kinds of smiles,
each having a distinct character.
Some announce goodness and sweetness, others betray sarcasm, bitterness, and pride; some soften the countenance by their languishing tenderness, others brighten by their spiritual vivacity.—Lavater.

Smoking

May never lady press his lips, his proffer'd love returning,
Who makes a furnace of his mouth, and keeps his chimney burning;
May each true woman shun his sight, for fear his fumes should choke her,
And none but those who smoke themselves have kisses for a smoker.

—Anonymous.

A club there is of smokers—dare you come
To that close, clouded, hot, narcotic room?
When, midnight past, the very candles seem Dying for air, and give a ghastly gleam;
When curling fumes in lazy wreaths arise,
And prozing toppers rub their winking eyes.

—Crabbe.

Snob

That which we call a snob, by any other name would still be snobbish.—
Thackeray.

He who meanly admires a mean thing is a snob—perhaps that is a safe definition of the character.—Thackeray.

You, who forget your own friends, meanly to follow after those of a higher degree, are a snob.—Thackeray.

An immense percentage of snobs, I believe, is to be found in every rank of this mortal life.—Thackeray.

Snow

A little snow, tumbled about, anon becomes a mountain.—Shakespeare.

Through the sharp air a flaky torrent flies,
Mocks the slow sight, and hides the gloomy
skies;
The fleecy clouds their chilly bosoms bare,
And shed their substance on the floating air.

—Crabbe.

Come, see the north-wind's masonry.
Out of an unseen quarry evermore
Furnished with tile, the fierce artificer Curves his white bastions with projected roof
Round every windward stake, or tree, or door.
Speeding, the myriad-handed, his wild work
So fanciful, so savage, nought cares he
For number or proportion. —Emerson.

How beautiful it was, falling so silently, all day long, all night long, on the mountains, on the meadows, on the roofs of the living, on the graves of the dead!—Longfellow.

Silently, like thoughts that come and go, the snowflakes fall, each one a gem.—W. H. Gibson.

The speckled sky is dim with snow,
The light flakes falter and fall slow;
Athwart the hill-top, rapt and pale,
Silently drops a silvery veil;
And all the valley is shut in
By flickering curtains gray and thin.

—J. T. Trowbridge.

On turf and curb and bower-roof
The snow-storm spreads its ivory woof;
It paves with pearl the garden-walk;
And lovingly around the tatter'd stalk
And snivering stem its magic weaves
A mantle fair as lily-leaves.

—J. T. Trowbridge.

Out of the bosom of the Air,
Out of the cloud-folds of her garments shaken,
Over the woodlands brown and bare,
Over the harvest-fields forsaken,
Silent, and soft, and slow
Descends the snow. —Longfellow.

A cheer for the snow—the drifting snow;
Smoother and purer than Beauty's brow;
The creature of thought scarce likes to tread

On the delicate carpet so richly spread.
With feathery wreaths the forest is bound
And the hills are with glittering diadems
crown'd:

'Tis the fairest scene we can have below,
Sing, welcome, then, to the drifting snow!

—Eliza Cook.

Announced by all the trumpets of the sky, Arrives the snow, and, driving o'er the
fields,

Seems nowhere to alight; the whited air Hides hills and woods, the river, and the
heaven,
And veils the farmhouse at the garden's
end.

The sled and traveller stopped, the cou-rier's feet
Delayed, all friends shut out, the house-mates sit

Around the radiant fireplace, enclosed
In a tumultuous privacy of storm.

—Emerson.

Lo! while we are gazing, in swifter haste Stream down the snows, till the air is
white,

As, myriads by myriads madly chased,
They fling themselves from their shadowy height.

The fair, frail creatures of middle sky,
What speed they make, with their grave senary;

Flake after flake,
To lie in the dark and silent lake!

—William Cullen Bryant.

Stand here by my side and turn, I pray,
On the lake below thy gentle eyes;
The clouds hang over it, heavy and gray,
And dark and silent the water lies;
And out of that frozen mist the snow
In wavering flakes begins to flow;
Flake after flake,
They sink in the dark and silent lake.
—William Cullen Bryant.

Sociability

We are more sociable, and get on better with people by the heart than the intellect.—Bruyère.

I cannot be certain not to meet with evil company, but I will be careful not to keep with evil company. I would willingly sort myself with such as should either teach or learn goodness; and if my companion cannot make me better, nor I him good, I will rather leave him ill than he shall make me worse.—Arthur Warwick.

Society

Society is the master, and man is the servant.—G. A. Sala.

Society is no comfort to one not sociable.—Shakespeare.

Society does not love its unmaskers.—Emerson.

Society is as ancient as the world.—Voltaire.

Society rests upon conscience and not upon science.—Amiel.

Intercourse is the soul of progress.—Charles Buxton.

People are to be taken in very small doses.—Emerson.

Society is ever ready to worship success, but rarely forgives failure.—Mme. Roland.

Society is composed of slow Christians and wide-awake sinners.—H. W. Shaw.

Among unequals what society
Can sort, what harmony or true delight?
—Milton.

Cursed be the social lies that warp us from the living truth!—Tennyson.

I never mingled with men, but I came home less of a man than I went out.—Tauler.

Society is a troop of thinkers and the best heads among them take the best places.—Emerson.

A man's reception depends upon his coat; his dismissal upon the wit he shows.—Beranger.

Man is a social animal formed to please in society.—Montesquieu.

Men would not live long in society if they were not the dupes of each other.—Rochevoucauld.

We mingle in society not so much to meet others as to escape ourselves.—H. W. Shaw.

Society becomes my glittering bride, and airy hopes my children.—Wordsworth.

In society mediocrity is not alone dangerous, it is fatal.—Mme. de Maintenon.

The world either breaks or hardens the heart.—Chamfort.

We take our colors, chameleon-like, from each other.—Chamfort.

Society is like a large piece of frozen water; and skating well is the great art of social life.—L. E. Landon.

The virtue most in request in society is conformity. Self-reliance is its aversion.—Emerson.

Formed of two mighty tribes, the bores and bored.—Byron.

Society develops wit, but its contemplation alone forms genius.—Mme. de Staël.

Solitude is as needful to the imagination as society is wholesome for the character.—Lowell.

An artist should be fit for the best society, and keep out of it.—Ruskin.

The state is the association of men, and not men themselves; the citizen may perish, and the man remain.—Montesquieu.

Society is the union of men and not the men themselves.—Montesquieu.

Society is, and must be, based upon appearances, and not upon the deepest realities.—Hamerton.

Sweet reader! you know what a toady is?—that agreeable animal which you meet every day in civilized society.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

The wise man sometimes flees from society from fear of being bored.—La Bruyère.

The upper current of society presents no certain criterion by which we can judge of the direction in which the under current flows.—Macaulay.

Society is the atmosphere of souls; and we necessarily imbibe from it something which is either infectious or healthful.—Bishop Hall.

Too elevated qualities often unfit a man for society. We do not go to market with ingots, but with silver and small change.—Chamfort.

It has been said that society is for the happy, the rich; we should rather say the happy have no need of it.—Madame de Girardin.

If you wish to appear agreeable in society, you must consent to be taught many things which you know already.—Lavater.

Without good company, all dainties lose their true relish, and, like painted grapes, are only seen, not tasted.—Massinger.

There are four varieties in society—the lovers, the ambitious, observers, and fools. The fools are the happiest.—Taine.

Society is composed of two great classes—those who have more dinners than appetite, and those who have more appetite than dinners.—Chamfort.

Society does not exist for itself, but for the individual; and man goes into it, not to lose, but to find himself.—Phillips Brooks.

Man perfected by society is the best of all animals; he is the most terrible of all when he lives without law and without justice.—Aristotle.

Society having ordained certain customs, men are bound to obey the law of society, and conform to its harmless orders.—Thackeray.

Man, like the generous vine, supported lives; the strength he gains is from the embrace he gives.—Pope.

Society is like a lawn where every roughness is smoothed, every bramble eradicated, and where the eye is delighted by the smiling verdure of a velvet surface.—Washington Irving.

Human society is made up of partialities. Each citizen has an interest and a view of his own, which, if followed out to the extreme, would leave no room for any other citizen.—Emerson.

It is with a company as it is with a punch, everything depends upon the ingredients of which it is composed.—Bovee.

It is most true that a natural and secret hatred and aversion towards society, in any man, hath somewhat of the savage beast.—Bacon.

Society is divided into two classes: the shearers and the shorn. We should always be with the former against the latter.—Talleyrand.

Unhappy he! who from the first of joys, Society, cut off, is left alone
Amid this world of death. —Thomson.

The eyes of the social herd, who always observe little things, and generally form from them their opinions of great affairs.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

There is a sort of economy in Providence that one shall excel where another is defective, in order to make men more useful to each other, and mix them in society.—Addison.

Besides the general infusion of wit to heighten civility, the direct splendor of intellectual power is ever welcome in fine society, as the costliest addition to its rule and its credit.—Emerson.

Man in society is like a flow'r,
Blown in its native bed. 'Tis there alone
His faculties expanded in full bloom Shine out, there only reach their proper use. —Cowper.

Society will pardon much to genius and special gifts; but, being in its nature conventional, it loves what is conventional, or what belongs to coming together.—Emerson.

In this great society wide lying around us, a critical analysis would find very few spontaneous actions. It is almost all custom and gross sense.—Emerson.

Society is a strong solution of books. It draws the virtue out of what is best worth reading, as hot water draws the strength of tea-leaves.—O. W. Holmes.

Society is the offspring of leisure; and to acquire this forms the only rational motive for accumulating wealth, notwithstanding the cant that prevails on the subject of labor.—Tuckerman.

It is the fine souls who serve us, and not what is called fine society. Fine society is only a self-protection against the vulgarities of the street and the tavern.—Emerson.

God having designed man for a sociable creature, furnished him with language, which was to be the great instrument and cementer of society.—Locke.

Society will be obeyed; if you refuse obedience, you must take the consequences. Society has only one law, and that is custom. Even religion itself is socially powerful only just so far as it has custom on its side.—Hamerton.

Popular privileges are consistent with a state of society in which there is great inequality of position. Democratic rights, on the contrary, demand that there should be equality of condition as the fundamental basis of the society they regulate.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

Society itself, which should create Kindness, destroys what little we had got:
To feel for none is the true social art
Of the world's stoics—men without a heart.
—Byron.

Heaven forming each on other to depend,
A master, or a servant, or a friend,
Bids each on other for assistance call,
Till one man's weakness grows the strength of all. —Pope.

A man who has tasted with profound enjoyment the pleasure of agreeable society will eat with a greater appetite than he who rode horseback for two hours. An amusing lecture is as useful for health as the exercise of the body.—Kant.

The history of any private family, however humble, could it be fully related for five or six generations, would illustrate the state and progress of society better than the most elaborate dissertation.—Southey.

Unless society can effect by education what Lord Monboddoo holds man to have done by willing it, and can get rid of her tail, it will be wisest to let the educated classes keep their natural station at the head.—Hare.

In all societies it is advisable to associate if possible with the highest; not that the highest are always the best, but because, if disgusted there, we can at any time descend. But if we begin with the lowest, to ascend is impossible.—Colton.

Society everywhere is in conspiracy against the manhood of every one of its members. Society is a joint-stock company, in which the members agree, for the better securing of his bread to each shareholder, to surrender the liberty and culture of the eater.—Emerson.

It is an aphorism in physic, that unwholesome airs, because perpetually sucked into the lungs, do distemper health more than coarser diet used but at set times. The like may be said of society, which, if good, is a better refiner of the spirits than ordinary books.—F. Osborn.

From social intercourse are derived some of the highest enjoyments of life; where there is a free interchange of sentiments, the mind acquires new ideas; and by a frequent exercise of its powers, the understanding gains fresh vigor.—Addison.

Those can most easily dispense with society who are the most calculated to adorn it; they only are dependent on it who possess no mental resources, for though they bring nothing to the general mart, like beggars, they are too poor to stay at home.—Countess of Blessington.

As we ascend in society, like those who climb a mountain, we shall find that the line of perpetual congelation commences with the higher circles; and the nearer we approach to the grand luminary the court, the more frigidity and apathy shall we experience.—Colton.

Society is the true sphere of human virtue. In social, active life, difficulties will perpetually be met with, restraints of many kinds will be necessary; and studying to behave right in respect of these is a discipline of the human heart useful to others and improving to itself.—Elizabeth Carter.

Society is, indeed, a contract.
* * * It is a partnership in all science; a partnership in all art, a partnership in every virtue, and in all perfection. As the ends of such a partnership cannot be obtained in many generations, it becomes a partnership not only between those who are living, but between those who are living, those who are dead, and those who are to be born.—Burke.

Wherever progress ends, decline invariably begins; but remember that the healthful progress of society is like the natural life of man—it consists in the gradual and harmonious development of all its constitutional powers, all its component parts, and you introduce weakness and disease into the whole system whether you attempt to stint or to force its growth.—Lord Lytton.

We submit to the society of those that can inform us, but we seek the society of those whom we can inform. And men of genius ought not to be chagrined if they see themselves neglected. For when we communicate knowledge, we are raised in our own estimation; but when we receive it, we are lowered.—Colton.

Those who have resources within themselves, who can dare to live alone, want friends the least, but, at the same time, best know how to prize them the most. But no company is far preferable to bad, because we are more apt to catch the vices of others than their virtues, as disease is far more contagious than health.—Colton.

Christian society is like a bundle of sticks laid together, whereof one kindles another. Solitary men have fewest provocations to evil, but, again, fewest incitations to good. So much as doing good is better than not doing evil will I account Christian good-fellowship better than an hermitish and melancholy solitariness.—Bishop Hall.

Society is the true sphere of human virtue. In social, active life, difficulties will perpetually be met with; restraints of many kinds will be necessary; and studying to behave right in respect of these is a discipline of the human heart useful to others and improving to itself. Suffering is no duty, but where it is necessary to avoid guilt, or to do good; nor pleasure a crime, but where it strengthens the influence of bad inclinations, or lessens

the generous activity of nature.—Elizabeth Carter.

Society is a long series of uprising ridges, which from the first to the last offer no valley of repose. Whenever you take your stand, you are looked down upon by those above you, and reviled and pelted by those below you. Every creature you see is a farthing Sisyphus, pushing his little stone up some Liliputian mole-hill. This is our world.—Bulwer-Lytton.

There is no security in evil society, where the good are often made worse, the bad seldom better, for it is the peevish industry of wickedness to find or make a fellow. It is like they will be birds of a feather that use to flock together. For such commonly doth their conversation make us as they are with whom we use to converse.—Arthur Warwick.

"It is not safe for man to be alone," nor can all which the cold-hearted pedant stuns our ears with upon the subject ever give one answer of satisfaction to the mind; in the midst of the loudest vauntings of philosophy, nature will have her yearnings for society and friendship. A good heart wants something to be kind to; and the best parts of our blood, and the purest of our spirits suffer most under the destitution.—Sterne.

It is in the middle classes of society that all the finest feeling, and the most amiable propensities of our nature do principally flourish and abound. For the good opinion of our fellow-men is the strongest though not the purest motive to virtue. The privations of poverty render us too cold and callous, and the privileges of property too arrogant and consequential, to feel; the first places us beneath the influence of opinion—the second, above it.—Colton.

Society is a republic. When an individual endeavors to lift himself above his fellows, he is dragged down by the mass, either by means of ridicule or of calumny. No one shall be more virtuous, or more intellectually gifted than others. Whoever, by the irresistible force of genius, rises above the common herd is certain to be ostracised by society, which will pursue him with such merciless derision and detraction that at last he will be compelled to retreat into the solitude of his thoughts.—Heine.

Society,—the only field where the sexes have ever met on terms of equality, the arena where character is formed and studied, the cradle and the realm of public opinion, the crucible of ideas, the world's university, at once a school and a theater, the spur and the crown of ambition, the tribunal which unmasks pretension and stamps real merit, the power that gives government leave to be, and outruns the lazy Church in fixing the moral sense of the eye.—Wendell Phillips.

Soldier

The worse the man, the better the soldier.—Napoleon I.

War mends but few, and spoils multitudes.—Jeremy Taylor.

It is cruelty in war that buyeth conquest.—Sir P. Sidney.

A bright musket, but a ragged soldier.—Tilly.

Against the flying ball no valor avails.—Luther.

You may relish him more in the soldier than in the scholar.—Shakespeare.

War,—the trade of barbarians!—Napoleon I.

The victor's pastime, and the sport of war.—Prior.

Fie, my lord, fie! a soldier and afeard?—Shakespeare.

My only ambition is to be first soldier of Italian independence.—Victor Emmanuel II.

We are like cloaks,—one thinks of us only when it rains.—Marshal Saxe.

A soldier seeking the bubble reputation even in the cannon's mouth.—
Shakespeare.

This the soldier's life,
To have their balmy slumbers wak'd with strife. —Shakespeare.

Nothing is more binding than the friendship of companions-in-arms.—
George S. Hillard.

The stern joy that warriors feel in foemen worthy of their steel.—Sir
Walter Scott.

A mere soldier, a mere tool, a kind
Of human sword in a friend's hand.
—Byron.

Let the gulled fool the toil of war pursue, where bleed the many to enrich the few.—Shenstone.

The warrior who cultivates his mind polishes his arms.—Boufflers.

He is a soldier, fit to stand by Cæsar
And give direction. —Shakespeare.

Though triumphs were to generals only due, crowns were reserved to grace the soldiers too.—Pope.

Soldier, rest! thy warfare o'er, dream of fighting fields no more.—Sir
Walter Scott.

That in the captain's but a choleric word,
Which in the soldier is flat blasphemy.
—Shakespeare.

Without a home must the soldier go,
a changeful wanderer, and can warm himself at no home-lit hearth.—Schiller.

Enough of merit has each honored name
To shine untarnished on the rolls of fame,
And add new lustre to the historic page.
—David Humphreys.

You say, you are a better soldier:
Let it appear so; make your vaunting true.
And it shall please me well.
—Shakespeare.

Soldiers looked at as they ought to be. They are to the world as poppies to corn-fields.—Douglas Jerrold.

A soldier ought to consider peace only as a breathing-spell, which gives him leisure to contrive, and furnishes ability to execute, military plans.—
Macchiavelli.

Such is the country maiden's fright,
When first a red-coat is in sight;
Behind the door she hides her face;
Next time at distance eyes the lace.
—Gay.

I hate these potent madmen, who keep all Mankind awake, while they by their great deeds
Are drumming hard upon this hollow world,
Only to make a sound to last for ages.
—Crowne.

The broken soldier, kindly bade to stay,
Sat by his fire, and talk'd the night away;
Went o'er his wounds, or, tales of sorrow
done, Shoulder'd his crutch, and show'd how fields were won. —Goldsmith.

Soldiers in arms! Defenders of our soil!
Who from destruction save us; who from spoil
Protect the sons of peace, who traffic or who toil;
Would I could duly praise you, that each deed
Your foes might honor, and your friends might read. —Crabbe.

For it's Tommy this, an' Tommy that, an'
"Tommy, wait outside,"
But it's "Special train for Atkins" when the trooper's on the tide.
—Rudyard Kipling.

O it's Tommy this, an' Tommy that, an'
"Tommy, go away,"
But it's "Thank you, Mister Atkins," when the band begins to play.
—Rudyard Kipling.

Then it's Tommy this, an' Tommy that, an'
"Tommy, 'ow's yer soul?"
But it's "Thin red lines of 'eroes" when the drums begin to roll.
—Rudyard Kipling.

What right has any free, reasonable soul on earth to sell himself for a shilling a day to murder any man, right or wrong, even his own brother or his own father, just because such a whiskered, profligate jackanapes as that officer, without learning, without any good except his own looking-glass and his opera-dancer,—a fellow who,
just because he was born a gentleman, is set to command gray-headed men before he can command his own meanest passions. Good heavens! that the lives of free men should be intrusted to such a stuffed cockatoo; and that free men should be such traitors to their own flesh and blood as to sell themselves, for a shilling a day and the smirks of the nursery-maids, to do that fellow's bidding.—Charles Kingsley.

To swear, to game, to drink, to show at home
By lewdness, idleness, and Sabbath-breach,
The great proficiency he made abroad,
T' astonish and to grieve his gazing friends,
To break some maiden's and his mother's heart,

To be a pest where he was useful once,
Are his sole aim, and all his glory now.
—Cowper.

Policy goes beyond strength, and contrivance before action; hence it is that direction is left to the commander, execution to the soldier, who is not to ask why, but to do what he is commanded.—Xenophon.

Solitude

Solitude is sometimes best society.—Milton.

In solitude, where we are least alone.—Byron.

Solitude's the nurse of woe.—Parnell.

The thought, the deadly feel, of solitude.—Keats.

He makes a solitude, and calls it peace.—Byron.

There is a society in the deepest solitude.—Isaac Disraeli.

Until I truly loved, I was alone.—Mrs. Norton.

Far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife.—Gray.

The secret of solitude is that there is no solitude.—Joseph Cook.

Then never less alone than when alone.—Samuel Rogers.

Few are the faults we flatter when alone.—Young.

Among them, but not of them.—Byron.

Remote, unfriended, melancholy, slow.—Goldsmith.

Solitude is the audience-chamber of God.—Anne C. Lynch.

Wholesome solitude, the nurse of sense!—Pope.

Sorrow's faded form, and solitude behind.—Gray.

I was never less alone than when by myself.—Gibbon.

Nothing is achieved without solitude.—Lacordaire.

Only the bad man is alone.—Diderot.

We enter the world alone, we leave it alone.—Froude.

It is solitude should teach us how to die.—Byron.

Solitude vivifies; isolation kills.—Joseph Roux.

Solitude has a healing consoler, friend, companion; it is work.—Auerbach.

Solitude, the sly enemy that doth separate a man from well-doing.—Sir P. Sidney.

Cursed be the social lies that warp us from the living truth!—Tennyson.

Prison'd in a parlour snug and small,
Like bottled wasps upon a southern wall.
—Cowper.

Solitude is the home of the strong; silence, their prayer.—Ravignan.

Solitude cherishes great virtues, and destroys little ones.—Sydney Smith.

That inward eye which is the bliss of solitude.—Wordsworth.

So lonely 'twas that God himself scarce seemed there to be.—Coleridge

Eagles we see fly alone; and they are but sheep which always herd together.—Sir P. Sidney.

O solitude! where are the charms that sages have seen in thy face?—Cowper.

One can be instructed in society; one is inspired only in solitude.—Goethe.

Solitude is the worst of all companions when we seek comfort and oblivion.—Méry.

Constant quiet fills my peaceful breast with unmixed joy.—Dillon.

Alone each heart must cover up its dead; alone, through bitter toil, achieve its rest.—Bayard Taylor.

Ah! wretched and too solitary he who loves not his own company!—Cowley.

Where musing Solitude might love to lift her soul above this sphere of earthliness.—Shelley.

Through the wide world he only is alone who lives not for another.—Rogers.

So vain is the belief That the sequestered path has fewest flowers. —Thomas Doubleday.

They are never alone who are accompanied with noble thoughts.—Sir P. Sidney.

I love to be alone. I never found the companion that was so companionable as solitude.—Thoreau.

Man forms himself in his own interior, and nowhere else.—Lacordaire.

Through the lone groves would pace in solemn mood,
Wooing the pensive charms of solitude. —Pye.

Haughtiness lives under the same roof with solitude.—Plato.

Loneliness is the first thing which God's eye named not good.—Milton.

Those beings only are fit for solitude who are like nobody, and are liked by nobody.—Zimmermann.

In the world a man lives in his own age: in solitude, in all the ages.—William Matthews.

Solitude either develops the mental powers, or renders men dull and vicious.—Victor Hugo.

Woe unto him that is never alone, and cannot bear to be alone.—Hamerton.

Him who lonely loves to seek the distant hills, and there converse with nature.—Thomson.

He that lives alone lives in danger; society avoids many dangers.—Marcus Antoninus.

Solitude shows us what we should be; society shows us what we are.—Cecil.

Solitude is as needful to the imagination as society is wholesome for the character.—Lowell.

He is never less at leisure than when at leisure, nor less alone than when he is alone.—Cicero.

Shall I, like an hermit, dwell
On a rock or in a cell?
—Sir Walter Raleigh.

The life of a solitary man will be certainly miserable, but not certainly devout.—Johnson.

How sweet, how passing sweet, is solitude;
But grant me still a friend in my retreat,
Whom I may whisper—solitude is sweet.
—Cowper.

When, musing on companions gone,
We doubly feel ourselves alone. —Scott.

A hermit who has been shut up in his cell in a college has contracted a sort of mould and rust upon his soul.—Dr. Watts.

The city does not take away, neither does the country give, solitude; solitude is within us.—Joseph Roux.

Converse with men makes sharp the glittering wit; but God to man doth speak in solitude.—John Stuart Blackie.

Oh, lost to virtue—lost to manly thought,
Lost to the noble sallies of the soul
Who think it solitude to be alone.

—Young.

I am persuaded there is no such thing after all as a perfect enjoyment of solitude; for the more delicious the solitude the more one wants a companion.—Leigh Hunt.

Oh, the solitariness of sin! There is nothing like it, except, perhaps, the solitariness of death. In that isolation none can reach you, none can feed you.—Hugh R. Haweis.

There is always a part of our being into which those who are dearer to us far than our own lives are yet unable to enter.—Froude.

Heaven often protects valuable souls charged with great secrets, great ideas, by long shutting them up with their own thoughts.—Emerson.

To be exempt from the passions with which others are tormented is the only pleasing solitude.—Addison.

No doubt solitude is wholesome, but so is abstinence after a surfeit. The true life of man is in society.—Simms.

What would a man do if he were compelled to live always in the sultry heat of society, and could never better himself in cool solitude?—Hawthorne.

There is no man alone, because every man is a microcosm, and carries the whole world about him.—Sir T. Browne.

We could not endure solitude were it not for the powerful companionship of hope, or of some unseen one.—Richter.

All that poets sing, and grief hath known, of hopes laid waste, knells in that word "alone."—Bulwer-Lytton.

As there is no pleasure in military life for a soldier who fears death, so there is no independence in civil existence for the man who has an overpowering dread of solitude.—Hamerton.

I love tranquil solitude
And such society
As is quiet, wise, and good.
—Shelley.

If the mind loves solitude, it has thereby acquired a loftier character, and it becomes still more noble when the taste is indulged in.—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

The great man is he who, in the midst of the crowd, keeps with perfect sweetness the independence of solitude.—Emerson.

An entire life of solitude contradicts the purpose of our being, since death itself is scarcely an idea of more terror.—Burke.

It is shameful for a man to live as a stranger in his own country, and to be uninformed of her affairs and interests.—Manilius.

There is no such thing as solitude, nor anything that can be said to be alone and by itself but God, who is His own circle, and can subsist by Himself.—Sir T. Browne.

Solitude holds a cup sparkling with bliss in her right hand, a raging dagger in her left. To the blest she offers her goblet, but stretches towards the wretched the ruthless steel.—Klopstock.

Luther deters me from solitariness; but he does not mean from a sober solitude that rallies our scattered strengths and prepares us against any new encounter from without.—Atterbury.

Solitude, though it may be silent as light, is like light, the mightiest of agencies: for solitude is essential to man. All men come into this world alone; all leave it alone.—De Quincey.

It has been from age to age an affectation to love the pleasure of solitude among those who cannot possibly be supposed qualified for passing life in that manner.—Steele.

Solitude is the nurse of enthusiasm, and enthusiasm is the true parent of genius. In all ages solitude has been called for, has been flown to.—Disraeli.

What a brave privilege is it to be free from all contentions, from all envying or being envied, from receiving or paying all kinds of ceremonies!—Cowley.

I am monarch of all I survey,
My right there is none to dispute,
From the centre all round to the sea,
I am lord of the fowl and the brute.
—Cowper.

How use doth breed a habit in a man!
Here can I sit alone, unseen of any,
And, to the nightingale's complaining notes,
Tune my distresses, and record my woes.
—Shakespeare.

I could live in the woods with thee in sight,
Where never should human foot intrude:
Or with thee find light in the darkest night,
And a social crowd in solitude.
—Tibullus.

It had been hard to have put more truth and untruth together in a few words than in that speech, "Whosoever is delighted with solitude is either a wild beast or a god."—Bacon.

Such only can enjoy the country who are capable of thinking when they are there; then they are prepared for solitude, and in that case solitude is prepared for them.—Dryden.

Solitude bears the same relation to the mind that sleep does to the body. It affords it the necessary opportunities for repose and recovery.—Simms.

Man dwells apart, though not alone,
He walks among his peers unread;
The best of thoughts which he hath known,
For lack of listeners are not said.
—Jean Ingelow.

Never does the soul feel so far from human life as when a man finds himself alone in the vistas of the moon, either in the streets of a sleeping city, the avenues of the woods, or by the border of the sea.—Elizabeth Stoddard.

Thus let me live, unseen, unknown,
Thus unlamented let me die;
Steal from the world, and not a stone
Tell where I lie.
—Pope.

If solitude deprives of the benefit of advice, it also excludes from the mischief of flattery. But the absence of others' applause is generally supplied by the flattery of one's own breast.—W. B. Clulow.

Why should we faint and fear to live alone,
Since all alone, so Heaven has will'd, we die,
Nor even the tenderest heart, and next our own,
Knows half the reasons why we smile and sigh.
—Keble.

Solitude is not measured by the miles of space that intervene between a man and his fellows. The really diligent student in one of the crowded hives of Cambridge college is as solitary as a dervish in the desert.—Thoreau.

Thrice happy he, who by some shady grove,
Far from the clamorous world, doth live his own;
Though solitary, who is not alone,
But doth converse with that eternal love.
—Drummond.

But little do men perceive what solitude is, and how far its extendeth. For a crowd is not company; and faces are but a gallery of pictures; and talk but a tinkling cymbal, where there is no love.—Bacon.

That which happens to the soil when it ceases to be cultivated by the social man happens to man himself when he foolishly forsakes society for solitude; the brambles grow up in his desert heart.—Rivarol.

Solitude is one of the highest enjoyments of which our nature is susceptible. Solitude is also, when too long continued, capable of being made the most severe, indescribable, unendurable source of anguish.—Deloraine.

We must certainly acknowledge that solitude is a fine thing; but it is a pleasure to have some one who can answer, and to whom we can say, from time to time, that solitude is a fine thing.—Balzac.

He enter'd in his house—his home no more,
For without hearts there is no home;—
and felt
The solitude of passing his own door
Without a welcome. —Byron.

Leisure and solitude are the best effect of riches, because mother of thought. Both are avoided by most rich men, who seek company and business, which are signs of being weary of themselves.—Sir W. Temple.

O for a lodge in some vast wilderness,
Some boundless contiguity of shade,
Where rumor of oppression and deceit,
Of unsuccessful or successful war,
Might never reach me more. —Cowper.

Solitude can be well applied and sit right upon but very few persons. They must have knowledge enough of the world to see the follies of it, and virtue enough to despise all vanity.—Cowley.

Solitude has but one disadvantage—it is apt to give one too high an opinion of one's self. In the world we are sure to be often reminded of every known or supposed defect we may have.—Byron.

Nature has presented us with a large faculty of entertaining ourselves alone, and often calls us to it, to teach us that we owe ourselves in part to society, but chiefly and mostly to ourselves.—Montaigne.

Solitude is a good school, but the world is the best theater; the institution is best there, but the practice here; the wilderness hath the advantage of discipline, and society opportunities of perfection.—Jeremy Taylor.

How many have found solitude, not only, as Cicero calls it, the pabulum of the mind, but the nurse of their genius! How many of the world's most sacred oracles have been uttered, like those of Dodona, from the silence of deep woods!—Bulwer-Lytton.

The wild bird that flies so lone and far has somewhere its nest and brood. A little fluttering heart of love impels its wings, and points its course. There is nothing so solitary as a solitary man.—Chapin.

Living a good deal alone will, I believe, correct me of my faults; for a man can do without his own approbation in much society, but he must make great exertions to gain it when he lives alone. Without it I am convinced solitude is not to be endured.—Sydney Smith.

O sacred solitude! divine retreat!
Choice of the prudent! envy of the great
By thy pure stream, or in thy waving shade,
We court fair wisdom, that celestial maid:
The genuine offspring of her lov'd embrace,
(Strangers on earth!) are innocence and peace. —Young.

And Wisdom's self
Oft seeks to sweet retired solitude,
Where, with her best nurse, Contemplation,
She plumes her feathers, and lets grow her wings.
That in the various bustle of resort
Were all too ruffled, and sometimes impaired. —Milton.

'Tis not for golden eloquence I pray,
A godlike tongue to move a stony heart—
Methinks it were full well to be apart
In solitary uplands far away,
Betwixt the blossoms of a rosy spray,
Dreaming upon the wonderful sweet face
Of Nature, in a wild and pathless place.
—Frederick Tennyson.

The man how bless'd, who, sick of gaudy scenes, (Scenes apt to thrust between us and ourselves,)
Is led by choice to take his fav'rite walk
Beneath death's gloomy, silent, cypress shades,
Unpierc'd by vanity's fantastic ray;
To read his monuments, to weigh his dust,
Visit his vaults, and dwell among the tombs.
—Young.

Birds sing in vain to the ear, flowers bloom in vain to the eye, of mortified vanity and galled ambition. He who would know repose in retirement must carry into retirement his destiny, integral and serene, as the Cæsars transported the statue of Fortune into the chamber they chose for their sleep.—

Bulwer-Lytton.

The love of retirement has in all ages adhered closely to those minds which have been most enlarged by knowledge, or elevated by genius. Those who enjoyed everything generally supposed to confer happiness have been forced to seek it in the shades of privacy.—Johnson.

The man to solitude accustom'd long,
Perceives in everything that lives a tongue;
Not animals alone, but shrubs and trees Have speech for him, and understood with case,
After long drought when rains abundant fall,
He hears the herbs and flowers rejoicing
 all. —Cowper.

A certain degree of solitude seems necessary to the full growth and spread of the highest mind; and therefore must a very extensive intercourse with men stifle many a holy germ, and scare away the gods, who shun the restless tumult of noisy companies and the discussion of petty interests.—
Novalis.

One ought to love society, if he wishes to enjoy solitude. It is a social nature that solitude works upon with the most various power. If one is misanthropic, and betakes himself to loneliness that he may get away from hateful things, solitude is a silent emptiness to him.—Zimmermann.

All weighty things are done in solitude, that is, without society. The means of improvement consist not in projects, or in any violent designs, for these cool, and cool very soon, but in patient practicing for whole long days, by which I make the thing clear to my highest reason.—Richter.

When we withdraw from human intercourse into solitude, we are more peculiarly committed in the presence of the divinity; yet some men retire into solitude to devise or perpetrate crimes. This is like a man going to meet and brave a lion in his own gloomy desert, in the very precincts of his dread abode.—John Foster.

There is no such thing as a perfect secrecy to encourage a rational mind to the perpetration of any base action; for a man must first extinguish and put out the great light within him, his conscience; he must get away from himself, and shake off the thousand witnesses which he always carries about him, before he can be alone.—
South.

In solitude the mind gains strength, and learns to lean upon herself; in the world it seeks or accepts of a few treacherous supports—the feigned compassion of one, the flattery of a second, the civilities of a third, the friendship of a fourth—they all deceive, and bring the mind back to retirement, reflection, and books.—
Sterne.

Still this great solitude is quick with life.
Myriads of insects, gaudy as the flowers
They flutter over, gentle quadrupeds,
And birds, that scarce have learned the fear
 of man,
Are here, and sliding reptiles of the ground, Startlingly beautiful. The graceful deer Bounds to the wood at my approach. The bee

* * * * *
Fills the savannas with his murmurings
—William Cullen Bryant.

Unsociable humors are contracted in solitude, which will, in the end, not fail of corrupting the understanding as well as the manners, and of utterly disqualifying a man for the satisfactions and duties of life. Men must be taken as they are, and we neither make them or ourselves better by flying from or quarreling with them.—Burke.

My retirement was now become solitude; the former is, I believe, the best state for the mind of man, the latter almost the worst. In complete solitude, the eye wants objects, the heart wants attachments, the understanding wants reciprocation. The character loses its tenderness when it has nothing to strengthen it, its sweetness when it has nothing to soothe it.—
Hannah More.

The love of solitude, when cultivated in the morn of life, elevates the mind to a noble independence, but to ac quire the advantages which solitude is capable of affording, the mind must not be impelled to it by melancholy and discontent, but by a real distaste to the idle pleasures of the world, a rational contempt for the deceitful joys of life, and just apprehensions of being corrupted and seduced by its insinuating and destructive gayeties.—Zimmermann.

Solitude, the safeguard of mediocrity, is to genius the stern friend, the cold, obscure shelter where moult the wings which will bear it farther than suns and stars. He who would inspire and lead his race must be defended from traveling with the souls of other men, from living, breathing, reading, and writing in the daily time-worn yoke of their opinions.—Emerson.

O Solitude! if I must with thee dwell,
Let it not be among the jumbled heap
Of murky buildings; climb with me the steep,— Nature's observatory—whence the dell,
In flowery slopes, its river's crystal swell,
May seem a span; let me thy vigils keep 'Mongst boughs pavilion'd, where the deer's swift leap Startles the wild bee from the foxglove bell.
—Keats.

Solitude delighteth well to feed on many thoughts;
There as thou sittest peaceful, communing with fancy,
The precious poetry of life shall gild its leaden cares;
There, as thou walkest by the sea beneath the gentle stars,
Many kindling seeds of good will sprout within thy soul;
Thou shalt weep in Solitude,—thou shalt pray in Solitude.
Thou shalt sing for joy of heart, and praise the grace of Solitude.
—Tupper.

In early youth, if we find it difficult to control our feelings, so we find it difficult to vent them in the presence of others. On the spring side of twenty, if anything affects us, we rush to lock ourselves up in our room, or get away into the street or the fields; in our earlier years we are still the savages of nature, and we do as the poor brutes do. The wounded stag leaves the herd; and if there is anything on a dog's faithful heart, he slinks away into a corner.—Bulwer-Lytton.

I am not alone,
For solitude like this is populous,
And its abundant life of sky and sun,
High-floating clouds, low mists, and wheeling birds,
And waves that ripple shoreward all day long,
Whether the tide is setting in or out,
Forever rippling shoreward, dark and bright,
As lights and shadows, and the shifting winds
Pursue each other in their endless play,
Is more than the companionship of man.
—R. H. Stoddard.

But midst the crowd, the hum, the shock of men,
To hear, to see, to feel, and to possess,
And roam along, the world's tired denizen,
With none who bless us, none whom we can bless:
Minions of splendor shrinking from distress!
None that, with kindred consciousness endowed,
If we were not, would seem to smile the less,
Of all that flatter'd, follow'd, sought and sued;
This is to be alone; this, this is solitude!
—Byron.

He who must needs have company must needs have sometimes bad company. Be able to be alone; lose not the advantage of solitude and the society of thyself; nor be only content but delight to be alone and single with Omnipotency. He who is thus prepared, the day is not uneasy, nor the night black unto him. Darkness may bound his eyes, not his imagination. In his bed he may lie, like Pompey and his sons, in all quarters of the earth; may speculate the universe, and enjoy the whole world in the hermitage of himself.—Sir Thomas Browne.

Song

Faith and joy are the ascensive forces of song.—Stedman.

The lively Shadow-World of Song.—Schiller.

Songs consecrate to truth and liberty.—Shelley.

Odds life! must one swear to the truth of a song?—Prior.

And heaven had wanted one immortal song.—Dryden.

Song forbids victorious deeds to die.—Schiller.

Little dew-drops of celestial melody.—Carlyle.

Vocal portraits of the national mind.—Lamb.

Oh, she will sing the savageness out of a bear.—Shakespeare.

That music in itself, whose sounds are song,
The poetry of speech. —Byron.

A careless song, with a little nonsense in it now and then, does not misbecome a monarch.—Horace Walpole.

Soft words, with nothing in them, make a song.—Edmund Waller.

The fineness which a hymn or psalm affords
Is when the soul unto the lines accords. —Herbert.

Short swallow-flights of song, that dip
Their wings in tears, and skim away. —Tennyson.

There is a certain flimsiness of poetry which seems expedient in a song.—Shenstone.

It was his nature to blossom into song, as it is a tree's to leaf itself in April.—Alexander Smith.

A song will outlive all sermons in the memory.—Henry Giles.

The song that we hear with our ears is only the song that is sung in our hearts.—Ouida.

The song on its mighty pinions
Took every living soul, and lifted it gently to heaven. —Longfellow.

What is the voice of song, when the world lacks the ear to taste?—Hawthorne.

I never heard the old song of Percy and Douglass, that I found not my heart moved more than with a trumpet.—Sir Philip Sidney.

All great song, from the first day when human lips contrived syllables, has been sincere song.—Ruskin.

Song is the tone of feeling. * * *
If song, however, be the tone of feeling, what is beautiful singing? The balance of feeling, not the absence of it.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

Unlike my subject now * * * shall be my song,
It shall be witty and it sha'n't be long!
—Earl of Chesterfield.

Because the gift of Song was chiefly lent,
To give consoling music for the joys
We lack, and not for those which we possess. —Bayard Taylor.

They sang of love and not of fame;
Forgot was Britain's glory;
Each heart recalled a different name,
But all sang "Annie Laurie,"
—Bayard Taylor.

Every pert young fellow that has a moving fancy, and the least jingle of verse in his head, sets up for a writer of songs, and resolves to immortalize his bottle or his mistress.—Steele.

Such songs have power to quiet
The restless pulse of care,
And come like the benediction
That follows after prayer.
—Longfellow.

Now, good Cesario, but that piece of song,
That old and antique song we heard last night;
Methought it did relieve my passion much,
More than light airs and recollected terms
Of these most brisk and giddy-paced times:
Come, but one verse. —Shakespeare.

Although music appeals simply to the emotions, and represents no definite images in itself, we are justified in using any language which may serve to convey to others our musical expressions. Words will often pave the way for the more subtle operations of music, and unlock the treasures which sound alone can rifle, and hence the eternal popularity of song.—Hugh R. Haweis.

Every modulated sound is not a song, and every voice that executes a beautiful air does not sing. Singing should enchant. But to produce this effect there must be a quality of soul and voice which is by no means common even with great singers.—Joubert.

Sophistry

Sophistry is the fallacy of argument.—Beecher.

Some men weave their sophistry till their own reason is entangled.—Johnson.

Sophistry is only fit to make men more conceited in their ignorance.—Locke.

When a false argument puts on the appearance of a true one, then it is properly called a sophism or fallacy.—Dr. Watts.

The juggle of sophistry consists, for the most part, in using a word in one sense in all the premises, and in another sense in the conclusion.—Coleridge.

As, creeping ivy clings to wood or stone,
And hides the ruin that it feeds upon,
So sophistry cleaves close to and protects Sin's rotten trunk, concealing its defects.
—Cowper.

Dogmatic jargon learnt by heart,
Trite sentences hard terms of art,
To vulgar ears seemed so profound,
They fancied learning in the sound.
—Gay.

There is no error which hath not some appearance of probability resembling truth, which, when men who study to be singular find out, straining reason, they then publish to the world matter of contention and jangling.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Sophistry, like poison, is at once detected and nauseated, when presented to us in a concentrated form; but a fallacy which, when stated barely in a few sentences, would not deceive a child, may deceive half the world, if diluted in a quarto volume.—Whately.

Genius may dazzle, eloquence may persuade, reason may convince; but to render popular cold and comfortless sophistry, unaided by these powers, is a hopeless attempt.—Robert Hall.

Sorrow

Sorrow makes men sincere.—Beecher.

Social sorrow loses half its pain.—Johnson.

Here let me sit in sorrow for mankind.—Goldsmith.

Brief is sorrow, and endless is joy.—Schiller.

To live beneath sorrow, one must yield to it.—Mme. de Staël.

Nothing comes to us too soon but sorrow.—Bailey.

Till sorrow seemed to wear one common face.—Congreve.

Wisely weigh our sorrow with our comfort.—Shakespeare.

Sorrows remembered sweeten present joy.—Pollok.

Hang sorrow, care 'll kill a cat.—Ben Jonson.

Great sorrows cannot speak.—John Donne.

Sorrow, the great idealizer.—Lowell.

Sorrow is knowledge.—Byron.

All sorrows are bearable, if there is bread.—Cervantes.

Alas! sorrow from happiness is oft evolved.—Goethe.

Sorrow is held the eldest child of sin.—John Webster.

By sorrow of the heart the spirit is broken.—Bible.

Smit with exceeding sorrow unto Death.—Tennyson.

Sorrow ends not when it seemeth done.—Shakespeare.

There can be no rainbow without a cloud and a storm.—J. H. Vincent.

Down, thou climbing sorrow.—
Shakespeare.

And weep the more, because I weep
in vain.—Gray.

Sinks my sad soul with sorrow to the grave.—Homer.

I will instruct my sorrows to be proud.—Shakespeare.

There is no day without sorrow.—
Seneca.

My peace is gone, my heart is heavy.
—Goethe.

The heart may be broken, and the soul remain unshaken.—Napoleon.

It is easy in adversity to despise death; real fortitude has he who can dare to be wretched.—Seneca.

The sorrowful dislike the gay, and the gay the sorrowful.—Horace.

Sorrows are like thunder-clouds,— in the distance they look black, over our heads hardly gray.—Richter.

Joy, being altogether wanting,
It doth remember me the more of sorrow.
—Shakespeare.

We pick our own sorrows out of the joys of other men, and from their sorrows likewise we derive our joys.
—Owen Feltham.

Woes cluster; rare are solitary woes;
They love a train, they tread each other's heel.
—Young.

The deeper the sorrow, the less tongue hath it.—Talmud.

Present unhappiness is selfish; past sorrow is compassionate.—Joseph Roux.

Sorrow causes more absence of mind and confusion than so-called levity.—
—Richter.

The natural effect of sorrow over the dead is to refine and elevate the mind.—Washington Irving.

Even by means of our sorrows we belong to the eternal plan.—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

This sorrow's heavenly;
It strikes where it doth love.
—Shakespeare.

Sorrow conceal'd, like an oven stopp'd,
Doth burn the heart to cinders.
—Shakespeare.

Give sorrow words: the grief that does not ^{speak} Whispers the o'er-fraught heart, and bids it break.
—Shakespeare.

There is a joy in sorrow which none but a mourner can know.—Tupper.

Here I and sorrows sit:
Here is my throne, bid kings come bow to it.
—Shakespeare.

Weep on; and, as thy sorrows flow,
I'll taste the luxury of woe.
—Moore.

One sorrow never comes but brings an heir,
That may succeed as his inheritor.
—Shakespeare.

That a sorrow's crown of sorrow is remembering happier things.—Tenny-son.

Not to sorrow freely is never to open the bosom to the sweets of the sunshine.—Simms.

Some natural sorrow, loss, or pain,
That has been and may be again.
—Wordsworth.

Sorrow turns the stars into mourners, and every wind of heaven into a dirge.—Hannay.

Light griefs do speak, while sorrow's tongue is bound.—Seneca.

Every noble crown is, and on earth will ever be, a crown of thorns.—
Carlyle.

Sorrow is Mount Sinai. If one will, one may go up and talk with God, face to face.—Beecher.

He that would soothe sorrow must not argue on the vanity of the most deceitful hopes.—Walter Scott.

The best enjoyment is half disappointment to what we mean, or would have, in this world.—Bailey.

He who has most of heart, knows most of sorrow.—Bailey.

How beautiful, if sorrow had not made Sorrow more beautiful than Beauty's self.
—Keats.

The path of sorrow, and that path alone, Leads to the land where sorrow is unknown.
—Cowper.

Night brings out stars as sorrow shows us truths.—Bailey.

Any mind that is capable of a real sorrow is capable of good.—Mrs. Stowe.

Since sorrow never comes too late,
And happiness too swiftly flies.
—Gray.

Affliction may one day smile again; and till then, sit thee down, sorrow! —Shakespeare.

Sorrow breaks seasons and reposing hours,
Makes the night morning, and the noontide night.
—Shakespeare.

What signifies sadness, sir; a man grows lean on it.—Mackenzie.

Past sorrows, let us moderately lament them,
For those to come, seek wisely to prevent them.
—Webster.

I have that within which passeth show; These, but the trappings and the suits of woe.
—Shakespeare.

Courage! even sorrows, when once they are vanished, quicken the soul, as rain the valley.—Salis.

Gnarling sorrow hath less power to bite the man that mocks at it, and sets it light.—Shakespeare.

If grief is to be mitigated, it must either wear itself out or be shared.—Madame Swetchine.

Many an inherited sorrow that has marred a life has been breathed into no human ear.—George Eliot.

Man alone is born crying, lives complaining, and dies disappointed.—Sir W. Temple.

It is those who make the least display of their sorrow who mourn the deepest.—Chapin.

Sorrow is not evil, since it stimulates and purifies.—Mazzini.

Could my griefs speak, the tale would have no end.—Otway.

Great sorrows have no leisure to complain: Least ills vent forth, great griefs within remain.
—Goffe.

Sorrows must die with the joys they outnumber.—Schiller.

Sorrows humanize our race;
Tears are the showers that fertilize this world.
—Jean Ingelow.

Blessed are they that mourn for they shall be comforted.—Bible.

I do not know of a better cure for sorrow than to pity somebody else.—H. W. Shaw.

To the old, sorrow is sorrow; to the young, it is despair.—George Eliot.

Thou makest the man, O Sorrow!—yes, the whole man,—as the crucible gold.—Lamartine.

Ah, if you knew what peace there is in an accepted sorrow!—Mme. Guyon.

When sorrows come, they come not single spies,
But in battalions! —Shakespeare.

Sorrow is the mere rust of the soul. Activity will cleanse and brighten it.—Johnson.

It is with sorrows, as with countries, each man has his own.—Chateaubriand.

Year chases year, decay pursues decay; still drops some joy from withering life away.—Dr. Johnson.

Do not look at life's long sorrow; see how small each moment's pain.—
Adelaide A. Procter.

It eases some, though none it ever cured, to think their sorrows others have endured.—Shakespeare.

The seal of suffering impressed upon our destiny announces in clear characters our high calling.—De Gerando.

Whatever, below God, is the object of our love, will, at some time or other, be the matter of our sorrow.—Cecil.

As we retain but a faint remembrance of our felicity, it is but fair that the smartest stroke of sorrow should, if bitter, at least be brief.—
Earl of Beaconsfield.

The first pressure of sorrow crushes out from our hearts the best wine; afterwards the constant weight of it brings forth bitterness,—the taste and stain from the lees of the vat.—Longfellow.

Believe me, every man has his secret sorrows which the world knows not; and oftentimes we call a man cold when he is only sad.—Longfellow.

In the voice of mirth there may be excitement, but in the tones of mourning there is consolation.—W. G. Clarke.

Sorrow, like a heavy hanging bell, once set on ringing, with his own weight goes; then little strength rings out the doleful knell.—Shakespeare.

Tell me what is sorrow? It is a garden-bed.
And what is joy? It is a little rose,
Which in that garden grows.
—R. H. Stoddard.

How beautiful is sorrow, when 't is drest
By virgin innocence? it makes Felicity in others seem deform'd.
—Sir W. Davenant.

Sorrow is a stone that crushes a single bearer to the ground, while two are able to carry it with ease.—Bailey.

Whatever lives, lives to die in sorrow. We engage our hearts, and grasp after the things of this world, only to undergo the pang of losing them.—Schiller.

In extent sorrow is boundless,—it pours from ten million sources, and floods the world; but its depth is small,—it drowns few.—Charles Buxton.

Be of comfort, and your heavy sorrow
Part equally among us; storms divided, Abate their force, and with less rage are guided.
—Heywood.

There are sorrows that are not painful, but are of the nature of some acids, and give piquancy and flavor to life.—Beecher.

Real sorrow is almost as difficult to discover as real poverty. An instinctive delicacy hides the rays of the one and the wounds of the other.—Madame Swetchine.

Sorrow is knowledge; they who know thee most must mourn the deepest over the fatal truth, the tree of knowledge is not that of life.—Byron.

'T is the work of many a dark hour, many a prayer, to bring the heart back from an infant gone.—N. P. Willis.

There is enjoyment even in sadness; and the same souvenirs which have produced long regrets may also soften them.—De Boufflers.

We may learn from children how large a part of our grievances is imaginary. But the pain is just as real.—Bovee.

Thou canst not tell how rich a dowry sorrow gives the soul, how firm a faith and eagle sight of God.—Dean Alford.

The mind profits by the wreck of every passion, and we may measure our road to wisdom by the sorrows we have undergone.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Sorrow seems sent for our instruction, as we darken the cages of birds when we would teach them to sing.—Richter.

Affliction is a mother,
Whose painful throes yield many sons,
Each fairer than the other.
—Henry Vaughan.

Look, who comes here! a grave unto a soul,
Holding the eternal spirit, against her will,
In the vile prison of afflicted breath.
—Shakespeare.

Here bring your wounded hearts, here tell your anguish: earth hath no sorrow that heaven cannot heal.—
Moore.

Sorrow is properly that state of the mind in which our desires are fixed upon the past without looking forward to the future.—Dr. Johnson.

The sorrow which calls for help and comfort is not the greatest, nor does it come from the depths of the heart.—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

It is foolish to pluck out one's hair for sorrow, as if grief could be assuaged by baldness.—Cicero.

Joy cannot unfold the deepest truths. Cometh white-robed Sorrow, stooping and wan, and flingeth wide the door she must not enter.—George MacDonald.

If hearty sorrow be a sufficient ransom for offence, I tender it here; I do as truly suffer as e'er I did commit.—
Shakespeare.

It would seem that by our sorrows only we are called to a knowledge of the Infinite. Are we happy? The limits of life constrain us on all sides.—Madame Swetchine.

Sorrow itself is not so hard to bear
as the thought of sorrow coming.
Airy ghosts that work no harm do terrify us more than men in steel with bloody purpose.—Aldrich.

The human race are sons of sorrow born; and each must have his portion.
Vulgar minds refuse, or crouch beneath their load; the brave bear theirs without repining.—Mallet.

There is a sacredness in tears. They are not the mark of weakness, but of power. They speak more eloquently than ten thousand tongues.—W. Irving.

The dark in soul see in the universe their own shadow; the shattered spirit can only reflect external beauty in form as untrue and broken as itself.—
Binney.

The capacity of sorrow belongs to our grandeur; and the loftiest of our race are those who have had the profoundest grief, because they have had the profoundest sympathies.—Henry Giles.

Men die, but sorrow never dies;
The crowding years divide in vain,
And the wide world is knit with ties
Of common brotherhood in pain.
—Susan Coolidge.

O sorrow, wilt thou rule my blood,
But sometimes lovely, like a bride,
And put thy harsher moods aside,
If thou wilt have me wise and good.
—Tennyson.

A small sorrow distracts, a great one makes us collected; as a bell loses its clear tone when slightly cracked, and recovers it if the fissure is enlarged.—Richter.

'Tis better to be lowly born,
And range with humble livers in content,
Than to be perk'd up in a glistering grief,
And wear a golden sorrow.
—Shakespeare.

Alas! by some degree of woe
We every bliss must gain:
The heart can ne'er a transport know,
That never feels a pain.
—Lord Lyttleton.

Alas! I have not words to tell my grief;
To vent my sorrow would be some relief;
Light sufferings give us leisure to complain;
We groan, but cannot speak, in greater pain.
—Dryden.

When fresh sorrows have caused us to take some steps in the right way, we may not complain. We have invested in a life annuity, but the income remains.—Madame Swetchine.

Short time seems long in sorrow's sharp sustaining; though woe be heavy, yet it seldom sleeps, and they who watch see time how slow it creeps.—Shakespeare.

The path of sorrow, and that path alone,
Leads to the land where sorrow is unknown;
No traveller ever reach'd that blest abode,
Who found not thorns and briars in his road.
—Cowper.

There is no wisdom in useless and hopeless sorrow; but there is something in it so like virtue that he who is wholly without it cannot be loved, nor will by me, at least, be thought worthy of esteem.—Johnson.

To each his sufferings: all are men
Condemn'd alike to groan;
The tender for another's pain,
The unfeeling for his own. —Gray.

We fancy that our afflictions are sent us directly from above; sometimes we think it in piety and contrition, but oftener in moroseness and discontent. —Landon.

The echo of the nest-life, the voice of our modest, fairer, holier soul, is audible only in a sorrow-darkened bosom, as the nightingales warble when one veils their cage.—Richter.

Sorrows, as storms, bring down the clouds close to the earth; sorrows bring heaven down close; and they are instruments of cleansing and purifying.—Beecher.

The violence of sorrow is not at the first to be striven withal; being, like a mighty beast, sooner tamed with following than overthrown by withstanding.—Sir P. Sidney.

To love all mankind, from the greatest to the lowest, a cheerful state of being is required; but in order to see into mankind, into life, and still more into ourselves, suffering is requisite.—Richter.

The sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow from which we refuse to be divorced. Every other wound we seek to heal, every other affliction to forget; but this wound we consider it a duty to keep open, this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude.—Washington Irving.

Sorrow, being the natural and direct offspring of sin, that which first brought sin into the world, must, by necessary consequences, bring in sorrow also.—South.

Sorrow is sin's echo, and as the echo answers the voice best where there are broken walls and ruined buildings to return it, so is sorrow when reverberated by a broken ruined heart.—Philip Henry.

Time, thy name is sorrow, says the stricken Heart of life, laid waste with wasting flame
Ere the change of things and thoughts re-quicken,
Time, thy name. —Swinburne.

I have, as when the sun doth light a storm,
Buried this sigh in wrinkle of a smile:
But sorrow, that is couch'd in seeming gladness,
Is like that mirth fate turns to sudden sadness. —Shakespeare.

As fate is inexorable, and not to be moved either with tears or reproaches, an excess of sorrow is as foolish as profuse laughter; while, on the other hand, not to mourn at all is insensibility.—Seneca.

To grieve for evils is often wrong; but it is much more wrong to grieve without them. All sorrow that lasts longer than its cause is morbid, and should be shaken off as an attack of melancholy, as the forerunner of a greater evil than poverty or pain.—Johnson.

It is the veiled angel of sorrow who plucks away one thing and another that bound us here in ease and security, and, in the vanishing of these dear objects, indicates the true home of our affections and our peace.—Chapin.

Religion prescribes to every miserable man the means of bettering his condition; nay, it shows him that the bearing of his afflictions as he ought to do, will naturally end in the removal of them.—Addison.

Vital is the relation between earthly sorrow and eternal satisfaction. The travail to which God's saints are subjected results in the birth of nobler natures and more sanctified spirits. Pain always promotes progress, and suffering invariably ensures success.—J. McC. Holmes.

Sorrow preys upon
Its solitude and nothing more diverts it
From its sad visions of the other world
Than calling it at moments back to this.
The busy have no time for tears.

—Byron.

Every Calvary has an Olivet. To every place of crucifixion there is likewise a place of ascension. The sun that was shrouded is unveiled, and heaven opens with hopes eternal to the soul which was nigh unto despair.—Henry Giles.

Fairer and more fruitful in the spring the vine becomes from the skilful pruning of the husbandman; less pure had been the gums which the odorous balsam gives, if it had not been cut by the knife of the Arabian shepherd.—Metastasio.

Part of our good consists in the endeavor to do sorrows away, and in the power to sustain them when the endeavor fails,—to bear them nobly, and thus help others to bear them as well.—Leigh Hunt.

Earth may embitter, not remove,
The love divinely given;
And e'en that mortal grief shall prove
The immortality of love,
And lead us nearer heaven.

—Mrs. E. B. Browning.

Oh, look not at thy pains or sorrows, how great soever; but look from them, look off them, look beyond them, to the Deliverer, whose power is over them, and whose loving, wise, and tender spirit is able to do thee good by them!—Isaac Pennington.

Out of suffering have emerged the strongest souls; the most massive characters are seamed with scars; martyrs have put on their coronation robes glittering with fire, and through their tears have the sorrowful first seen the gates of heaven.—Chapin.

No wringing of the hands and knocking the breast, or wishing one's self unborn; all which are but the ceremonies of sorrow, the pomp and ostentation of an effeminate grief, which speak not so much the greatness of the misery as the smallness of the mind.—South.

If there is an evil in this world, it is sorrow and heaviness of heart. The loss of goods, of health, of coronets and mitres, is only evil as they occasion sorrow; take that out, the rest is fancy, and dwelleth only in the head of man.—Sterne.

As the Christian's sorrows multiply, his patience grows, until, with sweet, unruffled quiet, he can confront the ills of life, and, though inwardly wincing, can calmly pursue his way to the restful grave, while his old, harsh voice is softly cadenced into sweetest melody, like the faint notes of an angel's whispered song. As patience deepens, charity and sympathy increase.—George C. Lorimer.

There's no way to make sorrow light
But in the noble bearing; be content;
Blows given from heaven are our due punishment;
All shipwrecks are not drownings; you see buildings
Made fairer from their ruins.

—W. Rowley.

Sorrow treads heavily, and leaves behind
A deep impression, e'en when she departs;
While joy trips by with steps light as the wind,
And scarcely leaves a trace upon our hearts
Of her faint foot-falls: only this is sure,
In this world nought, save misery, can endure.

—Mrs. Embury.

And o'er that fair broad brow were wrought
The intersected lines of thought;
Those furrows, which the burning share
Of sorrow ploughs untimely there:
Scars of the lacerating mind,
Which the soul's war doth leave behind.

—Byron.

Nature always wears the colors of the spirit. To a man laboring under calamity the heat of his own fire hath sadness in it. Then there is a kind of contempt of the landscape felt by him who has just lost by death a dear friend. The sky is less grand as it shuts down over less worth in the population.—Emerson.

Whoever can turn his weeping eyes to heaven has lost nothing; for there, above, is everything he can wish for here below. He only is a loser, who persists in looking down on the narrow plains of the present time.—Richter.

Rash combat often immortalizes man; if he should fall, he is renowned in song; but after-ages reckon not the ceaseless tears which the forsaken woman sheds. Poets tell us not of the many nights consumed in weeping, or of the dreary days wherein her anguished soul vainly yearns to call her loved one back.—Goethe.

The night of sorrow now is turn'd to day,
Her two blue windows faintly she upheaveth,
Like the fair sun, when in his fresh array
He cheers the morn, and all the world relieveth;
And as the bright sun glorifies the sky,
So is her face illumined with her eye.
—Shakespeare.

Sorrows, because they are lingering guests, I will entertain but moderately, knowing that the more they are made of, the longer they will continue; and for pleasures, because they stay not, and do but call to drink at my door, I will use them as passengers with slight respect. He is his own best friend that makes least of both of them.—Bishop Hall.

Do not cheat thy Heart and tell her,
"Grief will pass away,
Hope for fairer times in future,
And forget to-day."
Tell her, if you will, that sorrow
Need not come in vain;
Tell her that the lesson taught her Far outweighs the pain.
—Adelaide A. Procter.

When some one sorrow, that is yet reparable, gets hold of your mind like a monomania,—when you think, because Heaven has denied you this or that, on which you had set your heart, that all your life must be a blank,—oh, then diet yourself well on biography,—the biography of good and great men. See how little a space one sorrow really makes in life. See scarce a page, perhaps, given to some grief similar to your own, and how triumphantly the life sails on beyond it.—Bulwer-Lytton.

For the external expressions and vent of sorrow, we know that there is a certain pleasure in weeping; it is the discharge of a big and swelling grief, of a full and strangling discontent; and therefore he that never had such a burden upon his heart as to give him opportunity thus to ease it has one pleasure in this world yet to come.—South.

When the cold breath of sorrow is sweeping
O'er the chords of the youthful heart,
And the earnest eye, dimm'd with strange weeping,
Sees the visions of fancy depart;
When the bloom of young feeling is dying,
And the heart throbs with passion's fierce strife,
When our sad days are wasted in sighing,
Who then can find sweetness in life?
—Mrs. Embury.

Sorrow, the heart must bear,
Sits in the home of each, conspicuous there.
Many a circumstance, at least,
Touches the very breast.
For those Whom any sent away,—he knows:
And in the live man's stead,
Armor and ashes reach
The house of each. —Robert Browning.

He that hath so many causes of joy, and so great, is very much in love with sorrow and peevishness, who loses all these pleasures, and chooses to sit down on his handful of thorns. Such a person is fit to bear Nero company in his funeral sorrow for the loss of one of Poppea's hairs, or help to mourn for Lesbia's sparrow; and because he loves it he deserves to starve in the midst of plenty, and to want comfort whilst he is encircled with blessings.—Jeremy Taylor.

From the very summit of his sorrows, where he had gone to die, Moses, for the first time in his life, caught a view of the land of Canaan. He did not know, as he went over the rocks, torn and weary, how lovely the prospect was from the top. In this world, it frequently happens that when man has reached the place of anguish, Goë rolls away the mist from his eyes, and the very spot selected as the receptacle of his tears, becomes the place of his highest rapture.—J. T. Headley.

Soul

'T is the Divinity that stirs within us.—Addison.

Vital spark of heav'nly flame!—Pope.

There is a divinity within our breast.—Ovid.

The soul is one with its faith.—C. A. Bartol.

The temples perish, but the God still lives.—Bailey.

The soul, immortal as its sire, shall never die.—Montgomery.

A soul as white as Heaven.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

The soul never grows old—Longfellow.

The soul knows no persons.—Emerson.

A single soul is richer than all the worlds.—Alexander Smith.

The soul has more diseases than the body.—H. W. Shaw.

And her immortal part with angels lives.—Shakespeare.

The dome of Thought, the palace of the Soul.—Byron.

Life is the soul's nursery.—Thackeray.

There are no twin souls in God's universe.—J. G. Holland.

Silence and solitude, the soul's best friends.—Longfellow.

Grief dejects and wrings the tortured soul.—Roscommon.

The soul, like the body, lives by what it feeds on.—J. G. Holland.

A noble soul has no other merit than to be a noble soul.—Schiller.

And keeps that palace of the soul serene.—Edmund Waller.

The one thing in the world of value is the active soul.—Emerson.

Think'st thou I'll endanger my soul gratis?—Shakespeare.

Above the vulgar flight of common souls.—Arthur Murphy.

The feast of reason and the flow of soul.—Pope.

A corporation has no soul.—Coke.

Oh! how seldom the soul is silent, in order that God may speak.—Fénelon.

The gods approve the depth, and not the tumult of the soul.—Wordsworth.

Thy soul's flight,
If it find heaven, must find it out to-night.
—Shakespeare.

In the scenes of moral life the soul is at once actor and spectator.—Degérando.

The want of goods is easily repaired, but the poverty of the soul is irreparable.—Montaigne.

For of the soule the bodie forme doth take;
For soule is forme and doth the bodie make.
—Spenser.

Ah, could the soul, like the body, have a mirror! It has,—a friend.—W. R. Alger.

'T would take an angel from above
To paint th' immortal soul.
—Mrs. Welby.

The production of souls is the secret of unfathomable depth.—Victor Hugo.

There is a remedy for every wrong and a satisfaction for every soul.—R. W. Emerson.

Souls are dangerous things to carry straight through all the spilt salt petre of this world.—Mrs. E. B. Browning.

Men possessing small souls are generally the authors of great evils.—Goethe.

The countenance is the portrait of the soul, and the eyes mark its intentions.—Cicero.

Christ bounds and terminates the vast desires of the soul; He is the very Sabbath of the soul.—John Flavel.

The imaginative faculty of the soul must be fed with objects immense and eternal.—Emerson.

And rest at last where souls unbodied dwell,
In ever-flowing meads of Asphodel.
—Homer.

The body,—that is dust; the soul,—it is a bud of eternity.—Nathaniel Culverwell.

From the looks—not the lips, is the soul reflected.—McDonald Clarke.

He had kept
The whiteness of his soul, and thus men o'er him wept.
—Byron.

The heart may be broken, and the soul remain unshaken.—Napoleon.

The soul on earth is an immortal guest, compelled to starve at an unreal feast.—Hannah More.

Every subject's duty is the king's; but every subject's soul is his own.—Shakespeare.

The faculties of our souls differ as widely as the features of our faces and the forms of our frames.—J. G. Holland.

Death only this mysterious truth unfolds,
The mighty soul, how small a body holds.
—Juvenal.

The soul, uneasy and confin'd from home,
Rests and expatiates in a life to come.
—Pope.

The limbs will quiver and move
after the soul is gone.—Sam'l Johnson.

And the weak soul, within itself unblest, leans for all pleasure on another's breast.—Goldsmith.

A soul without reflection, like a pile
Without inhabitant, to ruin runs.
—Dr. Young.

A happy soul, that all the way
To heaven hath a summer's day.
—Richard Crashaw.

And he that makes his soul his surety,
I think, does give the best security.
—Butler.

Ah, the souls of those that die
Are but sunbeams lifted higher.
—Longfellow.

A soul,—a spark of the never-dying flame that separates man from all the other beings of earth.—James Fenimore Cooper.

Yet stab at thee who will,
No stab the soul can kill!
—Sir Walter Raleigh.

The wealth of a soul is measured by how much it can feel; its poverty, by how little.—W. R. Alger.

I have a soul that, like an ample shield,
Can take in all, and verge enough for more.
—Dryden.

Gravity is the ballast of the soul, which keeps the mind steady.—Fuller.

A man's possessions are just as large as his own soul. If his title-deeds cover more, the surplus acres own him, not he the acres.—R. F. Hallock.

Not in the knowledge of things without, but in the perfection of the soul within, lies the empire of man aspiring to be more than man.—Bulwer-Lytton.

It seems to me as if not only the form, but the soul of man was made to "walk erect, and look upon the stars." Bulwer-Lytton.

Everywhere the human soul stands between a hemisphere of light and another of darkness; on the confines of two everlasting hostile empires, Necessity and Free Will.—Carlyle.

I am positive I have a soul; nor can all the books with which materialists have pestered the world ever convince me to the contrary.—Sterne.

But who would force the Soul, tilts with a straw Against a Champion cased in adamant.
—Wordsworth.

Some men have a Sunday soul, which they screw on in due time, and take off again every Monday morning.—Robert Hall.

Alas! alas! why, all the souls that were, were forfeit once; and he that might the vantage best have took found out the remedy.—Shakespeare.

There is nothing that is so wonderfully created as the human soul. There is something of God in it. We are infinite in the future, though we are finite in the past.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Life was intended to be so adjusted that the body should be the servant of the soul, and always subordinate to the soul.—J. G. Holland.

The soul has, living apart from its corporeal envelope, a profound habitual meditation which prepares it for a future life.—Hippel.

The soul is a temple; and God is silently building it by night and by day. Precious thoughts are building it; disinterested love is building it; all-penetrating faith is building it.—Henry Ward Beecher.

The strongest love which the human heart has ever felt has been that for its Heavenly Parent. Was it not then constituted for this love?—W. E. Channing.

We all dread a bodily paralysis, and would make use of every contrivance to avoid it; but none of us is troubled about a paralysis of the soul.—Epicurus.

Our souls must become expanded by the contemplation of Nature's grandeur, before we can fully comprehend the greatness of man.—Heine.

The saddest of all failures is that of a soul, with its capabilities and possibilities, failing of life everlasting, and entering upon that night of death upon which morning never dawns.—Herrick Johnson.

There is a god within us, and we have intercourse with heaven. That spirit comes from abodes on high.—Ovid.

If our souls be immortal, this makes amends for the frailties of life and the sufferings of this state.—Tillotson.

It is the soul itself which sees and hears, and not those parts which are, as it were, but windows to the soul.—Cicero.

What is mind? No matter. What is matter? Never mind. What is the soul? It is immaterial.—Hood.

The Egyptians, by the concurrent testimony of antiquity, were among the first who taught that the soul was immortal.—Bishop Warburton.

Our immortal souls, while righteous, are by God himself beautified with the title of his own image and similitude.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

The human soul is hospitable, and will entertain conflicting sentiments and contradictory opinions with much impartiality.—George Eliot.

The soul of man is larger than the sky.
Deeper than ocean, or the abysmal dark
Of the unfathomed centre.
—Hartley Coleridge.

Within this wall of flesh
There is a soul counts thee her creditor,
And with advantage means to pay thy love.
—Shakespeare.

Our souls sit close and silently within,
And their own web from their own entrails
spin;
And when eyes meet far off, our sense is such,
That, spider-like, we feel the tenderest touch.
—Dryden.

Why should I start at the plough of my Lord, that maketh deep furrows on my soul? I know he is no idle husbandman; he purposeth a crop.—Rutherford.

Whatever that be, which thinks, which understands, which wills, which acts, it is something celestial and divine; and, upon that account, must necessarily be eternal.—Cicero.

A fiery soul, which, working out its way,
Fretted the pygmy-body to decay,
And o'er-inform'd the tenement of clay.
—Dryden.

Is not the mighty mind, that son of heaven!
By tyrant life dethroned, imprison'd,
pain'd?
By death enlarg'd, ennobled, deify'd?
Death but entombs the body; life the soul.
—Young.

Nothing gives us a greater idea of our soul, than that God has given us, at the moment of our birth, an angel to take care of it.—Jerome.

The soul,
Advancing ever to the source of light
And all perfection, lives, adores, and reigns
In cloudless knowledge, purity, and bliss.
—Henry Ware.

A sublime soul can rise to all kinds of greatness, but by an effort; it can tear itself from all bondage, to all that limits and constrains it, but only by strength of will. Consequently the sublime soul is only free by broken efforts.—Schiller.

Every thing here, but the soul of man, is a passing shadow. The only enduring substance is within. When shall we awake to the sublime greatness, the perils, the accountableness, and the glorious destinies of the immortal soul?—W. E. Channing.

Go and try to save a soul, and you will see how well it is worth saving, how capable it is of the most complete salvation. Not by pondering about it, nor by talking of it, but by saving it, you learn its preciousness.—Phillips Brooks.

A charge to keep I have,
A God to glorify:
A never-dying soul to save,
And fit it for the sky.
—Charles Wesley.

Some of our philosophizing divines have too much exalted the faculties of our souls, when they have maintained that by their force mankind has been able to find out God.—Dryden.

What came from the earth returns to the earth, and the spirit that was sent from heaven, again carried back, is received into the temple of heaven.
—Lucretius.

The most regular and most perfect soul in the world has but too much to do to keep itself upright from being overthrown by its own weakness.—
Montaigne.

The light of love, the purity of grace,
The mind, the music breathing from her
face,
The heart whose softness harmonized the
whole—
And, oh! that eye was in itself a soul!
—Byron.

"No doubt," replied Scipio, "those are alive who have broken loose from the chains of the body as from a prison; it is yours, that is called life, that is really death."—Cicero.

As all curves have reference to their centres or foci, so all beauty of character has reference to the soul, and is a graceful gesture of recognition or waving of the body toward it.
—Thoreau.

The image of God was no less resplendent in man's practical understanding,—namely, that storehouse of the soul in which are treasured up the rules of action and the seeds of morality.—South.

The human soul is like a bird that is born in a cage. Nothing can deprive it of its natural longings, or obliterate the mysterious remembrance of its heritage.—Epes Sargent.

The soul's dark cottage, batter'd and decay'd,
Lets in new light through chinks that time has made;
Stronger by weakness, wiser men become;
As they draw nearer to their eternal home.
—Waller.

There are souls which fall from heaven like flowers; but ere the pure and fresh buds can open, they are trodden in the dust of the earth, and lie soiled and crushed under the foul tread of some brutal hoof.—Richter.

A soul which is conversant with virtue is like an ever flowing source, for it is pure and tranquil and potable and sweet and communicative (social) and rich and harmless and free from mischief.—Epictetus.

We may compare the soul to a linen cloth; it must be first washed to take off its native hue and color, and to make it white; and afterwards it must be ever and anon washed to preserve it white.—South.

I hardly know a sight that raises one's indignation more than that of an enlarged soul joined to a contracted fortune; unless it be that so much more common one, of a contracted soul joined to an enlarged fortune.—Lord Greville.

Embellish the soul with simplicity, with prudence, and everything which is neither virtuous nor vicious. Love all men. Walk according to God; for, as a poet hath said, his laws govern all.—Marcus Antoninus.

The health of the soul is as precarious as that of the body; for when we seem secure from passions, we are no less in danger of their infection than we are of falling ill when we appear to be well.—Rochefoucauld.

The action of the soul is oftener in that which is felt and left unsaid than in that which is said in any conversation. It broods over every society, and men unconsciously seek for it in each other.—Emerson.

To me the external existence of my soul is proved from my idea of activity. If I work incessantly until my death, nature will give me another form of existence when the present can no longer sustain my spirit.—Goethe.

I am fully convinced that the soul is indestructible, and that its activity will continue through eternity. It is like the sun, which, to our eyes, seems to set in night; but it has in reality only gone to diffuse its light elsewhere.—Goethe.

The mind is never right but when it is at peace within itself; the soul is in heaven even while it is in the flesh, if it be purged of its natural corruptions, and taken up with divine thoughts, and contemplations.—Seneca.

The soul languishing in obscurity contracts a kind of rust, or abandons itself to the chimera of presumption; for it is natural for it to acquire something, even when separated from any one.—Quintilian.

The soul may be compared to a field of battle, where the armies are ready every moment to encounter. Not a single vice but has a more powerful opponent, and not one virtue but may be overborne by a combination of vices.—Goldsmith.

The little flower that opens in the meadows lives and dies in a season; but what agencies have concentrated themselves to produce it! So the human soul lives in the midst of heavenly help.—Elizabeth Peabody.

I consider the soul of man as the ruin of a glorious pile of buildings; where, amidst great heaps of rubbish, you meet with noble fragments of sculpture, broken pillars and obelisks, and a magnificence in confusion.—Steele.

Not all the subtleties of metaphysics can make me doubt a moment of the immortality of the soul, and of a beneficent Providence. I feel it, I believe it, I desire it, I hope it, and will defend it to my last breath.—Rousseau.

There are some men's souls that are so thin, so almost destitute of what is the true idea of soul, that were not the guardian angels so keen-sighted, they would altogether overlook them.—Beecher.

To whatever world He carries our souls when they shall pass out of these imprisoning bodies, in those worlds these souls of ours shall find themselves part of the same great temple; for it belongs not to this earth alone.—Phillips Brooks.

The sun meets not the springing bud that stretches towards him with half the certainty that God, the source of all good, communicates himself to the soul that longs to partake of him.—William Law.

Or looks on heav'n with more than mortal eyes,
Bids his free soul expatiate in the skies,
Amid her kindred stars familiar roam,
Survey the region, and confess her home.
—Pope.

No iron chain, or outward force of any kind, could ever compel the soul of man to believe or to disbelieve: it is his own indefeasible light, that judgment of his; he will reign and believe there by the grace of God alone!—Carlyle.

What then do you call your soul? What idea have you of it? You cannot of yourselves, without revelation, admit the existence within you of anything but a power unknown to you of feeling and thinking.—Voltaire.

What is the elevation of the soul? A prompt, delicate, certain feeling for all that is beautiful, all that is grand; a quick resolution to do the greatest good by the smallest means; a great benevolence joined to a great strength and great humility.—Lavater.

Whate'er of earth is form'd, to earth returns,
* * * The soul
Of man alone, that particle divine,
Escapes the wreck of worlds, when all things fail. —W. C. Somerville.

There is, they say, (and I believe there is),
A spark within us of th' immortal fire,
That animates and moulds the grosser frame;
And when the body sinks, escapes to heaven;
Its native seat, and mixes with the gods.
—Armstrong.

Never let man imagine that he can pursue a good end by evil means, without sinning against his own soul! Any other issue is doubtful: the evil effect on himself is certain.—Southey.

It is certain that the soul is either mortal or immortal. The decision of this question must make a total difference in the principles of morals. Yet philosophers have arranged their moral system entirely independent of thls. What an extraordinary blindness!—Pascal.

We endow
Those whom we love, in our fond, passionate blindness,
With power upon our souls too absolute
To be a mortal's trust. —Mrs. Hemans.

Making one object, in outward or inward nature, more holy to a single heart is reward enough for a life; for the more sympathies we gain or awaken for what is beautiful, by so much deeper will be our sympathy for that which is most beautiful,—the human soul!—Lowell.

The soul of man is not a thing which comes and goes, is builded and decays like the elemental frame in which it is set to dwell, but a very living force, a very energy of God's organic will, which rules and moulds this universe.—Froude.

O, how much greater is the soul of one man than the vicissitudes of the whole globe! Child of heaven, and heir of immortality, how from some star hereafter wilt thou look back on the ant-hill and its commotions, from Clovis to Robespierre, from Noah to the Final Fire!—Bulwer-Lytton.

Now, believe me, God hides some ideal in every human soul. At some time in our life we feel a trembling, fearful longing to do some good thing. Life finds its noblest spring of excellence in this hidden impulse to do our best.—Robert Collyer.

The soul, the mother of deep fears,
Of high hopes infinite,
Of glorious dreams, mysterious tears,
Of sleepless inner sight;
Lovely, but solemn, it arose,
Unfolding what no more might close.
—Mrs. Hemans.

The soul is a fire that darts its rays through all the senses; it is in this fire that existence consists; all the observations and all the efforts of philosophers ought to turn towards this Me, the centre and moving power of our sentiments and our ideas.—Madame de Staël.

Alas! while the body stands so broad and brawny, must the soul lie blinded, dwarfed, stupefied, almost annihilated? Alas! this was, too, a breath of God, bestowed in heaven, but on earth never to be unfolded!—Carlyle.

If self-knowledge be a path to virtue, virtue is a much better one to self-knowledge. The more pure the soul becomes, it will, like certain precious stones that are sensible to the contact of poison, shrink from the fetid vapors of evil impressions.—Richter.

Go, Soul, the Body's guest,
Upon a thankless errand;
Fear not to touch the best,
The truth shall be thy warrant.
Go, since I needs must die,
And give them all the lie.
—Sir Walter Raleigh.

It is the Soul's prerogative, its fate,
To shape the outward to its own estate.
If right itself, then, all around is well;
If wrong, it makes of all without a hell.
So multiplies the Soul its joys or pain,
Gives out itself, itself takes back again.
Transformed by thee, the world hath but one face. —R. H. Dana.

Who tells me he denies his soul's immortal,
Whate'er his boast, has told me he's a knave;
His duty, 'tis to love himself alone,
Nor care though mankind perish, if he smiles,
Who thinks ere long the man shall wholly die,
Is dead already; nought but brute survives.
—Young.

The soul that lives, ascends frequently, and runs familiarly through the streets of the heavenly Jerusalem, visiting the patriarchs and prophets, saluting the apostles, and admiring the army of martyrs. So do thou lead on thy heart, and bring it to the palace of the Great King.—Richard Baxter.

If I am mistaken in my opinion that the human soul is immortal, I willingly err; nor would I have this pleasant error extorted from me; and if, as some minute philosophers suppose, death should deprive me of my being, I need not fear the raillery of those pretended philosophers when they are no more.—Cicero.

The Soul, secure in her existence, smiles
At the drawn dagger, and defies its point:
The stars shall fade away, the sun himself
Grow dim with age, and nature sink in years:
But thou shalt flourish in immortal youth,
Unhurt amidst the war of elements,
The wrecks of matter, and the crush of worlds!
—Addison.

As the flowers follow the sun, and silently hold up their petals to be tinted and enlarged by its shining, so must we, if we would know the joy of God, hold our souls, wills, hearts, and minds, still before Him, whose voice commands, whose love warns, whose truth makes fair our whole being. God speaks for the most part in such silence only. If the soul be full of tumult and jangling voices, His voice is little likely to be heard.—Alexander Maclaren.

This is my firm persuasion, that since the human soul exerts itself with so great activity, since it has such a remembrance of the best, such a concern for the future, since it is enriched with so many arts, sciences, and discoveries, it is impossible but the being which contains all these must be immortal.—Cato.

In the darkest hour through which a human soul can pass, whatever else is doubtful, this at least is certain. If there be no God and no future state, yet even then it is better to be generous than selfish, better to be chaste than licentious, better to be true than false, better to be brave than to be a coward.—F. W. Robertson.

Philosophers have widely differed as to the seat of the soul, and St. Paul has told us that out of the heart proceed murmurings; but there can be no doubt that the seat of perfect contentment is in the head, for every individual is thoroughly satisfied with his own proportion of brains.—Colton.

For it is unknown what is the real nature of the soul, whether it be born with the bodily frame or be infused at the moment of birth, whether it perishes along with us, when death separates the soul and body, or whether it visits the shades of Pluto and bottomless pits, or enters by divine appointment into other animals.—Lucretius.

My soul, the seas are rough, and thou a stranger
In these false coasts; O keep aloof; there's danger;
Cast forth thy plummet; see, a rock appears;
Thy ships want sea-room; make it with thy tears. —Quarles.

This boundless desire had not its original from man itself; nothing would render itself restless; something above the bounds of this world implanted those desires after a higher good, and made him restless in everything else. And since the soul can only rest is something infinite, there is something infinite for it to rest in.—Charnock.

Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll!
Leave thy low-vaulted past!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free, Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting seal! —O. W. Holmes.

To look upon the soul as going on from strength to strength, to consider that she is to shine forever with new accessions of glory, and brighten to all eternity; that she will be still adding virtue to virtue, and knowledge to knowledge,—carries in it something wonderfully agreeable to that ambition which is natural to the mind of man.—Addison.

With what astonishment and veneration may we look into our own souls, where there are such hidden stores of virtue and knowledge, such inexhaustible sources of perfection. We know not yet what we shall be, nor will it ever enter into the heart to conceive the glory that will be always in reserve for it.—Addison.

After all, let a man take what pains he may to hush it down, a human soul is an awful, ghostly, unquiet possession for a bad man to have. Who knows the metes and bounds of it? Who knows all its awful perhappes,—those shudderings and tremblings, which it can no more live down than it can outlive its own eternity?—Mrs. Stowe.

Oh soul! I said, "thy boding murmurs cease;
Though sorrow bind thee as a funeral pall,
Thy Father's hand is guiding thee through all.
His love will bring a true and perfect peace.
Look upward once again; though drear the night,
Earth may be darkness, Heaven will give thee light!" —Mrs. Neal.

The soul, considered with its Creator, is like one of those mathematical lines that may draw nearer to another for all eternity without a possibility of touching it; and can there be a thought so transporting as to consider ourselves in these perpetual approaches to Him, who is not only the standard of perfection, but of happiness?—Addison.

Wander at will,
Day after day,— Wander away,— Wandering still—
Soul that canst soar!
Body may slumber:
Body shall cumber
Soul-flight no more.
—Robert Browning.

The soul of a true Christian appears like such a little white flower as we see in the spring of the year, low and humble on the ground, opening its bosom to receive the pleasant beams of the sun's glory, rejoicing, as it were, in a calm rapture, diffusing around a sweet fragrant, standing peacefully and lovingly in the midst of other flowers round about, all in like manner opening their bosoms to drink in the light of the sun.—Jonathan Edwards.

You can throw yourselves away. You can become of no use in the universe except for a warning. You can lose your souls. Oh, what a loss is that! The perversion and degradation of every high and immortal power for an eternity! And shall this be true of any one of you? Will you be lost when One has come from heaven, traveling in the greatness of His strength, and with garments dyed in blood, on purpose to guide you home—home to a Father's house—to an eternal home?—Mark Hopkins.

Where are Shakespeare's imagination, Bacon's learning, Galileo's dream? Where is the sweet fancy of Sidney, the airy spirit of Fletcher, and Milton's thought severe? Methinks such things should not die and dissipate, when a hair can live for centuries, and a brick of Egypt will last three thousand years. I am content to believe that the mind of man survives, somehow or other, his clay. —Barry Cornwall.

The soul on earth is an immortal guest,
Compell'd to starve at an unreal feast:
A spark, which upward tends by nature's force:

A stream diverted from its parent source;
A drop dissever'd from the boundless sea;
A moment, parted from eternity;
A pilgrim panting for the rest to come;
An exile, anxious for his native home.

—Hannah More.

What, my soul, was thy errand here?

Was it mirth or ease,

Or heaping up dust from year to year?

"Nay, none of these!"

Speak, soul, aright in His holy sight,

Whose eye looks still

And steadily on thee through the night;

"To do His will!" —Whittier.

But whither went his soul, let such relate
Who search the secrets of the future state:
Divines can say but what themselves believe;

Strong proofs they have, but not demonstrative:

For, were all plain, then all sides must agree,

And faith itself be lost in certainty.

To live uprightly then is sure the best,
To save ourselves, and not to damn the rest.

—Dryden.

Two things a master commits to his servant's care—the child and the child's clothes. It will be a poor excuse for the servant to say, at his master's return, "Sir, here are all the child's clothes, neat and clean, but the child is lost." Much so of the account that many will give to God of their souls and bodies at the great day. "Lord, here is my body; I am very grateful for it; I neglected nothing that belonged to its contents and welfare; but as for my soul, that is lost and cast away forever. I took little care and thought about it."—John Flavel.

Either we have an immortal soul, or we have not. If we have not, we are beasts,—the first and the wisest of beasts, it may be, but still true beasts. We shall only differ in degree and not in kind,—just as the elephant differs from the slug. But by the concession of the materialists of all the schools, or almost all, we are not of the same kind as beasts, and this also we say from our own consciousness. Therefore, methinks, it must be the possession of the soul within us that makes the difference. —Coleridge.

Our thoughts are boundless, though our frames are frail,

Our souls immortal, though our limbs decay;

Though darken'd in this poor life by a veil

Of suffering, dying matter, we shall play

In truth's eternal sunbeams; on the way

To heaven's high capital our cars shall roll:

The temple of the Power whom all obey,

That is the mark we tend to, for the soul

Can take no lower flight, and seek no meaner goal.

—Percival's Prometheus.

We cannot describe the natural history of the soul, but we know that it is divine. All things are known to the soul. It is not to be surprised by any communication. Nothing can be greater than it, let those fear and those fawn who will. The soul is in her native realm; and it is wider than space, older than time, wide as hope, rich as love. Pusillanimity and fear she refuses with a beautiful scorn; they are not for her who putteth on her coronation robes, and goes out through universal love to universal power.—Emerson.

Sound

How deep is the magic of sound may be learned by breaking some sweet verses into prose. The operation has been compared to gathering dew-drops, which shine like jewels upon the flower, but run into water in the hand. The elements remain, but the sparkle is gone.—Willmott.

Sweet is every sound,
Sweeter thy voice, but every sound is sweet;

Myriads of rivulets hurrying through the lawn,

The moan of doves in immemorial elms,
And murmuring of innumerable bees.

—Tennyson.

Sound—

That stealeth ever on the ear of him
Who, musing, gazeth on the distance dim,
And sees the darkness coming as a cloud—
Is not its form—its voice—most palpable and loud?

—Poe.

Spain

Fair land! of chivalry the old domain,
Land of the vine and olive, lovely Spain!
Though not for thee with classic shores to vie

In charms that fix th' enthusiast's pensive
eye;

Yet hast thou scenes of beauty, richly fraught

With all that wakes the glow of lofty
thought;

Fountains, and vales, and rocks, whose ancient name

High deeds have raised to mingle with their fame.

—Mrs. Hemans.

Not all the blood at Talavera shed,
Not all the marvels of Barossa's fight,
Not Albuera lavish of the dead,
Have won for Spain her well-asserted right.
When shall her olive-branch be free from blight?

When shall she breathe her from the blus-ing toil?

How many a doubtful day shall sink in
night,

Ere the Frank robber turn him from his spoil.

And Freedom's stranger-tree grow native of the soil!

—Byron.

Sparrow

The sparrows chirped as if they still were proud

Their race in Holy Writ should mentioned
be.

—Longfellow.

The hedge-sparrow fed the cuckoo so long,
That it had it head bit off by it young.

—Shakespeare.

Blithe wanderer of the wintry air,
Now here, now there, now everywhere,
Quick drifting to and fro,
A cheerful life devoid of care,

A shadow on the snow.

—George W. Bungay.

And in thy own sermon, thou
That the sparrow falls dost allow,
It shall not cause me any alarm;
For neither so comes the bird to harm,
Seeing our Father, thou hast said,
Is by the sparrow's dying bed;
Therefore it is a blessed place,
And the sparrow in high grace.

—George MacDonald.

Specialty

A man is like a bit of Labrador spar, which has no lustre as you turn it in your hand, until you come to a particular angle; then it shows deep and beautiful colors. There is no adaptation or universal applicability in men, but each has his special talent, and the mastery of successful men consists in adroitly keeping themselves where and when that turn shall be oftenest to be practised.—Emerson.

Speculation

Conjecture as to things useful is good; but conjecture as to what it would be useless to know, such as whether men went upon all-fours, is very idle.—Johnson.

Wise man was he who counselled that speculation should have free course, and look fearlessly towards all the thirty-two points of the compass, whithersoever and howsoever it listed.—Carlyle.

The history of humankind to trace Since Eve, the first of dupes, our doom unriddled,

A certain portion of the human race
Has certainly a taste for being diddled.
Witness the famous Mississippi dreams!
A rage that time seems only to redouble—
The banks, joint stocks, and all the flimsy schemes,

For rolling in Pactolian streams
That cost our modern rogues so little trouble

No matter what, to pasture cows on stubble
To twist sea-sand into a solid rope,
To make French bricks and fancy bread of rubble,

Or light with gas the whole celestial cope—
Only propose to blow a bubble,
And Lord! what hundreds will subscribe for soap!

—Hood.

The besetting evil of our age is the temptation to squander and dilute thought on a thousand different lines of inquiry.—Sir John Herschel.

Speech

Speech is but the incorporation of thought.—Joubert.

Speak briefly and to the point.—Cato.

Speech is the index of the mind.—Seneca.

A knavish speech sleeps in a foolish ear.—Shakespeare.

Speech is silvern, Silence is golden.—German Proverb.

She speaks poniards, and every word stabs.—Shakespeare.

Be swift to hear, slow to speak.—Cleobulus.

Speech is * * * the art of * * * stifling and suspending thought.—Carlyle.

Hear much; speak little.—Bias.

In man speaks God.—Hesiod.

The silent countenance often speaks.—Ovid.

My voice stuck in my throat.—Virgil.

We must speak by the card, or equivocation will undo us.—Shakespeare.

You drown him by your talk.—Plautus.

I will speak daggers to her, but use none.—Shakespeare.

Speech is reason's brother, and a kindly prerogative of man.—Tupper.

He mouths a sentence as curs mouth a bone.—Churchill.

In laboring to be concise, I become obscure.—Horace.

Speeches cannot be made long enough for the speakers, nor short enough for the hearers.—Perry.

Speak but little and well, if you would be esteemed as a man of merit.—Trench.

The true use of speech is not so much to express our wants as to conceal them.—Goldsmith.

All have the gift of speech, but few are possessed of wisdom.—Cato.

Your fair discourse hath been as sugar, Making the hard way sweet and delectable.—Shakespeare.

The heart seldom feels what the mouth expresses.—Campistron.

Speech is a faculty given to man to conceal his thoughts.—Talleyrand.

They only employ words to disguise their thoughts.—Voltaire.

Speech is but broken light upon the depth Of the unspoken.—George Eliot.

Thou speakest a word of great moment calmly.—Goethe.

Where Nature's end of language is declined, and men talk only to conceal the mind.—Young.

It was whispered balm, it was sunshine spoken!—Moore.

Speech is better than silence; silence is better than speech.—Emerson.

He who talks much cannot always talk well.—Goldoni.

The mouth of a wise man is in his heart; the heart of a fool is in his mouth.—Bible.

Consider in silence whatever any one says: speech both conceals and reveals the inner soul of man.—Cato.

His speech was a fine sample, on the whole, Of rhetoric, which the learn'd call "rigmale."—Byron.

Seldom is there much spoke, but something or other had better not been spoke.—South.

Let him be sure to leave other men their turn to speak.—Bacon.

The flowering moments of the mind drop half their petals in our speech.—O. W. Holmes.

Speech that leads not to action, still more that hinders it, is a nuisance on the earth.—Carlyle.

Just at the age 'twixt boy and youth, When thought is speech, and speech is truth.—Scott.

The Chinese have an excellent proverb: "Be modest in speech, but excel in action."—Horace Mann.

Speech is power: speech is to persuade, to convert, to compel.—Emerson.

It is never so difficult to speak as when we are ashamed of our silence.—La Rochefoucauld.

The truth thy speech doth show, within my heart reproves the swelling pride.—Dante.

I shall make you an impromptu at my leisure.—Molière.

A superior man is modest in his speech, but exceeds in his actions.—Confucius.

Conversation is the image of the mind; as the man, so is his speech.—Syrus.

I have often regretted having spoken, never having kept silent.—Syrus.

Do you wish people to speak well of you? Then do not speak at all yourself.—Pascal.

Speech is the golden harvest that followeth the flowering of thought.—Tupper.

Let no one be willing to speak ill of the absent.—Propertius.

We rarely repent of speaking little, but often of speaking too much.—Bruyère.

As a vessel is known by the sound, whether it be cracked or not; so men are proved, by their speeches, whether they be wise or foolish.—Demosthenes.

Rude am I in my speech And little bless'd with the soft phrase of peace.—Shakespeare.

I had a thing to say, But I will fit it with some better time.—Shakespeare.

For brevity is very good, Where we are or are not understood.—Butler.

And endless are the modes of speech, and far Extends from side to side the field of words.—Homer.

Concerning the dead nothing but good shall be spoken.—Plutarch.

It is a tiresome way of speaking, when you should despatch the business, to beat about the bush.—Plautus.

Such as thy words are, such will thy affections be esteemed; and such will thy deeds as thy affections, and such thy life as thy deeds.—Socrates.

I would be loath to cast away my speech; for, besides that it is excellently well penn'd, I have taken great pains to con it.—Shakespeare.

The speech of the tongue is best known to men; God best understands the language of the heart.—Warwick.

God has given us speech in order that we may say pleasant things to our friends, and tell bitter truths to our enemies.—Heinrich Heine.

Man is born with the faculty of speech. Who gives it to him? He who gives the bird its song.—Joubert.

One learns taciturnity best among people who have none, and loquacity among the taciturn.—Jean Paul Richter.

Choice word and measured phrase, above the reach Of ordinary men.—Wordsworth.

Speech is as a pump, by which we raise and pour out the water from the great lake of Thought,—whither it flows back again.—John Sterling.

Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt, and ye may know how ye ought to answer every man.—Bible.

When we are understood, we always speak well, and then all your fine diction serves no purpose.—Molière.

O that grave speech would cumber our quick souls
Like bells that waste the moments with their loudness. —George Eliot.

When Adam first of men,
To first of women Eve, thus moving speech,
Turn'd him all ear to hear new utterance flow. —Milton.

Speech was made to open man to man, and not to hide him; to promote commerce, and not betray it.—David Lloyd.

Speak not at all, in any wise, till you have somewhat to speak; care not for the reward of your speaking, but simply and with undivided mind for the truth of your speaking.—Carlyle.

A sentence well couched takes both the sense and the understanding. I love not those cart-rope speeches that are longer than the memory of man can fathom.—Feltham.

Lovers are apt to hear through their eyes, but the safest way is to see through their ears. Who was it that said, "Speak, that I may see you?"—Sterne.

Speech is like cloth of Arras opened and put abroad, whereby the imagery doth appear in figure; whereas in thoughts they lie but as in packs.—Plutarch.

Speak gently! 'tis a little thing
Dropp'd in the heart's deep well;
The good, the joy, that it may bring Eternity shall tell.—G. W. Langford.

He who does not make his words rather serve to conceal than discover the sense of his heart deserves to have it pulled out like a traitor's and shown publicly to the rabble.—Butler.

Discretion of speech is more than eloquence; and to speak agreeably to him with whom we deal is more than to speak in good words or in good order.—Bacon.

Depend upon it, sir, it is when you come close to a man in conversation that you discover what his real abilities are; to make a speech in a public assembly is a knack.—Dr. Johnson.

Half the sorrows of women would be averted if they could repress the speech they know to be useless,—nay, the speech they have resolved not to utter.—George Eliot.

Speech is too often not, as the Frenchman defined it, the art of concealing thought, but of quite stifling and suspending thought, so that there is none to conceal.—Carlyle.

Themistocles replied that a man's discourse was like to a rich Persian carpet, the beautiful figures and patterns of which can only be shown by spreading and extending it out; when it is contracted and folded up, they are obscured and lost.—Plutarch.

Sheridan once said of some speech, in his acute, sarcastic way, that "it contained a great deal both of what was new and what was true; but that unfortunately what was new was not true, and what was true was not new."—Hazlitt.

Abstruse and mystic thoughts you must express
With painful care, but seeming easiness;
For truth shines brightest thro' the plainest dress. —Wentworth Dillon.

God, that all-powerful Creator of nature and Architect of the world, has impressed man with no character so proper to distinguish him from other animals, as by the faculty of speech.—Quintilian.

Speech is the light, the morning of the mind:
It spreads the beauteous images abroad,
Which else lie furl'd and shrouded in the soul. —Dryden.

When you speak to any, especially of quality, look them full in the face;

other gestures betraying want of breeding, confidence, or honesty; dejected eyes confessing, to most judgments, guilt or folly.—F. Osborn.

When speech is given to a soul holy and true, time, and its dome of ages, becomes as a mighty whispering-gallery, round which the imprisoned utterance runs, and reverberates forever.—James Martineau.

Think all you speak; but speak not all you think:
Thoughts are your own; your words are so no more.
Where Wisdom steers, wind cannot make you sink:
Lips never err, when she does keep the door.
—Delaune.

Boys flying kites haul in their white winged birds;
You can't do that way when you're flying words.
"Careful with fire," is good advice we know.
"Careful with words," is ten times doubly so.
Thoughts unexpressed may sometimes fall back dead;
But God Himself can't kill them when they're said.
—Will Carleton.

Oh, but the heavenly grammar did I hold
Of that high speech which angels' tongues turn gold!
So should her deathless beauty take no wrong,
Praised in her own great kindred's fit and cognate tongue.
Or if that language yet with us abode
Which Adam in the garden talked with God!
But our untamed speech descends—poor heirs!
Grimy and rough-cast still from Babel's bricklayers:
Curse on the brutish jargon we inherit,
Strong but to damn, not memorise, a spirit!
A cheek, a lip, a limb, a bosom, they Move with light ease in speech of working-day;
And women we do use to praise even so.
—Francis Thompson.

According to Solomon, life and death are in the power of the tongue; and as Euripides truly affirmeth, every unbridled tongue in the end shall find itself unfortunate; for in all that ever I observed in the course of worldly things, I ever found that men's fortunes are oftener made by their tongues than by their virtues, and more men's fortunes overthrown thereby, also, than by their vices.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Rude am I in my speech,
And little blessed with the soft phrase of peace;
For since these arms of mine had seven years' pith,
Till now some nine moons wasted, they have us'd
Their dearest action in the tented field,
And little of this great world can I speak,
More than pertains to feats of broil and battle,
And therefore little shall I grace my cause
In speaking for myself. —Shakespeare.

Never is the deep, strong voice of man, or the low, sweet voice of woman, finer than in the earnest but mellow tones of familiar speech, richer than the richest music, which are a delight while they are heard, which linger still upon the ear in softened echoes, and which, when they have ceased, come, long after, back to memory, like the murmurs of a distant hymn.—Henry Giles.

Spider

The spider's touch, how exquisitely fine!
Feels at each thread, and lives along the line.
—Pope.

"Will you walk into my parlor?"

Said a spider to a fly;
"Tis the prettiest little parlor
That ever you did spy."

—Mary Howitt

Much like a subtle spider, which doth sit
In middle of her web, which spreadeth wide:

If aught do touch the utmost thread of it,
She feels it instantly on every side.
—Sir John Davies.

Or (almost) like a spider, who, confin'd
In her web's centre, shakt with every wind;
Moves in an instant, if the buzzing flea Stir but a string of her lawn canopie.
—Du Bartas.

Spire

Magnific walls, and heaven-assaulting spires.—Smart.

Who taught that heaven-directed spire to rise?—Pope.

Rushing from the woods, the spires Seem from hence ascending fires!
—Dyer.

These pointed spires, that wound the ambient sky.—Prior.

Nought but the heaven-directed spire.—Wordsworth.

How the tall temples, as to meet their gods,
Ascend the skies! —Young.

The tapering pyramid,—whose spiky top has wounded the thick cloud.—
Blair.

Thy best type, desire of the sad heart,—the heaven-ascending spire.—
Bulwer-Lytton.

Yon towers, whose wanton tops do buss the clouds.—Shakespeare.

Ye swelling hills and spacious plains!
Besprent from shore to shore with steeple
towers,
And spires whose "silent finger points to heaven." —Wordsworth.

View not this spire by measure given,
To buildings raised by common hands;
That fabric rises high as heaven,
Whose basis on devotion stands.
—Prior.

The village church, among the trees,
Where first our marriage-vows were given,
With merry peals shall swell the breeze,
And point with taper spire to heaven.
—Rogers.

Where'er a spire points up to heaven,
Through storm and summer air,
Telling that all around have striven,
Man's heart, and hope, and prayer.
—Mrs. Hemans.

An instinctive taste teaches men to build their churches in flat countries with spire-steeple; which, as they cannot be referred to any other object, point as with silent finger to the sky and stars.—S. T. Coleridge.

Spirits

I can call spirits from the vasty deep.—Shakespeare.

Beautiful spirit, with thy hair of light and dazzling eyes of glory!—
Byron.

Beware what spirit rages in your breast; for one inspired, ten thousand are possessed.—Roscommon.

Spirits live insphered, in regions mild, of calm and serene air.—Milton.

The spirits perverse with easy intercourse pass to and fro, to tempt or punish mortals.—Milton.

Spirits are not finely touched
But to fine issues. —Shakespeare.

For spirits when they please
Can either sex assume, or both.
—Milton.

There is an evil spirit continually active and intent to seduce.—South.

Spirits of peace, where are ye? are ye all gone?
And leave me here in wretchedness behind ye? —Shakespeare.

Millions of spiritual creatures walk the
earth
Unseen, both when we wake, and when we sleep. —Milton.

Without the notion and allowance of spirits, our philosophy will be lame and defective in one main part of it.
—Locke.

He had been indulging in fanciful speculations on spiritual essences until he had an ideal world of his own around him.—Washington Irving.

Whither are they vanished? Into the air; and what seemed corporal melted, as breath into the wind.—
Shakespeare.

How must a spirit, late escaped from earth, the truth of things new blazing in its eyes, look back astonished on the ways of men, whose lives' whole drift is to forget their graves!—Young.

All heart they live, all head, all eye, all
ear,
All intellect, all sense, and as they please They llmb themselves, and color, shape, or size Assume, as likes them best, condense or rare. —Milton.

There's a spirit above, and a spirit below,
A spirit of joy, and a spirit of woe,
The spirit above is the spirit divine,
The spirit below is the spirit of wine.
—Written About 1825.

Wicked spirits may by their cunning carry further in a seeming confederacy or subserviency to the designs of a good angel.—Dryden.

For my own part, I am apt to join in the opinion with those who believe that all the regions of Nature swarm with spirits, and that we have multitudes of spectators on all our actions when we think ourselves most alone.—Addison.

Aërial spirits, by great Jove design'd
To be on earth the guardians of mankind:
Invisible to mortal eyes they go,
And mark our actions, good or bad, below:
The immortal spies with watchful care
preside,
And thrice ten thousand round their charges glide:
They can reward with glory or with gold,
A power they by divine permission hold.
—Hesiod.

Whether dark presages of the night proceed from any latent power of the soul during her abstraction, or from any operation of subordinate spirits, has been a dispute.—Addison.

Spirituality

As a dead man cannot inherit an estate, no more can a dead soul inherit heaven. The soul must be resurrected in Christ.—D. L. Moody.

The contemplation of celestial things will make a man both speak and think more sublimely and magnificently when he descends to human affairs.—Cicero.

Heaven is not gained by a single bound,
But we build the ladder by which we rise
From the lowly earth to the vaulted skies;
And we mount to its summit round by round.
—J. G. Holland.

A man is a fool who sits looking backward from himself in the past. Ah, what shallow, vain conceit there is in man! Forget the things that are behind. That is not where you live. Your roots are not there. They are in the present; and you should reach up into the other life.—H. W. Beecher.

As the reflections of our pride upon our defects are bitter, disheartening, and vexatious, so the return of the soul towards God is peaceful and sustained by confidence. You will find by experience how much more your progress will be aided by this simple, peaceful turning towards God, than by all your chagrin and spite at the faults that exist in you.—Fénelon.

To bear adversity with meek submission to the will of God; to endure chastisement with all long-suffering and joyfulness; to appear cheerful amid surrounding gloom, hopeful amidst desponding circumstances, happy in God when there is nothing else to make us happy; he who does this has indeed made great advances in the divine life.—John Angel James.

Progress, in the sense of acquisition, is something; but progress in the sense of being, is a great deal more. To grow higher, deeper, wider, as the years go on; to conquer difficulties, and acquire more and more power; to feel all one's faculties unfolding, and truth descending into the soul,—this makes life worth living.—J. F. Clarke.

The life of a godly man is like a river, not like a stagnant pool or a dead sea. It is ever in motion, sometimes sparkling in the sunbeam, and sometimes shivering in the clouds; sometimes chanting through scenery as beautiful as Eden, and sometimes moaning through districts of miserable desolation; sometimes clear as the day, and sometimes black as the night. Still it is ever moving to its ocean destiny—progress is its law, infinitude is its home.—David Thomas.

You are born supernaturally through faith, by the grace of God, into the kingdom of righteousness; but you are born a little babe, that is all; and if you make any progress from that point on, it must be by work, by sacrifice, by the practice of Christian virtues, by benevolence, by self-denial, by resisting the adversary, by making valiant war for God and against sin; and on no other basis, am I authorized in giving you a hope that you may come to manhood in Christ Jesus.—C. H. Fowler.

Spirituality is best manifested on the ground, not in the air. Rapturous day-dreams, flights of heavenly fancy, longings to see the Invisible, are less expensive and less expressive than the plain doing of duty. To have bread excite thankfulness and a drink of water send the heart to God is better than sighs for the unattainable. To plow a straight furrow on Monday or dust a room well on Tuesday or kiss a bumped forehead on Wednesday is worth more than the most ecstatic thrill under Sunday eloquence. Spirituality is seeing God in common things, and showing God in common tasks.—Maltbie Babcock.

Voices of the glorified urge us onward. They who have passed from the semblances of time to the realities of eternity call upon us to advance. The rest that awaits us invites us forward. We do not pine for our rest before God wills it. We long for no inglorious rest. We are thankful rather for the invaluable training of difficulty, the loving discipline of danger and strife. Yet in the midst of it all the prospect of rest invites us heavenward. Through all, and above all, God cries, "Go forward!" "Come up higher!"—Sir William Jones.

Spite

Spite is a little word, but it represents as strange a jumble of feelings and compound of discords, as any polysyllable in the language.—Dickens.

When, to gratify a private appetite, it is once resolved upon that an ignorant and helpless creature shall be sacrificed, it is an easy matter to pick up sticks enough from any thicket where it has strayed, to make a fire to offer it up with.—Sterne.

Spleen

Hail, wayward Queen!
Who rule the sex to fifty from fifteen;
Parent of vapors, and of female wit,
Who give the hysteric, or poetic fit,
On various tempers act by various ways,
Make some take physic, others scribble plays:

Who cause the proud their visits to delay,
And send the godly in a pet to pray.
—Pope.

The spleen is seldom felt where Flora reigns;

The low'ring eye, the petulance, the frown,
And sullen sadness, that o'ershade, distort,
And mar the face of beauty, when no cause
For such immeasurable woe appears;
These Flora banishes, and gives the fair Sweet smiles, and bloom less transient than her own. —Cowper.

Sport

It is the first that ever I heard breaking of ribs was sport for ladies
—Shakespeare.

Detested sport,
That owes its pleasures to another's pain,
—Cowper.

'Tis the sport to have the engineer Hoist with his own petar.
—Shakespeare.

He learn'd the arts of riding, fencing,
gunnery,
And how to scale a fortress or—a nunnery.
—Byron.

Ah, nut-brown partridges! ah, brilliant pheasants!
And ah, ye poachers!—'tis no sport for peasants. —Byron.

Thick around Thunders the sport of those, who with the gun
And dog, impatient bounding at the shot,
Worse than the season desolate the fields.
—Thompson.

See from the brake the whirring pheasant
springs,
And mounts exulting on triumphant wings;
Short is his joy; he feels the fiery wound, Flutters in blood, and panting beats the ground. —Pope.

I bear to the wisdom of Sir Philip Sidney, who said that next to hunting he liked hawking worst. However, though he may have fallen into as hyperbolical an extreme, yet who can put too great a scorn upon their folly, that, to bring home a rascal deer, or a few rotten conies, submit their lives to the will or passion of such as may take them under a penalty no less slight than there is discretion shown in exposing them.—
F. Osborn.

Spring

Come, gentle Spring; ethereal Mild-ness, come!—Thomson.

The boyhood of the year.—Tenny-
son.

Winter, lingering, chills the lap of May.—Goldsmith.

The first pale blossom of the un-ripened year.—Mrs. Barbauld.

Where smiling Spring its earliest visit paid.—Goldsmith.

Fair-handed Spring unbosoms every grace.—Thomson.

He wakes into music the green forest-bowers.—W. G. Clark.

It is a natural resurrection, an experience of immortality.—Thoreau.

The holy spirit of the Spring
Is working silently.
—George MacDonald.

Sweet daughter of a rough and stormy sire, hoar Winter's blooming child, delightful Spring.—Mrs. Barbauld.

The beauteous eyes of the spring's fair
night
With comfort are downward gazing.
—Heine.

When Spring unlocks the flowers to paint the laughing soil.—Bishop Heber.

Rough winds do shake the darling buds of May.—Shakespeare.

When well-apparelled April on the heel of limping winter treads.—Shakespeare.

Spring hangs her infant blossoms on the trees.—Cowper.

In the spring a young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love.—Tennyson.

Fled now the sullen murmurs of the North,
The splendid raiment of the Spring peeps forth.
—Bloomfield.

When every brake hath found its note, and sunshine smiles in every flower.—Edward Everett.

Winking Maybuds begin to ope their golden eyes.—Shakespeare.

Still sweet with blossoms is the year's fresh prime.—Bryant.

Let us fill urns with rose-leaves in our May, and hive the thrifty sweetness for December!—Bulwer-Lytton.

Fresh as the lovely form of youthful May, when nymphs and graces in the dance unite.—Wieland.

O fresh-lit dawn! immortal life!
O Earth's betrothal, sweet and true!
—E. C. Stedman.

Airs, vernal airs, breathing the smell of fields and grove, attune the trembling leaves.—Milton.

The spring, the summer, the chilling autumn, angry winter, change their wonted liveries.—Shakespeare.

'T is a month before the month of May, and the spring comes slowly up this way.—Coleridge.

There is no time like spring, that passes by, now newly born, and now hastening to die.—Christina G. Rossetti.

The peach-bud glows, the wild bee hums, and wind-flowers wave in graceful gladness.—Lucy Larcom.

Sweet Spring! full of sweet days and roses; a box where sweets compacted lie.—George Herbert.

Came the Spring with all its splendor,
All its birds and all its blossoms,
All its flowers, and leaves, and grasses.
—Longfellow.

Spring flies, and with it all the train it leads;
And flowers, in fading, leave us but their seeds.
—Schiller.

Fair-handed Spring unbosoms every grace:
Throws out the snowdrop and the crocus first.
—Thompson.

But when shall spring visit the mouldering urn? O, when shall it dawn on the night of the grave?—Beattie.

Spring, the Raphael of the northern earth, stood already out of doors, and covered all apartments of our Vatican with his pictures.—Richter.

Most gladly would I give the blood-stained laurel for the first violet which March brings us, the fragrant pledge of the new-fledged year.—Schiller.

Stately Spring! whose robe-folds are valleys, whose breast-bouquet is gardens, and whose blush is a vernal evening.—Richter.

Ye may trace my step o'er the wakening earth by the winds which tell of the violet's birth.—Mrs. Hemans.

Thus came the lovely spring, with a rush of blossoms and music, flooding the earth with flowers and the air with melodies vernal.—Longfellow.

Ah, how wonderful is the advent of the spring,—the great annual miracle of the blossoming of Aaron's rod, repeated on myriads and myriads of branches!—Longfellow.

I wonder if the sap is stirring yet,
If wintry birds are dreaming of a mate,
If frozen snowdrops feel as yet the sun,
And crocus fires are kindling one by one.
—Christina G. Rossetti.

Gentle Spring!—in sunshine clad,
Well dost thou thy power display!
For Winter maketh the light heart sad,
And thou,—thou makest the sad heart gay.
—Charles D'Orleans.

The lovely town was white with apple-blossoms,
And the great elms o'erhead
Dark shadows wove on their aerial looms, Shot through with golden thread.
—Longfellow.

All flowers of Spring are not May's own;
The crocus cannot often kiss her;
The snow-drop, ere she comes, has flown—
The earliest violets always miss her.
—Lucy Larcom.

Sweet Spring, full of sweet dayes and roses,
A box where sweets compacted lie,
My musick shows ye have your closes,
And all must die.
—Herbert.

The spring's already at the gate
With looks my care beguiling;
The country round appeareth straight
A flower-garden smiling.
—Heine,

It is the season now to go
About the country high and low,
Among the lilacs hand in hand,
And two by two in fairyland.
—Robt. Louis Stevenson.

For lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land.—Bible.

The breath of springtime at this twilight hour
Comes through the gathering glooms,
And bears the stolen sweets of many a flower
Into my silent rooms.
—William Cullen Bryant.

When daisies pied, and violets blue,
And lady-smocks all silver-white,
And cuckoo-buds of yellow hue
Do paint the meadows with delight.
—Shakespeare.

Dip down upon the northern shore,
O sweet new year, delaying long;
Thou doest expectant nature wrong,
Delaying long; delay no more.
—Tennyson.

Showers and sunshine bring,
Slowly, the deepening verdure o'er the earth;
To put their foliage out, the woods are slack,
And one by one the singing-birds come back.
—William Cullen Bryant.

Winter is past; the heart of Nature warms
Beneath the wrecks of unresisted storms;
Doubtful at first, suspected more than seen,
The southern slopes are fringed with tender green.—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

In that soft season, when descending show'rs
Call forth the greens, and wake the rising flow'rs;
When opening buds salute the welcome day,
And earth relenting feels the genial ray.
—Pope.

Sweet is the air with the budding haws,
and the valley stretching for miles below Is white with blossoming cherry-trees, as if just covered with lightest snow.
—Longfellow.

Mighty nature bounds as from her birth.
The sun is in the heavens, and life on earth;
Flowers in the valley, splendor in the beam,
Health on the gale, and freshness in the stream.
—Byron.

Bright April showers will bid again the fresh green leaves expand; and May, light floating in a cloud of flowers, will cause thee to rebloom with magic hand.—G. H. Lewes.

What child has a heart to sing in this capricious clime of ours, when spring comes sailing in from the sea, with wet and heavy cloud-sails and the misty pennon of the east-wind nailed to the mast.—Longfellow.

Eternal Spring, with smiling Verdure here Warms the mild Air, and crowns the youthful Year.

The Rose still blushes, and the violets blow.
—Sir Sam'l Garth.

There is no time like Spring,
When life's alive in everything,
Before new nestlings sing,
Before cleft swallows speed their journey back
Along the trackless track.

—Christina G. Rossetti.

The Spring is here—the delicate footed
May,
With its slight fingers full of leaves and
flowers,
And with it comes a thirst to be away,
In lovelier scenes to pass these sweeter hours.

—N. P. Willis.

The clouds consign their treasures to the fields,

And, softly shaking on the dimpled pool,
Prelusive drops, let all their moisture flow
In large effusion, o'er the freshen'd world.

—Thomson.

Daughter of heaven and earth, coy Spring,
With sudden passion languishing,
Teaching barren moors to smile,
Painting pictures mile on mile,
Holds a cup of cowslip wreaths Whence a smokeless incense breathes.

—Emerson.

Once more the heavenly power
Makes all things new,
And domes the red-plough'd hills
With loving blue;
The blackbirds have their wills,
The throstles too.

—Tennyson.

'Tis spring-time on the eastern hills!
Like torrents gush the summer rills;
Through winter's moss and dry dead leaves
The bladed grass revives and lives,
Pushes the mouldering waste away,
And glimpses to the April day.

—Whittier.

What delights us in the spring is more a sensation than an appearance, more a hope than any visible reality.
There is something in the softness of the air, in the lengthening of the days, in the very sounds and odors of the sweet time, that caresses us and con-soles us after the rigorous weeks of winter.—Hamerton.

When the measured dance of the hours brings back the happy smile of spring, the buried dead is born again in the life-glance of the sun. The germs which perished to the eye within the cold breast of the earth spring up with joy in the bright realm of day.—Schiller.

Spring is a beautiful piece of work;
and not to be in the country to see it done is the not realizing what glorious masters we are, and how cheerfully, minutely, and unflaggingly the fair fingers of the season brooder the world for us.—Willis.

At last from Aries rolls the bounteous sun,
And the bright Bull receives him. Then no more
Th' expansive atmosphere is cramp'd with cold;
But, full of life and vivifying soul,
Lifts the light clouds sublime, and spreads them thin,
Fleecy and white, o'er all surrounding heaven.

—Thomson.

So then the year is repeating its old story again. We are come once more, thank God! to its most charming chapter. The violets and the Mayflowers are as its inscriptions or vignettes. It always makes a pleasant impression on us, when we open again at these pages of the book of life.—
Goethe.

I come, I come! ye have called me long,
I come o'er the mountain with light and
song:

Ye may trace my step o'er the wakening
earth,
By the winds which tell of the violet's
birth,
By the primrose-stars in the shadowy grass,
By the green leaves, opening as I pass.

—Mrs. Hemans.

And all the woods are alive with the murmur and sound of spring,
And the rosebud breaks into pink on the climbing briar,
And the crocus bed is a quivering moon
of fire
Girdled round with the belt of an amethyst ring.

—Oscar Wilde.

It is not the variegated colors, the cheerful sounds, and the warr-breezes which enliven us so much in spring; it is the quiet prophetic spirit of endless hope, a presentiment of many happy days, the anticipation of higher everlasting blossoms and fruits, and the secret sympathy with the world that is developing itself.—Martin Opitz.

Alas! bright Spring! not long Shall I enjoy thy pleasant influence:
For thou shalt die the summer heat among,
Sublimed to vapor in his fire intense,
And, gone forever hence,
Exist no more; no more to earth belong,
Except in song. —Albert Pike.

The bee buzz'd up in the heat,
"I am faint for your honey, my sweet."
The flower said, "Take it, my dear,
For now is the Spring of the year.
So come, come!"
"Hum!"

And the bee buzz'd down from the heat.
—Tennyson.

O tender time that love thinks long to see,
Sweet foot of Spring that with her foot-fall sows Late snow-like flowery leavings of the snows,
Be not too long irresolute to be;
O mother-month, where have thy hidden thee? —Swinburne.

And softly came the fair young queen
O'er mountain, dale, and dell;
And where her golden light was seen
An emerald shadow fell.
The good-wife oped the window wide,
The good-man spanned his plough;
'Tis time to run, 'tis time to ride,
For Spring is with us now.
—Leland.

See where surly Winter passes off, Far to the north, and calls his ruffian
blasts:
His blasts obey, and quit the howling hill,
The shattered forest and the ravished vale;
While softer gales succeed, at whose kind
touch,
Dissolving snows in livid torrents lost,
The mountains lift their green heads to the sky. —Thomson.

What change has made the pastures sweet
And reached the daisies at my feet,
And cloud that wears a golden hem?
This lovely world, the hills, the sward—
They all look fresh, as if our Lord
But yesterday had finished them.
—Jean Ingelow.

It is not merely the multiplicity of tints, the gladness of tone, or the balminess of the air which delight in the spring; it is the still consecrated spirit of hope, the prophecy of happy days yet to come; the endless variety of nature, with presentiments of eternal flowers which never shall fade, and sympathy with the blessedness of the ever-developing world.—Novalis.

Spring is strong and virtuous,
Broad-sowing, cheerful, plenteous,
Quickening underneath the mould
Grains beyond the price of gold.
So deep and large her bounties are,
That one broad, long midsummer day
Shall to the planet overpay
The ravage of a year of war.—Emerson.

Hark! the hours are softly calling Bidding Spring arise,
To listen to the rain-drops falling
From the cloudy skies.
To listen to Earth's weary voices,
Louder every day,
Bidding her no longer linger
On her charm'd way;
But hasten to her task of beauty
Scarcely yet begun.
—Adelaide A. Procter.

It was in the prime
Of the sweet spring-time,
In the linnet's throat
Trembled the love-note,
And the love-stirred air
Thrilled the blossoms there.
Little shadows danced,
Each a tiny elf,
Happy in large light
And the thinnest self.
—George Eliot.

So forth issew'd the Seasons of the years:
First, lusty Spring, all dight in leaves of flowres
That freshly budded and new bloomes did beare,
In which a thousand birds had built their bowres
That sweetly sung to call forth paramours;
And in his hand a javelin he did beare,
And on his head (as fit for warlike stoures)
A guilt, engraven morion he did weare:
That, as some did him love, so others did him feare. —Spenser.

If spring came but once in a century, instead of once a year, or burst forth with the sound of an earthquake, and not in silence, what wonder and expectation there would be in all hearts to behold the miraculous change! But now the silent succession suggests nothing but necessity.
To most men only the cessation of the miracle would be miraculous, and the perpetual exercise of God's power seems less wonderful than its withdrawal would be.—Longfellow.

The trumpet winds have sounded a retreat,
Blowing o'er land and sea a sullen strain;
Usurping March, defeated, flies again,
And lays his trophies at the Winter's feet.
And lo! where April, coming in his turn,
In changeful motleys, half of light and shade,

Leads his belated charge, a delicate maid,
A nymph with dripping urn.

—R. H. Stoddard.

The golden line is drawn between winter and summer. Behind all is blackness and darkness and dissolution. Before is hope, and soft airs, and the flowers, and the sweet season of hay; and people will cross the fields, reading or walking with one another; and instead of the rain that soaks death into the heart of green things, will be the rain which they drink with delight; and there will be sleep on the grass at midday, and early rising in the morning, and long moonlight evenings.—Leigh Hunt.

Stage (See Acting)

* The stage * * * is the mirror of human life.—William Winter.

The world's a theatre, the earth a stage
Which God and nature do with actors fill.

—T. Heywood.

All the world's a stage,
And all the men and women merely players:
They have their exits and their entrances;
And one man in his time plays many parts.

—Shakespeare.

The stage I chose—a subject fair and free—
'Tis yours—'tis mine—'tis public property.
All common exhibitions open lie,
For praise or censure, to the common eye.
Hence are a thousand hackney writers fed;
Hence monthly critics earn their daily bread.

This is a general tax which all must pay,
From those who scribble, down to those who play.

—Churchill.

Stars

The thoughts of God in the heavens.—Longfellow.

Those gold candles fixed in heaven's air.—Shakespeare.

The eternal jewels of the short-lived night.—Mary Mapes Dodge.

Ye stars! which are the poetry of heaven.—Byron.

A sky full of silent suns.—Richter.
The stars above govern our condition.—Shakespeare.

Clad in the beauty of a thousand stars.—Marlowe.

The planets in their station listening stood.—Milton.

Still singing as they shine.—O. W. Holmes.

Our Jovial star reign'd at his birth.—Shakespeare.

The stars have fought their battles leagued with man.—Dr. Young.

The stars in their courses fought against Sisera.—Bible.

The stars are so far, far away!—L. E. Landon.

This majestic roof, fretted with golden fire.—Shakespeare.

Ye little stars, hide your diminish'd rays.—Pope.

The evening star, love's harbinger, appeared.—Milton.

Surely the stars are images of love.—Bailey.

Two stars keep not their motion in one sphere.—Shakespeare.

The starres, bright sentinels of the skies.—Wm. Habington.

The stars hang bright above, silent, as if they watched the sleeping earth.—Coleridge.

Cry out upon the stars for doing ill offices, to cross their wooing.

—Butler.

While twilight's curtain gathering far,
Is pinned with a single diamond star.

—McDonald Clark.

And the sentinel stars set their watch in the sky.—Campbell.

These blessed candles of the night.
—Shakespeare.

The unfolding star calls up the shepherd.—Shakespeare.

What are ye orbs?
The words of God? the Scriptures of the skies? —Bailey.

These preachers of beauty, which light the world with their admonishing smile.—Emerson.

Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades, or loose the bands of Orion?—Bible.

A broad and ample road, whose dust is
gold,
And pavement stars. —Milton.

Now the bright morning-star, day's harbinger,
Comes dancing from the east. —Milton.

But who can count the stars of heaven?
Who sing their influence on this lower world? —Thomson.

The gems of heaven, that gild night's sable throne.—Dryden.

Heaven looks down on earth with all her eyes.—Young.

The world is great; the stars are golden fruit upon a tree all out of reach.—George Eliot.

Forever singing, as they shine, the hand that made us is divine.—Addison.

Teach me your mood, O patient stars! who climb each night the ancient sky.—Emerson.

Day hath put on his jacket, and around his burning bosom buttoned it with stars.—O. W. Holmes.

Shrines to burn earth's incense on,
the altar-fires of heaven!—Whittier.

The stars in order twinkle in the skies,
And fall in silence, and in silence rise.
—Broome.

The stars shall fade away, the sun himself grow dim with age, and Nature sink in years.—Addison.

The innumerable stars shining in order, like a living hymn written in light.—Willis.

In yonder pensile orb, and every sphere
That gems the starry girdle of the year.
—Campbell.

Men at some time are masters of their fates:
The fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars,
But in ourselves. —Shakespeare.

Stars which stand as thick as dew-drops on the field of heaven.—Bailey.

No star seemed less than what science has taught us that it is.—James Fenimore Cooper.

Her blue eyes sought the west afar,
For lovers love the western star.
—Scott.

Hither, as to their fountain, other stars
Repairing in their golden urns draw light,
And hence the morning planet gilds her horns. —Milton.

One sun by day, by night ten thousand
shine;
And light us deep into the Deity;
How boundless in magnificence and might.
—Young.

Each separate star
Seems nothing, but a myriad scattered
stars
Break up the night, and make it beautiful.
—Bayard Taylor.

The very stars
Tremble above, as though the Voice Divine Reverberated through the dread expanse.
—Anna Katharine Green.

The stars of the night
Will lend thee their light,
Like tapers clear without number!
—Herrick.

A single star is rising in the east, and from afar sheds a most tremulous lustre; silent Night doth wear it like a jewel on her brow.—Barry Cornwall.

And lo, the star, which they saw in the east, went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was.—Bible.

O powers illimitable! it is but the outer hem of God's great mantle our poor stars do gem.—Ruskin.

I am constant as the northern star, of whose true-fixed and resting quality there is no fellow in the firmament.—Shakespeare.

When, like an Emir of tyrannic power,
Sirius appears, and on the horizon black Bids countless stars pursue their mighty track. —Victor Hugo.

The ignorant man takes counsel of the stars; but the wise man takes counsel of God, who made the stars.
—Jaafar.

And made the stars,
And set them in the firmament of heav'n,
To illuminate the earth, and rule the day
In their vicissitude, and rule the night.
—Milton.

One naked star has waded through
The purple shallows of the night,
And faltering as falls the dew
It drips its misty light.
—James Whitcomb Riley.

When stars are in the quiet skies,
Then most I pine for thee;
Bend on me then thy tender eyes,
As stars look on the sea.
—Bulwer-Lytton.

But soon, the prospect clearing,
By cloudless starlight on he treads
And thinks no lamp so cheering
As that light which heaven sheds.
—Moore.

There is no light in earth or heaven
But the cold light of stars;
And the first watch of night is given To the red planet Mars.
—Longfellow.

Silently, one by one, in the infinite meadows of heaven,
Blossomed the lovely stars, the forget-me-nots of the angels. —Longfellow.

Many a night I saw the Pleiads, rising thro'
the mellow shade,
Glitter like a swarm of fire-flies tangled in a silver braid. —Tennyson.

Just above yon sandy bar,
As the day grows fainter and dimmer,
Lonely and lovely, a single star
Lights the air with a dusky glimmer.
—Longfellow.

It is a gentle and affectionate thought, that in immeasurable height above us, at our first birth, the wreath of love was woven with sparkling stars for flowers.—Coleridge.

Magnificence is likewise a source of the sublime. A great profusion of things which are splendid or valuable in themselves is magnificent. The starry heaven, though it occurs so very frequently to our view, never fails to excite an idea of grandeur.—
Burke.

Who rounded in his palm these spacious orbs
Numerous as glittering gems of morning
dew,
Or sparks from populous cities in a blaze,
And set the bosom of old night on fire.
—Young.

The skies are painted with unnumber'd
sparks,
They are all fire and every one doth shine,
But there's but one in all doth hold his place. —Shakespeare.

The spacious firmament on high,
With all the blue ethereal sky,
And spangled heavens, a shining frame,
Their great Original proclaim.
—Addison.

So sinks the day-star in the ocean-bed,
And yet anon repairs his drooping head,
And tricks his beams, and with new-spangled ore
Flames in the forehead of the morning
sky. —Milton.

You meaner beauties of the night,
That poorly satisfy our eyes
More by your number than your light;
You common people of the skies,—
What are you when the moon shall rise?
—Sir Henry Wotton.

Give me my Romeo: and, when he shall die,
Take him and cut him out in little stars,
And he will make the face of heaven so
fine
That all the world will be in love with
night,
And pay no worship to the garish sun.
—Shakespeare.

The stars are mansions built by nature's hand,
And, haply, there the spirits of the blest, Dwell, clothed in radiance, their immortal rest. —Wordsworth.

The chambers of the East are opened in every land, and the sun come forth to sow the earth with orient pearl. Night, the ancient mother, follows him with her diadem of stars. * * * Bright creatures!
how they gleam like spirits through the shadows of innumerable eyes from their thrones in the boundless depths of heaven.—Carlyle.

Lo! from the dread immensity of space
Returning, with accelerated course,
The rushing comet to the sun descends;
And as he sinks below the shading earth,
With awful train projected o'er the heavens,
The guilty nations tremble. —Thomson.

If the stars should appear one night in a thousand years, how would men believe and adore; and preserve for many generations the remembrance of the city of God which had been shown! But every night come out these envoys of beauty, and light the universe with their admonishing smile.
—Emerson.

A star is beautiful; it affords pleasure, not from what it is to do, or to give, but simply by being what it is.
It befits the heavens; it has congruity with the mighty space in which it dwells. It has repose; no force disturbs its eternal peace. It has freedom; no obstruction lies between it and infinity.—Carlyle.

The sad and solemn night
Hath yet her multitude of cheerful fires;
The glorious host of light
Walk the dark hemisphere till she retires;
All through her silent watches, gliding
slow,
Her constellations come, and climb the heavens, and go. —Bryant.

The number is certainly the cause.
The apparent disorder augments the grandeur, for the appearance of care is highly contrary to our ideas of magnificence. Besides, the stars lie in such apparent confusion, as makes it impossible on ordinary occasions to reckon them. This gives them the advantage of a sort of infinity.—
Burke.

The night is calm and cloudless,
And still as still can be,
And the stars come forth to listen
To the music of the sea.
They gather, and gather, and gather,
Until they crowd the sky,
And listen, in breathless silence,
To the solemn litany.—Longfellow.

On the wide-stretching plains of western Asia, in the warm cloudless

Assyrian night, with the lamps of heaven flashing out their radiance in uninterrupted splendor from the centre to the boundless horizon, it was no wonder that students and sages should have accepted for deities those distant worlds of fire on which eyes, brain, hopes, thoughts, and aspirations were nightly fixed.—G. J. W.
Melville.

Look how the floor of heaven
Is thick inlaid with patines of bright gold:
There's not the smallest orb which thou behold'st
But in his motion like an angel sings,
Still quiring to the young-eyed cherubims:
Such harmony is in immortal souls;
But whilst this muddy vesture of decay
Doth grossly close it in, we cannot hear it
—Shakespeare.

The sky
Spreads like an ocean hung on high,
Bespangled with those isles of light
So wildly, spiritually bright.
Whoever gaz'd upon them shining,
And turn'd to earth without repining,
Nor wish'd for wings to flee away,
And mix with their eternal ray?
—Byron.

All these stupendous objects are daily around us; but because they are constantly exposed to our view, they never affect our minds, so natural is it for us to admire new, rather than grand objects. Therefore the vast multitude of stars which diversify the beauty of this immense body does not call the people together; but when any change happens therein, the eyes of all are fixed upon the heavens.
—St. Basil.

Ye stars! which are the poetry of heaven,
If in your bright leaves we would read the fate
Of men and empires,—'tis to be forgiven,
That in our aspirations to be great,
Our destinies o'erleap their mortal state,
And claim a kindred with you; for ye are
A beauty and a mystery, and create
In us such love and reverence from afar, That fortune, fame, power, life, have named themselves a star. —Byron.

When I gaze into the stars, they look down upon me with pity from their serene and silent spaces, like eyes glistening with tears over the little lot of man. Thousands of generations, all as noisy as our own,
have been swallowed up by time, and there remains no record of them any more. Yet Arcturus and Orion, Sirius and Pleiades, are still shining in their courses, clear and young, as when the shepherd first noted them in the plain of Shinar!—Carlyle.

Oh, Constellations of the early night
That sparkled brighter as the twilight died,
And made the darkness glorious! I have seen

Your rays grow dim upon the horizon's edge,

And sink behind the mountains. I have seen

The great Orion, with his jewelled belt,
That large-limbed warrior of the skies, go
down

Into the gloom. Beside him sank a crowd
Of shining ones.—William Cullen Bryant.

O thou beautiful
And unimaginable ether! and Ye multiplying masses of increased
And still increasing lights! what are ye?
what

Is this blue wilderness of interminable
Air, where ye roll along, as I have seen
The leaves along the limpid streams of Eden?

Is your course measur'd for ye? Or do ye Sweep on in your unbounded revelry
Through an aerial universe of endless Expansion,—at which my soul aches to think,—

Intoxicated with eternity? —Byron.

It is a truly sublime spectacle when in the stillness of the night, in an unclouded sky, the stars, like the world's choir, rise and set, and as it were divide existence into two portions,—the one, belonging to the earthly, is silent in the perfect stillness of night; whilst the other alone comes forth in sublimity, pomp, and majesty. Viewed in this light, the starry heavens truly exercise a moral influence over us; and who can readily stray into the paths of immorality if he has been accustomed to live amidst such thoughts and feelings, and frequently to dwell upon them? How are we entranced by the simple splendors of this wonderful drama of nature!—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

States

Whenever government abandons law, it proclaims anarchy.—Burke.

A thousand years scarce serves to form a State; an hour may lay it in the dust.—Byron.

Ill fares the State where many masters rule; let one be lord, one king supreme.—Homer.

A State would be happy where philosophers were kings, or kings philosophers.—Plato.

The work of a State in the long run is the work of the individuals composing it.—J. Stuart Mill.

In States, arms and learning have a concurrence or near sequence in time.—Bacon.

A nation to be great ought to be compressed in its increment by nations more civilized than itself.—Coleridge.

Without a humble imitation of the divine Author of our blessed religion we can never hope to be a happy nation.—Washington.

The ruin of a State is generally preceded by an universal degeneracy of manners and contempt of religion.—Swift.

A very prosperous people, flushed with great victories and successes, are seldom so pious, so humble, so just, or so provident as to perpetuate their happiness.—Atterbury.

Scotland by no means escaped the fate ordained for every country which is connected, but not incorporated, with another country of greater resources.—Macaulay.

It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence.—Washington.

Those who attempt to level never equalize. In all societies consisting of various descriptions of citizens, some descriptions must be uppermost. The levelers, therefore, only change and pervert the natural order of things; they load the edifice of society by setting up in the air what the solidity of the structure requires to be on the ground.—Burke.

Statesmen

True statesmanship is the art of changing a nation from what it is into what it ought to be.—W. R. Alger.

No statesman e'er will find it worth his pains
To tax our labours and excise our brains.
—Churchill.

It is strange so great a statesman should Be so sublime a poet. —Bulwer-Lytton.

And lives to clutch the golden keys,
To mould a mighty state's decrees,
And shape the whisper of the throne.
—Tennyson.

Why don't you show us a statesman who can rise up to the emergency, and cave in the emergency's head?—Artemus Ward.

A disposition to preserve, and an ability to improve, taken together, would be my standard of a statesman.
—Burke.

I look upon an able statesman out of business like a huge whale, that will endeavor to overturn the ship unless he has an empty cask to play with.—Steele.

An honest statesman to a prince,
Is like a cedar planted by a spring;
The spring bathes the tree's root, the grateful tree
Rewards it with his shadow. —Webster.

And statesmen at her council met
Who knew the seasons when to take Occasion by the hand, and make The bounds of freedom wider yet.
—Tennyson.

Forbear, you things
That stand upon the pinnacles of state;
To boast your slippery height! when you do fall,
You dash yourselves in pieces, ne'er to rise:
And he that lends you pity, is not wise.
—Ben Jonson.

Who would not praise Patricio's high desert,
His hand unstain'd, his uncorrupted heart,
His comprehensive head? all interests
weigh'd,
All Europe sav'd, yet Britain not betray'd.
—Pope.

What most of all enables a man to serve the public is not wealth, but content and independence; which, requiring no superfluity at home, distracts not the mind from the common good.—Plutarch.

Statesman, yet friend to truth! of soul sincere,
In action faithful, and in honor clear;
Who broke no promise, served no private
end,
Who gain'd no title, and who lost no
friend;
Ennobled by himself, by all approv'd,
And prais'd, unenvied, by the muse he lov'd.
—Pope.

You have not, as good patriots should do, studied
The public good, but your particular ends:
Factious among yourselves; preferring
such
To offices and honors, as ne'er read
The elements of saving policy;
But deeply skill'd in all the principles
That usher to destruction. —Massinger.

For as two cheats, that play one game,
Are both defeated of their aim;
So those who play a game of state,
And only cavil in debate,
Altho' there's nothing lost nor won,
The public business is undone.
Which still the longer 'tis in doing,
Becomes the surer way to ruin.—Butler.

It is curious that we pay statesmen for what they say, not for what they do; and judge of them from what they do, not from what they say.
Hence they have one code of maxims for profession and another for practice, and make up their consciences as the Neapolitans do their beds, with one set of furniture for show and another for use.—Colton.

Station

The best things are placed between extremes.—Aristotle.

For my part, I adhere to the maxim of antiquity: The throne is a glorious sepulchre.—Theodora.

Royalty is but a feather in a man's cap; let children enjoy their rattle.
—Cromwell.

Would that I could live without care in the middle rank of life.—
Euripides.

They that stand high have many blasts to shake them.—Shakespeare.

Eminent station makes great men more great, and little ones less.—Bruyère.

I shall show that the place does not honor the man, but the man the place.—Agesilaus.

True dignity is never gained by place, and never lost when honors are withdrawn.—Massinger.

He who thinks his place below him will certainly be below his place.—Saville.

Accept the place the Divine Providence has found for you, the society of your contemporaries, the connection of events.—Emerson.

The French have a saying that whatever excellence a man may exhibit in a public station he is very apt to be ridiculous in a private one.—Colton.

Finding that the middle condition of life is by far the happiest, I look with little favor upon that of princes.—Pindar.

It is not the mere station of life that stamps the value on us, but the manner in which we act our part.—Schiller.

The crowns of kings do not prevent those who wear them from being tormented sometimes by violent headaches.—Plutarch.

Whatever high station you may be placed in by fortune, remember this, that God will not estimate you by the office, but by the manner in which you fill it.—Channing.

Whatever our place, allotted to us by Providence, that for us is the post of honor and duty. God estimates us not by the position we are in, but by the way in which we fill it.—T. Edwards.

The man who loves the golden mean is safe from the misery of a wretched hovel, and moderate in his desires, cares not for a luxurious palace, the subject of envy.—Horatius.

How happy the station which every minute furnishes opportunities of doing good to thousands! how dangerous that which every moment exposes to the injuring of millions!—Bruyère.

A true man never frets about his place in the world, but just slides into it by the gravitation of his nature, and swings there as easily as a star.—Chapin.

Every man whom chance alone has, by some accident, made a public character, hardly ever fails of becoming, in a short time, a ridiculous private one.—Cardinal de Retz.

Whom the grandeur of his office elevates over other men will soon find that the first hour of his new dignity is the last of his independence.—Chancellor D'Aguesseau.

What is station high?
'Tis a proud mendicant; it boasts, and begs;
It begs an alms of homage from the throng,
And oft the throng denies its charity.
—Young.

No more restless uncertainties, no more anxious desires, no more impatience at the place we are in; for it is God who has placed us there, and who holds us in his arms. Can we be unsafe where he has placed us?—Fénelon.

Men and statues that are admired in an elevated situation have a very different effect upon us when we approach them; the first appear less than we imagined them, the last bigger.—Lord Greville.

Men in great places are thrice servants; servants of the sovereign or state, servants of fame, and servants of business; so as they have no freedom, neither in their persons nor in their actions nor in their times.—Bacon.

The station that has not its duty, its ideal, was never yet occupied by man. Yes, here in this poor, miserable, hampered, despicable actual, wherein thou even now standest,—here or nowhere is thy ideal; work it out therefrom; and working, believe, live, be free.—Carlyle.

Whatever poets may write, or fools believe, of rural innocence and truth, and of the perfidy of courts, this is most undoubtedly true,—that shepherds and ministers are both men; their natures and passions the same, the modes of them only different.—Chesterfield.

If any man is rich and powerful, he comes under the law of God by which the higher branches must take the burnings of the sun, and shade those that are lower; by which the tall trees must protect the weak plants beneath them.—Beecher.

God is a kind Father. He sets us all in the places where he wishes us to be employed. He chooses work for every creature which will be delightful to them if they do it simply and humbly. He gives us always strength enough and sense enough for what he wants us to do.—Ruskin.

Lord Bacon has compared those who move in higher spheres to those heavenly bodies in the firmament, which have much admiration, but little rest; and it is not necessary to invest a wise man with power, to convince him that it is a garment bedizened with gold, which dazzles the beholder by its splendor, but oppresses the wearer by its weight.—Colton.

There is a kind of elevation which does not depend on fortune. It is a certain air which distinguishes us, and seems to destine us for great things; it is a price which we imperceptibly set on ourselves. By this quality we usurp the deference of other men; and it puts us, in general, more above them than birth, dignity, or even merit itself.—Rochefoucauld.

Steadfastness

Is not this steadfastness to mark, to make, the character of your lives? Is it not God's will that we should press steadily on to our goal in obedience to Him, in channels of His choosing, whether in sunshine or shadow, in the cheer of spring or in the chill of winter, neither detained by pleasure nor deterred by pain?—Maltbie Babcock.

Stewardship

Property is a divine trust. Things are tools, not prizes. Life is not for self-indulgence, but for self-devotion. When, instead of saying, "The world owes me a living," men shall say, "I owe the world a life," then the kingdom will come in power. We owe everything to God but our sins. Fatherland, pedigree, home-life, schooling, Christian training,—all are God's gifts. Every member of the body or faculty of mind is ours providentially. There is no accomplishment in our lives that is not rooted in opportunities and powers we had nothing to do with in achieving. "What hast thou that thou didst not receive?" If God gives us the possibilities and the power to get wealth, to acquire influence, to be forces in the world, what is the true conception of life but divine ownership and human administration? "Of Thine own we render Thee." All there is of "me" is God's estate, and I am His tenant and agent. On the day of our birth a new lease is signed. On the day of our death accounts are closed. Our fidelity is the interest on God's principal. "That I may receive mine own with interest," is the divine intention. So live, that when thy summons comes to give an account of thy stewardship, it may be done with joy, and not with grief!—Maltbie Babcock.

Storm

The storm is master. Man, as a ball, is tossed twixt winds and billows.—Schiller.

Unsparring as the scourge of war,
Blasts follow blasts, and groves dismantled roar. —Bloomfield.

A mighty wind, like a leviathan, Ploughed through the brine, and from these solitudes
Sent Silence frightened.—T. B. Aldrich.

The winds with hymns of praise are loud,
Or low with sobs of pain,—
The thunder-organ of the cloud,
The dropping tears of rain.—Whittier.

It is a tempest in a tumbler of water.—Paul, Grand-Duc de Russie.

It is the flash which appears, the thunder bolt will follow.—Voltaire.

Loud roared the dreadful thunder,
The rain a deluge showers.
—Andrew Cherry.

Blow wind, swell billow, and swim bark!
The storm is up, and all is on the hazard.
—Shakespeare.

The clouds are scudding across the moon,
A misty light is on the sea;
The wind in the shrouds has a wintry tune,
And the foam is flying free.
—Bayard Taylor.

A red morn that ever yet betoken'd
Wreck to the seaman, tempest to the field,
Sorrow to shepherds, woe unto the birds, Gust and foul flaws to herdsmen and to herds.
—Shakespeare.

The poplars showed
The white of their leaves, the amber grain Shrunk in the wind,—and the lightning
now
Is tangled in tremulous skeins of rain!
—T. B. Aldrich.

The winds grow high;
Impending tempests charge the sky;
The lightning flies, the thunder roars;
And big waves lash the frightened shores.
—Prior.

Blow, winds, and crack your cheeks! rage!
blow!
You cataracts and hurricanoes, spout
Till you have drench'd our steeples.
—Shakespeare.

Roads are wet where'er one wendeth,
And with rain the thistle bendeth,
And the brook cries like a child!
Not a rainbow shines to cheer us;
Ah! the sun comes never near us,
And the heavens look dark and wild.
—Mary Howitt.

I have seen tempests, when the scolding
winds
Have riv'd the knotty oaks, and I have seen
The ambitious ocean swell and rage and
foam,
To be exalted with the threat'ning clouds
But never till tonight, never till now,
Did I go through a tempest dropping fire.
—Shakespeare.

We often see, against some storm,
A silence in the heavens, the rack stand still,
The bold winds speechless, and the orb below
As hush as death.
—Shakespeare.

Hark, hark! Deep sounds, and deeper still,
Are howling from the mountain's bosom:
There's not a breath of wind upon the hill,
Yet quivers every leaf, and drops each blossom:
Earth groans as if beneath a heavy load.
—Byron.

Merciful Heaven,
Thou rather with thy sharp and sulphurous bolt
Split'st the unwedgeable and gnarled oak
Than the soft myrtle. —Shakespeare.

Lightnings, that show the vast and foamy
deep,
The rending thunders, as they onward
roll,
The loud, loud winds, that o'er the billows
sweep—
Shake the firm nerve, appal the bravest soul!
—Mrs. Radcliffe.

A thousand miles from land are we,
Tossing about on the roaring sea—
From billow to bounding hallow cast,
Like fleecy snow on the stormy blast:
The sails are scattered abroad, like weeds;
The strong masts shake, like quivering
reeds;
The mighty cables, and iron chains,
The hull, which all earthly strength dis-dains—
They strain and they crack, and hearts like stone
Their natural hard proud strength disown.
—Barry Cornwall.

Defeating oft the labors of the year,
The sultry South collects a potent blast.
At first the groves are scarcely seen to stir
Their trembling tops, and a still murmur runs Along the soft-inclining fields of corn;
But as the aerial tempest fuller swells,
And in one mighty stream, invisible,
Immense, the whole excited atmosphere
Impetuous rushes o'er the sounding world.
—Thomson.

Flash!
Lightning, I swear!—there's a tempest brewing!
Crash!
Thunder, too—swift-footed lightning pursuing!
The leaves are troubled, the winds drop
dead,
The air grows ruminant overhead—
Splash!
That great round drop fell pat on my nose.
Flash! crash! splash!—
I must run for it, I suppose.
O what a flashing, and crashing, and splashing,
The earth is rocking, the skies are riven—
Jove in a passion, in god-like fashion,
Is breaking the crystal urns of heaven.
—Robert Buchanan.

The sky is changed!—and such a change!
 O night,
 And storm, and darkness, ye are wondrous strong,
 Yet lovely in your strength, as is the light
 Of a dark eye in woman! Far along,
 From peak to peak the rattling crags
 among Leaps the live thunder! —Byron.

Bursts as a wave that from the clouds im-pends,
 And swell'd with tempests on the ship descends;
 White are the decks with foam; the winds aloud
 Howl o'er the masts, and sing through every shroud;
 Pale, trembling, tir'd, the sailors freeze
 with fears;
 And instant death on every wave appears.
 —Homer.

At first, heard solemn o'er the verge of
 heaven,
 The Tempest growls; but as it nearer comes,
 And rolls its awful burden on the wind,
 The Lightnings flash a larger curve, and more
 The Noise astounds; till overhead a sheet
 Of livid flame discloses wide, then shuts,
 And opens wider; shuts and opens still Expansive, wrapping ether in a blaze.
 Follows the loose'd aggravated Roar, Enlarging, deepening, mingling, peal on peal, Crush'd, horrible, convulsing heaven and earth. —Thomson.

A boding silence reigns,
 Dread through the dun expanse; save the dull sound
 That from the mountain, previous to the
 storm,
 Rolls o'er the muttering earth, disturbs the
 flood,
 And shakes the forest-leaf without a
 breath.
 Prone, to the lowest vale, the ærial tribes
 Descend; the tempest-loving raven scarce Dares wing the dubious dusk. In rueful gaze,
 The cattle stand, and on the scowling heavens
 Cast a deploring eye; by man forsook
 Who to the crowded cottage hies him fast,
 Or seeks the shelter of the downward cave.
 —Thomson.

Story Telling

And thereby hangs a tale.—Shake-
 speare.

Soft as some song divine, thy story flows.—Homer.

He cometh unto you with a tale which holdeth children from play, and old men from the chimney corner.—

 Sir Philip Sidney.

This story will never go down.—
 Henry Fielding.

A schoolboy's tale, the wonder of an hour!—Byron.

For seldom shall she hear a tale
 So sad, so tender, yet so true.
 —Shenstone.

I cannot tell how the truth may be;
 I say the tale as 'twas said to me.
 —Sir Walter Scott.

I hate
 To tell again a tale once fully told.
 —Homer.

Tell me the tales that to me were so dear,
 Long, long ago, long, long ago.
 —Thomas Haynes Bayly.

When thou dost tell another's jest, therein Omit the oaths, which true wit cannot need;
 Pick out of tales the mirth, but not the sin. —Herbert.

And what so tedious as a twice-told tale.—Homer.

A story should, to please, at least seem true,
 Be apropos, well told, concise, and new;
 And whensoever it deviates from these rules,
 The wise will sleep, and leave applause to fools. —Stillington.

In this our spacious isle I think there is not one
 But he hath heard some talk of Hood and Little John,
 Of Tuck, the merry friar, which many a sermon made
 In praise of Robin Hood, his outlaws, and their trade. —Drayton.

A story, in which native humor reigns,
 Is often useful, always entertains;
 A graver fact enlisted on your side
 May furnish illustration, well applied;
 But sedentary weavers of long tales
 Give me the fidgets, and my patience fails.
 'Tis the most asinine employ on earth,
 To hear them tell of parentage and birth,
 And echo conversations dull and dry, Embellish'd with,—He said,—and, So said I.
 —Cowper.

Story-telling is subject to two unavoidable defects,—frequent repetition and being soon exhausted; so that, whoever values this gift in himself, has need of a good memory, and ought frequently to shift his company.—Swift.

An' all us other children, when the supper things is done,
We set around the kitchen fire an' has the mostest fun
A-list'nin' to the witch tales 'at Annie tells about,
An' the gobble-uns 'at gits you
Ef you

Don't Watch
Out!
—James Whitcomb Riley.

Dear Ellen, your tales are all plenteously stored,
With the joy of some bride and the wealth of her lord,
Of her chariots and dresses,
And worldly caresses,
And servants that fly when she's waited upon:
But what can she boast if she weds unbelov'd?
Can she e'er feel the joy that one morning I proved,
When I put on my new gown and waited for John?
—Bloomfield.

Stranger

Stranger is a holy name.—Walter Scott.

A stranger, if just, is not only to be preferred before a countryman, but a kinsman.—Pythagoras.

Strategy

Those oft are stratagems which errors seem,
Nor is it Homer nods, but we that dream.
—Pope.

For her own breakfast she'll project a scheme,
Nor take her tea without a stratagem.
—Young.

There webs were spread of more than common size,
And half-starved spiders prey'd on half starved flies.
—Churchill.

Strength

To be strong
Is to be happy! —Longfellow.

And, weaponless himself,
Made arms ridiculous. —Milton.

The king's name is a tower of strength,
Which they upon the adverse party want.
—Shakespeare.

Profan'd the God-given strength, and marr'd the lofty line.—Scott.

Strength alone knows conflict; weakness is below even defeat, and is born vanquished.—Mme. Swetchine.

Strength, wanting judgment and policy to rule, overturneth itself.—Horace.

The virtue of Paganism was strength; the virtue of Christianity is obedience.—Hare.

Strength is born in the deep silence of long-suffering hearts; not amidst joy.—Mrs. Hemans.

O, it is excellent
To have a giant's strength; but it is tyrannous
To use it like a giant. —Shakespeare.

But Hercules himself must yield to odds;
And many strokes, though with a little axe,
Hew down and fell the hardest-timber'd oak.
—Shakespeare.

Men mighty-thewed as Samson was,
dark-browed as kings in iron cast, broad-breasted as twin gates of brass.
—Joaquin Miller.

I would have you call to mind the strength of the ancient giants, that undertook to lay the high mountain Pelion on the top of Ossa, and set among those the shady Olympus.—Rabelais.

The ideal of morality has no more dangerous rival than the ideal of highest strength, of most powerful life. It is the maximum of the savage.—Novalis.

We deceive ourselves when we fancy that only weakness needs support. Strength needs it far more. A straw or a feather sustains itself long in the air.—Mme. Swetchine.

The exhibition of real strength is never grotesque. Distortion is the agony of weakness. It is the dislocated mind whose movements are spasmodic.—Willmott.

Although men are accused for not knowing their own weakness, yet perhaps as few know their own strength. It is in men as in soils, where some times there is a vein of gold which the owner knows not of.—Swift.

What is strength, without a double share
Of wisdom? Vast, unyielding, burdensome;
Proudly secure, yet liable to fall
By weakest subtleties; not made to rule,
But to subserve where wisdom hears command.
—Milton.

* * * In that day's feats,
He prov'd best man i' the field, and for his meed
Was brow-bound with the oak.
—Shakespeare.

So let it be in God's own might
We gird us for the coming fight,
And, strong in Him whose cause is ours
In conflict with unholy powers,
We grasp the weapons He has given,—
The Light, and Truth, and Love of Heaven.
—Whittier.

Atlas, we read in ancient song,
Was so exceeding tall and strong,
He bore the skies upon his back;
Just as the pedler does his pack;
But, as the pedler overpress'd
Unloads upon a stall to rest,
Or, when he can no longer stand,
Desires a friend to lend a hand,
So Atlas, lest the ponderous spheres
Should sink, and fall about his ears,
Got Hercules to bear the pile,
That he might sit and rest awhile.
—Swift.

Strife

There was war in the skies!—Owen Meredith.

Why all this toil for triumphs of an hour?—Young.

One that, above all other strifes, contended especially to know himself.
—Shakespeare.

If thou art of elephant-strength or of lion-claw, still peace is, in my opinion, better than strife.—Saadi.

Strikes (See Labor Day)

A mechanic his labor will often discard
If the rate of his pay he dislikes;
But a clock,—and its case is uncommonly hard,—
Will continue to work though it strikes.
—Hood.

Stubbornness

A stubborn mind conduces as little to wisdom or even to knowledge as a stubborn temper to happiness.—
Southey.

The man who can be compelled knows not how to die.—Seneca.

The self-educated are marked by stubborn peculiarities.—Disraeli.

Man's worst ill is stubbornness of heart.—Sophocles.

Mules and human jackasses are proverbially stubborn.—Haliburton.

If men were stubborn just in proportion as they were right, stubbornness would take her seat among the virtues; but men are generally stubborn just in proportion as they are ignorant and wrong.—H. W. Shaw.

Students

Night after night,
He sat and bleared his eyes with books.
—Longfellow.

The scholar who cherishes the love of comfort is not fit to be deemed a scholar.—Confucius.

There is unspeakable pleasure attending the life of a voluntary student.
—Goldsmith.

Strange to the world, he wore a bashful look,
The fields his study, nature was his book.
—Bloomfield.

The world's great men have not commonly been great scholars, nor its great scholars great men.—O. W.
Holmes.

Who climbs the grammar-tree, distinctly,
knows
Where noun, and verb, and participle grows. —Dryden.

Up! up! my Friend, and quit your books;
Or surely you'll grow double:
Up! up! my Friend, and clear our looks;
Why all this toil and trouble?
—Wordsworth.

And then the whining schoolboy, with his satchel
And shining morning face, creeping like snail
Unwillingly to school. —Shakespeare.

Where should the scholar live? In solitude, or in society? in the green stillness of the country, where he can hear the heart of Nature beat, or in the dark, gray town where he can hear and feel the throbbing heart of man?—

Longfellow.

He was a scholar, and a ripe and good
one;
Exceeding wise, fair-spoken, and persuad-
ing;
Lofty and sour to them that lov'd him not;
But to those men that sought him sweet as summer. —Shakespeare.

Ah, pensive scholar, what is fame?
A fitful tongue of leaping flame:
A giddy whirlwind's fickle gust,
That lifts a pinch of mortal dust;
A few swift years, and who can show
Which dust was Bill, and which was Joe?
—O. W. Holmes.

Deign on the passing world to turn thine
eyes,
And pause awhile from Learning to be wise;
There mark what ills the scholar's life as-
sail,

Toil, envy, want, the patron, and the gaol.
See nations, slowly wise and meanly just,
To buried merit raise the tardy bust.
—Sam'l Johnson.

The studious class are their own victims; they are thin and pale, their feet are cold, their heads are hot, the night is without sleep, the day a fear of interruption,—pallor, squalor, hunger, and egotism. If you come near them and see what conceits they entertain—they are abstractionists, and spend their days and nights in dreaming some dream: in expecting the homage of society to some precious scheme built on a truth, but destitute of proportion in its presentment, of justness in its application, and of all energy of will in the schemer to embody and vitalize it.—Emerson.

Study

Much study is a weariness of the flesh.—Bible.

Iron sharpens iron; scholar, the scholar.—Talmud.

Studious of ease, and fond of humble things.—Ambrose Philips.

As turning the logs will make a dull fire burn, so change of studies a dull brain.—Longfellow.

Strange to the world, he wore a bashful look; the field his study, Nature was his book.—Bloomfield.

There are more men ennobled by study than by nature.—Cicero.

There is no study that is not capable of delighting us after a little application to it.—Pope.

The more we study, we the more discover our ignorance.—Shelley.

Beholding the bright countenance of truth in the quiet and still air of delightful studies.—Milton.

Whence is thy learning? hath thy toil
O'er books consumed the midnight oil?
—Gay.

Exhausting thought,
And hiving wisdom with each studious year. —Byron.

When night hath set her silver lamp on
high,
Then is the time for study. —Bailey.

Leisure without study is death, and the grave of a living man.—Seneca.

Study is the bane of boyhood, the aliment of youth, the indulgence of manhood, and the restorative of age.—
Landor.

I study much, and the more I study, the oftener I go back to those first principles which are so simple that childhood itself can lisp them.—Mme.
Swetchine.

As land is improved by sowing it with various seeds, so is the mind by exercising it with different studies.—
Melmoth.

Studies teach not their own use;
but that is a wisdom without them,
and above them, won by observation.
—Bacon.

He has his Rome, his Florence, his whole glowing Italy, within the four walls of his library. He has in his books the ruins of an antique world, and the glories of a modern one.—
Longfellow.

He that studies only men will get the body of knowledge without the soul; and he that studies only books,
the soul without the body.—Colton.

Study detains the mind by the perpetual occurrence of something new, which may gratefully strike the imagination.—Dr. I. Watts.

Fall to them, as you find your stomach serves you:
No profit grows where is no pleasure ta'en;
In brief, sir, study what you most affect.
—Shakespeare.

The intellectual husbandry is a good field, and it is the worst husbandry in the world to sow it with trifles.—Sir M. Hale.

Even those to whom Providence has allotted greater strength of understanding can expect only to improve a single science.—Dr. Johnson.

The mind of the scholar, if he would have it large and liberal, should come in contact with other minds.—Longfellow.

The resources of the scholar are proportioned to his confidence in the attributes of the intellect.—Emerson.

Examples teach us that in military affairs, and all others of a like nature, study is apt to enervate and relax the courage of man, rather than to give strength and energy to the mind.—Montaigne.

A few books, well studied, and thoroughly digested, nourish the understanding more than hundreds but gargled in the mouth, as ordinary students use.—F. Osborn.

Histories make men wise; poets, witty; the mathematics, subtle; natural philosophy, deep; moral, grave; logic and rhetoric, able to contend.—Bacon.

Practical application is the only mordant which will set things in the memory. Study without it is gymnastics, and not work, which alone will get intellectual bread.—Lowell.

The love of study, a passion which derives fresh vigor from enjoyment, supplies each day, each hour, with a perpetual source of independent and rational pleasure.—Gibbon.

If not to some peculiar end assign'd,
Study's the specious trifling of the mind;
Or is at best a secondary aim,
A chase for sport alone and not for game.
—Young.

Trust, therefore, for the overcoming of a difficulty, not to long-continued study after you have once become bewildered, but to repeated trials at intervals.—Whately.

Universal plodding prisons up
The nimble spirits in the arteries;
As motion, and long-during action tires
The sinewy vigor of the traveller.
—Shakespeare.

As the soil, however rich it may be, cannot be productive without culture, so the mind without cultivation can never produce good fruit.—Seneca.

One of the best methods of rendering study agreeable is to live with able men, and to suffer all those pangs of inferiority which the want of knowledge always inflicts.—Sydney Smith.

When two or three sciences are pursued at the same time if one of them be dry, as logic, let another be more entertaining, to secure the mind from weariness.—Dr. Watts.

With curious art the brain, too finely wrought,
Preys on herself, and is destroy'd by thought:
Constant attention wears the active mind,
Blots out our powers, and leaves a blank behind.
—Churchill.

The love of study is in us the only lasting passion. All the others quit us in proportion as this miserable machine which holds them approaches its ruins.—Montesquieu.

They are not the best students who are most dependent on books. What can be got out of them is at best only material; a man must build his house for himself.—George MacDonald.

If you devote your time to study, you will avoid all the irksomeness of this life; nor will you long for the approach of night, being tired of the day;

nor will you be a burden to yourself, nor your society insupportable to others.—Seneca.

A boy will learn more true wisdom in a public school in a year than by a private education in five. It is not from masters, but from their equals, that youth learn a knowledge of the world.—Goldsmith.

Mankind have a great aversion to intellectual labor, but, even supposing knowledge to be easily attainable, more people would be content to be ignorant than would take even a little trouble to acquire it.—Johnson.

You are to come to your study as to the table, with a sharp appetite, whereby that which you read may the better digest. He that has no stomach to his book will very hardly thrive upon it.—Earl of Bedford.

Study is like the heaven's glorious sun,
That will not be deep-search'd with saucy looks,
Small have continual plodders ever won,
Save base authority from others' books.
—Shakespeare.

So study evermore is overshot;
While it doth study to have what it would
It doth forget to do the thing it should,
And when it hath the thing it hunteth most,
'Tis won as towns with fire, so won, so lost.
—Shakespeare.

The secret studies of an author are the sunken piers upon which is to rest the bridge of his fame, spanning the dark waters of oblivion. They are out of sight, but without them no superstructure can stand secure.—Longfellow.

Dr. Johnson held that "impatience of study was the mental disease of the present generation;" and the remark is still applicable. We may not believe that there is a royal road to learning, but we seem to believe very firmly in a "popular" one.—Samuel Smiles.

It is quite possible, and not uncommon, to read most laboriously, even so as to get by heart the words of a book, without really studying it at all,—that is, without employing the thoughts on the subject.—Whately.

The man who has acquired the habit of study, though for only one hour every day in the year, and keeps to the one thing studied till it is mastered, will be startled to see the way he has made at the end of a twelvemonth.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Strive, while improving your one talent, to enrich your whole capital as a man. It is in this way that you escape from the wretched narrow-mindedness which is the characteristic of every one who cultivates his specialty alone.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The ancient practice of allowing land to remain fallow for a season is now exploded, and a succession of different crops found preferable. The case is similar with regard to the understanding, which is more relieved by change of study than by total inactivity.—W. B. Clulow.

What is the end of study? Let me know?
Why, that to know, which else we should not know.
Things hid and barr'd, you mean, from common sense?
Ay, that is study's god-like recompense.
—Shakespeare.

These (literary) studies are the food of youth, and consolation of age; they adorn prosperity; and are the comfort and refuge of adversity; they are pleasant at home, and are no incumbrance abroad; they accompany us at night, in our travels, and in our rural retreats.—Cicero.

A man may smoke, or drink, or take snuff, till he is unable to pass away his time without it, not to mention how our delight in any particular study, art, or science, rises and improves in proportion to the application which we bestow upon it. Thus, what was at first an exercise, becomes at length an entertainment.—Addison.

I remember to have heard a great painter say: "There are certain faces for certain painters, as well as certain subjects for certain poets." This is as true in the choice of studies; and no one will ever relish an author thoroughly well who would not have been fit companion for that author, had they lived at the same time.—Steele.

Whatever study tends neither directly nor indirectly to make us better men and citizens is at best but a specious and ingenious sort of idleness; and the knowledge we acquire by it only a creditable kind of ignorance, nothing more.—Lord Bolingbroke.

Stupidity

Stupidity,—unconscious ignorance.—H. W. Shaw.

Stupidity has no friends, and wants none.—Horace Greeley.

Against stupidity the very gods fight unvictorious.—Schiller.

The fault rests with the gods, who have made her so stupid.—Gresset.

That fellow seems to me to possess but one idea, and that a wrong one.—Dr. Johnson.

Heaven should be kind to stupid people, for no one else can be consistent.—Balzac.

The bookful blockhead, ignorantly read,
With loads of learned lumber in his head.
—Pope.

He is not only dull himself, but the cause of dullness in others.—Samuel Johnson.

The fool of nature stood with stupid eyes
And gaping mouth, that testified surprise.
—Dryden.

With various readings stored his empty
skull,
Learn'd without sense, and venerably dull.
—Churchill.

A pity about the people! they are brave enough comrades, but they have heads like a soapboiler's.—Schiller.

There is in it a placid inexhaustibility, a calm, vicious infinitude, which will baffle even the gods.—Carlyle.

In our wide world there is but one altogether fatal personage, the dunce,—he that speaks irrationally, that sees not, and yet thinks he sees.—Carlyle.

Stupidity has its sublime, as well as genius, and he who carries that quality to absurdity has reached it; which is always a source of amusement to sensible people.—Wieland.

For blocks are better cleft with wedges,
Than tools of sharp or subtle edges,
And dullest nonsense has been found
By some to be the most profound.
—Butler.

Peter was dull; he was at first Dull,—Oh, so dull—so very dull!
Whether he talked, wrote, or rehearsed—
Still with this dullness was he cursed—Dull—beyond all conception—dull.
—Shelley.

Style

Style is the dress of thoughts.—Earl of Chesterfield.

A temperate style is alone classical.—Joubert.

Every good writer has much idiom.—Landor.

A good style fits like a good costume.—Alcott.

Set off with numerous breaks and dashes.—Swift.

Not poetry, but prose run mad.—Pope.

You gain your point if your industrious art can make unusual words easy.—Roscommon.

The style of St. Jerome shines like ebony.—Joubert.

A pure style in writing results from the rejection of everything superfluous.—Mme. Necker.

Chaucer, I confess, is a rough diamond, and must be polished ere he shine.—Dryden.

Uncommon expressions are a disfigurement rather than an embellishment of discourse.—Hume.

A chaste and lucid style is indicative of the same personal traits in the author.—Hosea Ballou.

The first requisite of style, not only in rhetoric, but in all compositions, is perspicuity.—Whately.

Simplicity, without which no human performance can arrive at perfection.—Swift.

Proper words in proper places.—Swift.

In all you write be neither low nor vile: The meanest theme may have a proper style.—Dryden.

The lives of trees lie only in the barks, And in their styles the wit of greatest clerks.—Butler.

Montesquieu had the style of a genius; Buffon, the genius of style.—Baron Grimm.

Let us not write at a loose rambling rate, in hope the world will wink at all our faults.—Roscommon.

Will no superior genius snatch the quill, and save me on the brink from writing ill?—Young.

Nero was wont to say of his master, Seneca, that his style was like mortar without lime.—Bacon.

An author can have nothing truly his own but his style.—Disraeli.

A sentence, well couched, takes both the sense and the understanding.—Feltham.

Style is the gossamer on which the seeds of truth float through the world.—Bancroft.

Every good writer has much idiom; it is the life and spirit of language.—Landor.

In the present day our literary masonry is well done, but our architecture is poor.—Joubert.

Grace was in all her steps, heaven in her eye, in every gesture dignity and love.—Milton.

A good writer does not write as people write, but as he writes.—Montesquieu.

Xenophon wrote with a swan's quill, Plato with a pen of gold, and Thucydides with a brazen stylus.—Joubert.

The truly sublime is always easy, and always natural.—Burke.

It is difficult to descend with grace without seeming to fall.—Blair.

Proper words in proper places make the true definition of a style.—Swift.

Every style formed elaborately on any model must be affected and straight-laced.—Whipple.

Men who make money rarely saunter; men who save money rarely swagger.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Style, after all, rather than thought, is the immortal thing in literature.—Alexander Smith.

Style is only the frame to hold your thoughts. It is like the sash of a window; if heavy, it will obscure the light.—Emerson.

One who uses many periods is a philosopher; many interrogations, a student; many exclamations, a fanatic.—J. L. Basford.

The lively phraseology of Montesquieu was the result of long meditation. His words, as light as wings, bear on them grave reflections.—Joubert.

If a book come from the heart, it will contrive to reach other hearts; all art and author-craft are of small account to that.—Carlyle.

Oh, never will I trust to speeches penned! * * * taffeta phrases, silken terms precise, three-piled hyperboles.—Shakespeare.

Such labored nothings, in so strange a style, amaze the unlearned and make the learned smile.—Pope.

Antithesis may be the blossom of wit, but it will never arrive at maturity unless sound sense be the trunk, and truth the root.—Colton.

The old prose writers wrote as if they were speaking to an audience; while, among us, prose is invariably written for the eye alone.—Niebuhr.

Long sentences in a short composition are like large rooms in a little house.—Shenstone.

When we meet with a natural style, we are surprised and delighted, for we expected to find an author, and we have found a man.—Pascal.

Obscurity in writing is commonly an argument of darkness in the mind. The greatest learning is to be seen in the greatest plainness.—Wilkins.

If you would be pungent, be brief, for it is with words as with sunbeams the more they are condensed, the deeper they burn.—Saxe.

Submit your sentiments with diffidence. A dictatorial style, though it may carry conviction, is always accompanied with disgust.—Washington.

Unconsciousness is one of the most important conditions of a good style in speaking or in writing.—Richard Grant White.

Style supposes the reunion and the exercise of all the intellectual faculties. The style is the man.—Buffon.

The least degree of ambiguity which leaves the mind in suspense as to the meaning ought to be avoided with the greatest care.—Blair.

Wherever you find a sentence musically worded, of true rhythm and melody in the words, there is something deep and good in the meaning also.—Coleridge.

With many readers brilliancy of style passes for affluence of thought; they mistake buttercups in the grass for immeasurable mines of gold under ground.—Longfellow.

As it is a great point of art, when our matter requires it, to enlarge and veer out all sail, so to take it in and contract it is of no less praise, when the argument doth ask it.—Ben Jonson.

There is nothing in words and styles but suitableness that makes them acceptable and effective.—Glanvill.

The sublime and the ridiculous are often so nearly related that it is difficult to class them separately. One step above the sublime makes the ridiculous; and one step above the ridiculous makes the sublime again.—Thomas Paine.

Sir Francis Bacon observed that a well-written book, compared with its rivals and antagonists, is like Moses' serpent, that immediately swallowed up and devoured those of the Egyptians.—Addison.

A sentence well couched takes both the sense and the understanding. I love not those cart-rope speeches that are longer than the memory of man can fathom.—Feltham.

Style in painting is the same as in writing,—a power over materials, whether words or colors, by which conceptions or sentiments are conveyed.—Sir Joshua Reynolds.

Some have a violent and turgid manner of talking and thinking; they are always in extremes, and pronounce concerning everything in the superlative.—Dr. Watts.

Whatever professes to benefit by pleasing must please at once. The pleasures of the mind imply something sudden and unexpected; that which elevates must always surprise.—Dr. Johnson.

Mannerism is always longing to have done, and has no true enjoyment in work. A genuine, really great talent, on the other hand, has its greatest happiness in execution.—Goethe.

The scholars of Ireland seem not to have the least conception of style, but run on in a flat phraseology, often mingled with barbarous terms.—Swift.

Style is indeed the valet of genius, and an able one too; but as the true gentleman will appear, even in rags, so true genius will shine, even through the coarsest style.—Colton.

I hate a style, as I do a garden, that is wholly flat and regular,—that slides along like an eel, and never rises to what one can call an inequality.—Shenstone.

The beautiful invariably possesses a visible and a hidden beauty; and it is certain that no style is so beautiful as that which presents to the attentive reader a half-hidden meaning.—Joubert.

Expression is the dress of thought, and still Appears more decent as more suitable;
A vile conceit in pompous words expressed,
Is like a clown in regal purple dress'd.—Pope.

Persons are oftentimes misled in regard to their choice of dress by attending to the beauty of colors, rather than selecting such colors as may increase their own beauty.—Shenstone.

Justness of thought and style, refinement in manners, good-breeding and politeness of every kind, can come only from the trial and experience of what is best.—Duncan.

I look upon paradoxes as the important efforts of men who, not having capacity to draw attention and celebrity from good sense, fly to eccentricities to make themselves noted.—Horace Walpole.

You know that in everything women write there are always a thousand faults of grammar, but, with your permission, a harmony which is rare in the writings of men.—Mme. de Main-tenon.

One tires of a page of which every sentence sparkles with points, of a sentimentalist who is always pumping the tears from his eyes or your own.—Thackeray.

It is far more difficult to be simple than to be complicated; far more difficult to sacrifice skill and cease exertion in the proper place, than to expend both indiscriminately.—Ruskin.

The way to acquire lasting esteem is not by the fewness of a writer's faults, but the greatness of his beauties, and our noblest works are generally most replete with both.—Goldsmith.

Whoever wishes to attain an English style, familiar but not coarse, and elegant but not ostentatious, must give his days and nights to the volumes of Addison.—Johnson.

Those who make antitheses by forcing the sense are like men who make false windows for the sake of symmetry. Their rule is not to speak justly, but to make accurate figures.—Pascal.

He who would reproach an author for obscurity should look into his own mind and see whether it is quite clear there. In the dusk the plainest writing is illegible.—Goethe.

Propriety of thought and propriety of diction are commonly found together. Obscurity and affectation are the two greatest faults of style.—Macaulay.

A great writer possesses, so to speak, an individual and unchangeable style, which does not permit him easily to preserve the anonymous.—Voltaire.

The way to elegance of style is to employ your pen upon every errand; and the more trivial and dry it is, the more brains must be allowed for sauce.—F. Osborn.

The secret of force in writing lies not so much in the pedigree of nouns and adjectives and verbs, as in having something that you believe in to say, and making the parts of speech vividly conscious of it.—Lowell.

Nothing is so difficult as the apparent ease of a clear and flowing style; those graces which, from their presumed facility, encourage all to attempt an imitation of them, are usually the most inimitable.—Colton.

D'Alembert tells us that Voltaire had always lying on his table the "Petit Carême" of Massillon and the "Tragedies" of Racine; the former to fix his taste in prose composition, and the latter in poetry.—Dugald Stewart.

There is a certain majesty in plainness; as the proclamation of a prince never frisks in its tropes or fine conceits, in numerous and well-turned periods, but commands in sober, natural expressions.—South.

Plutarch would rather we should applaud his judgment than commend his knowledge, and would rather leave us with an appetite to read more than glutted with that we have already read.—Montaigne.

As the air and manner of a gentleman can be acquired only by living habitually in the best society, so grace in composition must be attained by an habitual acquaintance with classical writers.—Dugald Stewart.

The censure of frequent and long parentheses has led writers into the preposterous expedient of leaving out the marks by which they are indicated. It is no cure to a lame man to take away his crutches.—Whately.

Let the man who despises style, and says that he attends to the matter, recollect that if the lace is sold at a higher price than the noble metal, it owes its chief value to its elegance, and not to its material.—Yriarte.

Redundancy of language is never found with deep reflection. Verbiage may indicate observation, but not thinking. He who thinks much says but little in proportion to his thoughts.—Washington Irving.

Burke's sentences are pointed at the end, instinct with pungent sense to the last syllable. They are like a charioteer's whip, which not only has a long and effective lash, but cracks and inflicts a still smarter sensation at the end.—John Foster.

Miss Edgeworth and Mme. de Staël have proved that there is no sex in style; and Mme. la Roche Jacqueline, and the Duchesse d'Angoulême have proved that there is no sex in courage.—Colton.

The want of a more copious diction, to borrow a figure from Locke, is caused by our supposing that the mind is like Fortunatus's purse, and will always supply our wants, without our ever putting anything into it.—Bovee.

When you doubt between words, use the plainest, the commonest, the most idiomatic. Eschew fine words as you would rouge, love simple ones as you would native roses on your cheek.—Hare.

The words in prose ought to express the intended meaning; if they attract attention to themselves, it is a fault; in the very best styles, as Southey's, you read page after page without noticing the medium.—Coleridge.

Generally speaking, an author's style is a faithful copy of his mind. If you would write a lucid style, let there first be light in your own mind; and if you would write a grand style, you ought to have a grand character.—Goethe.

Whatever is pure is also simple. It does not keep the eye on itself. The observer forgets the window in the landscape it displays. A fine style gives the view of fancy—its figures, its trees, or its palaces,—without a spot.—Willmott.

A copious manner of expression gives strength and weight to our ideas, which frequently make impression upon the mind, as iron does upon solid bodies, rather by repeated strokes than a single blow.—Melmoth.

When I meet with any persons who write obscurely or converse confusedly, I am apt to suspect two things; first, that such persons do not understand themselves; and secondly, that they are not worthy of being understood by others.—Colton.

Only well-written works will descend to posterity. Fulness of knowledge, interesting facts, even useful inventions, are no pledge of immortality, for they may be employed by more skilful hands; they are outside the man; the style is the man himself.—Buffon.

An era is fast approaching when no writer will be read by the majority, save and except those than can effect that for bales of manuscript that the hydrostatic screw performs for bales of cotton, by condensing that matter into a period that before occupied a page.—Cottar.

The flowery style is not unsuitable to public speeches or addresses, which amount only to compliment. The lighter beauties are in their place when there is nothing more solid to say; but the flowery style ought to be banished from a pleading, a sermon, or a didactic work.—Voltaire.

To write a genuine familiar or truly English style is to write as anyone would speak in common conversation, who had a thorough command and choice of words, or who could discourse with ease, force, and perspicuity, setting aside all pedantic and oratorical flourishes.—Hazlitt.

Style is the dress of thoughts; and let them be ever so just, if your style is homely, coarse, and vulgar, they will appear to as much disadvantage, and be as ill received, as your person, though ever so well proportioned, would if dressed in rags, dirt, and tatters.—Chesterfield.

In composing, think much more of your matter than your manner. To be sure, spirit, grace, and dignity of manner are of great importance, both to the speaker and writer; but of infinitely more importance is the weight and worth of matter.—Wirt.

As the mind of Johnson was robust, but neither nimble nor graceful, so his style was void of all grace and ease, and, being the most unlike of all styles to the natural effusion of a cultivated mind, had the least pretension to the praise of eloquence.—Sir J. Mackintosh.

Perhaps that is nearly the perfection of good writing which is original, but whose truth alone prevents the reader from suspecting that it is so; and which effects that for knowledge which the lens effects for the sunbeam, when it condenses its brightness in order to increase its force.—Colton.

It is curious for one who studies the action and reaction of national literature on each other, to see the humor of Swift and Sterne and Fielding, after filtering through Richter, reappear in Carlyle with a tinge of Germanism that makes it novel, alien, or even displeasing, as the case may be, to the English mind.—Lowell.

Style! style, why, all writers will tell you that it is the very thing which can least of all be changed. A man's style is nearly as much a part of him as his physiognomy, his figure, the throbbing of his pulse,—in short, as any part of his being which is at least subjected to the action of the will.—Fénelon.

The style of writing required in the great world is distinguished by a free and daring grace, a careless security, a fine and sharp polish, a delicate and perfect taste; while that fitted for the people is characterized by a vigorous natural fulness, a profound depth of feeling, and an engaging naivete.—Goethe.

We know much of a writer by his style. An open and imperious disposition is shown in short sentences, direct and energetic. A secretive and proud mind is cold and obscure in style. An affectionate and imaginative nature pours out luxuriantly, and blossoms all over with ornament.—Beecher.

Style is the physiognomy of the mind. It is more infallible than that of the body. To imitate the style of another is said to be wearing a mask. However beautiful it may be, it is through its lifelessness insipid and intolerable, so that even the most ugly living face is more engaging.—Schopenhauer.

Any one may mouth out a passage with a theatrical cadence, or get upon stilts to tell his thoughts; but to write or speak with propriety and simplicity is a more difficult task. Thus it is easy to affect a pompous style, to use a word twice as big as the thing you want to express; it is not so easy to pitch upon the very word that exactly fits it.—Hazlitt.

In some exquisite critical hints on "Eurythmy," Goethe remarks, "that the best composition in pictures is that which, observing the most delicate laws of harmony, so arranges the objects that they by their position tell their own story." And the rule thus applied to composition in painting applies no less to composition in literature.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Propriety of thought and propriety of diction are commonly found together. Obscurity and affectation are the two great faults of style. Obscurity of expression generally springs from confusion of ideas; and the same wish to dazzle, at any cost, which produces affectation in the manner of a writer, is likely to produce sophistry in his reasoning.—Macaulay.

Harmony of period and melody of style have greater weight than is generally imagined in the judgment we pass upon writing and writers. As a proof of this, let us reflect what texts of scripture, what lines in poetry, or what periods we most remember and quote, either in verse or prose, and we shall find them to be only musical ones.—Shenstone.

The unaffected of every country nearly resemble each other, and a page of our Confucius and your Tillotson have scarce any material difference. Paltry affectation, strained allusions, and disgusting finery are easily attained by those who choose to wear them; they are but too frequently the badges of ignorance or of stupidity, whenever it would endeavor to please.—Goldsmith.

A composition which dazzles at first sight by gaudy epithets, or brilliant turns of expression, or glittering trains of imagery, may fade gradually from the mind, leaving no enduring impression; but words which flow fresh and warm from a full heart, and which are instinct with the life and breath of human feeling, pass into household memories, and partake of the immortality of the affections from which they spring.—Whipple.

If I were to choose the people with whom I would spend my hours of conversation, they should be certainly such as labored no further than to make themselves readily and clearly apprehended, and would have patience and curiosity to understand me. To have good sense and ability to express it are the most essential and necessary qualities in companions. When thoughts rise in us fit to utter among familiar friends, there needs but very little care in clothing them.—Steele.

Young people are dazzled by the brilliancy of antithesis, and employ it. Matter-of-fact men, and those who like precision, naturally fall into comparisons and metaphor. Sprightly natures, full of fire, and whom a boundless imagination carries beyond all rules, and even what is reasonable, cannot rest satisfied even with hyberbole. As for the sublime, it is only great geniuses and those of the very highest order that are able to rise to its height.—Bryyère.

He who thinks much says but little in proportion to his thoughts. He selects that language which will convey his ideas in the most explicit and direct manner. He tries to compress as much thought as possible into a few words. On the contrary, the man who talks everlastingly and promiscuously, who seems to have an exhaustless magazine of sound, crowds so many words into his thoughts that he always obscures, and very frequently conceals them.—Washington Irving.

Gentleness in the gait is what simplicity is in the dress. Violent gesture or quick movement inspires involuntary disrespect. One looks for a moment at a cascade; but one sits for hours, lost in thought, and gazing upon the still water of a lake. A deliberate gait, gentle manners, and a gracious tone of voice—all of which may be acquired—give a mediocre man an immense advantage over those vastly superior to him. To be bodily tranquil, to speak little, and to digest without effort are absolutely necessary to grandeur of mind or of presence, or to proper development of genius.—Balzac.

Some authors write nonsense in a clear style, and others sense in an obscure one; some can reason without being able to persuade, others can persuade without being able to reason; some dive so deep that they descend into darkness, and others soar so high that they give us no light; and some, in a vain attempt to be cutting and dry, give us only that which is cut and dried. We should labor, therefore, to treat with ease of things that are difficult; with familiarity, of things that are novel; and with perspicuity, of things that are profound.—Colton.

Sublimity

Above the vulgar flight of common souls.—Murphy.

One source of the sublime is infinity.—Burke.

Sublimity is Hebrew by birth.—Coleridge.

Hear we not the hum of mighty workings?—Keats.

The palpable obscure.—Milton.

Nothing so effectually deadens the taste of the sublime as that which is light and radiant.—Burke.

From the sublime to the ridiculous there is but one step.—Napoleon.

How sublime is the audacious tauology of Mohammed, God is God!—W. R. Alger.

Anything which elevates the mind is sublime. Greatness of matter, space, power, virtue or beauty, are all sublime.—Ruskin.

The sublime and the ridiculous are often so nearly related that it is difficult to class them separately. One step above the sublime makes the ridiculous, and one step above the ridiculous makes the sublime again.—Thomas Paine.

Stupidity has its sublime as well as genius, and he who carries that quality to absurdity has reached it, which is always a source of pleasure to sensible people.—Wieland.

The sublime, when it is introduced at a seasonable moment, has often carried all before it with the rapidity of lightning, and shown at a glance the mighty power of genius.—Longinus.

“The sublime,” says Longinus, “is often nothing but the echo or image of magnanimity”; and where this quality appears in any one, even though a syllable be not uttered, it excites our applause and admiration.—Hume.

The sublime only paints the true, and that too in noble objects; it paints it in all its phases, its cause and its effect; it is the most worthy expression or image of this truth. Ordinary minds cannot find out the exact expression, and use synonymes.—Bruyère.

The sublime is the temple-step of religion, as the stars are of immeasurable space. When what is mighty appears in nature,—a storm, thunder, the starry firmament, death,—then utter the word “God” before the child. A great misfortune, a great blessing, a great crime, a noble action, are building-sites for a child’s church.—Richter.

Subordination

I am a friend to subordination, as most conducive to the happiness of society. There is a reciprocal pleasure in governing and being governed.—Johnson.

Subtlety

Subtlety may deceive you; integrity never will.—Cromwell.

It is said that Windham, when he came to the end of a speech, often found himself so perplexed by his own subtlety that he hardly knew which way he was going to give his vote. This is a good illustration of the fallaciousness of reasoning, and of the uncertainties which attend its practical application.—Hare.

Subtlety will sometimes give safety, no less than strength; and minuteness has sometimes escaped, where magnitude would have been crushed. The little animal that kills the boa is formidable chiefly from its insignificance, which is incompressible by the folds of its antagonist.—Colton.

Success

Nothing succeeds so well as success.—Talleyrand.

Success is the child of audacity.—Beaconsfield.

Success covers a multitude of blunders.—H. W. Shaw.

Success consecrates the foulest crimes.—Seneca.

A successful career has been full of blunders.—Charles Buxton.

In success be moderate.—Franklin.

Life lives only in success.—Bayard Taylor.

Success often costs more than it is worth.—E. Wigglesworth.

He will succeed; for he believes all he says.—Mirabeau.

Success is a fruit of slow growth.—Fielding.

A strenuous soul hates cheap success.—Fielding.

Human success is a quotation from overhead.—Charles H. Parkhurst.

Success makes success, as money makes money.—Chamfort.

The race by vigor, not by vaunts, is won.—Pope.

The gods are on the side of the stronger.—Tacitus.

Now, by St. Paul, the work goes bravely on.—Colley Cibber.

The greater part performed achieves the less.—Dryden.

Success causes us to be more praised than known.—Joseph Roux.

The surest way not to fail is to determine to succeed.—Sheridan.

To know how to wait is the great secret of success.—De Maistre.

There is a glare about worldly success, which is very apt to dazzle men's eyes.—Hare.

What succeeds we keep, and it becomes the habit of mankind.—Theodore Parker.

Who shall tax successful villany, or call the rising traitor to account?—Havard.

It is success that colors all in life; success makes fools admired, makes villains honest.—Thomson.

The man who is always fortunate cannot easily have a great reverence for virtue.—Cicero.

That which turns out well is better than any law.—Menander.

In everything the ends well defined are the secret of durable success.—Cousin.

Let them call it mischief; when it is past and prospered, it will be virtue.—Ben Jonson.

Success! to thee, as to a God, men bend the knee.—Æschylus.

Didst thou never hear
That things ill got had ever bad success?
—Shakespeare.

One thing is forever good;
That one thing is Success.
—Emerson.

The earliest desire of succeeding is almost always a prognostic of success.—Stanislaus.

Fortune is always on the side of the largest battalions.—Mme. de Sévigné.

Providence is always on the side of the last reserve.—Attributed to Napoleon I.

Success has a great tendency to conceal and throw a veil over the evil deeds of men.—Demosthenes.

Successful minds work like a gimlet,—to a single point.—Bovee.

Success is counted sweetest
By those who ne'er succeed.
—Emily Dickinson.

When the shore is won at last,
Who will count the billows past?
—Keble.

Th' aspirer, once attain'd unto the top,
Cuts off those means by which himself got up. —Sam'l Daniel.

I came up-stairs into the world; for
I was born in a cellar.—Congreve.

From mere success nothing can be concluded in favor of any nation upon whom it is bestowed.—Atterbury.

The surest way not to fail is to determine to succeed.—Sheridan.

Singing and dancing alone will not advance one in the world.—Rousseau.

'Tis not in mortals to command success,
But we'll do more, Sempronius; we'll deserve it. —Addison.

They never fail who die
In a great cause. —Byron.

To climb steep hills Requires slow pace at first.
—Shakespeare.

The mind is hopeful; success is in God's hands. (Man proposes, God disposes).—Plautus.

The success of most things depends upon knowing how long it will take to succeed.—Montesquieu.

The success of the wicked entices
many more.—Phædrus.

With the losers let it sympathize; for nothing can seem foul to those that win.—Shakespeare.

Almost everywhere men have become the particular things which their particular work has made them.—J. G.
Holland.

Success serves men as a pedestal.
It makes them seem greater when not measured by reflection.—Joubert.

The worst use that can be made of success is to boast of it.—Arthur Helps.

The greatest success is confidence, or perfect understanding between sincere people.—Emerson.

Give any one fortune, and he shall be thought a wise man.—South.

What does it avail you, if of many thorns only one be removed.—Horace.

He has carried every point, who has mingled the useful with the agreeable.
—Horace.

The stronger always succeeds. (The weakest goes to the wall).—Plautus.

Be commonplace and creeping, and you attain all things.—Beaumarchais.

Success at first doth many times
undo men at last.—Venning.

Had I succeeded well, I had been reckoned amongst the wise; our minds are so disposed to judge from the event.—Euripides.

We tell our triumphs to the crowd,
but our own hearts are the sole con-fidants of our sorrows.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Not that which men do worthily,
but that which they do successfully,
is what history makes haste to record.
—Beecher.

Success is full of promise till men get it; and then it is a last year's nest, from which the bird has flown.
—Beecher.

Few things are impracticable in themselves; and it is for want of application rather than of means, that men fail of success.—Rochefoucauld.

Success produces confidence, confidence relaxes industry, and negligence ruins that reputation which accuracy had raised.—Johnson.

Success surely comes with conscience in the long run, other things being equal. Capacity and fidelity are commercially profitable qualities.—Henry Ward Beecher.

The rude reproaches of the rascal herd, who for the self-same actions, if successful, would be as grossly lavish in their praise.—Thomson.

Success soon palls. The joyous time is when the breeze first strikes your sails, and the waters rustle under your bows.—Charles Buxton.

Born for success, he seemed
With grace to win, with heart to hold,
With shining gifts that took all eyes.
—Emerson.

Better have failed in the high aim, as I,
Than vulgarly in the low aim succeed
As, God be thanked! I do not.
—Robert Browning.

Experience has always shown, and reason also, that affairs which depend on many seldom succeed.—Guicciardini.

I have always observed that to succeed in the world one should appear like a fool but be wise.—Montesquieu.

There are but two ways of rising in the world: either by one's own industry or profiting by the foolishness of others.—La Bruyère.

It is a mistake to suppose that men succeed through success; they much oftener succeed through failure.—Samuel Smiles.

Those who are prosperously unjust are entitled to panegyric, but afflicted virtue is stabbed with reproaches.—Dryden.

Success does not consist in never making blunders, but in never making the same one the second time.—H. W. Shaw.

There are none so low but that they have their triumphs. Small successes suffice for small souls.—Bovee.

He that would relish success to purpose should keep his passion cool and his expectation low.—Jeremy Collier.

Such a nature, tickled with good success, disdains the shadow which he treads on at noon.—Shakespeare.

If fortune wishes to make a man estimable, she gives him virtues; if she wishes to make him esteemed, she gives him success.—Joubert.

Nothing is impossible to the man that can will. Is that necessary? That shall be. This is the only law of success.—Mirabeau.

Whenever you see a man who is successful in society, try to discover what makes him pleasing, and if possible adopt his system.—Beaconsfield.

If you wish success in life, make perseverance your bosom friend, experience your wise counselor, caution your elder brother, and hope your guardian genius.—Addison.

Had I miscarried, I had been a villain; for men judge actions always by events; but when we manage by a just foresight, success is prudence, and possession right.—Higgins.

To know a man, observe how he wins his object, rather than how he loses it; for when we fail, our pride supports us,—when we succeed, it betrays us.—Colton.

One line, a line fraught with instruction, includes the secret of Lord Kenyon's final success,—he was prudent, he was patient, and he persevered.—G. Townsend.

He that climbs the tall tree has won right to the fruit,
He that leaps the wide gulf should prevail in his suit.
—Scott.

One of the greatest of a great man's qualities is success: 't is the result of all the others; 't is a latent power in him which compels the favor of the gods, and subjugates fortune.—Thackeray.

It is success that colors all in life: success makes fools admired, makes villains honest: all the proud virtue of this vaunting world fawns on success and power, however acquired.—Thomson.

One way in which fools succeed where wise men fail is that through ignorance of the danger they sometimes go coolly about a hazardous business.—Whately.

It is a great presumption to ascribe our successes to our own management, and not to esteem ourselves upon any blessing, rather as it is the bounty of heaven, than the acquisition of our own prudence.—Addison.

Virtue without success is fair picture shown by an ill light; but lucky men are favorites of heaven: all own the chief when fortune owns the cause.—Dryden.

Now is the winter of our discontent
Made glorious summer by this sun of York;
And all the clouds that lour'd upon our house
In the deep bosom of the ocean buried.
—Shakespeare.

The great highroad of human welfare lies along the old highway of steadfast well-doing; and they who are the most persistent, and the work in the truest spirit, will invariably be the most successful; success treads on the heels of every right effort.—Samuel Smiles.

The thinking part of mankind do not form their judgment from events; and their equity will ever attach equal glory to those actions which deserve success, and those which have been crowned with it.—Washington.

Constant success shows us but one side of the world; for, as it surrounds us with friends, who will tell us only our merits, so it silences those enemies from whom alone we can learn our defects.—Colton.

There may come a day
Which crowns Desire with gift, and Art with truth,
And Love with bliss, and Life with wiser youth!
—Bayard Taylor.

Julius Cæsar owed two millions when he risked the experiment of being general in Gaul. If Julius Cæsar had not lived to cross the Rubicon, and pay off his debts, what would his creditors have called Julius Cæsar?—Bulwer-Lytton.

It is possible to indulge too great contempt for mere success, which is frequently attended with all the practical advantages of merit itself, and with several advantages that merit alone can never command.—W. B. Clu-
low.

Hast thou not learn'd what thou art often told,
A truth still sacred, and believed of old,
That no success attends on spears and swords
Unblest, and that the battle is the Lord's?
—Cowper.

The talent of success is nothing more than doing what you can do well, and doing well whatever you do without a thought of fame. If it comes at all it will come because it is deserved, not because it is sought after.—Longfellow.

Yet the success of plans and the advantage to be derived from them do not at all times agree, seeing the gods claim to themselves the right to decide as to the final result.—Amianus Marcellinus.

He that would relish success to a good purpose should keep his passions cool, and his expectations low; and then it is possible that his fortune might exceed his fancy; for an advantage always rises by surprise, and is almost always doubled by being unlooked for.—Jeremy Collier.

Popularity disarms envy in well-disposed minds. Those are ever the most ready to do justice to others who feel that the world has done them justice. When success has not this effect in opening the mind it is a sign that it has been ill-deserved.—Hazlitt.

The surest hindrance to success is to have too high a standard of refinement in our own minds, or too high an opinion of the judgment of the public. He who is determined not to be satisfied with anything short of perfection will never do anything at all either to please himself or others.—Hazlitt.

The secret of pleasure in life, as distinct from its great triumphs of transcendent joy, is to live in a series of small, legitimate successes. By legitimate I mean such as are not accompanied by self-condemnation.—Sydney Dobell.

"I confess," says a thoughtful writer, "that increasing years bring with them an increasing respect for men who do not succeed in life, as those words are commonly used." Ill success sometimes arises from a conscience too sensitive, a taste too fastidious, a self-forgetfulness too romantic, a modesty too retiring.—G. A. Sala.

To judge by the event is an error all commit: for in every instance courage, if crowned with success, is heroism; if clouded by defeat, temerity. When Nelson fought his battle in the Sound, it was the result alone that decided whether he was to kiss a hand at court or a rod at a court-martial.—Colton.

Mankind worships success, but thinks too little of the means by which it is attained,—what days and nights of watching and weariness; how year after year has dragged on, and seen the end still far off: all that counts for little, if the long struggle do not close in victory.—H. M. Field.

Success seems to be that which forms the distinction between confidence and conceit. Nelson, when young, was piqued at not being noticed in a certain paragraph of the newspapers, which detailed an action wherein he had assisted. "But never mind," said he; "I will one day have a Gazette of my own."—Colton.

The path of success in business is invariably the path of common-sense. Notwithstanding all that is said about "lucky hits," the best kind of success in every man's life is not that which comes by accident. The only

"good time coming" we are justified in hoping for is that which we are capable of making for ourselves.—Samuel Smiles.

Both as to high and low indifferently, men are prepossessed, charmed, fascinated by success; successful crimes are praised very much like virtue itself, and good fortune is not far from occupying the place of the whole cycle of virtues. It must be an atrocious act, a base and hateful deed, which success would not be able to justify.—Bruyère.

There is nothing so sure of succeeding as not to be over brilliant, as to be entirely wrapped up in one's self, and endowed with a perseverance which, in spite of all the rebuffs it may meet with, never relaxes in the pursuit of its object. It is incredible what may be done by dint of importunity alone; and where shall we find the man of real talents who knows how to be importunate enough!—Baron de Grimm.

Salvation is the only real success. Men are called successful who succeed in a section or two. What if three air-tight compartments keep dry, when the bulkheads break and the ship sinks? What if a man wins a boat race, a horse race, a lottery prize, and cannot speak grammatically, and does not know one good book nor one star nor tune nor flower from another, nor ever had a real friend? Is that success? Salvation is soundness. To have a splendid digestion, but a feeble mind; to have muscles standing out like whiplashes, but lungs that are affected; to have perfect sight and hearing, but a weak heart, is this success? Is this soundness? Salvation is health, wholeness, holiness. It is to be right all round. I may miss perfect success in the world of business and in the world of health. I need not in the real world—the moral,—in the real life—the spiritual. God's holiness is expressed in His love. Therefore love is wholeness, and to love is to fulfil—to fill full—God's law, and be right all round. Learn then to love God and your brother and all things great and small. Life is our "chance of learning love." To make money, to win academic degrees, to lead political armies, and not to love up and down, right and left, is to have missed success. Men suspect it now. They will know it by and by.—Maltbie Babcock.

Suffering

Suffering is part of the divine idea.
—Henry Ward Beecher.

Mirth cannot move a soul in agony.
—Shakespeare.

Some of His children must go into the furnace to testify that the Son of God is there with them.—E. Prentiss.

Knowledge by suffering entereth,
And Life is perfected by Death.
—E. B. Browning.

A great part of human suffering has its root in the nature of man, and not in that of his institutions.—Lowell.

For there are deeds Which have no form, sufferings which have no tongue.
—Shelley.

We have suffered lightly, if we have suffered what we should weep for.—
Seneca.

What is deservedly suffered must be borne with calmness, but when the pain is unmerited, the grief is resist-less.—Ovid.

Suffering is my gain; I bow
To my heavenly Father's will,
And receive it hushed and still:
Suffering is my worship now.
—Jean Paul Richter.

Those who inflict must suffer, for they see
The work of their own hearts, and that must be
Our chastisement or recompense.
—Shelley.

And taste
The melancholy joys of evils pass'd,
For he who much has suffer'd, much will know.
—Homer.

The cross of Christ is the pledge to as that the deepest suffering may be the condition of the highest blessing; the sign, not of God's displeasure, but of His widest and most compassionate face.—Dean Stanley.

They, the holy ones and weakly,
Who the cross of suffering bore,
Folded their pale hands so meekly, Spake with us on earth no more!
—Longfellow.

Our merciful Father has no pleasure in the sufferings of His children; He chastens them in love; He never inflicts a stroke He could safely spare; He inflicts it to purify as well as to punish, to caution as well as to cure, to improve as well as to chastise.—Hannah More.

Not till I was shut up to prayer and to the study of God's word by the loss of earthly joys—sickness destroying the flavor of them all—did I begin to penetrate the mystery that is learned under the cross. And wondrous as it is, how simple is that mystery! To love Christ, and to know that I love Him—this is all.—E. Prentiss.

To each his sufferings; all are men,
Condemn'd alike to groan;
The tender for another's pain,
Th' unfeeling for his own.
Yet ah! why should they know their fate,
Since sorrow never comes too late,
And happiness too swiftly flies?
Thought would destroy their paradise.
—Gray.

Suggestion

Suggestion is generally better than Definition. There is a seeming dogmatism about Definition that is often repellent, while Suggestion, on the contrary, disarms suspicion and summons to co-operation and experiment. Definition provokes discussion. Suggestion provokes to love and good works. Defining is limiting, Suggestion is enlarging. Defining calls a halt; Suggestion calls for an advance. Defining involves the peril of contentment: "I am here, I rest." "Thus far," says Definition, and draws a map. "Westward," cries Suggestion, and builds a boat.—Maltbie Babcock.

Suicide

We must not pluck death from the Maker's hand.—Bailey.

Suicide is not a remedy.—James A. Garfield.

Child of despair, and suicide by name.—Savage.

He only who gave life has a power over it.—Richardson.

'T is more brave to live than to die.—Owen Meredith.

Bid abhorrence hiss it round the world.—Young.

He is not valliant that dares lie; but he that boldly bears calamity.—Massinger.

When all the blandishments of life are gone,
The coward sneaks to death, the brave live on.—G. Sewell.

He, with delirious laugh, the dagger burl'd,
And burst the ties that bound him to the world! —Campbell.

How! leap into the pit our life to save?
To save our life leap all into the grave.—Cowper.

This is that rest this vain world lends,
To end in death that all things ends.—S. Daniel.

Beware of desperate steps. The darkest day,
Live till tomorrow, will have pass'd away.—Cowper.

I'm weary of conjectures: this must end them.—Addison.

It is no less vain to wish death than it is cowardly to fear it.—Sir P. Sidney.

Shall Nature, erring from her first command, self-preservation, fall by her own hand?—Granville.

Self-murder, that infernal crime,
Which all the gods level their thunder at! —Fane.

There is no refuge from confession but suicide; and suicide is confession.—Daniel Webster.

To die in order to avoid the pains of poverty, love, or anything that is disagreeable, is not the part of a brave man, but of a coward.—Aristotle.

He that cuts off twenty years of life
Cuts off so many years of fearing death.—Shakespeare.

Against self-slaughter there is a prohibition so divine, that cravens my weak hand.—Shakespeare.

God has appointed us captains of this our bodily fort, which, without treason to that majesty, are never to be delivered over till they are demanded.—Sir P. Sidney.

That kills himself to avoid misery, fears it;
And at the best shows but a bastard valor.—Massinger.

I do find it cowardly and vile,
For fear of what might fall, so to prevent
The time of life.—Shakespeare.

I look upon indolence as a sort of suicide; for the man in efficiently destroyed, though the appetite of the brute may survive.—Chesterfield.

Some indeed have been so affectedly vain as to counterfeit immortality, and have stolen their death in hopes to be esteemed immortal.—Sir T. Browne.

By all human laws, as well as divine, self-murder has ever been agreed on as the greatest crime.—Sir W. Temple.

You ever-gentle gods, take my breath from me;
Let not my worse spirit tempt me again
To die before you please!—Shakespeare.

Bravest at the last,
She levell'd at our purposes, and, being royal,
Took her own way.—Shakespeare.

What poetical suicides and sublime despair might have been prevented by a timely dose of blue pill, or the offer of a loge aux Italiens!—Sir Charles Morgan.

The more pity that great folk should have countenance in this world to drown or hang themselves, more than their even Christian.—Shakespeare.

We ought not to quit our post without the permission of Him who commands; the post of man is life.—Pythagoras.

When affliction thunders over our roofs, to hide our heads, and run into our graves, shows us no men, but makes us fortune's slaves.—Ben Jonson.

My spirit shrunk not to sustain
The searching throcs of ceaseless pain;
Nor sought the self-accorded grave
Of ancient fool and modern knave.
—Byron.

Fool! I mean not that poor-souled piece of heroism, self-slaughter. Oh, no; the miserablest day we live there's many a better thing to do than die!—George Darley.

Our time is fix'd; and all our days are number'd!
How long, how short, we know not: this we know Duty requires we calmly wait the summons,
Nor dare to stir till heaven shall give permission.
—Blair.

Ah yes, the sea is still and deep,
All things within its bosom sleep!
A single step, and all is o'er,
A plunge, a bubble, and no more.
—Longfellow.

Those men who destroy a healthful constitution of body by intemperance as manifestly kill themselves as those who hang or poison or drown themselves.—Sherlock.

He who, superior to the checks of Nature, dares make his life the victim of his reason, does in some sort that reason deify, and take a flight at heaven.—Young.

Suicide sometimes proceeds from cowardice, but not always; for cowardice sometimes prevents it, since as many live because they are afraid to die as die because they are afraid to live.—Colton.

The dread of something after death, that undiscovered country, from whose bourne no traveller returns, puzzles the will, and makes us rather bear the ills we have, than fly to others that we know not of.—Shakespeare.

But if there be an hereafter,
And that there is, conscience, uninfluenc'd
And suffer'd to speak out, tells every man,
Then must it be an awful thing to die;
More horrid yet to die by one's own hand.
—Blair.

Suicides pay the world a bad compliment. Indeed, it may, so happen that the world has been beforehand with them in incivility. Granted. Even then the retaliation is at their own expense.—Zimmermann.

Men would not be so hasty to abandon the world either as monks or as suicides, did they but see the jewels of wisdom and faith which are scattered so plentifully along its paths; and lacking which no soul can come again from beyond the grave to gather.
—Mountford.

Suicide is not to fear death, but yet to be afraid of life. It is a brave act of valour to condemn death; but when life is more terrible than death, it is then the truest valour to dare to live; and herein religion hath taught us a noble example, for all the valiant acts of Curtius, Scervola, or Codrus, do not parallel or match that one of Job.—Sir Thomas Browne.

Suicide is a crime the most revolting to the feelings; nor does any reason suggest itself to our understanding by which it can be justified. It certainly originates in that species of fear which we denominate poltroonery. For what claim can that man have to courage who trembles at the frowns of fortunes? True heroism consists in being superior to the ills of life in whatever shape they may challenge him to combat.—Napoleon.

Our pious ancestors enacted a law that suicides should be buried where four roads meet, and that a cart-load of stones should be thrown upon the body. Yet when gentlemen or ladies commit suicide, not by cord or steel, but by turtle-soup or lobster-salad, they may be buried in consecrated ground, and under the auspices of the Church; and the public are not ashamed to read an epitaph on their tombstones false enough to make the marble blush. Were the barbarous old law now in force that punished the body of the suicide for the offence of his soul, we should find many a Mount Auburn at the cross-roads.—Horace Mann.

To be, or not to be, that is the question: Whether 'tis nobler in the mind, to suffer The slings and arrows of outrageous fortune, Or to take arms against a sea of troubles, And by opposing end them? To die—to sleep;—

No more; and, by a sleep, to say we end The heart-ache, and the thousand natural shocks

That flesh is heir to, 'tis a consummation Devoutly to be wish'd. —Shakespeare.

Who would bear the whips and scorns of time,

The oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely,

The pangs of despiz'd love, the law's delay,

The insolence of office, and the spurns That patient merit of the unworthy takes, When he himself might his quietus make With a bare bodkin? —Shakespeare.

Summer

Thy eternal summer shall not fade. —Shakespeare.

The Indian Summer, the dead Summer's soul.—Mary Clemmer.

Child of sun, refulgent summer, comes.—Thomson.

Summer's parching heat.—Shakespeare.

The air of summer was sweeter than wine.—Longfellow.

Now Summer blinks on flowery braes, And o'er the crystal streamlet plays. —Burns.

All green and fair the summer lies, just budded from the bud of spring.—Susan Coolidge.

Bright summer is crowned with roses; deep in the forest arbutus doth hide.—Dora Goodale.

While the dog-roses blow and the dew-spangles shine.—Eliza Cook.

Through the lightened air a higher lustre and a clearer calm, diffusive, trembles.—Thomson.

Beneath the winter's snow lie germs of summer flowers.—Whittier.

Our summer such a russet livery wears as in a garment often dyed appears.—Dryden.

Who loves not more the night of June than cold December's gloomy noon?—Sir Walter Scott.

'T is the summer prime, when the noiseless air in perfumed chalice lies. —Mrs. E. Oakes Smith.

For men, like butterflies, show not their mealy wings but to the summer. —Shakespeare.

Then crowned with flowery hay, came real joy, and summer, with his fervid-beaming eye.—Burns.

It's surely summer, for there's a swallow: Come one swallow, his mate will follow, The bird race quicken and wheel and thicken. —Christina G. Rossetti.

White clouds, whose shadows haunt the deep,
Light mists, whose soft embraces keep
The sunshine on the hills asleep! —Whittier.

Very hot and still the air was,
Very smooth the gliding river,
Motionless the sleeping shadows. —Longfellow.

Then came the jolly summer, being dight In a thin silken cassock, coloured green,
That was unlined all, to be more light. —Spenser.

Now, every field and every tree is in bloom; the woods are now in full leaf, and the year is in its highest beauty.—Virgil.

Before green apples blush,
Before green nuts embrown,
Why, one day in the country
Is worth a month in town. —Christina G. Rossetti.

Heat, ma'am! it was so dreadful here, that I found there was nothing left for it but to take off my flesh and sit in my bones.—Sydney Smith.

Patient of thirst and toil,
Son of the desert, e'en the camel feels,
Shot through his wither'd heart, the fiery blast. —Thomson.

O for a lodge in a garden of cucumbers!
O for an iceberg or two at controll!
O for a vale that at midday the dew cumbers!
O for a pleasure trip up to the pole!
—Rossiter Johnson.

Here is the ghost
Of a summer that lived for us,
Here is a promise
Of summer to be.

—Wm. Ernest Henley.

Thou'rt bearing hence thy roses,
Glad summer, fare thee well!
Thou'rt singing thy last melodies
In every wood and dell.
—Mrs. Hemans.

All green and fair the Summer lies,
Just budded from the bud of Spring,
With tender blue of wistful skies,
And winds which softly sing.
—Susan Coolidge.

The weary August days are long;
The locusts sing a plaintive song,
The cattle miss their master's call
When they see the sunset shadows fall.
—E. C. Stedman.

But see, the shepherds shun the noonday
heat,
The lowing herds to murmuring brooks retreat,
To closer shades the panting flocks remove;
Ye gods! and is there no relief for love?
—Pope.

Through the open door
A drowsy smell of flowers—gay heliotrope,
And white sweet clover, and shy mignonette—
Comes faintly in, and silent chorus lends
To the pervading symphony of peace.
—Whittier.

The summer dawn's reflected hue
To purple changed Loch Katrine—blue,
Mildly and soft the western breeze
Just kiss'd the lake, just stirr'd the trees,
And the pleased lake, like maiden coy,
Trembled but dimpled not for joy.
—Scott.

From all the misty morning air, there comes a summer sound,
A murmur as of waters from skies, and trees, and ground.
The birds they sing upon the wing, the pigeons bill and coo.—R. W. Gilder.

That beautiful season
* * * the Summer of All-Saints!
Filled was the air with a dreamy and magical light; and the landscape Lay as if new created in all the freshness of childhood. —Longfellow.

From brightening fields of ether fair-disclosed,
Child of the Sun, refulgent Summer comes,
In pride of youth, and felt through Nature's depth;
He comes, attended by the sultry Hours,
And ever-fanning breezes, on his way.
—Thomson.

O summer day beside the joyous sea!
O summer day so wonderful and white,
So full of gladness and so full of pain!
Forever and forever shalt thou be
To some the gravestone of a dead delight,
To some the landmark of a new domain.
—Longfellow.

O thou who passest through our valleys in Thy strength, curb thy fierce steeds, allay
the heat
That flames from their large nostrils!
Thou, O Summer,
Oft pitchest here thy golden tent, and oft Beneath our oaks hast slept, while we beheld
With joy thy ruddy limbs and flourishing hair. —Wm. Blake.

Oh, father's gone to market-town, he was up before the day,
And Jamie's after robins, and the man is making hay,
And whistling down the hollow goes the boy that minds the mill, While mother from the kitchen door is calling with a will,
"Polly!—Polly!—The cows are in the corn! Oh, where's Polly?"
—R. W. Gilder.

The sun has drunk
The dew that lay upon the morning grass;
There is no rustling in the lofty elm
That canopies my dwelling, and its shade Scarce cools me. All is silent save the faint
And interrupted murmur of the bee, Settling on the sick flowers, and then again
Instantly on the wing. —Bryant.

All-conquering Heat, O, intermit thy wrath!
And on my throbbing temples, potent thou,
Beam not so fierce! incessant still you flow.
And still another fervent flood succeeds, Poured on the head profuse. In vain I sigh,
And restless turn, and look around for
night;
Night is far off; and hotter Hours approach. —Thomson.

But how unlike to April's closing days!
High climbs the sun, and darts his powerful rays;
Whitens the fresh drawn mould and pierces through
The cumbrous clods that tumble round the plough.
—Bloomfield.

Dust on thy mantle! dust,
Bright Summer, on thy livery of green!
A tarnish as of rust,
Dims thy late brilliant sheen;
And thy young glories,—leaf and bud and flower,— Change cometh over them with every hour.
—Wm. D. Gallagher.

Sun

God's lidless eye!—Horace Smith.

O sun! of this great world both eye and soul.—Milton.

He maketh His sun to rise on the evil and on the good.—Bible.

Shines upon all men with impartial light.—Cowley.

The glorious lamp of heaven, the sun.—Herrick.

Her sun is gone down while it is yet day.—Bible.

Suns are sunflowers of a higher light.—Richter.

That orb'd continent, the fire that severs day from night.—Shakespeare.

The sun, God's crest upon His azure shield, the heavens.—Bailey.

The sun with one eye vieweth all the world.—Shakespeare.

Neither the sun nor death can be looked at steadily.—Rochefoucauld.

High in his chariot glowed the lamp of day.—Falconer.

There sinks the nebulous star we call the Sun.—Tennyson.

The heavenly-harness'd team
Begins his golden progress in the east.
—Shakespeare.

The sun, reflecting upon the mud of strands and shores, is unpolluted in his beam.—Jeremy Taylor.

But yonder comes the powerful king of day rejoicing in the east.—Thomson.

Now, ere the sun advance his burning eye,
The day to cheer, and night's dank dew to dry.
—Shakespeare.

The glorious lamp of heaven, the radiant sun, is Nature's eye.—Dryden.

Let others hail the rising sun; I bow to that whose course is run.—Garrick.

The sun was set, and Vesper, to supply his absent beams, had lighted up the sky.—Dryden.

All the world's bravery that delights our eyes is but thy several liveries.—Cowley.

He fires the proud tops of the eastern pines, and darts his light through every guilty hole.—Shakespeare.

The sun stands, at midnight, blood-red, on the mountains of the North.—Longfellow.

In the warm shadow of her loveliness he kissed her with his beams.—Shelley.

The sun is all about the world we see, the breath and strength of every spring.—Swinburne.

The very dead creation from thy touch assumes a mimic life.—Thomson.

A sunbeam passes through pollution unpolluted.—Eusebius.

The downward sun looks out effulgent from amid the flash of broken clouds.—Thomson.

Now deep in ocean sunk the lamp of light,
And drew behind the cloudy veil of night.
—Pope.

Shine out, fair sun, till I have bought a glass,
That I may see my shadow as I pass.
—Shakespeare.

He from our sight retires awhile, and then rises and shines o'er all the world again.—Fielding.

Sunlight is like the breath of life to the pomp of autumn.—Hawthorne.

At length the sun began to peep,
And glid the surface of the deep.
—Somerville.

Pleasantly, between the pelting showers, the sunshine gushes down.—Bryant.

The sun shineth upon the dunghill and is not corrupted.—Lyly.

The sun, too, shines into cesspools, and is not polluted.—Diogenes Laertius.

The selfsame sun that shines upon his court Hides not his visage from our cottage, but Looks on alike. —Shakespeare.

I 'gin to be awery of the sun,
And wish the estate o' the world were now undone. —Shakespeare.

The sun, centre and sire of light,
The keystone of the world-built arch of heaven. —Bailey.

In his east the glorious lamp was seen, regent of the day; and all the horizon round, invested with bright rays.—Milton.

The radiant sun sends from above ten thousand blessings down, nor is he set so high for show alone.—Granville.

Thou sun, whose beams adorn the spheres, and with unwearied swiftness move to form the circles of our years.—Dr. Watts.

The weary sun hath made a golden set, and by the bright track of his fiery car, gives signal of a goodly day to-morrow.—Shakespeare.

When the sun shines on you, you see your friends. It requires sunshine to be seen by them to advantage!—Lady Blessington.

Busy old fool, unruly sun,
Why dost thou thus,
Through windows and through curtains
call on us? —John Donne.

"If that is not God," said Mirabeau, as the sun shone into his death-chamber, "it is at least his cousin-german."—Carlyle.

What light through yonder window breakst
It is the east, and Juliet, is the sun!—
Arise, fair sun, and kill the envious moon.
—Shakespeare.

The great luminary
Aloof the vulgar constellations thick,
That from his lordly eye keep distance
due,
Dispenses light from far. —Milton

She stood breast-high amid the corn,
Clasp'd by the golden light of morn,
Like the sweetheart of the sun,
Who many a glowing kiss had won.
—Hood.

See the gold sunshine patching,
And streaming and streaking across
The gray-green oaks; and catching,
By its soft brown beard, the moss.
—Bailey.

Though the sun scorches us sometimes, and gives us the headache, we do not refuse to acknowledge that we stand in need of his warmth.—Philip de Mornay.

There was not, on that day, a speck to stain
The azure heaven; the blessed sun alone,
In unapproachable divinity,
Career'd, rejoicing in his fields of light.
—Southey.

The glorious sun stays in his course, and plays the alchemist, turning with splendor of his precious eye the meagre cloddy earth to glittering gold.—Shakespeare.

The angels even Draw strength from gazing on its glance,
Though none its meaning fathom may;
The world's unwither'd countenance
Is bright as at creation's day.—Goethe.

Thou tide of glory, which no rest doth know,
But ever ebb and ever flow!
Thou golden shower of a true Jove!
Who doth in thee descend, and heaven to earth make love. —Cowkey.

The sun, which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race. His going forth is from the end of the heaven, and his circuit unto the ends of it. And there is nothing hid from the heat thereof.—Bible.

Whence are thy beams, O sun! thy everlasting light? Thou comest forth in thy awful beauty; the stars hide themselves in the sky; the moon, cold and pale, sinks in the western wave: but thou thyself movest alone.—Macpherson.

Through the soft ways of heaven, and air,
and sea,
Which open all their pores to thee,
Like a clear river thou dost glide,
And with thy living stream through the close channel slide. —Cowley.

And see—the Sun himself!—on wings
Of glory up the East he springs.
Angel of Light! who from the time
Those heavens began their march sublime,
Hath first of all the starry choir
Trode in his Maker's steps of fire!
—Moore.

Most glorious art thou! when from thy pavilion
Thou lookest forth at morning; flinging wide
Its curtain clouds of purple and vermillion, Dispensing life and light on every side.
—Barton.

Till, as a giant strong, a bridegroom gay,
The sun springs dancing through the gates
of day,
He shakes his dewy locks, and hurls his beams
O'er the proud hills, and down the glowing streams:
His fiery coursers bound above the main,
And whirl the car along th' ethereal plain;
The fiery courses and the car display
A stream of glory and a flood of day.
—Broome.

And the sun had on a crown
Wrought of gilded thistledown,
And a scarf of velvet vapor
And a raveled rainbow gown;
And his tinsel-tangled hair
Tossed and lost upon the air
Was glossier and flossier
Than any anywhere.
—James Whitcomb Riley.

Failing yet gracious,
Slow pacing, soon homing,
A patriarch that strolls
Through the tents of his children,
The sun as he journeys
His round on the lower Ascents of the blue,
Washes the roofs
And the hill-sides with clarity.
—Wm. Ernest Henley.

The glorious sun—the centre and soul of our system—the lamp that lights it,—the fire that heats it,—the magnet that guides and controls it;

—the fountain of colour, which gives its azure to the sky, its verdure to the fields, its rainbow-hues to the gay world of flowers and the purple light of love to the marble cheek of youth and beauty.—Sir David Brewster.

More joyful eyes look at the setting than at the rising sun. Burdens are laid down by the poor, whom the sun consoles more than the rich. No star and no moon announce the rising sun; and does not the setting sun, like a lover, leave behind his image in the moon? I yearn towards him when he sets, not when he rises.—Richter.

Blest power of sunshine! genial day,
What balm, what life are in thy ray!
To feel thee is such real bliss,
That, had the world no joy but this,
To sit in sunshine calm and sweet,
It were a world too exquisite
For man to leave it for the gloom,
The deep cold shadow of the tomb.
—Moore.

The golden sun, in splendor likest heav'n, Dispenses light from far; they, as they move
Their starry dance, in numbers that compute
Days, months, and years, towards his all-cheering lamp,
Turn swift their various motions, or are turn'd
By his magnetic beam, that gently warms
The universe; and to each inward part,
With gentle penetration, though unseen,
Shoots invisible virtue ev'n to the deep.
—Milton.

Thou material God!
And representative of the Unknown,
Who chose thee for His shadow! Thou chief star!
Centre of many stars!—which mak'st our
earth
Endurable, and temperest the hues
And hearts of all who walk within thy rays!
Sire of the seasons! Monarch of the climes,
And those who dwell in them! for near or far,
Our inborn spirits have a tint of thee,
Even as our outward aspects,—thou dost
rise,
And shine and set in glory! —Byron.

Sunday (See Sabbath)

Sunday School (See Children's Day)

Oh, be assured fellow teachers, that there is no time in life so favorable to sound conversion as early childhood.—T. L. Cuyler.

Let the Sunday-school for the children teach Christ first, Christ last, Christ in the middle, Christ all the time. And the school that shall be so single-eyed for the Master, shall have the full beam of His eyes which smile as the sun shining in its strength ever upon them.—Stephen H. Tyng, Jr.

Bring the little ones to Christ. Lord Jesus, we bring them today, the children of our Sunday-schools, of our churches, of the streets. Here they are; they wait Thy benediction. The prayer of Jacob for his sons shall be my prayer while I live, and when I die: "The angel which redeemed me from all evil, bless the lads."—T. DeWitt Talmage.

Learn to teach the children to look at this world as a beautiful symbol of Jesus; every thing, Jesus; Christ, all; Christ, in all. So shall you educate the imaginations of the children to receive, and their memories to retain and to use, that Christian truth; and you yourself shall be lifted up, as on angel's wings, to see with John things which are unspeakable, but which the sanctified imagination realizes.—Stephen H. Tyng, Jr.

It is quite likely that the modern contrivances for making Sunday-schools amusing have given them a distaste for the more solemn services of the sanctuary. If so, the amusement is a sin. The schools should feed the church. Children ought to be led by one into the other, exposed to the preaching of the gospel, taught the ways of God's house, and brought up under its influence, with all its hallowed and elevating influences.—S. Irenæus Prime.

Begin in prayer; continue in prayer; end in prayer. All the help that we have in the conversion of the children comes from God. We cannot convert their souls, but God can by the influence of His Spirit. When we study our lessons, let us go first for illumination to God, that we may so impress it on the minds and hearts of those we are teaching, that they may bring forth fruit for salvation; that they may see our earnestness—see that our desire is for their conversion. Let us pray individually for each one of our scholars.—A. O. Van Lenney.

The hope of the nation and of Christendom, and of the lands called heathen, alike is to be found in the indoctrination of little children in the knowledge of God's truth; for the missionaries will tell you that the adult heathen population of to-day are to die heathen; the minister will tell you that the adult, virtually heathen population of Christian lands to-day are to die in that condition, unless God showers down altogether unprecedented grace—with only such occasional exceptions as confirm this general and terrible law. If this be so, the hope of Christianity is in childhood. Towards childhood must be directed the work of the sappers and miners of the church. Here is the weak point of the enemy's fortress. Here let the breach be made, and his topmost turret shall be laid low.—C. D. Foss.

It is a grand thing to train the human mind in the academy and in the college and university to great intellectual achievements. It is a grand thing for you to leap, as it were, by the lightning of your thought, from crag to crag of discovery. It is well to make paths for tender feet through the morasses and over the mountains of study. These bring honor and power. But it is also well to remember that the diplomas of colleges and universities can never bring pardon for sin; that all the scholarships and all the titles in the world can never bring peace to the dying. Oh, brethren, it is this discipleship with the Man of Galilee who trod the wine-press alone, and carried His cross up Calvary's hill; this discipleship with the man Christ Jesus, that constitutes the moral and spiritual power in our work. That power it is yours to impart to the children under your care. Aye, this is grander than all human achievements.—J. Clement French.

Sunflower

Restless sunflower; cease to move.—Calderon.

And the yellow sunflower by the brook, in autumn beauty stood.—
Bryant.

Sunflowers by the sides of brooks,
Turn'd to the sun. —Moore.

And here the sunflower of the spring
Burns bright in morning's beam.
—Ebenezer Elliott.

As the sunflower turns on her god when he sets,
The same look which she turn'd when he rose. —Moore.

The lofty follower of the sun,
Sad when he sets, shuts up her yellow leaves,
Drooping all night; and when he warm returns,
Points her enamor'd bosom to his ray.
—Thomson.

With zealous step he climbs the upland lawn,
And bows in homage to the rising dawn;
Imbibes with eagle eye the golden ray,
And watches, as it moves, the orb of day.
—Erasmus Darwin.

Ah, sunflower, weary of time,
Who countest the steps of the sun,
Seeking after that sweet golden clime
Where the traveller's journey is done.
—William Blake.

Eagle of flowers! I see thee stand,
And on the sun's noon-glory gaze;
With eye like his, thy lids expand,
And fringe their disk with golden rays;
Though fixed on earth, in darkness rooted
there,
Light is thy element, thy dwelling air,
Thy prospect heaven.
—James Montgomery.

Sunrise (See Dawn)

And lo! in a flash of crimson splendor, with blazing scarlet clouds running before his chariot, and heralding his majestic approach, God's sun rises upon the world.—Thackeray.

The heavenly-harness'd team
Begins his golden progress in the east.
—Shakespeare.

He fires the proud tops of the eastern pines
And darts his light through every guilty hole. —Shakespeare.

But yonder comes the powerful King of
Day,
Rejoicing in the East. —Thomson.

Yonder fly his scattered golden arrows,
And smite the hills with day.
—Bayard Taylor.

See how there
The cowl'd night
Kneels on the Eastern sanctuary-stair.
—Francis Thompson.

It is right precious to behold
The first long surf of climbing light Flood all the thirsty east with gold.
—James Russell Lowell.

As when the golden sun salutes the morn,
And, having gilt the ocean with his beams,
Gallops the zodiac in his glistering coach,
And overlooks the highest-peering hills.
—Shakespeare.

Angel of light! who from the time
Those heavens began their march sublime,
Hath first of all the starry choir
Tro'd in his Maker's steps of fire!
—Moore.

The sun had long since in the lap
Of Thetis taken out his nap,
And, like a lobster boil'd, the morn
From black to red began to turn.
—Butler.

The morning light, which rains its quivering beams
Wide o'er the plains, the summits, and the streams,
In one broad blaze expands its golden glow
On all that answers to its glance below.
—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

The whole east was flecked
With flashing streaks and shafts of amethyst,
While a light crimson mist
Went up before the mounting luminary,
And all the strips of cloud began to vary Their hues, and all the zenith seemed to ope
As if to show a cope beyond the cope!
—Epes Sargent.

I say the sun is a most glorious sight,
I've seen him rise full oft, indeed of late
I have sat up on purpose all the night,
Which hastens, as physicians say, one's
fate;
And so all ye, who would be in the right
In health and purse, begin your day to date
From daybreak, and when coffin'd at fourscore,
Engrave upon the plate, you rose at four.
—Byron.

Seel led by Morn, with dewy feet,
Apollo mounts his golden seat,
Replete with seven-fold fire;
While, dazzled by his conquering light,
Heaven's glittering host and awful night
Submissively retire. —Thomas Taylor.

When from the opening chambers of the east
The morning springs in thousand liveries drest,
The early larks their morning tribute pay,
And, in shrill notes, salute the blooming day.
—Thomson.

The rising sun complies with our weak sight,
First gilds the clouds, then shows his globe of light
At such a distance from our eyes, as though He knew what harm his hasty beams would do.
—Edmund Waller.

'Tis morn. Behold the kingly Day now leaps
The eastern wall of earth with sword in hand,
Clad in a flowing robe of mellow light,
Like to a king that has regain'd his throne,
He warms his drooping subjects into joy,
That rise rejoiced to do him fealty,
And rules with pomp the universal world.
—Joaquin Miller.

Prime cheerer, light!
Efflux divine! Nature's resplendent robe!
Without whose vesting beauty all were wrapt
In unessential gloom; and thou, O sun!
Soul of surrounding worlds! in whom best seen Shines out thy Maker! —Thomson.

But yonder comes the powerful king of day,
Rejoicing in the east. The lessening cloud,
The kindling azure, and the mountain's brow,
Illum'd with fluid gold, his near approach Betoken glad. Lo! now, apparent all,
Aslant the dew-bright earth, and colour'd air,
He looks in boundless majesty abroad;
And sheds the shining day, that burnish'd plays
On rocks, and hills, and towers, and wand'ring streams,
High gleaming from afar. —Thomson.

The east is blossoming! Yea, a rose,
Vast as the heavens, soft as a kiss,
Sweet as the presence of woman is,
Rises and reaches, and widens and grows
Large and luminous up from the sea,
And out of the sea, as a blossoming tree,
Richer and richer, so higher and higher,
Deeper and deeper it takes its hue;
Brighter and brighter it reaches through
The space of heaven and the place of stars,
Till all is as rich as a rose can be,
And my rose-leaves fall into billows of fire.
—Joaquin Miller.

Only the country-liver can fully feel it—this dying of night with the birth of day—this supreme moment when the mists and d'mness and low voices of the one exhale into the melody and brightness of the other. It is a daily miracle—this sudden transition from gray to rosy light—this unrolling of the dew-covered landscape—this assumption, in delicious crescendo, of sound—this quickening of the day's life over the sleep of night—this flying of darkness, as of a ghost pursued, before the flooding of light—this oldest of all stories again told. Awake, for the day has dawned.—E. H. Arr.

When the breaking day is flushing
All the East, and light is gushing
Upward through the horizon's haze,
Sheaf-like, with its thousand rays
Spreading, until all above
Overflows with joy and love,
And below, on earth's green bosom,
All is chang'd to light and blossom;
Then, O Father!—Thou alone,
From the shadow of Thy throne,
To the sighing of my breast,
And its rapture answerest:
All my thoughts, with upward winging,
Bathe where Thy own light is springing!
—Whittier.

Sunset

Gilding pale streams with heavenly alchemy.—Shakespeare.

The death-bed of a day, how beautiful.—Bailey.

Long on the wave reflected lustres play.—Sam'l Rogers.

The sacred lamp of day
Now dipt in western clouds his parting ray.
—Falconer.

The setting sun, and music at the close,
As the last taste of sweets, is sweetest last.
—Shakespeare.

When the sun sets, who doth not look for night?—Shakespeare.

Cæsar-like the sun
Gathered his robes around him as he fell.
—Alexander Smith.

The weary sun hath made a golden set,
And, by the bright track of his fiery car,
Gives token of a goodly day to-morrow.
—Shakespeare.

Sunsets in themselves are generally superior to sunrises; but with the sunset we appreciate images drawn from departed peace and faded glory.

—Hillard.

Down sank the great red sun, and in golden, glimmering vapors Veiled the light of his face, like the Prophet descending from Sinai.
—Longfellow.

Oft did I wonder why the setting sun
Should look upon us with a blushing face:
Is't not for shame of what he hath seen
done, Whilst in our hemisphere he ran his race?
—Heath.

Come watch with me the shaft of fire that glows
In yonder West: the fair, frail palaces,
The fading Alps and archipelagoes,
And great cloud-continents of sunset-seas.
—T. B. Aldrich.

See the descending sun,
Scatt'ring his beams about him as he sinks,
And gilding heaven above, and seas beneath,
With paint no mortal pencil can express.
—Hopkins.

Dipp'd in the hues of sunset, wreath'd in zones,
The clouds are resting on their mountain-thrones;
One peak alone exalts its glacier crest,
A golden paradise, above the rest;
Thither the day with lingering steps retires,
And in its own blue element expires.
—James Montgomery.

'Tis sunset: to the firmament serene,
The Atlantic wave reflects a gorgeous
scene;
Broad in the cloudless west a belt of gold
Girds the blue hemisphere; above, unroll'd,
The keen clear air grows palpable to sight,
Imbodied in a flush of crimson light.
—James Montgomery.

After a day of cloud and wind and rain
Sometimes the setting sun breaks out again,
And, touching all the darksome woods
with light,
Smiles on the fields until they laugh and sing.
Then like a ruby from the horizon's ring,
Drops down into the night.
—Longfellow.

See! he sinks
Without a word; and his ensanguined bier
Is vacant in the west, while far and near Behold! each coward shadow eastward
shrinks,
Thou dost not strive, O sun, nor dost thou
cry
Amid thy cloud-built streets. —Faber.

Now in his Palace of the West,
Sinking to slumber, the bright Day,
Like a tired monarch fann'd to rest,
'Mid the cool airs of Evening lay;
While round his couch's golden rim
The gaudy clouds, like courtiers, crept—
Struggling each other's light to dim,
And catch his last smile e'er he slept.
—Moore.

Softly the evening came. The sun from the western horizon
Like a magician extended his golden wand
o'er the landscape;
Twinkling vapors arose; and sky and water and forest
Seemed all on fire at the touch, and melted and mingled together.
—Longfellow.

Purple, violet, gold and white,
Royal clouds are they;
Catching the spear-like rays in the west—
Lining therewith each downy nest,
At the close of Summer day.
Forming and breaking in the sky,
I fancy all shapes are there;
Temple, mountain, monument, spire;
Ships rigged out with sails of fire,
And blown by the evening air.
—J. K. Hoyt.

Touched by a light that hath no name,
A glory never sung,
Aloft on sky and mountain wall
Are God's great pictures hung.
How changed the summits vast and old!
No longer granite-browed,
They melt in rosy mist; the rock
Is softer than the cloud;
The valley holds its breath; no leaf
Of all its elms is twirled:
The silence of eternity
Seems falling on the world. —Whittier.

Methought little space 'tween those hills intervened,
But nearer,—more lofty,—more shaggy
they seemed.
The clouds o'er their summits they calmly
did rest,
And hung on the ether's invisible breast;
Than the vapours of earth they seemed purer, more bright,— Oh! could they be clouds? 'Twas the necklace of night. —Ruskin.

Now the noon,
Wearied with sultry toil, declines and falls,
Into the mellow eve;—the west puts on
Her gorgeous beauties—palaces and halls,
And towers, all carv'd of the unstable
cloud,
Welcome the calmly waning monarch—he Sinks gently midst that glorious canopy Down on his couch of rest—even like a proud
King of the earth—the ocean.—Bowring.

It was the cooling hour, just when the rounded
Red sun sinks down behind the azure
hill,
Which then seems 'as if the whole earth is bounded,
Circling all nature, hush'd, and dim, and
still,
With the far mountain-crescent half surrounded
On one side, and the deep sea calm and chill
Upon the other, and the rosy sky
With one star sparkling through it like an eye. —Byron.

How fine has the day been! how bright was the sun,
How lovely and joyful the course that he run!
Though he rose in a mist when his race
he begun,
And there followed some droppings of
rain:
But now the fair traveller's come to the west,
His rays are all gold, and his beauties are best;
He paints the skies gay as he sings to his
rest,
And forctells a bright rising again. —Watts.

Superfluities

It is impossible to diminish poverty
by the multiplication of effects, for,
manage as we may, misery and suffering will always cleave to the border
of superfluity.—Jacobi.

Were the superfluities of a nation valued, and made a perpetual tax or benevolence, there would be more almshouses than poor, schools than scholars, and enough to spare for government besides.—William Penn.

What man in his right senses, that has wherewithal to live free, would make himself a slave for superfluities?
What does that man want who has enough? Or what is he the better for abundance that can never be satisfied.
—L'Estrange.

Superiority

The object of the superior man is truth.—Confucius.

It is a great art to be superior to others without letting them know it.—
H. W. Shaw.

The faults of the superior man are like the eclipses of the sun and moon.
He has his faults, and all men see them; he changes, and all men look up to him.—Confucius.

Superstition

Superstition is a senseless fear of God.—Cicero.

Superstition is but the fear of belief.
—Lady Blessington.

Superstition is part of the poetry of life.—Goethe.

Hold each strange tale devoutly true.
—Collins.

Superstition renders a man a fool.—
Fielding.

My right eye itches, some good luck is near.—Dryden.

There are proselytes from atheism,
but none from superstition.—Junius.

I die adoring God, loving my friends, not hating my enemies, and detesting superstition.—Voltaire.

Religion worships God, while superstition profanes that worship.—Seneca.

Superstition is the only religion of which base souls are capable.—Joubert.

Religion is not removed by removing superstition.—Cicero.

Superstition is a quality that seems indigenous to the ocean.—James Fenimore Cooper.

Men are probably nearer to the essential truth in their superstitions than in their science.—Thoreau.

Look how the world's poor people are amazed at apparitions, signs and prodigies!—Shakespeare.

Heart-chilling superstition! thou canst glaze even Pity's eye with her own frozen tear.—Coleridge.

Danger is the very basis of superstition. It produces a searching after help supernaturally when human means are no longer supposed to be available.—B. R. Haydon.

A foolish superstition introduces the influences of the gods even in the smallest matters.—Livy.

Superstition always inspires littleness, religion grandeur of mind; the superstitious raises beings inferior to himself to deities.—Lavater.

I think we cannot too strongly attack superstition, which is the disturber of society; nor too highly respect genuine religion, which is the support of it.—Rousseau.

Why is it that we entertain the belief that for every purpose odd numbers are the most effectual?—Pliny.

The greatest burden in the world is superstition, not only of ceremonies in the church, but of imaginary and scarecrow sins at home.—Milton.

Superstition is the poesy of practical life; hence, a poet is none the worse for being superstitious.—Goethe.

Superstition changes a man to a beast, fanaticism makes him a wild beast, and despotism a beast of burden.—La Harpe.

A peasant can no more help believing in a traditional superstition than a horse can help trembling when he sees a camel.—George Eliot.

Superstition moulds nature into an arbitrary semblance of the supernatural, and then bows down to the work of its own hands.—John Sterling.

These terrors are not to be charged upon religion; they proceed either from the want of religion or from superstitious mistakes about it.—Bentley.

England, a fortune-telling host,
As num'rous as the stars could boast;
Matrons, who toss the cup, and see
The grounds of fate in grounds of tea.
—Churchill.

There is but one thing that can free a man from superstition, and that is belief. All history proves it. The most sceptical have ever been the most credulous.—George MacDonald.

The child taught to believe any occurrence a good or evil omen, or any day of the week lucky, hath a wide inroad made upon the soundness of his understanding.—Dr. Watts.

You will not think it unnatural that those who have an object depending, which strongly engages their hopes and fears, should be somewhat inclining to superstition.—Burke.

Piety is different from superstition. To carry piety to the extent of superstition is to destroy it. The heretics reproach us with this superstitious submission. It is doing what they reproach us with.—Pascal.

The master of superstition is the people, and in all superstition wise men follow fools, and arguments are fitted to practice in a reversed order.—Bacon.

Death approaches, which is always impending over us like the stone over Tantalus; then comes superstition, with which he who is racked can never find peace of mind.—Cicero.

Superstitious notions propagated in infancy are hardly ever totally eradicate, not even in minds grown strong enough to despise the like credulous folly in others.—Richardson.

The general root of superstition is that men observe when things hit, and not when they miss; and commit to memory the one, and forget and pass over the other.—Bacon.

Superstition is not, as has been defined, an excess of religious feeling, but a misdirection of it, an exhausting of it on vanities of man's devising.—Whately.

Midnight hags,
By force of potent spells, of bloody characters,
And conjurations horrible to hear,
Call fiends and spectres from the yawning deep,
And set the ministers of hell at work.
—Nicholas Rowe.

They that are against superstition oftentimes run into it of the wrong side. If I wear all colors but black, then I am superstitious in not wearing black.—Selden.

'Tis a history
Handed from ages down; a nurse's tale—
Which children, open-ey'd and mouth'd, devour;

And thus as garrulous ignorance relates,
We learn it and believe. —Southey.

Superstition is related to this life, religion to the next; superstition is allied to fatality, religion to virtue; it is by the vivacity of earthly desires that we become superstitious; it is, on the contrary, by the sacrifice of these desires that we become religious.—Mme. de Staël.

Superstition, without a veil, is a deformed thing; for, as it addeth deformity to an ape to be so like a man, so the similitude of superstition to religion makes it the more deformed; and as wholesome meat corrupteth to little worms, so good forms and orders corrupt into a number of petty observances.—Bacon.

That the corruption of the best thing produces the worst, is grown into a maxim, and is commonly proved, among other instances, by the pernicious effects of superstition and enthusiasm, the corruptions of true religion.—Hume.

Superstition is the poetry of life. It is inherent in man's nature; and when we think it is wholly eradicated, it takes refuge in the strangest holes and corners, whence it peeps out all at once, as soon as it can do it with safety.—Goethe.

It were better to have no opinion of God at all than such an opinion as is unworthy of him; for the one is unbelief, and the other is contumely; and certainly superstition is the reproach of the Deity.—Bacon.

Foul Superstition! howsoe'er disguised, Idol, saint, virgin, prophet, crescent,
cross,
For whatsoever symbol thou art prized,
Thou sacerdotal gain, but general loss!
Who from true worship's gold can separate thy dross? —Byron.

We are all tattooed in our cradles with the beliefs of our tribe; the record may seem superficial, but it is indelible. You cannot educate a man wholly out of the superstitious fears which were implanted in his imagination, no matter how utterly his reason may reject them.—O. W. Holmes.

Superstition! that horrid incubus which dwelt in darkness, shunning the light, with all its racks, and poison chalices, and foul sleeping draughts, is passing away without return. Religion cannot pass away. The burning of a little straw may hide the stars of the sky; but the stars are there and will reappear.—Carlyle.

Alas! you know the cause too well;
The salt is spilt, to me it fell,
Then to contribute to my loss,
My knife and fork were laid across;
On Friday, too! the day I dread;
Would I were safe at home, in bed!
Last night (I vow to Heaven 'tis true)
Bounce from the fire a coffin flew.
Next post some fatal news shall tell:
God send my Cornish friends be well!
—Gay.

Force first made conquest, and that conquest law,
Till Superstition taught the tyrant awe,
Then shar'd the tyranny, then lent it aid,
And gods of conquerors, slaves of subjects made:
She, 'midst the lightning's blaze and thunder's sound,
When rock'd the mountains, and when groan'd the ground,
She taught the weak to bend, the proud to pray
To Power unseen, and mightier far than they:
She, from the rending earth and bursting skies,
Saw gods descend, and fiends infernal rise;
Here fixed the dreadful, there the blest abodes;
Fear made her devils, and weak hope her gods.
—Pope.

Superstition, in all times and among all nations, is the fear of a spirit whose passions are those of a man, whose acts are the acts of a man; who is present in some places, not in others; who makes some places holy and not others; who is kind to one person, unkind to another; who is pleased or angry according to the degree of attention you pay him, or praise you refuse to him; who is hostile generally to human pleasure, but may be bribed by sacrifice of a part of that pleasure into permitting the rest. This, whatever form of faith it colors, is the essence of superstition.—Ruskin.

Suspense

It is a miserable thing to live in suspense; it is the life of the spider.—Swift.

Of all the conditions to which the heart is subject suspense is one that most gnaws and cankers into the frame. One little month of that suspense, when it involves death, we are told by an eye witness in "Wakefield on the Punishment of Death," is sufficient to plough fixed lines and furrows in a convict of five and twenty,—sufficient to dash the brown hair with grey, and to bleach the grey to white.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Suspicion

Suspicion always haunts the guilty mind.—Shakespeare.

Suspicion invites treachery.—Voltaire.

Whoever is suspicious invites treason.—Voltaire.

Suspicion shall be all stuck full of eyes.—Shakespeare.

The virtue of a coward is suspicion.—George Herbert.

Cæsar's wife should be above suspicion.—Plutarch.

Ignorance is the mother of suspicion.—W. R. Alger.

See what a ready tongue suspicion bath!—Shakespeare.

Suspicion is very often a useless pain.—Johnson.

Suspicion follows close on mistrust.—Lessing.

Suspicion is the poison of true friendship.—Augustine.

A woman of honor should not suspect another of things she would not do herself.—Marguerite de Valois.

Rakes are more suspicious than honest men.—Richardson.

The losing side is full of suspicion.—Syrus.

Suspicion has its dupes, as well as credulity.—Mme. Swetchine.

There is no killing the suspicion that deceit has once begotten.—George Eliot.

Suspicion is ever strong on the suffering side.—Publius Syrus.

All seems infected that the infected spy, and all looks yellow to the jaundiced eye.—Pope.

That knave preserves the pearl in his purse who considers all people purse-cuts.—Saadi.

Don't seem to be on the lookout for crows, else you'll set other people watching.—George Eliot.

Suspicion is as great an enemy to wisdom as too much credulity.—Thomas Fuller.

Suspicion and persecution are weeds of the same dunghill, and flourish best together.—Thomas Paine.

Disagreeable suspicions are usually the fruits of a second marriage.—Racine.

Suspicion is a heavy armor, and with its own weight impedes more than protects.—Byron.

Open suspecting of others comes of secretly condemning ourselves.—Sir P. Sidney.

Whose own hard dealings teaches them suspect the thoughts of others!—Shakespeare.

I confess it is my nature's plague To spy into abuses; and, oft, my jealousy Shapes faults that are not.

Suspicions amongst thoughts are like bats amongst birds, they ever fly by twilight.—Bacon.

Suspicious * * * are weeds of the mind which grow of themselves, and most rapidly when least wanted.—Lew Wallace.

All is not well;
I doubt some foul play. —Shakespeare.

Many men provoke others to overreach them by excessive suspicion; their extraordinary distrust in some sort justifies the deceit.—Seneca.

There is no rule more invariable than that we are paid for our suspicions by finding what we suspect.—Thoreau.

The wolf dreads the pitfall, the hawk suspects the snare, and the kite the covered hook.—Horace.

Suspicion is far more apt to be wrong than right; oftener unjust than just. It is no friend to virtue, and always an enemy to happiness.—Hosea Ballou.

A dull head thinks of no better way to show himself wise, than by suspecting everything in his way.—Sir P. Sidney.

It is hardly possible to suspect another without having in one's self the seeds of baseness the party is accused of.—Stanislaus.

Nature itself, after it has done an injury, will ever be suspicious; and no man can love the person he suspects.—South.

See, what a ready tongue suspicion hath!
He that but fears the thing he would not know,
Hath, by instinct, knowledge from others' eyes,
That what he feared is chanced.
—Shakespeare.

Better confide and be deceiv'd,
A thousand times, by treacherous foes,
Than once accuse the innocent,
Or let suspicion mar repose.
—Mrs. Osgood.

There is nothing that makes a man suspect much, more than to know little; and, therefore, men should remedy suspicion by procuring to know more, and not to keep their suspicions to smother.—Bacon.

Suspicious among thoughts are like bats amongst birds, they ever fly to twilight; they are to be repressed, or, at least, well guarded, for they cloud the mind.—Bacon.

Suspicion is not less an enemy to virtue than to happiness: he that is already corrupt is naturally suspicious; and he that becomes suspicious will quickly be corrupt.—Dr. Johnson.

All persons as they become less prosperous, are the more suspicious. They take everything as an affront; and from their conscious weakness, presume that they are neglected.—Terence.

Surmise is the gossamer that malice blows on fair reputations, the corroding dew that destroys the choice blossom. Surmise is primarily the squint of suspicion, and suspicion is established before it is confirmed.—Zimmermann.

He that lives in perpetual suspicion lives the life of a sentinel,—of a sentinel never relieved, whose business it is to look out for and expect an enemy, which is an evil not very far short of perishing by him.—Young.

As there are dim-sighted people who live in a sort of perpetual twilight, so there are some who, having neither much clearness of head nor a very elevated tone of morality, are perpetually haunted by suspicions of everybody and everything.—Whately.

Never put much confidence in such as put no confidence in others. A man prone to suspect evil is mostly looking in his neighbor for what he sees in himself. As to the pure all things are pure, even so to the impure all things are impure.—Hare.

Any base heart can devise means of vileness, and affix the ugly shapings of its own fancy to the actions of those around him: but it requires loftiness of mind, and the heaven-born spirit of virtue, to imagine greatness where it is not, and to deck the sordid objects of nature in the beautiful robes of loveliness and light.—Jane Porter.

Surety

Beware of suretyship for thy best friend. He that payeth another man's debt seeketh his own decay. But if thou canst not otherwise choose, rather lend thy money thyself upon good bonds, although thou borrow it; so shalt thou secure thyself, and pleasure thy friend.—Lord Burleigh.

If any friend desire thee to be his surety, give him a part of what thou hast to spare; if he press thee further, he is not thy friend at all, for friendship rather chooseth harm to itself than offereth it. If thou be bound for a stranger, thou art a fool; if for a merchant, thou putteth thy estate to learn to swim.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Such as are betrayed by their easy nature to be ordinary security for their friends leave so little to themselves, as their liberty remains ever after arbitrary at the will of others; experience having recorded many, whom their fathers had left elbow-room enough, that by suretyship have expired in a dungeon.—F. Osborn.

Swallow

It's surely summer, for there's a swallow:
Come one swallow, his mate will follow.
The bird race quicken and wheel and thicken.
—Christina G. Rossetti.

True hope is swift, and flies with swallow's wings;
Kings it makes gods, and meaner creatures kings.
—Shakespeare.

When Autumn scatters his departing gleams,
Warned of approaching Winter, gathered, play
The swallow-people; and tossed wide around O'er the calm sky, in convulsion swift,
The feathered eddy floats; rejoicing once,
Ere to their wintry slumbers they retire.
—Thomson.

But, as old Swedish legends say,
Of all the birds upon that day,
The swallow felt the deepest grief,
And longed to give her Lord relief,
And chirped when any near would come,
"Hugsvala swala swal honom!"
Meaning, as they who tell it deem,
Oh, cool, oh, cool and comfort Him!
—Leland.

The swallow is come!
The swallow is come!
O, fair are the seasons, and light
Are the days that she brings,
With her dusky wings,
And her bosom snowy white!
—Longfellow.

Swan

The swan, like the soul of the poet,
By the dull world is ill understood.
—Heine

The swan murmurs sweet strains with a faltering tongue, itself the singer of its own dirge.—Martial.

The swan, with arched neck Between her white wings mantling proudly,
rows
Her state with oary feet. —Milton.

The swan in the pool is singing,
And up and down doth he steer,
And, singing gently ever,
Dips under the water clear. —Heine.

As I have seen a swan
With bootless labour swim against the tide
And spend her strength with over-matching waves. —Shakespeare.

The stately-sailing swan
Gives out his snowy plumage to the gale;
And, arching proud his neck, with oary feet
Bears forward fierce, and guards his osier isle,
Protective of his young. —Thomson.

And over the pond are sailing
Two swans all white as snow;
Sweet voices mysteriously wailing
Pierce through me as onward they go.
They sail along, and a ringing
Sweet melody rises on high;
And when the swans begin singing,
They presently must die. —Heine.

Swearing (See Oath)

Take not His name, who made thy tongue
in vain;
It gets thee nothing, and hath no excuse.
—Herbert.

Profane swearing never did any man any good. No man is the richer or wiser or happier for it.—Louth.

From a common custom of swearing, men easily slide into perjury; therefore, if thou wouldst not be perjured, do not use to swear.—Hierocles.

But if you swear by that that is not, you are not forsworn; no more was this knight, swearing by his honor, for he never had any.—Shakespeare.

And then a whoreson jackanapes must take me up for swearing; as if I borrowed mine oaths of him, and might not spend them at my leisure.—Shakespeare.

When perjury, that heaven-defying vice,
Sells oaths by tale, and at the lowest price,
Stamps God's own name upon a lie just made,
To turn a penny in the way of trade.
—Cowper.

And hast thou sworn, on every slight pretence,
Till perjuries are common as bad pence,
While thousands, careless of the damning sin,
Kiss the book's outside who ne'er look within?
—Cowper.

The accusing spirit, which flew up to heaven's chancery with the oath, blushed as he gave it in; and the recording angel, as he wrote it down, dropped a tear upon the word and blotted it out forever.—Laurence Sterne.

Maintain our rank, vulgarity despise,
To swear is neither brave, polite, nor wise,
You would not swear upon a bed of death—
Reflect—your Maker now may stop your breath.
—Anonymous:

Sweetness

The two noblest of things, which are sweetness and light.—Swift.

The sweetest thing that ever grew Beside a human door. —Wordsworth.

Sweets to the sweet; farewell.
—Shakespeare.

The sweetest garland to the sweetest maid.—Tickell.

'Tis sweet to hear
At midnight, on the blue and moonlight deep,
The song and oar of Adria's gondolier,
By distance mellow'd, o'er the waters sweep;
'Tis sweet to see the evening star appear;
'Tis sweet to listen as the night winds creep
From leaf to leaf; 'tis sweet to view on high
The rainbow, based on ocean, span the sky.

Sweet is the vintage, when the showering grapes

In Bacchanal profusion reel to earth,
Purple and gushing; sweet are our escapes
From civic revelry to rural mirth;
Sweet to the miser are his glittering heaps;
Sweet to the father is his first born's birth;
Sweet is revenge—especially to women,
Pillage to soldiers, prize-money to seamen.

'Tis sweet to hear the watch-dog's honest bark

Bay deep-mouth'd welcome as we draw near home:

'Tis sweet to know there is an eye will mark

Our coming, and look brighter when we come:

'Tis sweet to be awaken'd by the lark,
Or lull'd by falling waters; sweet the hum
Of bees, the voice of girls, the song of birds,

The lisp of children and their earliest words.
—Byron.

Swimming

The torrent roar'd; and we did buffet it
With lusty sinews; throwing it aside,
And stemming it with hearts of controversy.
—Shakespeare.

I saw him beat the surges under him,
And ride upon their backs; he trod the water,
Whose enmity he flung aside, and breasted
The surge most swollen that met him.
—Shakespeare.

There was one did battle with the storm
With careless, desperate force; full many times

His life was won and lost, as though he reck'd not—

No hand did aid him, and he aided none—
Alone he breasted the broad wave, alone
That man was sav'd. —Maturin.

How many a time have I
Cloven with arm still lustier, breast more daring

The wave all roughen'd; with a swimmer's stroke

Flung the billows back from my drench'd hair,

And laughing from my lip the audacious brine

Which kiss'd it like a wine-cup rising o'er
The waves as they rose, and prouder still
The loftier they uplifted me. —Byron.

Symbols (See Signs)

Science sees signs; poetry the thing signified.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

It (Catholicism) supplies a multitude of external forms in which the spiritual may be clothed and manifested.—Nath. Hawthorne.

All things are symbols; the external shows
Of Nature have their image in the mind,
As flowers and fruits and falling of the leaves. —Longfellow.

Thus in the beginning the world was so made that certain signs come before certain events.—Cicero.

Of on the dappled turf at ease
I sit, and play with similes, Loose type of things through all degrees.
—Wordsworth.

If he be not in love with some woman, there is no believing old signs; a brushes his hat o' mornings; what should that bode?—Shakespeare.

With crosses, relics, crucifixes,
Beads, pictures, rosaries, and pixes;
The tools of working out salvation
By mere mechanic operation. —Butler.

There is nothing so great or so goodly in creation, but that it is a mean symbol of the gospel of Christ, and of the things He has prepared for them that love Him.—Ruskin.

Sometime we see a cloud that's dragonish;
A vapour sometime like a bear or lion,
A tower'd citadel, a pendant rock,
A forked mountain, or blue promontory With trees upon 't, that nod unto the world,
And mock our eyes with air: thou hast seen
these signs;
They are black vesper's pageants.
—Shakespeare.

Sympathy

Sympathy is especially a Christian duty.—Spurgeon.

Sympathy is two hearts tugging at one load.—Charles H. Parkhurst.

Of a truth men are mystically united.—Carlyle.

A sympathy in choice.—Shake-
speare.

There is in souls a sympathy with sounds.—Cowper.

Kindred weaknesses induce friendships as often as kindred virtues.—
Bovee.

What my tongue dares not that my heart shall say.—Shakespeare.

More helpful than all wisdom is one draught of simple human pity that will not forsake us.—George Eliot.

Speed the soft intercourse from soul to
soul,
And waft a sigh from Indus to the Pole.
—Pope.

We pine for kindred natures
To mingle with our own.
—Mrs. Hemans.

If thou art something, bring thy soul and interchange with mine.—
Schiller.

Never elated while one man's oppress'd;
Never dejected while another's blessed.
—Pope.

The sympathy of sorrow is stronger than the sympathy of prosperity.—
Earl of Beaconsfield.

It is only kindred griefs that draw forth our tears, and each weeps really for himself.—Heine.

Strengthen me by sympathizing with my strength not my weakness.—
Amos Bronson Alcott.

Pity and need Make all flesh kin. There is no caste in blood. —Edwin Arnold.

At a certain depth all bosoms communicate, all hearts are one.—Fred-rika Bremer.

The craving for sympathy is the common boundary-line between joy and sorrow.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

The human heart
Finds nowhere shelter but in human kind.
—George Eliot.

Nothing precludes sympathy so much as a perfect indifference to it.—
Hazlitt.

We are governed by sympathy; and the extent of our sympathy is determined by that of our sensibility.—
Hazlitt.

True sympathy is beyond what can be seen and touched and reasoned upon.—Mrs. Campbell Praed.

Not being untutored in suffering, I learn to pity those in affliction.—Virgil.

Striking the electric chain where-with we are darkly bound.—Byron.

The secret of language is the secret of sympathy, and its full charm is possible only to the gentle.—Ruskin.

We owe to man higher succors than food and fire. We owe to man, man.—Emerson.

Love and death are the two great hinges on which all human sympathies turn.—B. R. Haydon.

He watched and wept and prayed and felt for all.—Goldsmith.

One man pins me to the wall, while with another I walk among the stars.—Emerson.

Sympathy is the golden key that unlocks the hearts of others.—Samuel Smiles.

Ah! thank heaven, travelers find Samaritans as well as Levites on life's hard way.—Thackeray.

Next to love, sympathy is the divinest passion of the human heart.—Burke.

And share the inward fragrance of each other's heart.—Keats.

A crowd always thinks with its sympathy, never with its reason.—W. R. Alger.

Truth is the root, but human sympathy is the flower of practical life.—Chapin.

Our own cast-off sorrows are not sufficient to constitute sympathy for others.—Mme. Necker.

All sympathy not consistent with acknowledged virtue is but disguised selfishness.—Coleridge.

All powerful souls have kindred with each other.—Coleridge.

A brother's sufferings claim a brother's pity.—Addison.

Like will to like; each creature loves his kind.
Chaste words proceed still from a bashful mind.—Herrick.

He who steps on stones is glad to feel
The smallest spray of moss beneath his feet.—Anna Katharine Green.

How in the turmoil of life can love stand,
Where there is not one heart, and one mouth and one hand.—Longfellow.

The secrets of life are not shown except to sympathy and likeness.—Emerson.

The more we know, the better we forgive; who'er feels deeply, feels for all who live.—Mme. de Staël.

Far better one unpurchased heart than glory's proudest name.—Tuckerman.

The individual soul should seek for an intimate union with the soul of the universe.—Novalis.

To commiserate is sometimes more than to give; for money is external to a man's self, but he who bestows compassion communicates his own soul.—Mountford.

A helping word to one in trouble is often like a switch on a railroad track—but one inch between wreck and smooth-rolling prosperity.—Beecher.

The greatest pleasures of which the human mind is susceptible are the pleasures of consciousness and sympathy.—Parke Godwin.

One of the greatest of all mental pleasures is to have our thoughts often divined; ever entered into with sympathy.—Miss L. Landon.

Women have the genius of charity. A man gives but his gold; a woman adds to it her sympathy.—E. W. Legouvé.

Nature has concatenated our fancies and affections together with in-dissoluble bands of mutual sympathy.

—Barrow.

When a man can look upon the simple wild-rose, and feel no pleasure, his taste has been corrupted.—Beecher.

Sympathetic people are often uncommunicative about themselves; they give back reflected images which hide their own depths.—George Eliot.

A face which is always serene possesses a mysterious and powerful attraction; sad hearts come to it as to the sun to warm themselves again.—Joseph Roux.

The man who melts
With social sympathy, though not allied,
Is than a thousand kinsmen of more worth.
—Euripides.

Thou hast given me, in this beauteous face,
A world of earthly blessings to my soul,
If sympathy of love unite our thoughts.
—Shakespeare.

Yet, taught by time, my heart has learned to glow
For other's good, and melt at other's woe.
—Homer.

To rejoice in another's prosperity is to give content to your own lot; to mitigate another's grief is to alleviate or dispel your own.—T. Edwards.

It is certain my belief gains quite infinitely the very moment I can convince another mind thereof.—Novalis.

The world has no sympathy with any but positive griefs. It will pity you for what you lose; never for what you lack.—Madame Swetchine.

World-wide apart, and yet akin,
As showing that the human heart
Beats on forever as of old.
—Longfellow.

No one is so accursed by fate,
No one so utterly desolate,
But some heart, though unknown,
Responds unto his own. —Longfellow.

It is an eternal truth in the political as well as the mystical body, that "where one member suffers, all the members suffer with it."—Junius.

There is some danger lest there be no real religion in the heart which craves too much daily sympathy.—Margaret Fuller Ossoli.

It is a lively spark of nobleness to descend in most favor to one when he is lowest in affliction.—Sir P. Sidney.

A marriage or a refusal or a proposal thrills through a whole household of women, and sets their hysterical sympathies at work.—Thackeray.

Public feeling now is apt to side with the persecuted, and our modern martyr is full as likely to be smothered with roses as with coals.—Chapin.

True sympathy is putting ourselves in another's place; and we are moved in proportion to the reality of our imagination.—Hosea Ballou.

The sympathy of most people consists of a mixture of good-humor, curiosity, and self-importance.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

One common calamity makes men extremely affect each other, though they differ in every other particular.—Steele.

It seems to me that we become more dear one to the other, in together admiring works of art, which speak to the soul by their true grandeur.—Mme. de Staël.

There's nought in this bad world like sympathy:
'Tis so becoming to the soul and face—
Sets to soft music the harmonious sigh,
And robes sweet friendship in a Brussels lace.
—Byron.

Sympathy is in great degree a result of the mood we are in at the moment; anger forbids the emotion. On the other hand, it is easiest taken on when we are in a state of most absolute self-satisfaction.—Lew Wallace.

Be willing to pity the misery of the stranger! Thou givest to-day thy bread to the poor; to-morrow the poor may give it to thee.—Michaelis.

Women have a smile for every joy,
a tear for every sorrow, a consolation for every grief, an excuse for every fault, a prayer for every misfortune, and encouragement for every hope.—
Saint-Foix.

Somewhere or other there must surely be
The face not seen, the voice not heard,
The heart that not yet—never yet—ah me!
Made answer to my word.
—Christina G. Rossetti.

Outward things don't give; they draw out. You find in them what you bring to them. A cathedral makes only the devotional feel devotional; scenery refines only the fine-minded.—Charles Buxton.

I live not in myself, but I become Portion of that around me, and to me
High mountains are a feeling, but the hum
Of human cities torture.
—Byron.

O! ask not, hope thou not too much
Of sympathy below;
Few are the hearts whence one same touch
Bids the sweet fountains flow.
—Mrs. Hemans.

The capacity of sorrow belongs to our grandeur, and the loftiest of our race are those who have had the profoundest sympathies, because they have had the profoundest sorrows.—
Henry Giles.

Something the heart must have to cherish,
Must love, and joy, and sorrow learn;
Something with passion clasp or perish,
And in itself to ashes burn.—Longfellow.

Whom the heart of man shuts out,
Sometimes the heart of God takes in,
And fences them all round about
With silence 'mid the world's loud din.
—James Russell Lowell.

It [true love] is the secret sympathy,
The silver link, the silken tie,
Which heart to heart, and mind to mind
In body and in soul can bind. —Scott.

For I no sooner in my heart divin'd,
My heart, which by a secret harmony Still moves with thine, joined in connection sweet.
—Milton.

Helpless mortal! Thine arm can destroy thousands at once, but cannot enclose even two of thy fellowcreatures at once in the embrace of love and sympathy!—Richter.

Man is one; and he hath one great heart. It is thus we feel, with a gigantic throb athwart the sea, each other's rights and wrongs; thus are we men.—Bailey.

But better far it is to speak
One simple word, which now and then
Shall waken their free nature in the weak
And friendless sons of men.
—Lowell.

In the desert a fountain is springing,
In the wide waste there still is a tree,
And a bird in the solitude singing,
Which speaks to my spirit of thee.
—Byron.

We are accustomed to see men de-ride what they do not understand, and snarl at the good and beautiful because it lies beyond their sympathies.
—Goethe.

Every man rejoices twice when he has a partner of his joy; a friend shares my sorrow and makes it but a moiety, but he swells my joy and makes it double.—Jeremy Taylor.

There is poetry and there is beauty in real sympathy; but there is more —there is action. The noblest and most powerful form of sympathy is not merely the responsive tear, the echoed sigh, the answering look; it is the embodiment of the sentiment in actual help.—Octavius Winslow.

Our souls sit close and silently within,
And their own web from their own entrails
spin;
And when eyes meet far off, our sense is
such,
That, spider like, we feel the tenderest
touch.
—Dryden.

Sympathy wanting, all is wanting;
its personal magnetism is the conductor of the sacred spark that lights our atoms, puts us in human communion, and gives us to company, conversation, and ourselves.—Alcott.

The most reserved of men, that will not exchange two syllables together in an English coffee-house, should they meet at Ispahan, would drink sherbet and eat a mess of rice together.—
Shenstone.

He that sympathizes in all the happiness of others perhaps himself enjoys the safest happiness, and he that is warned by all the folly of others has perhaps attained the soundest wisdom.—Colton.

We are much bound to them that do succeed;

But, in a more pathetic sense, are bound To such as fail. They all our loss expound;

They comfort us for work that will not speed,

And life—itsself a failure.

—Jean Ingelow.

What gem hath dropp'd and sparkles o'er his chain?

The tear most sacred, shed for other's pain, That starts at once—bright—pure—from pity's mine,

Already polish'd by the Hand Divine.

—Byron.

No man can force the harp of his own individuality into the people's heart; but every man may play upon the chords of the people's heart, who draws his inspiration from the people's instinct.—Kossuth.

It may, indeed, be said that sympathy exists in all minds, as Faraday has discovered that magnetism exists in all metals; but a certain temperature is required to develop the hidden property, whether in the metal or the mind.—Bulwer-Lytton.

I would go fifty miles on foot to kiss the hand of that man whose generous heart will give up the reins of his imagination into his Author's hands; be pleased, he knows not why, and cares not wherefore.—Sterne.

There are secret ties, there are sympathies, by the sweet relationship of which souls that are well matched attach themselves to each other, and are affected by I know not what, which cannot be explained.—Corneille.

Our hearts, my love, were form'd to be

The genuine twins of sympathy,

They live with one sensation:

In joy or grief, but most in love,

Like chords in unison they move,

And thrill with like vibration. —Moore.

Of all the virtues necessary to the completion of the perfect man, there is none to be more delicately implied and less ostentatiously vaunted than that of exquisite feeling or universal benevolence.—Bulwer-Lytton.

But there is one thing which we are responsible for, and that is for our sympathies, for the manner in which we regard it, and for the tone in which we discuss it. What shall we say, then, with regard to it? On which side shall we stand?—John Bright.

Whose hearts in every thought are one,

Whose voices utter the same wills,

Answering, as echo doth, some tone

Of fairy music 'mong the hills,

So like itself we seek in vain

Which is the echo; which the strain.

—Moore.

The making one object, in outward or inward nature, more holy to a single heart, is reward enough for a life; for the more sympathies we gain or awaken for what is beautiful, by so much deeper will be our sympathy for that which is most beautiful, the human soul.—Lowell.

We often do more good by our sympathy than by our labors. A man may lose position, influence, wealth, and even health, and yet live on in comfort, if with resignation; but there is one thing without which life becomes a burden—that is human sympathy.—Canon Farrar.

Conversation augments pleasure and diminishes pain by our having shares in either; for silent woes are greatest, as silent satisfaction least: since sometimes our pleasure would be none but for telling of it, and our grief insupportable but for participation.—Wycherley.

Every human feeling is greater and larger than the exciting cause—a proof, I think, that man is designed for a higher state of existence, and this is deeply implied in music, in which there is always something more and beyond the immediate expression.—Coleridge.

A man may be buoyed up by the efflation of his wild desires to brave any imaginable peril; but he cannot calmly see one he loves braving the same peril; simply because he cannot feel within him that which prompts another. He sees the danger, and feels not the power that is to overcome it.—George Henry Lewes.

How bless'd the heart that has a friend
A sympathizing ear to lend
To troubles too great to smother?
For as ale and porter, when flat, are restor'd
Till a sparkling, bubbling head they afford,
So sorrow is cheer'd by being pour'd
From one vessel into another. —Hood.

Sympathy is the first great lesson which man should learn. It will be ill for him if he proceeds no farther; if his emotions are but excited to roll back on his heart, and to be fostered in luxurious quiet. But unless he learns to feel for things in which he has no personal interest he can achieve nothing generous or noble.—Talfourd.

There are eyes which need only to look up, to touch every chord of a breast choked by the stifling atmosphere of stiff and stagnant society, and to call forth tones which might become the accompanying music of a life. This gentle transfusion of mind into mind is the secret of sympathy.—Richter.

Nature always wears the colors of the spirit. To a man laboring under calamity the heat of his own fire hath sadness in it. Then there is a kind of contempt of the landscape felt by him who has just lost by death a dear friend. The sky is less grand as it shuts down over less worth in the population.—Emerson.

The devil himself would be but a contemptible adversary were he not sure of a correspondent, and a party that held intelligence with him in our own breasts. All the blowing of a fire put under a caldron could never make it boil over, were there not a fullness of water within it.—South.

Let us cherish sympathy. By attention and exercise it may be improved in every man. It prepares the mind for receiving the impressions of virtue; and without it there can be no true politeness. Nothing is more odious than that insensibility which wraps a man up in himself and his own concerns, and prevents his being moved with either the joys or the sorrows of another.—Beattie.

It is by sympathy we enter into the concerns of others, that we are moved as they are moved, and are never suffered to be indifferent spectators of almost anything which men can do or suffer. For sympathy may be considered as a sort of substitution, by which we are put into the place of another man, and affected in many respects as he is affected.—Burke.

Like warp and woof all destinies
Are woven fast,
Link'd in sympathy like the keys
Of an organ vast;
Pluck one thread, and the web ye mar;
Break but one
Of a thousand keys, and the paining jar
Through all will run. —Whittier.

Graceful, particularly in youth, is the tear of sympathy, and the heart that melts at the tale of woe; we should not permit ease and indulgence to contract our affections, and wrap us up in selfish enjoyment. But we should accustom ourselves to think of the distresses of human life, of the solitary cottage, the dying parent, and the weeping orphan. Nor ought we ever to sport with pain and distress in any of our amusements, or treat even the meanest insect with wanton cruelty.—Blair.

No radiant pearl, which crested fortune wears,
No gem, that twinkling hangs, from beauty's ears;
Not the bright stars, which night's blue arch adorn;
Nor rising sun, that gilds the vernal morn:
Shine with such lustre as the tear that flows
Down virtue's manly cheek for others' woes. —Darwin.

Happy is the man who has that in his soul which acts upon the dejected as April airs upon violet roots. Gifts from the hand are silver and gold, but the heart gives that which neither silver nor gold can buy. To be full of goodness, full of cheerfulness, full of sympathy, full of helpful hope, causes a man to carry blessings of which he is himself as unconscious as a lamp is of its own shining. Such a one moves on human life as stars move on dark seas to bewildered mariners; as the sun wheels, bringing all the seasons with him from the south.—Beecher.

System

Nothing truly precious swims helplessly in the great wake of God's clear method, but every part of the man can be, and therefore strives to be, abreast of the other. The mountains follow the earth, the air has eluded the mountains, and daylight and starlight stream forward entangled in the air. Clutching for dear life to each other, all solid and tenuous things describe the great invariable motion, and God is in the manifoldness, drenching it with uniformity.—John Weiss.

Table Talk

Table talk, to be perfect, should be sincere without bigotry, differing without discord, sometimes grave, always agreeable, touching on deep points, dwelling most on seasonable ones, and letting everybody speak and be heard.—Leigh Hunt.

Tact

Grant graciously what you cannot refuse safely, and conciliate those you cannot conquer.—Colton.

Without tact you can learn nothing. Tact teaches you when to be silent. Inquirers who are always inquiring never learn anything.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

Tact is one of the first of mental virtues, the absence of which is frequently fatal to the best of talents. Without denying that it is a talent of itself, it will suffice if we admit that it supplies the place of many talents.—Simms.

Talent is something, but tact is everything. Talent is serious, sober, grave, and respectable; tact is all that, and more, too. It is not a seventh sense, but is the life of all the five. It is the open eye, the quick ear, the judging taste, the keen smell, and the lively touch; it is the interpreter of all riddles, the surmounter of all difficulties, the remover of all obstacles.—W. P. Sargill.

I have known some men possessed of good qualities, which were very serviceable to others, but useless to themselves; like a sundial on the front of a house, to inform the neighbors and passengers, but not the owner within.—Swift.

Tailor

Great is the tailor, but not the greatest.—Carlyle.

Thy clothes are all the soul thou hast.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Thou art a strange fellow: a tailor make a man? Ay, a tailor, sir; a stone-cutter or a painter could not have made him so ill, though he had been but two hours at the trade.—Shakespeare.

Thy gown? why, ay,—come, tailor, let us see't.

O mercy, God! what masquing stuff is here?

What's this? a sleeve; 'tis like a demi-canon:

What, up and down, carv'd like an apple-tart?

Here's snip and nip and cut and slish and slash.

Like to a censor in a barber's shop; Why, what i' devil's name, tailor, call'st thou this! —Shakespeare.

O monstrous arrogance, thou liest, thou thread,

Thou thimble, Thou yard, three-quarters, half-yard, quarter, nail,

Thou flea, thou nit, thou winter-cricket, thou!—

Brav'd in mine own house with a skein of thread!

Away thou rag, thou quantity, thou remnant;

Or I shall so be-mete thee with thy yard, As thou shalt think on prating whilst thou liv'st! —Shakespeare.

What a fine man Hath your tailor made you!

—Massinger.

Sister, look ye,
How, by a new creation of my tailor's
I've shook off old mortality.
—John Ford.

Yes, if they would thank their maker,
And seek no further; but they have new creators,
God tailor and god mercer. —Massinger.

Thou villain base,
Know'st me not by my clothes?
No, nor thy tailor, rascal.
Who is thy grandfather; he made those clothes,
Which, as it seems, make thee.
—Shakespeare.

As if thou e'er wert angry
But with thy tailor! and yet that poor shred
Can bring more to the making up of a man, Than can be hoped from thee; thou art his creature;
And did he not, each morning, new create
thee,
Thou'dst stink and be forgotten.
—Massinger.

Tale

An honest tale speeds best, being plainly told.—Shakespeare.

This act is an ancient tale new told;
And, in the last repeating, troublesome,
Being urged at a time unseasonable.
—Shakespeare.

Who gather round, and wonder at the tale
Of horrid apparition, tall and ghastly, That walks at dead of night, or takes his stand O'er some new-open'd grave, and, strange to tell,
Evanishes at crowing of the cock.
—Blair.

Talent

Talents constitute our very essence.
—Charles Rollin.

Talent rules without a sceptre.—
Cælius.

Talent is always queer-tempered.—
Miss Braddon.

Talent is a cistern; genius, a fountain.—Whipple.

Talent is something, but tact is everything.—W. P. Sargill.

Talent without tact is only half talent.—Horace Greeley.

It is unfortunate that superior talent and superior men are so seldom united.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

Great talents have some admirers,
but few friends.—Niebuhr.

Talent is that which is in a man's power.—Lowell.

To do easily what is difficult for others is the mark of talent.—Amiel.

The true eye for talent presupposes
the true reverence for it.—Carlyle.

No one shall have wit save we and our friends.—Molière.

The world is always ready to receive talent with open arms.—O. W.
Holmes.

Talent, like beauty, to be pardoned, must be obscure and unostentatious.—
Lady Blessington.

Let us not overstrain our talents, lest we do nothing gracefully: a clown, whatever he may do, will never pass for a gentleman.—La Fontaine.

With the talents of an angel a man may be a fool.—Young.

It always seemed to me a sort of clever stupidity only to have one sort of talent—almost like a carrier-pigeon.—George Eliot.

Talent of the highest order, and such as is calculated to command admiration, may exist apart from wisdom.—Robert Hall.

It is an uncontrolled truth that no man ever made an ill figure who understood his own talents, nor a good one who mistook them.—Swift.

Men of great and shining qualities do not always succeed in life, but the fault lies more often in themselves than in others.—Colton.

It is a great proof of talents to be able to recall the mind from the senses, and to separate thought from habit.—Cicero.

Talents, to strike the eye of posterity, should be concentrated. Rays, powerless while they are scattered,
burn in a point.—Willmott.

Talent is some one faculty unusually developed; genius commands all the faculties.—F. H. Hedge.

And sure th' Eternal Master found His single talent well employ'd.
—Samuel Johnson.

Talents are best nurtured in solitude; character is best formed in the stormy billows of the world.—Goethe.

It is not always the highest talent that thrives best. Mediocrity, with tact, will outweigh talent oftentimes.—Joseph Cook.

Talent, lying in the understanding, is often inherited; genius, being the action of reason or imagination, rarely or never.—Coleridge.

Now this is how I define talent; it is a gift God has given us in secret, which we reveal without knowing it.—Montesquieu.

Talent for talents' sake is a bauble and a show. Talent working with joy in the cause of universal truth lifts the possessor to new power as a benefactor.—Emerson.

Talents angel-bright,
If wanting worth, are shining instruments
In false ambition's hand, to finish faults Illustrious, and give infamy renown.
—Young.

The talents lost—the moments run
To waste—the sins of act, of thought,
Ten thousand deeds of folly done,
And countless virtues cherish'd not.
—Bowring.

A man with great talents, but void of discretion, is like Polyphemus in the fable, strong and blind, endued with an irresistible force, which for want of sight is of no use to him.—Addison.

Talent is the capacity of doing anything that depends on application and industry and it is a voluntary power, while genius is involuntary.—Hazlitt.

Talents give a man a superiority far more agreeable than that which proceeds from riches, birth, or employments, which are all external. Talents constitute our very essence.—Rollin.

Have you not observed that there is a lower kind of discretion and regularity, which seldom fails of raising men to the highest station in the court, the church, and the law?—Swift.

We must despise no sort of talents; they all have their separate duties and uses, all the happiness of man for their object; they all improve, exalt, and gladden life.—Sydney Smith.

Whatever you are from nature, keep to it; never desert your own line of talent. Be what nature intended you for, and you will succeed; be anything else, and you will be ten thousand times worse than nothing.—Sydney Smith.

The most fertile soil does not necessarily produce the most abundant harvest. It is the use we make of our faculties which renders them valuable. Talent, like other things, may lie fallow.—T. W. Higginson.

Gross and vulgar minds will always pay a higher respect to wealth than to talent; for wealth, although it be a far less efficient source of power than talent, happens to be far more intelligible.—Colton.

As to great and commanding talents, they are the gift of Providence in some way unknown to us. They rise where they are least expected. They fail when everything seems disposed to produce them, or at least to call them forth.—Burke.

The world is always ready to receive talent with open arms. Very often it does not know what to do with genius. Talent is a docile creature. It bows its head meekly while the world slips the collar over it. It backs into the shafts like a lamb.—Holmes.

The difference between talent and genius is this: while the former usually develops some special branch of our faculties, the latter commands them all. When the former is combined with tact, it is often more than a match for the latter.—Beaconsfield.

It seems that nature has concealed at the bottom of our minds, talents and abilities of which we are not aware. The passions alone have the privilege of bringing them to light, and of giving us sometimes views more certain and more perfect than art could possibly produce.—La Rochefoucauld.

That talent confers an inequality of a much higher order than rank would appear from various views of the subject, and most particularly from this—many a man may justly thank his talent for his rank; but no man has ever yet been able to return the compliment, by thanking his rank for his talent. When Leonardo da Vinci died, his sovereign exclaimed: "I can make a thousand lords, but not one Leonardo."—Colton.

Men of splendid talents are generally too quick, too volatile, too adventurous, and too unstable to be much relied on; whereas men of common abilities, in a regular, plodding routine of business, act with more regularity and greater certainty. Men of the best intellectual abilities are apt to strike off suddenly, like the tangent of a circle, and cannot be brought into their orbits by attraction or gravity—they often act with such eccentricity as to be lost in the vortex of their own reveries. Brilliant talents in general are like the ignes fatui; they excite wonder, but often mislead. They are not, however, without their use; like the fire from the flint, once produced, it may be converted, by solid, thinking men, to very salutary and noble purposes.—Trusler.

Talent repeats; genius creates. Talent is a cistern; genius a fountain. Talent deals with the actual, with discovered and realized truths, analyzing, arranging, combining, applying positive knowledge, and in action looking to precedents; genius deals with the possible, creates new combinations, discovers new laws, and acts from an insight into principles. Talent jogs to conclusions to which genius takes giant leaps. Talent accumulates knowledge, and has it packed up in the memory; genius assimilates it with its own substance, grows with every new accession, and converts knowledge into power. Talent gives out what it has taken in; genius what has risen from its unsounded wells of living thought. Talent, in difficult situations, strives to untie knots, which genius instantly cuts with one swift decision. Talent is full of thoughts, genius of thought; one has definite acquisitions, the other indefinite power.—E. P. Whipple.

Talking

Talkers are no good doers.—Shakespeare.

Error is always talkative.—Goldsmith.

Brisk talkers are generally slow thinkers.—Swift.

Who talks much, must talk in vain.—Gay.

What a spendthrift he is of his tongue!—Shakespeare.

Men of few words are the best men.—Shakespeare.

Alas for the folly of the loquacious!—Seneca.

We talk little if we do not talk about ourselves.—Hazlitt.

Madame de Staël talks herself into a beauty.—Curran.

Even wit is a burden when it talks too long.—Dryden.

Men talk only to conceal the mind.—Young.

They always talk who never think.—Prior.

They only babble who practice not reflection.—Sheridan.

Intemperance in talk makes a dreadful havoc in the heart.—Thomas Wilson.

The inexhaustible talk that was the flow of a golden sea of eloquence and wisdom.—William Winter.

We speak little if not egged on by vanity.—Rochevoucauld.

No season now for calm, familiar talk.—Homer.

The tongue of a fool is the key of his counsel.—Socrates.

Things are often spoke and seldom meant.—Shakespeare.

With vollies of eternal babble.—Butler.

Fie, fie, how frantically I square my talk!—Shakespeare.

Evil tongues never want a whet.—Le Sage.

Consider, I'm a peer of the realm, and I shall die if I don't talk.—Reynolds.

Long talking begets short hearing, for people go away.—Richter.

Length of saying makes languor of hearing.—Joseph Roux.

A person who talks with equal vivacity on every subject excites no interest in any.—Hazlitt.

Blessed is the man who, having nothing to say, abstains from giving us wordy evidence of the fact.—George Eliot.

But far more numerous was the herd of ^{such},
Who think too little, and who talk too much.
—Dryden.

Those who have few affairs to attend to are great speakers. The less men think, the more they talk.—Montesquieu.

Much tongue and much judgment seldom go together.—L'Estrange.

No one would talk much in society if he only knew how often he misunderstands others.—Goethe.

A merrier man,
Within the limit of becoming mirth,
I never spent an hour's talk withal.
—Shakespeare.

What you keep by you, you may change and mend;
But words once spoken can never be recalled.
—Roscommon.

Nor is drunkenness censured for anything so much as its intemperate and endless talk.—Plutarch.

He who indulges in liberty of speech will hear things in return which he will not like.—Terence.

To talk without effort is, after all, the great charm of talking.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

She stammers; oh, what grace in lispings lies!—Dryden.

Whether one talks well depends very much upon whom he has to talk to.—Bovee.

A wise man reflects before he speaks; a fool speaks, and then reflects on what he has uttered.—From the French.

Less pains in the world a man cannot take than to hold his tongue.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

However irregular and desultory his talk, there is method in the fragments.—Coleridge.

If I were queen, I would order Madame de Staël to talk to me all day.—Mme. de Tessé.

But still his tongue ran on, the less of weight it bore, with greater ease.—Butler.

People who have nothing to say are never at a loss in talking.—H. W. Shaw.

The vanity of shining in conversation is usually subversive of its own desires.—Mrs. Sigourney.

I think the first wisdom is to restrain the tongue.—Cato.

In after-dinner talk, across the walnuts and the wine.—Tennyson.

No great talker ever did any great thing yet in this world.—Ouida.

In general, those who have nothing to say contrive to spend the longest time in doing it.—Lowell.

Learn to hold thy tongue. Five words cost Zacharias forty weeks' silence.—Thomas Fuller.

If I chance to talk a little wild, forgive me: I had it from my father.—Shakespeare.

The tongue is the instrument of the greatest good and the greatest evil that is done in the world.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Speaking much is a sign of vanity; for he that is lavish in words is a niggard in deed.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

I prefer the wisdom of the uneducated to the folly of the loquacious.—Cicero.

Every absurdity has a champion to defend it; for error is always talkative.—Goldsmith.

Though we have two eyes, we are supplied with but one tongue. Draw your own moral.—Alphonse Karr.

Those whose tongues are gentlemen ushers to their wit, and still go before it.—Ben Jonson.

Talking and eloquence are not the same; and to speak well are two things.—Ben Jonson.

Thy talk is the sweet extract of all speech, And holds mine ear in blissful slavery.—Bailey.

A good talker, even more than a good orator, implies a good audience.—Leslie Stephen.

The pleasure of talking is the inextinguishable passion of woman, coeval with the act of breathing.—Le Sage.

Drawing is speaking to the eye, talking is painting to the ear.—Joubert.

We seldom repent talking too little, but very often talking too much.—La Bruyère.

It is not of so much consequence what you say, as how you say it.—Alexander Smith.

What cracker is this same that deafs our ears
With this abundance of superfluous breath?
—Shakespeare.

I prythee, take the cork out of thy mouth that I may drink thy tidings.—Shakespeare.

It is a sad thing when men have neither wit to speak well nor judgment to hold their tongues.—La Bruyère.

He hath a heart as sound as a bell, and his tongue is the clapper; for what his heart thinks his tongue speaks.—Shakespeare.

Butler compared the tongues of these eternal talkers to race-horses, which go the faster the less weight they carry.—Colton.

The greatest talkers in the days of peace have been the most pusillanimous in the day of temptation.—Jeremy Taylor.

A talkative person runs himself upon great inconvenience by blabbing out his own and others' secrets.—John Ray.

Whom the disease of talking still once possesseth, he can never hold his peace. Nay, rather than he will not discourse he will hire men to hear him.—Ben Jonson.

Talking is like playing on the harp; there is as much in laying the hands on the strings to stop their vibrations as in twanging them to bring out their music.—Holmes.

It is a difficult task to talk to the purpose, and to put life and perspicuity into our discourse.—Jeremy Collier.

The honorablest part of talk is to give the occasion, and again to moderate and pass to somewhat else; for then a man leads the dance.—Bacon.

Talking over the things which you have read with your companions fixes them on the mind.—Dr. Watts.

Talking is one of the fine arts—the noblest, the most important, the most difficult—and its fluent harmonies may be spoiled by the intrusion of a single harsh note.—Holmes.

Why, what a wasp-tongued and impatient fool
Art thou, to break into this woman's mood;
Tying thine ear to no tongue but thine own!
—Shakespeare.

Such as thy words are, such will thy affections be esteemed; and such will thy deeds as thy affections, and such thy life as thy deeds.—Socrates.

He must be little skilled in the world who thinks that men's talking much or little shall hold proportion only to their knowledge.—Locke.

He who seldom speaks, and with one calm well-timed word can strike dumb the loquacious, is a genius or a hero.—Lavater.

We oftener say things because we can say them well than because they are sound and reasonable.—Landor.

One learns taciturnity best among those people who have none, and loquacity among the taciturn.—Richter.

If you light upon an impertinent talker, that sticks to you like a burr, to the disappointment of your important occasions, deal freely with him, break off the discourse, and pursue your business.—Plutarch.

There are many who talk on from ignorance rather than from knowledge, and who find the former an inexhaustible fund of conversation.—Hazlitt.

A man who always talks for fame never can be pleasing. The man who talks to unburthen his mind is the man to delight you.—Johnson.

In great families, some one false, paltry, tale-bearer, by carrying stories from one to another, shall inflame the minds and discompose the quiet of the whole family.—South.

But still his tongue ran on, the less
Of weight it bore, with greater ease;
And with its everlasting clack,
Set all men's ears upon the rack.
—Butler.

She sits tormenting every guest,
Nor gives her tongue one moment's rest,
In phrases batter'd, stale, and trite,
Which modern ladies call polite.
—Swift.

There are prating coxcombs in the world who would rather talk than listen, although Shakespeare himself were the orator, and human nature the theme!—Colton.

A gentleman that loves to hear himself talk, and will speak more in a minute than he will stand to in a month.—Shakespeare.

She spake,
And his love-wilder'd and idolatrous soul
Clung to the airy music of her words, Like a bird on a bough, high swaying in the wind.
—Bailey.

Nor did we fail to see within ourselves
What need there is to be reserved in speech,
And temper all our thoughts with charity.
—Wordsworth.

My lord shall never rest:
I'll watch him, tame and talk him out of
patience:
His bed shall seem a school, his board a shrift.
—Shakespeare.

Talking is a digestive process which is absolutely essential to the mental constitution of the man who devours many books.—William Matthews.

As empty vessels make the loudest sound, so they that have the least wit are the greatest babblers.—Plato.

If you don't wish a man to do a thing you had better get him to talk about it; for the more men talk, the more likely they are to do nothing else.—Carlyle.

Stop not, unthinking, every friend you meet
To spin your wordy fabric in the street;
While you are emptying your colloquial pack,
The fiend Lumbago jumps upon his back.
—O. W. Holmes.

Words learn'd by rote, a parrot may rehearse,
But talking is not always to converse;
Not more distinct from harmony divine,
The constant creaking of a country sign.
—Cowper.

Where village statesmen talk'd with looks profound,
And news much older than their ale went round.
—Goldsmith.

Talk without truth is the hollow brass; talk without love is like the tinkling cymbal, and when it does not tinkle it jingles, and when it does not jingle, it jars.—Mrs. Jameson.

The talkative listen to no one, for they are ever speaking. And the first evil that attends those who know not to be silent is that they hear nothing.—Plutarch.

There is the same difference between their tongues as between the hour and the minute-hand; one goes ten times as fast, and the other signifies ten times as much.—Sydney Smith.

I cannot tell thee, hour by hour,
That I adore thee dearly;
I cannot talk of passion's power—
But oh! I feel sincerely!
—Mrs. Osgood.

Discretion of speech is more than eloquence; and to speak agreeably to him with whom we deal is more than to speak in good words or in good order.—Bacon.

Speak gently! 'Tis a little thing
Dropp'd in the heart's deep well;
The good, the joy which it may bring Eternity shall tell.
—David Bates.

They who are great talkers in company have never been any talkers by themselves, nor used to private discussions of our home regimen.—Shaftesbury.

Let your words be few and digested; it is a shame for the tongue to cry the heart mercy, much more to cast itself upon the uncertain pardon of others' ears.—Bishop Hall.

There are braying men in the world as well as braying asses; for, what's loud and senseless talking and swearing, any other than braying?—Sir Roger L'Estrange.

Cautiously avoid talking of the domestic affairs either of yourself or of other people. Yours are nothing to them but tedious gossip, theirs are nothing to you.—Chesterfield.

A dearth of words a woman need not fear, But 't is a task indeed to learn—to hear: In that the skill of conversation lies; That shows or makes you both polite and wise.
—Young.

He gives the bastinado with his tongue; Our ears are cudgell'd; not a word of his, But buffets better than a fist of France: Zounds! I was never so bethump'd with words, Since I first called my brother's father, dad.
—Shakespeare.

This great author (Horace), who had the nicest taste of conversation, and was himself a most agreeable companion, had so strong an antipathy to a great talker, that he was afraid, some time or other, it would be mortal to him.—Steele.

The fool hath planted in his memory
An army of good words; and I do know
A many fools that stand in better place,
Garnish'd like him, that for a tricky word Defy the matter.
—Shakespeare.

Philosophy finds talkativeness a disease very difficult and hard to cure. For its remedy, conversation, requires hearers: but talkative people hear nobody, for they are ever prating. And the first evil this inability to keep silence produces is an inability to listen.—Plutarch.

When I think of talking, it is of course with a woman: for, talking at its best being an inspiration, it wants a corresponding divine quality of receptiveness, and where will you find this but in woman?—O. W. Holmes.

Give not thy tongue too great liberty, lest it take thee prisoner. A word unspoken is like a sword in the scabbard, thine; if vented, thy sword is in another's hand. If thou desire to be held wise, be so wise as to hold thy tongue.—Quarles.

Depend upon it, if a man talks of his misfortunes, there is something in them that is not disagreeable to him; for where there is nothing but pure misery, there never is any recourse to the mention of it.—Johnson.

There is such a torture, happily unknown to ancient tyranny, as talking a man to death. Marcus Aurelius advises to assent readily to great talkers—in hopes, I suppose, to put an end to the argument.—Sterne.

Does a man speak foolishly?—suffer him gladly, for you are wise. Does he speak erroneously?—stop such a man's mouth with sound words that cannot be gainsaid. Does he speak truly?—rejoice in the truth.—Oliver Cromwell.

The man who talks everlastingly and promiscuously, who seems to have an exhaustless magazine of sound, crowds so many words into his thoughts that he always obscures, and very frequently conceals them.—Washington Irving.

If thy words be too luxuriant, confine them, lest they confine thee; he that thinks he never can speak enough may easily speak too much. A full tongue and an empty brain are seldom parted.—Quarles.

It has been well observed that the tongue discovers the state of the mind no less than that of the body; but in either case, before the philosopher or the physician can judge, the patient must open his mouth.—Colton.

The ear and the eye are the mind's receivers; but the tongue is only busy in expending the treasures received. If, therefore, the revenues of the mind be uttered as fast or faster than they are received, it must needs be bare, and can never lay up for purchase.—Bishop Hall.

If any man think it a small matter, or of mean concernment, to bridle his tongue, he is much mistaken; for it is a point to be silent when occasion requires, and better than to speak, though never so well.—Plutarch.

This I always religiously observed, as a rule, never to chide my husband before company nor to prattle abroad of miscarriages at home. What passes between two people is much easier made up than when once it has taken air.—Erasmus.

Brisk talkers are usually slow thinkers. There is, indeed, no wild beast more to be dreaded than a communicative man having nothing to communicate. If you are civil to the voluble they will abuse your patience; if brusque, your character.—Swift.

To hear him (Emerson) talk was like watching one crossing a brook on stepping-stones. His noun had to wait for its verb or its adjective until he was ready; then his speech would come down upon the word he wanted, and not Worcester nor Webster could better it from all the wealth of their huge vocabularies.—O. W. Holmes.

Talk often, but never long; in that case, if you do not please, at least you are sure not to tire your hearers. Pay your own reckoning, but do not treat the whole company; this being one of the few cases in which people do not care to be treated, every one being fully convinced that he has wherewithal to pay.—Lord Chesterfield.

The common fluency of speech in many men, and most women, is owing to a scarcity of matter and a scarcity of words; for whosoever is a master of language, and hath a mind full of ideas, will be apt, in speaking, to hesitate upon the choice of both.—Swift.

Writing or printing is like shooting with a rifle; you may hit your reader's mind, or miss it—but talking is like playing at a mark with the pipe of an engine; if it is within reach, and you have time enough, you can't help hitting it.—Holmes.

Think you a little din can daunt mine ears? Have I not in my time heard lions roar? * * * Have I not heard great ordnance in the field, and heaven's artillery thunder in the skies? * * * And do you tell me of a woman's tongue, that gives not half so great a blow to hear as will a chestnut in a farmer's fire?—Shakespeare.

Great knowledge, if it be without vanity, is the most severe bridle of the tongue. For so have I heard that all the noises and prating of the pool, the croaking of frogs and toads, is hushed and appeased upon the instant of bringing upon them the light of a candle or torch. Every beam of reason and ray of knowledge checks the dissolutions of the tongue.—Jeremy Taylor.

His talk was like a stream which runs
With rapid change from rock to roses;
It slipped from politics to puns;
It passed from Mahomet to Moses;
Beginning with the laws that keep
The planets in their radiant courses,
And ending with some precept deep
For dressing eels or shoeing horses.

—Præd.

It may be glorious to write Thoughts that shall glad the two or three High souls, like those far stars that come in sight
Once in a century;—
But better far it is to speak
One simple word, which now and then
Shall waken their free nature in the weak
And friendless sons of men.
—James Russell Lowell.

It has been said in praise of some men, that they could talk whole hours together upon anything; but it must be owned to the honor of the other sex that there are many among them who can talk whole hours together upon nothing. I have known a woman branch out into a long extempore dissertation on the edging of a petticoat, and chide her servant for breaking a china cup, in all the figures of rhetoric.—Addison.

And we talk'd—oh, how we talk'd! her voice so cadenc'd in the talking,
Made another singing—of the soull a music without bars—
While the leafy sounds of woodlands, humming round where we were walking,
Brought interposition worthy—sweet,—as skies about the stars,
And she spake such good thoughts natural, as if she always thought them.

—Miss Barrett.

Talkers and futile persons are commonly vain and credulous withal, for he that talketh what he knoweth will also talk what he knoweth not; therefore set it down that a habit of secrecy is both politic and moral: and in this part it is good, that a man's face gives his tongue leave to speak; for the discovery of a man's self by the tracts of his countenance is a great weakness, and betraying by how much it is many times more marked and believed than a man's words.—Bacon.

Taste

Taste is the next gift to genius.—Lowell.

Bad taste is a species of bad morals.—Bovee.

Good taste rejects excessive nicety.—Fénelon.

Taste has never been corrupted by simplicity.—Joubert.

The finer impulse of our nature.—Schiller.

All our tastes are but reminiscences.—Lamartine.

Good taste is the flower of good sense.—Poincelot.

A person is well dressed when dressed in good taste.—Mme. de Sartory.

Taste is to literature what bon ton is in society.—Mme. de Staël.

A taste which plenty does deprave loathes lawful goods, and lawless ill does crave.—Dryden.

We taste the fragrance of the rose.
—Akenside.

For age but tastes of pleasures
youth devours.—Dryden.

Taste is improved by cultivation.—
Willmott.

Taste is often one of the aspects of fashion.—Willmott.

Taste is the mind's tact.—De Bouf-fiers.

Good taste consists first upon fitness.—George William Curtis.

Taste and good-nature are universally connected.—Shenstone.

The cause of a wrong taste is a defect of judgment.—Burke.

Taste is pursued at a less expense than fashion.—Shenstone.

Mock jewelry on a woman is tangible vulgarity.—Bayard Taylor.

My tastes are aristocratic; my actions democratic.—Victor Hugo.

A good taste is often unconscious;
a just taste is always conscious.—
Mrs. Jameson.

Taste is something quite different from fashion, superior to fashion.—
Thackeray.

Talk what you will of taste, my friend, you'll find two of a face as soon as of a mind.—Pope.

Mistaking taste for genius is the rock on which thousands have split.
—J. T. Headley.

Good taste comes more from the judgment than from the mind.—
Rochevoucauld.

I wish you all sorts of prosperity, with a little more taste.—Le Sage.

A truly elegant taste is generally accompanied with an excellency of heart.—Fielding.

Taste is, so to speak, the microscope of judgment.—Rousseau.

Taste consists in the power of judging; genius, in the power of executing.—Blair.

A man loves the meat in his youth that he cannot endure in his age.—
Shakespeare.

The instability of our tastes is the occasion of the irregularity of our lives.—Stanislaus.

They never taste who always drink;
They always talk who never think.
—Prior.

Taste depends upon those finer emotions which make the organization of the soul.—Sir J. Reynolds.

A well-dressed woman in a room should fill it with poetic sense, like the perfume of flowers.—Miss Oakey.

Men more easily renounce their interests than their tastes.—Rochevou-cauld.

Taste, that eternal wanderer, which flies
From head to ears, and now from ears to eyes. —Pope.

Perfect taste is the faculty of receiving the greatest possible pleasure from those material sources which are attractive to our moral nature in its purity and perfection.—Ruskin.

It seems with wit and good-nature,
Utrum horum mavis accipe. Taste and good-nature are universally connected.—Shenstone.

Taste is the power of relishing or rejecting whatever is offered for the entertainment of the imagination.—
Goldsmith.

Our purity of taste is best tested by its universality, for if we can only admire this thing or that, we may be sure that our cause for liking is of a finite and false nature.—Ruskin.

I have heard of some kind of men that put quarrels purposely on others, to taste their valor.—Shakespeare.

Nothing is so improving to the temper as the study of the beauties either of poetry, eloquence, music, or painting.—Hume.

Fine taste is an aspect of genius itself, and is the faculty of delicate appreciation, which makes the best effects of art our own.—N. P. Willis.

Delicacy of taste has the same effect as delicacy of passion; it enlarges the sphere both of our happiness and our misery.—Hume.

It is genius that brings into being, and it is taste that preserves. Without taste genius is nought but sublime folly.—Chateaubriand.

Good taste cannot supply the place of genius in literature, for the best proof of taste, when there is no genius, would be, not to write at all.—Mme. de Staël.

For the perception of the beautiful we have the term "taste"—a metaphor taken from that which is passive in the body and transferred to that which is active in the mind.—Thomas Reid.

A cultivated taste increases sensibility to all the tender and humane passions by giving them frequent exercise, while it tends to weaken the more violent and fierce emotions.—Blair.

It is not strange to me that persons of the fair sex should like, in all things about them, the handsomeness for which they find themselves most liked.—Boyle.

Few women have both taste and truth; and indeed, this special bit of moral mosaic is just the most difficult piece of carpentry in the whole of the human workshop.—E. Lynn Linton.

Women always show more taste in adorning others than themselves; and the reason is that their persons are like their hearts—they read another's better than they can their own.—Richter.

A lady of genius will give a genteel air to her whole dress by a well-fancied suit of knots, as a judicious writer gives a spirit to a whole sentence by a single expression.—Gay.

I think I may define it to be that faculty of the soul which discerns the beauties of an author with pleasure, and the imperfections with dislike.—Addison.

A fastidious taste is like a squeamish appetite; the one has its origin in some disease of the mind, as the other has in some ailment of the stomach.—Southey.

Taste is, in general, considered as that faculty of the human mind by which we perceive and enjoy whatever is beautiful or sublime in the works of nature or art.—Sir A. Alison.

There may be something petty in a refined taste; it easily degenerates into effeminacy. It does not consider the broadest use. It is not content with simple good and bad, and so is fastidious and curious or nice only.—Thoreau.

A delicacy of taste is favorable to love and friendship, by confining our choice to few people, and making us indifferent to the company and conversation of the greater part of men.—Hume.

For what has Virro painted, built, and planted?
Only to show how many tastes he wanted.
What brought Sir Visto's ill-got wealth to waste?
Some demon whispered, "Visto! have a taste."
—Pope.

We imperatively require a perception of and a homage to beauty in our companions. Other virtues are in request in the field and workyard, but a certain degree of taste is not to be spared in those we sit with.—Emerson.

May not taste be compared to that exquisite sense of the bee, which instantly discovers and extracts the quintessence of every flower, and disregards all the rest of it?—Lord Greville.

It is known that the taste—whatever it is—is improved exactly as we improve our judgment, by extending our knowledge, by a steady attention to our object, and by frequent exercise.—Burke.

Good native Taste, tho' rude, is seldom wrong,
Be it in music, painting, or in song:
But this, as well as other faculties,
Improves with age and ripens by degrees.
—Armstrong.

True taste is forever growing, learning, reading, worshipping, laying its hand upon its mouth because it is astonished, casting its shoes from off its feet because it finds all ground holy.—Ruskin.

In art there is a point of perfection, as of goodness or maturity in nature: he who is able to perceive it, and who loves it, has perfect taste; he who does not feel it, or loves on this side or that, has an imperfect taste.—Bruyère.

It is for the most part in our skill in manners, and in the observations of time and place and of decency in general, that what is called taste by way of distinction consists; and which is in reality no other than a more refined judgment.—Burke.

'Tis chiefly taste, or blunt, or gross, or fine,
Makes life insipid, bestial, or divine.
Better be born with taste to little rent
Than the dull monarch of a continent;
Without this bounty which the gods bestow,
Can Fortune make one favorite happy?
No.
—Armstrong.

Taste and elegance, though they are reckoned only among the smaller and secondary morals, yet are of no mean importance in the regulation of life. A moral taste is not of force to turn vice into virtue; but it recommends virtue with something like the blandishments of pleasure.—Burke.

There are some readers who have never read an essay on taste; and if they take my advice they never will, for they can no more improve their taste by so doing than they could improve their appetite or digestion by studying a cookery-book.—Southey.

Talent, taste, wit, good sense, are very different things, but by no means incompatible. Between good sense and good taste there exists the same difference as between cause and effect, and between wit and talent there is the same proportion as between a whole and its parts.—Bruyère.

If it were only that people have diversities of taste, that is reason enough for not attempting to shape them all after one model. But different persons also require different conditions for their spiritual development, and can no more exist healthily in the same moral, than all the varieties of plants can in the same physical, atmosphere and climate.—J. Stuart Mill.

A good taste in art feels the presence or the absence of merit; a just taste discriminates the degree—the poco più and the poco meno.—A good taste rejects faults; a just taste selects excellences. A good taste is often unconscious; a just taste is always conscious. A good taste may be lowered or spoilt; a just taste can only go on refining more and more.—Mrs. Jameson.

What, then, is taste, but those internal powers, active and strong, and feelingly alive to each fine impulse? a discerning sense of decent and sublime, with quick disgust from things deformed, or disarranged, or gross in species? This, nor gems, nor stores of gold, nor purple state, nor culture, can bestow, but God alone when first his sacred hand imprints the secret bias of the soul.—Akenside.

It is that faculty by which we discover and enjoy the beautiful, the picturesque, and the sublime in literature, art, and nature; which recognizes a noble thought, as a virtuous mind welcomes a pure sentiment by an involuntary glow of satisfaction. But while the principle of perception is inherent in the soul, it requires a certain amount of knowledge to draw out and direct it.—Willmott.

Taste, when once obtained, may be said to be no acquiring faculty, and must remain stationary; but knowledge is of perpetual growth and has infinite demands. Taste, like an artificial canal, winds through a beautiful country, but its borders are confined and its term is limited. Knowledge navigates the ocean, and is perpetually on voyages of discovery.—Disraeli.

Taste is not stationary. It grows every day, and is improved by cultivation, as a good temper is refined by religion. In its most advanced state it takes the title of judgment. Hume quotes Fontenelle's ingenious distinction between the common watch that tells the hours, and the delicately constructed one that marks the seconds and smallest differences of time.—Willmott.

True purity of taste is a quality of the mind; it is a feeling which can, with little difficulty, be acquired by the refinement of intelligence; whereas purity of manners is the result of wise habits, in which all the interests of the soul are mingled and in harmony with the progress of intelligence. That is why the harmony of good taste and of good manners is more common than the existence of taste without manners, or of manners without taste.—Ræderer.

Taste, if it mean anything but a paltry connoisseurship, must mean a general susceptibility to truth and nobleness, a sense to discern, and a heart to love and reverence all beauty, order, goodness, wheresoever, or in whatsoever forms and accompaniments they are to be seen. This surely implies, as its chief condition, not any given external rank or situation, but a finely-gifted mind, purified into harmony with itself, into keenness and justness of vision; above all, kindled into love and generous admiration.—Carlyle.

Tattling

The tongue is the worst part of a bad servant.—Juvenal.

Fire and sword are but slow engines of destruction in comparison with the babbler.—Steele.

We acknowledge that we should not talk of our wives; but we seem not to know that we should talk still less of ourselves.—Rochefoucauld.

Yet have I ever heard it said that spies and tale-bearers have done more mischief in this world than poisoned bowl or the assassin's dagger.—Schiller.

Who ever keeps an open ear
For tattlers, will be sure to hear
The trumpet of contention;
Aspersions is the babblers' trade,
To listen is to lend him aid,
And rush into dissension. —Cowper.

I will be silent and barren of discourse when I chance to hear a tale, rather than go with child therewith, till another's ears be my midwife, to deliver me of such a deformed monster. I may hear a tale of delight, and perhaps smile at an innocent jest; I will not jest nor joy at a tale disgracing an innocent person.—Arthur Warwick.

Be careful that you believe not hastily strange news and strange stories; and be much more careful that you do not report them, though at the second hand; for if it prove an untruth (as commonly strange stories prove so), it brings an imputation of levity upon him that reports it, and possibly some disadvantage to others.—Sir Matthew Hale.

Merrily and wittily said Plantus, who was one of the merry wits of his time, "I would," said he, "by my will have tale-bearers and tale-hearsers punished—the one hanging by the tongue, the other by the ears." Were his will a law in force with us, many a tattling gossip would have her vowels turned to mutes, and be justly tongued, that desires to be tied by the teeth at your table.—Arthur Warwick.

Tavern

A tavern is the throne of human felicity.—Johnson.

Shall I not take mine ease in mine inn?—Shakespeare.

There is nothing which has yet been contrived by man, by which so much happiness is produced as by a good tavern or inn.—Johnson.

He who has not been at a tavern knows not what a paradise it is. O holy tavern! O miraculous tavern!—holy, because no carking cares are there, nor weariness, nor pain: and miraculous, because of the spits, which of themselves turn round and round!—Aretino.

Taxes

Taxation is the legitimate support of government.—Thiers.

Death and taxes are inevitable.—Haliburton.

Kings ought to shear, not skin their sheep.—Herrick.

Millions for defence, but not a cent for tribute.—Charles Coatesworth Pinckney.

No laws, however liberal, will release us from our self-imposed taxes.—Abbott Lawrence.

Who nothing has to lose, the war bewails;
And he who nothing pays, at taxes rails.
—Congreve.

Idleness and pride tax with a heavier hand than kings and parliaments.—Franklin.

Men's virtues I have commended as freely as I have taxed their crimes.—Dryden.

Men who prefer any load of infamy, however great, to any pressure of taxation, however light.—Sydney Smith.

We have always considered taxes to be the sinews of the state.—Cicero.

Over-taxation cost England her colonies of North America.—Burke.

The taxes of government are heavy enough, but not so heavy as the taxes we lay upon ourselves.—Dewey.

The law takes measure of us all for clothes, Diets us all, and in the sight of all, To keep us from all private leagues with wealth.
—Crown.

These exactions whereof my sovereign would have note, they are most pestilent to the hearing; and, to bear 'em, the back is sacrifice to the load.—Shakespeare.

Taxes are a universal burden in moral as well as in civil life. There is not a pleasure, social or otherwise, which is not assessed by fate at its full value!—Alfred de Musset.

The repose of nations cannot be secure without arms, armies cannot be maintained without pay, nor can the pay be produced except by taxes.—Tacitus.

By heaven, I had rather coin my heart,
And drop my blood for drachmas, than to wring
From the hard hands of peasants their vile trash,
By any indirection.
—Shakespeare.

The general rule always holds good. In constitutional states liberty is a compensation of the heaviness of taxation. In despotic states the equivalent for liberty is the lightness of taxation.—Montesquieu.

Taxing is an easy business. Any projector can contrive new impositions, any bungler can add to the old; but is it altogether wise to have no other bounds to your impositions than the patience of those who are to bear them?—Burke.

We must not rend our subjects from our laws, and stick them in our will. Sixth part of each? A trembling contribution! Why, we take from every tree lop, bark, and part o' the timber; and though we leave it with a root thus hacked, the air will drink the sap.—Shakespeare.

That in, which every man is interested, is every man's duty to support; and any burden which falls equally on all men, and from which every man is to receive an equal benefit, is consistent with the most perfect ideas of liberty.—Thomas Paine.

Why tribute? why should we pay tribute? if Cæsar can hide the sun from us with a Blanket, or put the moon in his pocket, We will pay him tribute for light; else, sir, No more tribute. —Shakespeare.

There is one passage in the Scriptures to which all the potentates of Europe seem to have given their unanimous assent and approbation, and to have studied so thoroughly as to have it quite at their fingers' ends: "There went out a decree in the days of Claudius Cæsar, that all the world should be taxed."—Colton.

The taxes were indeed very heavy, and if those laid on by the government were the only ones we had to pay, we might more easily discharge them; but we have many others, and much more grievous to some of us. We are taxed twice as much by our idleness, three times as much by our pride, and four times as much by our folly; and from these taxes the commissioners cannot ease or deliver us, by allowing an abatement.—Franklin.

What is 't to us, if taxes rise or fall,
Thanks to our fortune, we pay none at all.
Let muckworms who in dirty acres deal, Lament those hardships which we cannot feel,
His grace who smarts, may bellow if he please,
But must I bellow too, who sit at ease?
By custom safe, the poets' numbers flow,
Free as the light and air some years ago.
No statesman e'er will find it worth his pains
To tax our labours, and excise our brains.
Burthens like these will earthly buildings
bear,
No tributes laid on castles in the air.
—Churchill.

What a benefit would the American government, not yet relieved of its extreme need, render to itself, and to every city, village, and hamlet in the States, if it would tax whiskey and rum almost to the point of prohibition! Was it Bonaparte who said that he found vices very good patriots? "He got five millions from the love of brandy, and he should be glad to know which of the virtues would pay him as much." Tobacco and opium have broad backs, and will cheerfully carry the load of armies, if you choose to make them pay high for such joy as they give and such harm as they do.—Emerson.

Tea

To warm without heating, to cheer but not inebriate.—Bishop Berkeley.

And sip with nymphs their elemental tea.—Pope.

Matrons, who toss the cup, and see
The grounds of fate in grounds of tea.
—Churchill.

Tea does our fancy aid,
Repress those vapours which the head invade
And keeps that palace of the soul serene.
—Edmund Waller.

The ship from Ceylon, Inde, or far Cathay, unloads for him the fragrant produce of each trip.—Byron.

Thank God for tea! What would the world do without tea? how did it exist? I am glad I was not born before tea.—Sydney Smith.

Here, thou, great Anna! whom three realms
obey,
Dost sometimes counsel take--and sometimes tea. —Pope.

The gentle fair on nervous tea relies, Whilst gay good-nature sparkles in her
eyes;
An inoffensive scandal fluttering round,
Too rough to tickle, and too light to wound.
—Crabbe.

Tea! thou soft, thou sober, sage,
and venerable liquid;—thou female tongue—running, smile-smoothing, heart-opening, wink-tipling cordial, to whose glorious insipidity I owe the happiest moment of my life, let me fall prostrate.—Colley Cibber.

Indeed, Madam, your ladyship is very sparing of your tea: I protest

the last I took was no more than water bewitched.—Swift.

And afterwards I did send for a cup of tee (a China drink), of which I never had drunk before.—Pepys.

Teaching

The school is the manufactory of humanity.—Comenius.

The sounding jargon of the schools.—Cowper.

Teach the art of living well.—Seneca.

Education is our only political safety.—Horace Mann.

Teachers should be held in highest honor.—Mrs. Sigourney.

Teach erring man to spurn the rage of gain.—Goldsmith.

He who honestly instructs reverences God.—Mohammed.

What's all the noisy jargon of the schools?—Pomfret.

None can teach admirably if not loving his task.—A. Bronson Alcott.

We'll set thee to school to an ant, to teach thee there's no labouring i' the winter.—Shakespeare.

Men must be taught as though you taught them not.—Pope.

Whilst that the childe is young, let him be instructed in vertue and lytterature.—Lyly.

Whetstones are not themselves able to cut, but make iron sharp and capable of cutting.—Isocrates.

The one exclusive sign of a thorough knowledge is the power of teaching.—Aristotle.

The temper of the pedagogue suits not with the age; and the world, however it may be taught, will not be tutored.—Shaftesbury.

If ever I am an instructress, it will be to learn more than to teach.—Madame Deluzy.

Experience teaches slowly, and at the cost of mistakes.—Froude.

Public instruction should be the first object of government.—Napoleon I.

The teacher is like the candle which lights others in consuming itself.—Ruffini.

It is a luxury to learn; but the luxury of learning is not to be compared with the luxury of teaching.—Roswell D. Hitchcock.

You cannot, by all the lecturing in the world, enable a man to make a shoe.—Dr. Johnson.

The growth of the intellect is strictly analogous in all individuals.—Emerson.

Tutors should behave reverently before their pupils.—L'Estrange.

You cannot teach a man anything; you can only help him to find it within himself.—Galileo.

I do present you with a man of mine, Cunning in music and the mathematics, To instruct her fully in those sciences.—Shakespeare.

A true teacher should penetrate to whatever is vital in his pupil, and develop that by the light and heat of his own intelligence.—E. P. Whipple.

A teacher who is attempting to teach without inspiring the pupil with a desire to learn is hammering on cold iron.—Horace Mann.

Garden work consists much more in uprooting weeds than in planting seed. This applies also to teaching.—Auerbach.

It is a good divine that follows his own instructions; I can easier teach twenty what were good to be done, than to be one of the twenty to follow mine own teachings.—Shakespeare.

Though one devote himself to many teachers, he must extract the essence, as the bee from the flower.—Kassila.

Worried and tormented into monotonous feebleness, the best part of his life ground out of him in a mill of boys.—Dickens.

How shall he give kindling in whose own inward man there is no live coal, but all is burnt out to a dead grammatical cinder?—Carlyle.

A teacher should, above all things, first induce a desire in the pupil for the acquisition he wishes to impart.—Horace Mann.

The authority of those who teach is very often an impediment to those who desire to learn.—Cicero.

The best teacher is the one who suggests rather than dogmatizes, and inspires his listener with the wish to teach himself.—Bulwer-Lytton.

To sentence a man of true genius to the drudgery of a school is to put a race-horse in a mill.—Colton.

There is nothing more frightful than for a teacher to know only what his scholars are intended to know.—Goethe.

Attempt to teach the young but little at a time; this will be easier to impart, easier to receive, and surer to be retained.—Hosea Ballou.

Be understood in thy teaching, and instruct to the measure of capacity; precepts and rules are repulsive to a child, but happy illustration winneth him.—Tupper.

Those who educate children well are more to be honored than they who produce them; for these only gave them life, those the art of living well.—Aristotle.

Passionate words or blows from the tutor fill the child's mind with terror and affrightment, which immediately takes it wholly up and leaves no room for other impressions.—Locke.

It is a pity that, commonly, more care is had—yea, and that among very wise men—to find out rather a cunning man for their horse than a cunning man for their children.—Roger Ascham.

Instructors should not only be skilful in those sciences which they teach, but have skill in the method of teaching, and patience in the practice.—Dr. Watts.

Do not allow your daughters to be taught letters by a man, though he be a St. Paul or St. Francis of Assisium. The saints are in Heaven.—Bishop Liguori.

A good schoolmaster minces his precepts for children to swallow, hanging clogs on the nimbleness of his own soul, that his scholars may go along with him.—Fuller.

It would be a great advantage to some schoolmasters if they would steal two hours a day from their pupils and give their own minds the benefit of the robbery.—J. F. Boyes.

Education of youth is not a bow for every man to shoot in that counts himself a teacher; but will require sinews almost equal to those which Homer gave to Ulysses.—Milton.

In the education of children there is nothing like alluring the appetites and affection; otherwise you make so many asses laden with books.—Montaigne.

Full well they laughed, with counterfeited glee,
At all his jokes, for many a joke had he;
Full well the busy whisper, circling round,
Convey'd the dismal tidings when he frown'd.
—Goldsmith.

Schoolmasters will I keep within my house,
Fit to instruct her youth.
* * * To cunning men
I will be very kind, and liberal
To mine own children in good bringing up.
—Shakespeare.

If, in instructing a child, you are vexed with it for a want of adroitness, try, if you have never tried before, to write with your left hand, and then remember that a child is all left hand.

—J. F. Boyes.

There is no teaching until the pupil is brought into the same state or principle in which you are; a transfusion takes place; he is you, and you are he; there is a teaching; and by no unfriendly chance or bad company can he ever quite lose the benefit.—Emerson.

Do not, then, train boys to learning by force and harshness; but direct them to it by what amuses their minds, so that you may be the better able to discover with accuracy the peculiar bent of the genius of each.—Plato.

It is the duty of a man of honor to teach others the good which he has not been able to do himself because of the malignity of the times, that this good finally can be done by another more loved in heaven.—Machiavelli.

It is by the promulgation of sound morals in the community, and more especially by the training and instruction of the young, that woman performs her part towards the preservation of free government.—Daniel Webster.

Men want to be reminded, who do not want to be taught; because those original ideas of rectitude to which the mind is compelled to assent when they are proposed, are not always as present to us as they ought to be.—Burke.

Count it one of the highest virtues upon earth to educate faithfully the children of others, which so few, and scarcely any, do by their own.—Luther.

All preceptors should have that kind of genius described by Tacitus, "equal to their business, but not above it;" a patient industry, with competent erudition; a mind depending more on its correctness than its originality, and on its memory rather than on its invention.—Colton.

Delightful task! to rear the tender thought, to teach the young idea how to shoot, to pour the fresh instruction over the mind, to breathe the enlivening spirit, and to fix the generous purpose in the glowing breast.—Thomson.

To know how to suggest is the great art of teaching. To attain it we must be able to guess what will interest; we must learn to read the childish soul as we might a piece of music. Then, by simply changing the key, we keep up the attraction and vary the song.—Amiel.

Improvement depends far less upon length of tasks and hours of application than is supposed. Children can take in but a little each day; they are like vases with a narrow neck; you may pour little or pour much, but much will not enter at a time.—Michelet.

Unless a woman has a decided pleasure and facility in teaching, an honest knowledge of everything she professes to impart, a liking for children, and, above all, a strong moral sense of her responsibility towards them, for her to attempt to enroll herself in the scholastic order is absolute profanation.—Miss Mulock.

For my part, I am convinced that the method of teaching which approaches most nearly to the method of investigation is incomparably the best; since, not content with serving up a few barren and lifeless truths, it leads to the stock on which they grew.—Burke.

Who'er excels in what we prize,
Appears a hero in our eyes;
Each girl, when pleased with what is taught,
Will have the teacher in her thought.

A blockhead with melodious voice,
In boarding-schools may have his choice.
—Swift.

'Tis pleasing to be school'd in a strange tongue
By female lips and eyes—that is, I mean,
When both the teacher and the taught are young,
As was the case, at least, where I have been;
They smile so when one's right; and when one's wrong
They smile still more. —Byron.

Teachers should be held in the highest honor. They are the allies of legislators; they have agency in the prevention of crime; they aid in regulating the atmosphere, whose incessant action and pressure cause the life-blood to circulate, and to return pure and healthful to the heart of the nation.—Mrs. Sigourney.

O ye! who teach the ingenious youth of nations,
Holland, France, England, Germany or Spain,
I pray ye flog them upon all occasions,
It mends their morals, never mind the pain.
—Byron.

Go to the place where the thing you wish to know is native; your best teacher is there. Where the thing you wish to know is so dominant that you must breathe its very atmosphere, there teaching is most thorough, and learning is most easy. You acquire a language most readily in the country where it is spoken; you study mineralogy best among miners; and so with everything else.—Goethe.

A tutor should not be continually thundering instruction into the ears of his pupil, as if he were pouring it through a funnel, but, after having put the lad, like a young horse, on a trot, before him, to observe his paces, and see what he is able to perform, should, according to the extent of his capacity, induce him to taste, to distinguish, and to find out things for himself; sometimes opening the way, at other times leaving it for him to open; and by abating or increasing his own pace, accommodate his precepts to the capacity of his pupil.—Montaigne.

Grave is the Master's look; his forehead wears Thick rows of wrinkles, prints of worrying cares;
Uneasy lies the heads of all that rule,
His worst of all whose kingdom is a school.
Supreme he sits; before the awful frown
That binds his brows the boldest eye goes down;
Not more submissive Israel heard and saw
At Sinai's foot the Giver of the Law.
—O. W. Holmes.

Tears

Tears are the silent language of grief.—Voltaire.

More tears are shed in playhouses than in churches.—Guthrie.

Tears are due to human misery.—Virgil.

Tears may soothe the wounds they cannot heal.—Thomas Paine.

Nature's tears are reason's merri-ment.—Shakespeare.

The tears of penitents are the wine of angels.—St. Bernard.

Eye-offending brine.—Shakespeare.

Like Niobe, all tears.—Shakespeare.

Every tear is a verse, and every heart is a poem.—Marc André.

And weep the more, because I weep in vain.—Gray.

Love is loveliest when embalmed in tears.—Walter Scott.

The April is in her eyes; it is love's spring, and these the showers to bring it on.—Shakespeare.

The tear of joy is a pearl of the first water; the mourning tear, only of the second.—Richter.

All the rarest hues of human life take radiance and are rainbowed out in tears.—Massey.

Friends, I owe more tears to this dead man than you shall see me pay.—Shakespeare.

We often shed tears which deceive ourselves after having deceived others.—Rochefoucauld.

The safety-valves of the heart, when too much pressure is laid on.—Albert Smith.

Man is the weeping animal born to govern all the rest.—Pliny.

The graceful tear that streams for others' woes.—Akenside.

Scorn the proud man that is ashamed to weep.—Young.

Weep for love, but not for anger; a cold rain will never bring flowers.—Duncan.

After his blood, that which a man can next give out of himself is a tear.—Lamartine.

Tears of joy, like summer rain-drops, are pierced by sunbeams.—Hosea Ballou.

Shame on those breasts of stone that cannot melt in soft adoption of another's sorrow.—Aaron Hill.

Every tear of sorrow sown by the righteous springs up a pearl.—Matthew Henry.

The waiting tears stood ready for command, and now they flow to varnish the false tale.—Rowe.

So bright the tear in Beauty's eye,
Love half regrets to kiss it dry.

—Byron.

How much better is it to weep at joy than to joy at weeping!—Jane Porter.

Believe these tears, which from my wounded heart bleed at my eyes.—Dryden.

O, let not woman's weapons, water-drops, stain my man's cheeks!—Shakespeare.

Let me wipe off this honorable dew, that silvery doth progress on thy cheeks.—Shakespeare.

See, see what showers arise,
Blown with the windy tempest of my heart.
—Shakespeare.

In youth, one has tears without grief; in age, griefs without tears.—Joseph Roux.

Tears are often to be found where there is little sorrow, and the deepest sorrow without any tears.—Johnson.

Tears harden lust, though marble wear with raining.—Shakespeare.

I can approve of those only who seek in tears for happiness.—Pascal.

Tears are the tribute of humanity to its destiny.—W. K. Alger.

O, banish the tears of children!
Continual rains upon the blossoms are hurtful.—Richter.

There is something so moving in the very image of weeping beauty.—
Steele.

He has strangled
His language in his tears.
—Shakespeare.

Trust not those cunning waters of his eyes, for villainy is not without such rheum.—Shakespeare.

Weeping may endure for a night,
but joy cometh in the morning.—Bible.

It is some relief to weep; grief is satisfied and carried off by tears.—
Ovid.

But woe awaits a country, when She sees the tears of bearded men.
—Scott.

Here tears and sighs speak his imperfect
moan,
In language far more moving than his own.—Cowley.

I could perceive with joy, a silent show'r Run down his silver beard.
—Lee.

O father, what a hell of witchcraft lies
In the small orb of one particular tear!
—Shakespeare.

All kin' o' smily round the lips
An' teary roun' the lashes.
—Lowell.

Devotion's self shall steal a thought from heaven,
One human tear shall drop, and be forgiven.—Pope.

Sweet tears! the awful language eloquent of infinite affection, far too big for words.—Pollok.

There is a tear for all who die,
A mourner o'er the humblest grave.
—Byron.

My tears must stop, for every drop Hinders needle and thread.—Hood.

Upon her cheeks she wept, and from those
showers
Sprang up a sweet nativity of flowers.
—Herrick.

Tears of joy are the dew in which the sun of righteousness is mirrored.
—Richter.

To me the meanest flower that blows can give Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears.—Wordsworth.

Thy heart is big; get thee apart and weep.
Passion, I see, is catching; for mine eyes,
Seeing those beads of sorrow stand in thine,
Begin to water.—Shakespeare.

The tide is now: nay, not thy tide of
tears,
That tide will stay me longer than should.—Shakespeare.

Her tears, like drops of molten lead,
With torment burn the passage to my heart.—Young.

To weep, is to make less the depth of grief;
Tears, then, for babes; blows and revenge for ac.—Shakespeare.

E'en like the passage of an angel's tear
That falls through the clear ether silently.
—Keats.

Accept these grateful tears! for thee they
flow,
For thee, that ever felt another's woe!
—Homer.

Those eyes of thine from mine have drawn salt tears:
Sham'd their aspects with store of childish drops.—Shakespeare.

Lofty mountains are full of springs;
great hearts are full of tears.—Joseph Roux.

Our present tears here, not our present
laughter
Are but the handbells of our joys hereafter.—Herrick.

Tears are nature's lotion for the eyes. The eyes see better for being washed with them.—Bovee.

By heavens, my love, thou dost distract my soul!
There's not a tear that falls from those
dear eyes,
But makes my heart weep blood.—Lee.

If that the earth could teem with woman's
tears,
Each drop she falls would prove a crocodile. —Shakespeare.

My plenteous joys,
Wanton in fullness, seek to hide themselves
In drops of sorrow. —Shakespeare.

I had not so much of man in me,
And all my mother came into mine eyes
And gave me up to tears.—Shakespeare.

None are so desolate but something dear,
Dearer than self, possesses or possess'd
A thought, and claims the homage of a tear. —Byron.

A smile is ever the most bright and beautiful with a tear upon it. What is the dawn without the dew? The tear is rendered by the smile precious above the smile itself.—Landor.

The cloudy weather melts at length into beauty, and the brightest smiles of the heart are born of its tears.—
Hosea Ballou.

I did not think to shed a tear
In all my miseries; but thou hast forc'd me,
Out of thy honest truth, to play the woman. —Shakespeare.

I cannot weep; for all my body's moisture Scarce serves to quench my furnace-burning heart. —Shakespeare.

The big round tears run down his dappled
face;
He groans in anguish. —Thomson.

I so lively acted with my tears
That my poor mistress, moved therewithal, Wept bitterly. —Shakespeare.

Yet tears to human suffering are due;
And mortal hopes defeated and o'erthrown
Are mourned by man, and not by man alone. —Wordsworth.

Hide not thy tears; weep boldly, and be proud to give the flowing virtue manly way; it is nature's mark to know an honest heart by.—Aaron Hill.

Tears are the natural penalties of pleasure. It is a law that we should pay for all that we enjoy.—Simms.

How sometimes nature will betray its folly, its tenderness, and make itself a pastime to harder bosoms!—
Shakespeare.

With sad unhelpful tears, and with dimm'd
eyes
Look after him and cannot do him good.
—Shakespeare.

And the tear that is wiped with a little address,
May be follow'd perhaps by a smile.
—Cowper.

It is delightful to kiss the eyelashes of the beloved,—is it not? But never so delightful as when fresh tears are on them.—Landor.

Nature confesses that she has bestowed on the human race hearts of softest mould, in that she has given us tears.—Juvenal.

Tears are the softening showers which cause the seed of heaven to spring up in the human heart.—Walter Scott.

Easy-crying widows take new husbands soonest; there is nothing like wet weather for transplanting.—
Holmes.

How many a holy and obsequious tear hath dear religious love stolen from mine eye, as interest of the dead!
—Shakespeare.

What I should say
My tears gainsay; for every word I speak,
Ye see, I drink the water of mine eyes.
—Shakespeare.

The sweet dew that lingered in her eye for pity's sake was—like an exhalation in the sun—dried and absorbed by love.—Barry Cornwall.

Those who are surly and imperious to their inferiors are generally humble, flattering, and cringing to their superiors.—Fuller.

The big round tears
Cours'd one another down his innocent nose
In piteous chase. —Shakespeare.

Why, man, if the river were dry, I am able to fill it with my tears: if the wind were down, I could drive the boat with my sighs.—Shakespeare.

So looks the lily after a shower, while drops of rain run gently down its silken leaves, and gather sweetness as they pass.—Fielding.

There she shook
The holy water from her heavenly eyes,
And clamour moisten'd.—Shakespeare.

That instant shut
My woeful self up in a mourning house,
Raining the tears of lamentation.
—Shakespeare.

What is the matter, that this dis-tempered messenger of wet, the many-colored Iris, rounds thine eye?—Shakespeare.

Then fresh tears
Stood on her cheeks, as doth the honeydew
Upon a gather'd lily almost wither'd.
—Shakespeare.

Down her cheeks flow'd the round drops:
And as we see the sun shine thro' a show'r,
So look'd her beauteous eyes,
Casting forth light and tears together.
—Lansdowne.

The tear down childhood's cheek that
flows,
Is like the dewdrop on the rose;
When next the summer breeze comes by,
And waves the bush, the flower is dry.
—Walter Scott.

Of all the portions of life it is in the two twilights, childhood and age, that tears fall with the most frequency; like the dew at dawn and eve.—W. R. Alger.

Tears, except as a private demonstration, are an ill-disguised expression of self-consciousness and vanity, which is inadmissible in good society.—Holmes.

O dear, dear Jeanie Morrison,
The thochts o' bygone years
Still fling their shadows ower my path,
And blind my een wi' tears.
—Wm. Motherwell.

Down she bent her head upon an arm so white that tears seemed but the natural melting of its snow, touched by the flushed cheek's crimson.—Mise L. E. Landon.

Pride dries the tears of anger and vexation; humility, those of grief. The one is indignant that we should suffer; the other calms us by the reminder that we deserve nothing else.—Madame Swetchine.

See yonder rock from which the fountain gushes; is it less compact of adamant, though waters flow from it? Firm hearts have moister eyes.—Walter Scott.

Hide thy tears,—I do not bid thee not to shed them,—it were easier to stop Euphrates at its source than one tear of a true and tender heart.—Byron.

The liquid drops of tears that you have shed
Shall come again, transform'd to orient
pearl,
Advantaging their loan with interest
Of ten times double gain of happiness.
—Shakespeare.

Heaven is not gone, but we are blind with
tears,
Groping our way along the downward slope of years! —R. H. Stoddard.

What gem hath dropp'd and sparkles o'er his chain?
The tear most sacred, shed for others' pain,
That starts at once—bright—pure—from pity's mine,
Already polished by the hand divine!
—Byron.

So bright the tear in Beauty's eye,
Love half regrets to kiss it dry;
So sweet the blush of Bashfulness,
Even Pity scarce can wish it less!
—Byron.

I wish'd but for a single tear,
As something welcome, new and dear,
I wish'd it then, I wish it still,
Despair is stronger than my will.—Byron.

When friendship or love our sympathies,
move,
When truth in a glance should appear,
The lips may beguile with a dimple or
smile,
But the test of affection's a tear.—Byron.

One, whose subdu'd eyes,
Albeit unused to the melting mood,
Drop tears as fast as the Arabian trees
Their medicinal gum. —Shakespeare.

Tears, O Aspasia, do not dwell long upon the cheeks of youth. Rain drops easily from the bud, rests on the bosom of the maturer flower, and breaks down that one only which hath lived its day.—Landon.

Oh! too convincing—dangerously dear—
In woman's eye the unanswerable tear!
That weapon of her weakness she can wield,
To save, subdue—at once her spear and shield.—Byron.

That very law which moulds a tear
And bids it trickle from its source,
That law preserves the earth a sphere,
And guides the planets in their course.—S. Rogers.

May no marble bestow the splendor of woe,
Which the children of vanity rear;
No fiction of fame shall blazon my name,
All I ask—all I wish—is a tear.—Byron.

Why wilt thou ever scare me with thy tears,
And make me tremble lest a saying learnt,
In days far-off, on that dark earth, be true?
The gods themselves cannot recall their gifts.—Tennyson.

She was a good deal shock'd; not shock'd at tears.
For women shed and use them at their liking;
But there is something when man's eye appears
Wet, still more disagreeable and striking.—Byron.

From his big heart o'ercharg'd with generous sorrow;
See the light working upward to his eye.
And stealing from him in large silent drops,
Without his leave.—Young.

And that same dew, which some time on the buds was wont to swell like round and orient pearls, stood now within the pretty floweret's eyes, like tears that did their own disgrace bewail.—Shakespeare.

As Rubens by one stroke converted a laughing into a crying child, so nature frequently makes this stroke in the original: a child's eye, like the sun, never draws water so readily as in the hot temperature of pleasure.—Richter.

There appears much joy in him, even so much that joy could not show itself modest enough without a badge of bitterness. A kind overflow of kindness,—there are no faces truer than those that are so washed.—Shakespeare.

Heaven and God are best discerned through tears; scarcely perhaps are discerned at all without them. The constant association of prayer with the hour of bereavement and the scenes of death suffice to show this.—James Martineau.

The good widow's sorrow is no storm, but a still rain; commonly it comes to pass that that grief is quickly emptied that streameth out at so large a vent, whilst their tears that but drop will hold running a long time.—Fuller.

I would hardly change the sorrowful words of the poets for their glad ones. Tears dampen the strings of the lyre, but they grow the tenser for it, and ring even the clearer and more ravishingly.—Lowell.

Tears, idle tears, I know not what they mean,—tears from the depth of some divine despair rise in the heart, and gather in the eyes, in looking on the happy autumn fields, and thinking of the days that are no more.—Tennyson.

Two aged men, that had been foes for life,
Met by a grave, and wept—and in those tears
They washed away the memory of their strife;
Then wept again the loss of all those years.—Frederick Tennyson.

How, thro' her tears, with pale and trembling radiance,
The eye of beauty shines, and lights her sorrows!
As rises o'er the storm some silver star.
The seaman's hope, and promise of his safety.—Francis.

Heav'n, that knows
The weakness of our natures, will forgive,
Nay, must applaud love's debt, when debt is paid:
Nor can the bravest mortal blame the tear
Which glitters on the bier of fallen worth.—Shirley.

There is a sacredness in tears. They are not the mark of weakness, but of power. They speak more eloquently than ten thousand tongues

They are the messengers of overwhelming grief, of deep contrition, and of unspeakable love.—Washington Irving.

I weep, 'tis true; but Machiavel, I swear They're tears of vengeance; drops of liquid fire!
So marble weeps, when flames surround the quarry,
And the pil'd oaks spout forth such scald-
ing bubbles,
Before the general blaze. —Lee.

A man is seldom more manly than when he is what you call unmanned,— the source of his emotion is championship, pity, and courage; the instinctive desire to cherish those who are innocent and unhappy, and defend those who are tender and weak.—
Thackeray.

And friends, dear friends,—when it shall
be
That this low breath is gone from me,
And round my bier ye come to weep,
Let One, most loving of you all,
Say, "Not a tear must o'er her fall;
He giveth His beloved sleep."
—E. B. Browning.

Her eye did seem to labour with a tear,
Which suddenly took birth, but over-
weigh'd
With its own weight, swelling, dropp'd upon her bosom,
Which, by reflection of her light, appear'd
As nature meant her sorrow for an ornament. —Shirley.

You have seen
Sunshine and rain at once: her smiles and
tears
Were like a better day: those happy smiles
That play'd on her ripe lip, seem'd not to know
What guests were in her eyes; which parted
thence,
As pearls from diamonds dropp'd.
—Shakespeare.

Thank God for grace,
Ye who weep only! If, as some have done,
Ye grope tear-blinded in a desert place And touch but tombs,—look up! Those tears will run
Soon in long rivers down the lifted face,
And leave the vision clear for stars and
sun. —E. B. Browning.

God made both tears and laughter, and both for kind purposes; for as laughter enables mirth and surprise to breathe freely, so tears enable sorrow to vent itself patiently. Tears hinder sorrow from becoming despair and madness; and laughter is one of the very privileges of reason, being confined to the human species.—Leigh Hunt.

Our funeral tears from different causes
rise:
Of various kinds they flow. From tender hearts,
By soft contagion call'd, some burst at once
And stream obsequious to the leading eye.
Some ask more time, by curious art distill'd.
Some hearts, in secret hard, unapt to melt,
Struck by the public eye, gush out again.
—Young.

The smile that illumines the features of beauty,
When kindled by virtue, alluring appears;
But smiles, tho' alluring, no magic can borrow,
To vie with the softness of beauty in tears.
The smiles that are sweetest are often deceiving;
Too often a mask which the cold-hearted
wears;
But a tear is the holiest offspring of feeling,
And monarchs are weak before beauty in tears. —Bohn.

No radiant pearl, which crested fortune
wears,
No gem, that twinkling hangs from beauty's ears;
Not the bright stars, which night's blue arch
adorn;
Nor rising sun that gilds the vernal morn;
Shine with such lustre as the tear, the
flows
Down virtue's manly cheek for others' woes. —Darwin.

I found her on the floor
In all the storm of grief; yet beautifull Sighing such a breath of sorrow, that her
lips,
Which late appear'd like buds, were now
o'er-blown!
Pouring forth tears, at such a lavish rate,
That were the world on fire, they might have drown'd
The wrath of heaven, and quench'd the mighty ruin. —Lee.

The glorious Angel, who was keeping
The gates of Light, beheld her weeping;
And, as he nearer drew and listen'd
To her sad song, a tear-drop glisten'd
Within his eyelids, like the spray
From Eden's fountain, where it lies
On the blue flow'r, which—Bramins say—Blooms nowhere but in Paradise.
—Moore.

Sooner mayest thou trust thy pocket to a pickpocket than give loyal friend ship to the man who boasts of eyes to which the heart never mounts in dew! Only when man weeps he should be alone, not because tears are weak, but they should be secret. Tears are akin to prayer,—Pharisees parade prayers, imposters parade tears.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Astronomers have built telescopes which can show myriads of stars unseen before; but when a man looks through a tear in his own eye, that is a lens which opens reaches in the unknown, and reveals orbs which no telescope, however skilfully constructed, could do; nay, which brings to view even the throne of God, and pierces that nebulous distance where are those eternal verities in which true life consists.—Beecher.

Tediousness

The sin of excessive length.—Shirley.

Wearisome nights are appointed to me.—Bible.

Oh, he is as tedious as a tired horse! —Shakespeare.

I stay too long by thee; I weary thee.—Shakespeare.

For not to irksome toil, but to delight, He made us.—Milton.

Pity only on fresh objects stays, but with the tedious sight of woes decays.—Dryden.

Life is as tedious as a twice-told tale, vexing the dull ear of a drowsy man.—Shakespeare.

Is there anything more tedious than the often repeated tales of the old and forgetful?—Colton.

A man would die, though he were neither valiant nor miserable, only upon a weariness to do the same thing so often over and over again.—Bacon.

Teeth

Such a pearly row of teeth, that sovereignty would have pawned her jewels for them.—Sterne.

Teeth, like falling snow
For white, were placed in a double row.
—Cowley.

Some ask'd how pearls did grow, and where?
Then spoke I to my girl,
To part her lips, and show'd them there
The quarrelets of Pearl.
—Herrick.

Temper

A sunny temper gilds the edges of life's blackest cloud.—Guthrie.

And mistress of herself though china fall.—Pope.

The happiness and misery of men depend no less on temper than fortune.—La Rochefoucauld.

In vain he seeketh others to suppress,
Who hath not learn'd himself first to subdue.
—Spenser.

But certain winds will make men's temper bad.—George Eliot.

Oh! blest with temper, whose unclouded ray
Can make to-morrow cheerful as to-day.
—Pope.

The difficult part of good temper consists in forbearance, and accommodation to the ill-humors of others.—Empson.

I'll make them live as brothers should with brother,
And keep them in good-humor with each other.
—Churchill.

Those who are surly and imperious to their inferiors, are generally humble, flattering, and cringing to their superiors.—Fuller.

The brain may devise laws for the blood; but a hot temper leaps o'er a cold decree: such a hare is madness, the youth, to skip o'er the meshes of good counsel, the cripple.—Shakespeare.

With "gentleness" in his own character, "comfort" in his house, and "good temper" in his wife, the earthly felicity of man is complete.—From the German.

Courtesy of temper, when it is used to veil churlishness of deed, is but a knight's girdle around the breast of a base clown.—Sir Walter Scott.

Nothing leads more directly to the breach of charity, and to the injury and molestation of our fellow-creatures than the indulgence of an ill temper.—Blair.

Through certain humors or passions, and from temper merely, a man may be completely miserable, let his outward circumstances be ever so fortunate.—Lord Shaftesbury.

Instability of temper ought to be checked when it disposes men to wander from one scheme to another; since such a fickleness cannot but be attended with fatal consequences.—Addison.

If we desire to live securely, comfortably, and quietly, that by all honest means we should endeavor to purchase the good will of all men, and provoke no man's enmity needlessly; since any man's love may be useful, and every man's hatred is dangerous.—Isaac Barrow.

A cheerful temper, joined with innocence, will make beauty attractive, knowledge delightful, and wit good natured. It will lighten sickness, poverty and affliction; convert ignorance into an amiable simplicity, and render deformity itself agreeable.—Addison.

Think you, a little din can daunt mine ears?

Have I not in my time heard lions roar?

Have I not heard the sea, puff'd up with winds,

Rage like an angry boar, chafed with sweat

Have I not heard great ordnance in the field,

And heaven's artillery thunder in the skies?

Have I not in a pitched battle heard

Loud 'larums, neighing steeds, and trumpets' clang

And do you tell me of a woman's tongue?

—Shakespeare.

Too many have no idea of the subjection of their temper to the influence of religion, and yet what is changed, if the temper is not? If a man is as passionate, malicious, resentful, sullen, moody, or morose after his conversion as before it, what is he converted from or to?—John Angell James.

Temperament

Temperament is the thermometer of character.—Balzac.

Women speak in the superlative.—Emile Souvestre.

Such is the active power of good temperament! Great sweetness of temper neutralizes such vast amounts of acid.—Emerson.

Temperament is wax before the human will and God. Natural traits are powerless before moral decisions.

The reason that women are so much more sociable than men is because they act more from the heart than the intellect.—Lamartine.

In love we do not think of moral qualities, and scarcely of intellectual ones. Temperament and manner alone, with beauty, excite love.—Hazlit.

Temperance

The universal medicine of life.—Sir W. Temple.

Temperance is the nurse of chastity.—Wycheley.

Temperance in everything is requisite for happiness.—B. R. Haydon.

Satan o'ercomes none but by wilfulness.—Herrick.

Temperance adds zest to pleasure.—Mme. de Lambert.

That cardinal virtue, temperance.—Burke.

Drinking water neither makes a man sick, nor in debt, nor his wife a widow.—John Neal.

Use, do not abuse; neither abstinence nor excess ever renders man happy.—Voltaire.

Temperance to be a virtue must be free, and not forced.—Bartol.

He who would keep himself to himself should imitate the dumb animals, and drink water.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Every inordinate cup is unblessed, and the ingredient is a devil.—Shakespeare.

In temperance there is ever cleanliness and elegance.—Joubert.

If you wish to keep the mind clear and the body healthy, abstain from all fermented liquors.—Sydney Smith.

Temperance is a bridle of gold; he who uses it rightly is more like a god than a man.—Burton.

Moderation is the silken string running through the pearl chain of all virtues.—Fuller.

Temperance is corporeal piety; it is the preservation of divine order in the body.—Theodore Parker.

Great men should dring with hardness on their throats.—Shakespeare.

Above all, let the poor hang up the amulet of temperance in their homes.—Horace Mann.

And he that will to bed go sober,
Falls with the leaf still in October.
—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Though I look old, yet I am strong and lusty, for in my youth I never did apply hot and rebellious liquors in my blood.—Shakespeare.

Except thou desire to hasten thine end, take this for a general rule, that thou never add any artificial heat to thy body by wine or spice.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Men live best on moderate means: Nature has dispensed to all men wherewithal to be happy, if mankind did but understand how to use her gifts.—Claudian.

It is all nonsense about not being able to work without ale and cider and fermented liquors. Do lions and cart-horses drink ale?—Sydney Smith.

The smaller the drink, the clearer the head, and the cooler the blood; which are great benefits in temper and business.—William Penn.

Temperance is reason's girdle and passion's bridle, the strength of the soul and the foundation of virtue.—Jeremy Taylor.

The first draught serveth for health, the second for pleasure, the third for shame, and the fourth for madness.—Anacharsis.

Every moderate drinker could abandon the intoxicating cup if he would; every inebriate would if he could.—J. B. Gough.

Temperance gives nature her full play, and enables her to exert herself in all her force and vigor.—Addison.

With riotous banquets, sicknesses came in,
When death 'gan muster all his dismal band
Of pale diseases.
—May.

If it is a small sacrifice to discontinue the use of wine, do it for the sake of others; if it is a great sacrifice, do it for your own.—Samuel J. May.

Temperance is a tree which has for a root very little contentment, and for fruit, calm and peace.—Buddha.

If temperance prevails, then education can prevail; if temperance fails, then education must fail.—Horace Mann.

There is hardly any noble quantity or endowment of the mind but must own temperance, either for its parent or its nurse.—South.

Make less thy body hence, and more thy grace;
Leave gormandizing.
—Shakespeare.

Ask God for temperance; that's the appliance only Which your disease requires.
—Shakespeare.

Temperance puts wood on the fire, meal in the barrel, flour in the tub, money in the purse, credit in the country, contentment in the house, clothes on the back, and vigor in the body.—Franklin.

A Spartan, being asked why his people drank so little, replied: "That we may consult concerning others, and not others concerning us."—Plutarch.

Call'd to the temple of impure delight
He that abstains, and he alone, does right.
If a wish wander that way, call it home;
He cannot long be safe whose wishes roam.
—Cowper.

Fools! not to know how far an humble lot Exceeds abundance by injustice got;
How health and temperance bless the rustic swain,
While luxury destroys her pamper'd train.
—Hesiod.

Temp'rate in every place,—abroad, at home,
Thence will applause, and hence will profit come;
And health from either—he in time prepares
For sickness, age, and their attendant cares.
—Crabbe.

Philosophy, religious solitude
And labour wait on temperance; in these Desire is bounded; they instruct the mind's
And body's action. —Nabb.

There is no difference between knowledge and temperance; for he who knows what is good and embraces it, who knows what is bad and avoids it, is learned and temperate.—Socrates.

The receipts of cookery are swelled to a volume, but a good stomach excels them all; to which nothing contributes more than industry and temperance.—Montaigne.

O temperance, thou fortune without envy; thou universal medicine of life, that clears the head and cleanses the blood, eases the stomach, strengthens the nerves, and perfects digestion.
—Sir W. Temple.

Temperance, in the nobler sense, does not mean a subdued and imperfect energy; it does not mean a stopping short in any good thing, as in love or in faith; but it means the power which governs the most intense energy, and prevents its acting in any way but as it ought.—Ruskin.

We ought to love temperance for itself, and in obedience to God who has commanded it and chastity; but what I am forced to by catarrhs, or owe to the stone, is neither chastity nor temperance.—Montaigne.

If all the world
Should in a pet of temp'rance, feed on pulse,
Drink the clear stream, and nothing wear but frieze,
Th' All-giver would be unthank'd, would be unprais'd.
—Milton.

Impostor! do not charge most innocent Nature
As if she would her children should be riotous
With her abundance. She, good cateress, Means her provision only to the good,
That live according to her sober laws,
And holy dictate of spare Temperance.
—Milton.

O madness, to think use of strongest wines
And strongest drinks our chief support of health
When God, with these forbidden, made choice to rear
His mighty champion, strong above compare, Whose drink was only from the liquid brook.
—Milton.

Health and liberty
Attend on these bare meals; if all were blest
With such a temperance, what man would fawn,
Or to his belly sell his liberty?
There would be then no slaves, no sycophants
At great men's tables. —May.

Temperance keeps the senses clear and unembarrassed, and makes them seize the object with more keenness and satisfaction. It appears with life in the face, and decorum in the person; it gives you the command of your head, secures your health, and preserves you in a condition for business.—Jeremy Collier.

Temperance, that virtue without pride, and fortune without envy, that gives indolence of body with an equality of mind; the best guardian of youth and support of old age; the precept of reason as well as religion, and physician of the soul as well as the body; the tutelar goddess of health and universal medicine of life.—Sir W. Temple.

Temperance is a virtue which casts the truest lustre upon the person it is lodged in, and has the most general influence upon all other particular virtues of any that the soul of man is capable of; indeed so general, that there is hardly any noble quality or endowment of the mind, but must own temperance either for its parent or its nurse; it is the greatest strengthener and clearer of reason, and the best preparer of it for religion, the sister of prudence, and the handmaid to devotion.—Dean South.

From our tables here, no painful surfeits,
No fed diseases grow, to strangle nature,
And suffocate the active brain; no fevers,
No apoplexies, palsies or catarrhs
Are here; where nature, not entic'd at all With such a dang'rous bait as pleasant cates,

Takes in no more than she can govern well.
—May.

Drink not the third glass, which thou canst
not tame,

When once it is within thee; but before Mayst rule it, as thou list; and pour the
shame,

Which it would pour on thee, upon the floor

It is most just to throw that on the ground,

Which would throw me there, if I keep the round. —Herbert.

If thou well observe

The rule of—not too much,—by temperance taught

In what thou eat'st and drink'st, seeking from thence

Due nourishment, not gluttonous delight,
Till many years over thy head return:

So may'st thou live, till like ripe fruit thou drop,

Into thy mother's lap, or be with ease
Gather'd, not harshly pluck'd; in death mature. —Milton.

Temperance (Prohibition and Abstinence)

What then is the conclusion of the matter? The destinies of the American people are practically in the grasp of a group of less than twenty liquor dealers! Were it not for certain moral restraints put upon this formidable power by public sentiment the outlook would be as black as midnight. As it is it behooves every lover of law and order and national prosperity to use his utmost influence against the dramshop. It is not for us at this point either to call in question or to concede the right of the individual to take a social or even a convivial glass. We are not talking about rights, but about Christian duties and privileges. There is one right which in the Christian life towers above all others; it is the right to surrender all rights for the sake of one's fellow men. This is the mind that was in Christ Jesus, who, possessing all the inalienable rights of Godhead, emptied himself and became of no reputation for us. This the mind that was in the Apostle Paul also when he said, "If meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no meat while the world standeth!" Never was a grander manifesto of human rights—never a sublimer declaration of independence than that! Oh, young men, to whom the welfare of the nation is presently to be committed, be "on duty" just there.—Rev. D. J. Burrell.

We are completely in bondage and slavery by the vile influence of the saloon in our country. We talk of our great and free institutions. We know, of course, that we have the grandest nation upon which the sun ever shines. We know that here with us the richest and rarest opportunities that have ever been known in the history of human civilization are presented to every man that he may avail himself of them to advance his position in life. We know that every man's rights and every man's privileges are guarded and protected by the grandest flag that it has ever been the privilege of free men to defend. We have no criterion of birth, of caste, of wealth, or of creed. The only criterion that we recognize is the criterion of individual merit and of individual worth. But yet we must stand before nations of the civilized world guilty of this gross and inexcusable sable folly of squandering enormous sums of money and wasting the life and strength of our people, year after year, in supporting this giant curse among us.—Father J. M. Cleary.

It is a fact and no fancy that we have all lived to see the abolition of slavery. Why is it incredible that some of us may live to see a greater evil, namely, the liquor traffic, made an outlaw by both state and national constitutional enactment? There is more money behind the liquor traffic than was ever behind slavery. Those who used to be called by Charles Sumner "the Lords of the Lash" never worked, or whipped, or burned, or starved to death in any circuit of the seasons before the Civil War so many victims as the liquor traffic now destroys every year in our republic. Slavery never added so much to the wastes and burdens of the nation in any one year before our military conflict began, as the liquor traffic now adds every year. Slavery never cost us a thousand millions annually. Slavery never destroyed eighty thousand lives a year. Slavery did not produce nine-tenths of the crime of the land. It is on account of the unity of the liquor traffic and its growing audacity that I predict its overthrow.—Joseph Cook.

"We never can create a public sentiment strong enough to suppress the dram-shops until God's people take hold of the temperance reform as a part of their religion."—Theodore L. Cuyler.

Here is a fearful enemy of God and man—the liquor traffic; it makes ruthless war upon the people; it blasts and destroys their homes as with pestilence and fire; it kills savagely, cruelly, more than a hundred thousand of them every year; robbing them first and driving wives and children to ruin and despair.—Neal Dow.

What's a drunken man like?—Like a drowned man, a fool, and a madman: one draught above heat makes him a fool; the second mads him, and a third drowns him.—Shakespeare.

The man who is a drunkard has no intellectual freedom. Science declares that alcohol seeks the intellectual faculties, clogs the brain cells, distorts the reason, vitiates the mind, shatters the nerve centres, and he who is diseased with inebriety cannot enjoy intellectual freedom.—Thos. C. Murphy.

I say we, the people who create the governing power, have a duty to perform. What is it? That we shall exert our efforts and put forth our energies to hasten the dawn of that day when the sentiment which now sustains the drink traffic shall be replaced by a total abstinence sentiment.—Thos. C. Murphy.

We are here to confront the great enemy of our time; to handle the greatest living question. This monster has the world for a home, the flesh for a mother, and the devil for a father. He stands erect, a monster of fabulous proportions. He has no head, and cannot think. He has no heart, and cannot feel. He has no eyes, and cannot see. He has no ears, and cannot hear. He has only an instinct by which to plan, a passion by which to allure, a coil by which to bind, a fang with which to sting, and an infinite maw in which to consume his victims. I impeach this monster, and arraign him before the bar of public judgment, and demand his condemnation in the name of industry robbed and beggared; of the public peace disturbed and broken; of private safety gagged and garroted; of common justice violated and trampled; of the popular conscience debauched and prostituted; of royal manhood wrecked and ruined; and of helpless innocence waylaid and assassinated.—Rev. Charles H. Fowler, D. D.

Now, if that sovereignty in the county says the saloon must go, we call it local option. It is the voice of the same authority in a limited area, which speaks in constitutional prohibition concerning the territory of an entire State, as in Maine or Kansas. The good results are small or great, in proportion as the area is limited or extended. The intelligent and robust temperance worker will contend for every inch of territory he can conquer; he will begin at the threshold of his own home and not lay down the warfare while there is a dramshop in any spot the flag floats over.—Mrs. E. Foster.

Wanted—a crusade; something objective; something all-enlisting; something to set souls on fire with indignation and resolve. That is the perpetual need of any organization with the breath of true and enduring life in it. That is the need of the united young people of all our churches, of whatever denomination, throughout America. Out of the Christian training-school into the Christian arena—is not that the true law of spiritual development and accomplishment?—Zion's Herald.

Think how the foremost champion, King Alcohol, is suffering defeat. He cannot now ingratiate himself into the stomachs of clergymen, as he once could; and now they are training their guns upon him. Not now as formerly does he find favor among thoughtful physicians. Science casts him out of the camp and brands him as an avowed enemy, while only a few years ago he was greeted as a trusted friend. Thoughtful people are waking up and taking sides against him. They are framing laws to expel him from the land, from many parts of which he has already gone. Girls and boys all abroad are being taught to see that he is wholly evil, and that continually; and that is a quiet work now, but will show itself in mighty power in the next generation.—E. Chevery, M. D.

If the strength and the sustaining force of the traffic were in the ballot box, there would be a possibility of dethroning it in that way. But, unfortunately, the root of the evil is not there, nor is it in the open saloon, nor is it to be found in the distillery, but it is grounded, and, I regret to say, it flourishes in the passions, the appetites, and the customs of the people, who are the governing power. Public sentiment is the basis of law, and public sentiment is simply individual sentiment taken in the aggregate. A spring cannot rise higher than its source. And prohibition, to be successful, must be the outgrowth of a sentiment which is based upon the self-sacrifice involved in total abstinence, enforced in the individual life of the nation. This involves agitation, education, and regeneration. To educate the public mind and to awaken the public conscience is equivalent to enacting laws upon the subject, because out of the mind and heart of the people the laws of the land are made. The people need to realize their responsibility as individuals; and we should lay down a principle that, while men are licensed to sell liquor, none have a license to take the cunning from the hand of any man, the genius from his brain, or the happiness from his home. If these are laid upon the altar of Bacchus, it is by the consent of the possessor of them.—Thos. C. Murphy.

Tempests

The southern wind
Doth play the trumpet to his purposes;
And, by his hollow whistling in the leaves,
Foretells a tempest and a blustering day.
—Shakespeare.

The sky
Is overcast, and musters muttering thunder, In clouds that seem approaching fast, and show
In forked flashes a commanding tempest.
—Byron.

Suddeine they see from midst of all the maine
The surging waters like a mountaine rise,
And the great sea, puft up with proud dis-
daine,
To swell above the measure of his guise,
As threatening to devoure all that his power despise.
—Spenser.

From cloud to cloud the rending lightnings rage;
Till, in the furious elemental war
Dissolv'd, the whole precipitated mass
Unbroken floods and solid torrents pour.
—Thomson.

I have seen tempests, when the scolding
winds
Have riv'd the knotty oaks; and I have seen The ambitious ocean swell, and rage, and
foam,
To be exalted with the threat'ning clouds;
But never till to-night, never till now,
Did I go through a tempest dropping fire.
—Shakespeare.

An horrid stillness first invades the ear,
And in that silence we the tempest fear.
—Dryden.

Who shall face
The blast that wakes the fury of the sea?

The vast hulks
Are whirled like chaff upon the waves; the sails
Fly, rent like webs of gossamer; the masts
Are snapped asunder.

—William Cullen Bryant.

Along the woods, along the moorish fens,
Sighs the sad genius of the coming storm;
And up among the loose disjointed cliffs,
And fractured mountains wild, the brawling brook

And cave, presageful, send a hollow moan, Resounding long in listening fancy's ear.
—Thomson.

Meanwhile

The sun, in his setting, sent up the last smile
Of his power, to baffle the storm. And, behold!

O'er the mountains embattled, his armies,
all gold,

Rose and rested: while far up the dim airy
crag,

Its artillery silenced, its banners in rags,
The rear of the tempest its sullen retreat Drew off slowly, receding in silence, to meet

The powers of the night, which, now gathering afar,

Had already sent forward one bright, single star.
—Owen Meredith.

Look, from the turbid south
What floods of flame in red diffusion burst,
Frequent and furious, darted thro' the dark
And broken ridges of a thousand clouds, Pil'd hill on hill; and hark, the thunder
rous'd,
Groans in long roarings through the distant gloom.
—Mallet.

Blow, wind, and crack your cheeks! rage!
blow!

You cataracts and hurricanoes, spout
Till you have drench'd our steeples, drown'd the cocks!

You sulphurous and thought-executing fires,
Vaunt-couriers to oak-cleaving thunderbolts,

Singe my white head! And thou, all-shaking thunder,

Strike flat the thick rotundity o' the world!
Crack nature's moulds, all germens spill at once,

That make ungrateful man.

—Shakespeare.

There is war in the skies!
Lo! the black-winged legions of tempest arise

O'er those sharp splinter'd rocks that are gleaming below

In the soft light, so fair and so fatal, as though

Some seraph burn'd through them, the thunderbolt searching

Which the black cloud unbosom'd just now,
—Owen Meredith.

A boding silence reigns,
Dread through the dun expanse; save the
dull sound

That from the mountain, previous to the
storm,

Rolls o'er the muttering earth, disturbs the
flood,

And shakes the forest leaf without a breath.
Prone, to the lowest vale, aerial tribes

Descend: the tempest-loving raven scarce
Dares wing the dubious dusk. In awful
gaze

The cattle stand, and on the scowling heavens
Cast a deploring eye; by man forsook,

Who to the crowded cottage hies him fast,
Or seeks the shelter of the downward cave.
—Thomson.

And sometimes too a burst of rain,
Swept from the black horizon, broad, descends

In one continuous flood. Still over head
The mingling tempest weaves its gloom, and still

The deluge deepens; till the fields around Lie sunk, and flattened, in the sordid wave.
Sudden the ditches swell; the meadows swim.

Red, from the hills, innumerable streams
Tumultuous roar; and high above its banks
The river lift; before whose rushing tide, Herds, flocks, and harvests, cottages, and swains,

Roll mingled down; all that the winds had spar'd

In one wild moment ruined; the big hopes
And well-earned treasures of the painful year.
—Thomson.

Temptation

Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation.—Bible.

When a man resists sin on human motives only, he will not hold out long.—Bishop Wilson.

Temptation is the fire that brings up the scum of the heart.—Boston.

Better shun the bait than struggle in the snare.—Dryden.

Life hath quicksands; life hath snares.—Longfellow.

It is opportunity that makes the thief.—Seneca.

Keep away from the fire!—Sterne.

The woman that deliberates is lost.
—Addison.

Temptation hath a music for all ears.—N. P. Willis.

Might shake the saintship of an anchorite.—Byron.

To beguile many and be beguil'd by one.—Shakespeare.

How oft the sight of means to do ill deeds makes deeds ill done!—
Shakespeare.

It is one thing to be tempted, another thing to fall.—Shakespeare.

God is better served in resisting a temptation to evil than in many formal prayers.—William Penn.

Temptations are a file which rub off much of the rust of self-confidence.—
Fénelon.

We like slipping, but not falling;
our real desire is to be tempted enough.—Hare.

Most dangerous is that temptation that doth goad us on to sin in loving virtue.—Shakespeare.

Honest bread is very well—it's the butter that makes the temptation.—
Douglas Jerrold.

If you take temptations into account, who is to say that he is better than his neighbor?—Thackeray.

Devils soonest tempt, resembling spirits of light.—Shakespeare.

In part she is to blame that has been tried.
He comes too late that comes to be denied.
—Lady M. W. Montagu.

Some temptations come to the industrious, but all temptations attack the idle.—Spurgeon.

Few men have virtue to withstand the highest bidder.—Washington.

Many a dangerous temptation comes to us in fine gay colors, that are but skin-deep.—Matthew Henry.

I am that way going to temptation,
Where prayers cross.—Shakespeare.

Bell, book and candle shall not drive me
back,
When gold and silver beckons me to come on.
—Shakespeare.

Know'st thou not any whom corrupting gold
Would tempt unto a close exploit of death?
—Shakespeare.

He who has no mind to trade with the Devil should be so wise as to keep from his shop.—South.

Find out what your temptations are, and you will find out largely what you are yourself.—Henry Ward
Beecher.

The realization of God's presence is the one sovereign remedy against temptation.—Fénelon.

The devil tempts us not; 'tis we tempt him,
Beckoning his skill with opportunity.
—George Eliot.

It is the bright day that brings forth the adder, and that craves wary walking.—Shakespeare.

Temptations, like misfortunes, are sent to test our moral strength.—
Marguerite de Valois.

Obscurity and innocence, twin sisters, escape temptations which would pierce their gossamer armor in contact with the world.—Chamfort.

Virtue, alas! not unfrequently trips and falls on the sharp-edged rock of poverty.—Eugene Sue.

How many perils doe enfold
The righteous man to make him daily fall.
—Spenser.

Great possessions and great want of them are both strong temptations.
—Goethe.

When devils will the blackest sins put on, they do suggest at first with heavenly shows.—Shakespeare.

The devil was piqued such saint-ship to behold, and longed to tempt him.—Pope.

There are times when it would seem as if God fished with a line, and the devil with a net.—Mme. Swetchine.

Love cries victory when the tears of a woman become the sole defence of her virtue.—La Fontaine.

The virtue which has never been attacked by temptation is deserving of no monument.—Mlle. de Scudéri.

Every Christian is endued with a power whereby he is enabled to resist temptations.—Tillotson.

Every bird has its decoy, and every man is led and misled in his own pecliar way.—Goethe.

No man is matriculated to the art of life till he has been well tempted.
—George Eliot.

One learns more metaphysics from a single temptation than from all the philosophers.—Lowell.

Every temptation is an opportunity of our getting nearer to God.—J. Q.
Adams.

An honest heart is not to be trusted with itself in bad company.—
Richardson.

An acknowledged love sanctifies every little freedom; and little freedoms beget great ones.—Richardson.

The devil is very near at hand to those who, like monarchs, are accountable to none but God for their actions.—Gustavus Adolphus.

My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations; knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience.—Bible.

When a beautiful woman yields to temptation, let her consult her pride, though she forgets her virtue.—Junius.

If thou wouldst conquer thy weakness, thou must never gratify it. No man is compelled to evil; his consent only makes it his. It is no sin to be tempted, but to be overcome.—William Penn.

But Satan now is wiser than of yore,
And tempts by making rich, not making poor.
—Pope.

The time for reasoning is before we have approached near enough to the forbidden fruit to look at it and admire.—Margaret Percival.

Shut the door of that house of pleasure which you hear resounding with the loud voice of a woman.—
Saadi.

In part to blame is she,
Which hath without consent bin only tride;
He comes too neere, that comes to be denide.
—Sir Thos. Overbury.

Temptations hurt not, though they have accesse;
Satan o'ercomes none but by willingness.
—Herrick.

Sometimes we are devils to ourselves,
When we will tempt the frailty of our
powers,
Presuming on their changeful potency.
—Shakespeare.

Occasions of adversity best discover how great virtue or strength each one hath. For occasions do not make a man frail, but they show what he is.—
Thomas à Kempis.

Do not give dalliance too much the rein; the strongest oaths are straw to the fire in the blood.—Shakespeare.

A beautiful woman, if poor, should use double circumspection; for her beauty will tempt others, her poverty herself.—Colton.

To fly the boar, before the boar pursues,
Were to incense the boar to follow us,
And make pursuit where he did mean no chase.
—Shakespeare.

The Devil has a great advantage against us inasmuch as he has a strong bastion and bulwark against us in our own flesh and blood.—Luther.

If men had only temptations to great sins, they would always be good; but the daily fight with little ones accustoms them to defeat.—Richter.

Christian! thou knowest thou carriest gunpowder about thee. Desire them that carry fire to keep at a distance. It is a dangerous crisis, when a proud heart meets with flattering lips.—John Flavel.

Temptations, when we meet them at first, are as the lion that roared upon Samson; but if we overcome them, the next time we see them we shall find a nest of honey within them.—John Bunyan.

Every man living shall assuredly meet with an hour of temptation, a certain critical hour, which shall more especially try what mettle his heart is made of.—South.

In the hour of my distress,
When temptations me oppress,
And when I my sins confess,
Sweet Spirit, comfort me.
—Robert Herrick.

Oftentimes, to win us to our harm,
The instruments of darkness tell us truths;
Win us with honest trifles, to betray us
In deepest consequence. —Shakespeare.

We are surrounded by abysses, but the greatest of all depths is in our own heart, and an irresistible leaning leads us there. Draw thyself from thyself!—Goethe.

The temptation is not here, where you are reading about it or praying about it. It is down in your shop, among bales and boxes, ten-penny nails, and sand-paper.—Chapin.

A vacant mind invites dangerous inmates, as a deserted mansion tempts wandering outcasts to enter and take up their abode in its desolate apartments.—Hillard.

Let a man be but in earnest in praying against a temptation as the tempter is in pressing it, and he needs not proceed by a surer measure.—Bishop South.

I may not here omit those two main plagues, and common dotages of human kind, wine and women, which have infatuated and besotted myriads of people: they go commonly together.—Burton.

Humanly speaking, there is a certain degree of temptation which will overcome any virtue. Now, in so far as you approach temptation to a man, you do him an injury, and if he is overcome, you share his guilt.—Johnson.

The difference between those whom the world esteems as good and those whom it condemns as bad, is in many cases little else than that the former have been better sheltered from temptation.—Hare.

When tempted, the shortest and surest way is to act like a little child at the breast; when we show it a frightful monster, it shrinks back and buries its face in its mother's bosom, that it may no longer behold it.—Fénelon.

No place, no company, no age, no person is temptation-free; let no man boast that he was never tempted, let him not be high-minded, but fear, for he may be surprised in that very instant wherein he boasteth that he was never tempted at all.—Spencer.

Prince Eugene informed a confidential friend that in the course of his life he had been exposed to many Potiphars, to all of whom he had proved a Joseph, merely because he had so many other things to attend to.—Colton.

Who ever lives looking for pleasure only, his senses uncontrolled, immoderate in his enjoyments, idle and weak, the tempter will certainly overcome him, as the wind blows down a weak tree.—Buddha.

When the flesh presents thee with delights, then present thyself with dangers; where the world possesses thee with vain hopes, there possess thyself with true fear; when the devil brings thee oil, bring thou vinegar. The way to be safe is never to be secure.—Quarles.

To attempt to resist temptation, to abandon our bad habits, and to control our dominant passions in our own unaided strength, is like attempting to check by a spider's thread the progress of a ship of the first rate, borne along before wind and tide.—Rev. Dr. Wagh.

A world of little cares is continually arising, which busy or affluent life knows nothing of, to open the first door to distress. Hunger is not among the postponable wants; and a day, even a few hours, in such a condition is often the crisis of a life of ruin.—Thomas Paine.

Life is very difficult. It seems right to me sometimes that we should follow our strongest feelings; but then such feelings continually come across the ties that all our former life has made for us,—the ties that have made others dependent on us,—and would cut them in two.—George Eliot.

If you wish to be like the gods on earth, to be free in the realms of the dead, pluck not the fruit from the garden! In appearance it may glisten to the eye; but the perishable pleasure of possession quickly avenges the curse of curiosity.—Schiller.

One does not require nor think of a fire often in spring or autumn; yet I don't know how it is, but when we have happened by chance to pass near one, the sensation it communicates is so pleasant that we feel rather inclined to indulge it. This is analogous to temptation,—and the moral is, "keep away from the fire."—Sterne.

St. Augustine teaches us that there is in each man a Serpent, an Eve, and an Adam. Our senses and natural propensities are the Serpent; the excitable desire is the Eve; and reason is the Adam. Our nature tempts us perpetually; criminal desire is often excited; but sin is not completed till reason consents.—Pascal.

It has been wisely said, "that well may thy guardian angel suffer thee to lose thy locks, when thou darest willingly to lay thy head in the lap of temptation!" Was it not easier for the hero of Judæa to avoid the touch of the fair Philistine, than to elude her power when held in her arms?—Jane Porter.

Between the acting of a dreadful thing
And the first motion, all the interim is Like a phantasma, or a hideous dream:
The genius and the mortal instruments
Are then in council; and the state of man,
Like to a little kingdom, suffers then
The nature of an insurrection.
—Shakespeare.

When I cannot be forced, I am fooled out of my integrity. He cannot constrain if I do not consent. If I do but keep possession, all the posse of hell cannot violently eject me; but I cowardly surrender to his summons. Thus there needs no more to be my undoing but myself.—Fuller.

Temptation is a fearful word. It indicates the beginning of a possible series of infinite evils. It is the ringing of an alarm bell, whose melancholy sounds may reverberate through eternity. Like the sudden, sharp cry of "Fire!" under our windows by night, it should rouse us to instantaneous action, and brace every muscle to its highest tension.—Horace Mann.

On this earth all is temptation. Crosses tempt us by irritating our pride, and prosperity by flattering it. Our life is a continual combat, but one in which Jesus Christ fights for us. We must pass on unmoved, while temptations rage around us, as the traveler, overtaken by a storm, simply wraps his cloak more closely about him, and pushes on more vigorously toward his destined home.—Fénelon.

'Tis the temptation of the devil
That makes all human actions evil;
For saints may do the same things by
The spirit, in sincerity,
Which other men are tempted to,
And at the devil's instance do:
And yet the actions be contrary,
Just as the saints and wicked vary.
—Butler.

We often wonder that certain men and women are left by God to the commission of sins that shock us. We wonder how, under the temptation of a single hour, they fall from the very heights of virtue and of honor into sin and shame. The fact is that there are no such falls as these, or there are next to none. These men and women are those who have dallied with temptation—have exposed themselves to the influence of it, and have been weakened and corrupted by it.—J. G. Holland.

Tenderness

Tenderness is the infancy of love.
—Rivarol.

Tenderness is a virtue.—Goldsmith.

Tenderness is the repose of passion.
—Joubert.

The dew of compassion is a tear.—Byron.

Want of tenderness is want of parts, and is no less a proof of stupidity than depravity.—Johnson.

The less tenderness a man has in his nature, the more he requires from others.—Rahel.

I was never fit to say a word to a sinner, except when I had a broken heart myself.—Edward Payson.

There never was any heart truly great and generous that was not also tender and compassionate.—South.

When death, the great Reconciler, has come, it is never our tenderness that we repent of, but our severity.—George Eliot.

The quiet tenderness of Chaucer, where you almost seem to hear the hot tears falling, and the simple choking words sobbed out.—Lowell.

Tenderness, without a capacity of relieving, only makes the man who feels it more wretched than the object which sues for assistance.—Goldsmith.

The most powerful symptom of love is a tenderness which, a times, becomes almost insupportable.—Victor Hugo.

Higher than the perfect song
For which love longeth,
Is the tender fear of wrong,
That never wrongeth.
—Bayard Taylor.

We shall never learn to feel and respect our real calling and destiny, unless we have taught ourselves to consider everything as moonshine, compared with the education of the heart.—Sir Walter Scott.

While we would have our young sisters imitate, as they cannot fail to love, the conduct of Ruth, will not their elders do well to ponder on, and imitate the tenderness of Naomi? Would we have our daughters Ruths, we must be Naomis.—Grace Aguilar.

Courage is by no means incompatible with tenderness. On the contrary, gentleness and tenderness have been found to characterize the men, no less than the women, who have done the most courageous deeds.—Samuel Smiles.

A tender-hearted and compassionate disposition, which inclines men to pity and feel the misfortunes of others, and which is, even for its own sake, incapable of involving any man in ruin and misery, is of all tempers of mind the most amiable; and though it seldom receives much honor, is worthy of the highest.—Fielding.

I have great admiration for power, a great terror of weakness, especially in my own sex, yet feel that my love is for those who overcome the mental and moral suffering and temptation through excess of tenderness rather than through excess of strength.—Mrs. Jameson.

Terror

The most terrible of all things is terror.—W. R. Alger.

By the Apostle Paul, shadows to-night have struck more terror to the soul of Richard than can the substance of ten thousand soldiers.—Shakespeare.

Terror itself, when once grown transcendental, becomes a kind of courage; as frost sufficiently intense, according to the poet Milton, will burn.—Carlyle.

The bay-trees in our country are all with-er'd,
And meteors fright the fixed stars of
heaven;
The pale-fac'd moon looks bloody on the
earth,
And lean-look'd prophets whisper fearful change. —Shakespeare.

Most terrors are but spectral illusions. Only have the courage of the man who could walk up to his spectre seated in the chair before him, and sit down upon it; the horrid thing will not partake the chair with you.—Hells.

No divine terror will ever be found in the work of the man who wastes a colossal strength in elaborating toys; for the first lesson that terror is sent to teach us is, the value of the human soul, and the shortness of mortal time.—Ruskin.

Testimony

Testimony is like an arrow shot from a long bow; the force of it depends on the strength of the hand that draws it. Argument is like an arrow from a cross-bow, which has equal force though shot by a child.—Johnson.

Thames

O, could I flow like thee, and make thy stream

My great example, as it is my theme!

Though deep, yet clear; though gentle, yet not dull;

Strong without rage, without o'erflowing full. —Denham.

Slow let us trace the matchless vale of Thames;

Fair winding up to where the Muses haunt In Twit'nham bowers, and for their Pope implore. —Thomson.

There is a hill beside the silver Thames, Shady with birch and beech and odorous
pine;

And brilliant underfoot with thousand gems,
Steeply the thickets to his floods decline.
—Robert Bridges.

The time shall come, when, free as seas or
wind,

Unbounded Thames shall flow for all mankind,

Whole nations enter with each swelling tide,
And seas but join the regions they divide;
Earth's distant ends our glory shall behold,
And the new world launch forth to seek the old. —Pope.

Thankfulness

Evermore thanks, the exchequer of the poor.—Shakespeare.

Thanks, oftentimes obtrusive.—Shen-
stone.

Beggar that I am, I am even poor in thanks.—Shakespeare.

I am glad that he thanks God for anything.—Samuel Johnson.

The poorest service is repaid with thanks.—Shakespeare.

Thanks to men
Of noble minds, is honorable meed.
—Shakespeare.

I thank you for your voices: thank you:
Your most sweet voices.
—Shakespeare.

Let never day nor night unhallow'd pass,
But still remember what the Lord hath done. —Shakespeare.

Our whole life should speak forth our thankfulness; every condition and place we are in should be a witness of our thankfulness. This will make the times and places we live in better for us. When we ourselves are monuments of God's mercy, it is fit we should be patterns of His praises, and leave monuments to others. We should think it given to us to do something better than to live in. We live not to live: our life is not the end of itself, but the praise of the giver.—R. Libbes.

Thou thought'st to help me; and such thanks I give
As one near death to those that wish him live. —Shakespeare.

When I'm not thank'd at all, I'm thank'd enough,
I've done my duty, and I've done no more. —Henry Fielding.

Your bounty's beyond my speaking,
But though my mouth be dumb, my heart shall thank you. —Nicholas Rowe.

Some hae meat and canna eat,
And some would eat that want it;
But we hae meat, and we can eat,
Sae let the Lord be thankit. —Burns.

To receive honestly is the best thanks for a good thing.—George MacDonald.

Thanksgiving Day

Praise ye the Lord.—Bible.

"Oh, that men would praise the Lord for His goodness, and for His wonderful works to the children of men!"—Bible.

"O give thanks unto the Lord; for He is good; for His mercy endureth forever."—Bible.

For the fruit of the time of our toil;
For whate'er we have fought for;
Whether born of the brain or the soil
Be the meed we have sought for;
For the gifts we have had from His hand
Who is Lord of the living,
Let there ring through the length of the land
A Thanksgiving! Thanksgiving!
—Clinton Scollard.

Thanksgiving Day is only our annual time for saying grace at the table of eternal goodness.—James M. Ludlow, D. D.

"Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet, Lest we forget—lest we forget!"
—Kipling.

Great as the preparations were for the dinner, everything was so contrived that not a soul in the house should be kept from the morning service of Thanksgiving in the church.
—H. B. Stowe.

Let us give thanks to God upon Thanksgiving Day. Nature is beautiful and fellowmen are dear, and duty is close beside us, and God is over us and in us. We want to trust Him with a fuller trust, and so at last to come to that high life where we shall "be careful for nothing, but in everything, by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let our request be made known unto God"; for that, and that alone, is peace.—Phillips Brooks.

Ah! on Thanksgiving day, when from East and from West,
From North and South, come the pilgrim and guest,
When the gray-haired New Englander sees round his board
The old broken links of affection restored,
When the care wearied man seeks his mother once more,
And the worn matron smiles where the girl smiled before.
What moistens the lips and what brightens the eye?
What calls back the past, like the rich pumpkin pie? —Whittier.

How well I remember that old Thanksgiving dinner! Father at one end, mother at the other end, the children between wondering if father will ever get done carving the turkey. O, that proud, strutting hero of the barnyard, upside down, his plumes gone and minus his gobbler! Stuffed with that which he can never digest. The day before, at school, we had learned that Greece was south of Turkey, but on the table we found that turkey was bounded by grease. The brown surface waited for the knife to plunge astride the breast-bone, and with knife sharpened on the jambs of the fire-place, lay bare the folds of white meat. Give to the disposed to be sentimental, the heart. Give to the one disposed to music, the drumstick. Give to the one disposed to theological discussion, the "parson's nose." Then the pies! For the most part a lost art. What mince pies! in which you had all confidence fashioned from all rich ingredients, instead of miscellaneous leavings which are only short of glorified hash! Not mince pies with profound mysteries of origin! But mother made them, sweetened them, flavored them, and laid the lower crust and the upper crust, with here and there a puncture by the fork to let you look through the light and flaky surface into the substance beneath.—T. DeWitt Talmage, D. D.

If Thanksgiving would but be observed in a becoming spirit, how much would it accomplish in the way of purifying and strengthening the sentiment of nationality, which was fostered by ancestral memories, cemented by the blood of our fathers, and wrought into the structure of our continent by the hand of God, in the flow of rivers, the clasp of lakes and ridges, and the embracing arm of an unbroken seaboard! "The Lord hath done great things for us; whereof we are glad." If there is one peril more than another which threatens our prosperity it is that indifference to our mercies which might provoke God to withdraw them. May God incline us more and more to that unambitious, unselfish, contented, cheerful, thankful temper which is at once a medicine and a feast, an ornament and a protection.—William Adams, D. D.

No, there is nothing that should hinder the praises of God's sons and daughters on Thanksgiving Day. We are much too prone to sadness; not overserious, but overmelancholy. In the Talmud we are told of a stringed instrument that hung over King David's bed in such a position that when the pleasant north winds blew in the night it sounded sweetly of itself; "and he forthwith arose and occupied himself with the law until he saw the pillars of the dawn." Our lives are environed with God's goodness. We sleep in the midst of untouched harps of blessing. Let us arise and sweep their strings on this Thanksgiving Day.—David J. Burrell, D. D.

THE FIRST PRESIDENTIAL THANKSGIVING PROCLAMATION.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A Proclamation.

WHEREAS, It is the duty of all Nations to acknowledge the Providence of Almighty God, to obey his Will, to be grateful for his Benefits, and humbly to implore his Protection and Favour: And whereas both houses of Congress have, by their joint Committee, requested me "To recommend to the People of the UNITED STATES, a Day of PUBLIC THANKSGIVING and PRAYER, to be observed by acknowledging with grateful Hearts the many Signal Favours of Almighty God, especially by affording them an opportunity peaceably to establish a Form of Government for their Safety and Happiness."

Now, THEREFORE, I do recommend and assign THURSDAY the Twenty-Sixth Day of November next, to be devoted by the People of these States, to the Service of that great and glorious Being, who is the beneficent Author of all the good that was, that is, or that will be: That we may then all unite in rendering unto him our sincere and humble thanks for his kind Care and Protection of the People of this Country previous to their becoming a Nation;—for the signal and manifold Mercies, and the favourable Interpositions of his Providence in the Course & Conclusion of the late War;—for the great Degree of Tranquillity, Union, and Plenty, which we have since enjoyed;—for the peaceable and rational Manner in which we have been enabled to establish Constitutions of Government for our Safety and Happiness, and particularly the national one now lately instituted;—for the civil and religious Liberty with which we are blessed, and the means we have of acquiring and diffusing useful knowledge;—and in general, for all the great and various Favours which he bath been pleased to confer upon us.

AND ALSO, that we may then unite in most humbly offering our Prayers and supplications to the great Lord and Ruler of Nations, and beseech him to pardon our National and other Transgressions;—to enable us all, whether in public or private Stations, to perform our several and relative Duties properly and punctually;—to render our national Government a Blessing to all the people, by constantly being a government of wise, just and Constitutional Laws, directly and faithfully obeyed;—to protect and guide all Sovereigns and nations, (especially such as have shown kindness unto us) and to bless them with good Government, Peace and Concord;—to promote the Knowledge and Practice of true Religion and Virtue, and the increase of Science among them and us;—and generally to grant unto all mankind such a Degree of temporal Prosperity as He alone knows to be best.

Given under my Hand at the City of New York, the third Day of October, in the Year of our Lord One Thousand Seven Hundred and Eighty-Nine.

G. WASHINGTON.

We think of Thanksgiving in harvest time—
In the yielding, gathering golden time;
When the sky is fringed with a hazy mist,
And the blushing maples by frost lip-kissed;
When the barns are full with the harvest cheer,
And the crowning, thankful day draws near.

We think of Thanksgiving at resting time—
The circle completed is but a chime
In the song of life, in the lives of men;
We harvest the toils of our years, and then
We wait at the gate of the King's highway,
For the dawn of our soul's Thanksgiving Day.
—Rose Hartwich Thorpe.

Let us, then, as good citizens, as believers in God, gratefully keep Thanksgiving day. Let us crowd to his sanctuaries, and praise God, from whom all blessings flow. Let households and friends gather about their firesides and well-spread boards, and let charities to the poor brighten and commemorate the day, that it may be to us all long a pleasant memory.—J. B. Walker, D. D.

No thanksgiving is complete without its generous thought of those who are not so favored as we are. The truly grateful heart always thinks of giving blessing to some other. Says George MacDonald: "When God comes to man, man looks around for his neighbor." Our own Thanksgiving dinner will be sweeter if we have shared it with another household. An unshared meal on this glad day will not bring its best possible blessing.—J. R. Miller, D. D.

We thank Thee, O Father, for all that is bright—
The gleam of the day and the stars of the night,
The flowers of our youth and the fruits of our prime,
And the blessings that march down the pathway of time.

We thank Thee, O Father, for all that is dear—
The sob of the tempest, the flow of the tear;
For never in blindness, and never in vain,
Thy mercy permitted a sorrow or pain.

We thank Thee, O Father of all, for the power
Of aiding each other in life's darkest hour:
The generous heart and the bountiful hand
And all the soul-help that sad souls understand.

We thank Thee, O Father, for days yet to be;
For hopes that our future will call us to Thee.
Let all our eternity form, through Thy love,
One Thanksgiving Day in the mansions above.
—Will Carleton.

This world o' God's is brighter than we ever dream or know;
Its burdens growin' lighter—an' it's Love that makes 'em so!
An' I'm thankful that I'm livin' where Love's blessedness I see,
'Neath a heaven that's forgivin', where the bells ring "Home" to me!
—Frank L. Stanton.

Yet it is meet and proper that a nation should set apart an annual day for national giving of thanks. It is a public recognition of God as the Author of all prosperity. It is the erection of a memorial to the honor of him who has led us through another year. The annual proclamations which call to the duty of thanksgiving are calculated to remind the people of their indebtedness to God, to stir in their minds and hearts emotions of gratitude and praise, and to call out thanks and sincere worship which otherwise might not find expression. But if the observance of the day be not marked by real remembering of mercies and by real lifting of hearts to God in thanks, what blessing can possibly come with it?—J. R. Miller, D. D.

As we gather about the family board to-day let us remember the houseless and homeless and unfriended, and be sure that we have done something to make sunshine in their hearts, no matter what November gloom may reign without. And as we grasp the hand and look into the eyes of friend and kinsman, be this the greeting we give: "Brother, whatever else our homes provide to-day of plenty and good cheer, let us provide things honest in the sight of all men," and then, in the name of that Master whom we serve and who has loved us with such a great exceeding love, "let all bitterness and wrath and anger and clamor and evil-speaking be put away from us with all malice; and let us be kind to one another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another," whatever the old wound that aches and burns to-day, "even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven us."—Henry C. Potter, D. D.

It seems to me that these thoughts are sufficient to awaken your gratitude. Let me, however, in conclusion, cast the horoscope and prophesy of the coming future of my beloved country. Poets have sung of the "parliament of nations, the federation of the world," and that great soldier who drew his sword only to conquer, who has visited all lands, and who to-day is a citizen of the world—that great soldier is the John the Baptist of this "parliament of nations, this federation of the world," in proclaiming everywhere a citizenship intelligent, cultured, Christian, and we are to follow in his glorious wake in our mission to the nations of the world. I do not look for a universal republic, but I dream of this parliament of nations, when wars shall cease, when the drum shall be silent, when the cannon shall be heard no more, when the sword shall be sheathed. I dream of this federation of the world, when the nations shall gather somewhere—on the banks of the Potomac, or on the banks of the Thames, or on the banks of the Tiber. And in this parliament of nations all men shall be brothers; war shall be abolished, and Jesus Christ proclaimed the Saviour of mankind, the Prince of peace, and the Lord of lords. Then will go forth these beautiful words of the Psalmist, "He hath not dealt so with any other nation."—J. P. Newman, D. D.

Let all pleasures be more pleasant, let all grief with help be nerved,
Let all blessings praise their sources, with the thanks that are deserved!
Every spirit should look heavenward, every heart should tribute pay,
To the Soul of souls that treats us to the Grand Old Day. —Will Carleton.

However flowerless the ways
Of grim November,
However dull and drear her days,
We should remember
One happy time she sets apart
For royal living,
A gift to cheer and bless each heart,—
It is Thanksgiving!
Emma C. Dowd.

Lord, for the erring thought
Not into evil wrought;
Lord, for the baffled will Betrayed, and baffled still;
For the heart from itself kept
Our thanksgiving accept.

For ignorant hopes that were Broken to our blind prayer;
For pain, death, sorrow, sent Unto our chastisement;
For all loss of seeming good Quickened our gratitude. —C. G.

But some may think this is not the time of year for a Feast of Tabernacles, since the summer is gone, and even the glory of autumn has disappeared. The forests are stripped of their foliage, and the mountains around our valley are bleak and bare. But our Thanksgiving, being more than a month later than the Feast of Tabernacles as kept by the Jews, cannot be observed, as that was, out of doors, in tents and booths that were pitched on all the hills round about Jerusalem. Our festival is not out of doors, but indoors, where we laugh at the winds that blow and the storms that rage without, which do but add to our sense of comfort and security. If some city-bred stranger, whose blood is thin and whose face is pale, should come up among these hills at this season of the year, and straightway begin to shiver as he muffles himself up in his overcoat lined with furs, and chatters between his teeth, "How the wind howls!" we answer, "Let it howl! Little harm can it do us, as we sit before the great open fireplace, and pile on the logs, and hear the flames roar up the chimney!" Indeed, it is the contrast between the wintry scene without and the warmth and glow within that gives a peculiar charm to a Thanksgiving in the country, as it does to Christmas also. And so let us gather round the fire to-night. Do not light the lamp, for there is nothing to stir up old memories like the fire on the hearth, that flashes up in the faces of those we love.—Henry M. Field, D. D.

This is Thanksgiving day. Its observance ought to be in the best sense religious. And it might be well to this end to review the feelings and emotions with which we approach it. Much of our thankfulness may be purely selfish. There are some with whom things have gone well this year. The family circle has remained unbroken. No wasting sickness has come into the home. Prosperity has left its blessings. The table is laden with plenty. There is meat in the larder and grain in the storehouse. Because of these things they imagine they are grateful; but such gratitude is of the essence of selfishness. It is dependent upon exterior conditions. It finds its basis in circumstances. It draws its inspiration from clear skies and smooth sailing, and hence it is fitful and evanescent as the alternations of sunlight and shadow. If these conditions of personal comfort and prosperity are in themselves the ground of thankfulness, where in the hour of adversity shall we find occasion for rejoicing? The record of the past has its graver side. There have been pain and losses and disappointments and bereavements and heartaches. Where in these things is there reason and ground for gratitude? Has the empty larder, the bare table, the desolate home, the vacant chair, the fresh mound in the cemetery, no place for thanksgiving? Ah, just here is the point of stumbling with many an earnest soul. We find in the bitter chill of adversity the true test of our gratitude. And that is true gratitude which, triumphing over conditions merely physical and external, finds its ground of thankfulness in God Himself. It is independent of circumstances. It goes beneath the surface of life, whether sad or joyous, and founds itself upon God.

For the festival of Thanksgiving to-day tho an American institution and a matter of proclamation on the part of the administration, is a thing that goes deeper than its national significance, and finds its firm root, not merely in the affections and the customs of one people, but in that potent imagination everywhere that speaks the aspirations of mankind, and voices in no vague tones the triumph of common humanity. To us individually Thanksgiving signifies a reunion of kinsfolk under the natal roof, at the hearthstone, which is the heartstone, and this reunion is for a joyous discussion of especially good cheer and a gentle rewelding of the old associations of consanguinity. But to us collectively as a people Thanksgiving means more. It stands to-day for what it stood in that almost primeval wilderness when the forlornly brave little band which came over on the Mayflower celebrated their gratitude to Him who had preserved them from the perils of the deep; when they performed the rites of hospitality to the savages whose minds had been inclined toward them in kindness; and when furthermore, they gave shape and example to that spirit of co-operation and fraternal love which was destined to ripen in the following century into a republic broad-based on the rights of every man.—Henry Austin.

One cycle more, with rich fruition crowned,
Hastes to fulfilment of its perfect round,— Great year of wonder, and of vast em-
prise!—

For all its gifts, ay, let Thanksgiving rise,
The hero's prowess—bloodless victory won;
The martyr's patience, sternest duty done,— Yet, loftier pæans still, for war's sur-
cease,—

For God's best gift,—the precious boon of peace!

For garnered opulence of flock and field,
Joys ever new, revolving seasons yield,—
For those bright presences of radiant
night,—

The garment-hem of Glory Infinite,— Blithe speech of birds, and bloom of sunny
bower,

Health, home, and love,—the best of earthly dower,—

Yet in thy gracious time of strife's release, Thank God, ye people, for His gift of
peace.
—J. Zitella Cocke.

It should be the aim of Christian people, in all their keeping of the day, whether in the sacred gladness of the home, in public services in church or Sunday-school, or in festivities of whatever kind, to have the true meaning of Christmas remembered, that the influence of the child Jesus may pervade all the thought of the day. So should it be with Thanksgiving day. To leave God out is to make the day an empty name without meaning. Thanksgiving is nothing if not a glad and reverent lifting of the heart to God in honor and praise for His goodness. As an annual festival it is meant to gather into one day the gratitude of a nation for the favors and mercies of a year. This does not imply that we can put all our thanksgiving for a year into one day. We may not be murmurers for three hundred and sixty-four days, and then atone for our ingratitude by praising and blessing God for one whole day. The normal Christian life is one whose thanksgiving fills every day of the year with song and gladness.—J. R. Miller, D. D.

We must conclude, therefore, that the great hymn of thanksgiving is not of local origin; it was not written in our prairies alone, but it was composed by the human soul when it first sat down and pondered over the mysterious visit it was making to this realm; and it has been sung ever since by each person who has reached the power of mind that is capable of a deep or sweet or sad thought. This slumbering hymn or prayer simply broke out in 1621. There must have been in that Mayflower group some heart of man or woman which had no concealment. It sang aloud the thanksgiving song of the world, and prayed its prayer to the God of man's being. This one soul said, "Let us have a great autumn feast soon." When New England possessed only about a hundred people it was easy for a feast to become national. What a change since then! For now the feast is proclaimed to sixty-five millions of citizens, and eight hundred railroads are busy carrying the food for the banquet—roads from California with fruits, roads from the South with the products of a long summer-time, trains from the Northwest with bread, trains from the Atlantic coast with food from the tropics and from the sea. What a change since the four men went hunting! And yet the then and the now blend in one song, and that to the God of our life.—Prof. David Swing.

The blessings we are used to, become so much the habit of our lives that we are apt to take them for granted and to fail to be stirred by them to any positive emotion of thankfulness. There are those who, ever mindful of the unequal measure in which privilege, opportunity and all material goods are distributed in this world, are always consciously grateful for the ordinary, every-day comforts; for food and shelter and decent surroundings and a peaceful life. But most of us, differently constructed, are prone to consider that all we are used to have is ours by a natural right, and that on the whole it is rather a hardship that we cannot contrive to have an ever-increasing share of sugar-plums allotted to us. We that are of that disposition must try at Thanksgiving to come to a fuller appreciation of our more recondite blessings, as well as of those which we accept as matters of course. As Riley puts it in his Thanksgiving poem—

Let us be thankful, thankful for the prayers

Whose gracious answers were long, long delayed,

That they might fall upon us unawares,
And bless us, as in greater need we prayed.

—E. C. Martin.

Along the hills that autumn's grace
Hath lit with sudden tints of flame,
One comes, with sweet, uplifted face,
Singing her praises to His name,
Whose hand the ready blessings heap,
Whose endless love a world doth keep.

A spirit of thanksgiving born
Of grateful people, blessed of God,
Whose barns He fills with golden corn;
Whose level fields of lifeless sod,
His sunshine and His fragrant rains,
Have quickened into fruitful plains.

E'en should the angry clouds uplift
Dark faces on the trembling days,
The seeming ill is yet God's gift;
Out of the shadows lift His praise.
Calm as the child who, smiling, hears
The footsteps of advancing years.
—Mrs. L. B. Hall.

To recall the circumstances of the first day of thanksgiving may serve to remind us of how much more we have to be thankful for than had those early Pilgrims. History tells us that of the one hundred and two emigrants that landed on the bleak and rocky coast of Cape Cod Bay in the winter of 1620, almost half died before the following winter fairly set in. To-day, in our comfortable country and city homes, we cannot even imagine the sufferings of the survivors, both from destitution and the inclement weather, which they were not prepared, either as to clothes or habitations, to brave. The most of the brave people were not inured to hardships; among them were delicately nurtured men and women.

They staked and laid out two rows of huts for the nineteen families that composed the colony; but within the first year they had to make seven times more graves for the dead than houses for the living. Notwithstanding all their trials and hardships, these brave founders of a great and glorious race had so much to be thankful for that they had to appoint "an especial day on which to give especial thanks for all their mercies." So they agreed among themselves that, since their prudence and forethought had been so wonderfully blessed of God, they would send out four men hunting, that they might rejoice together in a special manner after the fruit of their labors had been gathered. According to the historian, barley and Indian corn were their only crops; the "pease were not worth gathering; for, as we feared, they were too late sown." This was under the good Governor Bradford. The four men who went hunting brought in as much game as served the company for a week. The recreations of the day consisted of the exercise of their arms, Massasoit, the Indian chief, and ninety of his men, coming among them for three days, during which they were entertained and feasted by the colonists, the Indians killing and bringing to the feast five deer. This was in 1621, and was the beginning of Thanksgiving day in America.—American Agriculturist.

It is not a good spiritual policy for us who are now living to thank God only for the material progress of our times; because these material things will soon give place to something better, and then our prayers and hymns will seem lost, and we who lived for them will seem to perish with them; but if we bless God for the sun that has held us in its arms, and for the autumns that have painted the fields and have set in mezzotint the sky and sea and land, then have we a worship which the future cannot take away from our souls or memories. To nothing better can far-off times ever come. As in this worship of life we can all run back and bend with Bradford and Standish in their prayers, and sit down with them at their feast, thus can the far future come back to us, and see in our religious acts and sentiments something good enough for their more golden age. Man's world changes, but human life may easily find an unchanging greatness. As the goodness of old Governor Bradford shines out through his irregular verse and distorted syntax, thus the merit of our race often is mingled with little defects, but still it may possess a beautiful and everlasting part. As the game and fruits on the table in 1621 would be good for our table to-day, so their happiness would be all we could wish this week in our reunions at home, because man's happiness comes chiefly from the fact of a heart at peace with the universe. Man must, for the most part, give thanks for his life rather than for the field through which it flows.—Prof. David Swing.

The Thanksgiving need bring us no special boasting that we live to-day, because such boasting reproaches that yesterday in which Christ lived, and in which the earth is all marked with the footsteps of the mighty. The day need bring no laments that we are poor or full of toil, for the words "poor" and "rich" play only a small part in the vast history of true happiness; no laments that we cannot live a hundred years from the present, for each century has the same God and the same personal questions, just as it has the same sunshine. The one task and joy of each mortal, in whatever age or land, is to weave a song out of his own days and years, and, in any time or condition, to breathe a prayer in the name of his soul. The long and rich procession of humanity seen as filing over the great plains of the past—a procession headed by such beings as Jesus Christ—carrying banners of love, and chanting, as they march, the hymns of immortality, gives assurance that it is an amazing event for us to be carried through these many centuries in the great chariot of existence, and reason enough for our hymn and prayer of thanksgiving to the God of our life.

Theft

Stolen sweets are best.—Colley Cibber.

Every true man's apparel fits your thief.—Shakespeare.

In limited professions there's boundless theft.—Shakespeare.

Let me tell you, Cassius, you yourself
Are much condemn'd to have an itching palm. —Shakespeare.

O theft most base, that we have stolen what we do fear to keep!—
Shakespeare.

Thieves for their robbery have authority
When judges steal themselves.
—Shakespeare.

A plague upon it when thieves cannot be true one to another!—Shakespeare.

No Indian prince has to his palace
More followers than a thief to the gallows.
—Butler.

What is dishonestly got vanishes
in profligacy.—Cicero.

Suspicion always haunts the guilty mind; the thief still fears each bush an officer.—Shakespeare.

Well, well, be it so, thou strongest thief of
all,
For thou hast stolen my will, and made it
thine. —Tennyson.

Kill a man's family, and he may brook it,
But keep your hands out of his breeches' pocket. —Byron.

The robb'd that smiles steals something from the thief;
He robs himself that spends a bootless grief. —Shakespeare.

He that is robb'd, not wanting what is stol'n,
Let him not know 't, and he's not robb'd
at all. —Shakespeare.

Whether we force the man's property from him by pinching his stomach, or pinching his fingers, makes some difference anatomically; morally, none whatsoever.—Ruskin.

Virtuosi have been long remarked to have little conscience in their favorite pursuits. A man will steal a rarity who would cut off his hand rather than take the money it is worth. Yet, in fact, the crime is the same.—Horace Walpole.

Stolen sweets are always sweeter;
Stolen kisses much completer;
Stolen looks are nice in chapels;
Stolen, stolen be your apples.

—Thomas Randolph.

Nay, take my life and all, pardon not that;
You take my house, when you do take the prop
That doth sustain my house; you take my life.
When you do take the means whereby I live.

—Shakespeare.

Shun such as lounge through afternoons and eves,
And on thy dial write—"Beware of thieves!"
Felon of minutes, never taught to feel
The worth of treasures which thy fingers steal;
Pick my left pocket of its silver dime,
But spare the right,—it holds my golden time.

—O. W. Holmes.

Your thief looks
Exactly like the rest, or rather better;
'Tis only at the bar, and in the dungeon,
That wise men know your felon by his features.

—Byron.

Who steals my purse steals trash; 'tis something, nothing;
'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands;
But he that filches from me my good name
Robs me of that which not enriches him,
And makes me poor indeed.

—Shakespeare.

I'll example you with thievery:
The sun's a thief, and with his great attraction
Robs the vast sea: the moon's an arrant
thief,
And her pale fire she snatches from the
sun;
The sea's a thief, whose liquid surge resolves
The moon into salt tears: the earth's a thief,
That feeds and breeds by a composture stolen
From general excrement: each thing's a thief.

—Shakespeare.

Who, to patch up his fame—or fill his purse—
Still pilfers wretched plans, and makes them worse;
Like gypsies, lest the stolen brat be known,
Defacing first, then claiming for his own.

—Churchill.

Thou hast stolen both mine office and my name;
The one ne'er got me credit, the other mickle blame.

—Shakespeare.

Theology

Theology is Anthropology.—Feuerbach.

All my theology is reduced to this narrow compass—"Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners."— Archibald Alexander.

The theological systems of men and schools of men are determined always by the character of their ideal of Christ, the central fact of the Christian system.—J. G. Holland.

We can no more have exact religious thinking without theology, than exact mensuration and astronomy without mathematics, or exact iron-making without chemistry.—John Hall.

Comparative theology testifies that Jesus Christ, who is not less truly the incarnation of the Christian's theology than of the Christian's God, is indeed the desire of the nations, but not their product, their invention, or their discovery.—George D. B. Pepper.

A theology at war with the laws of physical nature would be a battle of no doubtful issue. The laws of our spiritual nature give still less chance of success to the system which would thwart or stay them.—Channing.

He that seeks perfection upon earth leaves nothing new for the saints to find in heaven; for whilst men teach, there will be mistakes in divinity, and as long as no other govern, errors in the State.—F. Osborn.

Theology is but a science of mind applied to God. As schools change theology must necessarily change

Truth is everlasting, but our ideas of truth are not. Theology is but our ideas of truth classified and arranged.—Beecher.

A man must have a stout digestion to feed upon some men's theology; no sap, no sweetness, no life, but all stern accuracy, and fleshless definition. Proclaimed without tenderness, and argued without affection, the gospel from such men rather resembles a missile from a catapult than bread from a Father's hand.—C. H. Spurgeon.

Theory

To despise theory is to have the excessively vain pretension to do without knowing what one does, and to speak without knowing what one says.—Fontenelle.

The theory that can absorb the greatest number of facts, and persist in doing so, generation after generation, through all changes of opinion and of detail, is the one that must rule all observation.—John Weiss.

'Tis mighty easy o'er a glass of wine
On vain refinements vainly to refine,
To laugh at poverty in plenty's reign,
To boast of apathy when out of pain,
And in each sentence, worthy of the schools,
Varnish'd with sophistry, to deal out rules
Most fit for practice, but for one poor fault That into practice they can ne'er be brought.
—Churchill.

The human mind feels restless and dissatisfied under the anxieties of ignorance. It longs for the repose of conviction; and to gain this repose it will often rather precipitate its conclusions than wait for the tardy lights of observation and experiment. There is such a thing, too, as the love of simplicity and system.—a prejudice of the understanding which disposes it to include all the phenomena of nature under a few sweeping generalities,—an indolence which loves to repose on the beauties of a theory rather than encounter the fatiguing detail of its evidences.—Chalmers.

Thinkers

Those who have finished by making all others think with them, have usually been those who began by daring to think with themselves.—Colton.

The profound thinker always suspects that he is superficial.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

A thinker is a person.—Joseph Cook.

Beware when the great God lets loose a thinker on this planet.—Emerson.

In every epoch of the world, the great event, parent of all others, is it not the arrival of a Thinker in the world?—Carlyle.

The greater part of mankind may be divided into two classes; that of shallow thinkers who fall short of the truth; and that of abstruse thinkers who go beyond it.—Hume.

There are very few original thinkers in the world; the greatest part of those who are called philosophers have adopted the opinions of some who went before them.—Dugald Stewart.

Thinkers are scarce as gold; but he whose thoughts embrace all his subject, and who pursues it uninterruptedly and fearless of consequences, is a diamond of enormous size.—Lavater.

Thirst

There is no small pleasure in pure water.—Ovid.

It is wretched business to be digging a well just as thirst is mastering you.—Plautus.

The incessant fever of that arid thirst Which welcomes as a well the clouds that burst
Above their naked heads, and feels delight
In the cold drenchings of the stormy night.
—Byron.

The panting thirst, which scorches in the breath
Of those that die the soldier's fiery death,
In vain impels the burning mouth to crave
One drop—one last—to cool it for the grave.
—Byron.

Till taught by pain,
Men really know not what good water's
worth
If you had been in Turkey or in Spain,
Or with a famish'd boat's-crew had your
berth,
Or in the desert heard the camel's bell,
You'd wish yourself where truth is—in a well. —Byron.

Thoroughness

Whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing well.—Lord Chesterfield.

There is large difference between indolent impatience of labor and intellectual impatience of delay, large difference between leaving things unfinished because we have more to do or because we are satisfied with what we have done.—Ruskin.

Thought

Thought alone is eternal.—Owen Meredith.

Thoughts rule the world.—Emerson.

Thought is silence.—Sheridan.

Thought is free.—Shakespeare.

Thought is the seed of action.—
Emerson.

Thought is invisible nature.—Heine.

As he thinketh in his heart, so is he.—Bible.

Our thoughts are heard in heaven!
—Young.

Great thoughts proceed from the heart.—Vauvenargues.

Second thoughts, they say, are best.
—Dryden.

Thinking nurseth thinking.—Sir P.
Sidney.

Thoughts are winged.—Shakespeare.

Learning without thought is labor lost.—Confucius.

Impromptu thoughts are mental wild-flowers.—Mme. du Deffand.

Great thoughts ensure musical expression.—Emerson.

Those thoughts that wander through eternity.—Milton.

A thought often makes us notter than a fire.—Longfellow.

Our century is a brutal thinker.— Béranger.

Make your best thoughts into action.—Mme. Necker.

A woman's thought runs before her actions.—Shakespeare.

Thought will not work except in silence.—Carlyle.

Thoughts that breathe and words that burn.—Gray.

Their own second and sober thoughts.—Matthew Henry.

Thought is parent of the dead. —
Carlyle.

In solitude all great thoughts are born.—Moses Harvey.

Those who think must govern those that toil.—Goldsmith.

Great thoughts reduced to practice become great acts.—Hazlitt.

Thought takes man out of servitude into freedom.—Emerson.

Thought once awakened does not again slumber.—Carlyle.

The mind grows by what it feeds on.—J. G. Holland.

Our best thoughts come from others.—Emerson.

He that never thinks never can be wise.—Johnson.

A delicate thought is a flower of the mind.—Charles Rollin.

Piece out our imperfections with your thoughts.—Shakespeare.

Thought is the measure of life.—
C. G. Leland.

Still are the thoughts to memory
dear.—Scott.

The ancestor of every action is a thought.—Emerson.

My thoughts and I were of another world.—Ben Jonson.

Labor is life; thought is light.—
Victor Hugo.

Every thought was once a poem.—
Charles H. Parkhurst.

Nurture your minds with great thoughts.—Beaconsfield.

The dome of thought, the palace of the soul.—Byron.

All our dignity lies in our thoughts.—Pascal.

Strange thoughts beget strange deeds.—Shelley.

Thought discovered is the more possessed.—Young.

First thoughts are not always the best.—Alfieri.

The value of a thought cannot be told.—Bailey.

Sky - aspiring and ambitious thoughts.—Shakespeare.

My thoughts are whirled like a potter's wheel.—Shakespeare.

The material of thought re-acts upon the thought itself.—Lowell.

Thought is the wind, knowledge the sail, and mankind the vessel.—Hare.

Many men's thoughts are not acorns,
but merely pebbles.—Charles Buxton.

Men possessed with an idea cannot be reasoned with.—Froude.

In the quick forge and working house of thought.—Shakespeare.

Thought precedes the will to think,
and error lives ere reason can be born.
—Congreve.

The power of thought—the magic of the mind.—Byron.

Everywhere that a great soul gives utterance to its thoughts, there also is a Golgotha.—Heinrich Heine.

What the Puritans gave the world was not thought, but action.—Wendell Phillips.

Earnest men never think in vain,
though their thoughts may be errors.
—Bulwer-Lytton.

Through aisles of long-drawn centuries my spirit walks in thought.—
Lowell.

One thought cannot awake without awakening others.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

It is godlike to unloose the spirit,
and forget yourself in thought.—N.
P. Willis.

Chamfort makes me laugh and think at the same time; that is true wit.—
Mme. Roland.

One can see him [Thiers] think through his skin.—Lamartine.

Man thinks, and at once becomes the master of the beings that do not think.—Buffon.

The man of thought strikes deepest and strikes safest.—Savage.

Reflection increases the vigor of the mind, as exercise does the strength of the body.—Lévis.

It is fine to stand upon some lofty mountain thought, and feel the spirit stretch into a view.—Bailey.

A moment's thought is passion's passing knell.—Keats.

To live thy better, let thy worst thoughts die.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

One does not see his thought distinctly till it is reflected in the image of another's.—Alcott.

Slow seems their speed whose thoughts before them run.—Sir William Davenant.

In matters of conscience first thoughts are best; in matters of prudence last thoughts are best.—Robert Hall.

Not a single path
Of thought I tread, but that it leads to God.
—Bailey.

And Thought leapt out to wed with Thought,
Ere Thought could wed itself with Speech.
—Tennyson.

Sudden a thought came like a full-blown
rose,
Flushing his brow. —Keats.

Thoughts so sudden, that they seem
The revelations of a dream.
—Longfellow.

They are never alone that are accompanied with noble thoughts.—Sir Philip Sidney.

If you are not a thinking man, to what purpose are you a man at all?
—S. T. Coleridge.

God put in man thought; society, action; nature, revery.—Victor Hugo.

Growing thought makes growing revelation.—George Eliot.

Faster than spring-time showers comes thought on thought.—Shakespeare.

High-erected thoughts, seated in a heart of courtesy.—Sir P. Sidney.

A single grateful thought towards heaven is the most perfect prayer.—Lessing.

One thought settles a life, an immortality.—Bailey.

In the interchange of thought use no coin but gold and silver.—Joubert.

Those flimsy webs that break as soon as wrought, attain not to the dignity of thought.—Cowper.

Ours is the age of thought; hearts are stronger than swords.—Wendell Phillips.

I and my bosom must debate awhile, and then I would no other company.—Shakespeare.

One thought includes all thought, in the sense that a grain of sand includes the universe.—Coleridge.

Most men think indistinctly, and therefore cannot speak with exactness.—Johnson.

Thoughts shut up want air, and spoil like bales unopened to the sun.—Young.

Thought is the property of him who can entertain it, and of him who can adequately place it.—Emerson.

Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears.—Wordsworth.

The surest pledge of a deathless name
Is the silent homage of thoughts unspoken. —Longfellow.

My own thoughts
Are my companions. —Longfellow.

Our thoughts are ours, their ends none of our own.—Shakespeare.

To dazzle let the vain design; to raise the thought, and touch the heart, be thine.—Pope.

All thoughts that mould the age begin Deep down within the primitive soul.
—Lowell.

Mind is the great lever of all things: human thought is the process by which human ends are alternately answered.—Daniel Webster.

Among mortals second thoughts are the wisest.—Euripides.

Thought is valuable in proportion as it is generative.—Bulwer-Lytton.

There is a wide difference between the original thinker and the merely learned man.—Schopenhauer.

Thoughts are but dreams till their effects be tried.—Shakespeare.

Kindred objects kindred thoughts inspire,
As summer clouds flash forth electric fire.
—Rogers.

Bad thoughts quickly ripen into bad actions.—Bishop Porteous.

From this time forth
My thoughts be bloody, or be nothing worth!
—Shakespeare.

Clearness is the ornament of profound thought.—Vauvenargues.

Constant thought will overflow in words unconsciously.—Byron.

At Learning's fountain it is sweet to drink,
But 'tis a nobler privilege to think.
—J. G. Saxe.

Thought is always troublesome to him who lives without his own approbation.—Johnson.

In that sweet mood when pleasant thoughts bring sad thoughts to the mind.—Wordsworth.

The busiest of living agents are certain dead men's thoughts.—Bovee.

Speech is external thought, and thought internal speech.—Rivarol.

Orthodoxy is the Bourbon of the world of thought. It learns not, neither can it forget.—Professor Huxley.

'T is a base abandonment of reason to resign our right of thought.—Byron.

The ground
Of all great thoughts is sadness.
—Bailey.

Great thoughts, like great deeds, need no trumpet.—Bailey.

High erected thoughts seated in the heart of courtesy.—Sir P. Sidney.

There is nothing either good or bad but thinking makes it so.—Shakespeare.

No thought which ever stirred
A human breast should be untold.
—Robert Browning.

Our growing thought
Makes growing revelation.
—George Eliot.

The rich are too indolent, the poor too weak, to bear the insupportable fatigue of thinking.—Cowper.

Every thought which genius and piety throw into the world, alters the world.—Emerson.

A thought is often original, though you have uttered it a hundred times.
—O. W. Holmes.

A thought embodied and embrained in fit words walks the earth a living being.—Whipple.

But hushed be every thought that springs
From out the bitterness of things.
Wordsworth.

Knocks at our hearts, and finds our thoughts at home.—Young.

For thoughts are so great—aren't they, sir?
They seem to lie upon us like a deep flood.
—George Eliot.

Not from a vain or shallow thought His awful Jove young Phidias brought.
—Emerson.

Every day a little life, a blank to be inscribed with gentle thoughts.—Rogers.

Man is but a reed, the weakest in nature, but he is a thinking reed.—Blaise Pascal.

The three foundations of thought:
Perspicuity, amplitude and justness.
The three ornaments of thought:
Clearness, correctness and novelty.—Catherall.

Speech is the vestment of thought and expression its armor.—Rivarol.

His bold brow bears but the scars of mind, the thoughts of years, not their decrepitude.—Byron.

Every man has some peculiar train of thought which he falls back upon when he is alone. This, to a great degree, moulds the man.—Dugald Stewart.

Fully to understand a grand and beautiful thought requires, perhaps, as much time as to conceive it.—Joubert.

Thoughts perhaps, which, like fieldmice of the soul, leap under the feet and stick like adders.—Richter.

It is the hardest thing in the world to be a good thinker without being a good self-examiner.—Shaftesbury.

Yet I doubt not through the ages one increasing purpose runs,
And the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns. —Tennyson.

Fine thoughts are wealth, for the right use of which

Men are and ought to be accountable,—
If not to Thee, to those they influence.

—Bailey.

There is no thought in any mind,
but it quickly tends to convert itself into a power, and organizes a huge instrumentality of means.—Emerson.

There are few who have at once thought and capacity for action.
Thought expands, but lames; action animates, but narrows.—Goethe.

His thoughts are like mummies, em-balm'd in spices and wrapped about with curious envelopments; but, within, those thoughts themselves are kings.—Longfellow.

Many thoughts are so dependent upon the language in which they are clothed that they would lose half their beauty if otherwise expressed.—Ruskin.

If ill thoughts at any time enter into the mind of a good man, he doth not roll them under his tongue as a sweet morsel.—Matthew Henry.

A single thought is that which it is from other thoughts as a wave of the sea takes its form and shape from the waves which precede and follow it.—Coleridge.

Thinking is creating with God, as thinking is writing with the ready writer; and worlds are only leaves turned over in the process of composition, about his throne.—Henry Ward
Beecher.

Love's heralds should be thoughts,
Which ten times faster glide than the sun-
beams,
Driving back shadows over lowering hills.
—Shakespeare.

All the past of Time reveals
A bridal dawn of thunder-peals, Whenever Thought hath wedded Fact.
—Tennyson.

Whatso'er thy birth,
Thou wert a beautiful thought and softly bodied forth. —Byron.

Could we but keep our spirit to that height,
We might be happy; but the clay will sink
Its thoughts immortal. —Byron.

Acquire a government over your ideas, that they may come down when they are called, and depart when they are bidden.—Dr. I. Watts.

Thought means life, since those who do not think do not live in any high or real sense. Thinking makes the man.—Alcott.

Who, with tame cowardice familiar grown, would hear my thoughts, but fear to speak their own.—Churchill.

Give thy thoughts no tongue, nor any unproportioned thought his act.
Be thou familiar, but by no means vulgar.—Shakespeare.

It is strange that thought should depend upon the stomach, and still that men with the best stomachs are not always the best thinkers.—Voltaire.

With thought, with the ideal, is immortal hilarity, the rose of joy. Round it all the muses sing.—Emerson.

Those recesses of the inner life, which the God who made us keeps from every eye but His own.—Mrs. Jameson.

Only those thoughts which the most profound earnestness has produced and perfected take a cheerful form.—Jacobi.

He who would govern his actions by the laws of virtue must regulate his thoughts by those of reason.—Dr. Johnson.

Man is a thinking being, whether he will or no; all he can do is to turn his thoughts to best way.—Sir W. Temple.

The walls of rude minds are scrawled all over with facts, with thoughts. They shall one day bring a lantern and read the inscriptions.—Emerson.

Thought is the slave of life, and life time's fool; and time, that takes survey of all the world, must have a stop.—Shakespeare.

Thought can wing its way
Swifter than lightning-flashes or the beam
That hastens on the pinions of the morn.
—Percival.

Those who have finished by making all others think with them, have usually been those who began by daring to think with themselves.—Colton,

What a man thinks in his spirit in the world, that he does after his departure from the world when he becomes a spirit.—Swedenborg.

What would be the state of the highway of life, if we did not drive our thought-sprinklers through them, with valve open, sometimes?—O. W. Holmes.

Thought is the first faculty of man; to express it is one of his first desires; to spread it, his dearest privilege.—Abbé Raynal.

Thought is the property of him who can entertain it, and of him who can adequately place it.—Emerson.

Thought can never be compared with action, but when it awakens in us the image of truth.—Madame de Staël.

Thinking is but an idle waste of thought, And naught is everything, and everything is naught. —Horace and James Smith.

I scarcely understand my own intent, but, silkworm-like, so long within have wrought, that I am lost in my own web of thought.—Dryden.

A vivid thought brings the power to paint it; and in proportion to the depth of its source is the force of its projection.—Emerson.

Mark this well, ye proud men of action! Ye are, after all, nothing but unconscious instruments of the men of thought.—Heinrich Heine.

Ah! as you say, we should slip over many thoughts and act as though we did not perceive them.—Mme. de Sévigné.

Sometimes a dark thought crossed my fancy, like the sullen bat that flies athwart the melancholy moon at eve. —Owen Meredith.

The greatest events of an age are its best thoughts. It is the nature of thought to find its way into action.—Bovee.

Time is of no account with great thoughts, which are as fresh to-day as when they first passed through their author's minds, ages ago.—Samuel Smiles.

Her pure and eloquent blood
Spoke in her cheeks, and so distinctly wrought,
That one would almost say her body thought. —Dr. Donne.

Grand Thoughts that never can be wearied out, Showing the unreality of Time.
—Richard Monckton Milnes.

Thought on thought pressed o'er his soul, like those ocean waves, which tore thee, distant America, from the three continents.—Klopstock.

Beautiful thoughts flit across the brain, like butterflies in the sun's rays, and are as difficult to capture.—Anna Cora Mowatt.

If the thought is slow to come, a glass of good wine encourages it; and when it does come, a glass of good wine rewards it.—Sheridan.

Our brains are seventy year clocks. The Angel of Life winds them up once for all, then closes the case, and gives the key into the hands of the Angel of the Resurrection.—Holmes.

At the end of life thoughts hitherto impossible come to the collected mind, like good spirits which let themselves down from the shining heights of the past.—Goethe.

"Give me," said Herder to his son, as he lay in the parched weariness of his last illness,—"give me a great thought, that I may quicken myself with it."—Richter.

Our dispositions will be suitable to that which we most frequently think on: for the soul is, as it were, tinged with the colour and complexion of its own thoughts.—Antoninus.

A nation may be in a tumult to-day for a thought which the timid Erasmus placidly penned in his study more than two centuries ago.—Whipple.

Whatever that be which thinks, which understands, which wills, which acts, it is something celestial and divine, and upon that account must necessarily be eternal.—Cicero.

A man by tumbling his thoughts, and forming them into expressions, gives them a new fermentation, which works them into a finer body.—Jeremy Collier.

Large elements in order brought,
And tracts of calm from tempest made,
And world-wide fluctuation sway'd,
In vassal tides that follow'd thought.
—Tennyson.

There are very few original thinkers in the world, or ever have been;

the greatest part of those who are called philosophers have adopted the opinions of some who went before them.—Dugald Stewart.

Who can mistake great thoughts? They seize upon the mind; arrest and search and shake it; bow the tall soul as by wind; rush over it like rivers over reeds.—Bailey.

Good thoughts are blessed guests, and should be heartily welcomed, well fed, and much sought after. Like rose leaves, they give out a sweet smell if laid up in the jar of memory.—Spurgeon.

For thought, all bodiless, will soar above; and thus her Maker's image can display,—a boon nor time nor place nor death shall snatch away.—W. H. Leatham.

What exile from himself can flee?
To zones, though more and more remote,
Still, still pursues, where'er I be,
The blight of life—the demon Thought.
—Byron.

Thoughts must come naturally, like wild-flowers; they cannot be forced in a hot-bed, even although aided by the leaf-mould of your past.—Alexander Smith.

Thoughts there are, that need no embodying, no form, no expression. It is enough to hint at them vaguely; a word, and they are heard and seen.—Joubert.

Thoughts! what are they? They are my constant friends, who, when harsh fate its dull brow bends, uncloud me with a smiling ray, and in the depth of midnight force a day.—Flatman.

When our thoughts are born,
Though they be good and humble, one should mind
How they are reared, or some will go astray
And shame their mother.
—Jean Ingelow.

The more we examine the mechanism of thought, the more we shall see that the automatic, unconscious action of the mind enters largely into all its processes.—O. W. Holmes.

Perhaps 'tis pretty to force together
Thoughts so all unlike each other;
To mutter and mock a broken charm,
To dally with wrong that does no harm.
—Coleridge.

Old things need not be therefore true,
O brother men, nor yet the new;
Ah! still awhile the old thought retain,
And yet consider it again!
—Arthur Hugh Clough.

Men's thoughts and opinions are in a great degree vassals of him who invents a new phrase or re-applies an old epithet. The thought or feeling a thousand times repeated becomes his at last who utters it best.—Lowell.

The highest thoughts are those which are least dependent on language, and the dignity of any composition and praise to which it is entitled are in exact proportion to its dependency of language or expression.—Ruskin.

A very sea of thought; neither calm nor clear, if you will, yet wherein the toughest pearl-diver may dive to his utmost depth, and return not only with sea-wreck but with true orient.—Carlyle.

Thoughts come maimed and plucked of plumage from the lips, which, from the pen, in the silence of your own leisure and study, would be born with far more beauty.—Lady Blessington.

We should round every day of stirring action with an evening of thought. We learn nothing of our experience except we muse upon it.—Sovee.

O guard thy roving thoughts with jealous care, for speech is but the dial-plate of thought; and every fool reads plainly in thy words what is the hour of thy thought.—Tennyson.

It is only by labor that thought can be made healthy, and only by thought that labor can be made happy; and the two cannot be separated with impunity.—Ruskin.

There is a thread in our thoughts, as there is a pulse in our feelings; he who can hold the one knows how to think, and he who can move the other knows how to feel.—Disraeli.

Alas, we make a ladder of our thoughts, where angels step, but sleep ourselves at the foot; our high resolves look down upon our slumbering acts.—Miss L. E. Landon.

The thinker requires exactly the same light as the painter, clear, without direct sunshine, or blinding reflection, and, where possible, from above.—Schlegel.

It is curious to note the old sea-margins of human thought! Each subsiding century reveals some new mystery; we build where monsters used to hide themselves.—Longfellow.

By virtue of the Deity thought renews itself inexhaustibly every day, and the thing whereon it shines, though it were dust and sand, is a new subject with countless relations.—Emerson.

Liberty of thinking, and of expressing our thoughts, is always fatal to priestly power, and to those pious frauds on which it is commonly founded.—Hume.

Sweetest mother, I can weave no more to-day,
For thoughts of him come thronging,
Him for whom my heart is longing—
For I know not where my weary fingers stray.
—Sappho.

Though man a thinking being is defined,
Few use the grand prerogative of mind.
How few think justly of the thinking few!
How many never think, who think they do.
—Jane Taylor.

Come near me! I do weave
A chain I cannot break—I am possessed With thoughts too swift and strong for one ione human breast.
—Shelley.

Thoughts come into our minds by avenues which we never left open, and thoughts go out of our minds through avenues which we never voluntarily opened.—Emerson.

A thought is often original, though you have uttered it a hundred times. It has come to you over a new route, by a new and express train of association.—Holmes.

It is because we underrate thought, because we do not see what a great element it is in religious life, that there is so little of practical and consistent religion among us.—Chapin.

Ingenious philosophers tell you, perhaps, that the great work of the steam-engine is to create leisure for mankind. Do not believe them; it only creates a vacuum for eager thought to rush in.—George Eliot.

A man would do well to carry a pencil in his pocket, and write down the thoughts of the moment. Those that come unsought for are commonly the most valuable, and should be secured, because they seldom return.—Bacon.

The happiness of your life depends upon the quality of your thoughts; therefore guard accordingly, and take care that you entertain no notions unsuitable to virtue and reasonable nature.—Marcus Antoninus.

Flowing water is at once a picture and a music, which causes to flow at the same time from my brain, like a limpid and murmuring rivulet, sweet thoughts, charming reveries, and melancholy remembrances.—Alphonse Karr.

Unless a man can link his written thoughts with the everlasting wants of men, so that they shall draw from them as from wells, there is no more immortality to the thoughts and feelings of the soul than to the muscles and the bones.—Beecher.

It may be said that it is with our thoughts as with our flowers. Those whose expression is simple carry their seed with them; those that are double by their richness and pomp charm the mind, but produce nothing.—Joubert.

A thought by thought is piled, till some great truth
Is loosened, and the nations echo round, Shaken to their roots, as do the mountains now.
—Shelley.

The old thoughts never die, Immortal drearings,
Outlive their dreamers and are ours for aye;
No thought once form'd and utter'd can expire.
—Dr. Mackay.

He that has light within his own clear breast,
May sit i' th' centre and enjoy bright day:
But he that hides a dark soul, and foul thoughts,
Benighted walks under the midday sun.
—Milton.

Casual thoughts are sometimes of great value. One of these may prove the key to open for us a yet unknown apartment in the palace of truth, or a yet unexplored tract in the paradise of sentiment that environs it.—John Foster.

And yet, as angels in some brighter dreams
Call to the soul when man doth sleep,
So some strange thoughts transcend our wonted themes,
And into glory peep.
—Henry Vaughan.

Though an inheritance of acres may be bequeathed, an inheritance of knowledge and wisdom cannot. The wealthy man may pay others for doing his work for him; but it is impossible to get his thinking done for him by another, or to purchase any kind of self-culture.—Samuel Smiles.

Such as are thy habitual thoughts, such also will be the character of thy mind; for the soul is dyed by the thoughts. Dye it then with a continuous series of such thoughts as these: that where a man can live, there he can also live well.—Marcus Antoninus.

All that we are is the result of what we have thought; it is founded on our thoughts, it is made up of our thoughts. If a man speaks or acts with an evil thought, pain follows him, as the wheel follows the foot of him who draws the carriage.—Buddha.

We should manage our thoughts as shepherds do their flowers in making a garland: first, select the choicest, and then dispose them in the most proper places, that every one may reflect a part of its color and brightness on the next.—Coleridge.

We may divide thinkers into those who think for themselves and those who think through others; the latter are the rule, the former the exception. Only the light which we have kindled in ourselves can illuminate others.—Schopenhauer.

We met, and we drank from the crystalline well,

That flows from the fountains of science above;

On the beauties of thought we would silently dwell,

Till we look'd—though we never were talking of love. —Percival.

The key to every man is his thought. Sturdy and defying though he look, he has a helm which he obeys, which is the idea after which all his facts are classified. He can only be reformed by showing him a new idea which commands his own.—Emerson.

When the great God lets loose a thinker on this planet, then all things are at risk. There is not a piece of science, but its flank may be turned to-morrow; there is not any literary reputation, nor the so-called eternal names of fame, that may not be revised and condemned.—Emerson.

I can readily conceive of a man without hands or feet; and I could conceive of him without a head, if experience had not taught me that by this he thinks. Thought, then, is the essence of man, and without this we cannot conceive of him.—Pascal.

Before men we stand as opaque bee-hives. They can see the thoughts go in and out of us; but what work they do inside of a man they cannot tell. Before God we are as glass beehives, and all that our thoughts are doing within us he perfectly sees and understands.—Beecher.

The only thought in the world that is worth anything is free thought. To free thought we owe all past progress and all hope for the future. Since when has any one made it appear that shackled thought could get on better than that which is free? Brains are a great misfortune if one is never to use them.—Savage.

Thinking leads man to knowledge. He may see and hear, and read and learn, as much as he please; he will never know any of it, except that which he has thought over, that which by thinking he has made the property of his mind. Is it then saying too much if I say, that man by thinking only becomes truly man? Take away thought from man's life, and what remains?—Pestalozzi.

I imagine that thinking is the great desideratum of the present age; and the cause of whatever is done amiss may justly be reckoned the general neglect of education in those who need it most, the people of fashion. What can be expected where those who have the most influence have the least sense, and those who are sure to be followed set the worst examples?—Bishop Berkeley.

Thought is the seed of action; but action is as much its second form as thought is its first. It rises in thought, to the end that it may be uttered and acted. The more profound the thought, the more burdensome. Always in proportion to the depth of its sense does it knock importunately at the gates of the soul, to be spoken, to be done.—Emerson.

It is by thought that has aroused my intellect from its slumbers, which has "given lustre to virtue, and dignity to truth," or by those examples which have inflamed my soul with the love of goodness, and not by means of sculptured marble, that I hold communion with Shakespeare and Milton, with Johnson and Burke, with Howard and Wilberforce.—Wayland.

A thinking man is the worst enemy the Prince of Darkness can have; every time such a one announces himself, I doubt not there runs a shudder through the nether empire; and new emissaries are trained with new tactics, to, if possible, entrap him, and hoodwink and handcuff him.—Carlyle.

Nothing is comparable to the pleasure of an active and prevailing thought.—a thought prevailing over the difficulty and obscurity of the object, and refreshing the soul with new discoveries and images of things; and thereby extending the bounds of apprehension, and as it were enlarging the territories of reason.—South.

Thought engenders thought. Place one idea on paper, another will follow it, and still another, until you have written a page; you cannot fathom your mind. There is a well of thought there which has no bottom; the more you draw from it, the more clear and fruitful it will be.—G. A. Sala.

All that a man does outwardly is but the expression and completion of his inward thought. To work effectually, he must think clearly; to act nobly, he must think nobly. Intellectual force is a principal element of the soul's life, and should be proposed by every man as the principal end of his being.—Channing.

The more we examine the mechanism of thought, the more we shall see that the automatic, unconscious action of the mind enters largely into all its processes. Our definite ideas are stepping-stones; how we get from one to the other, we do not know; something carries us; we do not take the step.—Holmes.

Many of the finest and most interesting emotions perish forever, because too complex and fugitive for expression. Of all things relating to man, his feelings are perhaps the most evanescent, the greater part dying in the moment of their birth. But while emotions perish, thought blended in diction is immortal.—W. B. Chulow.

The habit of reflecting gives an inner life, which all that we see animates and embellishes. In this disposition of the soul everything becomes an object of thought. If the young botanist trembles with joy at the sight of a new plant, the moral botanist joys no less to see germinate around him truths with a much superior prize to that of an unknown flower.—Bonstetten.

If I could think how these my thoughts to leave,
Or thinking still, my thoughts might have good end:

If rebel sense would reason's law receive;
Or reason foil'd would not in vain contend:
Then might I think what thoughts were best to think:

Then might I wisely swim, or gladly sink.
—Sir Philip Sidney.

Return, my thoughts, come home!
Ye wild and wing'd! what do ye o'er the deep?

And wherefore thus th' abyss of time o'ersweep

As birds the ocean foam?

Oh, no! return ye not!

Still farther, loftier let your soarings be!
Go, bring me strength from journeyings bright and free

O'er many a haunted spot.

Go, visit cell and shrine

Where woman has endur'd!—through wrong, through scorn,

Unshar'd by fame—yet silently upborne
By promptings more divine!

—Mrs. Hemans.

Thoughtlessness

Some people pass through life soberly and religiously enough, without knowing why, or reasoning about it, but, from force of habit merely, go to heaven like fools.—Sterne.

Ah, how unjust to nature and himself is thoughtless, thankless, inconsistent man!—Young.

Threats

Back to thy punishment,
False fugitive, and to thy speed add wings,
Lest with a whip of scorpions I pursue Thy ling'ring. —Milton.

I pr'ythee take thy fingers from my throat;
Sir, though I am not splenetic and rash,
Yet have I something in me dangerous,
Which let thy wiseness fear: away thy hand.
—Shakespeare.

For Christian shame, put by this barbarous brawl;
He that stirs next to carve for his own
rage,
Holds his soul light; he dies upon his motion. —Shakespeare.

Set hills on hills betwixt me and the man
That utters this, and I will scale them all;
And from the utmost top fall on his neck,
Like thunder from a cloud.
—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Hence,
Horrible villain! or I'll spurn thine eyes
Like balls before me; I'll unhair thy head;
Thou shalt be whipt with wire, and stew'd
in brine,
Smarting in ling'ring pickle.—Shakespeare.

Leave wringing of your hands: Peace; sit you down,
And let me wring your heart: for so I shall,
If it be made of penetrable stuff;
If damned custom have not braz'd it so,
That it be proof and bulwark against sense.
—Shakespeare.

I consider it a mark of great prudence in a man to abstain from threats or any contemptuous expressions, for neither of these weaken the enemy, but threats make him more cautious, and the other excites his hatred, and a desire to revenge himself.—Machiavelli.

Stand there, damn'd meddling villain, and be silent;
For if thou utter'st but a single word,
A cough or hem, to cross me in my speech,
I'll send thy cursed spirit from the earth,
To bellow with the damn'd!
—Joanna Baillie.

Thunder

Are there no stones in heaven
But what serve for the thunder?
—Shakespeare.

Thy thunder, conscious of the new command,
Rumbles reluctant o'er our fallen house.
—Keats.

Far along,
From peak to peak the rattling crags
among,
Leaps the live thunder. —Byron.

The herald, earth-accredited, of heaven,—which when men hear, they think upon heaven's king, and run the items over of the account to which he is sure to call them.—Sheridaz Knowles.

The thunder,
That deep and dreadful organ-pipe, pro-nounc'd
The name of Prosper; it did bass my trespass. —Shakespeare.

To stand against the deep, dread-bolted
thunder?
In the most terrible and nimble stroke
Of quick, cross lightning?—Shakespeare.

The thunder,
Wing'd with red lightning and impetuous
rage,
Perhaps hath spent his shafts, and ceases
now
To bellow through the vast and boundless deep. —Milton.

A storm-cloud lurid with lightning,
And a cry of lamentation,
Repeated and again repeated,
Deep and loud
As the reverberation
Of cloud answering unto cloud,
Swell and rolls away in the distance,
As if the sheeted
Lightning retreated, Baffled and thwarted by the wind's resistance. —Longfellow.

Tide

Love has a tide!—Helen Hunt
Jackson.

The punctual tide draws up the bay,
With ripple of wave and hiss of spray.
—Susan Coolidge.

I saw the long line of the vacant shore,
The sea-weed and the shells upon the sand,
And the brown rocks left bare on every
hand,
As if the ebbing tide would flow no more.
—Longfellow.

All night the thirsty beach has listening lain
With patience dumb,
Counting the slow, sad moments of her
pain;
Now morn has come,
And with the morn the punctual tide again.
—Susan Coolidge.

The western tide crept up along the sand,
And o'er and o'er the sand,
And round and round the sand,
As far as eye could see The rolling mist came down and hid the
land:
And never home came she.
—Charles Kingsley.

The tide rises, the tide falls,
The twilight darkens, the curlew calls;

The little waves, with their soft, white
hands,
Erase the footprints in the sands,
And the tide rises, the tide falls.
—Longfellow.

Tide flowing is feared, for many a thing,
Great danger to such as be sick, it doth bring;
Sea ebb, by long ebbing, some respite doth
give,
And sendeth good comfort, to such as shall live. —Tusser.

waste of time.—Shakespeare.

His time's forever, everywhere his place.—Abraham Cowley.

Nae man can tether time or tide.—
Burns.

What does not destructive time destroy?—Horace.

Man seems to be deficient in nothing so much as he is in time.—Zeno.

Time,—that black and narrow isthmus between two eternities.—Colton.

Thou shoreless flood, which in thy ebb and flow claspest the limits of mortality.—Shelley.

As if you could kill time without injuring eternity.—Thoreau.

The end crowns all; and that old common arbitrator, Time, will one day end it.—Shakespeare.

The great rule of moral conduct is, next to God, to respect time.—Lavater.

Whatever passes away is too vile to be the price of time, which is itself
the price of eternity.—Massillon.

O time! whose verdicts mock our own, the only righteous judge art thou!—T. W. Parsons.

Time doth transfix the flourish set on youth, and delves the parallels in beauty's brow.—Shakespeare.

One always has time enough, if one will apply it well.—Goethe.

Think with terror on the slow, the quiet power of time.—Schiller

Time never bears such moments on his wing as when he flies too swiftly to be marked.—Joanna Baillie.

Time is, after all, the greatest of poets; and the sons of Memory stand a better chance of being the heirs of Fame.—Lowell.

Time, the corrector when our judgments err, the test of truth and love; sole philosopher, for all besides are sophists.—Byron.

Time is a blooming field: nature is ever teeming with life; and all is seed, and all is fruit.—Schiller.

If you could throw as an alms to those who would use it well the time that you fritter away, how many beggars would become rich!—Elizabeth, Queen of Roumania.

Time, as a river, hath brought down to us what is more light and superficial, while things more solid and substantial have been immersed.—Glanvill.

Backward, turn backward, O Time in your flight!
Make me a child again, just for to-night!
—Elizabeth Akers Allen.

The bell strikes one. We take no note of time,
But from its loss. To give it then a tongue,
Is wise in man. —Young.

Time shall unfold what plighted cunning hides;
Who covers faults, at last shame them derides.
—Shakespeare.

I never knew the old gentleman with the sythe and hour-glass bring anything but gray hairs, thin cheeks, and loss of teeth.—Dryden.

Nor do they speak properly who say that time consumeth all things; for time is not effective, nor are bodies destroyed by it.—Sir T. Browne.

Still on it creeps, each little moment at another's heels, till hours, days, years, and ages are made up.—Joanna Ballie.

But what minutes! Count them by sensation, and not by calendars, and each moment is a day and the race a life.—Benj. Disraeli.

* * * So often do the spirits
Of great events stride on before the events,
And in to-day already walks to-morrow.
—Coleridge.

Swift, speedy Time, feathered with flying hours,
Dissolves the beauty of the fairest brow.
—Samuel Daniel.

Time, to the nation as to the individual, is nothing absolute; its duration depends on the rate of thought and feeling.—Draper.

arrow-swift, the present sweepeth;
and motionless forever stands the past.
—Schiller.

Seven hours to law, to soothing slumber
^{seven,}
Ten to the world allot, and all to heaven.
—Sir Wm. Jones.

When time is flown, how it fled
It is better neither to ask nor tell,
Leave the dead moments to bury their dead.
—Owen Meredith.

Time eftsoun will tumble
All of us together like leaves in a gust, Humbled indeed down into the dust.
—Joaquin Miller.

While man is growing, life is in decrease,
And cradles rock us nearer to the tomb;
Our birth is nothing but our death begun.
—Young.

How many ages hence
Shall this our lofty scene be acted over
In states unborn and accents yet unknown.
—Shakespeare.

Who well lives, long lives: for this age of ^{ours} Should not be numbered by years, daies, and hours. —Du Bartas.

Nothing lies on our hands with such uneasiness as time. Wretched and thoughtless creatures! In the only place where covetousness were a virtue we turn prodigals.—Addison.

There are no fragments so precious as those of time, and none are so heedlessly lost by people who cannot make a moment, and yet can waste years.—
Montgomery.

As nothing truly valuable can be attained without industry, so there can be no persevering industry without a deep sense of the value of time.
—Mrs. Sigourney.

Time sheds a softness on remote objects or events, as local distance imparts to the landscape a smoothness and mellowness which disappear on a nearer approach.—W. B. Clulow.

We sleep, but the loom of life never stops; and the pattern which was weaving when the sun went down is weaving when it comes up to-morrow.

—Beecher.

Opinions, theories, and systems pass by turns over the grindstone of time, which at first gives them brilliancy and sharpness, but finally wears them out.—Rivarol.

A year! A life! What are they!
The telling of a tale, the passing of a meteor, a dim speck seen for a moment on time's horizon dropping into eternity.—Thomason.

Time is painted with a lock before,
and bald behind, signifying thereby,
that we must take time (as we say) by the forelock, for when it is once passed there is no recalling it.—Swift.

Lost, yesterday, somewhere between sunrise and sunset, two golden hours, each set with sixty diamond minutes.
No reward is offered, for they are gone forever!—Horace Mann.

Make use of time, if thou valuest eternity. Yesterday cannot be recalled; to-morrow cannot be assured; to-day only is thine, which, if thou procrastinatest, thou lovest; which loss is lost forever.—Jeremy Taylor.

Let's take the instant by the forward top;
For we are old, and on our quick'st decrees
The inaudible and noiseless foot of Time Steals ere we can effect them.
—Shakespeare.

O, how shall summer's honey breath hold
^{out}
Against the wreckful siege of battering
^{days,}
When rocks impregnable are not so stout,
Nor gates of steel so strong, but Time decays —Shakespeare.

Gather ye rosebuds while ye may,
Old time is still a-flying;
And this same flower that smiles to-day,
To-morrow will be dying. —Herrick.

Like as the waves make towards the pebbled
^{shore,}
So do our minutes hasten to their end;
Each changing place with that which goes ^{before,}
In sequent toil all forwards do contend.
—Shakespeare.

Write it on your heart that every day is the best day in the year. No man has learned anything rightly until he knows that every day is Doomsday.—Emerson.

And, looking on it with lack-lustre eye,
Says very wisely, "It is ten o'clock:
Thus we may see," quoth he, "how the world wags." —Shakespeare.

Minutes, hours, days, months, and years,
Pass'd over to the end they were created,
Would bring white hairs unto a quiet grave.
Ah, what a life were this! —Shakespeare.

Make use of time, let not advantage slip;
Beauty within itself should not be wasted:
Fair flowers, that are not gather'd in their prime Rot and consume themselves in little time.
—Shakespeare.

O Time! Why dost not pause? Thy sythe so dirty
With rust, should surely cease to hack and hew.
Reset it; shave more smoothly, also slower,
If but to keep thy credit as a mower.
—Byron.

Come, Time, and teach me many years,
I do not suffer in dream;
For now so strange do these things seem,
Mine eyes have leisure for their tears.
—Tennyson.

Ever eating, never cloying,
All-devouring, all-destroying,
Never finding full repast,
Till I eat the world at last.—Swift.

Time, the cradle of hope, but the grave of ambition, is the stern cor-rector of fools, but the salutary counselor of the wise, bringing all they dread to the one, and all they desire to the other.—Colton.

We push time from us, and we wish him
back;
* * * * *
Life we think long and short; death seek and shun. —Young.

The more we live, more brief appear
Our life's succeeding stages;
A day to childhood seems a year,
And years like passing ages.
—Campbell.

Know the true value of time;
snatch, seize, and enjoy every moment of it. No idleness, no laziness, no procrastination; never put off till to-morrow what you can do to-day.—
Earl of Chesterfield.

Procrastination is the thief of time:
Year after year it steals, till all are fled,
And to the mercies of a moment leaves
The vast concerns of an eternal scene.
—Young.

The present is our own; but while we speak,
We cease from its possession, and resign
The stage we tread on, to another race,
As vain, and gay, and mortal as ourselves.
—Thomas Love Peacock.

Time, still as he flies, adds increase to her truth,
And gives to her mind what he steals from her youth. —Edward Moore.

This day was yesterday to-morrow nam'd:
To-morrow shall be yesterday proclaimed:
To-morrow not yet come, not far away,
What shall to-morrow then be call'd?
To-day. —Owen.

Time has laid his hand
Upon my heart, gently, not smiting it,
But as a harper lays his open palm
Upon his harp, to deaden its vibrations.
—Longfellow.

Day and night,
Seedtime an' harvest, heat and hoary frost Shall hold their course, till fire purge all things new. —Milton.

A handful of red sand from the hot clime
Of Arab deserts brought,
Within this glass becomes the spy of Time,
The minister of Thought.
—Longfellow.

Like wind flies Time 'tween birth and
death;
Therefore, as long as thou hast breath,
Of care for two days hold thee free:
The day that was and is to be.
—Omar Khayyám.

Hours are golden links, God's token Reaching heaven; but one by one Take them, lest the chain be broken Ere the pilgrimage be done.
—A. A. Proctor.

Think'st thou existence doth depend on
time?
It doth; but actions are our epochs; mine
Have made my days and nights imperishable,
Endless, and all alike. —Byron.

Time hurries on with a resistless, unremitting stream, yet treads more soft than e'er did midnight thief, that slides his hand under the miser's pillow and carries off the prize.—Blair

Time, whose tooth gnaws away everything else, is powerless against truth; and the lapse of more than two thousand years has not weakened the force of these wise words.—Huxley.

Catch! then, Oh, catch, the transient hour;
Improve each moment as it flies;
Life's a short summer—man a flower—
He dies—alas! how soon he dies!

—Dr. Johnson.

Time passes cold and indifferent over us; it knows nothing of our joys or sorrows; it leads us with ice-cold hand deeper and deeper into the labyrinth.—Ludwig Tieck.

Time is the most undefinable yet paradoxical of things; the past is gone, the future is not come, and the present becomes the past, even while we attempt to define it, and, like the flash of the lightning, at once exists and expires.—Colton.

God, who is liberal in all his other gifts, shows us, by the wise economy of His providence, how circumspect we ought to be in the management of our time, for He never gives us two moments together.—Fénelon.

There is nothing of which we are apt to be so lavish as of time, and about which we ought to be more solicitous, since without it we can do nothing in this world. Time is what we want most, but what, alas! we use worst.—William Penn.

Time is like a ship which never anchors; while I am on board, I had better do those things that may profit me at my landing, than practice such as shall cause my commitment when I come ashore.—Feltham.

Out upon Time! it will leave no more
Of the things to come than the things before!

Out upon Time! who forever will leave
But enough of the past for the future to grieve.

—Byron.

What is time? The shadow on the dial, the striking of the clock, the running of the sand—day and night, summer and winter, months, years, centuries—these are but arbitrary and outward signs, the measure of time, not time itself. Time is the life of the soul.—Longfellow.

Our lives are either spent in doing nothing at all, or in doing nothing to the purpose, or in doing nothing that we ought to do. We are always complaining that our days are few, and acting as though there would be no end to them.—Seneca.

O Time! the beautifier of the dead,
Adorner of the ruin, comforter
And only healer when the heart hath bled—
Time! the corrector where our judgments err,
The test of truth, love,—sole philosopher!
—Byron.

Time is eternity,
Pregnant with all eternity can give;
Pregnant with all that makes Archangels smile.
Who murders time, he crushes in the birth
A power ethereal, only not adored.
—Young.

Time is hastening on, and we What our fathers are shall be,— Shadow-shapes of memory!
Joined to that vast multitude
Where the great are but the good.
—Whittier.

Daughters of Time, the hypocrite Days,
Muffled and dumb like barefoot dervishes,
And marching single in an endless file,
To each they offer gifts after his will,
Bread, kingdoms, stars, and sky that holds them all.
—Emerson.

Time is like a fashionable host,
That slightly shakes his parting guest by the hand;
And with his arms outstretch'd, as he would fly,
Grasps-in the comer: Welcome ever smiles,
And farewell goes out sighing.
—Shakespeare.

He that lacks time to mourn, lacks time to mend:
Eternity mourns that. 'Tis an ill cure
For life's worst ills to have no time to feel them.
—Sir Henry Taylor.

Our acts of kindness we reserve for our friends, our bounties for our dependants, our riches for our children and relations, our praises for those who appear worthy of them, our time we give all to the world; we expose

it, I may say, a prey to all mankind.
—Massillon.

See the minutes how they run,
How many make the hour full complete;
How many hours bring about the day;
How many days will finish up the year;
How many years a mortal man may live.
—Shakespeare.

However we pass Time, he passes still,
Passing away whatever the pastime,
And, whether we use him well or ill,
Some day he gives us the slip for the last time. —Lord Lytton.

If time, like money, could be laid by while one was not using it, there might be some excuse for the idleness of half the world, but yet not a full one. For even this would be such an economy as the living on a principal sum, without making it purchase interest.—Sterne.

Observe a method in the distribution of your time. Every hour will then know its proper employment, and no time will be lost. Idleness will be shut out at every avenue, and with her that numerous body of vices that make up her train.—Bishop Horne.

The greatest loss of time is delay and expectation, which depends upon the future. We let go the present, which we have in our power, and look forward to that which depends upon chance—and so relinquish a certainty for an uncertainty.—Seneca.

Time is but a stream I go a fishing in. I drink at it; but while I drink
I see the sandy bottom, and detect how shallow it is. Its thin current slides away, but eternity remains. I would drink deeper, fish in the sky, whose bottom is pebbly with stars.—
Thoreau.

A wonderful stream is the River Time,
As it runs through the realms of Tears,
With a faultless rhythm, and a musical rhyme,
And a broader sweep, and a surge sublime
As it blends with the ocean of Years.
—Benjamin F. Taylor.

Time is scytheless and toothless; it is we who gnaw like the worm; we who smite like the scythe. It is ourselves who abolish, ourselves who consume; we are the mildew and the flame, and the soul of man is to its own work as the moth that frets when it cannot fly, and as the hidden flame that blasts where it cannot illumine.—Ruskin.

Expect, but fear not, Death: Death cannot kill,
Till Time (that first must seal his patent)
will.
Would'st thou live long? keep Time in high esteem:
Whom gone, if thou canst not recall, redeem. —Quarles.

His golden locks Time hath to silver turned,
O, time too swift! O swiftness never ceasing!
His youth 'gainst Time and Age hath ever spurned,
But spurned in vain! Youth waneth by increasing. —George Peele.

Time rides with the old
At a great pace. As travellers on swift steeds
See the near landscape fly and flow behind
them,
While the remoter fields and dim horizons Go with them, and seem wheeling round to meet them,
So in old age things near us slip away,
And distant things go with us.
—Longfellow.

Old Time, in whose banks we deposit our notes,
Is a miser who always wants guineas for groats;
He keeps all his customers still in arrears
By lending them minutes and charging them years. —O. W. Holmes.

Time sadly overcometh all things, and is now dominant, and sitteth upon a sphinx, and looketh unto Memphis and old Thebes, while his sister Oblivion reclineth semi-somnolent on a pyramid, gloriously triumphing, making puzzles of Titanian erections, and turning old glories into dreams.—Sir
Thomas Browne.

Alas! it is not till Time, with reckless hand, has torn out half the leaves
from the Book of Human Life to light the fires of human passion with, from day to day, that man begins to see that the leaves which remain are few in number.—Longfellow.

Think not thy time short in this world, since the world itself is not long. The created world is but a small parenthesis in eternity, and a short interposition, for a time, between such a state of duration as was before it and may be after it.—Sir Thomas Browne.

I made a posy while the day ran by;
Here will I smell my remnant out, and tie
My life within this band.
But time did beckon to the flowers, and they
By noon most cunningly did steal away,
And wither'd in my hand.
—Herbert.

That great mystery of time, were there no other: the illimitable, silent, never-resting thing called time, rolling, rushing on, swift, silent, like an all-embracing ocean-tide, on which we and all the universe swim like exhalations, like apparitions which are, and then are not: this is forever very literally a miracle; a thing to strike us dumb, for we have no word to speak about it.—Carlyle.

The best general means to insure the profitable employment of our time is to accustom ourselves to living in continual dependence upon the Spirit of God and His law, receiving, every instant, whatever He is pleased to bestow; consulting Him in every emergency requiring instant action, and having recourse to Him in our weaker moments when virtue seems to fail.—Fénelon.

In the spirit of faith let us begin each day, and we shall be sure to "redeem the time" which it brings to us, by changing it into something definite and eternal. There is a deep meaning in this phrase of the apostle, to redeem time. We redeem time, and do not merely use it. We transform it into eternity by living it aright.—J. F. Clarke.

The time which passes over our heads so imperceptibly makes the same gradual change in habits, manners and character as in personal appearance. At the revolution of every five years we find ourselves another and yet the same—there is a change of views and no less of the light in which we regard them; a change of motives as well as of action.—Walter Scott.

Time is a feathered thing,
And, whilst I praise
The sparkling of thy looks, and call them
rays,
Takes wing,
Leaving behind him as he flies
An unperceived dimness in thine eyes.
—Jasper Mayne.

Time hath, my lord, a wallet at his back,
Wherein he puts alms for oblivion,
A great-sized monster of ingratitude;
Those scraps are good deeds past; which are devour'd
As fast as they are made, forgot as soon
As done.
—Shakespeare.

If time be of all things the most precious, wasting time must be the greatest prodigality, since lost time is never found again; and what we call time enough always proves little enough. Let us then be up and doing, and doing to the purpose; so by diligence shall we do more with less perplexity.—Franklin.

How silent, how spacious, what room for all, yet without place to insert an atom—in graceful succession, in equal fullness, in balanced beauty, the dance of the hours goes forward still. Like an odor of incense, like a strain of music, like a sleep, it is inexact and boundless. It will not be dissected, nor unraveled, nor shown.—Emerson.

Hour after hour departs,
Recklessly flying;
The golden time of our hearts
Is fast a-dying:
O, how soon it will have faded!
Joy droops, with forehead shaded;
And Memory starts.
—John Hamilton Reynolds.

Time's glory is to calm contending kings,
To unmask falsehood, and bring truth to
light,
To stamp the seal of time in aged things,
To wake the morn and sentinel the night,
To wrong the wronger till he render right,
To ruin proud buildings with thy hours,
And smear with dust their glittering golden towers.
—Shakespeare.

Time is the most subtle yet the most insatiable of depredators, and by appearing to take nothing is permitted to take all; nor can it be satisfied until it has stolen the world from us, and us from the world. It constantly flies, yet overcomes all things by flight; and although it is the present ally, it will be the future conqueror of death.—Colton.

The hours of a wise man are lengthened by his ideas, as those of a fool are by his passions. The time of the one is long, because he does not know what to do with it; so is that of the other, because he distinguishes every moment of it with useful or amusing thoughts—or, in other words, because the one is always wishing it away, and the other always enjoying it.—Addison.

He who cannot find time to consult his Bible will one day find he has time to be sick; he who has no time to pray must find time to die; he who can find no time to reflect is most likely to find time to sin; he who cannot find time for repentance will find an eternity in which repentance will be of no avail; he who cannot find time to work for others may find an eternity in which to suffer for himself.—Hannah More.

There is nothing that we can properly call our own but our time, and yet everybody fools us out of it who has a mind to do it. If a man borrows a paltry sum of money, there must needs be bonds and securities, and every common civility is presently charged upon account. But he who has my time thinks he owes me nothing for it, though it be a debt that gratitude itself can never repay.—Seneca.

Tobacco, coffee, alcohol, hashish, prussic acid, strychnine, are weak dilutions; the surest poison is time. This cup which nature puts to our lips, has a wonderful virtue, surpassing that of any other draught. It opens the senses, adds power, fills us with exalted dreams, which we call hope, love, ambition, science; especially it creates a craving for larger draughts of itself.—Emerson.

Time is never more misspent than while we declaim against the want of it; all our actions are then tinctured with peevishness. The yoke of life is certainly the least oppressive when we carry it with good-humor; and in the shades of rural retirement, when we have once acquired a resolution to pass our hours with economy, sorrowful lamentations on the subject of time misspent and business neglected never torture the mind.—Zimmermann.

Time rolls his ceaseless course. The race of yore,
Who danced our infancy upon their knee,
And told our marvelling boyhood legends store,
Of their strange ventures happ'd by land
or sea,
How are they blotted from the things that
be!
How few, all weak and wither'd, of their force
Wait, on the verge of dark eternity,
Like stranded wrecks, the tide returning hoarse,
To sweep them from our sight! —Scott.

"Where is the world?" cries Young, at eighty. "Where
The world in which a man was born?"
Alas!
Where is the world of eight years past?
'Twas there—
I look for it—'tis gone, a globe of glass Cracked, shivered, vanished, scarcely gazed on ere
A silent change dissolves the glittering mass.
Statesmen, chiefs, orators, queens, patriots,
kings,
And dandies, all are gone on the wind's wings. —Byron.

O, how shall summer's honey breath hold
out Against the wreckful siege of battering
days,
When rocks impregnable are not so stout,
Nor gates of steel so strong, but Time
decays?
O fearful meditation! where, alack, Shall Time's best jewel from Time's chest lie hid?
Or what strong hand can hold his swift foot back?
Or who his spoil of beauty can forbid?
—Shakespeare.

To-day, to-morrow, every day, to thousands the end of the world is close at hand. And why should we fear it? We walk here, as it were,

In the crypts of life; at times, from the great cathedral above us, we can hear the organ and the chanting choir; we see the light stream through the open door, when some friend goes up before us; and shall we fear to mount the narrow staircase of the grave that leads us out of this uncertain twilight into life eternal?—Longfellow.

Even such is time! which takes in trust
Our youth, our joys, and all we have;
And pays us naught but age and dust,
Which, in the dark and silent grave,
When we have wandered all our ways,
Shuts up the story of our days.
And from which grave, and earth, and dust,
The Lord will raise me up, I trust.
—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Timidity

Women do not fancy timid men.—Mme. Deluzy.

Timidity is a disease of the mind.—Dr. Johnson.

Timidity challenges the scorn of women.—Massias.

That mute eloquence which passeth speech.—Rogers.

Looks that asked, yet dared not hope relief.—Rogers.

No woman dares express all she thinks.—J. Petit-Senn.

Silent when glad; affectionate, though shy.—Beattie.

An ounce of courage will go farther with women than a pound of timidity.—Balzac.

Death of thy soul! those linen cheeks of thine are counsellors to fear.—Shakespeare.

Early and provident fear is the mother of safety.—Burke.

The absent danger greater still appears; less fears he who is near the thing he fears.—Daniel.

A thousand fears still overawe when she appears.—Granville.

Bestow, base man, thy idle threats elsewhere; my mother's daughter knows not how to fear.—Dryden.

Women, somehow, have the same fear of witty men as of fireworks.—Douglas Jerrold.

The beings who appear cold, but are only timid, adore where they dare to love.—Mme. Swetchine.

Speechless with wonder and half dead with fear.—Addison.

A woman is seldom merciful to the man who is timid.—Bulwer-Lytton.

One with more of soul in his face than words on his tongue.—Wordsworth.

Presumption will be easily corrected; but timidity is a disease of the mind more obstinate and fatal.—Johnson.

Until every good man is brave, we must expect to find many good women timid—too timid even to believe in the correctness of their own best promptings, when these would place them in a minority.—George Eliot.

Love is frightened at the intervals of insensibility and callousness that encroach by little and little on the domain of grief, and it makes efforts to recall the keenness of the first anguish.—George Eliot.

Titles

Virtue is the first title of nobility.—Molière.

The fool or knave who wears a title lies.—Young.

Titles do not count with posterity.—Thomas Paine.

Of the king's creation you may be; but he who makes a count never made a man.—Southern.

High titles debase, instead of elevate, those who know not how to support them.—Rochefoucauld.

A truce to titles; I will none.—
Garibaldi.

Titles of honor add not to his worth, who is himself an honor to his title.—John Ford.

Of all trifles, titles are the lightest.
—J. Petit-Senn.

For it is not titles that reflect honor on men, but men on their titles.—
Machiavelli.

Titles are too "thin" for the nineteenth century.—Beecher.

A successive title, long and dark, drawn from the mouldy rolls of Noah's ark.—Dryden.

The three highest titles that can be given a man are those of martyr, hero, saint.—Gladstone.

I can make a lord, but only God Almighty can make a gentleman.—
James I.

Titles, indeed, may be purchased;
but virtue is the only coin that makes the bargain valid.—Burton.

Titles are of no value to posterity;
the name of a man who has achieved great deeds imposes more respect than any or all epithets.—Voltaire.

All transitory titles I detest; a vir-tuous life I mean to boast alone. Our birth's our sires'; our virtues be our own.—Drayton.

Titles of honor are like the impressions on coin; which add no value to gold and silver, but only render brass current.—Sterne.

How impious is the title of sacred majesty applied to a worm, who, in the midst of his splendor, is crumbling into dust.—Thomas Paine.

Kings do with men as with pieces of money; they give them what value they please, and we are obliged to receive them at their current and not at their real value.—Rochefoucauld.

I would not cross the street to make a Baptist, but I would go round the world to make a Christian.—Rev. Dr.
Sharp.

A fool, indeed, hath great need of a title; it teaches men to call him count and duke, and to forget his proper name of fool.—Crowne.

Titles are valuable; they make us acquainted with many persons who otherwise would be lost among the rubbish.—H. W. Shaw.

Title and ancestry render a good man more illustrious, but an ill one more contemptible. Vice is infamous, though in a prince; and virtue honorable, though in a peasant.—Addison.

Everything made by man may be destroyed by man. There are no ineffaceable characters except those engraved by nature; and she makes neither princes, nor rich men, nor lords.—Rousseau.

Titles and mottoes to books are like escutcheons and dignities in the hands of a king. The wise sometimes con-descend to accept of them; but none but a fool would imagine them of any real importance. We ought to depend upon intrinsic merit, and not the slender helps of the title.—Goldsmith.

Titles the servile courtier's lean reward.—Rowe.

We are all soldiers, and all venture
lives;
And where there's no difference in men's worths
Titles are all jests.

These are the lords
That have bought titles: men may merchandise
Wares, ay and traffic in all commodities
From sea to sea, and from shore to shore:
But in my thought, of all things that are sold.
'Tis pity honor should be bought for
gold:
It cuts off all desert. —Haywood.

Titles and profit I resign,
The post of honor shall be mine.
—Gay.

When I can read my title clear
To mansions in the skies.
—Watts.

These people, however fallen, are still men, and that is a very good title to my affection.—Goldsmith.

Thrones, dominions, princedoms, virtues, powers—
If these magnificent titles yet remain
Not merely titular. —Milton.

Some people are all quality; you would think they are made up of nothing but title and genealogy. The stamp of dignity defaces in them the very character of humanity and transports them to such a degree of haughtiness that they reckon it below themselves to exercise either good nature or good manners.—L'Estrange.

A lawyer is sometimes required to search titles, and the client who thinks he has good right to an estate, puts the papers in his hands, and the attorney goes into the public records and finds everything right for three or four years back; but after a time he comes to a break in the title. So he finds that the man who supposed he owned it owns not an acre of the ground which belongs to someone else.
I trace the title of this world from century to century until I find the whole right vested in God. Now to whom did he give it? To his own children. Ali are yours.—Talmage.

I look down upon him
With such contempt and scorn, as on my slave;
He's a name only, and all good in him
He must derive from his great grand-sire's ashes,
For had not their victorious acts bequeathed
His titles to him, and wrote on his forehead,
"This is a lord," he had lived unobserved
By any man of mark and died as one Amongst the common rout.
—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Title-Tattle

Take not into your ear that scum of hell that people call tittle-tattle.
Whosoever willingly listens to a slander is equally guilty with the one who tells it, and an old writer says they ought both to be hanged; the one by the tongue and the other by the ear.
Do not smile upon such a spaniel, lest like a pleased dog, he puts his dirty paw upon you.—Talmage.

Toasts

Quiet days, fair issue, and long life.
—Shakespeare.

Drink to me only with thine eyes,
And I will pledge with mine.
—Ben Jonson.

And he that will this health deny,
Down among the dead men let him lie.
—Dyer.

To the old, long life and treasure;
To the young, all health and pleasure.
—Ben Jonson.

The cannons to the heavens, the heavens to earth.
"Now the king drinks to Hamlet."
—Shakespeare.

Here's a health to the lass with the merry black eyes!
Here's a health to the lad with the blue ones! —Wm. Winter.

First pledge our Queen this solemn
night,
Then drink to England, every guest;
That man's the best Cosmopolite
Who loves his native country best.
—Tennyson.

My boat is on the shore,
And my bark is on the sea:
But, before I go, Tom Moore,
Here's a double health to thee!
—Byron.

Were 't the last drop in the well,
As I gasp'd upon the brink,
Ere my fainting spirit fell,
'Tis to thee that I would drink.
—Byron.

Toasts (To Sweetheart)

Here's to one; may she be won,

May their joys be as deep as the ocean,
And their misfortune as light as its foam.

May we have the unspeakable good fortune to win a true heart, and the merit to keep it.

Here's to the heart
Though another's it be;
Here's to the cheeks,
Though they bloom not for me.

Here's to the wings of love;
May they never moult a feather
Until your little barque and my little barque
Sail down the stream of life together.

Toasts (To Wives)

The greatest blessing heaven can send—a good wife.

A good wife and health
Are a man's best wealth.

May those who enter the rosy paths of matrimony never meet with thorns.

May all single men be married, and all married men be happy.

Here's to woman. Before marriage a queen. After marriage—a subject.

Here's to our sweethearts and our wives;

May our sweethearts soon become our wives,

And our wives ever remain our sweethearts.

Toasts (To Woman)

The ladies—God bless 'em.

The Ladies: With assiduity we court their smiles: with sorrow we receive their frowns; but smiling or frowning, we love them.

The Ladies: We admire them for their beauty, respect them for their intelligence, adore them for their virtue, and love them because we can't help it.

The fair daughters of Columbia: May they add virtue to beauty, subtract envy from friendship, multiply amiable accomplishments by sweetness of temper, divide time by sociality and economy, and reduce scandal to its lowest denomination by a modest Christian deportment.

To America's daughters—Let all fill their glasses,
Whose beauty and virtue the whole world surpasses;
May blessings attend them, go wherever they will,
And foul fall the man who e'er offers them ill.

Toasts (To Man)

He who thinks the most good and speaks the least ill of his neighbors—the man we love.

Toasts (Patriotic)

The American Navy: May it ever sail on a sea of glory.

Columbia: My country—with all thy faults, I love thee still.

Our Country: May she always be in the right—but our country, right or wrong.

Our Native Land: May it ever be worthy of our heartiest love.

The Nation: May there be no north, no south, no east, no west, but only one broad, beautiful, glorious land.

We mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honor.—Jefferson.

Here's to American valor: May no war require it, but may it ever be ready for every foe.

May the joys of America be as pure as its air of freedom, and its virtues be as firm as its mountains.

Our President: May he always merit the esteem and affection of a people ever ready to bestow gratitude on those who deserve it.

Toasts (Miscellaneous)

May we never speak to deceive, nor listen to betray.

May the lamp of friendship be lighted with the oil of sincerity.

May care be a stranger to the honest heart.

Here's wishing us all more friends and less need of them.

Here's to love, the only fire against which there is no insurance.

May the hinges of friendship never grow rusty.

May the happiest days of your past
Be the saddest days of your future.

May the road to happiness be lighted by virtue.

May the pleasures of youth never bring us pain in old age.

May we never know want till relief is at hand.

May fortune fill the cup where charity guides the hand.

May we never want bread to make a toast or a good cook to prepare it.

May the sunshine of comfort dispel the clouds of despair.

May we never murmur without cause, and never have cause to murmur.

May Dame Fortune ever smile on you,
But never her daughter—Miss Fortune.

May we always look upon the faults of others with the same eye we look upon our own.

May we have the unspeakable good fortune to win a true heart, and the merit to keep it.

May we always be under the orders of General Peace, General Plenty and General Prosperity.

Say why are beauties praised and honored most,
The wise man's passion and the vain man's Toast. —Pope.

Here's a sigh to those who love me,
And a smile for those who hate;
And whatever sky's above me,
Here's a heart for every fate.

A little health, a little wealth,
A little house and freedom,
With some few friends for certain ends.
But little cause to need 'em.

Here's to friends both near and far;
Here's to woman, man's guiding star;
Here's to friends we've yet to meet,
Here's to those here, all here I greet;
Here's to childhood, youth, old age;
Here's to prophet, bard and sage,
Here's a health to every one,
Peace on earth, and heaven won!

Come in the evening, or come in the morning—
Come when you're looked for, or come
without warning;
A thousand welcomes you'll find here
before you,
And the oftener you come here the more I'll adore you!
—Thomas Moore.

Should auld acquaintance be forgot,
And never brought to min'?
Should auld acquaintance be forgot,
And the days o' auld lang syne?
For auld lang syne, my dear,
For auld lang syne,
We'll tak a cup o' kindness yet
For auld lang syne!
—Robert Burns.

A garland for the hero's crest,
And twined by her he loves the best;
To every lovely lady bright,
What can I wish but faithful knight?
To every faithful lover, too,
What can I wish but lady true?
And knowledge to the studious sage;
And pillow soft to head of age.
To thee, dear school-boy, whom my lay
Has cheated of thy hour of play,
Light task and merry holiday!
To all, to each, a fair good-night,
And pleasing dreams and slumber light! —Sir Walter Scott.

Tobacco

Thou though' such a mist dost show
us,
That our best friends do not know us.
—Charles Lamb.

Pernicious weed ; whose scent the fair
annoys,
Unfriendly to society's chief joys,
Thy worst effect is banishing for hours
The sex whose presence civilizes ours.
—Cowper.

The pipe with solemn interposing puff, Makes half a sentence at a time enough ;
The dozing sages drop the drowsy
strain,
Then pause, and puff—and speak, and pause again. —Cowper.

Tobacco, an outlandish weed,
Doth in the land strange wonders
breed ;

It taints the breath, the blood it dries,
It burns the head, it blinds the eyes ;
It dries the lungs, scourgeth the lights,
It 'numbs the soul, it dulls the sprites ;
It brings a man into a maze,
And makes him sit for other's gaze ;
It mars a man, it mars a purse,
A lean one fat, a fat one worse ;
A white man black, a black man white,
A night a day, a day a night ;
It turns the brain like cat in pan,
And makes a Jack a gentleman.
—Fairholt.

Thou in such a cloud dost bind us,
That our worst foes cannot find us,
And ill fortune, that would thwart us,
Shoots at rovers, shooting at us ;
While each man, through thy height-
'ning steam,
Does like a smoking Etna seem.
—Charles Lamb.

To-day

One to-day is worth two to-morrows.—Benjamin Franklin.

To-morrow life is too late : live today.—Martial.

Be wise to-day ; 'tis madness to defer.—Young.

To-day is always different from yesterday.—Alexander Smith.

We know nothing of to-morrow ;
our business is to be good and happy to-day.—S. Smith.

Again he limiteth a certain day, saying in David, "To-day, after so long a time ; as it is said, To-day if ye will hear his voice harden not your hearts."—Bible.

Then what is the use of repining ?
For where there's a will there's a way.

To-morrow the sun may be shining
Although it is cloudy to-day.
—Old Song.

To-day is yesterday returned ; returned Full-powered to cancel, expiate, raise,
adorn,

And reinstate us on the rock of peace ;
Let it not share its predecessor's fate,
Nor like its elder sisters die a fool.
—Young.

So here hath been dawning

Another blue day,

Think wilt thou let it

Slip useless away ?

Out of eternity

This new day is born ;

Into eternity

At night will return.

Behold it aforetime

No eye ever did ;

So soon it for ever

From all eyes is hid.

—Carlyle.

A liberal worlding, gay philosopher Art thou that lift'st thy young and yellow head

O'er the dim burial of the scarce-cold
dead,

Building above thy brother's sepulchre
A home of love, that sense might almost err,

Dreaming thine end therein to woo
and wed

The flower-haired earth forever. Yet the red

In yonder West may well such dreams deter !

Yes, thou all-hail'd to-day, whose outstretched hand

Scatters loose riches on a bankrupt
land

Even though thou art but a leaf from off the tree

Of yellowing time ;—a grain of glis-
t'ning sand,

Dashed from the waters of that un-sailed sea

Where thou to-night shall sink, and I as soon may be. —Blanchard.

Thou art no dreamer, O thou stern To-day!
The dead past had its dreams; the real is thine. —Julia C. R. Dorr.

What dost thou bring to me, O fair To-day,
That comest o'er the mountains with swift feet? —Julia C. R. Dorr.

Our cares are all To-day, our joys are all
To-day;
And in one little word, our life, what is it but—To-day? —Tupper.

Why shouldst thou fill to-day with sorrow about to-morrow, my heart?—
Paul Flemming.

Every hour comes with some little fagot of God's will fastened upon its back.—F. W. Faber.

Oh, how short are the days! How soon the aught overtakes us!—Longfellow.

Out of eternity this new day is born; into eternity at night will return.—Carlyle.

Happy the man, and happy he alone
—he who can call to-day his own.—
Dryden.

To-morrow comes, and we are where? Then let us live to-day.—
Schiller.

To-morrow do thy worst, for I have lived to-day.—Dryden.

Days that need borrow no part of their good morrow from a foreshadowing night of sorrow.—Crashaw.

It is when to-morrow's burden is added to the burden of to-day that the weight is more than a man can bear.
—George MacDonald.

To-day is ours; what do we fear?
To-day is ours; we have it here.
Let's treat it kindly, that it may Wish, at least, with us to stay.
Let's banish business, banish sorrow;
To the gods belongs to-morrow.
—Cowley.

Let the day's work be done as its hours are passing. Let not the opportunity that is so fleeting, yet so full, pass neglected away.—Frothingham.

Often do the spirits of great events stride on before the events; and in to-day already walks to-morrow.—
Coleridge.

To-day alone, I count my own,—
For God alone doth know,
Where I shall be, when o'er the lea,
The morrow's sun doth glow.
—Chas. Noel Douglas.

Nothing that is can pause or stay;
The moon will wax, the moon will wane.
The mist and cloud will turn to rain,
The rain to mist and cloud again,
To-morrow be to-day. —Longfellow.

Toil

Bodily labor alleviates the pain of the mind; whence arises the happiness of the poor.—Rochefoucauld.

Toil and pleasure, in their natures opposite, are yet linked together in a kind of necessary connection.—Livy.

He chooses best, whose labor entertains
His vacant fancy most; the toil you hate Fatigues you soon, and scarce improves your limbs. —Armstrong.

Toil to some is happiness, and rest to others. This man can only breathe in crowds, and that man only in solitudes.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Toil, and be strong; by toil the flaccid nerves
Grow firm, and gain a more compact tone:
The greener juices are by toil subdued,
Mellow'd, and subtilis'd; the vapid old Expell'd, and all the rancor of the blood.
—Armstrong.

The body * * *
Much toil demands; the lean elastic less.
While winter chills the blood and binds the veins,
No labors are too hard; by those yet
'scape
The slow diseases of the torpid year,
Endless to name. —Armstrong.

Toleration

The religion that fosters intolerance needs another Christ to die for it.—
Beecher.

Tolerance does not mark the progress of a religion. It is the fatal sign of its decline.—Isidore van Cleef

Toleration is the best religion.—
Victor Hugo.

Clemency alone makes us equal to the gods.—Claudianus.

A fallible being will fail somewhere.
—Dr. Johnson.

Every man must get to heaven his own way.—Frederick the Great.

Let us often think of our own infirmities, and we shall become indulgent toward those of others.—Fénelon.

Tolerance is the only real test of civilization.—Arthur Helps.

I would have all intoleration intolerated in its turn.—Chesterfield.

The responsibility of tolerance lies with those who have the wider vision.
—George Eliot.

We are all of one dying, one immortal family.—Henry Giles.

It is intolerance to speak of toleration. Away with the word from the dictionary!—Mirabeau.

Hardly a man will you find who could live with his door open.—Seneca.

The knowledge beyond all other knowledge is the knowledge how to excuse.—Bovee.

Has not God borne with you these many years? Be ye tolerant to others.
—Hosea Ballou.

If thou canst not make thyself such an one as thou wouldst, how canst thou expect to have another in all things to thy liking?—Thomas à Kempis.

Let those who celebrate by name, by waxlight at noonday, tolerate such as are content with the light of the sun.—Voltaire.

Generosity is in nothing more seen than in a candid estimation of other men's virtues and good qualities.—

Barrow.

Let us be very gentle with our neighbors' failings, and forgive our friends their debts as we hope ourselves to be forgiven.—Thackeray.

The moderation and toleration of the priests of any sect are in an inverse ratio to its authority and power.
—Isidore van Cleef.

No human power can force the entrenchments of the human mind: compulsion never persuades it; only makes hypocrites.—Fénelon.

Choose out the wisest, brightest, noblest of mankind, and how many of them could bear to be pursued into the little corners of their lives?—
Erskine.

He (Charles Lamb) had felt, thought, and suffered so much that he literally had intolerance for nothing.
—Leigh Hunt.

There is nothing to do with men but to love them; to contemplate their virtues with admiration, their faults with pity and forbearance, and their injuries with forgiveness.—
Dewey.

Let us people who are so uncommonly clever and learned have a great tenderness and pity for the poor folks who are not endowed with the prodigious talents which we have.—
Thackeray.

They who boast of their tolerance merely give others leave to be as careless about religion as they are themselves. A walrus might as well pride itself on its endurance of cold.
—Hare.

It requires far more of constraining love of Christ to love our cousins and neighbors as members of the heavenly family than to feel the heart warm to our suffering brethren in Tuscany and Madeira.—Elizabeth Charles.

Be thankful that your lot has fallen on times when, though there may be many evil tongues and exasperated spirits, there are none who have fire and fagot at command.—Southey.

Men in excess of happiness or misery are equally inclined to severity. Witness conquerors and monks! It is mediocrity alone, and a mixture of prosperous and adverse fortune that inspire us with lenity and pity.—Montesquieu.

No one, judging from his own feelings and powers, can be aware of the kind or degree of temptation or terror, or the seeming incapacity to resist them, which may induce others to deviate.—Abernethy.

I would recommend a free commerce both of matter and mind. I would let men enter their own churches with the same freedom as their own houses; and I would do it without a homily or graciousness or favor, for tyranny itself is to me a word less odious than toleration.—Landor.

Whenever we cease to hate, to despise, and to persecute those who think differently from ourselves, whenever we look on them calmly, we find among them men of pure hearts and unbiased judgments, who, reasoning on the same data with ourselves, have arrived at different conclusion on the subject of the spiritual world.—Sismondi.

What higher praise can we bestow on any one than to say of him that he harbors another's prejudices with a hospitality so cordial as to give him, for the time, the sympathy next best to, if indeed it be not edification in, charity itself. For what disturbs more and distracts mankind than the uncivil manners that cleave man from man?—Alcott.

Let us all resolve, first, to attain the grace of silence; second, to deem all fault-finding that does no good a sin, and to resolve, when we are ourselves happy, not to poison the atmosphere for our neighbors by calling upon them to remark every painful and disagreeable feature in their daily life, third, to practice the grace and virtue of praise.—Mrs. Stowe.

Have charity; have patience; have mercy. Never bring a human being, however silly, ignorant, or weak—above all, any little child—to shame and confusion of face. Never by petulance, by suspicion, by ridicule, even by selfish and silly haste—never, above all, by indulging in the devilish pleasure of a sneer—crush what is finest and rouse up what is coarsest in the heart of any fellow-creature.—Charles Kingsley.

Tomb

Dark lattice! letting in eternal day.—Young.

The house appointed for all living.—Bible.

Who's a prince or beggar in the grave?—Otway.

Hang an epitaph on her tomb.—Shakespeare.

The most magnificent and costly dome is but an upper chamber to a tomb.—Young.

The earth, that is nature's mother, is her tomb.—Shakespeare.

Death ends our woes, and the kind grave shuts up the mournful scene.—Dryden.

All that tread the globe are but a handful to the tribes that slumber in its bosom.—Bryant.

Men shiver when thou art named; nature appalled shakes off her wonted firmness.—Blair.

A tomb is a monument placed on the limits of two worlds.—Bernardin de St. Pierre.

From its peaceful bosom spring none but fond regrets and tender recollections.—Washington Irving.

By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave, like one that wraps the drapery of his couch about him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.—Bryant.

It buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment.—Washington Irving.

And so sepulchred, in such pomp dost lie, that kings for such a tomb would wish to die.—Milton.

I would rather sleep in the southern corner of a little country churchyard than in the tomb of the Capulets.—Burke.

To-morrow

To-morrow is, ah, whose?—D. M. Mulock.

To-morrow do thy worst, for I have lived to-day.—Dryden.

Ask me questions concerning to-morrow.—Congreve.

To-morrow is a satire on to-day, And shows its weakness.—Young.

Dreaming of a to-morrow, which to-morrow Will be as distant then as 'tis to-day, —Tome Burguillos.

To-morrow the dreams and flowers will fade.—Moore.

Boast not thyself of to-morrow; for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth.—Bible.

To-morrow even may bring the final reckoning.—Spurgeon.

Who knows whether the gods will add to-morrow to the present hour?—Horace.

To-morrow comes, and we are where? Then let us live to-day.—Schiller.

To-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow, Creeps in this petty pace from day to day, To the last syllable of recorded time.—Shakespeare.

To-morrow to fresh woods, and pastures new.—Milton.

In human hearts what bolder thoughts can rise than man's presumption on to-morrow's dawn? Where is to-morrow?—Young.

To-morrow!—it is a period nowhere to be found in all the hoary registers of time, unless perchance in the fool's calendar.—Colton.

There is no to-morrow; though before our face the shadow named so stretches, we always fail to o'ertake it, hasten as we may.—Margaret J. Preston.

Heaven makes sport of human affairs, and the present hour gives no sure promise of the next.—Ovid.

Far off I hear the crowing of the cocks, And through the opening door that time unlocks Feel the fresh breathing of To-morrow creep.—Longfellow.

To-morrow; never yet was born In earth's dull atmosphere a thing so fair— Never tripped, with footsteps light as air, So glad a vision o'er the hills of morn.—Julia C. R. Dorr.

To-morrow yet would reap to-day, As we bear blossoms of the dead; Earn well the thrifty months, nor wed Raw Haste, half-sister to Delay.—Tennyson.

How oft my guardian angel gently cried, "Soul, from thy casement look, and thou shalt see How he persists to knock and wait for thee!" And, O! how often to that voice of sorrow, "To-morrow we will open," I replied, And when the morrow came I answered still, "To-morrow." —Tome Burguillos.

A shining isle in a stormy sea, We seek it ever with smiles and sighs; To-day is sad. In the bland To-be, Serene and lovely To-morrow lies.—Mary Clemmer.

Some say "to-morrow" never comes, A saying oft thought right; But if to-morrow never came, No end were of "to-night." The fact is this, time flies so fast, That e'er we've time to say "To-morrow's come," presto! behold! "To-morrow" proves "To-day." —Anon.

To-morrow thou wilt live, didst thou say, Posthumus? to-day is too late;

he is the wise man who lived yesterday.—Martial.

To-morrow's fate, though thou be wise,
Thou canst not tell nor yet surmise;
Pass, therefore, not to-day in vain,
For it will never come again.
—Omar Khayyám.

To-morrow, what delight is in to-morrow!
What laughter and what music, breathing
joy,
Float from the woods and pastures, wavering down,
Dropping like echoes through the long to-
day,
Where childhood waits with weary expectation. —T. B. Read.

O, fair To-morrow, what our souls have missed
Art thou not keeping for us, somewhere,
still?
The buds of promise that have never blown—
The tender lips that we have never kissed—
The song whose high, sweet strain eludes
our skill,
The one white pearl that life hath never known. —Julia C. R. Dorr.

To-morrow cheats us all. Why dost thou stay,
And leave undone what should be done to-
day?
Begin—the present minute's in thy power;
But still t' adjourn, and wait a fitter hour;
Is like the clown, who at some river's side
Expecting stands, in hopes the running tide Will all ere long be past.—Fool! not to know
It still has flow'd the same, and will for ever flow. —Hughes.

To-morrow's action! Can that hoary wisdom,
Borne down with years, still dote upon tomorrow,—
That fatal mistress of the young, the lazy,
The coward, and the fool, condemn'd to lose
A useless life in waiting for to-morrow,
To gaze with longing eyes upon to-morrow,
Till interposing death destroys the prospect! —Dr. Johnson.

To-morrow may never come to us.
We do not live in to-morrow. We cannot find it in any of our title-deeds.
The man who owns whole blocks of real estate, and great ships on the sea, does not own a single minute of tomorrow. To-morrow! It is a mysterious possibility, not yet born. It lies under the seal of midnight, behind the veil of glittering constellations.—Chapin.

To-morrow is that lamp upon the marsh,
which a traveller never reacheth;
To-morrow, the rainbow's cup, coveted prize of ignorance;
To-morrow, the shifting anchorage, dangerous trust of mariners;
To-morrow, the wrecker's beacon, wily snare of the destroyer.
Reconcile conviction with delay, and Tomorrow is a fatal lie; Frighten resolutions into action, To-morrow is a wholesome truth. —Tupper.

Tongue

The tongue is a world of iniquity.
—Bible.

The artillery of words.—Swift.

The windy satisfaction of the tongue.—Homer.

The tongue, the ambassador of the heart.—Lyly.

A maiden hath no tongue but thought.—Shakespeare.

The tongue is the vile slave's vilest part.—Juvenal.

Death and life are in the power of the tongue.—Bible.

The heart's attorney.—Shakespeare.

Restrain thy mind, and let mild-ness ever attend thy tongue.—Theognis.

Is there a tongue like Delia's o'er her cup,
That runs for ages without winding up?
—Young.

Tongues I'll hang on every tree,
That shall civil sayings show.
—Shakespeare.

The heart hath treble wrong
When it is barr'd the aidance of the tongue.
—Shakespeare.

My tongue, though not my heart,
shall have his will.—Shakespeare.

My tongue's use is to me no more Than an unstringed viol or a harp.
—Shakespeare.

While thou livest, keep a good tongue in thy head.—Shakespeare.

Many a man's tongue shakes out his master's undoing.—Shakespeare.

I should think your tongue had broken its chain!—Longfellow.

The firste vertue, sone, if thou wilt lerne,
Is to restreynen and kepen wel thy tonge.
—Chaucer.

A sharp tongue is the only edge-tool that grows keener with constant use.
—Washington Irving.

A fool's heart is in his tongue; but a wise man's tongue is in his heart.—Quarles.

To many men well-fitting doors are not set on their tongues.—Theognis.

The tongue of the wise useth knowledge aright, and is as choice silver.—Bible.

Woman's tongue is her sword, which she never lets rust.—Madame Necker.

The tongue should not be suffered to outrun the mind.—Chilo.

Give your tongue more holiday than your hands or eyes.—Rabbi Ben-Azai.

By examining the tongue of a patient, physicians find out the diseases of the body, and philosophers the diseases of the mind.—Justin.

The tongue of a fool is the key of his counsel, which, in a wise man, wisdom hath in keeping.—Socrates.

You play the spaniel,
And think with wagging of your tongue to win me.
—Shakespeare.

The chameleon, who is said to feed upon nothing but air, has of all animals the nimblest tongue.—Swift.

When we advance a little into life, we find that the tongue of man creates nearly all the mischief of the world.—Paxton Hood.

When thou art obliged to speak, be sure to speak the truth; for equivocation is half-way to lying and lying is the whole way to hell.—William Penn.

If any man think it a small matter, or of mean concernment, to bridle his tongue, he is much mistaken.—Plutarch.

The man that hath a tongue, I say, is no man, if with his tongue he cannot win a woman.—Shakespeare.

A wound from a tongue is worse than a wound from the sword; the latter affects only the body—the former, the spirit, the soul.—Pythagoras.

Since I cannot govern my own tongue, though within my own teeth, how can I hope to govern the tongue of others?—Franklin.

Open, candid, and generous, his heart was the constant companion of his hand, and his tongue the artless index of his mind.—George Canning.

A wound made by an arrow will cicatrize and heal; a forest felled by the axe will spring up again in new growth; but a wound made by the tongue will never heal.—Mahabharata.

The tongue is, at the same time, the best part of man and his worst; with good government, none is more useful, and without it, none is more mischievous.—Anacharsis.

Give not thy tongue too great a liberty, lest it take thee prisoner. A word unspoken is like the sword in the scabbard, thine; if vented, thy sword is in another's hand. If thou desire to be held wise, be so wise as to hold thy tongue.—Quarles.

When thou dost tell another's jest, therein omit the oaths which true wit cannot need; pick out of tales the mirth, but not the sin; he pares his apple that will cleanly feed.
—Herbert.

The tongue of man is powerful enough to render the ideas which the human intellect conceives; but in the realm of true and deep sentiments it is but a weak interpreter. These are inexpressible, like the endless glory of the Omnipotent.—Kossuth.

In the use of the tongue God hath distinguished us from beasts, and by the well or ill using it we are distinguished from one another; and therefore, though silence be innocent as death, harmless as a rose's breath to a distant passenger, yet it is rather the state of death than life.—Jeremy Taylor.

Sacred interpreter of human thought,
How few respect or use thee as they ought!
But all shall give account of every wrong,
Who dare dishonor or defile the tongue;
Who prostitute it in the cause of vice,
Or sell their glory at a market-price!

—Cowper.

It is observed in the course of worldly things, that men's fortunes are oftener made by their tongues than by their virtues; and more men's fortunes overthrown thereby than by vices.—Sir W. Raleigh.

Tonsorial

Hoary whiskers and a forked beard.
—Pope.

Our courteous Antony, * * *

Being barber'd ten times o'er, goes to the feast.
—Shakespeare.

I must to the barber's; * * *
for methinks I am marvelous hairy about the face.—Shakespeare.

And his chin new reap'd, Show'd like a stubble-land at harvest-home.
—Shakespeare.

Ere on thy chin the springing beard began
To spread a doubtful down, and promise man.
—Prior.

But he shaved with a shell when he chose,
'Twas the manner of primitive man.
—Andrew Lang.

What a beard hast thou got! thou hast got more hair on thy chin than Dobbin my fill-horse has on his tail.—
Shakespeare.

Thy boist'rous locks, no worthy match
For valor to assail, nor by the sword

But by the barber's razor best subdued.
—Milton.

Of a thousand shavers, two do not shave so much alike as not to be distinguished.—Samuel Johnson.

The first (barbers) that entered Italy came out of Sicily and it was in the 454 years after the foundation of Rome. Brought in they were by P. Ticinius Mena as Varra doth report for before that time they never cut their hair. The first that was shaven every day was Scipio Africanus, and after him cometh Augustus the Emperor who evermore used the razor.—Pliny.

Trade

He that hath a trade hath an estate; and he that hath a calling hath a place of profit and honor. A ploughman on his legs is higher than a gentleman on his knees.—Franklin.

But times are alter'd; trade's unfeeling train
Usurp the land, and dispossess the swain;
Along the lawn, where scatter'd hamlets
rose,
Unwieldy wealth and cumbrous pomp repose.
—Goldsmith.

Some men make gain a fountain, whence proceeds
A stream of liberal and heroic deeds;
The swell of pity, not to be confined Within the scanty limits of the mind.
—Cowper.

There is a Spanish proverb, that a lapidary who would grow rich must buy of those who go to be executed, as not caring how cheap they sell; and sell to those who go to be married, as not caring how dear they buy.—Fuller.

There is nothing so useful to man in general, nor so beneficial to particular societies and individuals, as trade. This is that alma mater, at whose plentiful breast all mankind are nourished.—Fielding.

Tradition

Tradition wears a snowy beard.—Whittier.

There is only one thing better than tradition, and that is the original and eternal life out of which all tradition takes its rise.—Lowell.

What an enormous "camera-obscura" magnifier is tradition! How a thing grows in the human memory, in the human imagination, when love, worship, and all that lies in the human heart, is there to encourage it; and in the darkness in the entire ignorance, without date or document, no book, no Arundel marble, only here and there some dull monumental cairn!—Carlyle.

Tragedy

Tragedy has the great moral defect of giving too much importance to life and death.—Chamfort.

Tragedy warms the soul, elevates the heart, can and ought to create heroes. In this sense, perhaps, France owes a part of her great actions to Corneille.—Napoleon.

The pleasure arising from an extraordinary agitation of the mind is frequently so great as to stifle humanity; hence arises the entertainment of the common people at executions, and of the better sort at tragedies.—L'Abbé du Bois.

Traitor

The man who fights against his own country is never a hero.—Victor Hugo.

'Tis not sensible to call a man traitor that has an army at his heels.—Selden.

An arrant traitor as any is in the universal world, or in France, or in England.—Shakespeare.

When Philip of Macedon was told that a certain city was impregnable, "Is there not a pathway to it," he asked, "wide enough for an ass laden with gold!"—Plutarch.

Tranquillity

Tranquil pleasures last the longest.—Bovee.

There is a majestic grandeur in tranquillity.—Washington Irving.

The calmest and serenest hours of life, when the passions of nature are all silent, and the mind enjoys its most perfect composure.—Dr. Watts.

Thou wilt enjoy tranquillity if thy heart condemn thee not.—Thomas à Kempis.

Smooth runs the water where the brook is deep.—Shakespeare.

One may live tranquilly in a dungeon; but does life consist in living quietly?—Rousseau.

The fountain of tranquillity is within ourselves; let us keep it pure.—Phocian.

Travel

Travel is fatal to prejudice.—Mark Twain.

Travel to learn character.—Miss Pardoe.

To see the world is to judge the judges.—Joubert.

Long traveled in the ways of men.—Young.

Restless at home, and ever prone to range.—Dryden.

Never travel by sea when you can go by land.—Cato.

Traveling is a fool's paradise.—Emerson.

Travelers must be content.—Shakespeare.

Travel teaches toleration.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

Does the pilgrim count the miles
When he travels to some distant shrine?
—Schiller.

I'll put a girdle round about the earth
In forty minutes. —Shakespeare.

I pity the man who can travel from Dan to Beersheba and cry, "'Tis all barren!"—Sterne.

Every traveler has a home of his own, and he learns to appreciate it the more from his wandering.—Dickens.

Traveling is no fool's errand to him who carries his eyes and itinerary along with him.—Amos Bronson Alcott.

He who never leaves his country is full of prejudices.—Carlo Goldoni.

When I was at home, I was in a better place; but travelers must be content.—Shakespeare.

He travels safest in the dark night who travels lightest.—Fernando Cortez.

The traveled mind is the catholic mind educated from exclusiveness and egotism.—Amos Bronson Alcott.

The value of life deepens incalculably with the privileges of travel.—N. P. Willis.

To roam giddily, and be everywhere but at home, such freedom doth a banishment become.—Donne.

Where'er I roam, whatever realms to see, my heart, untraveled, fondly turns to thee.—Goldsmith.

Nothing tends so much to enlarge the mind as traveling.—Dr. Watts.

Usually speaking, the worst-bred person in company is a young traveler just returned from abroad.—Swift.

A pilgrimage is an admirable remedy for over-fastidiousness and sickly refinement.—Tuckerman.

People travel to learn; most of them before they start should learn to travel.—H. W. Shaw.

Ancient travelers guessed; modern travelers measure.—Dr. Johnson.

A traveler without observation is a bird without wings.—Saadi.

The dust is old upon my "sandal-shoon," and still I am a pilgrim.—N. P. Willis.

The world is a great book, of which they that never stir from home read only a page.—St. Augustine.

Travelers never did lie, though fools at home condemn them.—Shakespeare.

He travels safe, and not unpleasantly, who is guarded by poverty and guided by love.—Sir P. Sidney.

He foreign countries knew, but they were known
Not for themselves, but to advance his own.
—Luellin.

He that would travel for the entertainment of others should remember that the great object of remark is human life.—Johnson.

Ay, now am I in Arden: the more fool I; when I was at home, I was in a better place; but travellers must be content.—Shakespeare.

I always love to begin a journey on Sundays, because I shall have the prayers of the church to preserve all that travel by land or by water.—Swift.

* * * the sundry contemplation of my travels, in which my often rumination wraps me in a most humorous sadness.—Shakespeare.

In travelling
I shape myself betimes to idleness
And take fools' pleasure.
—George Eliot.

Travel makes all men countrymen, makes people noblemen and kings, every man tasting of liberty and dominion.—Alcott.

Rather see the wonders of the world abroad, than, living dully sluggardized at home, wear out thy youth with shapeless idleness.—Shakespeare.

The use of traveling is to regulate imagination by reality, and instead of thinking how things may be, to see them as they are.—Dr. Johnson.

He that travels into a country before he has some entrance into the language, goeth to school and not to travel.—Bacon.

Travelers find virtue in a seeming minority in all other countries, and forget that they have left it in a minority at home.—T. W. Higginson.

The useful science of the world to know, which books can never teach, nor pedants show.—Lord Lyttleton.

Know most of the rooms of thy native country before thou goest over the threshold thereof.—Thomas Fuller.

Travel gives a character of experience to our knowledge, and brings the figures upon the tablet of memory into strong relief.—Tuckerman.

Railway traveling is not traveling at all; it is merely being sent to a place, and very little different from becoming a parcel.—Ruskin.

The proper means of increasing the love we bear our native country is to reside some time in a foreign one.—Shenstone.

Travel is a ceaseless fount of surface education,
But its wisdom will be simply superficial, if thou add not thoughts to things.
—Tupper.

Only that traveling is good which reveals to me the value of home, and enables me to enjoy it better.—Thoreau.

They, and they only, advantage themselves by travel, who, well fraught with the experience of what their own country affords, carry ever with them large and thriving talents.—F. Osborn.

Much have I travell'd in the realms of gold,
And many goodly states and kingdoms seen;

Round many western islands have I been,
Which bards in fealty to Apollo hold.
—Keats.

Yon sun that sets upon the sea
We follow in his flight;
Farewell awhile to him and thee,
My native Land—Good-night!
—Byron.

I used to wonder how a man of birth and spirit could endure to be wholly insignificant and obscure in a foreign country, when he might live with lustre in his own.—Swift.

I depart,
Whither I know not; but the hour's gone
by
When Albion's lessening shores could grieve or glad mine eye. —Byron.

He did request me to importune you,
To let him spend his time no more at home,
Which would be great impeachment to his age,
In having known no travel in his youth.

The bee, though it finds every rose has a thorn, comes back loaded with honey from his rambles; and why should not other tourists do the same? —Haliburton.

Men may change their climate, but they cannot change their nature. A man that goes out a fool cannot ride or sail himself into common sense.—Addison.

Returning he proclaims by many a grace,
By shrugs and strange contortions of his
face,
How much a dunce that has been sent to
roam,
Excels a dunce that has been kept at home.
—Cowper.

I travel all the irksome night,
By ways to me unknown;
I travel, like a bird of flight,
Onward, and all alone.
—James Montgomery.

We love old travelers: we love to hear them prate, drivel and lie; we love them for their asinine vanity, their ability to bore, their luxuriant fertility of imagination, their startling, brilliant, overwhelming mendacity.—Mark Twain.

Does the road wind up-hill all the way?
Yes, to the very end.
Will the day's journey take the whole long
day?
From morn to night, my friend.
—Christina Rossetti.

With every step of the recent traveler our inheritance of the wonderful is diminished. Those beautiful pictured notes of the possible are re-deemed at a ruinous discount in the hard coin of the actual.—Lowell.

As the Spanish proverb says, "He who would bring home the wealth of the Indies must carry the wealth of the Indies with him," so it is in traveling; a man must carry knowledge with him if he would bring home knowledge.—Johnson.

To be a good traveler argues one no ordinary philosopher. A sweet landscape must sometimes be allowed to atone for an indifferent supper, and an interesting ruin charm away the remembrance of a hard bed.—Tuckerman.

She had resolved that he should travel through
All European climes, by land or sea,
To mend his former morals, and get new,
Especially in France and Italy,
(At least this is the thing most people do).
—Byron.

They change their sky not their mind who cross the sea. A busy idleness possesses us; we seek a happy life, with ships and carriages: the object of our search is present with us.—Horace.

There is probably no country so barbarous that would not disclose all it knew, if it received equivalent information; and I am apt to think that a person who was ready to give more knowledge than he received would be welcome wherever he came.—Goldsmith.

Those who visit foreign nations, but who associate only with their own countrymen, change their climate, but not their customs; they see new meridians, but the same men; and with heads as empty as their pockets, return home with traveled bodies, but untraveled minds.—Colton.

Thought sluggards deem it but a foolish chase,
And marvel men should quit their easy chair,
The toilsome way, and long, long league to trace;
Oh! there is sweetness in the mountain air,
And life, that bloated ease can never hope to share.
—Byron.

Perigrination charms our senses with such unspeakable and sweet variety that some count him unhappy that never traveled—a kind of prisoner, and pity his case: that, from his cradle to his old age, he beholds the same still, still,—still, the same, the same.—Burton.

Joy! the lost one is restor'd!
Sunshine comes to hearth and board.
From the far-off countries old,
Of the diamond and red gold,
From the dusky archer bands,
Roamers of the desert sands,
He hath reach'd his home again.
—Mrs. Hemans.

The man who, with undaunted toils,
Sails unknown seas to unknown soils,
With various wonders feasts his sight;
What stranger wonders does he write!
We read, and in description view Creatures which Adam never knew:
For, when we risk no contradiction
It prompts the tongue to deal in fiction.
—Gay.

Better sit still where born, I say,
Wed one sweet woman and love her well,
Love and be loved in the old East way,
Drink sweet waters, and dream in a spell,
Than to wander in search of the Blessed Isles,
And to sail the thousands of watery miles
In search of love, and find you at last
On the edge of the world, and a curs'd outcast.
—Joaquin Miller.

There is nothing gives a man such spirits,
Leavening his blood as cayenne doth a curry,
As going at full speed—no matter where its Direction be, so 'tis but in a hurry,
And 'merely for the sake of its own merits;
For the less cause there is for all this flurry,
The greater is the pleasure in arriving
At the great end of travel—which is driving.
—Byron.

His travel has not stopp'd him
As you suppose, nor alter'd any freedom,
But made him far more clear and excellent:
It drains the grossness of the understanding,
And renders active and industrious spirits:
He that knows men's manners, must of necessity
Best know his own, and mend those by examples:
'T is a dull thing to travel like a mill-horse,
Still in the place he was born in; round and blinded.
—Beaumont and Fletcher.

There are two things necessary for a traveler to bring him to the end of his journey—a knowledge of his way, a perseverance in his walk. If he walk in a wrong way, the faster he goes the farther he is from home; if he sit still in the right way, he may know his home, but never come to it: discreet stays make speedy journeys. I will first then know my way, ere I begin my walk; the knowledge of my way is a good part of my journey.—Arthur Warwick.

Me other cares in other climes engage,
Cares that become my birth, and suit my age:

In various knowledge to instruct my youth,

And conquer prejudice, worst foe to truth,
By foreign arts, domestic faults to mend,
Enlarge my notions, and my views extend;
The useful science of the world to know,
Which books can never teach, nor pedants show.

—Lord Lyttleton.

Treachery

It is time to fear when tyrants seem to kiss.—Shakespeare.

Men are oftener treacherous through weakness than design.—Rochefoucauld.

In general, treachery, though at first sufficiently cautious, yet in the end betrays itself.—Livy.

There's neither honesty, manhood, nor good fellowship in thee.—Shakespeare.

There is no knife that cuts so sharply and with such poisoned blade as treachery.—Ouida.

There is no traitor like him whose domestic treason plants the poniard within the breast which trusted to his truth.—Byron.

Deliberate treachery entails punishment upon the traitor. There is no possibility of escaping it, even in the highest rank to which the consent of society can exalt the meanest and worst of men.—Junius.

Treason

Treason seldom dwells with courage.—Sir Walter Scott.

Rebellion must be managed with many swords; treason to his prince's person may be with one knife.—Thomas Fuller.

Treason pleases, but not the traitor.—Cervantes.

Treason must be made odious.—Andrew Johnson.

Treason is not own'd when 'tis descried;
Successful crimes alone are justified.

—Dryden.

For while the treason I detest,
The traitor still I love.

—Hooe.

In the clear mind of virtue treason can find no hiding-place.—Sir P. Sidney.

Treason, which begins by being cautious, ends by betraying itself.—Lamartine.

This principle is old, but true as fate,
Kings may love treason, but the traitor hate.

—Thomas Dekker.

The man who pauses on the paths of treason,
Halts on a quicksand, the first step engulfs him.

—Aaron Hill.

Fellowship in treason is a bad ground of confidence.—Burke.

Tellst thou me of "ifs"? Thou art a traitor:
Off with his head!

—Shakespeare.

Treason is like diamonds; there is nothing to be made by the small trader.—Douglas Jerrold.

Thou art a traitor, and a miscreant;
Too good to be so, and too bad to live.

—Shakespeare.

So Judas kiss'd his Master,
And cried—All hail! when as he meant—all harm.

—Shakespeare.

Love of country is one of the loftiest virtues which the Almighty has planted in the human heart, and so treason against it has been considered among the most damning sins.—Emery A. Storrs.

It is the just decree of Heaven that a traitor never sees his danger till his ruin is at hand.—Metastasio.

Treason and murder ever kept together, as two yolk-devils sworn to either's purpose.—Shakespeare.

Though those that are betrayed do feel the treason sharply, yet the traitor stands in worse case of woe.—Shakespeare.

Treason doth never prosper; what is the reason? Why, if it prosper, none dare call it treason.—Sir John Harrington.

Treason is but trusted like the fox; Who, ne'er so tame, so cherished, and lock'd up,
Will have a wild trick of his ancestors.—Shakespeare.

Some guard these traitors to the block of death;
Treason's true bed and yielder up of breath.—Shakespeare.

Is there not some chosen curse,
Some hidden thunder in the stores of heaven,
Red with uncommon wrath, to blast the man
Who owes his greatness to his country's ruin?—Addison.

Oh, for a tongue to curse the slave,
Whose treason, like a deadly blight,
Comes o'er the councils of the brave,
And blasts them in their hour of might!—Moore.

The man was noble, but with his last attempt he wiped it out, destroyed his country; and his name remains to the ensuing age abhorred.—Shakespeare.

I know that there are angry spirits
And turbulent mutterers of stifled treason,
Who lurk in narrow places, and walk out
Muffled to whisper curses to the night;
Disbanded soldiers, discontented ruffians,
And desperate libertines who brawl in taverns.—Byron.

With evil omens from the harbor sails
The ill-fated ship that worthless Arnold bears;
God of the southern winds, call up thy gales,
And whistle in rude fury round his ears.—Philip Freneau.

Cæsar had his Brutus—Charles the First, his Cromwell—and George the Third—("Treason!" cried the speaker)—may profit by their example. If this be treason, make the most of it.—Patrick Henry.

Oh, colder than the wind that freezes
Founts, that but now in sunshine play'd,
Is that congealing pang which seizes
The trusting bosom, when betray'd.—Moore.

The traitor to Humanity is the traitor most accursed;
Man is more than Constitutions; better rot beneath the sod,
Than be true to Church and State while we are doubly false to God.—Lowell.

Trees

The groves were God's first temples.—Bryant.

A brotherhood of venerable trees.—Wordsworth.

The mourner yew and builder oak were there.—Dryden.

This is the forest primeval.—Longfellow.

Grove nods at grove.—Pope.

He loves his old hereditary trees.—Cowley.

Slips of yew, silvered in the moon's eclipse.—Shakespeare.

Spare, woodman, spare the beechen tree!—Campbell.

The dureful oak, whose sap is not yet dried.—Spenser.

Cause not a tree to die.—King of Siam.

A tree in the desert is still a tree.—Talmud.

No tree in all the grove but has its charms,
Though each its hue peculiar.—Cowper.

The highest and most lofty trees have the most reason to dread the thunder.—Rollin.

A large, branching, aged oak is perhaps the most venerable of all inanimate objects.—Shenstone.

All the tree-tops lay asleep, like green waves on the sea.—Shelley.

A forest of all manner of trees is poor, if not disagreeable, in effect; a mass of one species of tree is sublime.—Ruskin.

Hence it is that old men do plant young trees, the fruit whereof another age shall take.—Sir J. Davies.

Like some tall tree, the monster of the wood, o'ershading all that under him would grow.—Dryden.

A tree is a nobler object than a prince in his coronation robes.—Pope.

No gale disturb the trees, nor aspen leaves confess the gentle breeze.—Gay.

The trees were unctuous fir, and mountain ash.—Dryden.

The whispering breeze pants on the leaves, and dies upon the trees.—Pope.

Old trees in their living state are the only things that money cannot command.—Landor.

Whose roots earth's centre touch, whose heads the skies.—Walter Harte.

Worn, gray olive-woods, which seem the fittest foliage for a dream.—Mrs. Browning.

Next to ye both I love the palm, with his leaves of beauty, his fruit of balm.—Bayard Taylor.

Poplars and alders ever quivering played, and nodding cypress formed a fragrant shade.—Pope.

An oak whose boughs were mossed with age, and high top bald with dry antiquity.—Shakespeare.

What planter will attempt to yoke a sapling with a falling oak?—Swift.

Trees the most lovingly shelter and shade us when, like the willow, the higher soar their summits the lowlier droop their boughs.—Bulwer-Lytton.

In heaven the trees of life ambrosial fruitage bear, and vines yield nectar.—Milton.

The fir-trees dark and high; I used to think their slender tops were close against the sky.—Hood.

That forbidden tree, whose mortal taste brought death into the world, and all our woe.—Milton.

The osier good for twigs, the poplar for the mill.—Spenser.

And winter, that grand old harper, smote his thunder-harp of pines.—Alexander Smith.

With every change his features played, as aspens show the light and shade.—Sir Walter Scott.

Those green-robed senators of mighty woods, tall oaks, branch-charmed by the earnest stars, dream, and so dream, all night without a stir.—Keats.

But, poor old man, thou prunest a rotten tree,
That cannot so much as a blossom yield
In lieu of all thy pains and husbandry.
—Shakespeare.

Some to the holly hedge Nestling repair; and to the thicket some;
Some to the rude protection of the thorn.
—Thomson.

I sit where the leaves of the maple and the gnarled and knotted gum are circling and drifting around me.—Alice Cary.

I wonder how it is that so cheerful-looking a tree as the willow, should ever have become associated with ideas of sadness.—Hamerton.

These blasted pines, wrecks of a single winter, barkless, branchless, a blighted trunk upon a cursed root.—Byron.

When we plant a tree, we are doing what we can to make our planet a more wholesome and happier dwelling-place for those who come after us if not for ourselves.—Holmes.

Beautiful isles! beneath the sunset skies tall, silver-shafted palm-trees rise, between full orange-trees that shade the living colonade.—Bryant.

The trees were gazing up into the sky,
Their bare arms stretched in prayer for the snows.
—Alex. Smith.

The trees by the way should have borne men, and expectation fainted, longing for what it had not.—Shakespeare.

In lands of palm and southern pine;
in lands of palm, of orange-blossom,
of olive, aloe, and maize, and wine.—Tennyson.

In all great arts, as in trees, it is the height that charms us; we care nothing for the roots or trunks, yet it could not be without the aid of these.—Cicero.

The oak roars when a high wind wrestles with it; the beech shrieks; the elm sends forth a long, deep groan; the ash pours out moans of thrilling anguish.—T. Starr King.

And all amid them stood the Tree of Life,
High eminent, blooming ambrosial fruit
Of vegetable gold.
—Milton.

When the sappy boughs
Attire themselves with blooms, sweet rudiments
Of future harvest.
—John Phillips.

Cedar, and pine, and fir, and branching palm,
A sylvan scene, and as the ranks ascend Shade above shade, a woody theatre Of stateliest view.
—Milton.

Now rings the woodland loud and long,
The distance takes a lovelier hue,
And drowned in yonder living blue
The lark becomes a sightless song.
—Tennyson.

The woods appear
With crimson blotches deeply dashed and crossed,— Sign of the fatal pestilence of Frost.
—Bayard Taylor.

The willow is a sad tree, whereof such who have lost their love make their mourning garlands, and we know what exiles hung up their harps upon such doleful supporters. The twigs are physic to drive out the folly of children.—Fuller.

A barren detested vale, you see it is;
The trees, though summer, yet forlorn and lean,
O'ercome with moss and baleful mistletoe.
—Shakespeare.

Woodman, spare that tree!
Touch not a single bough!
In youth it sheltered me,
And I'll protect it now.
—George P. Morris.

Welcome, ye shades! ye bowery Thickets hail!
Ye lofty Pines! ye venerable Oaks!
Ye Ashes wild, resounding o'er the steep!
Delicious is your shelter to the soul.
—Thomson.

Hath not old custom made this life more sweet
Than that of painted pomp? Are not these woods
More free from peril than the envious court?
—Shakespeare.

The place is all awake with trees,
Limes, myrtles, purple-beaded,
Acacias having drunk the lees
Of the night-dew, faint headed,
And wan, grey olive-woods, which seem
The fittest foliage for a dream.
—E. B. Browning.

But see the fading many-colored Woods,
Shade deep'ning over shade, the country round
Imbrowed; crowded umbrage, dusk and dun,
Of every hue from wan declining green
To sooty dark.
—Thomson.

Under the greenwood tree
Who loves to lie with me,
And tune his merry note
Unto the sweet bird's throat,
Come hither, come hither, come hither;
No enemy here shall he see,
But winter and rough weather.
—Shakespeare.

These shades
Are still the abodes of gladness; the thick roof
Of green and stirring branches is alive
And musical with birds, that sing and sport
In wantonness of spirit; while below
The squirrel, with raised paws and form erect, Chirps merrily.

—William Cullen Bryant.

The works of a person that builds begin immediately to decay, while those of him who plants begin directly to improve. In this, planting promises a more lasting pleasure than building; which, were it to remain in equal perfection, would at best begin to moulder and want repairs in imagination. Now trees have a circumstance that suits our taste, and that is annual variety.—Shenstone.

Where is the pride of Summer,—the green prime,—

The many, many leaves all twinkling?—three

On the mossed elm; three on the naked lime

Trembling,—and one upon the old oak tree! Where is the Dryad's immortality?

—Hood.

Father, thy hand

Hath reared these venerable columns, thou Didst weave this verdant roof. Thou didst look down Upon the naked earth, and, forthwith, rose All these fair ranks of trees. They, in thy sun,

Budded, and shook their green leaves in thy breeze,

And shot towards heaven.

—William Cullen Bryant.

The woods are hush'd, their music is no more;

The leaf is dead, the yearning past away; New leaf, new life—the days of frost are o'er;

New life, new love, to suit the newer day:

New loves are sweet as those that went before:

Free love—free field—we love but while we may. —Tennyson.

The groves were God's first temples. Ere man learned

To hew the shaft, and lay the architrave, And spread the roof above them—ere he framed

The lofty vault, to gather and roll back The sound of anthems; in the darkling wood,

Amidst the cool and silence, he knelt down,

And offered to the Mightiest solemn thanks And supplication.

—William Cullen Bryant.

The linden broke her ranks and rent

The woodbine wreaths that bind her,

And down the middle buzz! she went

With all her bees behind her!

The poplars, in long order due,

With cypress promenaded,

The shock-head willows two and two

By rivers galloped. —Tennyson.

Sure thou did'st flourish once! and many springs,

Many bright mornings, much dew, many showers,

Passed o'er thy head; many light hearts and wings,

Which now are dead, lodg'd in thy living bowers.

And still a new succession sings and flies; Fresh groves grow up, and their green branches shoot

Towards the old and still-enduring skies; While the low violet thrives at their root.

—Henry Vaughan.

The laurell, meed of mightie conquerours And poets sage; the firre that weepeth still;

The willow, worne of forlorne paramours; The eugh, obedient to the bender's will;

The birch, for shafts; the sallow for the mill;

The mirrhe sweete-bleeding in the bitter wound;

The warlike heech; the ash for nothing ill;

The fruitfull olive; and the platane round; The carver holme; the maple seldom inward sound. —Spenser.

Trees have about them something beautiful and attractive even to the fancy, since they cannot change their places, are witnesses of all the changes that take place around them; and as some reach a great age, they become, as it were, historical monuments, and like ourselves they have a life, growing and passing away,—not being inanimate and unvarying like the fields and rivers. One sees them passing through various stages, and at last step by step approaching death, which makes them look still more like ourselves.—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

The tremendous unity of the pine absorbs and moulds the life of a race. The pine shadows rest upon a nation. The northern peoples, century after century, lived under one or other of the two great powers of the pine and the sea, both infinite. They dwelt amidst the forests as they wandered on the waves, and saw no end nor any other horizon. Still the dark, green trees, or the dark, green waters jagged the dawn with their fringe or their foam. And whatever elements of imagination, or of warrior strength, or of domestic justice were brought down by the Norwegian or the Goth against the dissoluteness or degradation of the south of Europe were taught them under the green roofs and wild penetralia of the pine.—Ruskin.

Trials

Trials teach us what we are.—Spurgeon.

Great faith must have great trials.—Spurgeon.

When He hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold.—Bible.

Under the shadow of earthly disappointment, all unconscious to ourselves, our Divine Redeemer is walking by our side.—E. H. Chapin.

Prosperity tries the fortunate, adversity the great.—Pliny the Younger.

But noble souls, through dust and heat,
Rise from disaster and defeat
The stronger. —Longfellow.

There are no crown-wearers in heaven who were not cross-bearers here below.—Spurgeon.

As sure as ever God puts His children in the furnace. He will be in the furnace with them.—Spurgeon.

A grievous burthen was thy birth to me;
Tetchy and wayward was thy infancy.
—Shakespeare.

Rocks whereon greatest men have ofttest wreck'd.—Milton.

Our dearest hopes in pangs are born,
The kingliest Kings are crown'd with thorn.
—Gerald Massey.

By His trials, God means to purify us, to take away all our self-confidence, and our trust in each other, and bring us into implicit, humble trust in Himself.—Horace Bushnell.

There will be no Christian but will have a Gethsemane; but every praying Christian will find that there is no Gethsemane without its angel!—T. Binney.

"Tribulation worketh patience; and patience, experience; and experience, hope." That is the order. You cannot put patience and experience into a parenthesis, and, omitting them, bring hope out of tribulation.—Alexander Maclaren.

Jesus wept once; possibly more than once. There are times when God asks nothing of His children except silence, patience, and tears.—Charles S. Robinson.

Reckon any matter of trial to thee among thy gains.—Rev. T. Adam.

All the lessons He shall send
Are the sweetest;
And His training, in the end,
Is completest. —F. R. Havergal.

When our troubles are many we are often by grace made courageous in serving our God; we feel that we have nothing to live for in this world, and we are driven, by hope of the world to come, to exhibit zeal, self-denial, and industry.—C. H. Spurgeon.

In the time of Jesus the mount of transfiguration was on the way to the cross. In our day the cross is on the way to the mount of transfiguration. If you would be on the mountain, you must consent to pass over the road to it.—H. Clay Trumbull.

Great trials seem to be a necessary preparation for great duties. It would seem that the more important the enterprise, the more severe the trial to which the agent is subjected in his preparation.—Edward Thomson.

Never was there a man of deep piety, who has not been brought into extremities—who has not been put into fire—who has been taught to say, "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him."—Richard Cecil.

God has not chosen to save us without crosses; as He has not seen fit to create men at once in the full vigor of manhood, but has suffered them to grow up by degrees amid all the perils and weaknesses of youth.—Fénelon.

Blessed be the discipline which makes me reach out my soul's roots into closer union with Jesus! Blessed be the dews of the Spirit which keep my leaf ever green! Blessed be the trials which shake down the ripe, golden fruits from the branches.—T. L. Cuyler.

The child of trial, to mortality

And all its changeful influences given;
On the green earth decreed to move and die,

And yet by such a fate prepared for heaven.
—Sir Humphrey Davy.

God hath many sharp-cutting instruments and rough files for the polishing of His jewels; and those He especially loves and means to make the most resplendent, He hath oftenest His tools upon.—Leighton.

God often lays the sum of His amazing providences in very dismal afflictions; as the limner first puts on the dusky colors, on which he intends to draw the portraiture of some illustrious beauty.—Charnock.

As the musician straineth his strings, and yet he breaketh none of them, but maketh thereby a sweeter melody and better concord; so God, through affliction, makes His own better unto the fruition and enjoying of the life to come.—Daniel Cawdrey.

Every man will have his own criterion in forming his judgment of others. I depend very much on the effect of affliction. I consider how a man comes out of the furnace; gold will lie for a month in the furnace without losing a grain.—Cecil.

Trials are medicines which our gracious and wise Physician prescribes, because we need them; and He proportions the frequency and the weight of them to what the case requires. Let us trust in his skill, and thank him for His prescription.—Newton.

Nothing is intolerable that is necessary. Now God hath bound thy trouble upon thee by His special providence, and with a design to try thee, and with purposes to reward and crown thee. These cords thou canst not break, and therefore lie thou down gently, and suffer the hand of God to do what He pleases.—Jeremy Taylor.

The way is dark, my child! but leads to light;
I would not have thee always walk by sight.

My dealings now, thou canst not understand.

I meant it so; but I will take thy hand,
And through the gloom lead safely home
My child!

—Henry N. Cobb.

Life has no smooth road for any of us; and in the bracing atmosphere of a high aim, the very roughness only stimulates the climber to steadier and steadier steps, till that legend of the rough places fulfills itself at last, "per aspera ad astra," over steep ways to the stars.—Bishop W. C. Doane.

Pray, pray, thou who also weepest,—

And the drops will slacken so;

Weep, weep,—and the watch thou keepest,

With a quicker count will go.

Think,—the shadow on the dial

For the nature most undone,

Marks the passing of the trial,

Proves the presence of the sun.

—E. B. Browning.

It is the easiest thing in the world for us to obey God when He commands us to do what we like, and to trust Him when the path is all sunshine. The real victory of faith is to trust God in the dark, and through the dark. Let us be assured of this, that if the lesson and the rod are of His appointing, and that His all-wise love has engineered the deep tunnel of trial on the heavenward road, He will never desert us during the discipline. The vital thing for us is not to deny and desert Him.—T. L. Cuyler.

Purge me, or Lord, though it be with fire. Burn up the chaff of vanity and self-indulgence, of hasty prejudice, second-hand dogmas—husks which do not feed my soul, with which I cannot be content, of which I feel ashamed daily—and if there be any grain of wheat in me, any word or thought or power of action which may be of use as seed for my nation after me, gather it, oh Lord, into Thy garner.—Charles Kingsley.

Trifles

Man shows his character best in trifles.—Schopenhauer.

Trifles themselves are elegant in him.—Pope.

Men are led by trifles.—Napoleon.

These little things are great to little men.—Goldsmith.

Things fit only to give weight to smoke.—Persius.

A snapper-up of unconsidered trifles.—Shakespeare.

A small unkindness is a great offence.—Hannah More.

Triflers not even in trifles can excel.—Young.

There is nothing insignificant, nothing!—Coleridge.

The gay motes that people the sunbeams.—Milton.

The smallest hair throws its shadow.—Goethe.

Trifles make up the happiness or the misery of mortal life.—Alexander Smith.

We must not stand upon trifles.—Cervantes.

A trifle makes a dream, a trifle breaks.—Tennyson.

By great efforts obtain great trifles.—Terence.

These trifles will lead to serious mischief.—Horace.

The chains which cramp us most are those which weigh on us least.—Mme. Swetchine.

It is but the littleness of man that seeth no greatness in trifles.—Wendell Phillips.

Affection, like melancholy, magnifies trifles.—Leigh Hunt.

Trifles discover a character, more than actions of importance.—Shenstone.

Contentions for trifles can get but a trifling victory.—Sir P. Sidney.

The journey of a thousand miles begins with one pace.—Lao-Tze.

Little things console us, because little things afflict us.—Pascal.

Alas! by what slight means are great affairs brought to destruction.—Claudianus.

A drop of water is as powerful as a thunder-bolt.—Huxley.

There is a kind of latent omniscience, not only in every man, but in every particle.—Emerson.

Trifles light as air are to the jealous confirmations strong as proofs of holy writ.—Shakespeare.

The pathetic almost always consists in the detail of little circumstances.—Gibbon.

Trifles render us miserable, but trifles also console us.—Romainville.

What mighty contests rise from trivial things!—Pope.

A stray hair, by its continued irritation, may give more annoyance than a smart blow.—Lowell.

There some trifles well habited, as there are some fools well clothed.—Chamfort.

Trifles lighter than straws are levers in the building up of character.—Tupper.

The creation of a thousand forests is in one acorn.—Emerson.

The earth bath bubbles, as the water has, and these are of them.—Shakespeare.

The power of duly appreciating little things belongs to a great mind;

A narrow-minded man has it not, for to him they are great things.—Whately.

At every trifle scorn to take offence;
That always shows great pride or little sense. —Pope.

Seeks painted trifles and fantastic toys,
And eagerly pursues imaginary joys. —Akenside.

A weak mind is like a microscope, which magnifies trifling things, but cannot receive great ones.—Chesterfield.

Those who bestow too much application on trifling things become generally incapable of great ones.—Rochefoucauld.

Think nought a trifle, though it small appear; small sands the mountain, moments make the year.—Young.

Each particle of matter is an immensity, each leaf a world, each insect an inexplicable compendium.—Lavater.

Those who place their affections at first on trifles for amusement, will find these trifles become at last their most serious concerns.—Goldsmith.

A fly is a very light burden; but if it were perpetually to return and settle on one's nose, it might weary us of our very lives.—Fredrika Bremer.

A grain of sand leads to the fall of a mountain when the moment has come for the mountain to fall.—Ernest Renan.

Trifles we should not let plague us only, but also gratify us; we should seize not their poison-bags only, but their honey-bags also.—Richter.

Come, gentlemen, we sit too long on trifles,
And waste the time, which looks for other revels. —Shakespeare.

Exploding many things under the name of trifles is a very false proof either of wisdom or magnanimity, and a great check to virtuous actions with regard to fame.—Swift.

The soft droppes of raine perce the hard marble, many strokes overthrow the tallest oke.—Lyly.

Rivers from bubbling springs
Have rise at first; and great, from abject things. —Middletton.

What will this boaster produce worthy of this mouthing? The mountains are in labor; a ridiculous mouse will be born.—Horace.

When I see the elaborate study and ingenuity displayed by woman in the pursuit of trifles, I feel no doubt of their capacity for the most herculean undertakings.—Julia Ward Howe.

The great moments of life are but moments like the others. Your doom is spoken in a word or two. A single look from the eyes, a mere pressure of the hand, may decide it; or of the lips though they cannot speak.—Thackeray.

Petty vexations may at times be petty, but still they are vexations. The smallest and most inconsiderable annoyances are the most piercing.—Montaigne.

It has been well observed that the misery of man proceeds not from any single crush of overwhelming evil, but from small vexations continually repeated.—Johnson.

A slight answer to an intricate and useless question, is a fit cover to such a dish,—a cabbage-leaf is good enough to cover a dish of mushrooms.—Jeremy Taylor.

There is a vigilance and judgment about trifles which men only get by living in a crowd; and those are the trifles of detail, on which the success of execution depends.—Horner.

A little, and a little, collected together become a great deal; the heap in the barn consists of single grains, and drop and drop from an inundation.—Saadi.

There is nothing too little for so little a creature as man. It is by studying little things that we attain the great art of having as little misery and as much happiness as possible.—Johnson.

Whoever shall review his life, will find that the whole tenor of his conduct has been determined by some accident of no apparent moment.—Johnson.

We are not only pleased, but turned, by a feather. The history of man is a calendar of straws. "If the nose of Cleopatra had been shorter," said Pascal, in his brilliant way, "Antony might have kept the world."—Willmott.

Nothing is small or great in God's sight. Whatever He wills becomes great to us, however seemingly trifling; and if once the voice of conscience tells us that He requires anything of us, we have no right to measure its importance.—Jean Nicolas Grou.

As small letters hurt the sight, so do small matters him that is too much intent upon them; they vex and stir up anger, which begets an evil habit in him in reference to greater affairs.—Plutarch.

There is no real elevation of mind in a contempt of little things; it is, on the contrary, from too narrow views that we consider those things of little importance which have in fact such extensive consequences.—Fénelon.

It is in those acts called trivialities that the seeds of joy are forever wasted, until men and women look around with haggard faces at the devastation their own waste has made, and say the earth bears no harvest of sweetness, calling their denial knowledge.—George Eliot.

He that resigns his peace to little casualties, and suffers the course of his life to be interrupted for fortuitous inadvertencies or offences, delivers up himself to the direction of the wind, and loses all that constancy and equanimity which constitutes the chief praise of a wise man.—Dr. Johnson.

There is not one grain in the universe, either too much or too little, nothing to be added, nothing to be spared; nor so much as any one particle of it, that mankind may not be either the better or the worse for, according as it is applied.—L'Estrange.

A spark is a molecule of matter, yet may it kindle the world; vast is the mighty ocean, but drops have made it vast. Despise not thou small things, either for evil or for good; for a look may work thy ruin, or a word create thy wealth.—Tupper.

Frivolous curiosity about trifles, and laborious attentions to little objects which neither require nor deserve a moment's thought, lower a man, who from thence is thought (and not unjustly) incapable of greater matters. Cardinal de Retz very sagaciously marked out Cardinal Chigi for a little mind, from the moment he told him that he had wrote three years with the same pen, and that it was an excellent good one still.—Chesterfield.

In mortals there is a care for trifles which proceeds from love and conscience, and is most holy; and a care for trifles which comes of idleness and frivolity, and is most base. And so, also, there is a gravity proceeding from thought, which is most noble; and a gravity proceeding from dullness and mere incapability of enjoyment, which is most base.—Ruskin.

Great merit or great failings will make you respected or despised; but trifles, little attentions, mere nothings, either done or neglected, will make you either liked or disliked, in the general run of the world. Examine yourself, why you like such and such people and dislike such and such others; and you will find that those different sentiments proceed from very slight causes.—Chesterfield.

The mind of the greatest man on earth is not so independent of circumstances as not to feel inconvenienced by the merest buzzing noise about him; it does not need the report of a cannon to disturb his thoughts. The creaking of a vane or a pulley is quite enough. Do not wonder that he reasons ill just now; a fly is buzzing by his ear; it is quite enough to unfit him for giving good counsel.—Pascal.

It is curious to observe the triumph of slight incidents over the mind; and what incredible weight they have in forming and governing our opinions, both of men and things, that trifles light as air shall waft a belief into the soul, and plant it so immovable within it, that Euclid's demonstrations, could they be brought to batter it in breach, should not all have power to overthrow it!—Sterne.

Trinity Sunday

To-day we are called upon to keep the festival of revelation. Every other great festival of our Church commemorates a fact through which God has been pleased to teach men something of His purpose of love; Trinity Sunday encourages us to reflect for a brief space on that final truth, most absolute, most elementary, most practical, which gives unity and stability to all knowledge. The view of the Divine nature which it offers for our devout contemplation is the charter of human faith.—Bishop Brook F. Westcott, D. D.

The light of the sun, the light of the moon, and the light of the air, in nature and substance are one and the same light, and yet they are there distinct lights: the light of the sun being of itself, and from none; the light of the moon from the sun; and the light of the air from them both. So the Divine Nature is one, and the persons three; subsisting, after a diverse manner, in one and the same Nature.—R. Newton.

He who goes about to speak of the mystery of the Trinity, and does it by words, and names of man's invention, talking of essence and existence hypostases and personalities, priority in co-equality, and unity in pluralities, may amuse himself and build a tabernacle in his head, and talk something—he knows not what; but the renewed man, that feels the power of the Father, to whom the Son is become wisdom, sanctification, and redemption, in whose heart the love of the Spirit of God is shed abroad—this man, tho he understand nothing of what is unintelligible, yet he alone truly understands the Christian doctrine of the Trinity.—Jeremy Taylor.

The two principal names which are applied to Deity in the Old Testament are Jehovah and God (in Hebrew, Elohim). The former is God's proper name, and clearly applies to the divine essence. This name is always singular, and may be rendered, "He who exists." The other name, Aleim or Elohim, in plural. And the question occurs, Why is the name Jehovah, which refers to His essence, always singular? Plainly, to express the unity of the divine essence. Why is the other, Elohim, plural? As clearly to denote a plurality of persons in the Godhead.—Field.

Father of heaven, whose love profound
A ransom for our souls hath found,
Before Thy throne we sinners bend:
To us Thy pardoning love extend.

Almighty Son, incarnate Word,
Our Prophet, Priest, Redeemer, Lord,
Before Thy throne we sinners bend:
To us Thy saving grace extend.

Eternal Spirit, by whose breath
The soul is raised from sin and death,
Before Thy throne we sinners bend:
To us Thy quickening power extend.

Jehovah.—Father, Spirit, Son,— Mysterious Godhead, Three in One,
Before Thy throne we sinners bend:
Grace, pardon, life, to us extend.
—Edward Cooper.

This symbol, light, is composed of three parts, one visible and two invisible; first, illuminative rays, which affect our vision, and by their Fraunhofer lines bring to us a knowledge of the substance of the suns from which they spring; second, chemical rays, which cause growth, and give the results of photography; and, third, the principle called heat, separate from either. So is God revealed—three persons in one God. No man hath seen the Father, or the Holy Ghost: but the Son has been seen of men. Each of these component parts is capable of separate and independent action. Each can be sundered from the other, and still retain its full efficiency. The illuminative rays still stream with their incredible swiftmess, still bloom with incomprehensible color, and still bear their records of other worlds, after the other two component parts have been turned to other work. There could be no other so happy illustration of the incomprehensible triune nature of God.—Dr. H. W. Warren.

Here is a mystery, the stupendous mystery of the Christian religion, the ineffable mystery of three persons in one God. We cannot define it. Every human attempt at definition involves it in deeper mystery. The arithmetic of heaven is beyond us. Yet this is no more mysterious and inexplicable than the trinity of our own nature; body, soul, and spirit; and no man has ever shown that it involved a contradiction or in any way conflicted with the testimony of our senses or with demonstrated truth; and we must accept it by the power of a simple faith, or rush into tritheism on the one hand or unitarianism on the other.—Fredk. D. Power, D. D.

This, then, appears to be the solution of our trinitarian difficulty; to concentrate our thoughts and our affections on God the Son as He is revealed to us in Christ; to adore Him as the Creator, Preserver, all-wise Ruler and Redeemer of the world; to worship Him as the ever-present King and Head of His Church; and to look forward to the eternal enjoyment of His presence in heaven, as the consummation of our happiness, as "all our salvation and all our desire." "Almighty God, who hast given us grace at this time with one accord to make our common supplications unto Thee, and dost promise that when two or three are gathered together in Thy name, Thou wilt grant their requests, fulfil now, O Lord, the desires and petitions of Thy servants, as may be most expedient for them; granting us in this world knowledge of Thy truth, and in the world to come life everlasting. Amen."—A Prayer of St. Chrysostom.

There be three grand principles—life, generation, and obedience —
Shadowing, in every creature, the Spirit, and the Father, and the Son.
There be three grand unities, variously mixed in trinities,
The rose, and the ruby, and the pearl; each one is made of three;
And the three be the like ingredients, mingled in diverse measures.
Thyself hast within thyself body, and life, and mind;
Matter, and breath, and instinct, unite in all beasts of the field;
Substance, coherence, and weight, fashion the fabrics of the earth;
The will, the doing, and the deed, combine to frame a fact;
The stem, the leaf, and the flower; beginning, middle, and end;
Cause, circumstance, consequent; and every three is one.
Yea, the very breath of man's life consisteth of a trinity of vapors,
And the noonday light is a compound, the triune shadow of Jehovah.
—Martin F. Tupper.

Holy, holy, holy! Lord God Almighty;
Early in the morning our song shall rise to Thee,
Holy, holy, holy, merciful and mighty;
God in three persons, blessed Trinity.

Holy, holy, holy! all the saints adore Thee,
Casting down their golden crowns around the glassy sea,
Cherubim and seraphim falling down before Thee,
Which wert, and art, and evermore shalt be.

Holy, holy, holy! tho the darkness hide Thee,
Tho the eye of sinful man Thy glory may not see,
Only Thou art holy; there is none beside Thee
Perfect in power, in love, and purity.

Holy, holy, holy! Lord God Almighty;
All Thy works shall praise Thy name, in earth and sky and sea:
Holy, holy, holy, merciful and mighty;
God in three persons, blessed Trinity.
Amen. —Reginald Heber.

Troubles

Troubles, like babies, grow larger by nursing.—Lady Holland.

Trifling troubles find utterance; deeply felt pangs are silent.—Seneca.

It is not designed that the road should be made too smooth for us here upon earth.—Jane Porter.

The true way to soften one's troubles is to solace those of others.—Mme. de Maintenon.

No evil lost is wailed when it is gone.—Shakespeare.

Man is born to trouble, as the sparks fly upward.—Bible.

Trouble and perplexity drive us to prayer, and prayer driveth away trouble and perplexity.—Melancthon.

In this wild world the fondest and the best are the most tried, most troubled and distressed.—Crabbe.

The greater our dread of crosses, the more necessary they are for us.—Fénelon.

Know this, that troubles come swifter than the things we desire.—Plautus.

Crosses are of no use to us but inasmuch as we yield ourselves up to them and forget ourselves.—Fénelon.

There are people who are always anticipating trouble, and in this way they manage to enjoy many sorrows that never really happen to them.—H. W. Shaw.

Many minds that have withstood the most severe trials have been broken down by a succession of ignoble cares.—Lady Blessington.

Annoyance is man's leaven; the element of movement, without which we would grow mouldy.—Feuchtersleben.

Troubles are exceedingly gregarious in their nature, and flying in flocks are apt to perch capriciously.—Dickens.

Are you borne down by trouble, remember the apt words of Carlyle: "The eternal stars shine out as soon as it is dark enough."—Beecher.

We are born to trouble; and we may depend upon it, whilst we live in this world, we shall have it, though with intermissions.—Sterne.

Men are born to trouble at first, and exercised in it all their days. There is a cry at the beginning of life, and a groan at its close.—Rev. W. Arnot.

In adverse hours the friendship of the good shines most; each prosperous day commands its friends.—Euripides.

Thou art never at any time nearer to God than when under tribulation; which He permits for the purification and beautifying of thy soul.—Miguel Molinos.

Tribulation will not hurt you unless it does—what, alas! it too often does—unless it hardens you, and makes you sour and narrow and sceptical.—Chapin.

It is a note
Of upstart greatness to observe and watch
For these poor trifles, which the noble mind
Neglects and scorns. —Ben Jonson.

Men's happiness springs mainly from moderate troubles, which afford the mind a healthful stimulus, and are followed by a reaction which produces a cheerful flow of spirits.—E. Wigglesworth.

Petty vexations may at times be petty, but still they are vexations. The smallest and most inconsiderable annoyances are the most piercing. As small letters weary the eye most, so also the smallest affairs disturb us most.—Montaigne.

Let a man who wants to find abundance of employment procure a woman and a ship: for no two things do produce more trouble if you begin to equip them; neither are these two things ever equipped enough.—Plautus.

Outward attacks and troubles rather fix than unsettle the Christian, as tempests from without only serve to root the oak faster; whilst an inward canker will gradually rot and decay it.—Hannah More.

If you tell your troubles to God, you put them into the grave; they will never rise again when you have committed them to him. If you roll your burden anywhere else, it will roll back again, like the stone of Sisyphus.—Spurgeon.

Now, God hath bound thy troubles upon thee with a design to try thee, and with purposes to reward and crown thee. The cords thou canst not break; and therefore lie thou down gently, and suffer the hand of God to do what He please.—Jeremy Taylor.

Troubles are usually the brooms and shovels that smooth the road to a good man's fortune, of which he little dreams; and many a man curses the rain that falls upon his head, and knows not that it brings abundance to drive away hunger.—Basil.

Quick is the succession of human events. The cares of to-day are seldom the cares of to-morrow; and when we lie down at night, we may safely say to most of our troubles, "Ye have done your worst, and we shall meet no more."—Cowper.

Make up your mind to the prospect of sustaining a certain measure of pain and trouble in your passage through life. By the blessing of God this will prepare you for it; it will make you thoughtful and resigned without interfering with your cheerfulness.—J. H. Newman.

You can imagine thistle-down so light that when you run after it your running motion would drive it away from you, and that the more you tried to catch it the faster it would fly from your grasp. And it should be with every man, that, when he is chased by troubles, they, chasing, shall raise him higher and higher.—Beecher.

I saw a delicate flower had grown up two feet high between the horse's path and the wheel track. An inch more to the right or left had sealed its fate, or an inch higher; and yet it lived to flourish as much as if it had a thousand acres of untrodden space around it, and never knew the danger it incurred. It did not borrow trouble, nor invite an evil fate by apprehending it.—Thoreau.

Trust

Whoso trusteth in the Lord, happy is he.—Bible.

There is none deceived but he that trusts.—Franklin.

Public office is a public trust.—Dan. S. Lamont.

You may trust him in the dark.—Cicero.

Treason is greatest where trust is greatest.—Dryden.

To be trusted is a greater compliment than to be loved.—George MacDonald.

Women are proverbially credulous.—Lavater.

Women are more credulous than men.—Victor Hugo.

To build upon a foolish woman's promise!—Shakespeare.

Will cast the spear and leave the rest to Jove.—Homer.

I believe in God, and I trust myself in His hands.—J. A. Garfield.

Make not Christ a liar in distrusting His promise.—Rutherford.

Trust few men; above all, keep your follies to yourself.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

I think we may safely trust a good deal more than we do.—Thoreau.

Who has passed by the gates of disillusion has died twice.—Ouida.

I repeat, * * * that all power is a trust—that we are accountable for its exercise.—Benj. Disraeli.

The soul and spirit that animates and keeps up society is mutual trust.—South.

Trust in God for great things. With your five loaves and two fishes He will show you a way to feed thousands.—Horace Bushnell.

When a man assumes a public trust, he should consider himself as public property.—Thos. Jefferson.

The less you trust others, the less you will be deceived.—Rochefoucauld.

The greatest trust between man and man is trust of giving counsel.—Bacon.

How calmly may we commit ourselves to the hands of Him who bears up the world!—Jean Paul Richter.

An undivided heart, which worships God alone, and trusts Him as it should, is raised above anxiety for earthly wants.—J. C. Geikie.

If, like Jacob, you trust God in little things, He may answer you by great things.—J. R. Macduff.

I can forgive a foe, but not a mistress and a friend; treason is there in its most horrid shape, where trust is greatest!—Dryden.

That, in tracing the shade, I shall find out the sun,
Trust to me! —Lord Lytton.

If he were
To be made honest by an act of parliament
I should not alter in my faith of him.
—Ben Jonson.

Trust men, and they will be true to you; treat them greatly, and they will show themselves great.—Emerson.

The confidence which we have in ourselves gives birth to much of that which we have in others.—La Rochefoucauld.

There is something so beautiful in trust that even the most hardened liar must needs feel a certain respect for those who confide in him.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

The woman who yields to promises sets her bark afloat upon a raging sea. In fulfillment alone lies safety.—Alfred Bougeart.

When we trust our brother, whom we have seen, we are learning to trust God, whom we have not seen.—James Freeman Clarke.

I well believe
Thou wilt not utter what thou dost not know;
And so far will I trust thee.
—Shakespeare.

The mistakes committed by women are almost always the result of her faith in the good and her confidence in the truth.—Balzac.

"Eyes to the blind"
Thou art, O God! Earth I no longer see,
Yet trustfully my spirit looks to thee.
—Alice Bradley Neal.

The appointing power of the Pope is treated as a public trust, and not as a personal perquisite.—Chas. Sumner.

You must cast yourself on God's gospel with all your weight, without any hanging back, without any doubt, without even the shadow of a suspicion that it will give.—Alexander Maclaren.

I would sooner walk in the dark, and hold hard to a promise of my God, than trust in the light of the brightest day that ever dawned.—C. H. Spurgeon.

I know not where His islands lift
Their fronded palms in air;
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond His love and care.
—Whittier.

Exercise your God-given power of trust. Look up! Salvation is provided, and nothing remains to be done. Take hold! Take hold! Do not wait! —Bishop Janes.

I trust you as holy men trust God; you could do nought that was not pure and loving, though the deed might pierce me unto death.—George Elliot.

The world is an old woman, that mistakes any gilt farthing for a gold coin; whereby, being often cheated, she will henceforth trust nothing but the common copper.—Carlyle.

Public officers are the servants and agents of the people, to execute laws which the people have made and within the limits of a constitution which they have established.—Grover Cleveland.

It is not fit the public trusts should be lodged in the hands of any till they are first proved and found fit for the business they are to be entrusted with.—Mathew Henry.

Better trust all and be deceived,
And weep that trust and that deceiving,
Than doubt one heart, that, if believed,
Had blessed one's life with true believing.
—Frances Anne Kemble.

To execute laws is a royal office; to execute orders is not to be a king. However, a political executive magistracy, though merely such, is a great trust.—Burke.

O holy trust! O endless sense of rest!
Like the beloved John
To lay his head upon the Saviour's breast,
And thus to journey on!
—Longfellow.

Youth, health, and hope may fade, but there is left
A soul that trusts in Heaven, though thus of all bereft.
—Emma Catherine Embury.

If thou be subject to any great vanity or ill (from which I hope God will bless thee), then therein trust no man; for every man's folly ought to be his greatest secret.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

The ordinary saying is, Count money after your father; so the same prudence adviseth to measure the ends of all counsels, though uttered by never so intimate a friend.—F. Osborn.

Women are safer in perilous situations and emergencies than men, and might be still more so if they trusted themselves more confidently to the chivalry of manhood.—Hawthorne.

Father, perfect my trust;
Let my spirit feel in death
That her feet are firmly set
On the rock of a living faith!
—Phoebe Cary.

If thou couldst trust, poor soul!
In Him who rules the whole,
Thou wouldst find peace and rest;
Wisdom and sight are well, but trust is best.
—A. A. Proctor.

Take special care that thou never trust any friend or servant with any matter that may endanger thine estate; for so shalt thou make thyself a bond-slave to him that thou trustest, and leave thyself always to his mercy.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Trust not any man with thy life, credit, or estate. For it is mere folly for a man to enthrall himself to his friend, as though, occasion being offered, he should not dare to become an enemy.—Lord Burleigh.

That which befits us, embosomed in beauty and wonder as we are, is cheerfulness, and courage, and the endeavor to realize our aspirations. Shall not the heart which has received so much trust the power by which it lives?—Emerson.

Happy he with such a mother!
Faith in womankind beats with his blood, and trust in all things high comes easy to him; and though he trip and fall he shall not blind his soul with clay.—Tennyson.

Let not the titles of consanguinity betray you into a prejudicial trust; no blood being apter to raise a fever, or cause a consumption sooner in your poor estate, than that which is nearest your own.—F. Osborn.

All persons possessing any portion of power ought to be strongly and awfully impressed with an idea that they act in trust, and that they are to account for their conduct in that trust to the one great Master, Author and Founder of society.—Burke.

Public office is a public trust, the authority and opportunities of which must be used as absolutely as the public moneys for the public benefit, and not for the purposes of any individual or party.—Dorman B. Eaton.

My trust is not that I am holy, but that, being unholy, Christ died for me. My rest is here, not in what I am or shall be or feel or know, but in what Christ is and must be,—in what Christ did and is still doing as He stands before yonder throne of glory.—C. H. Spurgeon.

We come, in our trust, unto God, and the moment we so embrace Him, by committing our total being and eternity to Him, we find every thing is transformed. There is life in us from God; a kind of Christ-consciousness is opened in us, testifying with the apostle,—Christ liveth in me.—Horace Bushnell.

We are only asking you to give to Christ that which you give to others, to transfer the old emotions, the blessed emotions, the exercise of which makes gladness in the life here below, to transfer them to Him, and to rest safe in the Lord. Faith is trust.—Alexander Maclaren.

A friend called on me when I was ill, to settle some business. My head was too much confused by my indisposition to understand fully what he said, but I had such unlimited confidence in him that I did whatever he bid me, in the fullest assurance that it was right. How simply I can trust in man, and how little in God! How unreasonable is a pure act of faith in one like ourselves, if we cannot repose the same faith in God.—Richard Cecil.

Other refuge have I none;
Hangs my helpless soul on Thee;
Leave, ah, leave me not alone,
Still support and comfort me!
All my trust on Thee is stayed,
All my help from Thee I bring;
Cover my defenseless head
With the shadow of Thy wing.
—Charles Wesley.

Commit yourself then to God! He will be your guide. He Himself will travel with you, as we are told He did with the Israelites, to bring them step by step across the desert to the promised land. Ah! what will be your blessedness, if you will but surrender yourself into the hands of God, permitting Him to do whatever He will, not according to your desires, but according to His own good pleasure?—Fénélon.

It is a view of God that compensates every thing else, and enables the soul to rest in His bosom. How, when the child in the night screams with terror, hearing sounds that it knows not of, is that child comforted and put to rest? Is it by a philosophical explanation that the sounds were made by the rats in the partition? Is it by imparting entomological knowledge? No; it is by the mother taking the child in her lap, and singing sweetly to it, and rocking it. And the child thinks nothing of the explanation, but only of the mother.—H. W. Beecher.

Trust with a child-like dependence upon God, and you shall fear no evil, for be assured that even "if the enemy comes in like a flood" the Spirit of the Lord will lift up a standard against him. While at that dread hour, when the world cannot help you, when all the powers of nature are in vain, yea, when your heart and your flesh shall fail you, you will be enabled still to rely with peace upon Him who has said, "I will be the strength of thy heart and thy portion forever."—H. Blunt.

How sweet the words of truth breathed from the lips of love!—James Beattie.

There is no need of words; believe facts.—Ovid.

The truth of truths is love.—Bailey.

For truth is unwelcome, however divine.—Cowper.

Whoever lives true life will love true love.—E. B. Browning.

Don't be "consistent," but be simply true.—Holmes.

There is but one poetry,—true poetry.—Goethe.

Verity is nudity.—Alfred de Musset.

At times truth may not seem probable.—Boileau.

Truth hates delays.—Seneca.

History has its truth; Legend has hers.—Victor Hugo.

Peace, if possible, but the truth at any rate.—Martin Luther.

Truth is the root of all the charities.—Dewey.

Truths that wake to perish never.—Wordsworth.

Truth takes no account of centuries.—Wordsworth.

God's word lasts forever.—Ulric von Wurtemberg.

Truth has rough flavors if we bite it through.—George Eliot.

Truth is more than a dream and a song.—Schiller.

Truth for authority, not authority for truth.—Lucretia Mott.

The genuine essence of truth never dies.—Carlyle.

I am as true as truth's simplicity,
And simpler than the infancy of truth.
—Shakespeare.

Truth is the daughter of Time.—Mazzini.

Lay thy face low on the threshold of truth.—Feisi.

The nobler the truth or sentiment, the less imports the question of authorship.—Emerson.

O, while you live, tell truth, and shame the devil.—Shakespeare.

To truth belongs freedom.—Richter.

Point thy tongue on the anvil of truth.—Pindar.

What we have in us of the image of God is the love of truth and justice.—Demosthenes.

Individuals may perish; but truth is eternal.—Joseph Gerrald.

Our minds possess by nature an insatiable desire to know the truth.—Cicero.

Truth illuminates and gives joy; and it is by the bond of joy, not of pleasure, that men's spirits are indissolubly held.—Matthew Arnold.

If I held all of truth in my hand I would beware of opening it to men.—Fontenelle.

My cares and my inquiries are for decency and truth, and in this I am wholly occupied.—Horace.

Truth is sensitive and jealous of the least encroachment upon its sacredness.—A. Bronson Alcott.

Truth does not do so much good in the world as the appearance of it does evil.—La Rochefoucauld.

The opposite of what is noised about concerning men and things is often the truth.—La Bruyère.

Every man seeks for truth; but God only knows who has found it.—Ches-terfield.

Truth is inclusive of all the virtues, is older than sects and schools, and, like charity, more ancient than mankind.—A. Bronson Alcott.

Truth is always present; it only needs to lift the iron lids of the mind's eye to read its oracles.—Emerson.

The dignity of truth is lost
With much protesting. —Jonson.

Truth is a good dog; but beware of barking too close to the heels of an error, lest you get your brains kicked out.—Coleridge.

Dare to be true. Nothing can need a lie; A fault, which needs it most, grows two thereby. —Herbert.

Truth is as impossible to be soiled by any outward touch as the sunbeam.—Milton.

A good man, through obscurest aspirations, Has still an instinct of the one true way. —Goethe.

But there is no veil like light—no adamant armor against hurt like the truth.—George MacDonald.

Truth, when not sought after, sometimes comes to light.—Menander.

Truth forever on the scaffold. Wrong forever on the throne.—Lowell.

Who ever knew truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter?—Milton.

Lest men suspect your tale untrue,
Keep probability in view. —Gay.

True as the dial to the sun,
Although it be not shin'd upon. —Butler.

All that I know is, that the facts I state
Are true as truth has ever been of late. —Byron.

Truth is strengthened by observation and time, pretences by haste and uncertainty.—Tacitus.

The thing is not only to avoid error, but to attain immense masses of truth.—Carlyle.

Truth, such as is necessary to the regulation of life, is always found where it is honestly sought.—Johnson.

Truth sometimes comes unawares upon Caution, and sometimes speaks in public as unconsciously as in a dream.—Lander.

Truth only smells sweet forever, and illusions, however innocent, are deadly as the canker worm.—Froude.

Truth, like the sun, submits to be obscured; but, like the sun, only for a time.—Bovee.

Truth shall never strike her top-sails in compliment to ignorance or sophistry.—Father Taylor.

Truth irritates those only whom it enlightens but does not convert.—Quesnel.

Truly, I see he that will but stand to the truth, it will carry him out.—George Fox.

All truth is precious, if not all divine; and what dilates the powers must needs refine.—Cowper.

Veracity is a plant of Paradise, and the seeds have never flourished beyond the walls.—George Eliot.

Old truths are always new to us, if they come with the smell of heaven upon them.—Bunyan.

Nothing is really beautiful but truth, and truth alone is lovely.—Boileau.

Truth will be uppermost one time or another, like cork, though kept down in the water.—Sir W. Temple.

Truth is too simple for us; we do not like those who unmask our illusions.—Emerson.

Truth is truth, though from an enemy, and spoken in malice.—G. Lillo.

He who seeks the truth should be of no country.—Voltaire.

The greatest truths are commonly the simplest.—Malesherbes.

Blessed be the God's voice; for it is true, and falsehoods have to cease before it!—Carlyle.

A departure from the truth was hardly ever known to be a single one.—Richardson.

There are few persons to whom truth is not a sort of insult.—Ségur.

As scarce as truth is, the supply has always been in excess of the demand.—H. W. Shaw.

If thou art wise, incline to truth; for truth, not the semblance, remains in its place.—Saadi.

O truth divine! enlightened by thy ray, I grope and guess no more, but see my way.—Arbuthnot.

It is easier to be mistaken about the true than the beautiful.—Joubert.

Truth is the highest thing that man may keep.—Chaucer.

Truth is only developed in the hour of need; time, and not man, discovers it.—Bonald.

It is strange, but true; for truth is always strange, stranger than fiction.—Byron.

The advent of truth, like the dawn of day, agitates the elements, while it disperses the gloom.—E. L. Magoon.

Truth will ever be unpalatable to those who are determined not to relinquish error.—E. W. Montagu.

We must never throw away a bushel of truth because it happens to contain a few grains of chaff.—Dean Stanley.

We must not let go manifest truths because we cannot answer all questions about them.—Jeremy Collier.

No truth can be said to be seen as it is until it is seen in its relation to all other truths. In this relation only is it true.—Elizabeth Prentiss.

Truth does not consist in minute accuracy of detail; but in conveying a right impression.—Dean Alford.

The truth you speak doth lack some gentleness,
And time to speak it in; you rub the sore,
When you should bring the plaster.
—Shakespeare.

Truth makes on the ocean of nature no one track of light—every one looking on finds its own.—Bulwer-Lytton.

The golden beams of truth and the silken cords of love, twisted together, will draw men on with a sweet violence whether they will or not.—Cudworth.

If circumstances lead me, I will find
Where truth is hid, though it were hid indeed
Within the centre. —Shakespeare.

This is all as true as it is strange;
Nay, it is ten times true; for truth is truth
To th' end of reckoning.

—Shakespeare.

Give us that calm certainty of truth, that nearness to Thee, that conviction of the reality of the life to come, which we shall need to bear us through the troubles of this.—H. W. Beecher.

Pray over every truth; for though the renewed heart is not "desperately wicked," it is quite deceitful enough to become so, if God be forgotten a moment.—Charles Kingsley.

An unproductive truth is none. But there are products which cannot be weighed even in patent scales, nor brought to market.—John Sterling.

The man who loves with his whole heart truth will love still more he who suffers for truth.—Lavater.

There is small chance of truth at the goal, where there is not childlike humility at the starting-post.—Coleridge.

Thy actions to thy words accord; thy words
To thy large heart give utterance due; thy heart Contains of good, wise, just, the perfect shape. —Milton.

To love truth for truth's sake is the principal part of human perfection in this world, and the seed-plot of all other virtues.—John Locke.

If I had a device, it would be the true, the true only, leaving the beautiful and the good to settle matters afterwards as best they could.—Sainte-Beuve.

I have found out the art of deceiving diplomatists; I speak the truth, and I am certain they will not believe me.—Count Cavour.

You need not tell all the truth, unless to those who have a right to know it; but let all you tell be truth.—Horace Mann.

Whenever you look at human nature in masses, you find every truth met by a counter truth, and both equally true.—Charles Buxton.

It is only when one is thoroughly true that there can be purity and freedom. Falsehood always punishes itself.—Auerbach.

Liars act like the salt miners; they undermine the truth, but leave just so much standing as is necessary to support the edifice.—Richter.

God offers to every mind its choice between truth and repose. Take which you please, and you can never have both.—Emerson.

One truth discovered is immortal, and entitles its author to be so; for, like a new substance in nature, it cannot be destroyed.—Hazlitt.

Truth never turns to rebuke falsehood; her own straightforwardness is the severest correction.—Thoreau.

All high truth is poetry. Take the results of science: they glow with beauty, cold and hard as are the methods of reaching them.—Charles Buxton.

In all nations truth is the most sublime, the most simple, the most difficult, and yet the most natural thing.—Mme. de Sévigné.

Truth is so great a perfection that if God would render himself visible to men, he would choose light for his body and truth for his soul.—Pythagoras.

If an offence come out of the truth better is it that the offence come, than the truth be concealed.—St. Jerome.

Truth is a torch, but a terrific one; therefore we all try to reach it with closed eyes, lest we should be scorched.

—Goethe.

Some modern zealots appear to have no better knowledge of truth, nor better manner of judging it, than by counting noses.—Swift.

The face of Truth is not less fair and beautiful for all the counterfeited visors which have been put upon her.—Shaftesbury.

Theory is continually the precursor of truth; we must pass through the twilight and its shade, to arrive at the full and perfect day.—James Douglas.

Truth and reason are common to everyone, and are no more his who spake them first than his who speaks them after.—Montaigne.

The smallest pebble in the well of truth has its peculiar meaning, and will stand when man's best monuments have passed away.—Willis.

Truth is the ground of science, the centre wherein all things repose, and is the type of eternity.—Sir P. Sidney.

The usefulest truths are plainest; and while we keep to them, our differences cannot rise high.—William Penn.

O man, little hast thou learnt of truth in things most true, and how therefore shall thy blindness wot of truth in things most fallen?—Tupper.

Truth is a queen who has her eternal throne in heaven, and her seat of empire in the heart of God.—Bossuet.

Truth may be stretched, but cannot be broken, and always gets above falsehood, as oil does above water.—Cervantes.

When the truth offends no one it should come from our lips as naturally as the air we breathe.—Stanislaus.

I will be mindful of the truth, so long as I shall be able. Mayest thou grant me the truth, tell me the best to be done.—Zend Avesta.

Childhood often holds a truth with its feeble fingers, which the grasp of manhood cannot retain,—which it is the pride of utmost age to recover.—Ruskin.

Scientific truth is marvellous, but moral truth is divine; and whoever breathes its air and walks by its light has found the lost paradise.—Horace Mann.

Truth will never be tedious unto him that travelleth in the secrets of nature; there is nothing but falsehood that glutteth us.—Seneca.

Knowledge, or more expressively truth,—for knowledge is truth received into our intelligence,—truth is an ideal whole.—John Sterling.

Truth is a gem that is found at a great depth; whilst on the surface of this world all things are weighed by the false scale of custom.—Byron.

General abstract truth is the most precious of all blessings; without it man is blind; it is the eye of reason.—Rousseau.

Great truths always dwell a long time with small minorities, and the real voice of God is often that which rises above the masses, not that which follows them.—Francis Lieber.

The firmest and noblest ground on which people can live is truth; the real with the real; a ground on which nothing is assumed.—Emerson.

Truth takes the stamp of the souls it enters. It is rigorous and rough in arid souls, but tempers and softens itself in loving natures.—Joubert.

There are truths that shield themselves behind veils, and are best spoken by implication. Even the sun veils himself in his own rays to blind the gaze of the too curious starrer.—A. Bronson Alcott.

Truth is like a pearl: he alone possesses it who has plunged into the depths of life and torn his hands on the rocks of Time.—Laboulaye.

He who has once deviated from the truth usually commits perjury with as little scruple as he would tell a lie.—Cicero.

Oh truth,
Thou art, whilst tenant in a noble breast,
A crown of crystal in an iv'ry chest!
—Davenport.

Vice for a time may shine, and virtue sigh;
But truth, like heav'n's sun, plainly doth reveal,
And scourge or crown, what darkness did conceal.
—Davenport.

I have seldom known any one who deserted truth in trifles that could be trusted in matters of importance.—Paley.

The greatest friend of truth is time;
her greatest enemy is prejudice; and her constant companion is humility.—Colton.

While we are examining into everything we sometimes find truth where we least expected it.—Quintilian.

A man protesting against error is on the way towards uniting himself with all men that believe in truth.—Carlyle.

But what is truth? 'Twas Pilate's question
To Truth itself, that deign'd him no reply.
—Cowper.

Love of truth will bless the lover all his days; yet when he brings her home, his fair-faced bride, she comes empty-handed to his door, herself her only dower.—Theodore Parker.

A man has no more right to utter untruths to his own disparagement than to his own praise. Truth is absolute. It is obligatory under all circumstances, and in all relations.—Dr. Kitto.

Some men are more beholden to their bitterest enemies than to friends who appear to be sweetness itself. The former frequently tell the truth, but the latter never.—Cato.

A truth which one has never heard causes the soul surprise at first, which touches it keenly; but when it is accustomed to it, it becomes very insensible there.—Nicole.

Truth can hardly be expected to adapt herself to the crooked policy and wily sinuosities of wordly affairs; for truth, like light, travels only in straight lines.—Colton.

Truth is a naked and open daylight, that doth not show the masks and mummeries of the world half so stately and daintily as candlelights.—Bacon.

But God himself is truth; in propagating which, as men display a greater integrity and zeal, they approach nearer to the similitude of God, and possess a greater portion of his love.—Milton.

But yet, I say, if imputation and strong circumstances, which lead directly to the door of truth, will give you satisfaction, you may have it.—Shakespeare.

When by night the frogs are croaking, kindle but a torch's fire;
Hail how soon they all are silent! Thus Truth silences the liar.
—Friedrich von Logau.

'Tis not enough your counsel still be true,
Blunt truths more mischief than nice falsehoods do.

* * * * *
Without good breeding, truth is disapproved;
That only makes superior sense below'd.
—Pope.

Truth crushed to earth shall rise again;
The eternal years of God are hers;
But Error, wounded, writhes with pain,
And dies among his worshippers.
—William Cullen Bryant.

Get but the truth once uttered, and 'tis like
A star new-born that drops into its place
And which, once circling in its placid round,
Not all the tumult of the earth can shake.
—Lowell.

Truth is the object of our understanding, as good is of our will; and the understanding can no more be delighted with a lie than the will can choose an apparent evil.—Dryden.

The best way to come to truth being to examine things as really they are, and not to conclude they are, as we fancy of ourselves, or have been taught by others to imagine.—Locke.

Put golden padlocks on Truth's lips, be callous as ye will,
From soul to soul, o'er all the world, leaps one electric thrill. —Lowell.

Truth is tough. It will not break, like a bubble, at a touch; nay, you may kick it about all day, like a football, and it will be round and full at evening.—O. W. Holmes.

Though love repine and reason chafe,
There came a voice without reply,
"Tis man's perdition to be safe,
When for the truth he ought to die."
—Emerson.

Truth is one;
And, in all lands beneath the sun,
Whoso hath eyes to see may see
The token of its unity. —Whittier.

Attach thyself to truth; defend justice; rejoice in the beautiful. That which comes to thee with time, time will take away; that which is eternal will remain in thy heart.—Esaías Tegner.

In order to discover truth, we must be truthful ourselves, and must welcome those who point out our errors as heartily as those who approve and confirm our discoveries.—Max Müller.

Truth, like the juice of the poppy, in small quantities, calms men; in large, heats and irritates them, and is attended by fatal consequences in excess.—Landor.

Truth is the source of every good to gods and men. He who expects to be blessed and fortunate in this world should be a partaker of it from the earliest moment of his life.—Plato.

Truth only needs to be for once spoken out; and there's such music in her, such strange rhythm, as makes men's memories her joyous slaves.—Lowell.

The way of truth is like a great road. It is not difficult to know it.

The evil is only that men will not seek it. Do you go home and search for it. —Mencius,

Every man has a right to utter what he thinks truth, and every other man has a right to knock him down for it. Martyrdom is the test.—Dr. Johnson.

Truth is congenial to man. Moral truth is then most consummate when, like beauty, it commends itself without argument. The righteous not only does right, but loves to do right.—F. W. Newman.

O Truth! pure and sacred virgin,
when wilt thou be worthily revered?
O Goddess, who instructs us, why didst thou put thy palace in a well?—Voltaire.

Clear and round dealing is the honor of man's nature; the mixture of falsehood is like alloy in coin of gold and silver, which may make the metal work the better, but it embaseth it.—Bacon.

The greatest truths are wronged if not linked with beauty, and they win their way most surely and deeply into the soul, when arranged in this their natural and fit attire.—Channing.

The golden beams of truth and the silken cords of love, twisted together, will draw men on with a sweet violence whether they will or no.—Cudworth.

- Of all the duties, the love of truth, with faith and constancy in it, ranks first and highest. Truth is God. To love God and to love truth are one and the same.—Silvio Pellico.

"Can this be true"? an arch observer cries,—
"Yes," rather moved, "I saw it with these eyes."
"Sir! I believe it on that ground alone; I could not had I seen it with my own."
—Cowper.

If you can but give to the fainting soul at your door a cup of water from the wells of truth, it shall flash back on you the radiance of God. As you save, so shall you be saved.—Conway.

Seven years of silent inquiry are needful for a man to learn the truth, but fourteen in order to learn how to make it known to his fellow-men.—Plato.

Truths on which depend our main concern, That 'tis our shame and misery not to learn,

Shine by the side of every path we tread
With such a lustre, he that runs may read.
—Cowper.

"Truth," I cried, "though the heavens crush me for following her; no falsehood, though a whole celestial Luberland were the price of apostasy!"—Carlyle.

Every newly discovered truth judges the world, separates the good from the evil, and calls on faithful souls to make sure of their election.—Julia Ward Howe.

Truth comes home to the mind so naturally that when we learn it for the first time, it seems as though we did no more than recall it to our memory.—Fontenelle.

Certainly, truth should be strenuous and bold; but the strongest things are not always the noisiest, as any one may see who compares scolding with logic.—Chapin.

Weigh not so much what men say, as what they prove; remembering that truth is simple and naked, and needs not investive to apparel her comeliness.—Sir P. Sidney.

Truth is the band of union and the basis of human happiness. Without this virtue there is no reliance upon language, no confidence in friendship, no security in promises and oaths.—Jeremy Collier.

Just as soon as any conviction of important truth becomes central and vital, there comes the desire to utter it—a desire which is immediate and irresistible. Sacrifice is gladness, service is joy, when such an idea becomes a commanding power.—R. S. Storrs.

The germs of all truth lie in the soul, and when the ripe moment comes, the truth within answers to the fact without as the flower responds to the sun, giving it form for heat and color for light.—Hamilton W. Mabie.

Truth always has a bewitching savor of newness in it, and novelty at the first taste recalls that original sweetness to the tongue; but alas for him who would make the one a substitute for the other.—Lowell.

As it has been finely expressed, "Principle is a passion for truth." And as an earlier and homelier writer hath it, "The truths we believe in are the pillars of our world."—Bulwer-Lytton.

Oh, how great is the power of truth! which of its own power can easily defend itself against all the ingenuity and cunning and wisdom of men, and against the treacherous plots of all the world.—Cicero.

Liberty is the parent of truth, but truth and decency are sometimes at variance. All men and all propositions are to be treated here as they deserve, and there are many who have no claim either to respect or decency.—Johnson.

Truth is a thing immortal and perpetual, and it gives to us a beauty that fades not away in time, nor does it take away the freedom of speech which proceeds from justice; but it gives to us the knowledge of what is just and lawful, separating from them the unjust and refuting them.—Epictetus.

Truth is a very different thing from fact; it is the loving contact of the soul with spiritual fact, vital and potent. It does not work in the soul independently of all faculty or qualification there for setting it forth or defending it. Truth in the inward parts is a power, not an opinion.—George MacDonald.

There is an inward state of the heart which makes truth credible the moment it is stated. It is credible to some men because of what they are. Love is credible to a loving heart; purity is credible to a pure mind; life is credible to a spirit in which life beats strongly—it is incredible to other men.—F. W. Robertson.

More proselytes and converts use t' accrue
To false persuasions than the right and true;
For error and mistake are infinite,
But truth has but one way to be f' th'
right. —Butler.

Did the Almighty, holding in his right hand truth, and in his left hand search after truth, deign to proffer me
the one I might prefer, in all humility, but without hesitation, I should request search after truth.—Lessing.

Ev'n them who kept thy truth so pure of old,
When all our fathers worshipp'd stocks
and stones,
Forget not. —Milton.

The love of truth is the stimulus to all noble conversation. This is the root of all the charities. The tree which springs from it may have a thousand branches, but they will all bear a golden and generous fruitage.—
Orville Dewey.

The dictum that truth always triumphs over persecution is one of those pleasant falsehoods which men repeat after one another till they pass into commonplaces, but which all experience refutes.—J. Stuart Mill.

There are those who hold the opinion that truth is only safe when diluted,—about one-fifth to four-fifths lies,—as the oxygen of the air is with its nitrogen. Else it would burn us all up.—Holmes.

We have oftener than once endeavored to attach some meaning to that aphorism, vulgarly imputed to Shaftesbury, which however we can find nowhere in his works, that "ridicule is the test of truth."—Carlyle.

Truth, whether in or out of fashion, is the measure of knowledge and the business of the understanding; whatsoever is besides that, however authorized by consent or recommended by rarity, is nothing but ignorance or something worse.—John Locke.

Morality has need, that it may be well received, of the mask of fable and the charm of poetry: truth pleases less when it is naked; and it is the only virgin whom we best like to see a little clothed.—Boufflers.

Truth is to be sought with a mind purified from the passions of the body.
Having overcome evil things, thou shalt experience the union of the immortal divinity with the mortal man.
—Pythagoras.

Since truthfulness, as a conscious virtue and sacrifice, is the blossom, nay, the pollen, of the whole moral growth, it can only grow with its growth, and open when it has reached its height.—Richter.

It is not always necessary that truth should be embodied; enough if it hover, spirit-like, around us and produce harmony, if it float through the air like the sweetly solemn chiming of a minster bell.—Goethe.

Jane borrow'd maxims from a doubting
school,
And took for truth the test of ridicule;
Lucy saw no such virtue in a jest,
Truth was with her of ridicule the test.
—Crabbe.

Truth travels down from the heights of philosophy to the humblest walks of life, and up from the simplest perceptions of an awakened intellect to the discoveries which almost change the face of the world. At every stage of its progress it is genial, luminous, creative.—Edward Everett.

The confusion and undesigned inaccuracy so often to be observed in conversation, especially in that of uneducated persons, proves that truth needs to be cultivated as a talent, as well as recommended as a virtue.— Mrs. Fry.

For who knows not that truth is strong, next to the Almighty; she needs no politics, nor stratagems, nor licensings to make her victorious;
those are the shifts and the defenses that error uses against her power:
give her but room, and do not bind her when she sleeps.—Milton.

Truth gathers itself spotless and unhurt after all our surrenders and concealments and partisanship; never hurt by the treachery or ruin of its best defenders, whether Luther, or William Penn, or St. Paul.—Emerson.

For all the practical purposes of life, truth might as well be in a prison as in the folio of a schoolman; and those who release her from the cobwebbed shelf, and teach her to live with men, have the merit of liberating, if not of discovering her.—Colton.

There is something very sublime, though very fanciful, in Plato's description of the Supreme Being,—that truth is His body and light His shadow. According to this definition there is nothing so contradictory to his nature as error and falsehood.—Addison.

The very essence of truth is plainness and brightness; the darkness and crookedness is our own. The wisdom of God created understanding, fit and proportionable to truth, the object and end of it, as the eye to the thing visible. If our understanding have a film of ignorance over it, or be hlear with gazing on other false glitterings, what is that to truth?—Milton.

He who seeks truth must be content with a lonely, little-trodden path. If he cannot worship her till she has been canonized by the shouts of the multitude, he must take his place with the members of that wretched crowd who shouted for two long hours, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!" till truth, reason and calmness were all drowned in noise.—F. W. Robertson.

Though all the winds of doctrine were let loose to play upon the earth, so truth be in the field, we do injuriously by licensing and prohibiting to misdoubt her strength. Let her and falsehood grapple; who ever knew truth put to the worse, in a free and open encounter? Her confuting is the best and surest suppressing.—Milton.

A writer who builds his arguments upon facts is not easily to be con-futed. He is not to be answered by general assertions or general reproaches. He may want eloquence to amuse and persuade; but, speaking truth, he must always convince.—Junius.

Truth! why shall every wretch of letters Dare to speak truth against his betters! Let ragged virtue stand aloof, Nor mutter accents of reproof; Let ragged wit a mute become, When wealth and power would have her dumb. —Churchill.

Truth is the beginning of every good thing, both in heaven and on earth; and he who would be blessed and happy should be from the first a partaker of the truth, that he may live a true man as long as possible, for then he can be trusted; but he is not to be trusted who loves voluntary falsehood, and he who loves involuntary falsehood is a fool.—Plato.

The nimble lie
Is like the second-hand upon a clock;
We see it fly; while the hour-hand of truth
Seems to stand still, and yet it moves unseen,
And wins, at last, for the clock will not strike
Till it has reached the goal.
—Longfellow.

Truths of all others the most awful and interesting are too often considered as so true that they lose all the power of truth, and lie bed-ridden in the dormitory of the soul, side by side with the most despised and exploded errors.—Coleridge.

The power to bind and loose to Truth is given;
The mouth that speaks it is the mouth of Heaven.
The power, which in a sense belongs to none,
Thus understood belongs to every one.
—Abraham Coles.

He is an adorer of chaste truth,
And speaks religiously of ev'ry man:
He will not trust obscure traditions,
Or faith implicit, but concludes of things Within his own clear knowledge: what he says
You may believe, and pawn your soul upon 't.
—Shirley.

All that happens in the world of nature and man—every war, every peace, every horn of prosperity, every horn of adversity, every election, every death, every life, every success and every failure, all change, all permanence, the perished leaf, the unutterable glory of stars—all things speak truth to the thoughtful spirit.—Rufus Choate.

Truth, whether in or out of fashion, is the measure of knowledge, and the business of the understanding; whatever is besides that, however authorized by consent, or recommended by rarity, is nothing but ignorance, or something worse.—Locke.

Truth has no gradations; nothing which admits of increase can be so much what it is, as truth is truth. There may be a strange thing, and a thing more strange. But if a proposition be true, there can be none more true.—Johnson.

Falsehood and delusion are allowed in no case whatever; but, as in the exercise of all the virtues, there is an economy of truth. It is a sort of temperance, by which a man speaks truth with measure, that he may speak it the longer.—Burke.

Truth lies in a small compass! The Aristotelians say, all truth is contained in Aristotle, in one place or another. Galileo makes Simplicius say so, but shows the absurdity of that speech by answering all truth is contained in a lesser compass, namely, in the alphabet.—Zimmermann.

Corrupt as men are, they are yet so much the creatures of reflection, and so strongly addicted to sentiments of right and wrong, that their attachment to a public cause can rarely be secured, or their animosity be kept alive, unless their understandings are engaged by some appearance of truth and rectitude.—Robert Hall.

After all, the most natural beauty in the world is honesty and moral truth; for all beauty is truth. True features make the beauty of a face, and true proportions the beauty of architecture, as true measures that of harmony and music. In poetry, which is all fable, truth still is the perfection.—Shaftesbury.

Pure truth, like pure gold, has been found unfit for circulation, because men have discovered that it is far more convenient to adulterate the truth than to refine themselves. They will not advance their minds to the standard, therefore they lower the standard to their minds.—Colton.

Each truth sparkles with a light of its own, yet it always reflects some light upon another; a truth, while lighting another, springs from one, in order to penetrate another. The first truth is an abundant sense, from which all others are colored, and each particular truth, in its turn, resembles a great river that divides into an infinite number of rivulets.—Scheuchzer.

Truth, after all, wears a different face to everybody, and it would be too tedious to wait till all are agreed. She is said to lie at the bottom of a well, for the very reason, perhaps, that whoever looks down in search of her sees his own image at the bottom, and is persuaded not only that he has seen the goddess, but that she is far better-looking than he had imagined.—Lowell.

Truth should be the first lesson of the child and the last aspiration of manhood; for it has been well said that the inquiry of truth, which is the love-making of it, the knowledge of truth, which is the presence of it, and the belief of truth, which is the enjoying of it, is the sovereign good of human nature.—Whittier.

Truth is the most powerful thing in the world, since even fiction itself must be governed by it, and can only please by its resemblance. The appearance of reality is necessary to make any passion agreeably represented, and to be able to move others we must be moved ourselves, or at least seem to be so, upon some probable grounds.—Shaftesbury.

According to Democritus, truth lies at the bottom of a well, the depth of which, alas! gives but little hope of release. To be sure, one advantage is derived from this, that the water serves for a mirror, in which truth may be reflected. I have heard, however, that some philosophers, in seeking for truth, to pay homage to her, have seen their own image and adored it instead.—Richter.

Not a truth has to art or to science been given,
But brows have ached for it, and souls
toil'd and striven;
And many have striven, and many have fail'd,
And many died, slain by the truth they assail'd. —Lord Lytton.

Then to side with Truth is noble when we share her wretched crust, Ere her cause bring fame and profit, and
'tis prosperous to be just;
Then it is the brave man chooses, while the coward stands aside, Doubting in his abject spirit, till his Lord is crucified. —Lowell.

Truth! Truth! where is the sound
Of thy calm, unflatt'ring voice to be found?
We may go to the Senate, where Wisdom rules,
And find but deceiv'd or deceiving fools:
Who dare trust the sages of old,
When one shall unsay what another has told?
And even the lips of childhood and youth
But rarely echo the tone of Truth.
—Eliza Cook.

Marble and recording brass decay,
And, like the 'graver's memory, pass away;
The works of man inherit, as is just,
Their author's frailty, and return to dust;
But Truth divine forever stands secure,
Its head as guarded, as its base is sure;
Fixed in the rolling flood of endless years,
The pillar of the eternal plan appears;
The waving storm and dashing wave defies,
Built by that Architect who built the skies.
—Cowper.

Tulip

The tulip's petals shine in dew,
All beautiful, but none alike.
—Montgomery.

Dutch tulips from their beds
Flaunted their stately heads.
—Montgomery.

And tulips, children love to stretch
Their fingers down, to feel in each Its beauty's secret nearer.
—E. B. Browning.

'Mid the sharp, short emerald wheat, scarce
risen three fingers well,
The wild tulip at end of its tube, blows out its great red bell, Like a thin clear bubble of blood, for the children to pick and sell.
—Robert Browning.

Bring the tulip and the rose,
While their brilliant beauty glows.
—Eliza Cook.

Like tulip-beds of different shape and dyes,
Bending beneath the invisible west-wind's sighs. —Moore.

Turkey

How bless'd, how envied were our life,
Could we but 'scape the poulterer's knifel
But man, curs'd man, on turkeys preys,
And Christmas shortens all our days:
Sometimes with oysters we combine,
Sometimes assist the savory chine.
From the low peasant to the lord,
The turkey smokes on every board.
—Gay.

Twilight

The curfew tolls the knell of parting day.—Gray.

Like our dawn, merely a sob of light.—Victor Hugo.

Dim eclipse, disastrous twilight.—
Milton.

Hail, twilight! sovereign of one peaceful hour!—Wordsworth.

Gilding pale streams with heavenly alchemy.—Shakespeare.

As twilight melts beneath the moon away.—Byron.

The deathbed of a day, how beautiful.—Bailey.

The skies yet blushing with departed light.—Pope.

Nature hath appointed the twilight as a bridge to pass us out of day into night.—Fuller.

The gaudy, blabbing, and remorse-ful day is crept into the bosom of the sea.—Shakespeare.

Last of the hours that track the fading day.—Mrs. Radcliffe.

Fair, fleeting sister of the mournful night.—Mrs. Norton.

How dear to my soul is the mild twilight hour!—Moore.

As thus into the quiet night the twilight lapsed away.—Whittier.

Of evening tinct the purple, streaming amethyst is thine.—Thomson.

The lengthening shadows wait the first pale stars of twilight.—O. W. Holmes.

Faint and sweet thy light falls round the peasant's homeward feet.—Mrs. Norton.

When the sun's last rays are fading
Into twilight soft and dim.
—Theodore L. Barker.

Twilight gray hath in her sober livery all things clad.—Milton.

Twilight's soft dews steal o'er the village green, with magic tints to harmonize the scene.—Rogers.

Now the last red ray is gone;
Now the twilight shadows lie.
—Susan Coolidge.

A tender sadness drops upon my soul, like the soft twilight dropping on the world.—Alexander Smith.

Night was drawing and closing her curtain up above the world, and down beneath it.—Richter.

In the vale beneath the hill
The evening's growing purple strengthens.
—Margaret J. Preston.

The hour before the heavenly-harness'd team Begins his golden progress in the east.
—Shakespeare.

Beauteous Night lay dead
Under the pall of twilight, and the lover-star sickened and shrank.
—George Eliot.

How beautiful the silent hour, when morning and evening thus sit together, hand in hand, beneath the starless sky of midnight!—Longfellow.

Twilight makes us pensive; Aurora is the goddess of activity; despair curses at midnight; hope blesses at noon.—Beaconsfield.

How lovely are the portals of the night,
When stars come out to watch the daylight die.
—Thomas Cole.

Twilight is like death; the dark portal of night comes upon us, to open again in the glorious morning of immortality.—James Ellis.

The day is done; and slowly from the scene the stooping sun upgathers his spent shafts, and puts them back into his golden quiver!—Longfellow.

The babbling day has touched the hem of night's garment, and, weary and still, drops asleep in her bosom.—Longfellow.

And not a breath crept through the rosy air, and yet the forest leaves seemed stirred with prayer.—Byron.

In the June twilight, in the soft gray twilight, the yellow sun-glow trembling through the rainy eve.—Miss Mulock.

The weary sun hath made a golden set,
And, by the bright track of his fiery car,
Gives signal of a goodly day to-morrow.
—Shakespeare.

Look, the gentle day
Before the wheels of Phœbus, round about Dapples the drowsy east with spots of grey.
—Shakespeare.

The west is broken into bars
Of orange, gold, and gray;
Gone is the sun, come are the stars,
And night infolds the day.
—George MacDonald.

The gloaming comes, the day is spent,
The sun goes out of sight,
And painted is the occident
With purple sanguine bright.
—Alexander Hume.

O, the sweet, sweet twilight just before the time of rest,
When the black clouds are driven away,
and the stormy winds suppressed.
—D. M. Mulock.

Softly the evening came. The sun from the western horizon, like a magi cian, extended his golden wand o'er the landscape.—Longfellow.

Ah, County Guy, the hour is nigh,
The sun has left the lea,
The orange flower perfumes the bower,
The breeze is on the sea. —Scott.

The sky is blue above,
And cool the green sod lies below;
It is the hour that claims for love
The halcyon moments as they flow.
—James T. Fields.

O Twilight! spirit that dost render birth To dim enchantments—melting heaven to earth—
Leaving on craggy hills and running
streams
A softness like the atmosphere of dreams.
—Mrs. Norton.

The summer day is closed—the sun is set;
Well they have done their office, those bright hours,
The latest of whose train goes softly out
In the red west.
—William Cullen Bryant.

The west yet glimmers with some streaks of
day:
Now spurs the lated traveller apace,
To gain the timely inn. —Shakespeare.

The air is full of hints of grief,
Strange voices touched with pain—
The pathos of the falling leaf
And rustling of the rain.
—T. B. Aldrich.

The twilight is sad and cloudy,
The wind blows wild and free,
And like the wings of sea-birds
Flash the white caps of the sea.
—Longfellow.

The sun is set; and in his latest beams
Yon little cloud of ashen gray and gold,
Slowly upon the amber air unrolled,
The falling mantle of the Prophet seems.
—Longfellow.

The sunbeams dropped
Their gold, and, passing in porch and niche,
Softened to shadows, silvery, pale, and dim,
As if the very Day paused and grew Eve.
—Edwin Arnold.

Peacefully
The quiet stars came out, one after one;
The holy twilight fell upon the sea,
The summer day was done.
—Celia Thaxter.

The sun, declined, was hastening now with prone career to the ocean isles, and in the ascending scale of heaven the stars that usher evening rose.—Milton.

The summer's songs are hushed. Up the lone shore
The weary waves wash sadly, and a grief Sounds in the wind, like farewells fond and brief;
The cricket's chirp but makes the silence more. —Celia Thaxter.

* * * th' approach of night
The skies yet blushing with departing light,
When falling dews with spangles deck'd
the glade,
And the low sun had lengthen'd ev'ry shade. —Pope.

From that high mount of God whence light and shade
Spring both, the face of brightest heaven had changed
To grateful twilight. —Milton.

Twilight, ascending slowly from the east, Entwined in duskier wreaths her braided locks
O'er the fair front and radiant eyes of
day;
Night followed, clad with stars.
—Shelley.

Along the west the golden bars
Still to a deeper glory grew;
Above our heads the faint few stars
Looked out from the unfathomed blue;
And the fair city's clamorous jars Seemed melted in the evening hue.
—W. B. Glazier.

One by one the flowers close,
Lily and dewy rose Shutting their tender petals from the moon;
The grasshoppers are still; but not so soon
Are still the noisy crows.
—Christina G. Rossetti.

'Twas twilight, and the sunless day went down
Over the waste of waters; like a veil,
Which, if withdrawn, would but disclose the frown
Of one whose hate is masked but to assail. —Byron.

Parting day
Dies like the dolphin, whom each pang im-bues
With a new color as it gasps away,
The last still loveliest, till 'tis gone—and all is gray. —Byron.

What heart has not acknowledged the influence of this hour, the sweet and soothing hour of twilight, the hour of love, the hour of adoration, the hour of rest, when we think of those we love only to regret that we have not loved them more dearly, when we remember our enemies only to forgive them.—Longfellow.

Now the soft hour
Of walking comes; for him who lonely
loves
To seek the distant hills, and there converse
With Nature, there to harmonize his heart,
And in pathetic Song to breathe around
The harmony to others. —Thomson.

The moon is bleached as white as wool,
And just dropping under;
Every star is gone but three,
And they hang far asunder,—
There's a sea-ghost all in gray,
A tall shape of wonder!

—Jean Ingelow.

Sweet shadows of twilight! how calm their
repose,
While the dewdrops fall soft in the breast
of the rose!
How blest to the toiler his hour of release
When the vesper is heard with its whisper of peace! —O. W. Holmes.

In the twilight of morning to climb to the top of the mountain,— Thee to salute, kindly star, earliest herald
of day,—
And to await, with impatience, the gaze of the ruler of heaven,— Youthful delight, oh, how oft luredst thou me out in the night. —Goethe.

Twilight's soft dewdrops steal o'er the village-
green,
With magic tints to harmonize the scene.
Stilled is the hum that through the hamlet broke
When round the ruins of their ancient oak
The peasants flocked to hear the minstrel
play,
And games and carols closed the busy day.
—Samuel Rogers.

Still Twilight, welcome! Rest, how sweet art thou!
Now eve o'erhangs the western cloud's thick brow;
The far-stretch'd curtain of retiring light,
With fiery treasures fraught; that on the
sight
Flash from its bulging sides, where darkness lowers,
In Fancy's eye, a chain of mould'ring
towers;
Or craggy coasts just rising into view,
Midst jav'lin's dire and darts of streaming blue. —Bloomfield.

Fades the light,
And afar
Goeth day, cometh night,
And a star
Leadeth all Speedeth all
To their rest.

—Bret Harte.

Tyranny

Rebellion to tyrants is obedience to God.—Anonymous.

Be sure there are domestic tyrants also.—Thackeray.

Bad laws are the worst sort of tyranny.—Burke.

A wicked tyrant is better than a wicked war.—Luther.

Love reigns a very tyrant in my heart.—Otway.

Hardness ever of hardness is mother.—Shakespeare.

'Tis time to fear, when tyrants seem to kiss.—Shakespeare.

A man's tyranny is measured only by his power to abuse.—Donn Piatt.

Clever tyrants are never punished.
—Voltaire.

Is there no tyrant but the crowned one?—Chénier.

What is more cruel than a tyrant's ear?—Juvenal.

There is a remedy in human nature against tyranny, that will keep us safe under every form of government.—Johnson.

A company of tyrants is inaccessible to all seductions.—Voltaire.

The sovereign is called a tyrant who knows no laws but his caprice.—
Voltaire.

I knew him tyrannous, and tyrants' fears Decrease not, but grow faster than the years. —Shakespeare.

Still when the lust of tyrant power succeeds, some Athens perishes, or some Tully bleeds.—Pope.

The tyrant, it has been said, is but a slave turned inside out.—Samuel Smiles.

He hath no friends but what are friends for fear;
Which, in his dearest need, will fly from him.—Shakespeare.

None but tyrants have any business to be afraid.—Hardouin de Péréfixe.

How can tyrants safely govern home,
Unless abroad they purchase great alliance.—Shakespeare.

He who strikes terror into others is himself in continual fear.—Claudian.

Where the hand of tyranny is long we do not see the lips of men open with laughter.—Saadi.

Tyrants have not yet discovered any chains that can fetter the mind.—Colton.

Of all the tyrants that the world affords, our own affections are the fiercest lords.—Earl of Sterling.

Oppressive government is more cruel than a tiger.—Confucius.

Whoever is right, the persecutor must be wrong.—William Penn.

'Twixt kings and tyrants there's this difference known Kings seek their subjects' good, tyrants their own.—Herrick.

The most insupportable of tyrants exclaim against the exercise of arbitrary power.—L'Estrange.

Kings will be tyrants from policy, when subjects are rebels from principle.—Burke.

Tyrants seldom die
Of a dry death; it waiteth at their gate,
Drest in the colour of their robes of state.—Alleyne.

There is no tyranny so despotic as that of public opinion among a free people.—Donn Piatt.

Arbitrary power is most easily established on the ruins of liberty abused to licentiousness.—Washington.

A king rules as he ought, a tyrant as he lists; a king to the profit of all, a tyrant only to please a few.—Aristotle.

It is not the rigor, but the inexpediency, of laws and acts of authority, which makes them tyrannical.—Paley.

Unlimited power corrupts the possessor; and this I know, that, where law ends, there tyranny begins.—Chatham.

When the will of man is raised above law it is always tyranny and despotism, whether it is the will of a bashaw or of bastard patriots.—Noah Webster.

Tyrants commonly cut off the stairs by which they climb up unto their thrones * * * for fear that, if they still be left standing, others will get up the same way.—Thomas Fuller.

O nation miserable, with an untitled tyrant bloody-sceptered, when shalt thou see thy wholesome days again?—Shakespeare.

Bleed, bleed, poor country!
Great Tyranny! lay thou thy basis sure,
For goodness dares not check thee!—Shakespeare.

He that by harshness of nature rules his family with an iron hand is as truly a tyrant as he who misgoverns a nation.—Seneca.

A great deal of the furniture of ancient tyranny is torn to rags; the rest is entirely out of fashion.—Burke.

An extreme rigor is sure to arm everything against it, and at length to relax into a supine neglect.—Burke.

The most imperious masters over their own servants are at the same time the most abject slaves to the servants of others.—Seneca.

Every wanton and causeless restraint of the will of the subject, whether practiced by a monarch, a nobility, or a popular assembly, is a degree of tyranny.—Blackstone.

I grant him bloody,
Luxurious, avaricious, false, deceitful,
Sudden, malicious, smacking of every sin
That has a name. —Shakespeare.

The tyrant should take heed to what he doth,
Since every victim-carrion turns to use,
And drives a chariot, like a god made wroth,
Against each piled injustice.
—Mrs. Browning.

Men are still men. The despot's wickedness
Comes of ill teaching, and of power's excess,— Comes of the purple he from childhood
wears,
Slaves would be tyrants if the chance were theirs. —Victor Hugo.

There is nothing more hostile to a city than a tyrant, under whom in the first and chiefest place, there are not laws in common, but one man, keeping the law himself to himself, has the sway, and this is no longer equal.
—Euripides.

Tyranny
Is far the worst of treasons. Dost thou deem None rebels except subjects? The prince who Neglects or violates his trust is more
A brigand than the robber-chief.
—Byron.

And many an old man's sigh, and many a widow's,
And many an orphan's water-standing
eye—
Men for their sons', wives for their husbands' fate,
And orphans for their parents' timeless
death,—
Shall rue the hour that ever thou wast born. —Shakespeare.

The lust of dominion innovates so imperceptibly that we become complete despots before our wanton abuse of power is perceived; the tyranny first exercised in the nursery is exhibited in various shapes and degrees in every stage of our existence.—
Zimmerman.

Tyranny
Absolves all faith; and who invades our rights,
Howe'er his own commence, can never be
But an usurper. —Henry Brooke.

Each animal,
By natural instinct taught, spares his own
kind,
But man, the tyrant man! revels at large,
Freebooter unrestrain'd, destroys at will
The whole creation; men and beasts his prey;
These for his pleasure, for his glory those.
—Somerville.

It is the nature of tyranny and rapacity never to learn moderation from the ill-success of first oppressions; on the contrary, all oppressors, all men thinking highly of the methods dictated by their nature, attribute the frustration of their desires to the want of sufficient rigor.—Burke.

Th' oppressive, sturdy, man-destroying villains,
Who ravag'd kingdoms, and laid empires
waste,
And in a cruel wantonness of power, Thinn'd states of half their people, and gave up
To want the rest. —Blair.

Think'st thou there is no tyranny but that Of blood and chains? The despotism of vice—
The weakness and the wickedness of luxury—
The negligence—the apathy—the evils
Of sensual sloth—produce ten thousand tyrants,
Whose delegated cruelty surpasses
The worst acts of one energetic master, However harsh and hard in his own bearing. —Byron.

U

Ugliness

Absolute and entire ugliness is rare.—Ruskin.

Better an ugly face than an ugly mind.—James Ellis.

Nothing is irredeemably ugly but sin.—Balzac.

Some men's ugliness is hard to beat.—G. D. Prentice.

Nobody's sweetheart is ugly.—J. J. Vadé.

Ugliness without tact is horrible.—Hawthorne.

Oh, I have passed a miserable night, so full of ugly sights, of ghastly dreams!—Shakespeare.

Wrinkles and ill-nature together made a woman hideous.—Chamfort.

The ugliest man was he who came to Troy; with squinting eyes and one distorted foot.—Homer.

Ugliness, after virtue, is the best guardian of a young woman.—Mme. de Genlis.

Proper deformity seems not in the flesh so horrid as in woman.—Shakespeare.

An ugly face and the want of exterior beauty generally increases the interior beauty.—Chatfield.

Ugliness is a letter of credit for some special purposes.—Chesterfield.

Lord Chesterfield designated ugly women as the third sex; how shall we place ugly men.—Anna Cora Mowatt.

There are no ugly women; there are only women who do not know how to look pretty.—Antoine Berryer.

An ugly woman in a rich habit set out with jewels, nothing can become.—Dryden.

Few persons comprehend the power of ugliness.—Mirabeau.

In nature there's no blemish but the mind; none can be called deformed but the unkind.—Shakespeare.

Their dull ribaldry must be offensive to any one who does not, for the sake of the sin, pardon the ugliness of its circumstances.—South.

Both beauty and ugliness are equally to be dreaded; the one as a dangerous gift, the other as a melancholy affliction.—Eliza Cook.

Nothing keeps me in such awe as perfect beauty; now, there is something consoling and encouraging in ugliness.—Sheridan.

There is a sort of charm in ugliness, if the person has some redeeming qualities and is only ugly enough.—H. W. Shaw.

I do not know that she was virtuous; but she was always ugly, and with a woman, that is half the battle.—Heinrich Heine.

Nature has hardly formed a woman ugly enough to be insensible to flattery upon her person.—Chesterfield.

Homeliness has its advantage over its enemy, personal beauty; it is as difficult for an ugly woman to be calumniated as for a pretty woman not to be.—Stahl.

Told gives to the ugliest thing a certain charming air,
For that without it were else a miserable affair. —Moliere.

Though ugliness be the opposite of beauty, it is not the opposite to proportion and fitness; for it is possible that a thing may be very ugly with any proportions, and with a perfect fitness for any use.—Burke.

Absolute ugliness is admitted as rarely as perfect beauty; but degrees of it more or less distinct are associated with whatever has the nature of death and sin, just as beauty is associated with what has the nature of virtue and of life.—Ruskin.

Unanimity

Unanimity is the mistress of strength.—Lamartine.

All concord's born of contraries.—Ben Jonson.

Two souls with but a single thought,
two hearts that beat as one.—Maria Lowell.

The multitude which does not reduce itself to unity is confusion exemplified.—Pascal.

When all shoot at one mark, the gods join in the combat.—Emerson.

By union the smallest states thrive;
by discord the greatest are destroyed.—Sallust.

Unbelief

Unbelief is blind.—Milton.

Men always grow vicious before they become unbelievers.—Swift.

Doubt that creed which you cannot reduce to practice.—Hosea Ballou,

It is no advantage to be near the light if the eyes are closed.—St. Augustine.

The fearful unbelief is unbelief in yourself.—Carlyle.

More strange than true. I never may believe These antique fables, nor these fairy toys. —Shakespeare.

A refusal to believe that God loves us is the unbelief which destroys the soul.—E. N. Kirk.

Faith always implies the disbelief of a lesser fact in favor of a greater.—O. W. Holmes.

How deeply rooted must unbelief be in our hearts when we are surprised to find our prayers answered.—Hare.

I would rather dwell in the dim fog of superstition than in air rarefied to nothing by the air-pump of unbelief.—Richter.

I know of no condition worse than that of the man who has little or no light on the supreme religious questions, and who at the same time is making no effort to come to the light.—E. F. Burr.

There is no strength in unbelief. Even the unbelief of what is false is no source of might. It is the truth shining from behind that gives the strength to disbelieve.—George MacDonald.

Surely scripture is right when it makes the sin of sins that unbelief, which is at bottom nothing else than a refusal to take the cup of salvation. Surely no sharper grief can be inflicted upon the Spirit of God than when we leave His gifts neglected and unappropriated.—Alexander MacLaren.

At the conscious approach of death, faith in the biblical religion, with its God and Christ and written revelation, never weakens, but almost or quite always strengthens, and very often advances to a splendid assurance; while unbelief under the same circumstances never strengthens, but almost or quite always weakens and falters, and very often fails utterly.—E. F. Burr.

There is but one thing without honor, smitten with eternal barrenness, inability to do or to be—insincerity, unbelief. He who believes nothing, who believes only the shows of things, is not in relation with nature and fact at all.—Carlyle.

Uncertainty

All that lies betwixt the cradle and the grave is uncertain.—Seneca.

Everything is sweetened by risk.—Alexander Smith.

When the mind is in a state of uncertainty the smallest impulse directs it to either side.—Terence.

Who knows whether the gods will add to-morrow to the present hour?—Horace.

All human things hang on a slender thread: the strongest fall with a sudden crash.—Ovid.

Uncertainty!

Fell demon of our fears! the human soul, That can support despair, supports not thee.—Mallet.

Heaven makes sport of human affairs and the present hour gives no sure promise of the next.—Ovid.

Most men make the voyage of life as if they carried sealed orders which they were not to open till they were fairly in mid-ocean.—Lowell.

Delude not yourself with the notion that you may be untrue and uncertain in trifles and in important things the contrary. Trifles make up existence, and give the observer the measure by which to try us; and the fearful power of habit, after a time, suffers not the best will to ripen into action.—C. M. von Weber.

Uncouthness

To reject wisdom because the person who communicates it is uncouth and his manners are inelegant, what is it but to throw away a pine-apple, and assign for a reason the roughness of its coat?—Bishop Horne.

Understanding

Humility is the light of the understanding.—Bunyan.

The light of the understanding, humility kindleth and pride covereth.—Quarles.

They understand but little who understand only what can be explained.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

The understanding also hath its idiosyncrasies as well as other faculties.—Glanvill.

Obtuseness is the rule, not the exception.—Mme. Dufresnoy.

His understanding at the best is of the middling size.—Swift.

The power of perception is that which we call the understanding.—Locke.

Fools usually know best that which the wise despair of ever comprehending.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

Women have the understanding of the heart, which is better than that of the head.—Rogers.

It is by no means necessary to understand things to speak confidently about them.—Beaumarchais.

Whatever we well understand we express clearly, and words flow with ease.—Boileau.

The defects of the understanding, like those of the face, grow worse as we grow old.—Rochefoucauld.

What we do not understand we do not possess.—Goethe.

The understanding of some men is clear, that of others brilliant. The former illumines its surroundings;

the latter obscures them.—Marle Ebner-Eschenbach.

We can sometimes love what we do not understand, but it is impossible completely to understand what we do not love.—Mrs. Jameson.

When he to whom one speaks does not understand, and he who speaks himself does not understand, this is metaphysics.—Voltaire.

Do not crowd the understanding; it can comprehend so much and no more. A pint pot will not contain the measure of a quart.—J. Petit-Senn.

I know no evil so great as the abuse of the understanding, and yet there is no one vice more common.—Steele.

Fully to understand a grand and beautiful thought requires, perhaps, as much time as to conceive it.—Joubert.

Knowing is seeing. * * * Until we ourselves see it with our own eyes, and perceive it by our own understandings, we are as much in the dark and as void of knowledge as before, let us believe any learned author as much as we will.—John Locke.

It is the understanding that sees and hears; it is the understanding that improves everything, that orders everything, and that acts, rules, and reigns.—Epicharmus.

The improvement of the understanding is for two ends: first, our own increase of knowledge; secondly, to enable us to deliver and make out that knowledge to others.—Locke.

It is the same with understanding as with eyes; to a certain size and make, just so much light is necessary, and no more. Whatever is beyond brings darkness and confusion.—Shaftesbury.

A distinction has been made between acuteness and subtlety of understanding. This might be illustrated by saying that acuteness consists in taking up the points or solid atoms, subtlety in feeling the air of truth.—Hazlitt.

He who calls in the aid of any equal understanding, doubles his own; and he who profits of a superior understanding, raises his powers to a level with the height of the superior understanding he unites with.—Burke.

It is not the eye, that sees the beauty of the heaven, nor the ear, that hears the sweetness of music or the glad tidings of a prosperous accident, but the soul, that perceives all the relishes of sensual and intellectual perfections; and the more noble and excellent the soul is, the greater and more savory are its perceptions.—Jeremy Taylor.

The understanding, that should be eyes to the blind faculty of the will, is blind itself; and so brings all the inconveniences that attend a blind follower under the conduct of a blind guide.—South.

The eye of the understanding is like the eye of the sense; for as you may see great objects through small crannies or holes, so you may see great axioms of nature through small and contemptible instances.—Lord Bacon.

Undertaker—Sexton

The houses that he makes last till doomsday.—Shakespeare.

Nigh to a grave that was newly made,
Leaned a sexton old on his earth-worn spade.
—Park Benjamin.

Ye undertakers, tell us,
'Midst all the gorgeous figures you exhibit,
Why is the principal conceal'd, for which You make this mighty stir? —Blair.

Alas, poor Tom! how oft, with merry heart
Have we beheld thee play the Sexton's part;
Each comic heart must now be grieved to see
The Sexton's dreary part performed on thee.
—Robert Fergusson.

Has this fellow no feeling of his business, that he sings at grave-making? Custom hath made it in him a property of easiness.—Shakespeare.

See yonder maker of the dead man's bed,
The sexton, hoary-headed chronicle,
Of hard, unmeaning face, down which ne'er stole
A gentle tear.

—Blair.

Why is the hearse with scutcheons blazon'd
round,
And with the nodding plume of ostrich
crown'd?
No; the dead know it not, nor profit gain;
It only serves to prove the living vain.

—Gay.

There was a man bespake a thing,
Which when the owner home did bring,
He that made it did refuse it;
And he that brought it would not use it,
And he that hath it doth not know Whether he hath it yea or no.

—Sir John Davies.

Uneasiness

Men tire themselves in pursuit of rest.—Sterne.

Is it not astonishing that the love of repose keeps us in continual agitation?—Stanislaus.

Generally we are occupied either with the miseries which now we feel, or with those which threaten; and even when we see ourselves sufficiently secure from the approach of either, still fretfulness, though unwarranted
by either present or expected affliction, fails not to spring up from the deep recesses of the heart, where its roots naturally grow, and to fill the soul with its poison.—Pascal.

Unfaithfulness

Infidelity, like death, admits of no degrees.—Mme. de Girardin.

Doubt the man who swears to his devotion.—Mme. de Colet.

How easy it is for the proper-false in women's waxen hearts to set their forms!—Shakespeare.

Stealing her soul with many vows of faith, and ne'er a true one.—Shakespeare.

The firmest purpose of a woman's heart to well-timed, artful flattery may yield.—Lillo.

We pardon infidelities, but we do not forget them.—Mme. de la Fayette.

O fatal beauty! why art thou bestowed on hapless woman still to make her wretched? Betrayed by thee, how many are undone!—Patterson.

It is to be feared that they who marry where they do not love, will love where they do not marry.—
Thomas Fuller.

There's no trust, no faith, no honesty, in men: all perjured, all for-sworn, all nought, all dissemblers.—
Shakespeare.

How delightful it would be to love if one loved always! But alas! there are no eternal loves.—Mlle. Scudéri.

The reason why women grown bad are worse than men is because it is the best that turns to the worst.—
Dumas, Fils.

The unfaithful woman, if she is known for such by the person concerned, is only unfaithful. If she is thought faithful, she is perfidious.—
Bruyère.

Such an act, that blurs the grace and blush of modesty, calls virtue hypocrite, takes off the rose from the fair forehead of an innocent love, and sets a blister there.—Shakespeare.

There is not so agonizing a feeling in the whole catalogue of human suffering as the first conviction that the heart of the being whom we most tenderly love is estranged from us.—
Bulwer-Lytton.

Who should be trusted, when one's own right hand
Is perjured to the bosom? Proteus,
I am sorry I must never trust thee more,
But count the world a stranger for thy sake.

The private wound is deepest.

—Shakespeare.

Unfortunate

The brave unfortunate are our best acquaintance.—Francis.

It is not becoming to turn from friends in adversity, but then it is for those who have basked in the sunshine of their prosperity to adhere to them. No one was ever so foolish as to select the unfortunate for a friend.

—Lucan.

Ungratefulness

Ungratefulness is the very poison of manhood.—Sir P. Sidney.

Unhappiness

The good time when I was unhappy.
—Mme. Sophie Arnould.

The wretched hasten to hear of their own miseries.—Seneca.

I believe that man to be wretched whom none can please.—Martial.

Present sufferings seem far greater to men than those they merely dread.
—Livy.

The most unhappy of all men is he who believes himself to be so.—Henry Home.

Have patience and endure; this unhappiness will one day be beneficial.—Ovid.

True happiness is exotic; its birthplace is in heaven; unhappiness is of native growth.—Du Cœur.

Oh, give me thy hand, one writ with me in sour misfortune's book!—Shakespeare.

What thing so good which not some harm may bring?—Earl of Sterling.

A perverse temper and fretful disposition will, wherever they prevail, render any state of life whatsoever unhappy.—Cicero.

What do people mean when they talk about unhappiness? It is not so much unhappiness as impatience that from time to time possesses men, and then they choose to call themselves miserable.—Goethe.

Man's unhappiness, as I construe, comes of his greatness; it is because there is an infinite in him, which with all his cunning he cannot quite bury under the finite.—Carlyle.

When men are unhappy, they do not imagine they can ever cease to be so; and when some calamity has fallen on them, they do not see how they can get rid of it. Nevertheless, both arrive; and the gods have ordered it so, in the end men seek it from the gods.
—Epictetus.

Union — Unity

The force of union conquers all.—Homer.

By uniting we stand, by dividing we fall.—John Dickinson.

Two souls in one, two hearts into one heart!—Du Bartas.

One country, one constitution, one destiny.—Daniel Webster.

We are one people and will act as one.—Schiller.

Union gives strength to the humble.
—Syrus.

Liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable.—Daniel Webster.

Nothing is fair or good alone.—Emerson.

Our Federal Union: it must be preserved.—Andrew Jackson.

God plans all perfect combinations.
—David Brainard.

Unite; for combination is stronger than witchcraft.—Toussaint l'Ouverture.

The union of the states is indissoluble; the country is undivided and indivisible forever.—David Dudley Field.

The multitude which does not reduce itself to unity is confusion.—Pascal.

Our national constitution shall prevail; the Union, which can alone insure internal peace and external security to each state, "must and shall be preserved," cost what it may in time, treasure, and blood.—George B. McClellan.

Men's hearts ought not to be set against one another, but set with one another, and all against the evil thing only.—Carlyle.

By union the smallest states thrive, by discord the greatest are destroyed.—Sallust.

We must all hang together or assuredly we shall all hang separately.—Benj. Franklin.

Two souls with but a single thought,
Two hearts that beat as one.
—Maria White Lowell.

Their meetings made December June,
Their every parting was to die.
—Tennyson.

The constitution in all its provisions looks to an indestructible union composed of indestructible states.—Salmon P. Chase.

When bad men combine, the good must associate, else they will fall, one by one, an unpitied sacrifice in a contemptible struggle.—Burke.

There is no more sure tie between friends than when they are united in their objects and wishes.—Cicero.

All the arts which belong to polished life have some common tie, and are connected as it were by some relationship.—Cicero.

The union of lakes—the union of lands—
The union of States none can sever—
The union of hearts—the union of hands—
And the flag of our Union for ever!
—George P. Morris.

When our two lives grew like two buds that kiss
At lightest thrill from the bee's swinging chime,
Because the one so near the other is.
—George Eliot.

Union does everything when it is perfect; it satisfies desires, it simplifies needs, it foresees the wishes of the imagination; it is an aisle always open, and becomes a constant fortune.

—De Sénancour.

I do not want the walls of separation between different orders of Christians to be destroyed, but only lowered, that we may shake hands a little easier over them.—Rowland Hill.

I never use the word "nation" in speaking of the United States. I always use the word "Union" or "Confederacy." We are not a nation but a union, a confederacy of equal and sovereign states.—J. C. Calhoun.

When my eyes shall be turned to behold for the last time the sun in heaven, may I not see him shining on the broken and dishonored fragments of a once glorious union; on states dissevered, discordant, belligerent; on a land rent with civil feuds, or drenched, it may be, in fraternal blood.
—Daniel Webster.

The advice nearest to my heart and deepest in my convictions is that the union of the states be cherished and perpetuated. Let the open enemy to it be regarded as a Pandora with her box opened, and the disguised one as the serpent creeping with his deadly wiles into paradise.—James Madison.

This glorious union shall not perish! Precious legacy of our fathers, it shall go down honored and cherished to our children. Generations unborn shall enjoy its privileges as we have done; and if we leave them poor in all besides, we will transmit to them the boundless wealth of its blessings!—Edward Everett.

Our Union is river, lake, ocean, and sky:
Man breaks not the medal, when God cuts the die!
Though darkened with sulphur, though cloven with steel,
The blue arch will brighten, the waters will heal!
—O. W. Holmes.

If this bill (for the admission of Orleans Territory as a state) passes, it is my deliberate opinion that it is virtually a dissolution of the union; that it will free the states from their moral obligation, and, as it will be the right of all, so it will be the duty of some, definitely to prepare for a separation—amicably if they can, violently if they must.—Josiah Quincy.

So we grew together,
Like to a double cherry, seeming parted,
But yet a union in partition;
Two lovely berries moulded on one stem:
So, with two seeming bodies, but one heart;
Two of the first, like coats in heraldry,
Due but to one and crowned with one crest.
—Shakespeare.

I know that there is one God in heaven, the Father of all humanity, and heaven is therefore one. I know that there is one sun in the sky, which gives light to all the world. As there is unity in God, and unity in the light, so is there unity in the principles of freedom. Wherever it is broken, wherever a shadow is cast upon the sunny rays of the sun of liberty, there is always danger of free principles everywhere in the world.—Kossuth.

It is to that union we owe our safety at home, and our consideration and dignity abroad. It is to that union that we are chiefly indebted for whatever makes us most proud of our country. That union we reached only by the discipline of our virtues in the severe school of adversity. It had its origin in the necessities of its disordered finance, prostrate commerce, and ruined credit. Under its benign influences these great interests immediately awoke, as from the dead, and sprang forth with newness of life. Every year of its duration has teemed with fresh fruits of its utility and its blessings; and although our territory has stretched out wider and wider, and our population spread farther and farther, they have not outrun its protection or its benefits. It has been to us all a copious fountain of national, social, and personal happiness.—Daniel Webster.

Universe

Is it not a firmer foundation for tranquillity to believe that all things were created, and are ordered for the best, than that the whole universe is mere bungling and blundering; nothing effected for any purpose or design, but all ill-favorably cobbled and jumbled together by the unguided agitation and rude shuffles of matter.—Bentley.

Never was a human machine produced without many trials and many failures; whereas this universe in all its endless complication was perfect at its production, perfected in the ideas of its great Author, even for eternity.—Macculloch.

What blessedness it is to dwell amidst this transparent air, which the eye can pierce without limit, amidst these floods of pure, soft, cheering light, under this immeasurable arch of heaven, and in sight of these countless stars! An infinite universe is each moment opened to our view. And this universe is the sign and symbol of Infinite Power, Intelligence, Purity, Bliss, and Love.—W. E. Channing.

Unkindness

This was the most unkindest cut of all.—Shakespeare.

And in their height of kindness are unkind.—Young.

Rich gifts wax poor when givers prove unkind.—Shakespeare.

There is nothing that needs to be said in an unkind manner.—Hosea Ballou.

Hard unkindness' alter'd eye,
That mocks the tear it forced to flow.
—Gray.

She hath tied Sharp-tooth'd unkindness, like a vulture here.
—Shakespeare.

Unkind language is sure to produce the fruits of unkindness—that is, suffering in the bosom of others.—Bentley.

Come, we have a hot venison pasty to dinner; come, gentlemen, I hope we shall drink down all unkindness.—Shakespeare.

A real grief I ne'er can find till thou provest perjured or unkind.—Prior.

A blow struck in anger oft causes less pain than a deliberate act of unkindness.—Chas. Noel Douglas.

As "unkindness has no remedy at law," let its avoidance be with you a point of honor.—Hosea Ballou.

More hearts pine away in secret anguish for unkindness from those who should be their comforters than for any other calamity in life.—Young.

Unkindness may do much;
And his unkindness may defeat my life,
But never taint my love.
—Shakespeare.

In nature there's no blemish but the mind;
None can be call'd deform'd, but the unkind:
Virtue is beauty; but the beauteous, evil,
Are empty trunks o'erflourish'd by the devil.
—Shakespeare.

He who has once stood beside the grave, to look back upon the companionship which has been forever closed, feeling how impotent there are the wild love, or the keen sorrow, to give one instant's pleasure to the pulseless heart, or atone in the lowest measure to the departed spirit for the hour of unkindness, will scarcely for the future incur that debt to the heart which can only be discharged to the dust.—Ruskin.

Unselfishness

There is but one virtue—the eternal sacrifice of self.—George Sand.

Self-abnegation is a trait most often seen in women, rarely in men.—Achilles Poincelot.

He who is wise puts aside all claims which may dissipate his attention, and confining himself to one branch excels in that.—Goethe.

The essence of true nobility is neglect of self. Let the thought of self pass in, and the beauty of great action is gone, like the bloom from a soiled flower.—Froude.

The secret of being loved is in being lovely; and the secret of being lovely is in being unselfish.—J. G. Holland.

Usefulness

Live for something.—Chalmers.

The great aim of human life.—Horace Mann.

The useful and the beautiful are never separated.—Periander.

Have I done aught of value to my fellow-men? Then have I done much for myself.—Lavater.

It is my humble prayer that I may be of some use in my day and generation.—Hosea Ballou.

A cock, having found a pearl, said that a grain of corn would be of more value to him.—Pierre Leroux.

Foul cankering rust the hidden treasure frets,
But gold that's put to use, more gold begets.
—Shakespeare.

Have I done anything for society? I have then done more for myself. Let that truth be always present to thy mind, and work without cessation.—Simms.

When the air balloon was first discovered, some one sippantly asked Dr. Franklin what was the use of it. The doctor answered this question by asking another: "What is the use of a new-born infant? It may become a man."—Colton.

Nought so vile that on the earth doth live,
But to the earth some special good doth give;
Nor aught so good, but, strain'd from that fair use
Revolts from true birth, stumbling on abuse:
Virtue itself turns vice, being misapplied;
And vice sometime 's by action dignified.
—Shakespeare.

Thousands of men breathe, move, and live; pass off the stage of life and are heard of no more. Why? They did not a particle of good in the world; and none were blest by them, none could point to them as the instrument of their redemption; not a line they wrote, not a word they spoke, could be recalled, and so they perished —their light went out in darkness, and they were not remembered more than the insects of yesterday. Will you thus live and die, O man immortal? Live for something.—Chalmers.

Nothing in this world is so good as usefulness. It binds your fellow-creatures to you, and you to them; it tends to the improvement of your own character; and it gives you a real importance in society, much beyond what any artificial station can bestow.—Sir Benjamin Brodie.

How often do we sigh for opportunities of doing good, whilst we neglect the openings of Providence in little things, which would frequently lead to the accomplishment of most important usefulness! Dr. Johnson used to say, "He who waits to do a great deal of good at once will never do any." Good is done by degrees. However small in proportion the benefits which follow individual attempts to do good, a great deal may thus be accomplished by perseverance, even in the midst of discouragements and disappointments.—Crabb.

Usury

The synonyme of usury is ruin.—Dr. Johnson.

Extra interest signifies extra risk.—Wellington.

Poor rogues, and usurers' men! bawds between gold and want!—Shakespeare.

Usury dulls and damps all industries, improvements, and new inventions, wherein money would be stirring if it were not for this slug.—Bacon.

Many have made witty invectives against usury. They say that it is a pity the devil should have God's part, which is the tithe; that the usurer is the greatest Sabbath-breaker, because his plough goeth every Sunday.—Bacon.

Usury is the land-shark and devil-fish of commerce.—J. L. Basford.

A money-lender. He serves you in the present tense; he lends you in the conditional mood; keeps you in the subjunctive; and ruins you in the future!—Addison.

Go not to a covetous old man with any request too soon in the morning, before he hath taken in that day's prey; for his covetousness is up before him, and he before thee, and he is in ill-humor; but stay till the afternoon, till he be satiated upon some borrower.—Fuller.

He was a man
Versed in the world as pilot in his compass;
The needle pointed ever to that interest
Which was his loadstar; and he spread his sails
With vantage to the gale of others' passions.
—Ben Jonson.

Utility

Use almost can change the stamp of nature.—Shakespeare.

The superfluous, a thing highly necessary.—Voltaire.

Thou shalt learn
The wisdom early to discern True beauty in utility. —Longfellow.

The use of a thing is only a part of its significance. To know anything thoroughly, to have the full command of it in all its appliances, we must study it on its own account, independently of any special application.—Goethe.

Of all parts of wisdom, the practice is the best. Socrates was esteemed the wisest man of his time because he turned his acquired knowledge into morality, and aimed at goodness more than greatness.—Tillotson.

V

Vacillation

The resolution of the combat is seldom equal to the vehemence of the charge.—Dr. Johnson.

Unstable as water, thou shalt not excel.—Bible.

The fickle populace have no fixed principles.—Claudianus.

Vacillation is the prominent feature of weakness of character.—Voltaire.

He wears his faith but as the fashion of his hat; it ever changes with the next block.—Shakespeare.

It is as common for men to change their taste as it is uncommon for them to change their inclination.—Rochefoucauld.

Vacuity

The fool of nature stood with stupid eyes,
And gaping mouth that testified surprise.
—Dryden.

You beat your pate, and fancy wit will come,
Knock as you please, there's nobody at home.
—Pope.

He trudged along, unknowing what he sought,
And whistled as he went, for want of thought.
—Dryden.

Vagrant

An honest man is seldom a vagrant.
—Cato.

Beware of those who are homeless by choice! You have no hold on a human being whose affections are without a top-root!—Southey.

That beauteous Emma vagrant courses took.—Prior.

The true vagrant is the only king above all comparison.—Lessing.

A vagrant is everywhere at home.
—Martial.

Valentine's Day

My valentine I pray that thou wilt be,
Not for a day, but for eternity.
—Charles Noel Douglas.

Saint Valentine is past;
Begin these wood-birds but to couple now!
—Shakespeare.

And now the lads and lasses, following the example of the birds, bill and coo together.—H. W. Shaw.

Now all nature seemed in love, and birds had drawn their valentines.—Sir Henry Wotton.

It was Shakespeare's notion that on this day birds begin to couple; hence probably arose the custom of sending fancy love-billets.—Washington Irving.

On paper curiously shaped, scribblers to-day of every sort, in verses valentines cycled, to Venus chime their annual court.—H. G. Bohn.

All birds during the pairing season become more or less sentimental, and murmur soft nothings in a tone very unlike the grinding-organ repetition and loudness of their habitual song.

The crow is very comical as a lover;
and to hear him trying to soften his croak to the proper Saint-Preux standard has something the effect of a Mississippi boatman quoting Tenny-son.—Lowell.

Apollo has peeped through the shutter,
And awaken'd the witty and fair;
The boarding-school belle's in a flutter,
The twopenny post's in despair;
The breath of the morning is flinging
A magic on blossom, on spray,
And cockneys and sparrows are singing
In chorus on Valentine's day.

—Praed.

Oft have I heard both youths and virgins ^{say,} Birds choose their mates, and couple too,
^{this day;}
But by their flight I never can divine
When I shall couple with my Valentine.
—Herrick.

Oh, cruel heart! ere these posthumous papers

Have met thine eyes, I shall be out of
breath;
Those cruel eyes, like two funereal tapers,
Have only lighted me the way to death.
Perchance thou wilt extinguish them in vapours,
When I am gone, and green grass covereth

Thy lover, lost; but it will be in vain—
It will not bring the vital spark again.

—Hood—A Valentine.

No popular respect will I omit
To do the honour on this happy day,
When every loyal lover tasks his wit
His simple truth in studious rhymes to pay,
And to his mistress dear his hopes convey.
Rather thou knowest I would still outrun
All calendars with Love's whose date alway Thy bright eyes govern better than the Sun,—

For with thy favour was my life begun,
And still I reckon on from smiles to
smiles,

And not by summers, for I thrive on none
But those thy cheerful countenance compiles;

Oh! if it be to choose and call thee mine,
Love, thou art every day my Valentine!
—Hood.

Hail to thy returning festival, old Bishop Valentine! great is thy name in the rubric. Like unto thee, assuredly, there is no other mitred father in the calendar.—Lamb.

To-morrow is Saint Valentine's day,
All in the morning betime,
And I a maid at your window,
To be your Valentine.
—Shakespeare.

Valor

Valor consists in the power of self-recovery.—Emerson.

Discretion, the best part of valor.—
Beaumont and Fletcher.

Valor is abased by too much lofti-ness.—Sir P. Sidney.

Let me die facing the enemy.—Bayard.

There is always safety in valor.—
Emerson.

A sad, wise valor is the brave complexion.—George Herbert.

Valor is the contempt of death and pain.—Tacitus.

Distressed valor challenges great respect, even from enemies.—Plutarch.

My valor is certainly going! it is sneaking off! I feel it oozing out, as it were, at the palms of my hands.—
Sheridan.

The mean of true valor lies between the extremes of cowardice and rash-ness.—Cervantes.

Valor is stability, not of arms and of legs, but of courage and the soul.
—Montaigne.

The Spartans do not inquire how many the enemy are, but where they are.—Agiis II.

True valor is like honesty; it enters into all that a man sees and does.
—H. W. Shaw.

The truly valiant dare everything but doing anybody an injury.—Sir Philip Sidney.

I have heard of some kind of men that put quarrels purposely on others, to taste their valor.—Shakespeare.

Fear to do base, unworthy things is valor; if they be done to us, to suffer them is valor, too.—Ben Jonson.

You may as well say that's a valiant flea that dare eat his breakfast on the lip of a lion.—Shakespeare.

How strangely high endeavors may be blessed, where piety and valor jointly go.—Dryden.

In vain doth valour bleed,
While Avarice and Rapine share the land.
—Milton.

No man can answer for his own valor or courage till he has been in danger.—Rochefoucauld.

It is held that valor is the chiefest virtue, and most dignifies the haver.—Shakespeare.

It is said of untrue valor that some men's valors are in the eyes of them that look on.—Bacon.

When valour preys on reason,
It eats the sword it fights with.
—Shakespeare.

Valor would cease to be a virtue, if there were no injustice.—Agesilaus.

It is a brave act of valor to condemn death; but where life is more terrible than death, it is then the truest valor to dare to live.—Sir Thomas Browne.

Glorious men are the scorn of wise men, the admiration of fools, the idols of parasites, and the slaves of their own vaunts.—Bacon.

Noble Pity held his hand awhile, and to their choice gave space whether they would prove his valor or his grace.—Waller.

What's brave, what's noble, let's do it after the high Roman fashion, and make death proud to take us.—Shakespeare.

Perfect valor is to do unwitnessed what we should be capable of doing before all the world.—Rochefoucauld.

True valor lies in the mind, the never-yielding purpose, nor owns the blind award of giddy fortune.—Thomson.

To that dauntless temper of his mind he hath a wisdom that doth guide his valor to act in safety.—Shakespeare.

The fight of Balaklava—that was a feat of chivalry, fiery with consummate courage and bright with flashing valor.—Beaconsfield.

He who has resolved to conquer or die is seldom conquered; such noble despair perishes with difficulty.—Cornille.

There is no love-broker in the world can more prevail in man's commendation with woman than report of valor.—Shakespeare.

'Tis much he dares;
And, to that dauntless temper of his mind,
He hath a wisdom that doth guide his valour
To act in safety. —Shakespeare.

But dream not helm and harness
The sign of valor true;
Peace hath higher tests of manhood
Than battle ever knew. —Whittier.

What valour were it, when a cur doth grin,
For one to thrust his hand between his
teeth,
When he might spurn him with his foot,
away? —Shakespeare.

I love the man that is modestly valiant; that stirs not till he most needs, and then to purpose. A continued patience I commend not.—Felt-ham.

Whatever comes out of despair cannot bear the title of valor, which should be lifted up to such a height that holding all things under itself, it should be able to maintain its greatness, even in the midst of miseries.—Sir P. Sidney.

Those who believe that the praises which arise from valor are superior to those which proceed from any other virtues have not considered.—Dryden

Valor gives awe, and promises protection to those who want heart or strength to defend themselves. This makes the authority of men among women, and that of a master buck in a numerous herd.—Sir W. Temple.

A valiant man
Ought not to undergo, or tempt a danger,
But worthily, and by selected ways.
He undertakes with reason, not by chance.
His valor is the salt t' his other virtues,
They're all unseason'd without it.
—Ben Jonson.

The love of glory, the fear of shame, the design of making a fortune, the desire of rendering life easy and agreeable, and the humor of pulling down other people, are often the causes of that valor so celebrated among men.—Rochefoucauld.

He's truly valiant that can wisely suffer
The worst that man can breathe and make his wrongs
His outides, to wear them like his raiment, carelessly;
And ne'er prefer his injuries to his heart.
To bring it into danger.
—Shakespeare.

As a rule, he fights well who has wrongs to redress; but vastly better fights he who, with wrongs as a spur, has also steadily before him a glorious result in prospect—a result in which he can discern balm for wounds, compensation for valor, remembrance and gratitude in the event of death.—Lew Wallace.

Vanity

Vanity has no sex.—Colton.

Vanity is the quicksand of reason.—George Sand.

Oh, frail estate of human things!—Dryden.

Vain is the world, but only to the vain.—Young.

Not a vanity is given in vain.—Pope.

Shine out, fair sun, till I have bought a glass, that I may see my shadow as I pass.—Shakespeare.

One can never outlive one's vanity.—Lady Montagu.

Vanity and rudeness are seldom seen together.—Lavater.

The soul of this man is in his clothes.—Shakespeare.

A golden mind stoops not to shows of dross.—Shakespeare.

Vanity is often the unseen spur.—Thackeray.

We say little if not egged on by vanity.—La Rochefoucauld.

Here Vanity assumes her pert grimace.—Goldsmith.

The knowledge of thyself will preserve thee from vanity.—Cervantes.

There is nothing which vanity does not desecrate.—Henry Ward Beecher.

No man sympathizes with the sorrows of vanity.—Johnson.

She neglects her heart who studies her glass.—Lavater.

The vain being is the really solitary being.—Auerbach.

Vanity is a strange passion; rather than be out of a job it will brag of its vices.—H. W. Shaw.

It is our own vanity that makes the vanity of others intolerable to us.—La Rochefoucauld.

Vanity keeps persons in favor with themselves who are out of favor with all others.—Shakespeare.

Vanity of vanities, saith the preacher; vanity of vanities; all is vanity.—Bible.

Extreme vanity sometimes hides under the garb of ultra modesty.—Mrs. Jameson.

Vanity makes men ridiculous, pride odious, and ambition terrible.—Steele.

Every man has just as much vanity as he wants understanding.—Pope.

Verily, every man at his best state is altogether vanity.—Bible.

It is difficult to esteem a man as highly as he would wish.—Vauvenargues.

Those who live on vanity must not unreasonably expect to die of mortification.—Mrs. Ellis.

Men speak but little when vanity does not induce them to speak.—Rochefoucauld.

The fool of vanity; for her alone he lives, loves, writes, and dies but to be known.—Canning.

To be vain is rather a mark of humility than pride.—Swift.

O, how true it is there can be no tête-à-tête where vanity reigns!—Madame de Girardin.

What is your sex's earliest, latest care,
Your heart's supreme ambition? To be fair.
Lord Lyttleton.

Pampered vanity is a better thing perhaps than starved pride.—Joanna Baillie.

Guard against that vanity which courts a compliment, or is fed by it.—Chalmers.

Where doth the world thrust forth a vanity— * * * *

That is not quickly buzz'd into his ears?
—Shakespeare.

Light vanity, insatiate cormorant,
Consuming means, soon preys upon itself.
—Shakespeare.

Hoy-day, what a sweep of vanity comes this way!
—Shakespeare.

To be a man's own fool is bad enough; but the vain man is everybody's.—William Penn.

Death gives a quietus to all vanity.
—C. N. Douglas.

Virtue would not go far, if vanity did not keep it company.—Rochefoucauld.

Our vanity is the constant enemy of our dignity.—Madame Swetchine.

The vain man makes a merit of misfortune, and triumphs in his disgrace.
—Hazlitt.

Applause which owes to man's short outlook all its charms.—Young.

A vain man finds his account in speaking good or evil of himself.—La Bruyère.

The most violent passions give some respite, but vanity always disturbs us.
—La Rochefoucauld.

If vanity does not entirely overthrow the virtues, at least it makes them all totter.—Rochefoucauld.

There is no restraining men's tongues or pens when charged with a little vanity.—Washington.

What fervent love of herself would Virtue excite if she could be seen!—Cicero.

Vanity indeed is a venial error; for it usually carries its own punishment with it.—Junius.

When men will not be reasoned out of a vanity, they must be ridiculed out of it.—L'Estrange.

There was never yet fair woman but she made mouths in a glass.—Shakespeare.

Pride makes us esteem ourselves; vanity makes us desire the esteem of others.—Blair.

An egotist will always speak of himself, either in praise or in censure; but a modest man ever shuns making himself the subject of his conversation.—La Bruyère.

Vanity is a natural object of temptation to a woman.—Swift.

Thy pride is but the prologue of thy shame: where vain-glory commands, there folly counsels; where pride rides, there shame lackeys.—Quarles.

Vanity is not half a bad principle, if it will but stick to legitimate business.—Haliburton.

All is vanity, look you; and so the preacher is vanity too.—Thackeray.

We have always pretensions to fame which, in our own hearts, we know to be disputable.—Dr. Johnson.

Vanity stands at my elbow, and animates me by a thousand agreeable promises.—Mrs. Pendarves.

Where would the power of women be, were it not for the vanity of men?—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

Oh, the cares of men! how much emptiness there is in human concerns!—Persius.

Vanity is the foundation of the most ridiculous and contemptible vices—the vices of affectation and common lying.—Adam Smith.

There is much money given to be laughed at, though the purchasers don't know it; witness A.'s fine horse, and B.'s fine house.—Franklin.

There is no limit to the vanity of this world. Each spoke in the wheel thinks the whole strength of the wheel depends upon it.—H. W. Shaw.

Vanity in its idler moments is benevolent, is as willing to give pleasure as to take it, and accepts as sufficient reward for its services a kind word or an approving smile.—Alexander Smith.

People who are very vain are usually equally susceptible; and they who feel one thing acutely, will so feel another.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Vanity is as ill at ease under indifference as tenderness is under a love which it cannot return.—George Eliot.

Every present occasion will catch the senses of the vain man; and with that bridle and saddle you may ride him.—Sir P. Sidney.

It is difficult to divest one's self of vanity; because impossible to divest one's self of self-love.—Horace Walpole.

If most married women possessed as much prudence as they do vanity, we should find many husbands far happier.—Belknap.

The vanity of human life is like a river, constantly passing away, and yet constantly coming on.—Pope.

In a vain man, the smallest spark may kindle into the greatest flame, because the materials are always prepared for it.—Hume.

A vain man can never be altogether rude. Desirous as he is of pleasing, he fashions his manners after those of others.—Goethe.

Never expect justice from a vain man; if he has the negative magnanimity not to disparage you, it is the most you can expect.—Washington Allston.

Ladies of fashion starve their happiness to feed their vanity, and their love to feed their pride.—Colton.

Alas, for human nature that the wounds of vanity should smart and bleed so much longer than the wounds of affection!—Macaulay.

Vanity and pride of nations; vanity is as advantageous to a government as pride is dangerous.—Montesquieu.

Since the well-known victory over the hare by the tortoise the descendants of the tortoise think themselves miracles of speed.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

Vanity is never at its full growth till it spreadeth into affectation, and then it is complete.—Saville.

For let us women be never so ill-favored, I imagine that we are always delighted to hear ourselves called handsome.—Cervantes.

Every man's vanity ought to be his greatest shame; and every man's folly ought to be his greatest secret.—Quarles.

I doubt if there ever was a man who was not gratified by being told that he was liked by the women.—Dr. Johnson.

Vanity costs money, labor, horses, men, women, health and peace, and is still nothing at last,—a long way leading nowhere.—Emerson.

It would be next to impossible to discover a handsome woman who was not also a vain woman.—Joubert.

Greater mischief happens often from folly, meanness, and vanity than from the greater sins of avarice and ambition.—Burke.

If you cannot inspire a woman with love of you, fill her above the brim with love of herself; all that runs over will be yours.—Colton.

Imperfections would not be half so much taken notice of, if vanity did not make proclamation of them.—L'Estrange.

Vanity and dignity are incompatible with each other; vain women are almost sure to be vulnerable.—Alfred de Musset.

In condemning the vanity of women, men complain of the fire they themselves have kindled.—Lingrée.

Should I publish any favors done me by your lordship, I am afraid it would look more like vanity than gratitude.—Addison.

Vanity is a strong temptation to lying; it makes people magnify their merit, over flourish their family, and tell strange stories of their interest and acquaintance.—Jeremy Collier.

Nature has cast but two men in the mould of statesmen,—myself and Mirabeau. After that she broke the mould.—Danton.

Vanity is the natural weakness of an ambitious man, which exposes him to the secret scorn and derision of those he converses with, and ruins the character he is so industrious to advance by it.—Addison.

All men are selfish, but the vain man is in love with himself. He admires, like the lover his adored one, everything which to others is indifferent.—Auerbach.

Vain? Let it be so! Nature was her teacher, What if a lovely and unisistered creature Loved her own harmless gift of pleasing feature. —O. W. Holmes.

Sooth'd with the sound, the king grew vain:
Fought all his battles o'er again;
And thrice he routed all his foes, and thrice
he slew the slain. —Dryden.

Maud Muller looked and sighed: "Ah me!
That I the Judge's bride might be!
He would dress me up in silks so fine,
And praise and toast me at his wine."
—Whittier.

There is no vice or folly that requires so much nicety and skill to manage as vanity; nor any which by ill management makes so contemptible a figure.—Swift.

Does not vanity itself cease to be blamable, is it not even ennobled, when it is directed to laudable objects, when it confines itself to prompting us to great and generous actions?—Diderot.

There is more jealousy between rival wits than rival beauties, for vanity has no sex. But in both cases there must be pretensions, or there will be no jealousy.—Colton.

Every one at the bottom of his heart cherishes vanity; even the toad thinks himself good-looking,—“rather tawny perhaps, but look at his eye!” —Wilson.

Tell me not of the pain of falsehood to the slandered! There is nothing

ing so agonizing to the fine skin of vanity as the application of a rough truth.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Scarcely have I ever heard or read the introductory phrase, "I may say without vanity," but some striking and characteristic instance of vanity has immediately followed.—Franklin.

When a man has no longer any conception of excellence above his own, his voyage is done, he is dead,—dead in trespasses and sin of blear-eyed vanity.—Beecher.

Pride is never more offensive than when it condescends to be civil; whereas vanity, whenever it forgets itself, naturally assumes good-humor.—Cumberland.

There is no folly of which a man who is not a fool cannot get rid except vanity; of this nothing cures a man except experience of its bad consequences, if indeed anything can cure it.—Rousseau.

Vanity, indeed, is the very antidote to conceit; for while the former makes us all nerve to the opinion of others, the latter is perfectly satisfied with its opinion of itself.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Vanity bids all her sons be brave, and all her daughters chaste and courteous. But why do we need her instructions? Ask the comedian who is taught a part which he does not feel.—Sterne.

The vainest woman is never thoroughly conscious of her beauty till she is loved by the man who sets her own passion vibrating in return.—George Eliot.

Our vanities differ as our noses do; all conceit is not the same conceit, but varies in correspondence with the minutiae of mental make in which one of us differs from another.—George Eliot.

Vanity is the poison of agreeableness; yet as poison, when artfully and properly applied, has a salutary effect in medicine, so has vanity in the commerce and society of the world.—Greville.

Vanity is the fruit of ignorance. It thrives most in subterranean places, never reached by the air of heaven and the light of the sun.—Ross.

False modesty is the masterpiece of vanity: showing the vain man in such an illusory light that he appears in the reputation of the virtue quite opposite to the vice which constitutes his real character; it is a deceit.—La Bruyère.

Extinguish vanity in the mind, and you naturally retrench the little superfluities of garniture and equipage. The blossoms will fall of themselves when the root that nourishes them is destroyed.—Steele.

False glory is the rock of vanity; it seduces men to affect esteem by things which they indeed possess, but which are frivolous, and which for a man to value himself on would be a scandalous error.—La Bruyère.

It is vanity which makes the rake at twenty, the worldly man at forty, and the retired man at sixty. We are apt to think that best in general for which we find ourselves best fitted in particular.—Pope.

Ecclesiastes said that "all is vanity,"

Most modern preachers say the same, or show it

By their examples of true Christianity.

In short, all know, or very soon may know it. —Byron.

When we are conscious of the least comparative merit in ourselves, we should take as much care to conceal the value we set upon it, as if it were a real defect; to be elated or vain upon it is showing your money before people in want.—Colley Cibber.

The youth who, like a woman, loves to adorn his person, has renounced all claim to wisdom and to glory; glory is due to those only who dare to associate with pain, and have trampled pleasure under their feet.—Fénelon.

Vanity finds in self-love so powerful an ally that it storms, as it were, by a coup de main, the citadel of our heads, where, having blinded the two watchmen, it readily descends into the heart.—Colton.

Vanity is so constantly solicitous of self, that even where its own claims are not interested, it indirectly seeks the aliment which it loves, by showing how little is deserved by others.—Simms.

Vanity calculates but poorly on the vanity of others; what a virtue we should distil from frailty, what a world of pain we should save our brethren, if we would suffer our own weakness to be the measure of theirs.—Bulwer-Lytton.

We are so presumptuous that we wish to be known to all the world, even to those who come after us; and we are so vain that the esteem of five or six persons immediately around us is enough to amuse and satisfy us.—Pascal.

After all, what is vanity? If it means only a certain wish to look one's best, is it not another name for self-respect? If it means inordinate self-admiration (very rare among persons with some occupation), it is less wicked than absurd.—Mrs. H. R. Haweis.

Vanity may be likened to the smooth-skinned and velvet-footed mouse, nibbling about forever in expectation of a crumb; while self-esteem is too apt to take the likeness of the huge butcher's dog, who carries off your steaks, and growls at you as he goes.—Simms.

A weakness natural to superior and to little men, when they have committed a fault, is to wish to make it pass as a work of genius, a vast combination which the vulgar cannot comprehend. Pride says these things and folly credits them.—Chateaubriand.

I give vanity fair quarter, wherever I meet with it, being persuaded that it is often productive of good to the possessor, and to others who are within his sphere of action; and therefore, in many cases, it would not be altogether absurd if a man were to thank God for his vanity, among the other comforts of life.—Franklin.

Vanity is so closely allied to virtue, and to love the fame of laudable actions approaches so near the love of laudable actions for their own sake, that these passions are more capable of mixture than any other kinds of affection; and it is almost impossible to have the latter without some degree of the former.—Hume.

It was prettily devised of Æsop, the fly sat upon the axletree of the chariot-wheel, and said, "What a dust do I raise!" So are there some vain persons that, whatsoever goeth alone or moveth upon greater means, if they have never so little hand in it, they think it is they that carry it.—Bacon.

O vanity, how little is thy force acknowledged or thy operations discerned! How wantonly dost thou deceive mankind under different disguises! Sometimes thou dost wear the face of pity; sometimes of generosity; nay, thou hast the assurance to put on those glorious ornaments which belong only to heroic virtue.—Fielding.

I would much rather fight pride than vanity, because pride has a stand-up way of fighting. You know where it is. It throws its black shadow on you, and you are not at a loss where to strike. But vanity is that delusive, that insectiferous, that multiplied feeling, and men that fight vanities are like men that fight midges and butterflies. It is easier to chase them than to hit them.—Beecher.

Let her who is full of beauty and admiration, sitting like the queen of flowers in majesty among the daughters of women, let her watch lest vanity enter her heart, beguiling her to rest proudly upon her own strength;

let her remember that she standeth upon slippery places, and be not high-minded but fear.—Mrs. Sigourney.

There are women vain of advantages not connected with their persons, such as birth, rank, and fortune; it is difficult to feel less the dignity of the sex. The origin of all women may be called celestial, for their power is the offspring of the gifts of Nature; by yielding to pride and ambition they soon destroy the magic of their charms.—Mme. de Staël.

Charms, which, like flowers, lie on the surface and always glitter, easily produce vanity; hence women, wits, players, soldiers, are vain, owing to their presence, figure, and dress. On the contrary, other excellences, which lie down like gold and are discovered with difficulty,—strength, profoundness of intellect, morality,—leave their possessors modest and proud.—Richter.

The greatest human virtue bears no proportion to human vanity. We always think ourselves better than we are, and are generally desirous that others should think us still better than we think ourselves. To praise us for actions or dispositions which deserve praise is not to confer a benefit, but to pay a tribute. We have always pretensions to fame which, in our own hearts, we know to be disputable, and which we are desirous to strengthen by a new suffrage; we have always hopes which we suspect to be fallacious, and of which we eagerly snatch at every confirmation.—Johnson.

Variety

Variety is the very spice of life.—Cowper.

Even pleasure cloy without variety.—Ovid.

Where order in variety we see; and where, though all things differ, all agree.—Pope.

Variety is the condition of harmony.—James Freeman Clarke.

Variety is the mother of enjoyment.—Disraeli.

Whatever is natural admits of variety.—Mme. de Staël.

Diversity, that is my motto.—La Fontaine.

Amidst the soft variety I'm lost.—Addison.

Tired of the last, and eager of the new.—Prior.

Ladies like variegated tulips show.—Pope.

The most universal quality is diversity.—Montaigne.

All, with one consent, praise newborn gawds.—Shakespeare.

That divine gift which makes a woman charming.—Beaconsfield.

Nothing is pleasant that is not spiced with variety.—Bacon.

There is a grace in wild variety surpassing rule and order.—William Mason.

Variety is a positive requisite even in the character of our food.—Ruskin.

Variety alone gives joy; the sweetest meats the soonest cloy.—Prior.

All sorts are here that all the earth yields, variety without end.—Milton.

There is a variety in the tempers of good men.—Atterbury.

Variety is nothing else but a continued novelty.—South.

Gods, that never change their state, vary oft their love and hate.—Waller.

That each from other differs, first confess; next that he varies from himself no less.—Pope.

The most delightful pleasures cloy without variety.—Publius Syrus.

I take it to be a principal rule of life, not to be too much addicted to any one thing.—Terence.

Age cannot wither her, nor custom stale
Her infinite variety. —Shakespeare.

For variety of mere nothings gives more pleasure than uniformity of something.—Jean Paul Richter.

God hath here varied His bounty so with new delights!—Milton.

When our old Pleasures die,
Some new One still is nigh;
Oh! fair Variety! —Nicholas Rowe.

As land is improved by sowing it with various seeds, so is the mind by exercising it with different studies.—Pliny.

In books and love the mind one end pursues, and only change the expiring flame renews.—Gay.

God hath varied the inclinations of men according to the variety of actions to be performed.—Sir T. Browne.

Countless the various species of mankind; countless the shades which separate mind from mind.—Gifford.

The charm of London is that you are never glad or sorry for ten minutes together; in the country you are one or the other for weeks.—Dr. Johnson.

Therefore doth heaven divide the state of man in divers functions, setting endeavor in continual motion.—Shakespeare.

The lights and shades, whose well-accorded strife gives all the strength and color of our life.—Pope.

Nature, through all her works, in great degree,
Borrows a blessing from variety.
Music itself her needful aid requires
To rouse the soul, and wake our dying fires.
—Churchill.

How nature delights and amuses us by varying even the character of insects; the ill-nature of the wasp, the sluggishness of the drone, the volatility of the butterfly, the slyness of the bug!—Sydney Smith.

The earth was made so various, that the mind
Of desultory man, studious of change
And pleased with novelty, might be indulged. —Cowper.

Not chaos-like together crush'd and bruin'd,
But, as the world, harmoniously confus'd,
Where order in variety we see,
And where, though all things differ, all agree. —Pope.

How widely its agencies vary,—
To save, to ruin, to curse, to bless,—
As even its minted coins express,
Now stamp'd with the image of good Queen Bess,
And now of Bloody Mary. —Hood.

Wherefore did Nature pour her bounties forth
With such a full and unwithdrawing hand,
Covering the earth with odors, fruits, and flocks,
Thronging the seas with spawn innumerable,
But all to please and sate the curious taste? —Milton.

Now, by two-headed Janus,
Nature hath fram'd strange fellows in her time:
Some that will evermore peep through their eyes,
And laugh, like parrots, at a bagpiper;
And other of such vinegar aspect,
That they'll not show their teeth in way of smile,
Though Nestor swear the jest be laughable.
—Shakespeare.

Vegetation

Every green herb, from the lotus to the dandel, is rich with delicate aids to help incurious man.—Tupper

Every green thing loves to die in bright colors. The vegetable cohorts march glowing out of the year in flaming dresses, as if to leave this earth were a triumph and not a sadness. It is never nature that is sad, but only we, that dare not look back on the past, and that have not its prophecy of the future in our bosoms.—Beecher.

The earth is a machine which yields almost gratuitous service to every application of intellect. Every plant is a manufacturer of soil. Is the stomach of the plant development begins. The tree can draw on the whole air, the whole earth, on all the rolling main. The plant is all suction-pipe,—imbibing from the ground by its root, from the air by its leaves, with all its might.—Emerson.

Vehemence

Vehemence without feeling is rant.
—G. H. Lewes.

Violence does even justice unjustly.
—Carlyle.

Nothing good comes of violence.—
Luther.

I tremble at his vehemence of temper.—Addison.

Heat not a furnace for your foe so hot that it do singe yourself.—Shakespeare.

Loud indignation against vice often stands for virtue with bigots.—J. Petri-Senn.

Whatever they did, the Elysians were careful never to be vehement.—Beaconsfield.

The greater your real strength and power, the quieter it will be exercised.—Lowell.

Vengeance

Vengeance is without foresight.—Napoleon I.

Good Christians should never avenge injuries.—Cervantes.

Deep, sombre vengeance is the daughter of deep silence.—Alfieri.

Delay in vengeance gives a heavier blow.—John Ford.

I shall see
The winged vengeance overtake such children.
—Shakespeare.

In high vengeance there is noble scorn.—George Eliot.

In vengeance is found the abject pleasure of an abject mind.—Juvenal.

The rarer action is in virtue than in vengeance.—Shakespeare.

Venice

Venice once was dear,
The pleasant place of all festivity,
The revel of the earth, the masque of Italy.
—Byron.

In Venice, Tasso's echoes are no more,
And silent rows the songless gondolier;
Her palaces are crumbling to the shore,
And music meets not always now the ear.
—Byron.

White swan of cities, slumbering in thy nest
So wonderfully built among the reeds
Of the lagoon, that fences thee and feeds,
As sayeth thy old historian and thy guest!
—Longfellow.

I loved her from my boyhood; she to me
Was as a fairy city of the heart,
Rising like water-columns from the sea,
Of joy the sojourn, and of wealth the mart;
And Otway, Radcliffe, Schiller, Shakespeare's art,
Had stamp'd her image in me. —Byron.

The sylphs and ondines
And the sea-kings and queens Long ago, long ago, on the waves built city,
As lovely as seems
To some bard in his dreams,
The soul of his latest love-ditty.
—Owen Meredith.

I stood in Venice, on the Bridge of Sighs,
A palace and a prison on each hand;
I saw from out the wave her structure rise,
As from the stroke of the enchanter's wand:
A thousand years their cloudy wings expand
Around me, and a dying Glory smiles
O'er the far times, when many a subject land
Look'd to the winged Lion's marble piles,
Where Venice sate in state, throned on her hundred isles.
—Byron.

Ventilation

You cannot breathe too much of the open air.—Dr. Abernethy.

Be careful never to retire to rest in a room not properly ventilated.—Horace Mann.

There is nothing that this age, from whatever standpoint we survey it, needs more, physically, intellectually, and morally, than thorough ventilation.—Ruskin.

Venus

O Venus, hail! all hail, immortal Queen!
 Thou reign'st unbounded o'er the human
 scene,
 Where the bright Thames shines forth in azure pride,
 To where the Ganges rolls its foamy tide, Where the redundant Nile expands his course,
 Or Niagara throws her headlong force;
 Still from the east to west, from pole to
 pole,
 Thou e'er shalt rule great Sovereign of the whole. —Bohn.

Creator Venus, genial power of love,
 The bliss of men below, and gods above!
 Beneath the sliding sun thou runn'st thy
 race,
 Dost fairest shine, and best become thy
 place;
 For thee the winds their eastern blasts for-
 bear,
 Thy month reveals the spring, and opens
 all the year.
 Thee, goddess, thee, the storms of winter
 fly,
 Earth smiles with flowers renewing, laughs
 the sky,
 And birds to lays of love their tuneful notes
 apply;
 For thee the lion loathes the taste of blood.
 —Dryden.

Verbosity

He draweth out the thread of his verbosity finer than the staple of his argument.—Shakespeare.

Versatility

He who expects from a great name in politics, in philosophy, in art, equal greatness in other things, is little versed in human nature. Our strength lies in our weakness. The learned in books are ignorant of the world.
 He who is ignorant of books is often well acquainted with other things; for life is of the same length in the learned and unlearned; the mind cannot be idle: if it is not taken up with one thing, it attends to another through choice or necessity; and the degree of previous capacity in one class or another is a mere lottery.—
 Hazlitt.

That mere will and industry can enable any man to accomplish anything is a belief common enough amongst imperfectly educated man.
 * * * But no one of really cultivated intellect denies the variety of natural endowments.—Hamerton.

Verse

Verse sweetens toil, however rude the
 sound;
 All at her work the village maiden sings;
 Nor as she turns the giddy wheel around,
 Revolves the sad vicissitudes of things.
 —Gifford.

Of little use, the man you may suppose,
 Who says in verse what others say in prose;
 Yet let me show a poet's of some weight,
 And (though no soldier) useful to the state,
 What will a child learn sooner than a song?
 What better teach a foreigner the tongue?
 What's long or short, each accent where to place
 And speak in public with some sort of grace? —Pope.

I was a poet too; but modern taste
 Is so refined and delicate and chaste,
 That verse, whatever fire the fancy warms,
 Without a creamy smoothness has no
 charms.
 Thus, all success depending on an ear,
 And thinking I might purchase it too dear,
 If sentiment were sacrific'd to sound,
 And truth cut short to make a period round,
 I judg'd a man of sense could scarce do worse
 Than caper in the morris-dance of verse.
 —Cowper.

Vexation

Your children were vexation to your youth.—Shakespeare.

Vexations may be petty, but they are vexations still.—Montaigne.

There are two things which will make us happy in this life, if we attend to them. The first is, never to vex ourselves about what we cannot help; and the second, never to vex ourselves about what we can help.—
 Chatfield.

Vice

One sin another doth provoke.—
 Shakespeare.

Human nature is not of itself vicious.—Thomas Paine.

Vice lives and thrives best by concealment.—Virgil.

To vice innocence must always seem only a superior kind of chicanery.—Ouida.

Vice itself lost half its evil by losing all its grossness.—Burke.

The vices of some men are magnificent.—Lamb.

We pardon familiar vices.—Seneca.

Spare the person, but lash the vice.—Martial.

To sanction vice and hunt decorum down.—Byron.

And poor misfortune feels the lash of vice.—Thomson.

Vices are seldom single.—Robert Hall.

Vice, that digs her own voluptuous tomb!—Byron.

Vice in its own pure native ugliness.—Crabbe.

Few love to hear the sins they love to act.—Shakespeare.

Vice is a peripatetic, always in progression.—Owen Feltham.

Vice, like disease, floats in the atmosphere.—Hazlitt.

Vice gets more in this vicious world than piety.—Fletcher.

There is no truth which personal vice will not distort.—J. G. Holland.

And lash the vice and follies of the age.—Susannah Centlivre.

Vices are often habits rather than passions.—Rivarol.

Vices are seldom single.—Bishop Hall.

Let thy vices die before thee.—Franklin.

Vice is but a nurse of agonies.—Sir P. Sidney.

The vicious obey their passions, as slaves do their masters.—Diogenes.

What maintains one vice would bring up two children.—Franklin.

This is the essential evil of vice: it debases a man.—Chapin.

The gods are just, and of our pleasant vices Make instruments to plague us.—Shakespeare.

One vice worn out makes us wiser than fifty tutors.—Bulwer-Lytton.

It is but a step from companionship to slavery when one associates with vice.—Hosea Ballou.

The world will tolerate many vices, but not their diminutives.—Arthur Helps.

Vice stings us even in our pleasures, but virtue consoles us even in our pains.—Cowper.

We try to make a virtue of vices we are loth to correct.—La Rochefoucauld.

I prefer an accommodating vice to an obstinate virtue.—Molière.

Vice repeated is like the wandering wind, blows dust in others' eyes to spread itself.—Shakespeare.

No vice so great, but we can kill And conquer it, if we but will.—Chas. Noel Douglas.

Great parts produce great vices as well as virtues.—Plato.

The cunning tempter, by avoiding the grossness of vice, often silences objections.—Rivarol.

Most men are more willing to indulge in easy vices than to practise laborious virtues.—Dr. Johnson.

Do but see his vice: 't is to his virtue a just equinox, the one as long as the other.—Shakespeare.

Who called thee vicious was a lying elf; thou art not vicious, for thou art vice itself.—Martial.

Many a man's vices have at first been nothing worse than good qualities run wild.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

So in the wicked there's no vice
of which the saints have not a spice.
—Samuel Butler.

Crimes sometimes shock us too much; vices almost always too little.
—Hare.

There are some faults so nearly allied to excellence that we can scarce weed out the vice without eradicating the virtue.—Goldsmith.

If vices were profitable, the vir-tuous man would be the sinner.—Bacon.

Vices that are familiar we pardon, and only new ones reprehend.—Pub-lius Syrus.

Vicious actions are not hurtful because they are forbidden, but forbidden because they are hurtful.—Franklin.

The end of a dissolute life is most commonly a desperate death.—Bion.

When our vices have left us, we flatter ourselves that we have left them.—Rochefoucauld.

I hate when vice can bolt her arguments,
And virtue has no tongue to check her pride. —Milton.

Count all th' advantage prosp'rous vice attains,
'Tis but what virtue flies from, and dis-dains. —Pope.

No penance can absolve our guilty fame;
Nor tears, that wash out sin, can wash out shame. —Prior.

One principal characteristic of vice in the present age is the contempt of fame.—Thomas Gray.

Virtue itself turns vice, being misapplied,
And vice sometime 's by action dignified.
—Shakespeare.

There is no vice so simple, but assumes some mark of virtue on its outward parts.—Shakespeare.

Vice can deceive under the guise and shadow of virtue.—Juvenal.

A few vices are sufficient to darken
many virtues.—Plutarch.

The same vices which are huge and insupportable in others we do not feel in ourselves.—La Bruyère.

No man e'er reach'd the heights of vice at first.—Juvenal.

So blinded are we by our passions, that we suffer more to be damned than to be saved.—Colton.

When to mischief mortals bend their will,
How soon they find fit instruments of ill!
—Pope.

No one is born without vices, and he is the best man who is encumbered with the least.—Horace.

Though a man cannot abstain from being weak, he may from being vicious.—Addison.

The heart resolves this matter in a trice,
"Men only feel the smart, but not the vice."
—Pope.

O dishonest wretch!
Wilt thou be made a man out of my vice?
—Shakespeare.

Vice is contagious, and there is no trusting the sound and the sick together.—Seneca.

Led by my hand, he saunter'd Europe
round,
And gather'd every vice on Christian
ground. —Pope.

Vice is the greatest of all Jacobins,
the archleveller.—Hare.

Vice and virtue chiefly imply the relation of our actions to men in this world; sin and holiness rather imply their relation to God and the other world.—Dr. Watts.

Ah, Vice! how soft are thy voluptuous
ways!
While boyish blood is mantling, who can escape
The fascination of thy magic gaze?
—Byron.

There is some virtue in almost every vice, except hypocrisy; and even that, while it is a mockery of virtue, is at the same time a compliment to it.—Hazlitt.

I never heard yet that any of these bolder vices wanted less impudence to gainsay what they did, than to perform it first.—Shakespeare.

The vices operate like age,—bring on disease before its time, and in the prime of youth, leave the character broken and exhausted.—Junius.

People do not persist in their vices because they are not weary of them, but because they cannot leave them off. It is the nature of vice to leave us no resource but in itself.—Hazlitt.

To attack vices in the abstract, without touching persons, may be safe fighting indeed, but it is fighting with shadows.—Junius.

Long careers of vice, that prosper even in their epitaphs, make cemeteries seem ridiculous, and death anything but a leveller.—John Weiss.

What often prevents our abandoning ourselves to a single vice is, our having more than one.—Rochefoucauld.

But all have prices,
From crowns to kicks, according to their vices.
—Byron.

The reason that men are so slow to confess their vices is because they have not yet abandoned them.—Beecher.

It will be found a work of no small difficulty to dispossess a vice from the heart, where long possession begins to plead prescription.—Bacon.

The vices and the virtues are written in a language the world cannot construe; it reads them in a vile translation, and the translators are Failure and Success.—Bulwer-Lytton.

He that has energy enough in his constitution to root out a vice should go a little farther, and try to plant in a virtue in its place, otherwise he will have his labor to renew.—Colton.

Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
As, to be hated, needs but to be seen;
Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace.
—Pope.

It is not possible now to keep a young gentleman from vice by a total ignorance of it, unless you will all his life mew him up in a closet and never let him go into company.—Locke.

Why is there no man who confesses his vices? It is because he has not yet laid them aside. It is a waking man only who can tell his dreams.—Seneca.

Beware of the beginnings of vice. Do not delude yourself with the belief that it can be argued against in the presence of the exciting cause. Nothing but actual flight can save you.—B. R. Haydon.

Vices and frailties correct each other, like acids and alkalies. If each vicious man had but one vice, I do not know how the world could go on.—Whately.

O, what a mansion have those vices got
Which for their habitation chose out thee,
Where beauty's veil doth cover every blot,
And all things turn to fair that eyes can see!
—Shakespeare.

The vices enter into the composition of the virtues, as poisons into that of medicines. Prudence collects and arranges them, and uses them beneficially against the ills of life.—Rochefoucauld.

The scandalous bronze-lacquer age of hungry animalisms, spiritual impotences, and mendacities, will have to run its course, till the pit follow it.—Carlyle.

Wise men will apply their remedies to vices, not to names; to the causes of evil which are permanent, not the occasional organs by which they act, and the transitory modes in which they appear.—Burke.

There are vices which have no hold upon us, but in connection with others; and which, when you cut down the trunk, fall like the branches.—Pascal.

When men of infamy to grandeur soar,
They light a torch to show their shame the
more,
Those governments which curb not evils,
cause!
And a rich knave's a libel on our laws.
—Young.

As a stick, when once it is dry and stiff you may break it, but you can never bend it into a straighter posture; so doth the man become incorrigible who is settled and stiffened into vice.—Barrow.

It is only in some corner of the brain which we leave empty that Vice can obtain a lodging. When she knocks at your door be able to say: "No room for your ladyship; pass on."—Bulwer-Lytton.

Saint Augustine! well hast thou said,
That of our vices we can frame
A ladder, if we will but tread
Beneath our feet each deed of shame.
—Longfellow.

There will be nothing more that posterity can add to our immoral habits; our descendants must have the same desires and act the same follies as their sires. Every vice has reached its zenith.—Juvenal.

It may be said that the vices await us in the journey of life like hosts with whom we must successively lodge; and I doubt whether experience would make us avoid them if we were to travel the same road a second time.—Rochefoucauld.

Say everything for vice which you can say, magnify any pleasure as much as you please, but don't believe you have any secret for sending on quicker the sluggish blood, and for refreshing the faded nerve.—Sydney Smith.

What we call vice in our neighbor may be nothing less than a crude virtue. To him who knows nothing more of precious stones than he can learn from a daily contemplation of his breastpin, a diamond in the mine must be a very uncompromising sort of stone.—Simms.

In its primary signification all vice—that is, all excess—brings its own punishment even here. By certain fixed, settled, and established laws of Him who is the God of Nature, excess of every kind destroys that constitution that temperance would preserve.—Colton.

Vices are often hid under the name of virtues, and the practice of them followed by the worst consequences. I have seen ladies indulge their own ill-humor by being very rude and impertinent, and think they deserve approbation by saying, "I love to speak the truth."—Lady Montagu.

Vice leaves repentance in the soul like an ulcer in the flesh, which is always scratching and lacerating itself; for reason effaces all other griefs and sorrows, but it begets that of repentance, which is so much the more grievous, by reason it springs within, as the cold and hot of fevers are more sharp than those that only strike upon the outward skin.—Montaigne.

Vicissitudes

Happy the man who can endure with equanimity the highest and the lowest fortune.—Seneca.

Thus run the wheels of state, now up, now down,
And none that lives finds safety in a crown.
—Markham and Sampson.

But yesterday the word of Caesar might Have stood against the world; now lies he
there,
And none so poor to do him reverence.
—Shakespeare.

The most affluent may be stripped of all, and find his worldly comforts like so many withered leaves dropping from him.—Sterne.

Sometimes bath the brightest day a cloud: and, after summer evermore succeeds barren winter, with his wrathful nipping cold: so cares and Joys abound, as seasons fleet.—Shakespeare.

Roses bloom, and then they wither;
 Checks are bright, then fade and die;
 Shapes of light are wafted hither,
 Then, like visions, hurry by.
 —Percival.

Thus doth the ever-changing course of things
 Run a perpetual circle, ever turning;
 And that same day, that highest glory
 brings,
 Brings us unto the point of back-returning.
 —Daniel.

We do not marvel at the sunrise of a joy, only at its sunset! Then, on the other hand, we are amazed at the commencement of a sorrow-storm; but that it should go off in gentle showers, we think quite natural.—Richter.

A blossom full of promise is life's joy,
 That never comes to fruit. Hope, for a time,
 Suns the young floweret in its gladsome
 light,
 And it looks flourishing—a little while—
 'T is pass'd, we know not whither, but 't is gone.
 —Miss Landon.

Though the Indian ocean abounds in rich and rare gems, it does not boast a clearer sky nor more unruffled sea. If there be a shore that dreads not the fury of the faithless billows, it is some poor and narrow inlet unknown to the winds.—Metastasio.

Oh sad vicissitude
 Of earthly things! to what untimely end
 Are all the fading glories that attend Upon the state of greatest monarchs,
 brought!
 What safety can by policy be wrought,
 Or rest be found on fortune's restless wheel!
 —May.

Is there no constancy in earthly things?
 No happiness in us, but what must alter?
 No life, without the heavy load of fortune?
 What miseries we are, and to ourselves?
 Ev'n then when full content seems to sit by us,
 What daily sores and sorrows.
 —Beaumont and Fletcher.

Such are the vicissitudes of the world, through all its parts, that day and night, labor and rest, hurry and retirement, endear each other, Such are the changes that keep the mind in action; we desire, we pursue, we obtain, we are satiated; we desire something else, and begin a new pursuit.—Johnson.

Then grieve not that nought mortal
 Endures through passing years—
 Did life one changeless tenor keep.
 'T were cause indeed for tears.
 And fill we, ere our parting,
 A mantling pledge to sorrow;
 The pang that wrings the heart to-day,
 Time's touch will heal to-morrow.
 —Mrs. Ellet.

Victory

The smile of God is victory.—
 Whittier.

I came, saw, and overcame.—Shake-
 speare.

There's a lean fellow beats all conquerors.—Dekker.

Victory or Westminster Abbey.— Nelson.

How beautiful is victory, but how dear!—Boufflers.

Victory belongs to the most persevering.—Napoleon I.

I love victory, but I love not triumph.—Madame Swetchine.

And either victory, or else a grave,
 —Shakespeare.

To whom God will, there be the victory!—Shakespeare.

Hail to the Chief who in triumph advances.—Scott.

God on our side, doubt not of victory.—Shakespeare.

Thus far our fortune keeps an upward
 course,
 And we are grac'd with wreaths of victory.
 —Shakespeare.

A victory is twice itself when the achiever brings home full numbers.
 —Shakespeare.

We have met the enemy and they are ours.—Oliver Hazard Perry.

They see nothing wrong in the rule, that to the victors belong the spoils of the enemy.—W. L. Marcy.

Then with the losers let it sympathize;
For nothing can seem foul to those that win. —Shakespeare.

Who overcomes
By force, hath overcome but half his foe.
—Milton.

But if We have such another victory, we are undone.
—Attributed to Pyrrhus, by Bacon.

Victory, with advantage, is rather robbed than purchased.—Sir P. Sidney.

In victory, the hero seeks the glory,
not the prey.—Sir P. Sidney.

A victory won over self, is the only victory acceptable to God.—Chas.
Noel Douglas.

Kings may be blest, but Tam was glorious,
O'er a' the ills o' life victorious. —Burns.

Victory follows me, and all things follow victory.—Scudéri.

Whether in chains or in laurels, liberty knows nothing but victories.—
Wendell Phillips.

It is more difficult to look upon victory than upon battle.—Sir Walter Scott.

It is the contest that delights us,
and not the victory.—Pascal.

We conquered France, but felt our cap-tive's charms,
Her arts victorious triumph'd o'er our arms.
—Pope.

Now the time is come,
That France must veil her lofty-plumed
crest,
And let her head fall into England's lap.
—Shakespeare.

Pursue not a victory too far. He hath conquered well that hath made his enemy fly; thou mayest beat him to a desperate resistance, which may ruin thee.—George Herbert.

Victories that are cheap are cheap.
Those only are worth having which come as the result of hard fighting.
—Beecher.

"But what good came of it at last?"
quoth little Peterkin. "Why, that I cannot tell," said he; "but 'twas a famous victory."—Southey.

There is a tear for all that die,
A mourner o'er the humblest grave;
But nations swell the funeral cry,
And Triumph weeps above the brave.
—Byron.

Then should some cloud pass over
The brow of sire or lover,
Think 'tis the shade
By Victory made
Whose wings right o'er us hover!
—Moore.

With dying hand, above his head,
He shook the fragment of his blade,
And shouted "Victory!"— Charge, Chester, charge! on, Stanley on!"
Were the last words of Marmion.—Scott.

Not one of all the purple host
Who took the flag to-day
Can tell the definition
So clear of victory.
As he, defeated, dying,
On whose forbidden ear
The distant strains of triumph
Break agonized and clear.
—Emily Dickinson.

Out spoke the victor then,
As he hail'd them o'er the wave,
Ye are brothers! ye are men!
And we conquer but to save;
So peace instead of death let us bring;
But yield, proud, foe, thy fleet,
With the crews, at England's feet,
And make submission meet
To our King. —Campbell.

"It was the English," Kaspar cried,
"Who put the French to rout;
But what they kill'd each other for,
I could not well make out.
But every body said," quoth he,
"That 'twas a famous victory.
They say it was a shocking sight
After the field was won;
For many thousand bodies here
Lay rotting in the sun;
But things like that, you know, must be
After a famous victory."—Southey.

He went down to the school with a glimmering of another lesson in his heart,—the lesson that he who has conquered his own coward spirit has conquered the whole outward world.

—Thomas Hughes.

Vigilance

The master's eye makes the horse fat.—From the Latin.

It is the enemy who keep the sentinel watchful.—Mme. Swetchine.

Vigilance is not only the price of liberty, but of success of any sort.
—Beecher.

He is most free from danger, who,
even when safe, is on his guard.—
Syrus.

There is a significant Latin proverb, to wit, Who will guard the guards?—H. W. Shaw.

A prudent person, having to do with a designing one, will always distrust most when appearances are fairest.—Richardson.

Chance will not do the work. Chance sends the breeze;

But if the pilot slumber at the helm,
The very wind that wafts us tow'rd the port

May dash us on the shoals. The steers-man's part

Is vigilance, or blow it rough or smooth.
—Ben Jonson.

Villagers

Suburban villas, highway-side retreats,
That dread th' encroachments of our growing streets,

Tight boxes neatly sash'd, and in a blaze
With all a July sun's collected rays,
Delight the citizen, who gasping there, Breathes clouds of dust, and calls it country air.

O sweet retirement, who would balk the
thought

That could afford retirement, or could not?
'Tis such an easy walk, so smooth and straight,—

The second milestone fronts the garden gate;

A step if fair, and if a shower approach
You find safe shelter in the next stage-coach,

There prison'd in a parlor snug and small,
Like bottled wasps upon a southern wall,
The man of business and his friends compress'd,

Forget their labors, and yet find no rest;
But still 'tis rural,—trees are to be seen From every window, and the fields are green.

—Cowper.

The villager, born humbly and bred hard,
Content his wealth, and poverty his guard,
In action simply just, in conscience clear,
By guilt untainted, undisturb'd by fear,
His means but scanty, and his wants but few,

Labor his business, and his pleasure too,
Enjoys more comforts in a single hour Than ages give the wretch condemn'd to power.

—Churchill.

Villainy

Villainy that is vigilant will be an overmatch for virtue, if she slumber at her post.—Colton.

Calm, thinking villains, whom no faith could fix.—Pope.

He hath out-villain'd villainy so far,
that the rarity redeems him.—Shake-
speare.

Villainy, when detected, never gives up, but boldly adds impudence to imposture.—Goldsmith.

Why here's a villain,
Able to corrupt a thousand by example.
—Massinger.

A fellow by the hand of nature mark'd,
Quoted, and sign'd, to do a deed of shame.
—Shakespeare.

The multiplying villainies of nature
Do swarm upon him. —Shakespeare.

O villainy! Ho! let the door be lock'd;
Treachery! seek it out. —Shakespeare.

The villainy you teach me, I will execute, and it shall go hard but I will better the instruction.—Shakespeare.

Which is the villain? Let me see his eyes;
That when I note another man like him
I may avoid him. —Shakespeare.

The most stormy ebullitions of passion, from blasphemy to murder, are less terrific than one single act of cool villainy; a still rabies is more dangerous than the paroxysms of a fever. Fear the boisterous savage of passion less than the sedately grinning villain.—Lavater.

Villains are usually the worst casuists, and rush into greater crimes to avoid less. Henry VIII. committed murder to avoid the imputation of adultery; and in our times, those who commit the latter crime attempt to wash off the stain of seducing the wife by signifying their readiness to shoot the husband.—Colton.

Vindictiveness

No reasonable man would be eager to possess himself of the invidious power of inflicting punishment, if he were not predetermined to make use of it.—Junius.

Violets

The violet is a nun.—Hood.

Violets spring in the soft May shower.—Bryant.

Banks that slope to the southern sky
Where languid violets love to lie.
—Sarah Helen Whitman.

And from his ashes may be made
The violet of his native land. —Tennyson.

The violet thinks, with her timid blue eye,
To pass for a blossom enchantingly shy.
—Francis S. Osgood.

Surely as cometh the Winter, I know
There are Spring violets under the snow.
—R. H. Newell.

Here oft we sought the violet, as it lay Buried in beds of moss and lichens gray.
—Sarah Helen Whitman.

Steals timidly away,
Shrinking as violets do in summer's ray.
—Moore.

And shade the violets,
That they may bind the moss in leafy nets.
—Keats.

The country ever has a lagging Spring,
Waiting for May to call its violets forth.
—Bryant.

Early violets blue and white Dying for their love of light.
—Edwin Arnold.

Yet there upon that upland height
The darlings of the early spring
Blue violets—were blossoming.
—Julia C. R. Dorr.

Again the violet of our early days
Drinks beauteous azure from the golden sun,
And kindles into fragrance at his blaze.
—Ebenezer Elliott.

The sweet sound,
That breathes upon a bank of violets,
Stealing and giving odor!—Shakespeare.

Violets dim,
But sweeter than the lids of Juno's eyes,
Or Cytherea's breath. —Shakespeare.

A violet by a mossy stone
Half hidden from the eye!
Fair as a star when only one
Is shining in the sky.
—Wordsworth.

In kindly showers and sunshine bud
The branches of the dull gray wood;
Out from its sunned and sheltered nooks
The blue eye of the violet looks.
—Whittier.

The smell of violets, hidden in the green,
Pour'd back into my empty soul and frame
The times when I remembered to have been Joyful and free from blame.
—Tennyson.

The tender violet bent in smiles
To elves that sported nigh,
Tossing the drops of fragrant dew
To scent the evening sky.
—Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

And the violet lay dead while the odor flew
On the wings of the wind o'er the water's blue.
—Shelley.

Hath the pearl less whiteness
Because of its birth?
Hath the violet less brightness
For growing near earth?
—Moore.

And in my breast
Spring wakens too; and my regret Becomes an April violet,
And buds and blossoms like the rest.
—Tennyson.

The modest, lowly violet
In leaves of tender green is set;
So rich she cannot hide from view,
But covers all the bank with blue.
—Dora Read Goodale.

We are violets blue,
For our sweetness found
Careless in the mossy shades,
Looking on the ground.
Love's dropp'd eyelids and a kiss,— Such our breath and blueness is.
—Leigh Hunt.

A blossom of returning light,
An April flower of sun and dew;
The earth and sky, the day and night
Are melted in her depth of blue!
—Dora Read Goodale.

Cold blows the wind against the hill,
And cold upon the plain;
I sit me by the bank, until
The violets come again.

—Richard Garnett.

When beechen buds begin to swell,
And woods the blue-bird's warble know,
The yellow violet's modest bell
Peeps from the last year's leaves below.

—Bryant.

The violets were past their prime,
Yet their departing breath
Was sweeter, in the blast of death,
Than all the lavish fragrance of the time.

—Montgomery.

What thought is folded in thy leaves!
What tender thought, what speechless pain!
I hold thy faded lips to mine,
Thou darling of the April rain.

—T. B. Aldrich.

Violets!—deep-blue violets!
April's loveliest coronets!
There are no flowers grow in the vale,
Kiss'd by the dew, woo'd by the gale,—
None by the dew of the twilight wet,
So sweet as the deep-blue violet.

—L. E. Landon.

Violet! sweet violet!
Thine eyes are full of tears;
Are they wet
Even yet

With the thought of other years?

—Lowell.

A humble flower long time I pined
Upon the solitary plain,
And trembled at the angry wind,
And shrunk before the bitter rain.
And oh! 'twas in a blessed hour
A passing wanderer chanced to see,
And, pitying the lonely flower,
To stoop and gather me.

—Thackeray.

Virgin

White, cold, virgin snow.—Shakespeare.

A simple maiden in her flower is worth a hundred coats-of-arms.—Tennyson.

Unstained and pure as is the lily,
or the mountain snow.—Thomson.

Maiden, when such a soul as thine is born, the morning stars their ancient music make.—Lowell.

Virginity is the poetry, not the reality, of life.—Lamartine.

Fasting maids whose minds are dedicated to nothing temporal.—Shakespeare.

The young girl who begins to experience the necessity of loving seeks to hide it.—Beauchêne.

For me it will be enough that a marble stone should declare that a queen, having reigned such a time, lived and died a virgin.—Queen Elizabeth.

Timorous virgins form a dreadful chimera of a husband, as of a creature quite contrary to that soft, humble, pliant, easy thing, a lover.—Congreve.

But earthlier happy is the rose distilled than that which, withering on the virgin thorn, grows, lives, and dies in single blessedness.—Shakespeare.

Poetry, good sir, in my opinion, is like a young virgin, very young, and extremely beautiful, whom divers other virgins—namely, all the other sciences—make it their business to enrich, polish, and adorn.—Cervantes.

Let the words of a virgin, though in a good cause and to a good purpose, be neither violent, many, nor first, nor last; it is less shame for a virgin to be lost in a blushing silence than to be found in a bold eloquence.—Quarles.

A woman's whole life is a history of the affections. The heart is her world; it is there her ambition strives for empire; it is there her avarice seeks for hidden treasures. She sends forth her sympathies on adventure, she embarks her soul in the traffic of affection; and, if shipwrecked, her cause is hopeless, for it is a bankruptcy of the heart.—Washington Irving.

Virtue

Virtue is the beauty of the soul.—Socrates.

Virtue alone is true nobility.—Gifford.

Virtue is beauty.—Shakespeare.

Virtue is to herself the best reward.—Henry Moore.

Virtue, the greatest of all monarchies.—Swift.

Virtue alone is happiness below.—Crabbe.

Heaven made virtue; man, the appearance.—Voltaire.

The only reward of virtue is virtue.—Emerson.

He who dies for virtue does not perish.—Plautus.

Virtue's a stronger guard than brass.—Edmund Waller.

Virtue is not hereditary.—Thomas Paine.

Virtue is like a rich stone, best plain set.—Bacon.

Virtue is health, vice is sickness.—Petrarch.

Assume a virtue, if you have it not.—Shakespeare.

Virtue by calculation is the virtue of vice.—Joubert.

Our virtues are commonly disguised vices.—Rochefoucauld.

Virtue's office never breaks men's troth.—Shakespeare.

A heart unspotted is not easily daunted.—Shakespeare.

Virtue is praised and freezes.—Juvenal.

Our virtues and vices spring from one root.—Goethe.

Virtue is bold, and goodness never fearful.—Shakespeare.

Hang virtue!—Ben Jonson.

They only have lived long who have lived virtuously.—Sheridan.

The greatest offence against virtue is to speak ill of it.—Hazlitt.

Sometimes virtue starves while vice is fed.—Pope.

Virtue is the truest liberty.—Owen Feltham.

The good hate sin because they love virtue.—Horace.

It is easy to be virtuous in prospective.—J. Petit-Senn.

Virtue is voluntary, vice involuntary.—Plato.

All great virtues become great men.—Corneille.

Virtue is necessary to a republic.—Montesquieu.

Virtue withers away if it has no opposition.—Seneca.

Virtue is chok'd with foul ambition.—Shakespeare.

Virtue is in the mind, not in the appearance.—Saadi.

Integrity of life is fame's best friend.—John Webster.

Most virtue lies between two vices.—Horace.

Virtue has many preachers, but few martyrs.—Helvetius.

Virtue will catch as well as vice by contact.—Burke.

God looks at pure, not full hands.—Syrus.

And even his failings leaned to virtue's side.—Goldsmith.

All bow to virtue and then walk away.—De Finod.

The whole of virtue consists in its practice.—Cicero.

Virtue is, like health, the harmony of the whole man.—Carlyle.

Sweet are the slumbers of the virtuous man.—Addison.

We need greater virtues to sustain good than evil fortune.—La Rochefoucauld.

I wrap myself up in my virtue.—Horace.

Birth is nothing where virtue is not.—Molière.

Honor is the reward of virtue.—Cicero.

Virtue is safe only when it is inspired.—Charles H. Parkhurst.

Virtue, for us, is obedience to God in Christ.—Roswell D. Hitchcock.

For virtue only finds eternal fame.—Petrarch.

Virtue often trips and falls on the sharp-edged rock of poverty.—Eugene Sue.

Silver is less valuable than gold, gold than virtue.—Horace.

Virtue maketh men on the earth famous, in their graves illustrious, in the heavens immortal.—Chilo.

O let us still the secret joy partake,
To follow virtue even for virtue's sake.
—Pope.

If you can be well without health,
you can be happy without virtue.—Burke.

Live virtuously, my lord, and you cannot die too soon, nor live too long.—Lady Rachel Russell.

Recommend to your children virtue; that alone can make happy, not gold.—Beethoven.

No one dies too soon who has finished the course of perfect virtue.—Cicero.

Virtue is everywhere the same, because it comes from God, while everything else is of men.—Voltaire.

What is virtue but a medicine, and vice but a wound?—Hooker.

Well may your heart believe the truths I tell;
'Tis virtue makes the bliss where'er we dwell.
—Collins.

Virtue is like precious odors, most fragrant when they are incensed or crushed.—Bacon.

Some, by admiring other men's virtues, become enemies to their own vices.—Bias.

I believe that Virtue shows quite as well in rags and patches as she does in purple and fine linen.—Dickens.

Virtue is a state of war, and to live in it we have always to combat with ourselves.—Rousseau.

I am no herald to inquire of men's pedigrees; it sufficeth me, if I know their virtues.—Sir P. Sidney.

If our virtues did not go forth of us, it were all alike as if we had them not.—Shakespeare.

Virtue consisteth of three parts,—temperance, fortitude, and justice.—Epicurus.

In the truly great, virtue governs with the sceptre of knowledge.—Sir P. Sidney.

There are some persons on whom virtue sits almost as ungraciously as vice.—Bouhours.

It is difficult to persuade mankind that the love of virtue is the love of themselves.—Cicero.

Virtue is that which must tip the preacher's tongue and the ruler's sceptre with authority.—South.

Nothing is more easy than irreproachable conduct.—Mme. de Maintenon.

The soul's calm sunshine, and the heartfelt joy, is virtue's prize.—Pope.

Parley and surrender signify the same thing where virtue is concerned.—Mme. de Maintenon.

Virtue itself turns vice, being misapplied, and vice sometimes by action dignified.—Shakespeare.

Virtue in distress, and vice in triumph make atheists of mankind.—Dryden.

Virtue, vain word, futile shadow, slave of chance! Alas! I believe in thee!—Brutus.

Virtue preserv'd from fell destruction's blast, Led on by heaven, and crown'd with joy at last.
—Shakespeare.

The only amaranthine flower on earth is virtue.—Cowper.

Is virtue a thing remote? I wish to be virtuous; and lo! virtue is at hand.—Confucius.

Whilst shame keeps its watch, virtue is not wholly extinguished in the heart.—Burke.

The four cardinal virtues are prudence, fortitude, temperance, and justice.—Paley.

But virtue too, as well as vice, is clad in flesh and blood.—Waller.

'T is virtue which they want; and, wanting it, honor no garment to their backs can fit.—Ben Jonson.

Virtue must be the result of self-culture; the gods do not take pupils.—Mme. de Krudener.

Virtue and sense are one; and, trust me, still
A faithless heart betrays the head unsound.
—Armstrong.

And virtue, though in rags, will keep me warm.—Dryden.

Virtue is not a thing you can have by halves; it is or it is not.—Balzac.

Most men admire virtue, who follow not her lore.—Milton.

Of the two, I prefer those who render vice lovable to those who degrade virtue.—Joubert.

Virtue is not malicious; wrong done her is righted even when men grant they err.
—George Chapman.

The virtue which has never been attacked by temptation is deserving of no monument.—Mlle. de Scudéri.

Few men have virtue to withstand the highest bidder.—George Washington.

Virtue, thou in rags, may challenge more than vice set off with all the trim of greatness.—Massinger.

Beware of the virtue which a man boasts is his.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

It is easier to be virtuous than it is to appear so, and it pays better.—H. W. Shaw.

According to his virtue let us use him,
With all respect and rites of burial.
—Shakespeare.

The true ornament of matrons is virtue, not apparel.—Justin.

And he by no uncommon lot
Was famed for virtues he had not
—Cowper.

My heart laments that virtue cannot live
Out of the teeth of emulation.
—Shakespeare.

Virtue is not left to stand alone.
He who practices it will have neighbors.—Confucius.

For in the fatness of these pury times
Virtue itself of vice must pardon beg.
—Shakespeare.

Virtue she finds too painful an endeavor,
Content to dwell in decencies forever.
—Pope.

Only a sweet and virtuous soul,
Like seasoned timber, never gives.
—Herbert.

Virtue does not consist in the absence of the passions, but in the control of them.—H. W. Shaw.

Our virtues live upon our incomes;
our vices consume our capital.—J.
Petit-Senn.

Good company and good discourse are the very sinews of virtue.—Izaak Walton.

O virtue, I have followed you through life, and find you at last but a shade.—Euripides.

Virtue is like the polar star, which keeps its place, and all stars turn towards it.—Confucius.

The firste vertu, sone, if thou wolt lerne,
Is to restreynen, and kepe wel thy tonge.
—Chaucer.

She who is more ashamed of dishonesty than of poverty will not be easily overcome.—Richardson.

Our virtues, as well as our vices, are often scourges for our own backs.
—Miss Braddon.

Virtue with some is nothing but successful temerity.—Seneca.

An effort made with ourselves for the good of others, with the intention of pleasing God alone.—Bernardin de St. Pierre.

Virtues that shun the day and lie concealed in the smooth seasons and the calm of life.—Addison.

Virtuous and vicious every man must be,
Few in th' extreme, but all in the degree.
—Pope.

Weak is that throne, and in itself unsound,
Which takes not solid virtue for its ground.
—Churchill.

Whatever farce the boastful hero plays,
Virtue alone has majesty in death.
—Young.

Know then this truth, enough for man to
know,
Virtue alone is happiness below. —Pope.

Positive virtues are of all others
the severest and most sublime.—Paley.

Or, if virtue feeble were, heaven itself would stoop to her.—Milton.

True greatness is sovereign wisdom.
We are never deceived by our virtues.
—Lamartine.

All virtue lies in a power of denying our own desires where reason does not authorize them.—Locke.

Virtue in its grandest aspect is neither more nor less than following reason.—Lao-Tze.

Virtue dwells at the head of a river,
to which we cannot get but by rowing against the stream.—Feltham.

I find that the best virtue I have has in it some tincture of vice.—
Montaigne.

Her virtues, graced with external gifts,
Do breed love's settled passions in my heart.
—Shakespeare.

Virtue alone outbuilds the Pyramids;
Her monuments shall last, when Egypt's fall. —Young.

Can virtue hide itself? Go to, mum, you are he; graces will appear, and there's an end.—Shakespeare.

When men grow virtuous in their old age, they only make a sacrifice to God of the devil's leavings.—Pope.

Virtue is its own reward. There's a pleasure in doing good which sufficiency pays itself.—Vanbrugh.

Men's evil manners live in brass; their virtues
We write in water. —Shakespeare.

Some virtue is needed, but not too much. Excess in anything is a defect.
—Monvel.

I prefer an accommodating vice to an obstinate virtue.—Molière.

Virtue alone is the unerring sign of a noble soul.—Boileau.

That virtue we appreciate is as much ours as another's. We see so much only as we possess.—Thoreau.

To show virtue her own feature, scorn her own image, and the very age and body of the time his form and presence.—Shakespeare.

Adversity tries men; but virtue struggles after fame regardless of the adverse heights.—Silius Italicus.

The more virtuous any man is, the less easily does he suspect others to be vicious.—Cicero.

Virtue is the health of the soul. It gives a flavor to the smallest leaves of life.—Joubert.

The regular path of virtue is to be pursued without any bend, and from no view to emolument.—Mencius.

Nature has placed nothing so high that virtue cannot reach it.—Quintus Curtius Rufus.

True virtue, wheresoever it moves, still carries an intrinsic worth about it.—Vanbrugh.

Virtue were a kind of misery if fame were all the garland that crowned her.—Owen Feltham.

It is virtue that gives glory; that will endenizen a man everywhere.—Ben Jonson.

We hate virtue when it is safe; when removed from our sight we diligently seek it.—Horace.

Let them (the wicked) see the beauty of virtue, and pine at having forsaken her.—Persius.

It is not the business of virtue to extirpate the affections of the mind, but to regulate them.—Addison.

Every generous action loves the public view; yet no theatre for virtue is equal to a consciousness of it.—Cicero.

Fewer possess virtue than those who wish us to believe that they possess it.—Cicero.

There was never yet a truly great man that was not at the same time truly virtuous.—Benjamin Franklin.

Virtue consists in avoiding vice, and is the highest wisdom.—Horace.

We seldom speak of the virtue which we have, but much oftener of that which we lack.—Lessing.

But virtue never will be mov'd,
Though lewdness court it in a shape of heaven.
—Shakespeare.

The ages of greatest public spirit are not always eminent for private virtue.—Hume.

Moderation is the silken string running through the pearl chain of all virtues.—Bishop Hall.

That virtue which requires to be ever guarded is scarce worth the sentinel.—Goldsmith.

Hast thou virtue? acquire also the graces and beauties of virtue.—Benjamin Franklin.

Virtue alone is sufficient to make a man great, glorious, and happy.—Benjamin Franklin.

Virtue, though clothed in a beggar's garb, commands respect.—Schiller.

It is not enough merely to possess virtue, as if it were an art; it should be practised.—Cicero.

Virtue alone is sweet society,
It keeps the key to all heroic hearts,
And opens you a welcome in them all.
—Emerson.

The virtue of a man ought to be measured not by his extraordinary exertions, but by his every-day conduct.—Pascal.

When we pray for any virtue, we should cultivate the virtue as well as pray for it: the form of your prayers should be the rule of your life.—Jeremy Taylor.

To be ambitious of true honor, of the true glory and perfection of our natures, is the very principle and incentive of virtue.—Sir P. Sidney.

There is nothing that is meritorious but virtue and friendship; and, indeed, friendship itself is only a part of virtue.—Pope.

Virtue is not to be considered in the light of mere innocence, or abstaining from harm; but as the exertion of our faculties in doing good.—Bishop Butler.

What nothing earthly gives, or can destroy,
The soul's calm sunshine, and the heart-felt joy,
Is virtue's prize. —Pope.

I would be virtuous for my own sake, though nobody were to know it; as I would be clean for my own sake, though nobody were to see me.—Shaftesbury.

Good sense, good health, good conscience, and good fame,—all these belong to virtue, and all prove that virtue has a title to your love.—Cowper.

The virtue in most request is conformity. Self-reliance is its aversion. It loves not realities and creators, but names and customs.—Emerson.

Although virtue receives some of its excellencies from nature, yet it is perfected by education.—Quintilian.

Every man has his appointed day; life is brief and irrevocable; but it is the work of virtue to extend our fame by our deeds.—Virgil.

It is the stain and disgrace of the age to envy virtue, and to be anxious to crush the very flower of dignity.—Cicero.

Virtue can see to do what virtue would by her own radiant light, though sun and moon were in the flat sea sunk.—Milton.

The paths of virtue, though seldom those of worldly greatness, are always those of pleasantness and peace.—Sir Walter Scott.

The advantage to be derived from virtue is so evident that the wicked practise it from sinister motives.

The thirst for fame is much greater than that for virtue; for who would embrace virtue itself if you take away its rewards?—Juvenal.

Sincerely to aspire after virtue is to gain her, and zealously to labor after her wages is to receive them.—Colton.

I willingly confess that it likes me better when I find virtue in a fair lodging than when I am bound to seek it in an ill-favored creature.—Sir P. Sidney.

Virtue does not truly reward her votary if she leaves him sad and half doubtful whether it would not have been better to serve vice.—George William Curtis.

The best perfection of a religious man is to do common things in a perfect manner. A constant fidelity in small things is a great and heroic virtue.—St. Bonaventura.

The virtues, like the muses, are always seen in groups. A good principle was never found solitary in any breast.—Jane Porter.

Virtue hath no virtue if it be not impugned; then appeareth how great it is, of what value and power it is, when by patience it approveth what it works.—Seneca.

Charity and good-nature give a sanction to the most common actions; and pride and ill-nature make our best virtues despicable.—Wycherley.

Virtue that transgresses is but patched with sin; and sin that amends is but patched with virtue.—Shakespeare.

Virtue is an angel; but she is a blind one, and must ask of Knowledge to show her the pathway that leads to her goal.—Horace Mann.

I have known persons without a friend—never any one without some virtue. The virtues of the former conspired with their vices to make the whole world their enemies.—Hazlitt.

Even virtue is an art; and even its devotees are divided into those who practise it and those who are merely amateurs.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

Let this great maxim be my virtue's guide,—in part she is to blame that has been tried; he comes too near that comes to be denied.—Mary Wortley Montagu.

The measure of any man's virtue is what he would do if he had neither the laws nor public opinion, nor even his own prejudices, to control him.—Hazlitt.

The glory of riches and of beauty is frail and transitory; virtue remains bright and eternal.—Sallust.

Virtues, like essences, lose their fragrance when exposed. They are sensitive plants, which will not bear too familiar approaches.—Shenstone.

Virtue that wavers is not virtue, but vice revolted from itself, and after a while returning. The actions of just and pious men do not darken in their middle course.—Milton.

Content not thyself that thou art virtuous in the general; for one link being wanting, the chain is defective.—William Penn.

Virtue, without talent, is a coat of mail without a sword; it may indeed defend the wearer, but will not enable him to protect his friend.—Colton.

No man is born wise; but wisdom and virtue require a tutor; though we can easily learn to be vicious without a master.—Seneca.

There are odious virtues; such as inflexible severity, and an integrity that accepts of no favor.—Tacitus.

It must be admitted that the conception of virtue cannot be separated from the conception of happiness-producing conduct.—Herbert Spencer.

O virtue! virtue! as thy joys excel, so are thy woes transcendent: the gross world knows not the bliss or misery of either.—Thomson.

Virtue is that perfect good, which is the complement of a happy life; the only immortal thing that belongs to mortality.—Seneca.

The most virtuous of all men is he that contents himself with being virtuous without seeking to appear so.—Plato.

All virtue lies in individual action, in inward energy, in self-determination. The best books have most beauty.—Channing.

Woman's virtue is the music of stringed instruments, which sounds best in a room; but man's that of wind instruments, which sounds best in the open air.—Richter.

Virtue, the more it is exposed, like purest linen, laid in open air, will bleach the more, and whiten to the view.—Dryden.

To worthiest things, virtue, art, beauty, fortune, now I see, rareness of use, not nature value brings.—Donne.

Good sense, good health, good conscience, and good fame,—all these belong to virtue, and all prove that virtue has a title to your love.—Cowper.

Virtue and vice are both prophets; the first, of certain good; the second, of pain or else of penitence.—R. Venning.

Our virtues would be proud if our faults whipped them not; and our crimes would despair if they were not cherished by our virtues.—Shakespeare.

God sure esteems the growth and completing of one virtuous person, more than the restraint of ten vicious.—Milton.

They who disbelieve in virtue because man has never been found perfect, might as reasonably deny the sun because it is not always noon.—Hare.

A virtuous name is the only precious good for which queens and peasants' wives must contest together.—Schiller.

Virtues go ever in troops; they go so thick, that sometimes some are hid in the crowd; which yet are, but appear not.—Bishop Hall.

The more tickets you have in a lottery, the worse your chance. And it is the same of virtues, in the lottery of life.—Sterne.

As they suspect a man in the city who is ostentatious of his riches, so should the woman be who makes the most noise of her virtue.—Fielding.

Virtue, which breaks through opposition and all temptation can remove, most shines, and most is acceptable above.—Milton.

However virtuous a woman may be, a compliment on her virtue is what gives her the least pleasure.—Prince de Ligne.

It is a great deal easier for a man to find a pedigree to fit his virtues than virtues to fit his pedigree.—H. W. Shaw.

As many as are the difficulties which Virtue has to encounter in this world, her force is yet superior.—Shaftesbury.

Is any one able for one day to apply his strength to virtue? I have not seen the case in which his strength would be sufficient.—Confucius.

Most people are so constituted that they can only be virtuous in a certain routine: an irregular course of life demoralizes them.—Hawthorne.

Wealth is a weak anchor, and glory cannot support a man; this is the law of God, that virtue only is firm, and cannot be shaken by a tempest.—Pythagoras.

To be discontented with the divine discontent, and to be ashamed with the noble shame, is the very germ of the first upgrowth of all virtue.—Chas. Kingsley.

If we should cease to be generous and charitable because another is sordid and ungrateful, it would be much in the power of vice to extinguish Christian virtues.—L'Estrange.

To be able under all circumstances to practise five things constitutes perfect virtue: these five are gravity, generosity of soul, sincerity, earnestness, and kindness.—Confucius.

Sweet drop of pure and pearly light;
In thee the rays of Virtue shine;
More calmly clear, more mildly bright,
Than any gem that gilds the mine.
—Sam'l Rogers.

The only impregnable citadel of virtue is religion; for there is no bulwark of mere morality which some temptation may not overtop, or undermine and destroy.—Sir P. Sidney.

His virtues
Will plead like angels, trumpet-tongued, against
The deep damnation of his taking-off.
—Shakespeare.

Though virtue give a ragged livery, she gives a golden cognizance; if her service make thee poor, blush not. Thy poverty may disadvantage thee, but not dishonor thee.—Quarles.

It is the edge and temper of the blade that make a good sword, not the richness of the scabbard, and so it is not money or possessions that make men considerable, but virtue.—Seneca.

There is no community or commonwealth of virtue; every man must study his own economy, and erect these rules unto the figure of himself.—Sir Thomas Browne.

Virtue is uniform, conformable to reason, and of unvarying consistency; nothing can be added to it that can make it more than virtue; nothing can be taken from it, and the name of virtue be left.—Cicero.

No virtue fades out of mankind. Not over-hopeful by inborn tempera ment, cautious by long experience, I yet never despair of human virtue.—Theodore Parker.

That which leads us to the performance of duty by offering pleasure as its reward, is not virtue, but a deceptive copy and imitation of virtue.—Cicero.

Count all th' advantage prosperous Vice attains,
'Tis but what Virtue flies from and disdains:
And grant the bad what happiness they would,
One they must want—which is, to pass for good.
—Pope.

Virtue may choose the high or low degree,
'Tis just alike to Virtue and to me;
Dwell in a monk, or light upon a king,
She's still the same belov'd contented thing.
—Pope.

The web of our life is of a mingled yarn, good and ill together: our virtues would be proud if our faults whipped them not; and our crimes would despair if they were not cherished by our virtues.—Shakespeare.

Believe the muse, the wintry blast of death
Kills not the buds of virtue; no, they spread,
Beneath the heavenly beams of brighter suns,
Thro' endless ages, into higher powers.
—Thomson.

Virtue may be assail'd, but never hurt;
Surpris'd by unjust force, but not enthral'd;
Yea, even that which mischief meant most harm,
Shall in the happy trial prove most glory.
—Milton.

He who talks much about virtue in the abstract, begins to be suspected; it is shrewdly guessed that where there is great preaching there will be little almsgiving.—Carlyle.

Virtue and vice are not arbitrary things; but there is a natural and eternal reason for goodness and virtue, and against vice and wickedness.—Tillotson.

Some virtuous women are too liberal in their insults to a frail sister; but virtue can support itself without borrowing any assistance from the vices of other women.—Fielding.

True virtue, when she errs, needs not the eyes of men to excite her blushes; she is confounded at her own presence, and covered with confusion of face.—Jane Porter.

The Great slight the men of wit, who have nothing but wit; the men of wit despise the Great, who have nothing but greatness; the good man pities them both, if with greatness or wit they have not virtue.—La Bruyère.

Many new years you may see, but happy ones you cannot see without deserving them. These virtue, honor, and knowledge alone can merit, alone can produce.—Chesterfield.

Virtue consists in doing our duty in the several relations we sustain, in respect to ourselves, to our fellow-men, and to God, as known from reason, conscience, and revelation.—Alexander.

I cannot worship the abstractions of virtue: she only charms me when she addresses herself to my heart, speaks through the love from which she springs.—Niebuhr.

Virtue, our present peace, our future prize,
Man's unprecious, natural estate,
Improvable at will, in virtue lies;
Its tenure sure; its income is divine.
—Young.

Virtue, the strength and beauty of the soul,
Is the best gift of heaven; a happiness
That, even above the smiles and frowns of fate,
Exalts great Nature's favorites; a wealth
That ne'er encumbers, nor can be transferred.
—Armstrong.

What, what is virtue, but repose of mind.
A pure ethereal calm, that knows no storm;
Above the reach of wild ambition's wind,
Above those passions that this world deform
And torture man.
—Thomson.

Virtue is more to man than either water or fire. I have seen men die from treading on water and fire, but I have never seen a man die from treading the course of virtue.—Confucius.

I'll leave my son my virtuous deeds behind;
And would my father had left me no more!
For all the rest is held at such a rate,
As brings a thousandfold more care to keep,
Than in possession any jot of pleasure.
—Shakespeare.

Virtue may be said to steal, like a guilty thing, into the secret haunts of vice and infamy; it clings to their devoted victim, and will not be driven quite away. Nothing can destroy the human heart.—Hazlitt.

No virtue can be real that has not been tried. The gold in the crucible alone is perfect; the loadstone tests the steel, and the diamond is tried by the diamond, while metals gleam the brighter in the furnace.—Calderon.

Virtue is only a conflict by which we get the mastery of our failings; that, by which every man proves his peculiar power of understanding the will and spirit of God, is only a silent working of the inner man.—Schleiermacher.

There have been men who could play delightful music on one string of the violin, but there never was a man who could produce the harmonies of heaven in his soul by a one-stringed virtue.—Chapin.

A virtuous and well-disposed person, like a good metal, the more he is fired, the more he is fined; the more he is opposed, the more he is approved: wrongs may well try him, and touch him, but cannot imprint in him any false stamp.—Richelieu.

A man that hath no virtue in himself ever envieth virtue in others; for men's minds will either feed upon their own good or upon others' evil; and who wanteth the one will prey upon the other.—Bacon.

Virtue is despotic; life, reputation, every earthly good, must be surrendered at her voice. The law may seem hard, but it is the guardian of what it commands; and is the only sure defence of happiness.—Jane Porter.

Virtue is shut out from no one; she is open to all, accepts all, invites all, gentlemen, freedmen, slaves, kings, and exiles; she selects neither house nor fortune; she is satisfied with a human being without adjuncts.—Seneca.

It would not be easy even for an unbeliever, to find a better translation of the rule of virtue from the abstract into the concrete, than to endeavor so to live that Christ would approve our life.—J. Stuart Mill.

There is no virtue which does not rejoice a well-descended nature; there is a kind of I know not what congratulation in well-doing, that gives us an inward satisfaction, and a certain generous boldness that accompanies a good conscience.—Montaigne.

Verily, virtue must be her own reward, as in the Socratic creed; for she will bring no other dower than peace of conscience in her gift to who-soever weds her. "I have loved justice, and fled from iniquity; wherefore here I die in exile," said Hildebrand upon his death-bed.—Ouida.

There is but one pursuit in life which it is in the power of all to follow, and of all to attain. It is subject to no disappointments, since he that perseveres makes every difficulty an advancement and every contest a victory; and this is the pursuit of virtue.—Colton.

What we take for virtues is often nothing but an assemblage of different actions, and of different interests, that fortune or our industry know how to arrange; and it is not always from valor and from chastity that men are valiant, and that women are chaste.—Rochefoucauld.

Virtue is nothing but an act of loving that which is to be beloved, and that act is prudence, from whence not to be removed by constraint is fortitude; not to be allured by enticements is temperance; not to be diverted by pride is justice.—Quarles.

The recognition of virtue is not less valuable from the lips of the man who hates it, since truth forces him to acknowledge it; and though he may be unwilling to take it into his inmost soul, he at least decks himself out in its trappings.—Montaigne.

If thou takest virtue for the rule of life, and valuest thyself upon acting in all things comfortably thereto, thou wilt have no cause to envy lords and princes; for blood is inherited, but virtue is common property, and may be acquired by all; it has, moreover, an intrinsic worth, which blood has not.—Cervantes.

A vice sanctioned by the general opinion is merely a vice. The evil terminates in itself. A vice condemned by the general opinion produces a pernicious effect on the whole character. The former is a local malady; the latter, constitutional taint. When the reputation of the offender is lost, he too often flings the remainder of his virtue after it in despair.—Macaulay.

I have ever thought,
Nature doth nothing so great for great men,
As when she's pleas'd to make them lords of truth.
Integrity of life is fame's best friend,
Which nobly, beyond death, shall crown the
end.
—John Webster.

Court-virtues bear, like gems, the highest rate,
Born where Heav'n's influence scarce can penetrate.
In life's low vale, the soil the virtues like,
They please as beauties, here as wonders strike.
—Pope.

Virtue will catch as well as vice by contact; and the public stock of honest manly principle will daily accumulate. We are not too nicely to scrutinize motives as long as action is irreproachable. It is enough (and for a worthy man perhaps too much) to deal out its infamy to convicted guilt and declared apostasy.—Burke.

Do not be troubled because you have not great virtues. God made a million spears of grass where he made one tree. The earth is fringed and carpeted, not with forests, but with grasses. Only have enough of little virtues and common fidelities, and you need not mourn because you are neither a hero nor a saint.—Beecher.

The height and value of true virtue consists in the facility, utility, and pleasure of its exercise; so far from difficulty, that boys, as well as men, and the innocent as well as the subtle, may make it their own; and it is by order and good conduct, and not by force, that it is to be acquired.—Montaigne.

By great and sublime virtues are meant those which are called into action on great and trying occasions, which demand the sacrifice of the dearest interests and prospects of human life, and sometimes of life itself; the virtues, in a word, which, by their rarity and splendor, draw admiration, and have rendered illustrious the character of patriots, martyrs, and confessors.—Robert Hall.

Virtue is as little to be acquired by learning as genius; nay, the idea is barren, and is only to be employed as an instrument, in the same way as genius in respect to art. It would be as foolish to expect that our moral and ethical systems would turn out virtuous, noble, and holy beings, as that our æsthetic systems would produce poets, painters, and musicians.—Schopenhauer.

Where is the reward of virtue? and what recompense has nature provided for such important sacrifices as those of life and fortune, which we must often make to it? O sons of earth! Are ye ignorant of the value of this celestial mistress? And do ye meanly inquire for her portion, when ye observe her genuine beauty?—Hume.

Virtue is the nursing-mother of all human pleasures, who, in rendering them just, renders them also pure and permanent; in moderating them, keeps them in breath and appetite; in interdicting those which she herself refuses, whets our desires to those that she allows; and, like a kind and liberal mother abundantly allows all that nature requires, even to satiety, if not to lassitude.—Socrates.

Ah! whither now are fled
Those dreams of greatness? those unsolid hopes
Of happiness? those longings after fame?
Those restless cares? those busy bustling
days?
Those gay-spent, festive nights? those veering
thoughts,
Lost between good and ill, that shared thy
life?
All now are vanished! Virtue sole survives,
Immortal never-failing friend of man,
His guide to happiness on high.

—Thomson.

The virtuous to those mansions go
Where pleasures unembitter'd flow,
Where, leading up a jocund band,
Vigor and Youth dance hand in hand,
Whilst Zephyr, with harmonious gales,
Pipes softest music through the vales,
And Spring and Flora, gaily crown'd,
With velvet carpet spread the ground;
With livelier blush where roses bloom,
And every shrub expires perfume.

—Churchill.

Virtue and sense are one; and trust me still
A faithless heart betrays the head unsound.
Virtue (for mere good nature is a fool)
Is sense and spirit with humanity.
'Tis sometimes angry, and its frown confounds;
'Tis even vindictive, but in vengeance just.
Knaves fain would laugh at it; some great ones dare
But at his heart the most undaunted son
Of Fortune dreads its name and awful charms.

—Armstrong.

Visions

Gorgons, and Hydras, and Chimæras dire.—Milton.

Visions of glory, spare my aching sight!
Ye unborn ages, crowd not on my soul.

—Gray.

And like a passing thought, she fled
In light away.

—Burns.

Fond man! the vision of a moment made!
Dream of a dream! and shadow of a shade!

—Young.

But shapes that come not at an earthy call,
Will not depart when mortal voices bid.

—Wordsworth.

My thoughts by night are often filled

With visions false as fair:

For in the past alone, I build

My castles in the air.

—Thos. Love Peacock.

The people's prayer, the glad diviner's
themel
The young men's vision, and the old men's dream!

—Dryden.

O visions ill foreseen! Better had I Liv'd ignorant of future, so had borne
By part of evil only.

—Milton.

An angel stood and met my gaze,
Through the low doorway of my tent;
The tent is struck, the vision stays;
I only know she came and went.

—Lowell.

It is a dream, sweet child! a waking dream,
A blissful certainty, a vision bright,
Of that rare happiness, which even on earth
Heaven gives to those it loves.

—Longfellow.

Hence the fool's paradise, the statesman's scheme,
The air-built castle, and the golden dream,
The maid's romantic wish, the chemist's
flame,
And poet's vision of eternal fame.—Pope.

Our revels now are ended. These, our actors,

As I foretold you, were all spirits, and
Are melted into air, into thin air;
And, like the baseless fabric of this vision,
The cloud-capped towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve,
And, like this insubstantial pageant faded,
Leave not a rack behind.

—Shakespeare.

Abou Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase!) Awoke one night from a deep dream of
peace,

An saw, within the moonlight in his room
Making it rich, and like a lily in bloom,
An angel, writing in a book of gold;
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the presence in the room he said—
"What writest thou?" The Vision raised its head,

And, with a look made all of sweet accord, Answered, "The names of those who love
the Lord."

—Leigh Hunt.

Visitors

Fish and visitors smell in three days.—Franklin.

Visits are unsatiable devourers of time, and fit only for those who, if they did not visit, would do nothing.—
Cowper.

Visits are for the most part neither more nor less than inventions for discharging upon our neighbors some what of our own unendurable weight.

—Nicole.

Vituperation

The bitter clamour of two eager tongues.—Shakespeare.

For evil deeds may better than bad words be borne.—Spenser.

When he (Luther) was angry, invectives rushed from him like boulder rocks down a mountain torrent in flood.—Erasmus.

Scurrility has no object in view but incivility: if it is uttered from feelings of petulance, it is mere abuse; if it is spoken in a joking manner, it may be considered raillery.—Cicero.

Less than we imagine, from abusive words in controversy, does one individual, who is the vilified object, suffer harm. Vials of wrath in constant use, like uncorked bottles, lose the potency of their contents from too much exposure to the air; and disputants laugh in each other's faces after having with hard adjectives metaphorically boxed one another's ears.—Bartol.

Vivacity

Vivacity is the health of the spirit.
—Balzac.

Vivacity is the gift of woman.—Addison.

Vivacity in youth is often mistaken for genius, and solidity for dullness.—Colton.

The vivacity that augments with years is not far from folly.—Rochefoucauld.

Vocation

'Tis not sin for a man to labor in his vocation.—Shakespeare.

He that hath a trade hath an estate, and he that hath a calling hath an office of profit and honor.—Benjamin Franklin.

Every individual has a place to fill in the world, and is important, in some respect, whether he chooses to be so or not.—Hawthorne.

—One must espouse some pursuit, taking it kindly at heart and with enthusiasm.—A. Bronson Alcott.

Now, my masters, happy man be his dole, say I; every man to his business.
—Shakespeare.

A vocation is born to us all; happily most of us meet promptly our twin,—occupation.—Balzac.

When we have learned to offer up every duty connected with our situation in life as a sacrifice to God, a settled employment becomes just a settled habit of prayer.—Thomas Erskine.

The highest excellence is seldom attained in more than one vocation. The roads leading to distinction in separate pursuits diverge, and the nearer we approach the one, the farther we recede from the other.—Bovee.

Of all paths a man could strike into, there is, at any given moment, a best path for every man,—a thing which, here and now, it were of all things wisest for him to do; which, could he but be led or driven to do, he were then doing like a man, as we phrase it. His success, in such a case, were complete, his felicity a maximum.—Carlyle.

Never let your love for your profession overshadow your religious feeling. Depend on it that religion will strengthen, not weaken, your energies, and will not only make you a better sailor, but a superior man. Professional studies are not to be neglected; but, on the other hand, take care how you fall into the common error of believing they are the remedy for all the ills of life.—B. R. Haydon.

Voice

The warder of the mind.—Rousseau.

The voice is the flower of beauty.—Zeno.

Thy voice is sweet as if it took its music from thy face.—L. E. Landon.

The voice of the people is the voice of God.—Hesiod.

Thy voice is a celestial melody.—Longfellow.

The human voice is the organ of the soul.—Longfellow.

My heart leaps at the trumpet's voice.—Addison.

The music of the heart.—Akenside.

Canst thou thunder with a voice like him?—Bible.

The soft contralto notes of a woman's voice are born in the immediate region of the heart.—Alfred de Musset.

Her voice was ever soft, gentle, and low; an excellent thing in woman.—Shakespeare.

Her voice was like the voice the stars
Had when they sang together.
—Dante Gabriel Rossetti.

The devil hath not, in all his quiver's choice,
An arrow for the heart like a sweet voice.
—Byron.

Her voice changed like a bird's:
There grew more of the music and less of the words.
—Robert Browning.

The tones of human voices mightier than strings or brass to move the soul.
—Klopstock.

A lovely countenance is the fairest of all sights, and the sweetest harmony is the sound of the voice of her whom we love.—Bruyère.

There is in the voice of a menaced man, who calls you, something imperious, which subdues and commands.—
M. de Martignac.

Two voices are there; one is of the sea,
One of the mountains: each a mighty voice.
—Wordsworth.

Mirah's was the sort of voice that gives the impression of being meant, like a bird's wooing, for an audience near and beloved.—George Eliot.

How sweetly sounds the voice of a good woman! It is so seldom heard that when it speaks, it ravishes all senses.—Massinger.

Oh, there is something in that voice that reaches
The innermost recesses of my spirit!
—Longfellow.

Her voice is soft; not shrill and like the lark's, but tenderer, graver, almost hoarse at times! As though the earnestness of love prevailed and quelled all shriller music.—Barry Cornwall.

The Angel ended, and in Adam's ear
So charming left his voice, that he awhile Thought him still speaking, still stood fix'd to hear.
—Milton.

A sweet voice, a little indistinct and muffled, which caresses and does not thrill; an utterance which glides on without emphasis, and lays stress only on what is deeply felt.—George Sand.

Her silver voice
Is the rich music of a summer bird, Heard in the still night, with its passionate cadence.
—Longfellow.

The voice so sweet, the words so fair,
As some soft chime had stroked the air;
And though the sound had parted thence,
Still left an echo in the sense.
—Ben Jonson.

His voice no touch of harmony admits,
Irregularly deep, and shrill by fits.
The two extremes appear like man and wife Coupled together for the sake of strife.
—Churchill.

Reader, when that which thou lovedst has long vanished from the earth or from thy fancy, then will nevertheless the beloved voice come back, and bring with it all thy old tears, and the disconsolate heart which has shed them.—Richter.

To a nice ear, the quality of a voice is singularly affecting. Its depth seems to be allied to feeling; at least, the contralto notes alone give an adequate sense of pathos. They are born near the heart.—Tuckerman.

The voice is a human sound which nothing inanimate can perfectly imitate. It has an authority and an insinuating property which writing lacks. It is not merely so much air, but air modulated and impregnated with life.—Joubert.

Some glances of real beauty may be seen in their faces who dwell in true meekness. There is a harmony in the sound of that voice to which divine love gives utterance, and some appearance of right order in their temper and conduct whose passions are regulated.—John Woolman.

How often you are irresistibly drawn to a plain, unassuming woman, whose soft silvery tones render her positively attractive! In the social circle, how pleasant it is to hear a woman talk in that low key which always characterizes the true lady. In the sanctuary of home, how such a voice soothes the fretful child and cheers the weary husband!—Lamb.

How wonderful is the human voice! It is indeed the organ of the soul! The intellect of man sits enthroned visibly upon his forehead and in his eye; and the heart of man is written upon his countenance. But the soul reveals itself in the voice only, as God revealed himself to the prophet of old, in "the still, small voice," and in a voice from the burning bush. The soul of man is audible, not visible. A sound alone betrays the flowing of the eternal fountain, invisible to man!—Longfellow.

Voluptuousness

Music arose with its voluptuous swell.—Byron.

Voluptuous as the first approach of sleep.—Byron.

I had often heard Mentor say, that the voluptuous were never brave, and I now found by experience that it was true: for the Cyprians whose jollity had been so extravagant and tumultuous, now sunk under a sense of their danger and wept like women. I heard nothing but the screams of terror and the wailings of hopeless distress. Some lamented the loss of pleasures that were never to return; but none had presence of mind either to undertake or direct the navigation of the menaced vessel.—Fenelon.

Voluptuousness, like justice, is blind, but that is the only resemblance between them.—Pascal.

I had rather eleven died nobly for their country than one voluptuously surfeit out of action.—Shakespeare.

What pleasure can those overhappy persons know, who, from their affluence and luxury, always eat before they are hungry and drink before they are thirsty?—Richardson.

The rich and luxurious may claim an exclusive right to those pleasures which are capable of being purchased by pelf, in which the mind has no enjoyment, and which only afford a temporary relief to languor by steeping the senses in forgetfulness; but in the precious pleasures of the intellect, so easily accessible by all mankind, the great have no exclusive privilege; for such enjoyments are only to be procured by our own industry.—Zimmermann.

Votes

I court not the votes of the fickle mob.—Horace.

If we could but weigh in place of counting votes.—Alexander H. Everett.

No country can find eternal peace and comfort where the vote of Judas Iscariot is as good as the vote of the Saviour of mankind.—Carlyle.

It may be conjectured that it is cheaper in the long run to lift men up than to hold them down, and that the ballot in their hands is less dangerous to society than a sense of wrong is in their heads.—Lowell.

Vowels

We are little airy creatures,
All of different voice and features;
One of us in glass is set,
One of us you'll find in jet,
T'other you may see in tin,
And the fourth a box within.
If the fifth you should pursue,
It can never fly from you. —Swift.

Vows

Men's vows are women's traitors.—
Shakespeare.

Hasty resolutions are of the nature of vows; and to be equally avoided.—
William Penn.

Those mouth-made vows, which break themselves in swearing.—Shakespeare.

All unnecessary vows are folly, because they suppose a prescience of the future, which has not been given us.—
Johnson.

The gods are deaf to hot and peevish vows; they are polluted offerings, more abhorred than spotted livers in the sacrifice.—Shakespeare.

The vows that woman makes to her fond lover are only fit to be written on air or on the swiftly passing stream.—Catullus.

Make no vows to perform this or that; it shows no great strength, and makes thee ride behind thyself.—
Fuller.

No man takes or keeps a vow,
But just as he sees others do;
Nor are they 'blig'd to be so brittle
As not to yield and bow a little:
For as best temper'd blades are found,
Before they break, to bend quite round;
So truest oaths are still more tough,
And tho' they bow, are breaking proof.
—Butler.

Vulgarity

Success will popularize the grossest vulgarity.—Alfred Bougeart.

A rank soil, nay, a dunghill, will produce beautiful flowers.—Boswell.

Vulgarity is more obvious in satin than in homespun.—N. P. Willis.

Vulgarity is setting store by the things which are seen.—Lady Morgan.

Flourishing vulgarity is more unconscious than wicked; a destitute refinement is a great deal more capable of bearing malice.—John Weiss.

Vulgar minds refuse or crouch beneath their load; the brave bear theirs
without repining.—Thomson.

To show us what a miserable, credulous, deluded thing that creature is, called the vulgar.—Milton.

To endeavor to work upon the vulgar with fine sense is like attempting to hew blocks with a razor.—Pope.

The manner of a vulgar man hath freedom without ease, and the manner of a gentleman hath ease without freedom.—Shenstone.

As to the pure all things are pure,
so the common mind sees far more vulgarity in others than the mind developed in genuine refinement.—
George MacDonald.

The fastidious taste will find offence in the occasional vulgarisms, or what we now call slang, which not a few of our writers seem to have affected.—Coleridge.

A vulgar man is captious and jealous and impetuous about trifles. He suspects himself to be slighted, and thinks everything that is said is meant for him.—Chesterfield.

He whom common, gross, or stale objects allure, and when obtained, content, is a vulgar being, incapable of greatness in thought or action.—Lavater.

Disorder in a drawing-room is vulgar; in an antiquary's study, not; the black battle-stain on a soldier's face is not vulgar, but the dirty face of a housemaid is.—Ruskin.

The vulgarity of inanimate things requires time to get accustomed to;
but living, breathing, bustling, plot-ting, planning, human vulgarity is a species of moral ipecacuanha, enough to destroy any comfort.—Carlyle.

W

Walking

If you are for a merry jaunt,
I will try for once who can foot it farthest.—Dryden.

The art of walking is at once suggestive of the dignity of man. Progressive motion alone implies power, but in almost every other instance it seems a power gained at the expense of self-possession.—Tuckerman.

The sum of the whole is this: walk and be happy, walk and be healthy. "The best of all ways to lengthen our days" is not, as Mr. Thomas Moore has it, "to steal a few hours from night, my love;" but, with leave be it spoken, to walk steadily and with a purpose. The wandering man knows of certain ancients, far gone in years, who have staved off infirmities and dissolution by earnest walking,—hale fellows close upon eighty and ninety, but brisk as boys.—Dickens.

Want

Nothing makes men sharper than want.—Addison.

Our necessities never equal our wants.—Franklin.

The keener the want, the lustier the growth.—Wendell Phillips.

How few our real wants, and how vast our imaginary ones!—Lavater.

If any one say that he has seen a just man in want of bread, I answer that it was in some place where there was no other just man.—St. Clement.

Hundreds would never have known want if they had not first known waste.—Spurgeon.

He can feel no little wants who is in pursuit of grandeur.—Lavater.

It is not from nature, but from education and habits that our wants are chiefly derived.—Fielding.

God forbid that such a scoundrel as want should dare approach me!—Swift.

Every want that stimulates the breast becomes a source of pleasure when redressed.—Goldsmith.

Constantly choose rather to want less, than to have more.—Thomas a Kempis.

Human life is in constant want, and ought to be a constant prayer.—S. Osgood.

The relief that is afforded to mere want, as want, tends to increase that want.—Whately.

The miser is as much in want of what he has, as of what he has not.—Syrus.

The stoical scheme of supplying our wants by lopping off our desires is like cutting off our feet when we want shoes.—Swift.

Every one is the poorer in proportion as he has more wants, and counts not what he has, but wishes only what he has not.—Manilius.

The fewer our wants the nearer we resemble the gods.—Socrates.

We should wish for few things with eagerness, if we perfectly knew the nature of that which was the object of our desire.—Rochefoucauld.

Great wants proceed from great wealth; but they are undutiful children, for they sink wealth down to poverty.—Henry Home.

Wants awaken intellect. To gratify them disciplines intellect. The keener the want the lustier the growth.—Wendell Phillips.

Where necessity ends, curiosity begins; and no sooner are we supplied with everything that nature can command than we sit down to contrive artificial appetites.—Dr. Johnson.

Nature has provided for the exigency of privation, by putting the measure of our necessities far below the measure of our wants. Our necessities are to our wants as Falstaff's pennyworth of bread to his any quantity of sack.—Bovee.

We are ruined, not by what we really want, but by what we think we do; therefore never go abroad in search of your wants; if they be real wants, they will come home in search of you; for he that buys what he does not want will soon want what he cannot buy.—Colton.

The grave Sir Gilbert holds it for a rule, That ev'ry man in want is knave or fool. "God cannot love (says Blunt, with tearless eyes)

The wretch he starves"—and piously denies;

But the good bishop, with a meeker air, Admits and leaves them Providence's care.

—Pope.

War

War is science of destruction.—John S. C. Abbott.

So ends the bloody business of the day.—Homer.

A day of battle is a day of harvest for the devil.—William Hooke.

My sentence is for open war.—Milton.

Horribly stuffed with epithets of war.—Shakespeare.

The brazen throat of war.—Milton.

There are few die well that die in a battle.—Shakespeare.

There never was a good war or a bad peace.—Benj. Franklin.

Battle's magnificently stern array! —Byron.

War cannot be put on a certain allowance.—Archidamus III.

There is war in the skies!—Lord Lytton.

I hate war, for it spoils conversation.—Fontenelle.

In war the olive branch of peace is of use.—Ovid.

War never leaves, where it found a nation.—Burke.

The fortune of war is always doubtful.—Seneca.

The crystal-pointed tents from hill to hill.—E. C. Stedman.

Slavery is also as ancient as war, and war as human nature.—Voltaire.

I propose to fight it out on this line, if it takes all summer.—Grant.

They shall have wars and pay for their presumption.—Shakespeare.

War is a crime which involves all other crimes.—Brougham.

War is the corruption and disgrace of man.—Thomson.

The guard dies but never surrenders.—Rougemont.

To the victors belong the spoils of the enemy.—William Learned Marcy.

War disorganizes, but it is to re-organize.—Emerson.

The law is silent during war.—Cicero.

Christianity hath harmonized the conduct of war.—Paley.

A wicked tyrant is better than a wicked war.—Luther.

The feast of vultures, and the waste of life.—Byron.

Civil wars leave nothing but tombs.—Lamartine.

War, war is still the cry; "War even to the knife!"—Byron.

Better pointed bullets than pointed speeches.—Bismarck.

To murder thousands takes a specious name.—Young.

All delays are dangerous in war.—Dryden.

Their flag was furled, and mute their drum.—Sir Walter Scott.

Men practice war; beasts do not.—Seneca.

The wounds of civil war are deepest.—Lucan.

A man-of-war is the best ambassador.—Cromwell.

The worse the man, the better the soldier.—Napoleon I.

Cry "Havock," and let slip the dogs of war.—Shakespeare.

I prefer the hardest terms of peace to the most just war.—C. J. Fox.

And high above the fight the lonely bugle grieves.—Grenville Mellin.

We kind o' thought Christ went agin war an' pillage.—Lowell.

When Greeks joined Greeks, then was the tug of war!—Nathaniel Lee.

To be prepared for war is one of the most effectual means of preserving peace.—Washington.

Death is the universal salt of states; Blood is the base of all things—law and war.—Bailey.

War's a brain-spattering, windpipe-slitting art,
Unless her cause by right be sanctified.—Byron.

Cease to consult, the time for action calls,
War, horrid war, approaches to your walls!—Pope.

The chance of war
Is equal, and the slayer oft is slain.—Homer.

Thus far into the bowels of the land
Have we march'd on without impediment.—Shakespeare.

Ingenious to their ruin, every age improves the art and instruments of rage.—Waller.

The fire-eyed maid of smoky war
All hot and bleeding will we offer them.—Shakespeare.

Let's march without the noise of threat'ning drum.—Shakespeare.

So frown'd the mighty combatants, that hell Grew darker at their frown.—Milton.

Sound trumpets! let our bloody colors wave!
And either victory, or else a grave.—Shakespeare.

He which hath no stomach to this fight,
Let him depart; his passport shall be made.—Shakespeare.

The warrior who cultivates his mind polishes his arms.—De Boufflers.

'Tis a principle of war that when you can use the lightning, 'tis better than cannon.—Napoleon I.

Intestine war no more our passions wage,
And giddy factions bear away their rage.—Pope.

War is delightful to those who have had no experience of it.—Erasmus. . .

Who asks whether the enemy were defeated by strategy or valor?—Virgil

War in men's eyes shall be a monster of iniquity in the good time coming.—Charles Mackay.

Religious canons, civil laws, are cruel; then what should war be?—Shakespeare.

Every creature lives in a state of war by nature.—Swift.

A great country can have no such thing as a little war.—Wellington.

War requires three things,—money, money, money.—Montecuculi.

I heard the bullets whistle; and believe me, there is something charming in the sound.—Washington.

Let the only walls the foe shall scale
Be ramparts of the dead!
—Paul H. Hayne.

War is a terrible trade; but in the cause that is righteous sweet is the smell of powder.—Longfellow.

War and Niagara thunder to a music of their own.—Wendell Phillips.

Now hear the trumpets' clangor from afar, and all the dreadful harmony of war.—Tickell.

Even in a righteous cause force is a fearful thing.—Schiller.

War's a game, which, were their subjects wise,
Kings would not play at. —Cowper.

He is come to open
The purple testament of bleeding war.
—Shakespeare.

Grim-visag'd war hath smoothed his wrinkled front.—Shakespeare.

Most of the debts of Europe represent condensed drops of blood.—Beecher.

Providence for war is the best prevention of it.—Bacon.

War its thousands slays; peace its ten thousands.—Dr. Porteus.

The bodies of men, munition, and money may justly be called the sinews of war.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

The words of his mouth were smoother than butter, but war was in his heart.—Bible.

Advise how war may, best upheld, move by her two main nerves, iron and gold.—Milton.

For those that run away, and fly,
Take place at least o' th' enemy.
—Butler.

Blow, wind! come, wrack!
At least we'll die with harness on our back.
—Shakespeare.

If Christian nations were nations of Christians, there would be no wars.—Soame Jenyns.

War, that mad game the world so loves to play.
—Swift.

In all the trade of war, no feat
Is nobler than a brave retreat. —Butler.

Food for powder, food for powder;
they'll fill a pit as well as better: tush,
man, mortal men, mortal men.—
Shakespeare.

Civil war is a momentous evil.
* * * Civil war needs momentous and solemn justification.—Wendell Phillips.

Nothing except a battle lost can be half so melancholy as a battle won.— Duke of Wellington.

When all is past, it is humbling to tread o'er the weltering field of the tombless dead.—Byron.

The king who makes war on his enemies tenderly distresses his subjects
most cruelly.—Johnson.

Terrible as is war, it yet displays the spiritual grandeur of man daring to defy his mightiest hereditary enemy —death.—Heine.

Let the gulled fool the toil of war
pursue, where bleed the many to enrich the few.—Shenstone.

The fate of war is to be exalted in the morning, and low enough at night! There is but one step from triumph to ruin.—Napoleon I.

Black it stood as night
Fierce as ten furies, terrible as hell,
And shook a dreadful dart. —Milton.

War will never yield but to the principles of universal justice and love; and these have no sure root but in the religion of Jesus Christ.—Channing.

The sight of a battlefield after the fight is enough to inspire princes with a love of peace and a horror of war.—Napoleon I.

The decision will come only from God, from the God of battles, when He lets fall from His hand the iron dice of destiny.—Bismarck.

Battles are never the end of war; for the dead must be buried and the cost of the conflict must be paid.—James A. Garfield.

All history is the decline of war, though the slow decline. All that society has yet gained is mitigation; the doctrine of the right of war still remains.—Emerson.

The soldier at the same time may shoot out his prayer to God, and aim his pistol at his enemy, the one better hitting the mark for the other.—Thomas Fuller.

Fly from wrath; sad be the sights and bitter fruits of war; a thousand furies wait on wrathful swords.—Spenser.

Cannon to right of them, cannon to left of them, cannon in front of them, volleyed and thundered.—Tennyson.

The necessity of war, which among human actions is the most lawless, hath some kind of affinity with the necessity of law.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Take my word for it, if you had seen but one day of war, you would pray to Almighty God that you might never see such a thing again.—Wellington.

The whole art of war consists in getting at what is on the other side of the hill, or, in other words, in learning what we do not know from what we do.—Duke of Wellington.

War is a child that devours its nurses one after another, until it is claimed by its true parents.—O. W. Holmes.

Theirs not to make reply,
Theirs not to reason why,
Theirs but to do and die. —Tennyson.

War, when decisive, has a quick and practical philosophy of its own, and the difficulties that seem largest in its progress usually vanish at its close.—Lord Lytton.

The fearful thunder-roar of red-breathed cannon and the wailing cry of myriad victims filled the air.—G. D. Prentice.

Let war be so carried on that no other object may seem to be sought but the acquisition of peace.—Cicero.

Battle, with the sword, has cut many a Gordian knot in twain which all the wit of East and West, of Northern and Border statesmen, could not untie.—Emerson.

Civil wars are the greatest of evils. They are inevitable, if we wish to reward merit, for all will say that they are meritorious.—Pascal.

Even in a righteous cause force is a fearful thing; God only helps when men can help no more.—Schiller.

Some general officers should pay a stricter regard to truth than to call the depopulating other countries the service of their own.—Fielding.

The measure of civilization in a people is to be found in its just appreciation of the wrongfulness of war.—Helps.

War kills men, and men deplore the loss; but war also crushes bad principles and tyrants, and so saves societies.—Colton.

War educates the senses, calls into action the will, perfects the physical constitution, brings men into such swift and close collision in critical moments that man measures man.—Emerson.

A steady hand in military affairs is more requisite than in peace, because an error committed in war may prove irremediable.—Bacon.

Strategy is the most important department of the art of war, and strategical skill is the highest and rarest function of military genius.—George S. Hillard.

The nations bleed where'er her steps she turns; the groan still deepens, and the combat burns.—Pope.

We fight to great disadvantage when we fight with those who have nothing to lose.—Guicciardini.

When discord dreadful bursts her brazen bars,
And shatters locks to thunder forth her wars. —Horace.

No terms except an unconditional and immediate surrender can be accepted. I propose to move immediately upon your works.—U. S. Grant.

Woe to the man that first did teach the cursed steel to bite in his own flesh, and make way to the living spirit!—Spenser.

There is strength and a fierce instinct, even in common souls, to bear up manhood with a stormy joy when red swords meet in lightning.—Mrs. Hemans.

War 'twixt you twain would be as if the world should cleave, and that slain men should solder up the rift.—Shakespeare.

He who makes war his profession cannot be otherwise than vicious. War makes thieves, and peace brings them to the gallows.—Machiavelli.

Great warriors, like great earthquakes, are principally remembered for the mischief they have done.—Bovee.

The armorers, accomplishing the knights,
With busy hammers closing rivets up,
Give dreadful note of preparation. —Shakespeare.

Lay on, Macduff,
And damn'd be him that first cries "Hold,
enough!" —Shakespeare.

From camp to camp through the foul womb of night
The hum of either army stilly sounds. —Shakespeare.

Tut, tut; good enough to toss; food for powder, food for powder; they'll fill a pit as well as better.—Shakespeare.

Now for the bare-pick'd bone of majesty
Doth dogged war bristle his angry crest
And snarleth in the gentle eyes of peace. —Shakespeare.

The cannons have their bowels full of wrath,
And ready mounted are they to spit forth
Their iron indignation 'gainst your walls. —Shakespeare.

Once more unto the breach, dear friends,
once more;
Or close the wall up with our English dead. —Shakespeare.

If the cause and end of war be justifiable, all the means that appear necessary to the end are justifiable also.—Paley.

From hence, let fierce contending nations
know
What dire effects from civil discord flow. —Addison.

To overcome in battle, and subdue
Nations, and bring home spoils with infinite Man-slaughter, shall be held the highest pitch
Of human glory. —Milton.

March to the battle-field,
The foe is now before us;
Each heart is Freedom's shield,
And heaven is shining o'er us. —B. E. O'Meara.

"Go, with a song of peace," said Fingal; "go, Ullin, to the king of swords. Tell him that we are mighty in war; that the ghosts of our foes are many."—Ossian.

Arms on armor clashing bray'd
Horrible discord, and the madding wheels
Of brazen chariots ray'd; dire was the noise
Of conflict. —Milton.

She saw her sons with purple death expire,
Her sacred domes involved in rolling fire,
A dreadful series of intestine wars,
Inglorious triumphs and dishonest scars. —Pope.

In the lost battle,
Borne down by the flying.
Where mingles war's rattle
With groans of the dying.—Scott.

The combat deepens. On, ye brave,
Who rush to glory, or the grave!
Wave, Munich! all thy banners wave,
And charge with all thy chivalry. —Campbell.

The Assyrian came down like the wolf on the fold,
And his cohorts were gleaming in purple and gold. —Byron.

For he who fights and runs away
May live to fight another day;
But he who is in battle slain
Can never rise and fight again. —Goldsmith.

Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the Judgment Day;
Love and tears for the Blue,
Tears and love for the Gray. —Francis M. Finch.

By the rude bridge that arched the flood,
Their flag to April's breeze unfur'd;
Here once the embattl'd farmers stood,
And fired the shot heard round the world. —Emerson.

War suspends the rules of moral obligation, and what is long suspended is in danger of being totally abrogated. Civil wars strike deepest of all into the manners of the people.—Burke.

A great and lasting war can never be supported on this principle (patriotism) alone. It must be aided by a prospect of interest, or some reward.—George Washington.

Every war involves a greater or less relapse into barbarism. War, indeed, in its details, is the essence of inhumanity. It dehumanizes. It may save the state, but it destroys the citizen.—Bovee.

They came with banner, spear, and shield;
And it was proved in Bosworth field,
Not long the Avenger was withstood—
Earth help'd him with the cry of blood. —Wordsworth.

Ez fer war, call it murder,—
Ther you hev it plain and flat;
I don't want to go no furdur
Than my Testymet fer that.—Lowell.

To arms! to arms! ye brave!
Th' avenging sword unsheathe,
March on! march on! all hearts resolved
On victory or death! —Joseph Rouget De Lisle.

Hence jarring sectaries may learn
Their real interest to discern;
That brother should not war with brother,
And worry and devour each other. —Cowper.

If war has its chivalry and its pageantry, it has also its hideousness and its demoniac woe. Bullets respect not beauty. They tear out the eye, and shatter the jaw, and rend the cheek.—Abbott.

The blood of man should never be shed but to redeem the blood of man.
It is well shed for our family, for our friends, for our God, for our country, for our kind. The rest is vanity; the rest is crime.—Burke.

The natural principle of war is to do the most harm to our enemy with the least harm to ourselves; and this of course, is to be effected by strata-gem.—Washington Irving.

Laws are commanded to hold their tongues among arms; and tribunals fall to the ground with the peace they are no longer able to uphold.—Burke.

A wise minister would rather preserve peace than gain a victory, because he knows that even the most successful war leaves nations generally more poor, always more profligate, than it found them.—Colton.

Wars, therefore, are to be undertaken for this end, that we may live in peace, without being injured: but when we obtain the victory, we must preserve those enemies who behaved without cruelty or inhumanity during the war.—Cicero.

Kings play at war unfairly with republics; they can only lose some earth, and some creatures they value as little, while republics lose in every soldier a part of themselves.—Landor.

A nation is not worthy to be saved if, in the hour of its fate, it will not gather up all its jewels of manhood and life, and go down into the conflict, however bloody and doubtful, resolved on measureless ruin or complete success.—Garfield.

Thus, as the stream and ocean greet,
With waves that madden as they meet—
Thus join the bands whom mutual wrong,
And fate and fury drive along.—Byron.

With common men
There needs too oft the show of war to keep The substance of sweet peace, and for a king,
'Tis sometimes better to be fear'd than lov'd.—Byron.

War is one of the greatest plagues than can afflict humanity: it destroys religion, it destroys states, it destroys families. Any scourge, in fact, is preferable to it. Famine and pestilence become as nothing in comparison with it.—Martin Luther.

Be thou as lightning in the eyes of France;
For ere thou can'st report I will be there,
The thunder of my cannon shall be heard;
So hencel Be thou the trumpet of our wrath.—Shakespeare.

Dying like men, though buried in your dunghills,
They shall be fam'd; for there the sun shall greet them,
And draw their honors reeking up to
heaven;
Leaving their earthly parts to choke your clime.—Shakespeare.

And all the gods go with you! upon your sword
Sit laurel victory; and smooth success
Be strew'd before your feet.—Shakespeare.

In peace there's nothing so becomes a man as modest stillness and humility; but when the blast of war flows in our ears, then imitate the action of the tiger.—Shakespeare.

Bloody wars at first began,
The artificial plague of man,
That from his own invention rise,
To scourge his own iniquities.—Butler.

Shall we upon the footing of our land
Send fair-play orders, and make compromise,
Insinuation, parley, and base truce,
To arms invasive?—Shakespeare.

Now all the youth of England are on fire,
And silken dalliance in the wardrobe lies;
Now thrive the armorers, and honor's
thought
Reigns solely in the breast of every man.—Shakespeare.

We must have bloody noses and crack'd crowns,
And pass them current too. God's me, my horse!—Shakespeare.

The nimble gunner
With linstock now the devilish cannon touches,
And down goes all before them.—Shakespeare.

Scots, wha hae wi' Wallace bled;
Scots, wham Bruce has after led,
Welcome to your gory bed,
Or to victory!—Burns.

War, he sung, is toil and trouble;
Honor, but an empty bubble;
Never ending, still beginning,
Fighting still, and still destroying.—Dryden.

Put in their hands thy bruising irons of
wrath,
That they may crush down with heavy fall
The usurping helmets of our adversaries.—Shakespeare.

And when the fight becomes a chase,
Those win the day that win the race;
And that which would not pass in fights,
Has done the feat with easy fights.—Butler.

I drew this gallant head of war,
And cull'd these fiery spirits from the
world,
To outlook conquest and to win renown
Even in the jaws of danger and of death.—Shakespeare.

One to destroy, is murder by the law,
And gibbets keep the lifted hand in awe;
To murder thousands takes a specious name, War's glorious art, and gives immortal fame.—Young.

It is only necessary to make war with five things: with the maladies of the body, the ignorances of the mind, with the passions of the body, with the seditious of the city, and the discords of families.—Pythagoras.

Is it, O man, with such discordant noises,
With such accursed instruments as these,
Thou drownest Nature's sweet and kindly voices,
And jarest the celestial harmonies?
—Longfellow.

Others more mild,
Retreated in a silent valley, sing
With notes angelical to many a harp
Their own heroic deeds and hapless fall
By doom of battle. —Milton.

Some undone widow sits upon mine arm,
And takes away the use of it; and my sword,
Glued to my scabbard with wronged orphan's tears,
Will not be drawn. —Massinger.

Our battle is more full of names than yours,
Our men more perfect in the use of arms,
Our armor all as strong, our cause the best;
Then reason will our hearts should be as good. —Shakespeare.

Give me the cups;
And let the kettle to the trumpet speak,
The trumpet to the cannoneer without,
The cannons to the heavens, the heavens to earth. —Shakespeare.

War! that in a moment
Lay'st waste the noblest part of the creation,
The boast and masterpiece of the great Maker,
That wears in vain th' impression of his image,
Unprivileged from thee! —Rowe.

Shall we go throw away our coats of steel,
And wrap our bodies in black mourning gowns,
Numb'ring our Ave Marias with our beads?
Or shall we on the helmets of our foes
Teil our devotion with revengeful arms
—Shakespeare.

Follow thy drum;
With man's blood paint the ground, gules, gules;
Religious canons, civil laws are cruel;
Then what should war be? —Shakespeare.

What a fine-looking thing is war!
Yet, dress it as we may, dress and feather it, daub it with gold, huzza

it, and sing swaggering songs about it,—what is it, nine times out of ten, but murder in uniform!—Douglas Jerrold.

What though the field be lost?
All is not lost; the unconquerable will,
And study of revenge, immortal hate
And courage never to submit or yield,
And what is else not to be overcome.
—Milton.

Still from the sire the son shall hear
Of the stern strife, and carnage drear,
Of Flodden's fatal field,
When shiver'd was fair Scotland's spear,
And broken was her shield! —Scott.

Hand to hand, and foot to foot:
Nothing there, save death, was mute;
Stroke, and thrust, and flash, and cry
For quarter or for victory,
Mingle there with the volleying thunder.
—Byron.

That men should kill one another for want of somewhat else to do, which is the case of all volunteers in war, seems to be so horrible to humanity that there needs no divinity to control it.—Clarendon.

War is never lenient but where it is wanton; where men are compelled to fight in self-defence, they must hate and avenge. This may be bad, but it is human nature; it is the clay as it came from the hands of the Potter. —Macaulay.

A thousand glorious actions that might claim Triumphant laurels, and immortal fame,
Confus'd in crowds of glorious actions lie,
And troops of heroes undistinguished die.
—Addison.

Fight, gentlemen of England! fight, bold yeomen!
Draw, archers, draw your arrows to the head!
Spur your proud horses hard, and ride in blood;
Amaze the welkin with your broken staves!
—Shakespeare.

I abominate war as Unchristian. I hold it the greatest of human crimes. I deem it to involve all others,—violence, blood, rapine, fraud; every-thing that can deform the character, alter the nature, and debase the name of man.—Lord Brougham.

Wars are to the body politic, what drams are to the individual. There are times when they may prevent a sudden death, but if frequently resorted to, or long persisted in, they heighten the energies only to hasten the dissolution.—Colton.

Carry his body hence!

Kings must have slaves:

Kings climb to eminence

Over men's graves:

So this man's eye is dim;

Throw the earth over him!

—Henry Austin Dobson.

Then more fierce
The conflict grew; the din of arms, the yell
Of savage rage, the shriek of agony,
The groan of death, commingled in one
sound
Of undistinguish'd horrors. —Southey.

Your breath first kindled the dead coal of wars
And brought in matter that should feed
this fire;
And now 'tis far too huge to be blown out
With that same weak wind which enkindled
it. —Shakespeare.

War, like all other situations of danger and of change, calls forth the exertion of admirable intellectual qualities and great virtues, and it is only by dwelling on these, and keeping out of sight the sufferings and sorrows, and all the crimes and evils that follow in its train, that it has its glory in the eyes of men.—Bryant.

The fate of a battle is the result of a moment, of a thought: the hostile forces advance with various combinations, they attack each other and fight for a certain time; the critical moment arrives, a mental flash decides, and the least reserve accomplishes the object.—Napoleon I.

I own my natural weakness; I have not Yet learn'd to think of indiscriminate murder Without some sense of shuddering; and the sight
Of blood, which spouts through hoary scalps, is not,
To me, a thing of triumph, nor the death
Of men surprised, a glory. —Byron.

In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparation for our defence.—James Monroe.

The death-shot hissing from afar—
The shock—the shout—the groan of war—
Reverberate along that vale,
More suited to the shepherd's tale:
Though few the numbers—theirs the strife,
That neither spares, nor speaks for life.
—Byron.

What boots the oft-repeated tale of strife,
The feast of vultures, and the waste of life?
The varying fortune of each separate field,
The fierce that vanquish, and the faint that yield?
The smoking ruin and the crumbled wall?
In this the struggle was the same with all.
—Byron.

O war, thou son of hell,
Whom angry heav'n's do make their minister,
Throw in the frozen bosoms of our part
Hot coals of vengeance!—Let no soldier fly;
He that is truly dedicate to war
Hath no self-love: nor he that loves himself. —Shakespeare.

War! war! war!
Heaven aid the right!
God move the hero's arm in the fearful
fight!
God send the women sleep in the long,
long night,
When the breasts on whose strength they leaned shall heave no more.
—E. C. Stedman.

War in men's eyes shall be
A monster of iniquity
In the good time coming.
Nations shall not quarrel then,
To prove which is the stronger;
Nor slaughter men for glory's sake;—
Wait a little longer.—Charles Mackay.

Oh, a strange hand writes for our dear son—O, stricken mother's soul!
All swims before her eyes—flashes with black—she catches the main words only; Sentences broken—gun-shot wound in the breast, cavalry skirmish, taken to hospital;
At present low, but will soon be better.
—Walt Whitman.

Of all the evils to public liberty, war is perhaps the most to be dreaded, because it comprises and develops the genius of every other. War is the parent of armies; from these proceed debt and taxes. And armies and debts and taxes are the known instruments for bringing the many under the dominion of the few.—Madison.

Use makes a better soldier than the most urgent considerations of duty,—familiarity with danger enabling him to estimate the danger. He sees how much is the risk, and is not afflicted with imagination; knows practically Marshal Saxe's rule, that every soldier killed costs the enemy his weight in lead.—Emerson.

War, even in the best state of an army, with all the alleviations of courtesy and honor, with all the correctives of morality and religion, is nevertheless so great an evil, that to engage in it without a clear necessity is a crime of the blackest dye. When the necessity is clear, it then becomes a crime to shrink from it.—Southey.

The conqueror is not so much pleased by entering into open gates, as by forcing his way. He desires not the fields to be cultivated by the patient husbandman; he would have them laid waste by fire and sword. It would be his shame to go by a way already opened.—Lucan.

Tell me, he that knows,

* * * * *
Why such daily cast of brazen cannon,
And foreign mart for implements of war:
Why such impress of shipwrights, whose sore task
Does not divide the Sunday from the week:
What might be toward, that this sweaty
haste
Doth make the night joint-laborer with the
day;
Who is't that can inform me?
—Shakespeare.

O great corrector of enormous times,
Shaker of o'er-rank states, thou grand de-cider
Of dusty and old titles, that healest with blood
The earth when it is sick, and curest the world
O' the pleurisy of people.
—Beaumont and Fletcher.

War is the matter which fills all history; and consequently the only, or almost the only, view in which we can see the external of political society is in a hostile shape. and the only actions to which we have always seen, and still see, all of them intent, are such as tend to the destruction of one another.—Burke.

All was prepared—the fire, the sword, the men
To wield them in their terrible array.
The army, like a lion from his den,
March'd forth with nerves and sinews bent to slay—
A human Hydra, issuing from its fen
To breathe destruction on its winding way, Whose heads were heroes, which cut off in vain,
Immediately in others grew again.
—Byron.

War is honorable
In those who do their native rights maintain;
In those whose swords an iron barrier are Between the lawless spoiler and the weak;
But is, in those who draw th' offensive blade
For added power or gain, sordid and depicable
As meanest office of the worldly churl.
—Joanna Baillie.

To my shame, I see
The imminent death of twenty thousand
men,
That, for a fantasy and trick of fame,
Go to their graves like beds; fight for a plot
Whereon the numbers cannot try the cause.
Which is not tomb enough, and continent,
To hide the slain. —Shakespeare.

The morning came, there stood the foe;
Stark eyed them as they stood;
Few words he spoke—"twas not a time
For moralizing mood:
"See there the enemy, my boys!
Now, strong in valor's might,
Beat them or Betty Stark will sleep
In widowhood to-night."
—J. P. Rodman.

Oh, East is East, and West is West, and never the twain shall meet Till earth and sky stand presently at God's great judgment seat;
But there is neither East nor West, border
nor breed nor birth
When two strong men stand face to face, tho' they come from the ends of the earth!
—Rudyard Kipling.

The gospel has but a forced alliance with war. Its doctrine of human brotherhood would ring strangely between the opposed ranks. The bel-lowing speech of cannon and the baptism of blood mock its liturgies and sacraments. Its gentle beatitudes would hardly serve as mottoes for defiant banners, nor its list of graces as names for ships-of-the-line.—Chapin.

Like the leaves of the forest when summer is green,
That host with their banners at sunset were seen;
Like the leaves of the forest when autumn hath blown,
That host on the morrow lay wither'd and strown!
—Byron.

War mends but few, and spoils multitudes; it legitimates rapine and authorizes murder; and these crimes must be ministered to by their lesser relatives, by covetousness and anger and pride and revenge, and heats of blood, and wilder liberty, and all the evil that can be supposed to come from or run to such cursed causes of mischief.—Jeremy Taylor.

Three hundred cannon threw up their emetic,
And thirty thousand muskets flung their pills
Like hail, to make a bloody diuretic;
Mortality! thou hast thy monthly bills!
Thy plagues, thy famines, thy physicians, yet tick,
Like the death-watch, within our ears the ills,
Past, present, and to come; but all may yield
To the true portrait of one battle-field.
—Byron.

All that the mind would shrink from, of excesses;
All that the body perpetrates, of bad;
All that we read, hear, dream, of man's distresses;
All that the devil would do, if run stark mad;
All that defies the worst which pen expresses
All by which hell is peopled, or is sad
As hell—mere mortals who their power abuse—
Was here (as heretofore and since) let loose.
—Byron.

"War," says Machiavelli, "ought to be the only study of a prince"; and, by a prince, he means every sort of State, however constituted. "He ought," says this great political doctor, "to consider peace only as a breathing-time, which gives him leisure to contrive, and furnishes ability to execute military plans." A meditation on the conduct of political societies made old Hobbes imagine that war was the state of nature.—Burke

They now to fight are gone;
Armor on armor shone;
Drum now to drum did groan,
To hear was wonder;
That with the cries they make,
The very earth did shake;
Trumpet to trumpet spake,
Thunder to thunder. —Drayton.

By heaven! it is a splendid sight to see
(For one who hath no friend, no brother there)
Their rival scarfs of mix'd embroidery,
Their various arms that glitter in the air!
What gallant war-hounds rouse them from their lair,
And gnash their fangs, loud yelling for the prey!
All join the chase, but few the triumph share;
The grave shall bear the chiefest prize away,
And havoc scarce for joy can number their array.
—Byron.

The bay-trees in our country all are with-er'd
And meteors fright the fixed stars of heaven;
The pale-fac'd moon looks bloody on the earth
And lean-look'd prophets whisper fearful change;
Rich men look sad and ruffians dance and leap,
The one in fear to lose what they enjoy,
The other to enjoy by rage and war.
—Shakespeare.

And there was mounting in hot haste: the steed,
The mustering squadron, and the clattering car,
Went pouring forward with impetuous speed,
And swiftly forming in the ranks of war;
And the deep thunder peal on peal, afar
And near; the beat of the alarming drum
Roused up the soldier ere the morning star;
While throng'd the citizens with terror dumb,
Or whispering with white lips—"The foe! they come! they come!" —Byron.

War suspends the rules of moral obligation, and what is long suspended is in danger of being totally abrogated. Civil wars strike deepest of all into the manners of the people. They vitiate their politics; they corrupt their morals; they pervert even the natural taste and relish of equity.

and justice. By teaching us to consider our fellow-citizens in a hostile light, the whole body of our nation becomes gradually less dear to us. The very names of affection and kindred, which were the bond of charity, whilst we agreed, become new incentives to hatred and rage, when the communion of our country is dissolved.—Burke.

Lay down the axe; fling by the spade;
Leave in its track the toiling plough;
The rifle and the bayonet-blade
For arms like yours were fitter now;
And let the hands that ply the pen
Quit the light task, and learn to wield
The horseman's crooked brand, and rein
The charger on the battle-field.
—Bryant.

Dreary East winds howling o'er us,
Clay-lands knee-deep spread before us;
Mire and ice and snow and sleet;
Aching backs and frozen feet;
Knees which reel as marches quicken,
Ranks which thin as corpses thicken;
While with carrion birds we eat,
Calling puddle-water sweet,
As we pledge the health of our general,
Who fares as rough as we:
What can daunt us, what can turn us, led
To death by such as he?
—Charles Kingsley.

Washington's Birthday

First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen.—
Henry Lee.

He had faith in God and in himself.
—Guizot.

The two greatest men of modern times are William III. and Washington.—Grattan.

Where Washington hath left his awful memory a light for after-times.
—Southey.

Washington, in fact, had very little private life, but was eminently a public character.—Washington Irving.

Illustrious man! deriving honor less from the splendor of his situation than from the dignity of his mind.—C. J.
Fox.

He early acquired the magic of method, which of itself works wonders.—Washington Irving

The test of the progress of mankind will be in the appreciation of the character of Washington.—Brougham.

In my idea General Washington is the greatest man; for I look upon him as the most virtuous.—Lafayette.

There is virtue in the look of a great man [after meeting Washington]. I felt myself warmed and refreshed by it during the rest of my life.—Cha-teaubriand.

Unacquainted with aught of inward agitation, untormented by the promptings of splendid ambition, Washington anticipated none of the occurrences of his life.—Guizot.

When Washington declined a military escort on the occasion of his inauguration [1789], he said, "I require no guard but the affections of the people."—Edward Everett.

Whoever would understand the character of Washington, in all its compass and grandeur, must learn it from his own writings, and from a complete history of his country during the long period in which he was the most prominent actor.—Jared Sparks.

I never say anything of a man that I have the smallest scruple of saying to him.—Washington.

To be prepared for war is one of the most effectual means of preserving peace.—Washington.

'Tis substantially true that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government.—Washington.

To the efficacy and permanency of your union a government for the whole is indispensable.—Washington.

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world.—Washington.

It is incumbent upon every person of every description to contribute to his country's welfare.—Washington.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake.—Washington.

Let us impart all the blessings we possess, or ask for ourselves, to the whole family of mankind.—Washington.

There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation.—Washington.

The name American must always exalt the just pride of patriotism.—Washington.

Every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest should be indignantly frowned upon.—Washington.

Labor to keep alive in your breast that little spark of celestial fire, conscience.—Washington.

The propitious smiles of heaven can never be expected on a nation that disregards the eternal rules of order and right, which heaven itself has ordained.—Washington.

It would be repugnant to the vital principles of our government virtually to exclude from public trusts, talents and virtue, unless accompanied by wealth.—Washington.

Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humor or caprice?—Washington.

The very idea of the power and right of the people to establish government presupposes the duty of every individual to obey the established government.—Washington.

"My brave fellows, let no sensation of satisfaction for the triumphs you have gained induce you to insult your fallen enemy. Let no shouting, no clamorous huzzaing increase their mortification. It is sufficient for us that we witness their humiliation. Posterity will huzza for us."—Washington at Yorktown.

Where is the man to be found who wishes to remain indebted for the defense of his own person and property to the exertions, the bravery, and the blood of others, without making one generous effort to repay the debt of honor and gratitude?—Washington.

If there was the same propensity in mankind for investigating the motives, as there is for censuring the conduct, of public characters, it would be found that the censure so freely bestowed is oftentimes unmerited and uncharitable.—Washington.

For a thousand years no king in Christendom has shown such greatness or given so high a type of manly virtue.—Theodore Parker.

George Washington, the brave, the wise, the good. Supreme in war, in council, and in peace. Washington, valiant, without ambition; discreet, without fear; confident, without presumption.—Dr. Andrew Lee.

More than any other individual, and as much as to one individual was possible, has he contributed to found this, our wide spreading empire, and to give to the Western World independence and freedom.—Chief Justice Marshall.

To add brightness to the sun or glory to the name of Washington is alike impossible. Let none attempt it. In solemn awe pronounce the name, and in its naked, deathless splendor leave it shining on.—Abraham Lincoln.

Let him who looks for a monument to Washington look around the United States. Your freedom, your independence, your national power, your prosperity, and your prodigious growth are a monument to him.—Kosuth.

More than all, and above all, Washington was master of himself. If there be one quality more than any other in his character which may exercise a useful control over the men of the present hour, it is the total disregard of self when in the most elevated positions for influence and example.—Charles Francis Adams.

God be thanked that in General Washington we have the picture of one such man, set where it cannot be hid, in the glorious frame of our country's early history, as an example to the Americans of to-day! May it find no small number who, living by the same great principles, may in no long time work in our land a moral revolution—a regeneration into a purer, sweeter, and nobler life.—James T. Bixby, D.D.

He stands the noblest leader who ever was entrusted with his country's life. His patience under provocation, his calmness in danger, and lofty courage when all others despaired, his prudent delays when delay was best, and his quick and resistless blows when action was possible, his magnanimity to defamers and generosity to his foes, his ambition for his country and unselfishness for himself, his sole desire of freedom and independence for America, and his only wish to return after victory to private life, have all combined to make him, by the unanimous judgment of the world, the foremost figure of history.—Chauncey M. Depew.

It must, indeed, create astonishment that, placed in circumstances so critical, and filling a station so conspicuous, the character of Washington should not once have been called in question; that he should, in no instance, have been accused either of improper insolence or of mean submission, in his transactions with foreign nations. It has been reserved for him to run the race of glory without experiencing the smallest interruption to the brilliancy of his career. The breath of censure has not dared to impeach the purity of his conduct, nor the eye of envy to raise its malignant glance to the elevation of his virtues. Such has been the transcendent merit and the unparalleled fate of this illustrious man!—Charles James Fox in the British Parliament, 1794.

His genius, it is true, was of a peculiar kind; the genius of character, of thought, and the objects of thought solidified and concentrated into active faculty. He belongs to that rare class of men—rare as Homers and Miltons, rare as Platos and Newtons—who have impressed their characters upon nations without pampering national vices. Such men have natures broad enough to include all the facts of a people's practical life, and deep enough to discern the spiritual laws which underlie, animate, and govern those facts.—Edwin F. Whipple.

But perhaps he excels all the great men that ever lived in the steadiness of his adherence to his maxims of life, and in the uniformity of his conduct to the same maxims. These maxims, though wise, were yet not so remarkable for their wisdom as for their authority over his life; for if there were any errors in his judgment (and he discovered as few as any man), we know of no blemishes in his virtue. He was the patriot without reproach; he loved his country enough to hold his success in serving it an ample recompense. Thus far self-love and love of country coincided; but when his country needed sacrifices few could, or perhaps would, be willing to make, he did not even hesitate. This was virtue in its most exalted character.—Fisher Ames.

Sound, sound the trump of Fame!
Let Washington's great name
Ring through the world with loud applause;
Let every clime to Freedom dear
Listen with a joyful ear.
With equal skill, with god-like power,
He governs in the fearful hour
Of horrid war, or guides with ease,
The happier times of honest peace.
—Jos. Hopkinson.

The General is sorry to be informed that the foolish and wicked practise of profane cursing and swearing, a vice hitherto little known in an American army, is growing into fashion. He hopes the officers will, by example as well as influence, endeavor to check it, and that both they and the men will reflect that we can have little hope of the blessing of heaven on our arms. If we insult it by our impiety and folly. Added to this, it is a vice so mean and low, without any temptation, that every man of sense and character detests and despises it.—Washington.

O noble brow, so wise in thought!
O heart, so true! O soul unbought!
O eye, so keen to pierce the night
And guide the "ship of state" aright!
O life, so simple, grand and free,
The humblest still may turn to thee.
O king, uncrowned! O prince of men!
When shall we see thy like again?

—Mrs. Mary Wingate.

Great knightly soul who came in time to serve his country's need,
To serve her with the timely word and with the valiant deed,
Along the ages brightening as endless cycles run
Undimmed and gaining luster in the twentieth century's sun,
First in our Hall of Fame we write the name all folk may ken,
As first in war, and first in peace, first with his countrymen.—Margaret Sangster.

A true son of nature was George Washington—of nature in her brightest intelligence and noblest mold; and the difficulty, if such there be, in comprehending him, is only that of reviewing from a single standpoint the vast procession of those civil and military achievements which filled nearly half a century of his life, and in realizing the magnitude of those qualities which were requisite to their performance—the difficulty of fashioning in our minds a pedestal broad enough to bear the towering figure, whose greatness is diminished by nothing but the perfection of its proportions.—John W. Daniel.

Grand and manifold as were its phases, there is yet no difficulty in understanding the character of Washington. He was no Veiled Prophet. He never acted a part. Simple, natural, and unaffected, his life lies before us—a fair and open manuscript. He disdained the arts which wrap power in mystery in order to magnify

it. He practised the profound diplomacy of truthful speech—the consummate tact of direct attention. Looking ever to the All-Wise Disposer of events, he relied on that Providence which helps men by giving them high hearts and hopes to help themselves with the means which their Creator has put at their service. There was no infirmity in his conduct over which charity must fling its veil; no taint of selfishness from which purity averts her gaze; no dark recess of intrigue that must be lit up with colored panegyric; no subterranean passage to be trod in trembling, lest there be stirred the ghost of a buried crime.—John W. Daniel.

Never to see a nation born
Hath been given to mortal man,
Unless to those who, on that summer morn,
Gazed silent when the great Virginian
Unsheathed the sword whose fatal flash
Shot union through the incoherent clash
Of our loose atoms, crystallizing them
Around a single will's unpliant stem
And making purpose of emotion rash.
Out of that scabbard sprang, as from its womb,
Nebulous at first but hardening to a star,
Through mutual share of sunburst and of
gloom,
The common faith that made us what we are. —Lowell.

Conquerors who have stretched your scepters over boundless territories; founders of empires who have held your dominions in the reign of law; reformers who have cried aloud in the wilderness of oppression; teachers who have striven to cast down false doctrine, heresy, and schism; statesmen whose brains have throbbled with mighty plans for the amelioration of human society; scar-crowned vikings of the sea, illustrious heroes of the land, who have borne the standards of siege and battle, come forth in bright array from your glorious fanes, and would ye be measured by the measure of his stature? Behold you not in him a more illustrious and more venerable presence? Statesman, soldier, patriot, sage, reformer of creeds, teacher of truth and justice, achiever and preserver of liberty, the first of men, founder and savior of his country, father of his people—this is he, solitary and unapproachable in his grandeur! Oh, felicitous Providence that gave to America our Washington!—

John W. Daniel.

The time is now near at hand which must probably determine whether Americans are to be freemen or slaves; whether they are to have any property they can call their own; whether their houses are to be pillaged and destroyed, and themselves consigned to a state of wretchedness from which no human efforts will deliver them. The fate of unborn millions will now depend, under God, on the courage and conduct of this army. Our cruel unrelenting enemy leaves us only the choice of a brave resistance or the most abject submission. We have, therefore, to resolve to conquer or to die. Our own, our country's honor, calls upon us for a vigorous and manly exertion; and if we now shamefully fail, we shall become infamous before the whole world. Let us, then, rely on the goodness of our cause, and the aid of the Supreme Being, in whose hands victory is, to animate and encourage us to great and noble actions. The eyes of all our countrymen are now upon us; and we shall have their blessings and praises if happily we are the instruments of saving them from the tyranny meditated against them. Let us, therefore, animate and encourage each other, and show the whole world that a freeman contending for liberty on his own ground, is superior to any slavish mercenary on earth. Liberty, property, life, and honor are all at stake. Upon your courage and conduct rest the hopes of our bleeding and insulted country. Our wives, children, and parents expect safety from us only; and they have every reason to believe that heaven will crown with success so just a cause. The enemy will endeavor to intimidate us by show and appearance; but remember they have been repulsed on various occasions by a few brave Americans. Their cause is bad—their men are conscious of it; and, if opposed with firmness and coolness on their first onset, with our advantages of works and knowledge of the ground, the victory is most assuredly ours. Every good soldier will be silent and attentive, wait for orders, and reserve his fire until he is sure of doing execution.—Washington's Address to the American Troops Before the Battle of Long Island, Aug. 27, 1776.

Equal when fields were lost or fields were won,
With breath of popular applause or blame,
Nor fanned or damped, unquenchably the same,
Too inward to be reached by flaws of idle fame.
Soldier and statesman, rarest union;
High-poised example of great duties done
Simply as breathing, a world's honors worn
As life's indifferent gifts to all men born;
Dumb for himself, unless it were to God,
But for his barefoot soldiers eloquent,
Trampling the snow to coral where they trod,
Held by his awe in hollow-eyed content;
Modest, yet firm as Nature's self; unblamed
Save by the men his nobler temper shamed;
Never seduced through show of present good
By other than unsetting lights to steer
New-trimmed in Heaven, nor than his steadfast mood
More steadfast, far from rashness as from fear;
Rigid, but with himself first, grasping still
In swerveless poise the wave-beat helm of will;
Not honored then or now because he wooed
The popular voice, but that he still withstood;
Broad-minded, higher-souled, there is but one Who was all this and ours, and all men's,
—Washington. —Lowell.

Encompassed by the inviolate seas, stands to-day the American Republic which he founded—a freer, Greater Britain—uplifted above the powers and principalities of the earth, even as his monument is uplifted over roof and dome and spire of the multitudinous city. Long live the Republic of Washington! Respected by mankind, beloved by all its sons, long may it be the asylum of the poor and oppressed of all lands and religions—long may it be the citadel of that Liberty which writes beneath the eagle's folded wings, "We will sell to no man, we will deny to no man, right and justice." Long live the United States of America! Filled with the free, magnanimous spirit, crowned by the wisdom, blessed by the moderation, hovered over by the guardian angel of Washington's example.—John W. Daniel.

Waste

Time elaborately thrown away.—
Young.

More water glideth by the mill than wots the miller of.—Shakespeare.

What maintains one vice, would bring up two children. Remember, many a little makes a mickle: and farther, beware of little expenses; a small leak will sink a great ship.—
Franklin.

Waste cannot be accurately told,
though we are sensible how destructive it is. Economy, on the one hand, by which a certain income is made to maintain a man genteelly; and waste, on the other, by which on the same income another man lives shabbily, cannot be defined. It is a very nice thing; as one man wears his coat out much sooner than another, we cannot tell how.—Dr. Johnson.

Oh! waste thou not the smallest thing,
Created by Divinity;
For grains of sand do mountains make,
And atomies infinity;
Waste thou not then, the smallest time,
'Tis imbecile infirmity,
For well thou know'st, if aught thou know'st,
That seconds form eternity.
—Edward Knight.

Watchfulness

He is free from danger who, even when safe, is on his guard.—Syrus.

He allows very readily, that the eyes and footsteps of the master are things most salutary to the land.—
Columella.

Without your knowledge, the eyes and ears of many will see and watch you, as they have done already.— Cicero.

Water

The rising world of waters dark and deep.—Milton.

Water its living strength first shows,
When obstacles its course oppose.
—Goethe.

Honest water, which ne'er left man in the mire.—Shakespeare.

Smooth runs the water where the brook is deep.—Shakespeare.

Water is the mother of the vine,
The nurse and fountain of fecundity,
The adorning and refresher of the world.
—Chas. Mackay.

Here quench your thirst, and mark in me
An emblem of true clarity;
Who, while my bounty I bestow,
Am neither seen, nor heard to flow.
—Hone.

Water, water, everywhere,
And all the boards did shrink;
Water, water, everywhere,
Nor any drop to drink.
—Coleridge.

Traverse the desert, and then ye can tell
What treasures exist in the cold deep well,
Sink in despair on the red parch'd earth,
And then ye may reckon what water is worth.
—Miss Eliza Cook.

Till taught by pain,
Men really know not what good water's
worth:
If you had been in Turkey or in Spain,
Or with a famish'd boat's crew had your
berth,
Or in the desert heard the camel's bell,
You'd wish yourself where truth is—in a well.
—Byron.

'Tis a little thing
To give a cup of water: yet its draught
Of cool refreshment, drain'd by feverish
lips,
May give a thrill of pleasure to the frame
More exquisite than when nectarian juice
Renews the life of joy in happiest hours.
—Thos. Noon Talfourd.

'Tis rushing now adown the spout,
And gushing out below,
Half frantic in its joyousness,
And wild in eager flow.
The earth is dried and parched with heat,
And it hath long'd to be Released from out the selfish cloud,
To cool the thirsty tree.
—Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

How beautiful the water is!
To me 'tis wondrous fair—
No spot can ever lonely be
If water sparkle there;
It hath a thousand tongues of mirth,
Of grandeur, or delight,
And every heart is gladder made
When water greets the sight.
—Mrs. E. Oakes Smith.

A cup of cold Adam from the next purling stream.—Tom Brown.

How sweet from the green mossy brim to receive it,
As, poised on the curb, it inclined to my lips!

Not a full blushing goblet could tempt me
to leave it.

The brightest that beauty or revelry sips.
—Samuel Woodworth.

More water glideth by the mill
Than wots the miller of.
—Shakespeare.

Smooth to the shelving brink, a copious
flood

Rolls fair and placid, where collected all in one impetuous torrent, down the steep
It thund'ring shoots, and shakes the country round.

At first an azure sheet it rushes broad,
Then whitening by degrees, as prone it falls,

And from the loud resounding rocks below,
Dash'd in a cloud of foam, it sends aloft
A hoary mist, and forms a ceaseless shower.
Nor even the torrid wave here finds repose,

But raging still amid the shaggy rocks,
Now flashes o'er the scatter'd fragments
now

Aslant the hollow'd channel rapid darts,
And falling fast from gradual slope to slope,

With wild infracted course and lessen'd
roar

It gains a safer bed, and steals at last Along the mazes of the quiet vale.
—Thomson.

The fall of waters! rapid as the light,
The flashing mass foams shaking the abyss;
The hell of waters! where they howl and hiss,

And boil in endless torture; while the sweat

Of their great agony, wrung out from this Their Phlegethon, curls round the rocks of jet

That gird the gulf around, in pitiless horror
set,

And mounts in spray the skies, and thence
again

Returns in an unceasing shower, which
round,

With its unemptied clouds of gentle rain,
Is an eternal April to the ground,

Making it all one emerald:—how profound
The gulf! and how the giant element

From rock to rock leaps with delirious
bound,

Crushing the cliffs, which, downward worn and rent

With his fierce footsteps, yield in chasms a fearful vent

To the broad column which rolls on.
—Byron.

Weakness

Amiable weakness.—Henry Fielding.

Weakness is born vanquished.—
Mme. Swetchine.

The weakest goes to the wall.—
Shakespeare.

To be weak is miserable, doing or suffering.—Milton.

Weakness to be wroth with weakness.—Tennyson.

Amiable weakness of human nature.
—Gibbon.

Our worries always come from our weaknesses.—Joubert.

Fine by defect, and delicately weak.
—Pope.

How many weak shoulders have craved heavy burdens!—Joubert.

Soft without weakness; without glaring, gay.—Pope.

But every one has a besetting sin to which he returns.—La Fontaine.

Women are never stronger than when they arm themselves in their weakness.—Mme. du Deffand.

Guard thy heart on this weak side, where most our nature fails.—Addison.

To think everything disputable is a proof of a weak mind and a captious temper.—Beattie.

The weakness of women has been given them to call forth the virtues of men.—Mme. Necker.

Many take pleasure in spreading abroad the weaknesses of an exalted character.—Steele.

Weakness is more opposed to virtue than is vice.—Rochefoucauld.

I know and love the good, yet, ah!
the wrong pursue.—Petrarch.

We may not be weaklings because we have a strong enemy.—Latimer.

The attractiveness that exists to man in the very helplessness of woman is scarcely realized.—Lamartine.

We justly consider women to be weaker than ourselves, and yet we are governed by them.—Chamfort.

The weak-minded man is the slave of his vices and the dupe of his virtues.—J. Petit-Senn.

Some weak people are so sensible of their weakness as to be able to make a good use of it.—Rochefoucauld.

The beautiful seems right by force of beauty, and the feeble wrong, because of weakness.—Mrs. Browning.

Though it is weakness to love, oftentimes it is another weakness to cease to love.—Du Cœur.

Weakness is oftentimes so palpable as to be equivalent to wickedness.—George Sand.

The feeble howl with the wolves, bray with the asses, and bleat with the sheep.—Mme. Roland.

Woman's weakness, not man's merit, oftenest gains the suitor's victory.—Chamfort.

Weakness indicates dependence, and there is a degree of trust and tenderness also in it.—Eugene Sue.

Soft-heartedness, in times like these,
Shows softness in the upper story!
—Lowell.

But the concessions of the weak are the concessions of fear.—Burke.

We always weaken whatever we exaggerate.—La Harpe.

Weaknesses, so called, are nothing more nor less than vice in disguise!—Lavater.

Weakness is the only fault that is incorrigible.—Rochefoucauld.

Men are in general so tricky, so envious, and so cruel that when we find one who is only weak, we are too happy.—Voltaire.

The weak may be joked out of anything but their weakness.—Zimmermann.

Delusion and weakness produce not one mischief the less, because they are universal.—Burke.

More men are guilty of treason through weakness than any studied design to betray.—Rochefoucauld.

The mortal race is far too weak not to grow dizzy on unwonted heights.—Goethe.

There are two kinds of weakness, that which breaks and that which bends.—Lowell.

We are not so easily guided by our most prominent weaknesses as by those of which we are least aware.—Arthur Helps.

The strength of man sinks in the hour of trial; but there doth live a Power that to the battle girdeth the weak.—Joanna Baillie.

There are some weaknesses that are peculiar and distinctive to generous characters, as freckles are to a fair skin.—Bovee.

How sometimes nature will betray its folly,
Its tenderness, and make itself a pastime
To harder bosoms! —Shakespeare.

Weakness ineffectually seeks to disguise itself,—like a drunken man trying to show how sober he is.—Bovee.

Some of our weaknesses are born in us, others are the result of education; it is a question which of the two gives us most trouble.—Goethe.

Weakness of conduct is but the consequence of weakness of conviction: for the strongest of all the springs of human action is human belief.—Guizot.

It is not because men's desires are strong that they act ill; it is because their consciences are weak. There is no natural connection between strong impulses and a weak conscience.—J. Stuart Mill.

He that of greatest works is finisher oft does them by the weakest minister: so holy writ in babes hath judgment shown, when judges have been babes.—Shakespeare.

The more weakness the more falsehood; strength goes straight; every cannon-ball that has in it hollows and holes goes crooked.—Weaklings must lie.—Richter.

Ye gods, it doth amaze me,
A man of such a feeble temper should
So get the start of the majestic world,
And bear the palm alone.
—Shakespeare.

He who does most to cure woman of her weakness, her frivolity, and her servility will likewise at the same stroke do most to cure man of his brutality, his selfishness and his sensuality.—Frances Power Cobbe.

Heaven forming each on other to depend,
A master, or a servant, or a friend,
Bids each on other for assistance call,
Till one man's weakness grows the strength of all.
—Pope.

If weakness may excuse,
What murderer, what traitor, parricide,
Incestuous, sacrilegious, but may plead it?
All wickedness is weakness; that plea, therefore,
With God or man will gain thee no remission.
—Milton.

I have never quite understood the relationship between beauty and weakness, womanly sweetness and womanly silliness; to my mind, indeed, that woman being the most beautiful who is the most capable, while weakness and silliness can never by any chance be other than unlovely.—E. Lynn Linton.

Women, sometimes boasting of their weakness, cunningly obtain power by playing on the weakness of men. And they may well glory in their illicit sway; for, like Turkish bashaws, they have more real power than their masters.—Mary Wollstonecraft.

We must have a weak spot or two in a character before we can love it much. People that do not laugh or cry, or take more of anything than is good for them, or use anything but dictionary words, are admirable subjects for biographies.—O. W. Holmes.

Weakness has its hidden resources, as well as strength. There is a degree of folly and meanness which we cannot calculate upon, and by which we are as much liable to be foiled as by the greatest ability or courage.—Hazlitt.

Wealth

A great fortune is a great servitude.—Seneca.

We all covet wealth, but not its perils.—Bruyère.

Lack of desire is the greatest riches.—Seneca.

These riches are posses'd, but not enjoy'd.—Homer.

I envy none the gilding of their woe.—Young.

All wealth is the product of labor.—Locke.

Riches seldom make their owners rich.—Dr. Johnson.

Wealth is the least trustworthy of anchors.—J. G. Holland.

Worldly wealth is the devil's bait.—Robert Burton.

Golden roofs break men's rest.—Seneca.

Base wealth preferring to eternal praise.—Homer.

Wants keep pace with wealth always.—J. G. Holland.

The wealth of society is its stock of productive labor.—Sir James Mackintosh.

How i' the name of thrift doth he rake this together?—Shakespeare.

Wealth is not his that has it, but his that enjoys it.—Franklin.

Poverty treads close upon the heels of great and unexpected wealth.—Rivarol.

Without a rich heart wealth is an ugly beggar.—Emerson.

For they say, if money go before, all ways do lie open.—Shakespeare.

Can wealth give happiness? look round and see, what gay distress! what splendid misery!—Young.

Conscience and wealth are not always neighbors.—Massinger.

Well-gotten wealth may lose itself, but the ill-gotten loses its master also.—Cervantes.

Wealth is nothing in itself; it is not useful but when it departs from us.—Dr. Johnson.

Our wealth is often a snare to ourselves, and always a temptation to others.—Colton.

It is far more easy to acquire a fortune like a knave than to expend it like a gentleman.—Colton.

The million covet wealth, but how few dream of its perils?—John Neal.

Property is like snow; if it falleth level to-day, it will be blown into drifts to-morrow.—Sinclair.

It is only when the rich are sick that they fully feel the impotence of wealth.—Colton.

The most brilliant fortunes are often not worth the littleness required to gain them.—Rochefoucauld.

Get place and wealth, if possible, with ^{grace}
If not, by any means get wealth and place.—Pope.

Wealth is the smallest thing on earth, the least gift that God has bestowed on mankind.—Martin Luther.

That man has the fewest wants who is the least anxious for wealth.—Publius Syrus.

What makes the breaking of all oaths A holy duty?—food and clothes.—Butler.

Less coin, less care; to know how to dispense with wealth is to possess it.—Remyard.

A man can no more make a safe use of wealth without reason than he can of a horse without a bridle.—Socrates.

Wealth cannot purchase any great private solace or convenience. Riches are only the means of sociality.—Henry D. Thoreau.

Wealth is an imperious mistress; she requires the whole heart and life of man.—Laboulaye.

Wealth may be an excellent thing, for it means power, it means leisure, it means liberty.—Lowell.

Old gold has a civilizing virtue which new gold must grow old to be capable of secreting.—Lowell.

If you would be wealthy, think of saving as well as of getting.—Benjamin Franklin.

Life is short. The sooner that a man begins to enjoy his wealth the better.—Johnson.

He that is proud of riches is a fool. For if he be exalted above his neighbors because he hath more gold, how much inferior is he to a gold mine!—Jeremy Taylor.

Wealth hath never given happiness, but often hastened misery; enough hath never caused misery but often quickened happiness.—Tupper.

The way to wealth is as plain as the road to market. It depends chiefly on two words,—industry and frugality.—Franklin.

Wherever there is excessive wealth, there is also in the train of it excessive poverty; as where the sun is brightest the shade is deepest.—Lan-dor.

One cause of the insufficiency of riches (to produce happiness) is, that they very seldom make their owner rich.—Johnson.

As riches and favor forsake a man, we discover him to be a fool, but nobody could find it out in his prosperity.—Bruyère.

Seek not proud wealth; but such as thou mayest get justly, use soberly, distribute cheerfully, and leave contentedly.—Bacon.

Wealth, after all, is a relative thing, since he that has little, and wants less, is richer than he that has much but wants more.—Colton.

There is no society, however free and democratic, where wealth will not create an aristocracy.—Bulwer-Lyt-ton.

The accumulation of wealth is fol-lowed by an increase of care, and by an appetite for more.—Horace.

The proverb is true, that light gains make heavy purses; for light gains come often, great gains now and then.—Bacon.

When wealthy, show thy wisdom not to be to wealth a servant, but make wealth serve thee.—Sir J. Denham.

Seneca devoted much of his time to writing essays in praise of poverty, and in lending money at usurious rates.—H. W. Shaw.

Much learning shows how little mor-tals know; much wealth, how little worldlings can enjoy.—Young.

Sovereign money procures a wife with a large fortune, gets a man credit, creates friends, stands in place of ped-igree, and even of beauty.—Horace.

There is nothing keeps longer than a middling fortune, and nothing melts away sooner than a great one.—Bru-yère.

In goodness, rich men should trans-cend the poor, as clouds the earth; raised by the comfort of the sun to water dry and barren grounds.—Tour-neur.

The possession of wealth is, as it were, prepayment, and involves an ob-ligation of honor to the doing of cor-respondent work.—George MacDonald.

For wealth, without contentment, climbs a hill,
To feel those tempests which fly over ditches. —Herbert.

Through life's dark road his sordid way he wends,
An incarnation of fat dividends. —Sprague.

But wealth is a great means of re-finement; and it is a security for gen-tleness, since it removes disturbing anxieties.—Ik. Marvel.

O what a world of vile ill-favour'd faults
Looks handsome in three hundred pounds a year! —Shakespeare.

Know from the bounteous heavens all riches flow;
And what man gives, the gods by man be-stow. —Homer.

Let none admire
That riches grow in hell; that soil may best Deserve the precious bane. —Milton.

It requires a great deal of boldness and a great deal of caution to make a great fortune; and when you have got it, it requires ten times as much wit to keep it.—Rothschild.

Wealth is a weak anchor, and glory cannot support a man; this is the law of God, that virtue only is firm, and cannot be shaken by a tempest.—Pyth-agoras.

Many a beggar at the crossway, or gray-haired shepherd on the plain, hath more of the end of all wealth than hundreds who multiply the means.—Tupper.

Money and time are the heaviest burdens of life, and the unhappiest of all mortals are those who have more of either than they know how to use.—Johnson.

That plenty should produce either covetousness or prodigality is a perversion of providence; and yet the generality of men are the worse for their riches.—William Penn.

People who are arrogant on account of their wealth are about equal to our Laplanders, who measure a man's worth by the number of his reindeer.—Fredrika Bremer.

Many in hot pursuit have hasted to the goal of wealth, but have lost, as they ran, those apples of gold, the mind and the power to enjoy it.—Tupper.

Riches are gotten with pain, kept with care, and lost with grief. The cares of riches lie heavier upon a good man than the inconveniences of an honest poverty.—L'Estrange.

Can wealth give happiness? look round, and see

What gay distress! what splendid misery! Whatever fortune lavishly can pour, The mind annihilates, and calls for more.—Young.

We frequently misplace esteem, By judging men by what they seem, To birth, wealth, power, we should allow Precedence, and our lowest bow.—Gay.

If thou art rich, thou art poor; for, like an ass whose back with ingots bows, thou bearest thy heavy riches but a journey, and death unloads thee.—Shakespeare.

If we command our wealth, we shall be rich and free; if our wealth commands us, we are poor indeed. We are bought by the enemy with the treasure in our own coffers.—Burke.

The greatest and most amiable privilege which the rich enjoy over the poor is that which they exercise the least,—the privilege of making them happy.—Colton.

One man pursues power in order to possess wealth, and another pursues wealth in order to possess power; which last is the safer way, and generally followed.—South.

Of all pure things, purity in the acquisition of riches is the best. He who preserves purity in becoming rich is really pure, not he who is purified by water.—Manu.

The ideal social state is not that in which each gets an equal amount of wealth, but in which each gets in proportion to his contribution to the general stock.—Henry George.

Who hath not heard the rich complain
Of surfeits, and corporeal pain?
He barr'd from every use of wealth,
Envieth the ploughman's strength and health.—Gay.

I have mental joys and mental health,
Mental friends and mental wealth,
I've a wife that I love and that loves me;
I've all but riches bodily.—Wm. Blake.

Poverty breeds wealth; and wealth in its turn breeds poverty. The earth, to form the mould, is taken out of the ditch; and whatever may be the height of the one will be the depth of the other.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

There are, while human miseries abound,
A thousand ways to waste superfluous wealth,
Without one fool or flatterer at your board,
Without one hour of sickness or disgust.—Armstrong.

Wealth in the gross is death, but life diffused;
As poison heals, in just proportion us'd;
In heaps, like ambergrise, a stink it lies,
But well dispers'd, is incense to the skies.—Pope.

There is a burden of care in getting riches, fear in keeping them, temptation in using them, guilt in abusing them, sorrow in losing them, and a burden of account at last to be given up concerning them.—Matthew Henry.

What a man does with his wealth depends upon his idea of happiness. Those who draw prizes in life are apt to spend tastelessly, if not viciously; not knowing that it requires as much talent to spend as to make.—Whipple.

Gross and vulgar minds will always pay a higher respect to wealth than to talent; for wealth, although it be a far less efficient source of power than talent, happens to be far more intelligible.—Colton.

What makes all doctrines plain and clear?
About two hundred pounds a year,
And that which was prov'd true before,
Prove false again? two hundred more.
—Butler.

Many men want wealth,—not a competence alone, but a five-story competence. Everything subserves this; and religion they would like as a sort of lightning-rod to their houses, to ward off by and by the bolts of Divine wrath.—Beecher.

Leisure and solitude are the best effect of riches, because mother of thought. Both are avoided by most rich men, who seek company and business, which are signs of being weary of themselves.—Sir W. Temple.

What real good does an addition to a fortune, already sufficient, procure? Not any. Could the great man, by having his fortune increased, increase also his appetites, then precedence might be attended with real amusement.—Goldsmith.

Worldly wealth is the Devil's bait; and those whose minds feed upon riches recede, in general, from real happiness, in proportion as their stores increase; as the moon, when she is fullest, is farthest from the sun.—Burton.

Money, thou bane & bliss, and source of woe,
Whence com'st thou, that thou art so fresh and fine?
I know thy parentage is base and low:
Man found thee poor and dirty in a mine.
—Herbert.

The rich man's son inherits cares;
The bank may break, the factory burn,
A breath may burst his bubble shares,
And soft, white hands could hardly earn
A living that would serve his turn.
—Lowell.

Let us not envy some men their accumulated riches; their burden would be too heavy for us; we could not sacrifice, as they do, health, quiet, honor, and conscience, to obtain them: it is to pay so dear for them that the bargain is a loss.—Bryère.

What does competency in the long run mean? It means to all reasonable beings, cleanliness of person, decency of dress, courtesy of manners, opportunities for education, the delights of leisure, and the bliss of giving.—Whipple.

That I might live alone once with my gold!
Oh 't is a sweet companion! kind and true!
A man may trust it, when his father cheats him,
Brother, or friend, or wife. O wondrous self,
That which makes all men false, is true itself.
—Jonson.

If wealth come, beware of him, the smooth, false friend! There is treachery in his proffered hand; his tongue is eloquent to tempt; lust of many harms is lurking in his eye; he hath a hollow heart; use him cautiously.—Tupper.

Poor worms, they hiss at me, whilst I at home
Can be contented to applaud myself, * * * with joy
To see how plump my bags are and my barns.
—Ben Jonson.

Since all the riches of this world
May be gifts from the devil and earthly kings,
I should suspect that I worshipped the devil
If I thanked my God for worldly things.
—Wm. Blake.

What money creates, money preserves: if thy wealth decays, thy honor dies; it is but a slippery happiness which fortunes can give, and frowns can take; and not worth the owning which a night's fire can melt, or a rough sea can drown.—Quarles.

Wealth is not acquired, as many persons suppose, by fortunate speculations and splendid enterprises, but by the daily practice of industry, frugality, and economy. He who relies upon these means will rarely be found destitute, and he who relies upon any other will generally become bankrupt.

—Wayland.

We know that wealth well understood,
Hath frequent power of doing good;
Then fancy that the thing is done,
As if the power and will were one;
Thus oft the cheated crowd adore
The thriving knaves that keep them poor.
—Gay.

These grains of gold are not grains of wheat!
These bars of silver thou canst not eat;
These jewels and pearls and precious stones
Cannot cure the aches in thy bones,
Nor keep the feet of death one hour
From climbing the stairways of thy tower.
—Longfellow.

An accession of wealth is a dangerous predicament for a man. At first he is stunned, if the accession be sudden; he is very humble and very grateful. Then he begins to speak a little louder; people think him more sensible, and soon he thinks himself so.—Cecil.

And to hie him home, at evening's close,
To sweet repast, and calm repose.*

From toil he wins his spirits light,
From busy day the peaceful night;
Rich, from the very want of wealth,
In heaven's best treasures, peace and health.
—Gray.

Men pursue riches under the idea that their possession will set them at ease, and above the world. But the law of association often makes those who begin by loving gold as a servant finish by becoming themselves its slaves; and independence without wealth is at least as common as wealth without independence.—Colton.

Wealth brings noble opportunities, and competence is a proper object of pursuit; but wealth, and even competence, may be bought at too high a price. Wealth itself has no moral attribute. It is not money, but the love of money, which is the root of all evil. It is the relation between wealth and the mind and the character of its possessor which is the essential thing.—Hillard.

Whosoever shall look heedfully upon those who are eminent for their riches will not think their condition such as that he should hazard his quiet, and much less his virtue, to obtain it, for all that great wealth generally gives above a moderate fortune is more room for the freaks of caprice, and more privilege for ignorance and vice, a quicker succession of flatteries, and a larger circle of voluptuousness.—Johnson.

To purchase Heaven has gold the power?
Can gold remove the mortal hour?
In life can love be bought with gold?
Are friendship's pleasures to be sold?
No—all that's worth a wish—a thought,
Fair virtue gives unbribed, unbought.
Cease then on trash thy hopes to bind,
Let nobler views engage thy mind.
—Dr. Johnson.

Perhaps he hath great projects in his mind,
To build a college, or to found a race,
An hospital, a church—and leave behind
Some dome surmounted by his meagre face,
Perhaps he fain would liberate mankind
Even with the very ore which makes them base;
Perhaps he would be wealthiest of his nation,
Or revel in the joys of calculation.
—Byron.

See what money can do: that can change
Men's manners; alter their conditions!
How tempestuous the slaves are without it!
O thou powerful metal! what authority
Is in thee! thou art the key to all men's Mouths: with thee, a man may lock up the jaws
Of an informer; and without thee, he Cannot open the lips of a lawyer.
—Richard Brome.

Why dost thou heap up wealth, which thou must quit,
Or what is worse, be left by it?
Why dost thou load thyself when thou 'rt
to fly,
Oh, man! ordain'd to die?
Why dost thou build up stately rooms on
high,
Thou who art under ground to lie?
Thou sow'st and plantest, but no fruit must
see,
For death, alas! is reaping thee.
—Cowley.

When the desire of wealth is taking hold of the heart, let us look round and see how it operates upon those whose industry or fortune has obtained it. When we find them oppressed with their own abundance, luxurious with out pleasure, idle without ease, impatient and querulous in themselves, and despised or hated by the rest of mankind, we shall soon be convinced that if the real wants of our condition are satisfied, there remains little to be sought with solicitude or desired with eagerness.—Dr. Johnson.

Weariness

After all there is a weariness that cannot be prevented. It will come on. The work brings it on. The cross brings it on. Sometimes the very walk with God brings it on, for the flesh is weak; and at such moments we hear softer and sweeter than it ever floated in the wondrous air of Mendelssohn, "O rest in the Lord," for it has the sound of an immortal requiem: "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, for they rest from their labors."—James Hamilton.

Weather

We consider it tedious to talk of the weather, and yet there is nothing more important.—Auerbach.

Wedlock (See Marriage)

Thou art an elm, my husband, I a vine.—Shakespeare.

Wedlock joins nothing, if it joins not hearts.—Sheridan Knowles.

A world-without-end bargain.—Shakespeare.

The band of conjugal love is adamantine.—Robert Burton.

Marriage with peace is the world's paradise.—St. Augustine.

Marriage is not, like the hill of Olympus, wholly clear, without clouds.—Thomas Fuller.

Hail, wedded love, mysterious law, true source of human offspring!—Milton.

Body and soul like peevish man and wife, united jar, and yet are loath to part.—Young.

Humble wedlock is far better than proud virginity.—St. Augustine.

No navigator has yet traced lines of latitude and longitude on the conjugal sea.—Balzac.

As soon as a woman becomes ours, we are no longer theirs.—Montaigne.

A husband is a plaster that cures all the ills of girlhood.—Molière.

The very difference of character in marriage produces a harmonious combination.—Washington Irving.

A man finds himself seven years older the day after his marriage.—Bacon.

If she be not honest, chaste, and true, there's no man happy.—Shakespeare.

There is a French saying: "Love is the dawn of marriage, and marriage is the sunset of love."—De Finod.

We must be careful that the bond of wedlock does not become bondage.—Mrs. Jameson.

The bitterest satires and noblest eulogies on married life have come from poets.—Whipple.

Conjugal love is the metempsychosis of woman.—Mme. de Salm.

Since all the maids are good and lovable, from whence come the evil wives?—Lamb.

It is a mistake to consider marriage merely a scheme of happiness; it is also a bond of service.—Chapin.

It destroys one's nerves to be amiable every day to the same human being.—Beaconsfield.

Mutual complacency is the atmosphere of conjugal love.—Dr. Johnson.

For any man to match above his rank is but to sell his liberty.—Massinger.

There are few husbands whom the wife cannot win in the long run, by patience and love.—Marguerite de Valois.

When a man and woman are married, their romance ceases and their history commences.—Rochebrune.

I believe it will be found that those who marry late are best pleased with their children; and those who marry early, with their partners.—Dr. Johnson.

The treasures of the deep are not so precious as are the concealed comforts of a man locked up in woman's love.—Middleton.

To all married men be this caution, which they should duly tender as their life: Neither to doat too much, nor doubt a wife.—Massinger.

The happiness of married life depends upon the power of making small sacrifices with readiness and cheerfulness.—Selden.

The character of a woman rapidly develops after marriage, and sometimes seems to change, when in fact it is only complete.—Beaconsfield.

If you will learn the seriousness of life, and its beauty also, live for your husband; make him happy.—Fredrika Bremer.

A happy marriage is a new beginning of life, a new starting-point for happiness and usefulness.—Dean Stanley.

They that marry ancient people merely in expectation to bury them, hang themselves in hopes that some one will come and cut the halter.—Thomas Fuller.

It was in his own home that Fielding knew and loved her (Amelia); from his own wife that he drew the most charming character in English fiction.—Thackeray.

To protect ourselves against the storms of passion, marriage with a good woman is a harbor in the tempest; but with a bad woman it is a tempest in the harbor.—J. Petit-Senn.

The land of marriage has this peculiarity: that strangers are desirous of inhabiting it, while its natural inhabitants would willingly be banished from thence.—Montaigne.

However old a conjugal union, it still garners some sweetness. Winter has some cloudless days, and under the snow some flowers still bloom.—Mme. de Staël.

The early months of marriage often are times of critical tumult,—whether that of a shrimp pool or of deeper water,—which afterwards subside into cheerful peace.—George Eliot.

Husband and wife,—so much in common, how different in type! Such a contrast, and yet such harmony, strength and weakness blended together!—Ruffini.

Men who marry wives very much superior to themselves are not so truly husbands to their wives as they are unawares made slaves to their position.—Plutarch.

Socrates, who is by all accounts the undoubted head of the sect of the hen-pecked, owed, and acknowledged that he owed, a great part of his virtue to the exercise his useful wife constantly gave him.—Steele.

Rarest of all things on earth is the union in which both, by their contrasts, make harmonious their blending; each supplying the defects of the helpmate, and completing, by fusion, one strong human soul.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Husband and wife have so many interests in common that when they have jogged through the ups and downs of life a sufficient time, the leash which at first galled often grows easy and familiar.—Bulwer-Lytton.

She is not a brilliant woman; she is not even an intellectual one; but there is such a thing as a genius for affection, and she has it. It has been good for her husband that he married her.

—Helen Hunt.

He said—and his observation was just—that a man on whom heaven hath bestowed a beautiful wife should be as cautious of the men he brings home to his house as careful of observing the female friends with whom his spouse converses abroad.—Cervantes.

If a superior woman marry a vulgar or inferior man, he makes her miserable, but seldom governs her mind or vulgarizes her nature; and if there be love on his side, the chances are that in the end she will elevate and refine him.—Mrs. Jameson.

No unity can last, in married life, unless the fellowship of hearts is accompanied by the fellowship of minds. As a woman loses the charms of her youth, her husband must perceive that her mind is developing, and love must be perpetuated by esteem.—Duple.

If the man be really the weaker vessel, and the rule is necessarily in the wife's hands, how is it then to be? To tell the truth, I believe that the really loving, good wife never finds it out. She keeps the glamor of love and loyalty between herself and her husband, and so infuses herself into him that the weakness never becomes apparent either to her or to him or to most lookers-on.—Charlotte M. Yonge.

Weeds

To win the secret of a weed's plain heart.—Lowell.

Call us not weeds, we are flowers of the sea.—E. L. Aveline.

The summer's flower is to the summer sweet,

Though to itself it only live and die,
But if that flower with base infection meet,

The basest weed outbraves his dignity;
For sweetest things turn sourest by their deeds;

Lilies that fester smell far worse than weeds.
—Shakespeare.

I will go root away
The noisome weeds which without profit suck
The soil's fertility from wholesome flowers.
—Shakespeare.

Now 'tis the spring, and weeds are shallow-rooted;
Suffer them now, and they'll o'ergrow the garden,
And choke the herbs for want of husbandry.
—Shakespeare.

In the deep shadow of the porch
A slender bind-weed springs,
And climbs, like airy acrobat,
The trellises, and swings
And dances in the golden sun
In fairy loops and rings.
—Susan Coolidge.

Weeping

We weep and laugh, as we see others do.—Roscommon.

Love, Gratitude, and Pity wept at once.—Thomson.

And weep the more because I weep in vain.—Gray.

There is a certain pleasure in weeping; grief finds in tears both a satisfaction and a cure.—Ovid.

What remains when hope is fled?
She answered, "Endless weeping."—Rogers.

Every woman is in the wrong until she cries, and then she is in the right instantly.—Haliburton.

For one drop calls another down, till we are drowned in seas of grief.—Dr. Watts.

There is something so moving in the very image of weeping beauty.—Steele.

This heart shall break into a hundred thousand flaws ere I'll weep.
—Shakespeare.

The tear down childhood's cheek that flows is like the dew-drop on the rose.—Sir Walter Scott.

Trust not a woman when she weeps, for it is her nature to weep when she wants her will.—Socrates.

In silence weep, and thy convulsive sorrow inward keep.—Prior.

Larded all with sweet flowers, which bewept to the grave did go, with true-love showers.—Shakespeare.

The April's in her eyes; it is love's spring, and these the showers to bring it on.—Shakespeare.

My tears are buried in my heart, like cave-locked fountains sleeping.—L. E. Landon.

Weeping is not alone woman's weapon, but also a specific for transient sorrows.—Mme. Dufresnoy.

I so lively acted with my tears that my poor mistress, moved therewithal, wept bitterly.—Shakespeare.

When from soft love proceeds the deep distress, ah! why forbid the willing tears to flow?—Cowper.

Were both the golden Indies mine, I'd give both Indies for a tear.—Dr. Watts.

Weep not for him that dieth; for he sleeps, and is at rest.—Mrs. Norton.

Then let these useless streams be stayed; wear native courage in your face.—Dr. Watts.

She was a good deal shocked,—not shocked at tears, for women shed and use them at their liking.—Byron.

What women would do if they could not cry, nobody knows. What poor, defenceless creatures they would be!—Douglas Jerrold.

Do not weep, my dear lady! Your tears are too precious to shed for me; bottle them up, and may the cork never be drawn.—Sterne.

Welcome

Welcome as happy tidings after fears.—Otway.

Small cheer and great welcome makes a merry feast.—Shakespeare.

Stay is a charming word in a friend's vocabulary.—A. Bronson Alcott.

To say you are welcome were superfluous.—Shakespeare.

Trust me, sweet,
Out of this silence yet I pick'd a welcome.—Shakespeare.

How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings!—Bible.

His worth is warrant for his welcome.—Shakespeare.

Welcome as kindly showers to long-parched earth.—Dryden.

Welcome, my old friend,
Welcome to a foreign fireside.—Longfellow.

I hold your dainties cheap, sir, and your welcome dear.—Shakespeare.

The appurtenance of welcome is fashion and ceremony.—Shakespeare.

A table full of welcome makes scarce one dainty dish.—Shakespeare.

The atmosphere breathes rest and comfort, and the many chambers seem full of welcome.—Longfellow.

And kind the voice and glad the eyes
That welcome my return at night.—William Cullen Bryant.

A hundred thousand welcomes: I could weep,
And I could laugh; I am light and heavy:
Welcome.—Shakespeare.

Welcome ever smiles,
And Farewell goes out sighing.—Shakespeare.

I am glad to see you well;
Horatio,—or I do forget myself.—Shakespeare.

'Tis sweet to hear the watchdog's honest bark bay deep-mouthed welcome as we draw near home.—Byron.

I reckon this always,—that a man is never undone till he be hanged; nor never welcome to a place till some certain shot be paid and the hostess say, Welcome.—Shakespeare.

Sir, you are very welcome to our house: It must appear in other ways than words, Therefore I scant this breathing courtesy. —Shakespeare.

Bid that welcome
Which comes to punish us, and we punish it Seeming to bear it lightly. —Shakespeare.

I hope, as no unwelcome guest,
At your warm fireside, when the lamps are lighted,
To have my place reserved among the rest,
Nor stand as one unsought and uninvited! —Longfellow.

Shall I meet other wayfarers at night?
Those who have gone before.
Then must I knock, or call when just in sight?
They will not keep you standing at that door. —Christina G. Rossetti.

Come in the evening, or come in the morning,
Come when you're looked for, or come
without warning,
Kisses and welcome you'll find here before
you,
And the oftener you come here the more I'll adore you. —Thomas O. Davis.

A general welcome from his grace
Salutes ye all: This night he dedicates To fair content, and you: none here, he hopes,
In all this noble bevy, has brought with
her
One care abroad: he would have all as merry
As first-good company, good wine, good welcome
Can make good people. —Shakespeare.

Well-doing

Let no man be sorry he has done good, because others concerned with him have done evil! If a man has acted right, he has done well, though alone; if wrong, the sanction of all mankind will not justify him.—Fielding.

The Hebrews have a saying that God is more delighted in adverbs than in nouns; it is not so much the matter that is done, but the matter how it is done, that God minds. Not how much, but how well! It is the well-doing that meets with a well-done. Let us therefore serve God, not nominally or verbally, but adverbially.—R. Venning.

Whip-poor-will

The moan of the whip-poor-will from the hillside; the boding cry of the tree-toad, that harbinger of storm; the dreary hooting of the screechowl. —Irving.

Where deep and misty shadows float
In forest's depths is heard thy note.
Like a lost spirit, earthbound still,
Art thou, mysterious whip-poor-will. —Marie Le Baron.

But the whip-poor-will wafts on the moor,
And day has deserted the west:
The moon glimmers down thro' the vines at my door
And the robin has flown to her nest. —James G. Clarke.

Wickedness

Oh, how cowardly is wickedness always!—Statius.

Peace and wickedness are far asunder.—Stillingfleet.

The world loves a spice of wickedness.—Longfellow.

For never, never wicked man was wise.—Pope.

Wickedness may prosper for a while.—L'Estrange.

No wickedness has any ground of reason.—Livy.

The majority is wicked.—Bias.

Do not be deceived; happiness and enjoyment do not lie in wicked ways. —Dr. Watts.

Wickedness is a kind of voluntary frenzy, and a chosen distraction.—Tillotson.

The happiness of the wicked passes away like a torrent.—Racine.

I never wonder to see men wicked, but I often wonder to see them not ashamed.—Swift.

Few are so wicked as to take delight in crimes unprofitable.—Dryden.

What rein can hold licentious wickedness, when down the hill he holds his fierce career?—Shakespeare.

The wickedness of the few makes the calamity of the many.—Publius Syrus.

There's a method in man's wickedness; it grows up by degrees.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

It is no sin to be tempted; the wickedness lies in being overcome.—Balzac.

'Cause I'se wicked,—I is. I's mighty wicked, anyhow, I can't help it.—Harriet Beecher Stowe.

They that plough iniquity and sow wickedness reap the same.—Bible.

Destroy his fib, or sophistry—in vain! The creature's at his dirty work again.
—Pope.

Was ever any wicked man free from the stings of a guilty conscience?—Tillotson.

Are you call'd forth from out a world of men,
'fo slay the innocent? —Shakespeare.

Mental stains cannot be removed by time, nor washed away by any waters.—Cicero.

The disposition to do a bad deed is the most terrible punishment of the deed it does.—Charles Mildway.

To see and listen to the wicked is already the beginning of wickedness.—Confucius.

Wickedness resides in the very hesitation about an act, even though it be not perpetrated.—Cicero.

Great God, have pity on the wicked, for thou didst everything for the good, when thou madest them good!—Saadi.

We can never be grieved for their miseries who are thoroughly wicked, and have thereby justly called their calamities on themselves.—Dryden.

It is a statistical fact that the wicked work harder to reach hell than the righteous do to enter heaven.—H. W. Shaw.

Hint at the existence of wickedness in a light, easy, and agreeable manner, so that nobody's fine feelings may be offended.—Thackeray.

The sure way to wickedness is all ways through wickedness.—Seneca.

If the wicked flourish, and thou suffer, be not discouraged; they are fatted for destruction, thou are dieted for health.—Fuller.

Wickedness is a wonderfully diligent architect of misery, of shame, accompanied with terror, and commotion, and remorse, and endless perturbation.—Plutarch.

Doubtless the world is wicked enough; but it will not be improved by the extension of a spirit which self-righteously sees more to reform outside of itself than in itself.—J. G. Holland.

Wickedness may well be compared to a bottomless pit, into which it is easier to keep one's self from falling, then, being fallen, to give one's self any stay from falling infinitely.—Sir P. Sidney.

There is no man suddenly either excellently good or extremely wicked; but grows so, either as he holds himself up in virtue, or lets himself slide to viciousness.—Sir P. Sidney.

God has sometimes converted wickedness into madness; and it is to the credit of human reason that men who are not in some degree mad are never capable of being in the highest degree wicked.—Burke.

Widow

A widow is like a frigate of which the first captain has been shipwrecked.—Alphonse Karr.

Widows, like ripe fruit, drop easily from their perch.—Bruyère.

Young widows still bide their time.
—H. W. Shaw.

Handsome widows, after a twelve-month, enjoy a latitude and longitude without limit.—Balzac.

May widows wed as often as they can,
And ever for the better change their man;
And some devouring plague pursue their
lives,
Who will not well be govern'd by their wives.
—Dryden.

Why are those tears? why droops your head
Is then your other husband dead?
Or does a worse disgrace betide?
Hath not one since his death applied?
—Gay.

Thus, day by day, and month by month,
we pass'd;
It pleas'd the Lord to take my spouse at last.

I tore my gown, I soil'd my locks with dust,
And beat my breasts—as wretched widows must:

Before my face my handkerchief I spread,
To hide the flood of tears I did—not shed.
—Pope.

The widow who has been bereft of her children may seem in after years no whit less placid, no whit less serenely gladsome; nay, more gladsome than the woman whose blessings are still round her. I am amazed to see how wounds heal.—Charles Buxton.

Wife

My dear, my better half.—Sir
Phillip Sidney.

How much the wife is dearer than the bride!—Lord Lyttleton.

The light wife doth make a heavy husband.—Shakespeare.

Lord of yourself, uncumbered with a wife.—Dryden.

Hanging and wiving goes by destiny.—Shakespeare.

We'll leave a proof, by that which we will do,
Wives may be merry, and yet honest too.
—Shakespeare.

Should all despair that have revolted wives, the tenth of mankind would hang themselves.—Shakespeare.

Thy wife is a constitution of virtues: she's the moon, and thou art the man in the moon.—Congreve.

He who would have fine guests, let him have a fine wife.—Dr. Johnson.

He knows little who will tell his wife all he knows.—Thomas Fuller.

All other goods by fortune's hand are given; a wife is the peculiar gift of heaven.—Pope.

As the husband is, the wife is; thou art mated with a clown.—Tennyson.

She is not made to be the admiration of everybody, but the happiness of one.—Burke.

A happy union with wife and child is like the music of lutes and harps.—Confucius.

A wise man in his house should find a wife gentle and courteous, or no wife at all.—Euripides.

She commandeth her husband, in any equal matter, by constant obeying him.—Fuller.

One can with dignity be wife and widow but once.—Joubert.

Of earth's goods, the best is a good wife; a bad, the bitterest curse of human life.—Simonides.

He knew whose gentle hand was on the latch, before the door had given her to his eyes.—Keats.

Think you, if Laura had been Petrarch's
wife,
He would have written sonnets all his life.
—Byron.

The world well tried—the sweetest thing in life
Is the unclouded welcome of a wife.
—N. P. Willis.

Wives are young men's mistresses; companions for middle age; and old men's nurses.—Bacon.

I have known men of valor cowards to their wives.—Horace Walpole.

To no men are such cordial greetings given
As those whose wives have made them fit for heaven. —Byron.

But thou dost make the very night itself
Brighter than day. —Longfellow.

One word can charm all wrongs away,—
The sacred name of Wife.
—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Thy likeness, thy fit help, thy other self,
Thy wish, exactly to thy heart's desire.
—Milton.

The wife was pretty, trifling, childish, weak;
She could not think, but would not cease to speak. —Crabbe.

Her pleasures are in the happiness of her family.—Rousseau.

First get an absolute conquest over thyself, and then thou wilt easily govern thy wife.—Fuller.

Nothing flatters a man so much as the happiness of his wife; he is always proud of himself as the source of it.—
Dr. Johnson.

To be man's tender mate was woman born, and in obeying nature she best serves the purpose of heaven.—
Schiller.

In the election of a wife, as in A project of war, to err but once is To be undone forever.
—Thos. Middleton.

An intelligent wife can make her home, in spite of exigencies, pretty much what she pleases.—Thackeray.

Her gentle spirit commits itself to yours to be directed, as from her lord, her governor, her king.—Shakespeare.

A woman in a single state may be happy and may be miserable; but most happy, most miserable,—these are epithets belonging to a wife.—Coleridge.

O wretched is the dame, to whom the
sound,
"Your lord will soon return," no pleasure brings. —Maturin.

Being asked why in some kingdoms the king is of age at fourteen, but cannot marry until eighteen, Molière replied: "Because it is more difficult to rule a wife than a kingdom."—

J. A. Bent.

You know I met you, Kist you, and prest you close within my
arms,
With all the tenderness of wifely love.
—Dryden.

For nothing lovelier can be found
In woman, than to study household good,
And good works in her husband to promote.
—Milton.

The wife, where danger or dishonor lurks,
Safest and seemliest by her husband stays,
Who guards her, or with her the worst endures. —Milton.

Awake,
My fairest, my espous'd, my latest found,
Heaven's last best gift, my ever new delight! —Milton.

What is there in the vale of life
Half so delightful as a wife;
When friendship, love and peace combine
To stamp the marriage-bond divine?
—Cowper.

She is a winsome wee thing,
She is a handsome wee thing,
She is a bonny wee thing,
This sweet wee wife o' mine.
—Burns.

And while the wicket falls behind
Her steps, I thought if I could find A wife I need not blush to show
I've little further now to go.
—William Barnes.

She who ne'er answers till a husband cools
Or, if she rules him, never shews she rules;
Charms by accepting, by submitting sways,
Yet has her humour most when she obeys.
—Pope.

The man to Jove his suit prefer'd;
He begg'd a wife; his prayer was heard.
Jove wonder'd at his bold addressing!
For how precarious is the blessing!
—Gay.

Oh! 'tis a precious thing, when wives are
dead,
To find such numbers who will serve instead;
And in whatever state a man be thrown,
'Tis that precisely they would wish their own. —Crabbe.

You are my true and honorable wife, as dear to me as the ruddy drops that visit my sad heart.—Shakespeare.

A wife, domestic, good, and pure,
Like snail, should keep within her door;
But not, like snail, with silver track,
Place all her wealth upon her back.

—W. W. How.

I grant I am a woman; but, withal,
A woman that lord Brutus took to wife;
I grant I am a woman; but, withal,
A woman well reputed; Cato's daughter.
Think you, I am no stronger than my sex,
Being so father'd and so husbanded?

—Shakespeare.

Be thou the rainbow to the storms of life!
The evening beam that smiles the clouds
away

And tints to-morrow with prophetic ray!
—Byron.

She is mine own;
And I as rich in having such a jewel,
As twenty seas, if all their sand were pearl,
The water nectar, and the rocks pure gold.

—Shakespeare.

I crave fit disposition for my wife;
Due reference of place, and exhibition;
With such accommodation, and besort,
As levels with her breeding.

—Shakespeare.

As for my wife,
I would you had her spirit in such another:
The third o' the world is yours; which with a snaffle,

You may pace easy, but not such a wife.
—Shakespeare.

Alas! he has banish'd me his bed already;
His love, too long ago: I am old, my lords,
And all the fellowship I hold now with him
Is only my obedience. What can happen
To me, above this wretchedness?

—Shakespeare.

Fye! fye! unkut that threat'ning unkind
brow;

And dart not scornful glances from those
eyes,

To wound thy lord, thy king, thy governor:
It blots thy beauty, as frosts bite the
meads;

Confounds thy fame, as whirlwinds shake fair buds;

And in no sense is meet, or amiable.

—Shakespeare.

I am asham'd, that women are so simple
To offer war where they should kneel for
peace;

Or seek for rule, supremacy, and sway,
When they are bound to serve, love, and obey.

—Shakespeare.

Happy in this, she is not yet so old
But she may learn; happier than this,
She is not bred so dull but she can learn;
Happiest of all is, that her gentle spirit
Commits itself to yours to be directed.

—Shakespeare.

Would it not grieve a woman to be over-mastered by a piece of valiant dust? to make an account of her life to a clod of wayward marle?—
Shakespeare.

What? I! I love! I sue! I seek a wife!
A woman that is like a German clock,
Still a repairing, ever out of frame,
And never going aright; being a watch,
But being watch'd that it may still go right!

—Shakespeare.

Give me, next good, an understanding wife,
By nature wise, not learned by much art;
Some knowledge on her side will all my life
More scope of conversation then impart;
Besides her inborn virtue fortify;
They are most good who best know why.

—Sir Thomas Overbury.

Such duty as the subject owes the prince,
Even such a woman oweth to her husband;
And, when she's froward, peevish, sullen,
sour,

And not obedient to his honest will,
What is she but a foul contending rebel,
And graceless traitor to her loving lord?

—Shakespeare.

Horses (thou say'st) and asses men may try,

And ring suspected vessels ere they buy;
But wives, a random choice, untried they take;

They dream in courtship, but in wedlock
wake;

Then, nor till then, the veil's removed
away,

And all the woman glares in open day.

—Pope.

This specter of the female politician, who abandons her family to neglect for the sake of passing bills in parliament, is just as complete an illusion of the masculine brain, as the other specter whom Sydney Smith laid by a joke,—the woman who would forsake an infant for a quadratic equation.—Frances Power Cobbe.

The good wife is none of our dainty dames, who love to appear in a variety of suits every day new; as if a good gown, like a stratagem in war, were to be used but once. But our good wife sets up a sail according to the keel of her husband's estate; and if of high parentage, she doth not so remember what she was by birth, that she forgets what she is by match.—Fuller.

Thy husband is thy lord, thy life, thy keeper,
Thy head, thy sovereign; one that cares for thee,

And for thy maintenance; commits his body
To painful labour, both by sea and land;
While thou ly'st warm at home, secure and safe,

And craves no other tribute at thy hands,
But love, fair looks, and true obedience;—
Too little payment for so great a debt.

—Shakespeare.

Nothing can be more touching than to behold a soft and tender female, who had been all weakness and dependence, and alive to every trivial roughness while treading the prosperous paths of life, suddenly rising by mental force to be the comforter and supporter of her husband under misfortune, and abiding with unshrinking firmness the bitterest blast of adversity.—Washington Irving.

A good wife is heaven's last, best gift to man,—his gem of many virtues, his casket of jewels; her voice is sweet music, her smiles his brightest day, her kiss the guardian of his innocence, her arms the pale of his safety, her industry his surest wealth, her economy his safest steward, her lips his faithful counselors, her bosom the softest pillow of his care.—Jeremy Taylor.

What so pure, which envious tongues will spare?

Some wicked wits have libell'd all the fair,
With matchless impudence they style a wife,
The dear-bought curse, and lawful plague
of life;

A bosom serpent, a domestic evil,
A night invasion, and a mid-day devil;
Let not the wise these sland'rous words regard,

But curse the bones of ev'ry living bard.
—Pope.

O woman! thou knowest the hour when the good man of the house will return, when the heat and burden of the day are past; do not let him at such time, when he is weary with toil and jaded with discouragement, find upon his coming to his habitation that the foot which should hasten to meet him is wandering at a distance, that the soft hand which should wipe the sweat from his brow is knocking at the door of other houses.—Washington Irving.

Sail forth into the sea of life,
O gentle, loving, trusting wife,
And safe from all adversity
Upon the bosom of that sea
Thy comings and thy goings be!
For gentleness and love and trust
Prevail o'er angry wave and gust;
And in the wreck of noble lives
Something immortal still survives.

—Longfellow.

Light household duties, ever more in-wrought

With placid fancies of one trusting heart
That lives but in her smile, and turns
From life's cold seeming and the busy mart,

With tenderness, that heavenward ever yearns

To be refreshed where one pure altar burns.
Shut out from hence the mockery of life;
Thus liveth she content, the meek, fond,
trusting wife.

—Elizabeth Oakes Smith.

A love still burning upward, giving light
To read those laws, an accent very low
In blandishment, but a most silver flow
Of subtle-paced counsel in distress, Right to the heart and brain, tho' undescribed,

Winning its way with extreme gentleness
Thro' all the outworks of suspicious pride;
A courage to endure and to obey:

A hate of gossip parlance and of sway,
Crown'd Isabel, thro' all her placid life,
The queen of marriage, a most perfect
wife.
—Tennyson.

The death of a man's wife is like cutting down an ancient oak that has long shaded the family mansion. Henceforth the glare of the world, with its cares and vicissitudes, falls upon the old widower's heart, and there is nothing to break their force, or shield him from the full weight of misfortune. It is as if his right hand were withered; as if one wing of his angel was broken, and every movement that he made brought him to the ground.—Lamartine.

Wilfulness

The star of the unconquered will.—
Longfellow.

To wilful men the injuries that they themselves procure must be their schoolmasters.—Shakespeare.

Muse not that I thus suddenly proceed;
For what I will, I will, and there an end.
—Shakespeare.

Self-will is so ardent and active that it will break a world to pieces to make a stool to sit upon.—Cecil.

Will

Our wills are ours to make them
thine.—Tennyson.

The star of the unconquered will.
—Longfellow.

There is nothing good or evil save in the will.—Epictetus.

Our wills are ours, we know not how.—Tennyson.

Will is not unfrequently weakness.
—George MacDonald.

He would make his will lord of his reason.—Shakespeare.

People do not lack strength; they lack will.—Victor Hugo.

He wants wit that wants resolved will.—Shakespeare.

Will is deaf, and hears no heedful friends.—Shakespeare.

No one is a slave whose will is free.—Tyrius Maximus.

A boy's will is the wind's will.—
Longfellow.

All life needs for life is possible to will.—Tennyson.

The will of man is by his reason
sway'd.—Shakespeare.

How does our will become sanctified? By conforming itself unreservedly to that of God.—Fénelon.

He who is firm in will moulds the world to himself.—Goethe.

Everything in this world depends upon will.—Earl of Beaconsfield.

A tender heart, a will inflexible.—
Longfellow.

Want of will causes paralysis of every faculty. In spiritual things man is utterly unable because resolved-ly unwilling.—C. H. Spurgeon.

That what he will he does, and does so much
That proof is call'd impossibility.
—Shakespeare.

And binding nature fast in fate,
Left free the human will. —Pope.

To deny the freedom of the will is to make morality impossible.—Froude.

The only way of setting the will free is to deliver it from wilfulness.
—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

It is the will that makes the action
good or ill.—Herrick.

In idle wishes fools supinely stay;
be there a will, and wisdom finds a way.—Crabbe.

A willing heart adds feather to the heel, and makes the clown a winged Mercury.—Joanna Baillie.

That ye may prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God.—Bible.

The readinesse of doing doth expresse
No other but the doer's willingnesse.
—Herrick.

No action will be considered as blameless unless the will was so; for by the will the act was dictated.—
Seneca.

The saddest failures in life are those that come from the not putting forth of power and will to succeed.—
Whipple.

Lawless are they that make their wills their law.—Rochefoucauld.

Leaning on Him, make with reverent meekness His own thy will.—Whittier.

The general of a large army may be defeated, but you cannot defeat the determined will of a peasant.—Confucius.

The despotism of will in ideas is styled plan, project, character, obstinacy; its despotism in desires is called passion.—Rivarol.

My will enkindled by mine eyes and ears,
Two traded pilots 'twixt the dangerous shores.

Of will and judgment. —Shakespeare.

We sought therefore to amend our will, and not to suffer it through despite to languish long time in error.—Seneca.

There may be some tenderness in the conscience and yet the will be a very stone; and as long as the will stands out, there is no broken heart.—Richard Alleine.

"My will, not Thine, be done," turned paradise into a desert. "Thy will, not mine be done," turned the desert into paradise, and made Gethsemane the gate of heaven.—Pressense.

We are too fond of our own will; we want to be doing what we fancy mighty things: but the great point is to do small things, when called to them, in a right spirit.—Cecil.

Whatever the will commands, the whole man must do; the empire of the will over all the faculties being absolutely overruling and despotic.—South.

In the moral world there is nothing impossible if we can bring a thorough will to it. Man can do everything with himself, but he must not attempt to do too much with others.—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

God takes men's hearty desires and will, instead of the deed, where they have not power to fulfill it; but he never took the bare deed instead of the will.—Richard Baxter.

There is nothing more precious to a man than his will; there is nothing which he relinquishes with so much reluctance.—J. G. Holland.

He that complies against his will,
Is of his own opinion still,
Which he may adhere to, yet disown,
For reasons to himself best known.
—Butler.

Study to follow His will in all, to have no will but His. This is thy duty and thy wisdom. Nothing is gained by spurning and struggling, but to hurt and vex thyself; but by complying all is gained,—sweet peace.—Leighton.

To those who are His all things are not only easy to be borne, but even to be gladly chosen. Their will is united to that will which moves heaven and earth, which gives laws to angels, and rules the courses of the world.—Archbishop Manning.

A good inclination is but the first rude draught of virtue; but the finishing strokes are from the will, which, if well disposed, will by degrees perfect; if ill-disposed, will by the superinduction of ill habits quickly deface it.—South.

Calmness of will is a sign of grandeur. The vulgar, far from hiding their will, blab their wishes. A single spark of occasion discharges the child of passions into a thousand crackers of desire.—Lavater.

God made thee perfect, not immutable;
And good he made thee, but to persevere
He left it in thy pow'r; ordained thy will
By nature free, not over-rul'd by fate Inextricable, or strict necessity.
—Milton.

If the will, which is the law of our nature, were withdrawn from our memory, fancy, understanding, and reason, no other hell could equal, for a spiritual being, what we should then feel from the anarchy of our powers. It would be conscious madness,—a horrid thought!—Milton.

Do not let the loud utterances of your own wills anticipate, nor drown, the still, small voice in which God speaks. Bridle impatience till He does. If you cannot hear His whisper, wait till you do. Take care of running before you are sent. Keep your wills in equipoise till God's hand gives the impulse and direction.—Alexander Maclaren.

There dwelt in him a mighty will, which merely said to the serving company of impulses: Let it be! Such a will is not stoicism, which rules merely over internal malefactors, or knaves, or prisoners of war, or children; but it is that genially energetic spirit which conditions and binds the healthy savages of our bosoms, and which says more royally than the Spanish regent to others: I, the king.—Richter.

Willow

The willow hangs with sheltering grace
And benediction o'er their sod,
And Nature, hushed, assures the soul
They rest in God.—Crammond Kennedy.

Willow, in thy breezy moan,
I can hear a deeper tone;
Through thy leaves come whispering low,
Faint sweet sounds of long ago—
Willow, sighing willow!
—Mrs. Hemans.

Know ye the willow-tree,
Whose grey leaves quiver,
Whispering gloomily
To yon pale river?
Lady, at even-tide
Wander not near it:
They say its branches hide
A sad, lost spirit! —Thackeray.

Tree of the gloom, o'erhanging the tomb,
Thou seem'st to love the churchyard sod;
Thou ever art found on the charnel ground,
Where the laughing and happy have rarely trod.

When thy branches trail to the wintry gale,
Thy wailing is sad to the hearts of men;
When the world is bright in a summer's light,

'Tis only the wretched that love thee then.
The golden moth and the shining bee
Will seldom rest on the Willow-tree.
—Eliza Cook.

Wills

What thou givest after thy death, remember that thou givest it to a stranger, and most times to an enemy; for be that shall marry thy wife will despise thee, thy memory, and thine, and shall possess the quiet of thy labors, the fruit which thou hast planted, enjoy thy love, and spend with joy and ease what thou hast spared and gotten with care and travail.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

What you leave at your death, let it be without controversy, else the lawyers will be your heirs.—F. Osborn.

Wind

Ill blows the wind that profits nobody.—Shakespeare.

While rocking winds are piping loud.—Milton.

How silent are the winds!—Barry Cornwall.

There is strange music in the stirring wind!—Rev. Wm. L. Bowles.

Is 't possible? Sits the wind in that corner?—Shakespeare.

The winds are out of breath.—Dryden.

Is not thy home among the flowers?—William Cullen Bryant.

The hushed winds their Sabbath keep.—William Cullen Bryant.

The wind, a sightless laborer, whistles at his task.—Wordsworth.

The wind moans, like a long wail from some despairing soul shut out in the awful storm!—W. H. Gibson.

What wind blew you hither, Pistol?
Not the ill wind which blows no man to good.—Shakespeare.

The winds with wonder whist,
Smoothly the waters kist.
—Milton.

The wind breathes not, and the wave Walks softly as above a grave.
—Bailey.

Seas are the fields of combat for the winds; but when they sweep along some flowery coast, their wings move mildly, and their rage is lost.—Dryden.

The sobbing wind is fierce and strong; its cry is like a human wail.—Susan Coolidge.

Do not the bright June roses blow
To meet thy kiss at morning hours?
—William Cullen Bryant.

Full fast the leaves are dropping Before that wandering breath.
—William Cullen Bryant.

Except wind stands as it never stood
It is an ill wind turns none to good.
—Thomas Tusser.

I hear the wind among the trees playing celestial symphonies.—Longfellow.

I hear the howl of the wind that brings
The long drear storm on its heavy wings.
—William Cullen Bryant.

O wind,
If Winter comes, can Spring be far behind?
—Shelley.

And maketh the clouds his chariot,
and walketh upon the wings of the wind.—Bible.

As winds come lightly whispering from the west,
Kissing, not ruffling the blue deep's serene.
—Byron.

The gentle wind, a sweet and passionate wooer,
Kisses the blushing leaf. —Longfellow.

The winds of winter wailing through the woods;
The mighty laughter of the vernal floods.
—Abraham Coles.

When the gust hath blown his fill,
Ending on the rustling leaves,
With minute drops from off the eaves.
—Milton.

Never does a wilder song
Steal the breezy lyre along,
When the wind in odors dying,
Wooes it with enamored sighing.
—Moore.

Take a straw and throw it up into the air, you may see by that which way the wind is.—John Selden.

A melancholy sound is in the air,
A deep sigh in the distance, a shrill wail Around my dwelling. 'Tis the Wind of night.
—William Cullen Bryant.

A gentle wind of western birth,
From some far summer sea,
Wakes daisies in the wintry earth.
—George MacDonald.

Madame, bear in mind
That princes govern all things—save the wind.
—Victor Hugo.

Where hast thou wandered, gentle gale, to find
The perfumes thou dost bring?
—William Cullen Bryant.

Perhaps the wind
Wails so in winter for the summer's dead,
And all sad sounds are nature's funeral cries
For what has been and is not.
—George Eliot.

Chill airs and wintry winds! my ear
Has grown familiar with your song;
I hear it in the opening year,
I listen, and it cheers me long.
—Longfellow.

Through the gaunt woods the winds are shrilling cold,
Down from the rifted rock the sunbeam
pours
Over the cold gray slopes, and stony moors.
—Frederick Tennyson.

We wait for thy coming, sweet wind of the south!
For the touch of thy light wings, the kiss of thy mouth;
For the yearly evangel thou bearest from God,
Resurrection and life to the graves of the sod!
—Whittier.

Boughs are daily rifled
By the gusty thieves,
And the book of Nature
Getteth short of leaves.
—Hood.

The morning wind the mead hath kissed;
It leads in narrow lines
The shadows of the silver mist,
To pause among the pines. —Ruskin.

Thou wind!
Which art the unseen similitude of God
The Spirit, His most meet and mightiest sign.
—Bailey.

A wailing, rushing sound, which shook the walls as though a giant's hand were on them; then a hoarse

roar, as if the sea had risen; then such a whirl and tumult, that the air seemed mad; and then, with a lengthened howl, the waves of wind swept on.—Dickens.

The winds that never moderation knew,
Afraid to blow too much, too faintly blew;
Or out of breath with joy, could not enlarge Their straighten'd lungs or conscious of their charge. —Dryden.

A fresher Gale Begins to wave the wood, and stir the stream,
Sweeping with shadowy gust the fields of corn;
While the Quail clamors for his running mate. —Thomson.

The faint old man shall lean his silver head
To feel thee; thou shalt kiss the child asleep,
And dry the moistened curls that over-
spread
His temples, while his breathing grows more deep. —Bryant.

A breeze came wandering from the sky,
Light as the whispers of a dream; re
He put the o'erhanging grasses by, ci
And softly stooped to kiss the stream,
The pretty stream, the flattered stream,
The shy, yet unreluctant stream.
—Bryant.

I dropped my pen; and listened to the wind
That sang of trees upturn and vessels
tost;
A midnight harmony and wholly lost
To the general sense of men by chains confined
Of business, care, or pleasure,—or resigned
To timely sleep. —Wordsworth.

And the South Wind—he was dressed
With a ribbon round his breast
That floated, flapped, and fluttered
In a riotous unrest
And a drapery of mist
From the shoulder to the wrist
Floating backward with the motion
Of the waving hand he kissed.
—James Whitcomb Riley.

We must not think too unkindly even of the east wind. It is not, perhaps, a wind to be loved, even in its benignest moods; but there are seasons when I delight to feel its breath upon my cheek, though it be never advisable to throw open my bosom and take it into my heart, as I would its gentle sisters of the south and west.—Hawthorne.

Loud wind, strong wind, sweeping o'er the mountains,
Fresh wind, free wind, blowing from the sea,
Pour forth thy vials like streams from airy
mountains,
Draughts of life to me.
—D. M. Mulock.

The bitter-sweet, the haunting air
Creepeth, bloweth everywhere;
It preys on all, all prey on it,
Blooms in beauty, thinks in wit,
Stings the strong with enterprise,
Makes travellers long for Indian skies.
—Emerson.

O wild West Wind, thou breath of Autumn's being,
Thou, from whose unseen presence the leaves dead
Are driven, like ghosts from an enchanter fleeing,
Yellow, and black, and pale, and hectic red,
Pestilence-stricken multitudes.
—Shelley.

The wind, the wandering wind
Of the golden summer eves—
Whence is the thrilling magic
Of its tunes amongst the leaves?
Oh, is it from the waters,
Or from the long, tall grass?
Or is it from the hollow rocks
Through which its breathings pass?
—Mrs. Hemans.

Ye winds ye unseen currents of the air,
Softly ye played a few brief hours ago;
Ye bore the murmuring bee; ye tossed the
air
O'er maiden cheeks, that took a fresher glow;
Ye rolled the round white cloud through depths of blue;
Ye shook from shaded flowers the lingering
dew;
Before you the catalpa's blossoms flew,
Light blossoms, dropping on the grass like snow. —William Cullen Bryant.

The wind has a language, I would I could learn!
Sometimes 'tis soothing, and sometimes
'tis stern,
Sometimes it comes like a low sweet song,
And all things grow calm, as the sound floats along,
And the forest is lul'd by the dreamy
strain,
And slumber sinks down on the wandering
main,
And its crystal arms are folded in rest,
And the tall ship sleeps on its heaving
breast.
—L. E. Landon.

The wind is rising; it seizes and shakes
 The doors and window-blinds, and makes Mysterious moanings in the halls;
 The convent-chimneys seem almost
 The trumpets of some heavenly host,
 Setting its watch upon our walls!
 —Longfellow.

Wind of the sunny south! oh, still
 delay
 In the gay woods and in the golden
 air,
 Like to a good old age released
 from care,
 Journeying, in long serenity, away.
 In such a bright, late quiet, would that I Might wear out life like thee, mid bowers and brooks,
 And, dearer yet, the sunshine of kind
 looks,
 And music of kind voices ever nigh;
 And when my last sand twinkled in
 the glass,
 Pass silently from men as thou dost pass.
 —Bryant.

I loved the Wind.
 Whether it kissed my hair and pallid
 brow;
 Whether with sweets my sense it fed,
 as now;
 Whether it blew across the scudding
 main;
 Whether it shrieked above a stretch of plain;
 Whether, on autumn days, in solemn woods,
 And barren solitudes,
 Along the waste it whirled the withered leaves;
 Whether it hummed around my cottage eaves,
 And shook the rattling doors,
 And died with long-drawn sighs, on bleak and dreary moors;
 Whether in winter, when its trump did blow
 Through desolate gorges dirges of despair,
 It drove the snow-flakes slantly down
 the air,
 And piled the drifts of snow;
 Or whether it breathed soft in vernal
 hours,
 And filled the trees with sap, and filled the grass with flowers.
 —R. H. Stoddard.

Wine

Good wine needs no bush.—Shake-
 speare.

There is a devil in every berry of the grape.—The Koran.

Wine has drowned more than the sea.—Publius Syrus.

Wine is a cunning wrestler.—
 Plautus.

Wine and youth are fire upon fire.
 —Fielding.

Wine is a turncoat; first a friend, and then an enemy.—Fielding.

Wine invents nothing; it only tattles.—Schiller.

O thou invisible spirit of wine, if thou hast no name to be known by,
 let us call thee—devil!—Shakespeare.

What is a treacherous friend against whom you must always be on your guard. Such a friend is wine.—
 Rovee.

Wine maketh the hand quivering,
 the eye watery, the night unquiet, lewd dreams, a stinking breath in the morning, and an utter forgetfulness of all things.—Pliny.

Taking our stand on the immovable rock of Christ's character we risk nothing in saying that the wine of miracle answered to the wine of nature, and was not intoxicating. No counter proof can equal the force of that drawn from His attributes. It is an indecency and a calumny to im-pute to Christ conduct which requires apology.—Abraham Coles.

So Noah, when he anchor'd safe on
 The mountain's top, his lofty haven,
 And all the passengers he bore
 Were on the new world set ashore,
 He made it next his chief design
 To plant and propagate a vine, Which since has overwhelmed and drown'd

Far greater numbers, on dry ground.
 Of wretched mankind, one by one,
 Than all the flood before had done.
 —Butler.

Wine is an abomination.—Ptah Hotep.

Wine maketh a man act like an ass in a rich pasture.—Zahir Ad-din.

Drinking of wine maketh men to act like so many furies.—N. Morton.

The blood that is once inflamed with wine is apt to boil with rage.—Hall.

Wine makes a poor man rich in imagination, a rich man poor in reality.—Edward Parsons Day.

Wine intoxicates for a time, but the end is bitterness.—Lady Rachel Russell.

Wine, though it possesses good qualities, was forbidden by the prophet, because it attacked reason.—Hais-Bais.

This is the great fault in wine; it first trips up the feet, it is a cunning wrestler.—Plautus.

Wine often turns the good-natured man into an idiot, and the choleric into an assassin.—Addison.

When asked what kind of wine he liked to drink he replied, "That which belongs to another."—Diogenes Laërtius.

Wine and other luxuries have a tendency to enervate the mind and make men less brave in battle.—Cæsar.

Wine leads to folly, making even the wise to laugh immoderately, to dance, and to utter what had better have been kept silent.—Homer.

Wine takes away reason, engenders insanity, leads to thousands of crimes, and imposes such an enormous expense on nations.—Pliny.

The use of wine must inevitably be a stepping-stone to that of stronger drinks and to intemperance.—J. C. Holbrook, D.D.

In my interview with the king of the French, he stated expressly that the drunkenness of France was occasioned by wine.—Hon. E. C. Delavan.

Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his color in the cup, when it moveth itself aright; at the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder.—Bible.

It (wine) produces most of the bad effects of ardent spirits, as misused in our country, and is perhaps more insidious.—Horatio Greenough, the sculptor, of Florence.

Of all things known to mortals wine is the most powerful and effectual for exciting and inflaming the passions of mankind, being common fuel to them all.—Lord Bacon.

The wine-shops breed, in physical atmosphere of malaria and a moral pestilence of envy and vengeance, the men of crime and revolution.—Charles Dickens.

There is never the body of a man, how strong and stout soever, if it be troubled and inflamed, but will take more harm and offense by wine being poured into it.—Plutarch.

Where there is a wine-shop, there are the elements of disease and the frightful source of all that is at enmity with the interests of the workmen.—Count De Montalembert.

Drinking of wine brings poverty, shame, quarrels; leads to calumnious talk, unchastity, murder, and the loss of freedom, of honor, of understanding.—Tosafot.

The sluices of the grog-shop are fed from the wine-glasses in the parlor, and there is a lineal descent from the gentleman who hiccoughs at his elegant dinner-table to the sot who makes a bed of the gutter.—E. H. Chapin, D.D.

From extensive acquaintance with many lands, I unhesitatingly affirm that everywhere God has provided pure water for man, and that the wines drunk are often miserable and dirty. I have found water everywhere that I have traveled,—in China and India, Palestine and Egypt,—and everywhere water has been my beverage.—Thomas Cook, the Tourist.

Thou shalt not drink wine of anything that will intoxicate.—Buddhist Commandment.

Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise.—Prov. 20: 1.

Woe unto them that are mighty to drink wine and men of strength to mingle strong drink.—Isa. 5: 22.

All the crimes on earth do not destroy so much of the human race, nor alienate so much property as drunkenness.—Lord Bacon.

Far from me be the gift of Bacchus—pernicious, inflaming wine, that weakens both body and mind.—Homer of Greece, 900 B.C.

If it is a small sacrifice to discontinue the use of wine, do it for the sake of others; if it is a great sacrifice, do it for your own sake.—Rev. Samuel J. May.

Wine is like anger; for it makes us strong,
Blind and impatient; and it leads us wrong:
The strength is quickly lost; we feel the error long. —Crabbe.

I hold to the utter abandonment of the use as a beverage of distilled and fermented liquors of every sort, especially of wines, whether having much or little alcohol in them.—Eliphalet Nott, D.D.

Light wines—nothing so treacherous. They inflame the brain like fire while melting on the palate like ice. All inhabitants of light-wine countries are quarrelsome.—Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton.

The use of wine is quite superfluous to man. It is constantly followed by the expenditure of power. The drinker draws a bill on his health which must always be renewed.—Baron Liebig.

Wine-drinking is the mother of all mischief, the root of crimes, the spring of vices, the whirlwind of the brain, the overthrow of the sense, the tempest of the tongue, the ruin of the body, the shame of life, the stain of honesty, and the plague and corruption of the soul.—St. Augustine.

Wine heightens indifference into love, love into jealousy, and jealousy into madness. It often turns the good-natured man into an idiot, and the choleric into an assassin. It gives bitterness to resentment, it makes vanity insupportable, and displays every little spot of the soul in its utmost deformity.—Addison.

You often hear the remark that "there is no harm in a glass of wine per se." Per se means by itself. Certainly there is no harm in a glass of wine by itself. Place a glass of wine on a shelf and let it remain there, and it is per se, and will harm no one. But if you take it from the shelf and turn it inside a man, then it is no longer per se.—Geo. W. Bain.

Not only has Solomon, in his wisdom, pointed out the evils, which attend those who tarry long at the wine, but all the precepts and denunciators against drunkenness, all the details of the flagitious arts penetrated under its influence, which are recorded in the Bible, from Genesis to Revelation, are directed against the inordinate drinkers of wine.—Hodgkin.

Wine is the source of the greatest evils among communities. It causes diseases, quarrels, seditions, idleness, aversion to labor, and family disorders. . . . It is a species of poison that causes madness. It does not make a man die, but it degrades him into a brute. Men may preserve their health and vigor without wine; with wine they run the risk of ruining their health and losing their morals.—Fenelon.

O ye princes and rulers, how exceeding strong is wine! It causeth all men to err that drink it; it maketh the mind of the king and the beggar to be all one, of the bondman and the freeman, of the poor man and of the rich; it turneth also every thought into jollity and mirth, so that a man remembereth neither sorrow nor debt; it changeth and elevateth the spirits, and enliveneth the heavy hearts of the miserable; it maketh a man forget his brethren, and draw his sword against his best friends.—Masonic Manual.

Take special care that thou delight not in wine; for there never was any man who came to honor, or preferment that loved it; for it transformeth a man into a beast, decayeth health, poisoneth the breath, destroyeth natural heat, brings a man's stomach to an artificial heat, deformeth the face, rotteth the teeth, and to conclude, maketh a man contemptible, soon old, and despised of all wise and worthy men; hated in thy servants, in thyself, and companions; for it is a bewitching and infectious vice.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Who hat woe? Who hath sorrow?
Who hath contentions? Who hath babbling?
Who hath wounds without cause?
Who hath redness of eyes?
They that tarry long at the wine:
They that go to seek mixed wine.—
Prov. 23: 29.

Winter

O winter, ruler of the inverted year!
—Thomson.

Winter is the night of vegetation.—
Bovee.

Stern winter loves a dirge-like sound.—Wordsworth.

Coldly and capriciously the slanting sunbeams fall.—Alice Cary.

O wind, if winter comes, can spring be far behind?—Shelley.

When great leaves fall, the winter is at hand.—Shakespeare.

And Autumn in his leafless bowers is waiting for the winter's snow.—Whittier.

The frost performs its secret ministry unhelped by any wind.—Coleridge.

Winter binds our strengthened bodies in a cold embrace constringent.—Thomson.

Winter does not work only on a broad scale; he is careful in trifles.—Alexander Smith.

Winter giveth the fields, and the trees so old, their beards of icicles and snow.—Longfellow.

The stiff rails were softened to swan's-down, and still fluttered down the snow.—Lowell.

Behold the groves that shine with silver frost, their beauty withered, and their verdure lost!—Pope.

When dark December glooms the day, and takes our autumn joys away.—Sir Walter Scott.

No vernal blooms their tropic rocks array,
But winter lingering chills the lap of May.—Goldsmith.

The silent snow possessed the earth, and calmly fell our Christmas-eve.—Tennyson.

On a lone winter evening, when the frost
Has wrought a silence. —Keats.

'Tis done! dread winter spreads his latest glooms, and reigns tremendous o'er the conquered year.—Thomson.

Every Fern is tucked and set,
'Neath coverlet,
Downy and soft and warm.
—Susan Coolidge.

See, Winter comes to rule the varied year,
Sullen and sad, with all his rising train,
Vapors, and clouds, and storms.
—Thomson.

Well-apparelled April on the heel of limping winter treads.—Shakespeare.

A February face, so full of frost, of storm, and cloudiness!—Shakespeare.

Take winter as you find him, and he turns out to be a thoroughly honest fellow with no nonsense in him, and tolerating none in you, which is a great comfort in the long run.—

Lowell.

The day is ending,
The night is descending;
The marsh is frozen,
The river dead. —Longfellow.

But see, Orion sheds unwholesome dew;
Arise, the pines a noxious shade diffuse;
Sharp boreas blows, and nature feels decay,
Time conquers all, and we must time obey. —Pope.

Where, twisted round the barren oak,
The summer vine in beauty clung,
And summer winds the stillness broke,
The crystal icicle is hung. —Longfellow.

Green moss shines there with ice encased;
The long grass bends its spear-like form;
And lovely is the silvery scene
When faint the sun-beams smile. —Southey.

In winter, when the dismal rain
Came down in slanting lines,
And Wind, that grand old harper, smote
His thunder-harp of pines. —Alexander Smith.

I crown thee king of intimate delights,
Fireside enjoyments, home-born happiness,
And all the comforts that the lowly roof
Of undisturb'd retirement, and the hours
Of long, uninterrupted evening, know. —Cowper.

There's silence in the harvest field;
And blackness in the mountain glen,
And cloud that will not pass away
From the hill-tops for many a day;
And stillness round the homes of men. —Mary Howitt.

Yet all how beautiful! Pillars of pearl
Propping the cliffs above, stalactites bright
From the ice roof depending; and bequeath, Grottoes and temples with their crystal spires
And gleaming columns radiant in the sun. —William Henry Burleigh.

Look! the massy trunks
Are cased in the pure crystal; each light spray,
Nodding and tinkling in the breath of heaven,
Is studded with its trembling water-drops,
That glimmer with an amethystine light. —Bryant.

Every leaf and twig was * * * covered with a sparkling ice armor.

Even the grasses in exposed fields were hung with innumerable diamond pendants, which jingled merrily when brushed by the foot of the traveler.
* * * It was as if some super-incumbent stratum of the earth had been removed in the night, exposing to light a bed of untarnished crystals.—
Henry D. Thoreau.

Miserable they!
Who, here entangled in the gathering ice,
Take their last look of the descending sun,
While, full of death, and fierce with tenfold
frost,
The long, long night, incumbent o'er their heads,
Falls horrible. —Thomson.

Under the snowdrifts the blossoms are sleeping,
Dreaming their dreams of sunshine and June, Down in the hush of their quiet they're keeping Trills from the throstle's wild summer-sung tune. —Harriet Prescott Spofford.

'Tis winter, yet there is no sound
Along the air
Of winds along their battle-ground;
But gently there
The snow is falling,—all around —Ralph Hoyt.

O Winter! bar thine adamantine doors;
The north is thine; there hast thou built thy dark,
Deep-founded habitation. Shake not thy roofs,
Nor bend thy pillars with thine iron car. —William Blake.

Here feel we but the penalty of Adam,
The seasons' difference, as the icy fang
And churlish chiding of the winter's wind, Which, when it bites and blows upon my body,
Even till I shrink with cold, I smile and
say,
"This is no flattery." —Shakespeare.

O Winter! ruler of the inverted year,
Thy scatter'd hair with sleet-like ashes fill'd, Thy breath congeal'd upon thy lips, thy cheeks
Fring'd with a beard made white with other snows
Than those of age; thy forehead wrapt in clouds,
A leafless branch thy sceptre, and thy throne
A sliding car indebted to no wheels,
But urged by storms along its slippery way;
I love thee, all unlovely as thou seem'st,
And dreaded as thou art. —Cowper.

Every winter,
When the great sun has turned his face
away,
The earth goes down into the vale of grief,
And fasts, and weeps, and shrouds herself
in sables,
Leaving her wedding-garlands to decay—
Then leaps in spring to his returning kisses.
—Charles Kingsley.

Up rose the wild old winter-king,
And shook his beard of snow;
"I hear the first young hare-bell ring,
'Tis time for me to go!
Northward o'er the icy rocks,
Northward o'er the sea,
My daughter comes with sunny locks:
This land's too warm for me!"
—Leland.

His breath like silver arrows pierced the
air,
The naked earth crouched shuddering at his feet,
His finger on all flowing waters sweet Forbidding lay—motion nor sound was there:—
Nature was frozen dead,—and still and
slow,
A winding sheet fell o'er her body fair, Flaky and soft, from his wide wings of snow.
—Frances Anne Kemble.

When icicles hang by the wall,
And Dick, the shepherd, blows his nail,
And Tom bears logs into the hall,
And milk comes frozen home in pail,
When blood is nipp'd and ways be foul,
Then nightly sings the staring owl,
Tu-whit;
Tu-who, a merry note,
While greasy Joan doth keel the pot.
—Shakespeare.

Now, when the cheerless empire of the sky
To Capricorn the Centaur Archer yields,
And fierce Aquarius stains th' inverted
year;
Hung o'er the farthest verge of heaven, the sun
Scarce spreads o'er ether the dejected day:
Faint are his gleams and ineffectual shoot
His struggling rays, in horizontal lines,
—Thomson.

These Winter nights against my window-pane
Nature with busy pencil draws designs Of ferns and blossoms and fine spray of pines,
Oak-leaf and acorn and fantastic vines,
Which she will make when summer comes
again—
Quaint arabesques in argent, flat and cold,
Like curious Chinese etchings.
—T. B. Aldrich.

When now, unsparing as the scourge of
war,
Blasts follow blasts and groves dismantled
roar;
Around their home the storm-pinched cattle lows,
No nourishment in frozen pasture grows;
Yet frozen pastures every morn resound With fair abundance thund'ring to the ground.
—Bloomfield.

All nature feels the renovating force
Of winter, only to the thoughtless eye
In ruin seen. The frost-contracted glebe Draws in abundant vegetable soul,
And gathers vigor for the coming year.
A stronger glow sits on the lively cheek
Of ruddy fire; and luculent along
The purer rivers flow: their sullen deeps,
Transparent, open to the shepherd's gaze
And murmur hoarser at the fixing frost.
—Thomson.

When winter stern his gloomy front uprears,
A sable void the barren earth appears;
The meads no more their former verdure
boast,
Fast-bound their streams, and all their beauty lost;
The herds, the flocks, in icy garments mourn, and wildly murmur for the Spring's return;
From snow-topp'd hills the whirlwinds
keenly blow, Howl through the woods, and pierce the vales below,
Through the sharp air a flaky torrent flies,
Mocks the slow sight, and hides the gloomy
skies.
—Crabbe.

But Winter has yet brighter scenes—he boasts Splendors beyond what gorgeous Summer
knows.
Or Autumn with his many fruits, and
woods
All flushed with many hues. Come when the rains
Have glazed the snow and clothed the trees with ice,
While the slant sun of February pours
Into the bowers a flood of light. Approach!
The incrustated surface shall upbear thy steps,
And the broad arching portals of the grove
Welcome thy entering.
—William Cullen Bryant.

Lastly came Winter clothed all in frize, Chattering his teeth for cold that did him
chill;
Whilst on his hoary beard his breath did freeze,
And the dull drops, that from his purpled
bill
As from a limebeck did adown distill:

In his right hand a tipped staffe he held,
With which his feeble steps he stayed still;
For he was faint with cold, and weak with
 old;
That scarce his loosed limbes he hable was to weld. —Spenser.

wise.—La Rochefoucauld.

Knowledge is the parent of love;
wisdom, love itself.—J. C. and A. W.
Hare.

No man is wise enough by himself.
—Plautus.

You read of but one wise man; and all that he knew was—that he knew nothing.—Congreve.

Wisdom is to the soul what health is to the body.—La Rochefoucauld.

The wise man is seldom prudent.—
Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

Wisdom is rare, Lorenzo! wit abounds.—Young.

Dare to be wise.—Horace.

Body cannot teach wisdom; God only.—Emerson.

No man can be wise on an empty stomach.—George Eliot.

Wisdom may be the ultimate arbiter, but is seldom the immediate agent in human affairs.—Sir J.
Stephen.

Give tribute, but not oblation, to human wisdom.—Sir P. Sidney.

Wisdom views with an indifferent eye all finite joys, all blessings born to die.—Hannah More.

Great is wisdom; infinite is the value of wisdom. It cannot be exaggerated; it is the highest achievement of man.—Carlyle.

A man's wisdom is his best friend;
folly, his worst enemy.—Sir W.
Temple.

Man's chief wisdom consists in being sensible of his follies.—Roche-
foucauld.

Call him wise whose actions, words, and steps are all a clear because to a clear why.—Lavater.

The glory and increase of wisdom stands in exercising it.—Sir P. Sidney.

But they whom truth and wisdom lead
Can gather honey from a weed.
—Cowper.

We become wiser by adversity:
prosperity destroys our appreciation of the right.—Seneca.

You will cast away your cards and dice when you find the sweetness of youthful learning.—Richard Baxter.

The wisest man is generally he who thinks himself the least so.—Boileau.

The wisdom of one generation will be folly in the next.—Priestley.

Who then is free? The wise man who can govern himself.—Horace.

It is easier to be wise for others than for ourselves.—La Rochefou-
cauld.

It is not wise to be wiser than is necessary.—Quinault.

On every thorn, delightful wisdom grows,
In every rill a sweet instruction flows.
—Young.

It is good to rub and polish our brain against that of others.—Montaigne.

He who has once been very foolish will at no other time be very wise.—
Montaigne.

Be wise with speed;
A fool at forty is a fool indeed.
—Montaigne.

Teach me my days to number, and apply
My trembling heart to wisdom.
—Young.

He gains wisdom in a happy way who gains it by another's experience.
—Plautus.

Our wisdom is no less at fortune's mercy than our wealth.—Roche-
foucauld.

Nothing can be truer than fairy wisdom. It is as true as sunbeams.—
Douglas Jerrold.

By wisdom wealth is won; but riches purchased wisdom yet for none.
—Bayard Taylor.

The doorstep to the temple of wisdom is a knowledge of our own ignorance.—Spurgeon.

The wisdom of women comes to them by inspiration, their folly by pro-meditation.—Dumas, Pere.

Full oft we see cold wisdom waiting on superfluous folly.—Shakespeare.

Be wise;
Soar not too high to fall; but stoop to rise.
—Massinger.

I would have you wise unto that which is good, and simple concerning evil.—Bible.

How prone to doubt, how cautious are the wise!—Homer.

Wisdom is the talent of buying virtuous pleasures at the cheapest rate.
—Fielding.

The weak have remedies, the wise have joys; superior wisdom is superior bliss.—Young.

The bearings of this observation lays in the application on it.—Dickens.

Wisdom no more consists in science than happiness in wealth.—De Boufflers.

Wisdom makes but a slow defence against trouble, though at last a sure one.—Goldsmith.

Wisdom is oftentimes nearer when we stoop than when we soar.—Wordsworth.

To know that which before us lies in daily life is the prime of wisdom.—Milton.

A man must become wise at his own expense.—Montaigne.

Look about, my son, and see how little wisdom it takes to govern the world.—Oxenstiern.

True wisdom is to know what is best worth knowing, and to do what is best worth doing.—Humphreys.

The end of wisdom is consultation and deliberation.—Demosthenes.

As you are old and reverend, you should be wise.—Shakespeare.

With wisdom fraught; not such as books, but such as practice taught.—Waller.

Common sense is an uncommon degree is what the world calls wisdom.
—Coleridge.

So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom.—Bible.

Knowledge is proud that he has learned so
much;
Wisdom is humble that he knows no more.
—Cowper.

What in me is dark,
Illumine, what is low, raise and support.
—Milton.

Seize wisdom ere 'tis torment to be wise; that is, seize wisdom ere she seizes thee.—Young.

Go, wiser thou! and in thy scale of sense weigh thy opinion against Providence.—Pope.

In idle wishes fools supinely stay;
Be there a will, then wisdom finds a way.
—Shakespeare.

So wise, so young, they say, do never live long.—Shakespeare.

A man cannot learn to be wise any more than he can learn to be handsome.—H. W. Shaw.

Modest doubt is called the beacon of the wise.—Shakespeare.

He is oft the wisest man who is not wise at all.—Wordsworth.

Wisdom consists not so much in seeing as in foreseeing.—Hosea Ballou.

The bearing and the training of a child
Is woman's wisdom. —Tennyson.

The stream from Wisdom's well,
Which God supplies, is inexhaustible.
—Bayard Taylor.

Wisdom and Goodness are twin born, one heart Must hold both sisters, never seen apart.
—Cowper.

Nor is he the wisest man who never proved himself a fool. —Tennyson.

He who exercises wisdom exercises
the knowledge which is about God.—
Epictetus.

If wisdom was to cease throughout the world, no one would suspect himself of ignorance.—Saadi.

He is a wise man who does not grieve for the things which he has not, but rejoices for those which he has.—Epictetus.

He is wise who can instruct us and assist us in the business of daily vir-tuous living.—Carlyle.

Wisdom is everlasting; early or late we apprehend her still the same.—
Frederic W. H. Myers.

A man of virtue, judgment, and prudence speaks not until there is silence.
—Saadi.

The only jewel which you can carry beyond the grave is wisdom.—James Alfred Langford.

Wisdom consists not in seeing what is directly before us, but in discerning those things which may come to pass.—Terence.

He who learns the rules of wisdom, without conforming to them in his life, is like a man who labored in his fields, but did not sow.—Saadi.

The fool is willing to pay for anything but wisdom. No man buys that of which he supposes himself to have an abundance already.—Simms.

A wise man will always be a Christian, because the perfection of wisdom is to know where lies tranquillity of mind and how to attain it, which Christianity teaches.—Lander.

These are the signs of a wise man:
to reprove nobody, to praise nobody, to blame nobody, nor even to speak of himself or his own merits.—Epictetus.

If thou kiss Wisdom's cheek and make her thine, she will breathe into thy lips divinity, and thou, like Phœbus, shalt speak oracle.—Decker.

The sublimity of wisdom is to do those things living which are to be desired when dying.—Jeremy Taylor.

Wisdom is the olive that springeth from the heart, bloometh on the tongue, and beareth fruit in the actions.—Grymestone.

Wisdom consists in rising superior both to madness and to common sense, and in lending one's self to the universal delusion without becoming its dupe.—Amiel.

The highest conceptions of the sages, who, in order to arrive at them, had to live many days, have become the milk for babes.—Ballanche.

True wisdom, laboring to expound, heareth others readily;

False wisdom, sturdy to deny, closeth up her mind to argument. —Tupper.

To be wiser than other men is to be honestest than they; and strength of mind is only courage to see and speak the truth.—Hazlitt.

Human wisdom is the aggregate of all human experience, constantly accumulating and selecting and reorganizing its own materials.—Judge Joseph Story.

Wisdom and fortune combating together,
If that the former dare but what it can,
No chance may shake it. —Shakespeare.

Much of this world's wisdom is still acquired by necromancy,—by consulting the oracular dead.—Hare.

But wisdom, awful wisdom! which inspects,
Discerns, compares, weighs, separates, infers,

Seizes the right, and holds it to the last.
—Young.

The first point of wisdom is to discern that which is false; the second, to know that which is true.—Lactantius.

But to know
That which before us lies in daily life,
Is the prime wisdom. —Milton.

In the common run of mankind, for one that is wise and good you find ten of a contrary character.—Addison.

Well, God give them wisdom that have it; and those that are fools, let them use their talents.—Shakespeare.

Were wisdom to be sold, she would give no price; every man is satisfied with the share he has from nature.—Henry Home.

The clouds may drop down titles and estates, wealth may seek us; but wisdom must be sought.—Young.

He who considers himself a paragon of wisdom is sure to commit some superlatively stupid act.—Ludwig Tieck.

What is it to be wise?
'Tis but to know how little can be known,
To see all others' faults, and feel our own.
—Pope.

To one it is the mighty heavenly goddess; to another it is an excellent cow that furnishes him with milk.—Schiller.

We ought not to judge of men's merits by their qualifications, but by the use they make of them.—Charron.

Socrates * * *
Whom, well inspir'd, the oracle pronounc'd Wise of men. —Milton.

Teach a man to read and write, and you have put into his hands the great keys of the wisdom-box.—Huxley.

In strictness of language there is a difference between knowledge and wisdom; wisdom always supposing action, and action directed by it.—Paley.

If wisdom were conferred with this proviso, that I must keep it to myself and not communicate it to others, I would have none of it.—Seneca.

May I deem the wise man rich, and may I have such a portion of gold as none but a prudent man can either bear or employ!—Plato.

The wise man is but a clever infant, spelling letters from a hieroglyphical prophetic book, the lexicon of which lies in eternity.—T. Carlyle.

Talk not to me of the wisdom of women,—I know my own sex well; the wisest of us all are but little less foolish than the rest.—Mary, Queen of Scots.

When a man seems to be wise, it is merely that his follies are proportionate to his age and fortune.—Rochefoucauld.

Knowledge is the treasure of the mind, but discretion is the key to it, without which it is useless. The practical part of wisdom is the best.—Owen Feltham.

There is this difference between happiness and wisdom: he that thinks himself the happiest man is really so; but he that thinks himself the wisest is generally the greatest fool.—Bacon.

Man thinks
Brutes have no wisdom, since they know not his:
Can we divine their world?

—George Eliot.

The god, O men, seems to me to be really wise; and by his oracle to mean this, that the wisdom of this world is foolishness and of none effect.—Plato.

Wisdom, though richer than Peruvian mines, And sweeter than the sweet ambrosial hive, What is she, but the means of happiness? That unobtain'd, than folly more a fool.

—Young.

The most manifest sign of wisdom is a continual cheerfulness; her state is like that of things in the regions above the moon, always clear and serene.—Montaigne.

The sea does not contain all the pearls, the earth does not enclose all the treasures, and the flint-stone does not inclose all the diamonds, since the head of man encloses wisdom.—Saadi.

For knowledge to become wisdom, and for the soul to grow, the soul must be rooted in God: and it is through prayer that there comes to us that which is the strength of our strength, and the virtue of our virtue, the Holy Spirit.—Wm. Mountford.

No man is the wiser for his learning; it may administer matter to work in, or objects to work upon; but wit and wisdom are born with a man.—Selden.

Wisdom and understanding are synonymous words; they consist of two propositions, which are not distinct in sense, but one and the same thing variously expressed.—Tillotson.

All foreign wisdom doth amount to this, To take all that is given, whether wealth, Or love, or language; nothing comes amiss: A good digestion turneth all to health.
—Herbert.

As whole caravans may light their lamps from one candle without exhausting it, so myriads of tribes may gain wisdom from the great Book without impoverishing it.—Rabbi Ben-Azai.

Be still, then, thou uneasy mortal: know that God is unerringly wise; and be assured that, amidst the greatest multiplicity of beings, He does not overlook thee.—James Hervey.

Some men are counted wise from the cunning manner in which they hide their ignorance. In what little they do know such men play the pedant.—A. Ricard.

Wisdom consisteth not in knowing many things, nor even in knowing them thoroughly; but in choosing and in following what conduces the most certainly to our lasting happiness and true glory.—Landor.

It may be said, almost without qualification, that true wisdom consists in the ready and accurate perception of analogies. Without the former quality, knowledge of the past is uninstructional; without the latter it is deceptive.—Whately.

The true greatness and the true happiness of a country consist in wisdom; in that enlarged and comprehensive wisdom which includes education, knowledge, religion, virtue, freedom, with every influence which advances and every institution which supports them.—Henry Giles.

Wisdom is the only thing which can relieve us from the sway of the passions and the fear of danger, and which can teach us to bear the injuries of fortune itself with moderation, and which shows us all the ways which lead to tranquillity and peace.—Cicero.

Though wisdom wake, suspicion sleeps
At wisdom's gate, and to simplicity Resigns her charge, while goodness thinks no ill
Where no ill seems. —Milton.

Wisdom sits alone, topmost in heaven: she is its light, its God; and in the heart of man she sits as high, though groveling minds forget her oftentimes, seeing but this world's idols.—N. P. Willis.

Wouldst thou wisely, and with pleasure,
Pass the days of life's short measure,
From the slow one counsel take,
But a tool of him ne'er make;
Ne'er as friend the swift one know,
Nor the constant one as foe.
—Schiller.

Wisdom is like electricity. There is no permanently wise man, but men capable of wisdom, who, being put into certain company, or other favorable conditions, become wise for a short time, as glasses rubbed acquire electric power for a while.—Emerson.

Few and precious are the words which the lips of Wisdom utter.
To what shall their rarity be likened?
What price shall count their worth?
Perfect and much to be desired, and giving joy with riches,
No lovely thing on earth can picture all their beauty.
—Tupper.

The question is, whether, like the Divine Child in the temple, we are turning knowledge into wisdom, and whether, understanding more of the mysteries of life, we are feeling more of its sacred law: and whether, having left behind the priests and the scribes and the doctors and the fathers, we are about our Father's business, and becoming wise to God.—F. W. Robertson.

Whoever is wise is apt to suspect and be diffident of himself, and upon that account is willing to "hearken unto counsel"; whereas the foolish man, being in proportion to his folly full of himself, and swallowed up in conceit, will seldom take any counsel but his own, and for that very reason, because it is his own. Balguy.

Wisdom for a man's self is, in many branches thereof, a depraved thing; it is the wisdom of rats, that will be sure to leave a house somewhat before it fall; it is the wisdom of the fox, that thrusts out the badger who digged and made room for him; it is the wisdom of crocodiles, that shed tears when they would devour.—Bacon.

Human wisdom makes as ill use of her talent when she exercises it in rescinding from the number and sweetness of those pleasures that are naturally our due, as she employs it favorably and well in artificially disguising and tricking out the ills of life to alleviate the sense of them.—Montaigne.

That man strangely mistakes the manner of spirit he is of who knows not that peaceableness, and gentleness, and mercy, as well as purity, are inseparable characteristics of the wisdom that is from above; and that Christian charity ought never to be sacrificed even for the promotion of evangelical truth.—Bishop Mant.

Every moment instructs, and every object; for wisdom is infused into every form. It has been poured into us as blood; it convulsed us as pain; it slid into us as pleasure; it enveloped us in dull, melancholy days, or in days of cheerful labor; we did not guess its essence until after long time.—Emerson.

Wisdom is a fox who, after long hunting, will at last cost you the pains to dig out; it is a cheese, which, by how much the richer, has the thicker, the homlier, and the coarser coat; and whereof to a judicious palate, the maggots are best. It is a sack posset, wherein the deeper you go, you'll find it the sweeter. Wisdom is a hen, whose cackling we must value and consider, because it is attended with an egg. But lastly, it is a nut, which, unless you choose with judgment, may cost you a tooth, and pay you with nothing but a worm.—Swift.

Socrates was pronounced by the oracle of Delphos to be the wisest man in Greece, which he would turn from himself ironically, saying there could be nothing in him to verify the oracle, except this, that he was not wise and knew it, and others were not wise and knew it not.—Bacon.

"The Prophet's words were true;
The mouth of Ali is the golden door
Of Wisdom."

When his friends to Ali bore These words, he smiled and said: "And should they ask
The same until my dying day, the task
Were easy; for the stream from Wisdom's
well,
Which God supplies, is inexhaustible."
—Bayard Taylor.

But these are foolish things to all the wise,
And I love wisdom more than she loves
me;
My tendency is to philosophise
On most things, from a tyrant to a tree;
But still the spouseless virgin Knowledge flies,
What are we? and whence come we? what shall be
Our ultimate existence? What's our present?
Are questions answerless, and yet incessant.
—Byron.

Vain man would trace the mystic maze
With foolish wisdom, arguing, charge his God,
His balance hold, and guide his angry rod,
New-mould the spheres, and mend the skies'
design,
And sound th' immense with his short scanty line.
Do thou, my soul, the destined period wait,
When God shall solve the dark decrees of fate,
His now unequal dispensation clear,
And make all wise and beautiful appear.
—Tickell.

Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding: for the merchandise of it is better than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold.
She is more precious than rubies: and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared unto her. Length of days is in her right hand; and in her left hand riches and honor. Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace. She is a tree of life to them that lay hold upon her; and happy is every one that retaineth her.—Bible.

Where the eye of pity weeps,
And the sway of passion sleeps,
Where the lamp of faith is burning,
And the ray of hope returning,
Where the "still small voice" within Whispers not of wrath or sin,
Resting with the righteous dead—
Beaming o'er the drooping head—
Comforting the lowly mind,
Wisdom dwelleth—seek and find.

I'll tell the names and sayings and the places of their birth,
Of the seven great ancient sages so renowned on Grecian earth,
The Lidian Cleobulus said, "The mean was still the best;"
The Spartan Chilo, "Know thyself," a heaven-born phrase confessed.
Corinthian Periander taught "Our anger to command,"
"Too much of nothing," Pittacus, from Mitylenes' strand; Athenian Solon this advised, "Look to the end of life,"
And Bias from Priene showed, "Bad men are the most ripe;" Milesian Thales urged that "None should e'er a surety be;"
Few were their words, but if you look,
you'll much in little see.
—From the Greek (author unknown).

Those things on which philosophy has set its seal are beyond the reach of injury; no age will discard them or lessen their force, each succeeding century will add somewhat to the respect in which they are held: for we look upon what is near us with jealous eyes, but we admire what is further off with less prejudice. The wise man's life, therefore, includes much; he is not hedged in by the same limits which confine others; he alone is exempt from the laws by which mankind is governed; all ages serve him like a god. If any time be past he recalls it by his memory, if it be present he uses it, if it be future he anticipates it; his life is a long one because he concentrates all times into it.—Seneca.

Wishes

Every wish is like a prayer with God.—Mrs. Browning.

Our wishes lengthen, as our sun declines.—Young.

We cannot wish for that we know not.—Voltaire.

Thy wish was father, Harry, to that thought.—Shakespeare.

I have immortal longings in me.—Shakespeare.

Where nothing wants that want itself doth seek.—Shakespeare.

What one has wished for in youth, in old age one has in abundance.—Goethe.

If all our wishes were gratified, most of our pleasures would be destroyed.—Whately.

Wishes, like castles in the air, are inexpensive and not taxable.—Haliburton.

Wishes, at least, are the easy pleasures of the poor.—Douglas Jerrold.

Why wish for more?
Wishing of all employments is the worst.
—Young.

Men's thoughts are much according to their inclination.—Bacon.

Fate wings, with every wish, the afflictive dart,
Each gift of nature, and each grace of art.
—Johnson.

Unattainable wishes are often called "pious." This seems to indicate that only profane wishes are fulfilled.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

I could write down twenty cases, wherein I wished God had done otherwise than He did; but which I now see, had I had my own will, would have led to extensive mischief. The life of a Christian is a life of paradoxes.—Cecil.

The apparently irreconcilable dissimilarity between our wishes and our means, between our hearts and this world, remains a riddle.—Richter.

Before we passionately wish for anything, we should carefully examine into the happiness of its possessor.—Rochefoucauld.

We are poor, indeed, when we have no half-wishes left us. The heart and the imagination close the shutters the instant they are gone.—Landor.

It is a fearful mistake to believe that because our wishes are not accomplished they can do no harm.—Gertrude.

Wert thou all that I wish thee, great, glorious and free,
First flower of the earth, and first gem of the sea.
—Moore.

I've often wished that I had clear,
For life, six hundred pounds a year,
A handsome house to lodge a friend,
A river at my garden's end,
A terrace walk, and half a rood
Of land, set out to plant a wood.
—Swift.

I respect the man who knows distinctly what he wishes. The greater part of all the mischief in the world arises from the fact that men do not sufficiently understand their own aims. They have undertaken to build a tower, and spend no more labor on the foundation than would be necessary to erect a hut.—Goethe.

"Man wants but little here below Nor wants that little long,"
'Tis not with me exactly so;
But 'tis so in the song.
My wants are many, and, if told,
Would muster many a score;
And were each wish a mint of gold,
I still should long for more.
—John Quincy Adams.

Knowest thou the land where the lemon-trees flourish, where amid the shadowed leaves the golden oranges glisten,—a gentle zephyr breathes from the blue heavens, the myrtle is motionless, and the laurel rises high? Dost thou know it well? Thither, thither, fain would I fly with thee, O my beloved!—Goethe.

Wit

Wit is an unexpected explosion of thought.—Whipple.

You may be witty, but not satirical.—Horace Greeley.

The finest wits have their sediment.—Emerson.

So vast is art; so narrow human wit.—Pope.

What quick wit is found in sudden straits!—Martial.

Ev'n wit's a burthen, when it talks too long.—Dryden.

Wit does not take the place of knowledge.—Vauvenargues.

Avoid witticisms at the expense of others.—Horace Mann.

Wit is the salt of conversation, not the food.—Hazlitt.

Wit and judgment often are at strife.—Pope.

Wit,—the pupil of the soul's clear eye.—Sir John Davies.

Sir, your wit ambles well; it goes easily.—Shakespeare.

How the wit brightens! how the style refines!—Pope.

Wit and humor belong to genius alone.—Cervantes.

Wit is the flower of the imagination.—Livy.

A wit with dunces, and a dunce with wits.—Pope.

Wit has as few true judges as painting.—Wycherley.

Wit should be wit, but never satire.—Madame La Rochejaquelein.

Thy wit is as quick as the greyhound's mouth—it catches.—Shakespeare.

Wit sometimes enables us to act rudely with impunity.—La Rochefoucauld.

Wit is the refractory pupil of judgment.—Shenstone.

They have a plentiful lack of wit.—Shakespeare.

There's a skirmish of wit between them.—Shakespeare.

True wit never made us laugh.—Emerson.

Wit without an employment is a disease.—Burton.

Humor is consistent with pathos, whilst wit is not.—Coleridge.

Truth, when witty, is the wittiest of all things.—J. C. and A. W. Hare.

A good wit will make use of anything.—Shakespeare.

What silly people wits are!—Beaumarchais.

The life of a wit is a warfare upon earth.—Pope.

Those who object to wit are envious of it.—Hazlitt.

That is not wit which consists not with wisdom.—South.

Don't put too fine a point to your wit, for fear it should get blunted.—Cervantes.

It is often a sign of wit not to show it, and not to see that others want it.—Madame Necker.

The character of false wit is that of appearing to depend only upon reason.—Vauvenargues.

There is many a man hath more hair than wit.—Shakespeare.

If satire charms, strike faults, but spare the man.—Young.

Wit is the god of moments, but genius is the god of ages.—Bruyère.

It marries ideas lying wide apart, by a sudden jerk of the understanding.—E. P. Whipple.

The impromptu reply is precisely the touch-stone of the man of wit.—Molière.

Through the harsh cadence of a rugged line. Wit will shine —Dryden.

Great wits and valours, like great states, Do sometimes sink with their own weights.—Butler.

I am not only witty in myself, but the cause that wit is in other men.—Shakespeare.

It is having in some measure a sort of wit, to know how to use the wit of others.—Stanislaus.

As wit is too hard for power in council, so power is too hard for wit in action.—Wycherley.

Women ought not to know their own wit, because they will still be showing it, and so spoil it.—John Selden.

Wit is of the true Pierian spring, that can make anything of anything.—Chapman.

Aristotle said * * * melancholy men of all others are most witty.—Burton.

To place wit before good sense is to place the superfluous before the necessary.—M. de Montlosier.

Wit has its place in debate; in controversy it is a legitimate weapon, offensive and defensive.—Theodore Parker.

Wit, to be well defined, must be defined by wit itself; then it will be worth listening to.—Zimmermann.

I am a fool . . . yet, I'm poor enough to be a wit.—Congreve.

In cheerful souls there is no wit. Wit shows a disturbance of the equipoise.—Novalis.

Wit and wisdom differ; wit is upon the sudden turn, wisdom is bringing about ends.—Selden.

And one may say that his wit shines at the expense of his memory.—Alain René Le Sage.

Great wits are sure to madness near allied, And thin partitions do their bounds divide.—Dryden.

The wit of men compared to that of women is like rouge compared to the rose.—Saint Foix.

Sharp wits, like sharp knives, do often cut their owner's fingers.—Arrowsmith.

You beat your pate, and fancy wit will come; Knock as you please, there's nobody at home.—Pope.

Witticisms never are agreeable, which are injurious to others.—From the Latin.

I fear nothing so much as a man who is witty all day long.—Madame de Sévigné.

It is inconceivable how much wit it requires to avoid being ridiculous.—Chamfort.

There must be more malice than love in the hearts of all wits.—B. R. Haydon.

Wit, now and then, struck smartly, shows a spark.—Cowper.

When we seek after wit, we discover only foolishness.—Montesquieu.

Repartee is precisely the touch-stone of the man of wit.—Molière.

Wit is the rarest quality to be met with among people of education, and the most common among the uneducated.—Hazlitt.

Men are contented to be laughed at for their wit, but not for their folly.—Swift.

Wit will never make a man rich, but there are places where riches will always make a wit.—Johnson.

The wit of language is so miserably inferior to the wit of ideas that it is very deservedly driven out of good company.—Sydney Smith.

Genuine wit implies no small amount of wisdom and culture.—Moses Harvey.

To leave this keen encounter of our wits, and fall somewhat into a slower method.—Shakespeare.

Genuine and innocent wit is surely the very flavor of the mind.—Moses Harvey.

Oh, help thou my weak wit, and sharpen my dull tongue!—Spenser.

His sparkling sallies bubbled up as from areated natural fountains.—Carlyle.

Of all wit's uses, the main one is to live well with who has none.—Emerson.

Erasmus injured us more by his wit than Luther by his anger.—Leo X.

His wit run him out of his money, and now his poverty has run him out of his wits.—Congreve.

For the qualities of sheer wit and humor, Swift had no superior, ancient or modern.—Leigh Hunt.

Only just the right quantum of wit should be put into a book; in conversation a little excess is allowable.—Joubert.

The falling-out of wits is like the falling-out of lovers: we agree in the main, like treble and bass.—Congreve.

His wit invites you by his looks to come; but when you knock, it never is at home.—Cowper.

There is nothing so unready as readiness of wit.—Rivarol.

Humor is the offspring of man; it comes forth like Minerva, fully armed from the brain.—L'Estrange.

Anger makes dull men witty, but keeps them poor.—Bacon.

Thy wit is a very bitter sweetening; it is a most sharp sauce.—Shakespeare.

I will keep where there is wit stirring, and leave the faction of fools.—Shakespeare.

This fellow pecks up wit as pigeons pease; he is wit's peddler.—Shakespeare.

Whose wit in the combat, gentle as bright, ne'er carried a heart-stain away on its blade.—Moore.

True wit is everlasting, like the sun; describing all men, but described by none.—Buckingham.

Though I am young, I scorn to flit
On the wings of borrowed wit.
—George Wither.

Wit is an intermittent fountain; kindness is a perennial spring.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

A man does not please long when he has only one species of wit.—La Rochefoucauld.

Look, he's winding up the watch of his wit; by and by it will strike.—Shakespeare.

Modest plainness sets off sprightly wit,
For works may have more wit than do
'em good,
As bodies perish through excess of blood.
—Pope.

A good old man, sir; he will be talking; as they say, When the age is in, the wit is out.—Shakespeare.

Self-wit is so ardent and active that it will break a sword to pieces to make a stool to sit on.—Cecil.

Surprise is so essential an ingredient of wit that no wit will bear repetition; at least, the original electrical feeling produced by any piece of wit can never be renewed.—Sydney Smith.

We find ourselves less witty in remembering what we have said than in dreaming of what we would have said.—J. Petit-Senn.

There are some men who are witty when they are in a bad humor, and others only when they are sad.—Joubert.

There's no possibility of being witty without a little ill-nature; the malice of a good thing is the barb that makes it stick.—Sheridan.

Methinks sometimes that I have no more wit than a Christian or an ordinary man has; but I am a great eater of beef, and I believe that does harm to my wit.—Shakespeare.

Make the doors upon a woman's wit, and it will out at the casement; shut that, and 'twill out at the keyhole; stop that, 'twill fly with the smoke out at the chimney.—Shakespeare.

Wit, without wisdom, is salt without meat; and that is but a comfortless dish to set a hungry man down to.—Bishop Horne.

With little wit and ease to suit them,
They whirl in narrow circling trails,
Like kittens playing with their tails.

—Goethe.

We prefer a person with vivacity and high spirits, though bordering upon insolence, to the timid and pusillanimous; we are fonder of wit joined to malice than of dullness without it.—Hazlitt.

Rallery is a mode of speaking in favor of one's wit at the expense of one's better nature.—Montesquieu.

Men of humor are always in some degree men of genius; wits are rarely so, although a man of genius may, amongst other gifts, possess wit, as Shakespeare.—Coleridge.

The hapless wit has his labors always to begin, the call for novelty is never satisfied, and one jest only raises expectation of another.—Johnson.

There are as many and innumerable degrees of wit, as there are cubits between this and heaven.—Montaigne.

Intemperate wits will spare neither friend nor foe, and make themselves the common enemies of mankind.—L'Estrange.

Wit, like money, bears an extra value when rung down immediately it is wanted. Men pay severely who require credit.—Douglas Jerrold.

It is a certain rule that wit and passion are entirely incompatible. When the affections are moved, there is no place for the imagination.—Hume.

Wit is more necessary than beauty; and I think no young woman ugly that has it, and no handsome woman agreeable without it.—Wycherley.

One wit, like a knuckle of ham in soup, gives a zest and flavor to the dish; but more than one serves only to spoil the pottage.—Smollett.

An elegant writer has observed, that wit may do very well for a mistress, but that he should prefer reason for a wife.—Colton.

Rudeness is a sauce to his good wit,
Which gives men stomach to digest his words,

With better appetite. —Shakespeare.

A jest's prosperity lies in the ear of him that hears it, never in the tongue of him that makes it.—Shakespeare.

The fairest blossoms of pleasantry thrive best where the sun is not strong enough to scorch, nor the soil rank enough to corrupt.—L'Estrange.

Wits, like drunken men with swords, are apt to draw their steel upon their best acquaintances.—Douglas Jerrold.

Antithesis may be the blossom of wit, but it will never arrive at maturity unless sound sense be the trunk and truth the root.—Colton.

Wit is, in general, the finest sense in the world. I had lived long before I discovered that wit was truth.—Dr. Porson.

The lowest boor may laugh on being tickled, but a man must have intelligence to be amused by wit.—L'Estrange.

It is with wits as with razors, which are never so apt to cut those they are employed upon as when they have lost their edge.—Swift.

Wit consists in knowing the resemblance of things which differ, and the difference of things which are alike.—Madame de Staël.

It is no great advantage to possess a quick wit, if it is not correct; the perfection is not speed, but uniformity.—Vauvenargues.

This man [Chesterfield] I thought had been a lord among wits; but I find he is only a wit among lords.—Sam'l Johnson.

His eye begets occasion for his wit;
For every object that the one doth catch,
The other turns to a mirth-moving jest.
—Shakespeare.

Great men may jest with saints; 'tis wit in them;
But, in the less, foul profanation.
—Shakespeare.

A small degree of wit, accompanied by good sense, is less tiresome in the long run than a great amount of wit without it.—La Rochefoucauld.

Sharpness cuts slight things best;
solid, nothing cuts through but weight and strength; the same in the use of intellectuals.—Sir W. Temple.

There are heads sometimes so little, that there is no room for wit, sometimes so long that there is no wit for so much room.—Fuller.

For wit and judgment often are at strife,
Though meant each other's aid, like man and wife.
—Pope.

It is by vivacity and wit that man shines in company; but trite jokes and loud laughter reduce him to a buffoon.—Chesterfield.

The most brilliant flashes of wit come from a clouded mind, as lightning leaps only from an obscure firmament.—Bovee.

Wit, like hunger, will be with great difficulty restrained from falling on vice and ignorance, where there is great plenty and variety of food.—Fielding.

Wit is a dangerous weapon, even to the possessor, if he knows not how to use it discreetly.—Montaigne.

I cannot imagine why we should be at the expense to furnish wit for succeeding ages, when the former have made no sort of provision for ours.—Swift.

Wit implies hatred or contempt of folly and crime, produces its effects by brisk shocks of surprise, uses the whip of scorpions and the branding-iron, stabs, stings, pinches, tortures, goads, teases, corrodes, undermines.—E. P. Whipple.

As in smooth oil, the razor best is whet,
So wit is by politeness sharpest set;
Their want of edge from their offence is seen;
Both pain us least when exquisitely keen.
—Young.

I have no more pleasure in hearing a man attempting wit and failing, than in seeing a man trying to leap over a ditch and tumbling into it.—Dr. Johnson.

It is much easier to decide what is not humorous than what is, and very difficult to define it otherwise than

Cowley has done, by negatives.—Addison.

Too much or too little wit
Do only render th' owner fit
For nothing, but to be undone Much easier than if they'd none.
—Butler.

True wit is like the brilliant stone,
Dug from the Indian mine,
Which boasts two different pow'rs in one,
To cut as well as shine.

—Notes and Queries.

A Christian's wit is offensive light,
A beam that aids, but never grieves the
sight;
Vig'rous in age as in the flush of youth,
Tis always active on the side of truth.

—Cowper.

Some wits, like oracles, deal in ambiguities, but not with equal success; for though ambiguities are the first excellence of an impostor, they are the last of a wit.—Young.

It consisteth in one knows not what,
and springeth up one can hardly tell how. Its ways are unaccountable and inexplicable, being answerable to the numberless roving of fancy and windings of language.—Dr. Barrow.

Since brevity is the soul of wit,
And tediousness the limbs and outward flourishes,
I will be brief.

—Shakespeare.

Against their wills what numbers ruin shun,
Purely through want of wit to be undone!
Nature has shown by making it so rare,
That wit's a jewel which we need not wear.

—Young.

Wit is not levelled so much at the muscles as at the heart; and the latter will sometimes smile when there is not a single wrinkle on the cheek.
—Lord Lyttleton.

Many species of wit are quite mechanical; these are the favorites of witlings, whose fame in words scarce outlives the remembrance of their funeral ceremonies.—Zimmermann.

Wit is brushwood, judgment timber; the one gives the greatest flame,
the other yields the durablest heat;

and both meeting make the best fire.—
Sir Thomas Overbury.

From Lucifer to Jerry Sneak there is not an aspect of evil, imperfection, and littleness which can elude the lights of humor or the lightning of wit.—Whipple.

The best thing next to wit is a consciousness that it is not in us; without wit, a man might then know how to behave himself, so as not to appear to be a fool or a coxcomb.—
Bruyère.

Less judgment than wit is more sail than ballast. Yet it must be confessed that wit gives an edge to sense, and recommends it extremely.—William Penn.

Wit, says an author that I do not know,
Is like Time's scythe—cuts down both friend and foe;—

Ready, each object, tiger-like, to leap on!
"Lord! what a butcher this same wit!"

—Peter Pindar.

Some to conceit alone their taste confine,
And glittering thoughts struck out at ev'ry line; Pleas'd with a work where nothing's just or fit;

One glaring chaos and wild heap of wit.

—Pope.

Wit consists in assembling, and putting together with quickness, ideas in which can be found resemblance and congruity, by which to make up pleasant pictures and agreeable visions in the fancy.—Locke.

I give you full credit for your elegant diction, well-turned periods, and Attic wit; but wit is oftentimes false, though it may appear brilliant; which is exactly the case of your whole performance.—Junius.

Wit throws a single ray, separated from the rest,—red, yellow, blue, or any intermediate shade,—upon an object; never white light; that is the province of wisdom. We get beautiful effects from wit,—all the prismatic colors,—but never the object as it is in fair daylight.—Holmes.

That which we call wit consists much in quickness and tricks, and is so full of lightness that it seldom goes with judgment and solidity; but when they do meet, it is commonly in an honest man.—King James I.

Wit, bright, rapid, and blasting as the lightning, flashes, strikes, and vanishes, in an instant; humor, warm and all-embracing as the sunshine, bathes its object in a genial and abiding light.—Whipple.

Even when there is a real stock of wit, yet the wittiest sayings and sentences will be found in a great measure the issue of chance, and nothing else but so many lucky hits of a roving fancy.—South.

Genuine witticisms surprise those who say them as much as those who listen to them; they arise in us in spite of us, or, at least, without our participation,—like everything inspired.—Joubert.

Wit in women is a jewel, which, unlike all others, borrows lustre from its setting, rather than bestows it; since nothing is so easy as to fancy a very beautiful woman extremely witty.—Colton.

If he who has little wit needs a master to inform his stupidity, he who has much frequently needs ten to keep in check his worldly wisdom, which might otherwise, like a high-mettled charger, toss him to the ground.—Scriver.

Perpetual aiming at wit is a very bad part of conversation. It is done to support a character: it generally fails; it is a sort of insult on the company, and a restraint upon the speaker.—Swift.

Man could direct his ways by plain reason, and support his life by tasteless food; but God has given us wit, and flavor, and brightness, and laughter, and perfumers, to enliven the days of man's pilgrimage, and to "charm his pained steps over the burning marl."—Sydney Smith.

Superiority in wit is more frequently the cause of vanity than superiority of judgment; as the person that wears an ornamental sword is ever more vain than he that wears a useful one.—Shenstone.

Sense is our helmet, wit is but the plume, The plume exposes, 'tis our helmet saves. Sense is the diamond, weighty, solid, sound; When cut by wit, it casts a brighter beam; Yet, wit apart, it is a diamond still.

—Young

If wit is to be measured by the circumstances of time and place, there is no man has generally so little of that talent as he who is a wit by profession. What he says, instead of arising from the occasion, has an occasion invented for bringing it in.—Steele.

With the latitude of unbounded scurrility, it is easy enough to attain the character of a wit, especially when it is considered how wonderfully pleasant it is to the generality of the public to see the folly of their acquaintance exposed by a third person.—Fielding.

The essence of every species of wit is surprise; which, vi termini, must be sudden; and the sensations which wit has a tendency to excite are impaired or destroyed as often as they are mingled with much thought or passion.—Sydney Smith.

Wit must be without effort. Wit is play, not work; a nimbleness of the fancy, not a laborious effort of the will; a license, a holiday, a carnival of thought and feeling, not a trifling with speech, a constraint upon language, a duress upon words.—Bovee.

Nature and society are so replete with startling contrasts that wit often consists in the mere statement and comparison of facts, as when Hume says that the ancient Muscovites wedded their wives with a whip instead of a ring.—Whipple.

Wit generally succeeds more from being happily addressed than from its native poignancy. A jest, calculated to spread at a gaming-table, may be received with perfect indifference should it happen to drop in a mackerel-boat.—Goldsmith.

Let your wit rather serve you for a buckler to defend yourself, by a handsome reply, than the sword to wound others, though with ever so facetious reproach; remembering that a word cuts deeper than a sharper weapon, and the wound it makes is longer curing.—F. Osborn.

Though wit be very useful, yet unless a wise man has the keeping of it, that knows when, where, and how to apply it, it is like wild-fire, that flies at rovers, runs hissing about, and blows up everything that comes in its way, without any respect or discrimination.—Walter Scott.

False wit is a fatiguing search after cunning traits, an affectation of saying in enigmas what others have already said naturally, to hang together ideas which are incompatible, to divide that which ought to be united, of seizing false relations.—Voltaire.

By wit we search divine aspect above,
By wit we learn what secrets science yields,
By wit we speak, by wit the mind is rul'd,
By wit we govern all our actions;
Wit is the loadstar of each human thought,
Wit is the tool by which all things are wrought.
—Robert Greene.

Wit is its own remedy. Liberty and commerce bring it to its true standard. The only danger is the laying an embargo. The same thing happens here as in the case of trade: impositions and restrictions reduce it to a low ebb; nothing is so advantageous to it as a free port.—Shaftesbury.

I have seen many so prone to quip and gird, as they would rather lose their friend than their jest. And if perchance their boiling brain yield a quaint scoff, they will travail to be delivered of it, as a woman with child. These nimble fancies are but the froth of wit.—Lord Burleigh.

The essence of the ludicrous consists in surprise,—in unexpected terms of feeling and explosions of thought,—often bringing dissimilar things together with a shock; as when some wit called Boyle, the celebrated philosopher, the father of chemistry and brother of the Earl of Cork.—Whipple.

Wit's an unruly engine, wildly striking
Sometimes a friend, sometimes the engineer:

Hast thou the knack? pamper it not with liking;

But if thou want it, buy it not too deare.
Many affecting wit beyond their power,
Have got to be a deare fool for an houre.

—Herbert.

When wit is combined with sense and information; when it is softened by benevolence and restrained by strong principle; when it is in the hands of a man who can use it and despise it, who can be witty and something much better than witty, who loves honor, justice, decency, good-nature, morality, and religion, ten thousand times better than wit,—wit is then a beautiful and delightful part of our nature.—Sydney Smith.

As the repute of wisdom, so of wit also, is very casual, sometimes a lucky saying or a pertinent reply has procured an esteem of wit to persons otherwise very shallow; so that, if such a one should have the ill-hap to strike a man dead with a smart saying, it ought in all reason and conscience to be judged but a chance medley.—South.

Wit, how delicious to man's dainty taste!
'Tis precious as the vehicle of sense;
But, as its substitute, a dire disease;
Pernicious talent! flatter'd by the world,
By the blind world, which thinks the talent rare.

Wisdom is rare—wit abounds.
Passion can give it; sometimes wine inspires
The lucky flash, and madness rarely fails.

—Young.

Wit, like every other power, has its boundaries. Its success depends on the aptitude of others to receive impressions; and that as some bodies, indissoluble by heat, can set the fur-pace and crucible at defiance, there are minds upon which the rays of fancy may be pointed without effect, and which no fire of sentiment can agitate or exalt.—Johnson.

Men famed for wit, of dangerous talents vain,

Treat those of common parts with proud disdain;

The powers that wisdom would, improving, hide,

They blaze abroad, with inconsiderate pride; While yet but mere probationers for fame, They seize the honor they should then disclaim:

Honor so hurried to the light must fade, The lasting laurels flourish in the shade.

—Crabbe.

Wit makes its own welcome, and levels all distinction. No dignity, no learning, no force of character, can make any stand against good wit. It is like ice, on which no beauty of form, no majesty of carriage, can plead any immunity; they must walk gingerly, according to the laws of ice, or down they must go, dignity and all.—Emerson.

Wit gives to life one of its best flavors; common-sense leads to immediate action, and gives society its daily motion: large and comprehensive views, its annual rotation; ridicule chastises folly and imprudence, and keeps men in their proper sphere; subtly seizes hold of the fine threads of truth; analogy darts away in the most sublime discoveries; feeling paints all the exquisite passions of man's soul, and rewards him by a thousand inward visitations for the sorrows that come from without.—Sydney Smith.

Witches

What are these,

So wither'd, and so wild in their attire; That look not like the inhabitants o' the earth,

And yet are on't. —Shakespeare.

Midnight hags,

By force of potent spells, of bloody characters,

And conjurations, horrible to hear,

Call fiends and spectres from the yawning deep,

And set the ministers of hell at work.

—Rewe.

Sex to the last. —Dryden.

My only books
Were woman's looks,
And folly's all they've taught me.
—Moore.

Women are like thermometers, which on a sudden application of heat sink at first a few degrees, as a preliminary to rising a good many.—Richter.

A woman's best qualities do not reside in her intellect, but in her affections. She gives refreshment by her sympathies, rather than by her knowledge.—Samuel Smiles.

I know the nature of women. When you will, they will not; when you will not, they come of their own accord.—

Terence.

She hath a natural wise sincerity, a simple truthfulness, and these have lent her a dignity as moveless as the centre.—Lowell.

I have often thought that the nature of women was inferior to that of men in general, but superior in particular.
—Lord Greville.

Loveliest of women! heaven is in thy soul,
Beauty and virtue shine forever round thee,
Brightening each other! thou art all divine.
—Addison.

Men can be great when great occasions call:
In little duties women find their spheres,
The narrow cares that cluster round the hearth. —R. H. Stoddard.

A woman mixed of such fine elements
That were all virtue and religion dead She'd make them newly, being what she was. —George Eliot.

How sweetly sounds the voice of a good woman!
It is so seldom heard, that, when it speaks,
It ravishes all senses. —Massinger.

A woman's rank
Lies in the fulness of her womanhood:
Therein alone she is royal.
—George Eliot.

'Tis beauty, that doth oft make women
proud; * * * *

'Tis virtue, that doth make them most admired; * * * *

'Tis government, that makes them seem divine. —Shakespeare.

A woman is the most inconsistent compound of obstinacy and self-sacrifice that I am acquainted with.—
Richter.

One woman is fair; yet I am well:
another is wise; yet I am well: another virtuous; yet I am well. But till all graces be in one woman, one woman shall not come in my grace.—
Shakespeare.

Men's hearts and faces are always wide asunder; women's are not only in close connection, but are mirror-like in the instant power of reflection.

—Chamfort.

Offend her, and she knows not to forgive;
Oblige her, and she'll hate you while you live. —Pope.

O loving woman, man's fulfillment, sweet,
Completing him not otherwise complete!
How void and useless the sad remnant left
Were he of her, his nobler part, bereft.
—Abraham Coles.

Without our hopes, without our fears,
Without the home that plighted love endears,
Without the smile from partial beauty won,
Oh! what were man?—a world without a sun. —Campbell.

Pleasure is to women what the sun is to the flower; if moderately enjoyed, it beautifies, it refreshes, and it improves; if immoderately, it withers, deteriorates and destroys.—Colton.

Women are much more like each other than men: they have, in truth, but two passions, vanity and love;
these are their universal characteristics.
—Chesterfield.

A virtuous mind in a fair body is indeed a fine picture in a good light, and therefore it is no wonder that it makes the beautiful sex all over charms.—Addison.

On one she smiled, and he was bles.;
She smiles elsewhere—we make a din!
But 'twas not love which heaved her breast, Fair child!—it was the bliss within.
—Matthew Arnold.

Thy daughters bright thy walks adorn,
Gay as the gilded summer sky,
Sweet as the dewy milk-white thorn,
Dear as the raptured thrill of joy.
—Burns.

You forget too much
That every creature, female as the male, Stands single in responsible act and
thought,
As also in birth and death.
—E. B. Browning.

The majority of women have no principles of their own; they are guided by the heart, and depend for their own conduct, upon that of the men they love.—Bruyère.

To see her is to love her,
And love but her forever;
For nature made her what she is,
And never made anither!
—Burns.

Auld nature swears, the lovely dears
Her noblest work she classes, O;
Her 'prentice han' she tried on man,
And then she made the lasses, O.
—Burns.

Oh, Woman, perfect woman! what distraction Was meant to mankind when thou wast made a devil!
What an inviting hell invented.
—Beaumont and Fletcher.

The souls of women are so small,
That some believe they've none at all;
Or, if they have, like cripples, still They've but one faculty, the will.
—Butler.

But she was a soft landscape of mild
earth,
Where all was harmony, and calm, and
quiet,
Luxuriant, budding; cheerful without mirth.
—Byron.

A tigress robb'd of young, a lioness,
Or any interesting beast of prey,
Are similes at hand for the distress
Of ladies who cannot have their own way.
—Byron.

Some waltz; some draw; some fathom the abyss
Of metaphysics; others are content With music; the most moderate shine as wits,
While others have a genius turn'd for fits.
—Byron.

I am resolved to grow fat and look young till forty, and then slip out of the world with the first wrinkle and the reputation of five and twenty.—
Dryden.

What furniture can give such finish to a room as a tender woman's face?
and is there any harmony of tints that has such stirrings of delight as the sweet modulations of her voice?—
George Eliot.

Women never truly command till they have given their promise to obey; and they are never in more danger of being made slaves than when the men are at their feet.—Farquhar.

To describe women, the pen should be dipped in the humid colors of the rainbow, and the paper dried with the dust gathered from the wings of a butterfly.—Diderot.

To think of the part one little woman can play in the life of a man, so that to renounce her may be a very good imitation of heroism, and to win her may be a discipline.—George Eliot.

Let men say what they will; according to the experience I have learned, I require in married women the economical virtue above all other virtues.—Fuller.

If thou wouldst hear what seemly is and fit, inquire of noble woman; they can tell, who in life's common usage hold their place by graceful deed and aptly chosen word.—Goethe.

At present the most valuable gift which can be bestowed on women is something to do, which they can do well and worthily, and thereby maintain themselves.—James A. Garfield.

I am a woman—therefore I may not Call to him, cry to him,
Fly to him,
Bid him delay not!
—R. W. Gilder.

When lovely woman stoops to folly,
And finds too late that men betray,
What charm can soothe her melancholy?
What art can wash her guilt away?
—Goldsmith.

First, then, a woman will, or won't, depend on't;
If she will do't, she will; and there's an end on't.
But if she won't, since safe and sound your trust is,
Fear is affront, and jealousy injustice.
—Aaron Hill.

Women of forty always fancy they have found the Fountain of Youth, and that they remain young in the midst of the ruins of their day.—Arsène Houssaye.

Teach him to live unto God and unto thee; and he will discover that women, like the plants in woods, derive their softness and tenderness from the shade.—Londor.

When greater perils men environ,
Then women show a front of iron;
And, gentle in their manner, they Do bold things in a quiet way.

—Thomas Dunn English.

And where she went, the flowers took thickest root.
As she had sow'd them with her odorous foot.

—Ben Jonson.

I never addressed myself in the language of decency and friendship to a woman, whether civilised or savage, without receiving a decent and friendly answer.—Ledyard.

A Lady with a lamp shall stand
In the great history of the land,
A noble type of good,
Heroic womanhood.

—Longfellow.

Oh! why did God, * * * create at last

This novelty on earth, this fair defect
Of nature, and not fill the world at once
With men as angels without feminine.

—Milton.

O fairest of creation! last and best Of all God's works! creature in whom excell'd
Whatever can to sight or thought be form'd
Holy, divine, good, amiable, or sweet!

—Milton.

O woman, born first to believe us;
Yea, also born first to forget;
Born first to betray and deceive us,
Yet first to repent and regret.

—Joaquin Miller.

O woman! whose form and whose soul
Are the spell and the light of each path we pursue;
Whether sunn'd in the tropics, or chill'd
at the pole,
If woman be there, there is happiness too.

—Moore.

There is nothing by which I have, through life, more profited by than the just observations, the good opinion, and the sincere and gentle encouragement of amiable and sensible women.

—Romilly.

O, if the loving, closed heart of a good woman should open before a man,

how much controlled tenderness, how many veiled sacrifices and dumb virtues, would he see reposing therein?—
Richter.

Angels listen when she speaks;
She's my delight, all mankind's wonder;
But my jealous heart would break
Should we live one day asunder.

—Earl of Rochester.

Women, like summer storms, awhile are cloudy,
Burst out in thunder and impetuous
showers:
But straight the sun of beauty dawns
abroad,
And all the fair horizon is serene.

—Rowe.

Women have many faults, but of the many this is the greatest, that they please themselves too much, and give too little attention to pleasing the men.—Plautus.

And yet believe me, good as well as ill,
Woman's at best a contradiction still Heaven, when it strives to polish all it can
Its last best work, but forms a softer man.

—Pope.

To the disgrace of men it is seen that there are women both more wise to judge what evil is expected, and more constant to bear it when it is happened.—Sir P. Sidney.

One moral's plain—without more fuss;
Man's social happiness all rests on us;
Through all the drama—whether damn'd or
not—Love gilds the scene, and women guide the plot.

—Sheridan.

The prevailing manners of an age depend, more than we are aware of, or are willing to allow, on the conduct of the women: this is one of the principal things on which the great machine of human society turns.—Blair.

Why are our bodies soft, and weak, and smooth,
Unapt to toil and trouble in the world,
But that our soft conditions, and our hearts,
Should well agree with our external parts.

—Shakespeare.

However we do praise ourselves, our fancies are more giddy and unfirm more longing, wavering, sooner lost and won, than women's are.—Shakespeare.

Fair ladies mask'd are roses in their bud:
Dismask'd, their damask sweet commixture shown,
Are angels veiling clouds, or roses blown.
—Shakespeare.

If, one by one, you wedded all the world,
Or from the all that are took something good.

To make a perfect woman, she you kill'd
Would be unparallel'd. —Shakespeare.

I thank God I am not a woman, to be touched with so many giddy offences as He hath generally taxed their whole sex withal.—Shakespeare.

Make the doors upon a woman's wit, and it will out at the casement; shut that, and it will out at the key-hole; stop that, it will fly with the smoke out at the chimney.—Shakespeare.

I grant I am a woman, but withal,
A woman that Lord Brutus took to wife:
I grant I am a woman; but withal
A woman well-reputed; Cato's daughter.
—Shakespeare.

They never reason, or, if they do, they either draw correct inferences from wrong premises or wrong inferences from correct premises; and they always poke the fire from the top.— Whately.

As pure and sweet, her fair brow seemed Eternal as the sky:
And like the brook's low song, her voice,—
A sound which could not die.
—Whittier.

Sweet promptings unto kindest deeds
Were in her very look;
We read her face, as one who reads
A true and holy book. —Whittier.

She was a soft landscape of mild earth,
Where all was harmony, and calm, and
quiet,
Luxuriant, budding; cheerful without mirth,
Which, if not happiness, is much more nigh it
Than are your mighty passions.
—Byron.

No amount of preaching, exhortation, sympathy, benevolence, will render the condition of our working-women what it should be so long as the kitchen and the needle are substantially their only resources.—Horace Greeley.

Then, my good girls, be more than women,
wise:
At least be more than I was; and be sur-
You credit anything the light gives life to Before a man.
—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Woman, they say, was only made of man:
Methinks 'tis strange they should be so unlikely!

It may be all the best was cut away,
To make the woman, and the naught was left

Behind with him.
—Beaumont and Fletcher.

A woman's counsel brought us first to woe,
And made her man his paradise forego,
Where at heart's ease he liv'd; and might have been
As free from sorrow as he was from sin.
—Dryden.

They the royal-hearted women are
Who nobly love the noblest, yet have grace
For needy suffering lives in lowliest place,
Carrying a choicer sunlight in their smile,
The heavenliest ray that pitieth the vile.
—George Eliot.

O woman ! woman ! thou shouldest have few sins of thine own to answer for ! Thou art the author of such a book of follies in a man that it would need the tears of all the angels to blot the record out.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Nature has given women two painful but heavenly gifts, which distinguish them, and often raise them above human nature,—compassion and enthusiasm. By compassion, they devote themselves; by enthusiasm they exalt themselves.—Lamartine.

Yet when I approach
Her loveliness, so absolute she seems,
And in herself complete; so well to know
Her own, that what she wills to do or say, Seems wisest, virtuousest, discreetest, best.
—Milton.

Nature sent women into the world with this bridal dower of love, for this reason, that they might be, what their destination is, mothers, and love children, to whom sacrifices must ever be offered, and from whom none are to be obtained.—Richter.

The woman must not belong to herself; she is bound to alien destinies. But she performs her part best who can take freely of her own choice, the alien to her heart, can bear and foster it with sincerity and love.—Richter.

Woman is the highest, holiest, most precious gift to man. Her mission and throne is the family, and if anything is withheld that would make her more efficient, useful, or happy in that sphere, she is wronged, and has not her rights.—John Todd.

A maid

That paragon's description and wild fame;
One that excels the quirks of blazoning
pens,
And in the essential vesture of creation
Does tire the ingener. —Shakespeare.

Her sighs will make a battery in his breast;
Her tears will pierce into a marble heart;
The tiger will be mild whiles she doth mourn;
And Nero will be tainted with remorse,
To hear and see her plaints.
—Shakespeare.

I have often reflected within myself on this unaccountable humor in womankind, of being smitten with everything that is showy and superficial; and on the numberless evils that befall the sex from this light fantastical disposition.—Addison.

What a strange thing is man! and what a stranger
Is woman! What a whirlwind is her head,
And what a whirlpool full of depth and danger
Is all the rest about her. —Byron.

A worthless woman! mere cold clay
As all false things are! but so fair,
She takes the breath of men away
Who gaze upon her unaware:
I would not play her larcenous tricks
To have her looks!
—E. B. Browning.

An inconstant woman is one who is no longer in love; a false woman is one who is already in love with another person; a fickle woman is she who neither knows whom she loves nor whether she loves or not; and the indifferent woman, one who does not love at all.—Bruyère.

Man has subdued the world, but woman has subdued man. Mind and muscle have won his victories; love and loveliness have gained hers. No monarch has been so great, no peasant so lowly, that he has not been glad to lay his best at the feet of a woman.—
Gail Hamilton.

Her air, her manners, all who saw admired;
Courteous though coy, and gentle, though retired:
The joy of youth and health her eyes dis-
play'd,
And ease of heart her every look convey'd.
—Crabbe.

Man pays deference to woman instinctively, involuntarily, not because she is beautiful or truthful or wise or foolish or proper, but because she is a woman, and he cannot help it. If she descends, he will lower to her level; if she rises, he will rise to her height.—
Gail Hamilton.

Some are so uncharitable as to think all women bad, and others are so credulous as to believe they are all good. All will grant her corporeal frame more wonderful and more beautiful than man's. And can we think God would put a worse soul into a better body?—Feltham.

A woman's whole life is a history of the affections. The heart is her world:
it is there her ambition strives for empire; it is there her avarice seeks for hidden treasures. She sends forth her sympathies on adventure; she embarks her whole soul in the traffic of affection; and, if shipwrecked, her case is hopeless—for it is a bankruptcy of the heart.—Irving.

Whatever littleness and vanity is to be observed in the minds of women, it is, like the cruelty of butchers, a temper that is wrought into them by that life which they are taught and accustomed to lead.—William Law.

For if a young lady has that discretion and modesty, without which all knowledge is little worth, she will never make an ostentatious parade of it, because she will rather be intent on acquiring more, than on displaying what she has.—Hannah More.

A female heart is often like marble: the cunning stone cutter strikes a thousand blows without the Parian block showing the line of a crack; but all at once it breaks asunder into the very form which the cunning stone cutter has so long been hammering after.—Richter.

Ladies, stock and tend your hive,
Trifle not at thirty-five;
For, how'er we boast and strive,
Life declines from thirty-five;
He that ever hopes to thrive
Must begin by thirty-five.

—Sam'l Johnson.

She who makes her husband and her children happy, who reclaims the one from vice, and trains up the other to virtue, is a greater character than ladies described in romance, whose whole occupation is to murder mankind with their eyes.—Goldsmith.

O woman! lovely woman! Nature made thee
To temper man; we had been brutes without you.

Angels are painted fair to look like you:
There's in you all that we believe of heaven,
Amazing brightness, purity, and truth,
Eternal joy, and everlasting love.

—Otway.

O! bless'd with temper, whose unclouded ray

Can make to-morrow cheerful as to-day;
She who can own a sister's charms, or hear
Sighs for a daughter with unwounded ear;
She who ne'er answers till a husband cools,
Or, if she rules him, never shows she rules.

—Pope.

Women govern us; let us render them perfect: the more they are enlightened, so much the more shall we be. On the cultivation of the mind of women depends the wisdom of men. It is by women that nature writes on the hearts of men.—Sheridan.

With soft, persuasive prayers woman wields the sceptre of the life which she charmeth; she lulls the discord which roars and glows,—teaches the fierce powers which hate each other like fiends to embrace in the bonds of love, and draws together what are forever flying asunder.—Schiller.

The Christian religion alone contemplates the conjugal union in the order of nature; it is the only religion which presents woman to man as a companion; every other abandons her to him as a slave. To religion alone do European women owe their liberty.—St. Pierre.

Our grandsire, ere of Eve possess'd,
Alone, and e'en in Paradise unblest,
With mournful looks the blissful scenes survey'd,
And wander'd in the solitary shade;
The Maker saw, took pity, and bestow'd Woman, the last, the best reserv'd of God.

—Pope.

O woman! in our hours of ease,
Uncertain, coy, and hard to please,
And variable as the shade
By the light quivering aspen made;
When pain and anguish wring the brow,
A ministering angel thou!

—Walter Scott.

Her passions are made of nothing but the finest part of pure love. We cannot call her winds and waters, sighs and tears; they are greater storms and tempests than almanacs can report. This cannot be cunning in her. If it be, she makes a shower of rain as well as Jove.—Shakespeare.

Never give her o'er;
For scorn at first makes after-love the more.

If she do frown, 'tis not in hate of you,
But rather to beget more love in you;
If she do chide, 'tis not to have you gone,
For why, the fools are mad if left alone.

—Shakespeare.

Frailty, thy name is woman!—
A little month, or ere those shoes were old
With which she follow'd my poor father's body,
Like Niobe, all tears;—why she, even she,
Married with my uncle.

—Shakespeare.

Women have tongues of craft, and hearts of guile,
They will, they will not; fools that on them trust;
For in their speech is death, hell in their smile.

—Tasso.

Christ has lifted woman to a new place in the world. And just in proportion as Christianity has sway, will she rise to a higher dignity in human life. What she has now, and what she shall have, of privilege and true honor, she owes to that gospel which took those qualities peculiarly and which had been counted weak and unworthy, and gave them a divine glory in Christ.—Herrick Johnson.

Without religion, man is an atheist, woman is a monster. As daughter, sister, wife and mother, she holds in her hands, under God, the destinies of humanity. In the hours of gloom and sorrow we look to her for sympathy and comfort. Where shall she find strength for trial, comfort for sorrow, save in that gospel which has given a new meaning to the name of "mother," since it rested on the lips of the child Jesus?—Bishop Whipple.

The life of woman is full of woe,
Toiling on and on and on,
With breaking heart, and tearful eyes,
The secret longings that arise,
Which this world never satisfies!
Some more, some less, but of the whole
Not one quite happy, no, not one!
—Longfellow.

The very first
Of human life must spring from woman's
breast:
Your first small words are taught you from her lips;
Your first tears quench'd by her, and your last sighs
Too often breath'd out in a woman's hearing,
When men have shrunk from the ignoble
care
Of watching the last hour of him who led them. —Byron.

Women in health are the hope of the nation. Men who exercise a controlling influence—the master spirits—with a few exceptions, have had country-born mothers. They transmit to their sons those traits of character which give stability to institutions, and promote order, security and justice.—Dr. J. V. C. Smith.

I have often had occasion to remark the fortitude with which women sustain the most overwhelming reverses of fortune. Those disasters which break down the spirit of a man and prostrate him in the dust seem to call forth all the energies of the softer sex, and give such intrepidity and elevation to their character that at times it approaches to sublimity.—Washington Irving.

Say that she rail, why then I'll tell her plain
She sings as sweetly as a nightingale;
Say that she frown; I'll say she looks as clear
As morning roses newly wash'd with dew;
Say she be mute and will not speak a word;
Then I'll commend her volubility,
And say she uttereth piercing eloquence.
—Shakespeare.

A woman is sometimes fugitive, irrational, indeterminable, illogical and contradictory. A great deal of forbearance ought to be shown her, and a good deal of prudence exercised with regard to her, for she may bring about innumerable evils without knowing it. Capable of all kinds of devotion, and of all kinds of treason, "monster incomprehensible," raised to the second power, she is at once the delight and the terror of man.—Amiel.

To chase the clouds of life's tempestuous
hours,
To strew its short but weary way with flow'rs,
New hopes to raise, new feelings to im-
part,
And pour celestial balsam on the heart;
For this to man was lovely woman giv'n,
The last, best work, the noblest gift of Heav'n. —Thomas Love Peacock.

Woman may err, woman may give her
mind
To evil thoughts, and lose her pure estate;
But for one woman who affronts her kind
By wicked passions and remorseless hate,
A thousand make amends in age and youth,
By heavenly pity, by sweet sympathy,
By patient kindness, by enduring truth,
By love, supremest in adversity.
—Charles Mackay

The most beautiful object in the world, it will be allowed, is a beautiful woman. But who that can analyze his feelings is not sensible that she owes her fascination less to grace of outline and delicacy of color than to a thousand associations which, often unperceived by ourselves, connect these qualities with the source of our existence, with the nourishment of our infancy, with the passions of our youth, with the hopes of our age,—with elegance, with vivacity, with tenderness.

with the strongest natural instincts, with the dearest of social ties?—Maoaulay.

"Petticoat influence" is a great reproach,
Which e'en those who obey would fain be thought
To fly from, as from hungry pikes a roach;
But since beneath it upon earth we're brought
By various joltings of life's hackney
coach,
I for one venerate a petticoat—
A garment of mystical sublimity,
No matter whether russet, silk, or dimity.
—Byron.

I love the sex, and sometimes would reverse
The tyrant's wish, "that mankind only had
One neck, which he with one fell stroke might pierce;"
My wish is quite as wide, but not so bad,
And much more tender on the whole than fierce;
It being (not now, but only while a lad)
That womankind had but one rosy mouth,
To kiss them all at once, from North to South.
—Byron.

God in his harmony has equal ends
For cedar that resists and reed that bends;
For good it is a woman sometimes rules,
Holds in her hand the power, and manners,
schools,
And laws, and mind; succeeding master
proud,
With gentle voice and smiles she leads the crowd,
The somber human troop.
—Victor Hugo.

Think not, when woman's transient breath
is fled,
That all her vanities at once are dead;
Succeeding vanities she still regards,
And though she plays no more, o'erlooks
the cards.
Her joy in gilded chariots, when alive,
And love of ombre, after death survive.
For when the fair in all their pride expire,
To their first elements their souls retire:
The sprites of fiery termagants in flame
Mount up, and take a salamander's name.
Soft yielding minds to water glide away,
And sip, with nymphs, their elemental tea.
The graver pride sinks downward to a gnome.
In search of mischief still on earth to roam.
The light coquettes in sylphs aloft repair,
And sport and flutter in the fields of air.
—Pope.

A good woman is the loveliest flower that blooms under heaven; and we look with love and wonder upon its silent grace, its pure fragrance, its delicate bloom of beauty. Sweet and beautiful!

the fairest and the most spotless! is it not pity to see them bowed down or devoured by grief or death inexorable, wasting in disease, pining with long pain, or cut off by sudden fate in their prime? We may deserve grief, but why should these be unhappy?—except that we know that heaven chastens those whom it loves best; being pleased, by repeated trials, to make these pure spirits more pure.—
Thackeray.

As the vine which has long twined its graceful foliage about the oak, and been lifted by it into sunshine, will, when the hardy plant is rifted by the thunderbolt, cling round it with its caressing tendrils, and bind up its shattered boughs; so it is beautifully ordered by Providence, that woman, who is the mere dependent and ornament of man in his happier hours, should be his stay and solace when smitten with sudden calamity; winding herself into the rugged recesses of his nature, tenderly supporting the drooping head, and binding up the broken heart.—Washington Irving.

Wonder

Wonder is involuntary praise.—
Young.

O day and night, but this is wondrous strange.—Shakespeare.

Wonder is prophetic.—Charles H.
Parkhurst.

All wonder is the effect of novelty upon ignorance.—Johnson.

It was through the feeling of wonder that men now and at first began to philosophize.—Aristotle.

A wonder lasts but nine days, and then the puppy's eyes are open.—Fielding.

'Twas strange, 'twas passing strange;
'Twas pitiful, 'twas wondrous pitiful.
—Shakespeare.

Stones have been known to move and trees to speak.—Shakespeare.

At last fell humbly down upon his knees, and of his wonder made religion.—Spenser.

There's something in a flying horse,
There's something in a huge balloon.
—Wordsworth.

No wonder is greater than any other wonder, and if once explained ceases to be a wonder.—Leigh Hunt.

I saw a fie within a beade
Of amber cleanly buried.
—Herrick.

And still they gazed, and still the wonder grew, that one small head should carry all he knew.—Goldsmith.

That is ever the difference between the wise and the unwise: the latter wonders at what is unusual; the wise man wonders at the usual.—Emerson.

Can such things be,
And overcome us like a summer's cloud,
Without our special wonder?
—Shakespeare.

They spake not a word;
But like dumb statues or breathless stones,
Star'd on each other, and look'd deadly pale.
—Shakespeare.

Wonder, connected with a principle of rational curiosity, is the source of all knowledge and discovery, and it is a principle even of piety; but wonder which ends in wonder, and is satisfied with wonder, is the quality of an idiot.—Horsley.

Pretty! in amber to observe the forms
Of hairs, or straws, or dirt, or grubs, or worms!
The things, we know, are neither rich nor rare,
But wonder how the devil they got there.
—Pope.

Woods

The nunneries of silent nooks, the murmured longing of the wood.—Lowell.

In the woods, too, a man casts off his years, as the snake his slough, and, at what period soever of life, is always a child. In the woods is perpetual youth. Within these plantations of God a decorum and sanctity reign, a perennial festival is dressed, and the guest sees not how he should tire of them in a thousand years. In the woods we return to reason and faith.—Emerson.

Wooing (See Courtship)

She half consents who silently denies.—Ovid.

Deference and intimacy live far apart.—Molière.

I'll woo her as the lion woos his brides.—John Home.

And let us mind, faint heart ne'er wan
A lady fair.
—Burns.

A heaven on earth I have won by wooing thee.—Shakespeare.

You must not contrast too strongly the hours of courtship with the years of possession.—Beaconsfield.

Men are April when they woo, December when they wed.—Shakespeare.

Love is a child that talks in broken language, yet then he speaks most plain.—Dryden.

The first thing necessary to win the heart of a woman is opportunity.—Balzac.

It is against womanhood to be forward in their own wishes.—Sir P. Sidney.

With women worth the being won, the softest lover ever best succeeds.—Aaron Hill.

I was not born under a rhyming planet, nor I cannot woo in festival terms.—Shakespeare.

She is a woman, therefore may be wooed; she is a woman, therefore may be won.—Shakespeare.

They dream in courtship, but in wedlock wake.—Pope.

Women are not apt to be won by the charms of verse.—Bayard Taylor.

If I am not worth the wooing, I surely am not worth the winning.—
Longfellow.

Was ever woman in this humour woo'd?
Was ever woman in this humour won?
—Shakespeare.

And every shepherd tells his tale
Under the hawthorne in the dale.
—Milton.

Faint heart hath been a common phrase, faire ladie never wives.—J. P.
Collier.

The surest way to hit a woman's heart is to take aim kneeling.—Douglas Jerrold.

Her virtue and the conscience of her
worth,
That would be woo'd and not unsought be won.
—Milton.

That man that hath a tongue, I say, is no
man,
If with his tongue he cannot win a woman.
—Shakespeare.

We cannot fight for love, as men may do;
We should be woo'd and were not made to woo.
—Shakespeare.

Be merry, and employ your chiefest
thoughts
To courtship and such fair ostents of love
As shall conveniently become you there.
—Shakespeare.

Not much he kens, I ween, of woman's
breast,
Who thinks that wanton thing is won by sighs.
—Byron.

Win her with gifts, if she respects not
words;
Dumb jewels often in their silent kind
More than quick words do move a woman's mind.
—Shakespeare.

Most fair,
Will you vouchsafe to teach a soldier terms
Such as will enter at a lady's ear
And plead his love-suit to her gentle heart?
—Shakespeare.

Wooring thee, I found thee of more value
Than steepe in gold or sums in sealed bags;
And 'tis the very riches of thyself
That now I aim at.
—Shakespeare.

O subtle love! a thousand wiles
thou hast. by humble suit, by service, or by hire, to win a maiden's hold,—a thing soon done, for nature framed all women to be won.—Tasso.

His heart kep' goin' pity-pat,
But hern went pity-Zekle.
—Lowell.

Quiet, Robin, quiet!
You lovers are such clumsy summer-flies,
Forever buzzing at your lady's face.
—Tennyson.

Lightly from fair to fair he flew,
And loved to plead, lament, and sue,—
Suit lightly won, and short-lived pain.
For monarchs seldom sigh in vain.
—Scott.

Ah, whither shall a maiden flee,
When a bold youth so swift pursues,
And siege of tenderest courtesy,
With hope perseverent, still renews!
—Coventry Patmore.

'Tis enough—
Who listens once will listen twice;
Her heart be sure is not of ice,
And one refusal no rebuff.
—Byron.

She that with poetry is won,
Is but a desk to write upon;
And what men say of her they mean
No more than on the thing they lean.
—Butler.

He that will win his dame must do
As love does when he draws his bow;
With one hand thrust the lady from,
And with the other pull her home.
—Butler.

If I speak to thee in friendship's name,
Thou think'st I speak too coldly;
If I mention Love's devoted flame,
Thou say'st I speak too boldly.
—Moore.

Say that upon the altar of her beauty
You sacrifice your tears, your sighs, your heart:
Write till your ink be dry and with your
tears
Moist it again, and frame some feeling line,
That may discover such integrity.
—Shakespeare.

She wish'd she had not heard it, yet she wish'd
That heaven had made her such a man:
She thank'd me,
And bade me, if I had a friend that lov'd
her,
I should but teach him how to tell my story
And that would woo her. —Shakespeare.

Women are angels, wooing:
Things won are done, joy's soul lies in the doing:
That she belov'd knows nought that knows not this:
Men prize the thing ungain'd more than it is.
—Shakespeare.

O gentle Romeo,
If thou dost love, pronounce it faithfully,
Or if thou think'st I am too quickly won,
I'll frown and be perverse and say thee nay,
So thou wilt woo: but else, not for the world.
—Shakespeare.

Happy Mary Anerly, looking O so fair!
There's a ring upon your hand, and there's myrtle in your hair.
Somebody is with you now: Somebody
I see,
Looks into your trusting face very tenderly.
—Arthur Jas. Munby.

'Tis an old lesson; time approves it true,
And those who know it best, deplore it most;
When all is won that all desire to woo,
The paltry prize is hardly worth the cost.
—Byron.

Do proper homage to thine idol's eyes;
But not too humbly, or she will despise Thee and thy suit, though told in moving tropes:
Disguise even tenderness, if thou art wise.
—Byron.

The nightingales among the sheltering boughs
Of populous and many-nested trees Shall teach me how to woo thee, and shall tell me
By what resistless charms or incantations
They won their mates. —Longfellow.

Follow a shadow, it still flies you,
Seem to fly it, it will pursue:
So court a mistress, she denies you;
Let her alone, she will court you.
Say are not women truly, then,
Styled but the shadows of us men?
—Ben Jonson.

Bring therefore all the forces that ye may,
And lay incessant battery to her heart;
Playnts, prayers, vows, truth, sorrow, and dismay;
Those engins can the proudest love convert:
And if those fayle, fall down and dy
before her;
So dying live, and living do adore her.
—Spenser.

He sat by her side and her soft hand he pressed;
He felt, in the pressure returned him thrice blessed,
Enraptured gazing
On her whom he honored beyond all praising.
—Esaías Tegnér.

'Tis sweet to think that where'er we rove
We are sure to find something blissful and dear;
And that when we're far from the lips we
love,
We've but to make love to the lips we are near.
—Moore.

Duncan Gray cam here to woo,
Ha, ha, the wooing o't!
On blithe Yulennight when we were fou,
Ha, ha, the wooing o't!
Maggie coost her head fu' high,
Looked asklent and unco skeigh,
Gart poor Duncan stand abeigh:
Ha, ha! the wooing o't!
—Burns.

Alas! to seize the moment
When heart inclines to heart,
And press a suit with passion,
Is not a woman's part.

If man come not to gather
The roses where they stand,
They fade among their foliage,
They cannot seek his hand.
—Bryant.

Words are grown so false, I am loath to prove reason with them.—Shakespeare.

One doth not know
How much an ill word may empoison liking.
—Shakespeare.

If you do not wish a man to do a thing, you had better get him to talk about it; for the more men talk, the more likely they are to do nothing else.—Carlyle.

Words, words, mere words, no matter from the heart.—Shakespeare.

Madam, you have bereft me of all words,
Only my blood speaks to you in my veins.
—Shakespeare.

Unpack my heart with words,
And fall a-cursing, like a very drab.
—Shakespeare.

Here are a few of the unpleasant'st words
That ever blotted paper!—Shakespeare.

A blemish may be removed from a diamond by careful polishing, but evil words once spoken cannot be effaced.—Confucius.

Words are words; I never yet did hear,
That the bruised heart was pierced through the ear.
—Shakespeare.

Words are things; and a small drop of ink,
Falling like dew upon a thought, produces
That which makes thousands, perhaps millions, think.
—Byron.

It is with a word as with an arrow: the arrow once loosed does not return to the bow; nor a word to the lips.—Abdel-Kader.

We should be as careful of our words as of our actions, and as far from speaking ill as from doing ill.—Cicero.

For one word a man is often deemed to be wise, and for one word he is often deemed to be foolish. We ought to be careful indeed what we say.—Confucius.

Like a beautiful flower full of color, but without scent, are the fine but fruitless words of him who does not act accordingly.—Buddha.

The turn of a sentence has decided the fate of many a friendship, and, for aught that we know, the fate of many a kingdom.—Jeremy Bentham.

Kind words are benedictions. They are not only instruments of power, but of benevolence and courtesy; blessings both to the speaker and hearer of them.—Frederick Saunders.

Multitudes of words are neither an argument of clear ideas in the writer, nor a proper means of conveying clear notions to the reader.—Adam Clarke.

It is as easy to draw back a stone thrown with force from the hand, as to recall a word once spoken.—Menander.

Apt words have power to 'suage
The tumors of a troubled mind;
And are as balm to fester'd wounds.
—Milton.

Man usually believes, if only words he hears,
That also with them goes material for thinking.
—Goethe.

Words are good, but they are not the best. The best is not to be explained by words; the spirit in which we act is the great matter.—Goethe.

In the mouths of many men soft words are like roses that soldiers put into the muzzles of their muskets on holidays.—Longfellow.

Men believe that their reason governs their words; but it often happens the words have power to react on reason.—Bacon.

As it is the mark of great minds to say many things in a few words, so it is that of little minds to use many words to say nothing.—La Rochefoucauld.

Words are as they are taken, and things are as they are used. There are even cursed blessings.—Bishop Hall.

Words are like leaves; and where they most abound,
Much fruit of sense beneath is rarely found.
—Pope.

Thought in the mind may come forth gold or dross; when coined in words, we know its real worth.—Young.

Words are often things also, and very precious, especially on the gravest occasions. Without "words," and the truth of things that is in them, what were we?—Leigh Hunt.

Gentle words, quiet words, are after all, the most powerful words. They are more convincing, more compelling, more prevailing.—Washington Gladden.

They say . . .

That, putting all his words together,
'Tis three blue beans in one blue bladder.
—Prior.

How long a time lies in one little word!
Four lagging winters and four wanton
springs
End in a word: such is the breath of kings.
—Shakespeare.

They have been at a great feast of languages, and stolen the scraps. They have lived long in the alms-basket of words!—Shakespeare.

It would be well for us all, old and young, to remember that our words and actions, ay, and our thoughts also, are set upon never-stopping wheels, rolling on and on unto the pathway of eternity.—M. M. Brewster.

The last word should be the last word. It is like a finishing touch given to color; there is nothing more to add. But what precaution is needed in order not to put the last word first.—Joubert.

Liquid, flowing words are the choicest and the best, if language is regarded as music. But when it is considered as a picture, then there are rough words which are very telling,—they make their mark.—Joubert.

'Twas he that ranged the words at random flung,
Pierced the fair pearls and them together strung.
—Firdousi.

He used words as mere stepping-stones, upon which, with a free and youthful bound, his spirit crosses and recrosses the bright and rushing stream of thought.—Longfellow.

There comes Emerson first, whose rich words, every one,
Are like gold nails in temples to hang trophies on.
—Lowell.

I hate anything that occupies more space than it is worth. I hate to see a load of handboxes go along the street, and I hate to see a parcel of big words without anything in them.

—Hazlitt.

Sorrowful words become the sorrowful; angry words suit the passionate; light words a playful expression; serious words suit the grave.—Horace.

Words indeed are but the signs and counters of knowledge, and their currency should be strictly regulated by the capital which they represent.—Colton.

Deep in my heart subsides the infrequent word,
And there dies slowly throbbing like a wounded bird.—Francis Thompson.

O! many a shaft, at random sent,
Finds mark the archer little meant!
And many a word, at random spoken,
May soothe or wound a heart that's broken.
—Scott.

But yesterday the word of Cæsar might Have stood against the world; now lies he
there,
And none so poor to do him reverence.
—Shakespeare.

"The last word" is the most dangerous of internal machines; and husband and wife should no more fight to get it than they would struggle for the possession of a lighted bombshell.
—Douglas Jerrold.

They say, the tongues of dying men
Enforce attention, like deep harmony;
Where words are scarce, they're seldom spent in vain;
For they breathe truth, that breathe their words in pain.
—Shakespeare.

Windy attorneys to their client woes,
Airy successors of intestate joys,
Poor breathing orators of miseries!
Let them have scope: though what they do impart
Help nothing else, yet do they ease the heart.
—Shakespeare.

Words, however, are things; and the man who accords
To his language the license to outrage his soul,
Is controll'd by the words he disdains to control.
—Lord Lytton.

Words are freeborn, and not the vassals of the gruff tyrants of prose to do their bidding only. They have the same right to dance and sing as the dewdrops have to sparkle and the stars to shine.—Abraham Coles.

Work

Work is alone noble.—Carlyle.

Always at work.—Voltaire.

In books, or work, or healthful play.
—Isaac Watts.

Work first, and then rest.—Ruskin.

And still be doing, never done.—
Butler.

Plough deep while sluggards sleep.
—Benj. Franklin.

We live not to ourselves, our work is life.—Bailey.

We work and that is godlike.—J.
G. Holland.

Better to wear out than to rust out.
—Bishop Cumberland.

Nothing is impossible to industry.—
Periander of Corinth.

Thine to work as well as pray.—
Whittier.

Work is the means of living, but it is not living.—J. G. Holland.

The modern majesty consists in work.—Carlyle.

When Adam dolve, and Eve span,
Who was then the gentleman?
—John Ball.

Hard toil can roughen form and face,
And want can quench the eye's bright grace. —Scott.

The work under our labour grows
Luxurious by restraint. —Milton.

In every rank, or great or small,
'Tis industry supports us all.—Gay.

Free men freely work:
Whoever fears God, fears to sit at ease.
—Mrs. Browning.

Work, ah! that talisman to guard one against one's self.—Mrs. Campbell
Praed.

Never idle a moment, but thrifty and thoughtful of others.—Longfellow.

Get work! Be sure it is better than what you work to get.—Mrs. E.
B. Browning.

Chase brave employments with a naked
sword
Throughout the world. —Herbert.

Get leave to work
In this world,—'tis the best you get at all
—E. B. Browning.

Too busy with the crowded hour to fear to live or die.—Emerson.

He that well his warke beginneth
The rather a good ende he winneth.
—Gower.

This we commanded you, that if any would not work, neither should he eat.—Bible.

God did anoint thee with His odor-ous oil, to wrestle not to reign.—Mrs.
Browning.

Unless a man works he cannot find out what he is able to do.—Hamerton.

You never will be saved by works;
but let us tell you most solemnly that you never will be saved without works.
—T. L. Cuyler.

The rather since every man is the son of his own works.—Cervantes.

The fruit derived from labor is the sweetest of pleasures.—Vauvenargues.

Work, according to my feeling, is as much of a necessity to man as eating and drinking.—Wilhelm von Humboldt.

Unless we put heart and soul into our labor we but brutify our actions.
—H. W. Shaw.

Avowed work, even when uncongenial, is far less trying to patience than feigned pleasure.—Hamerton.

Without labor there were no ease, no rest, so much as conceivable.—Carlyle.

Genuine work alone, what thou workest faithfully, that is eternal as the Almighty Founder and World-Builder Himself.—Carlyle.

Why has no religion this command before all others: Thou shalt work?—Auerbach.

It is our actual work which determines our value.—George Bancroft.

Man's record upon this wild world is the record of work; and of work alone.—J. G. Holland.

I doubt if hard work, steadily and regularly carried on, ever yet hurt anybody.—Lord Stanley.

Work is the inevitable condition of human life, the true source of human welfare.—Tolstoi.

Patience, persistence, and power to do are only acquired by work.—J. G. Holland.

On bravely through the sunshine and the showers!
Time hath his work to do, and we have ours. —Emerson.

We enjoy ourselves only in our work, our doing; and our best doing is our best enjoyment.—Jacobi.

It is far better to give work which is above the men than to educate the men to be above their work.—Ruskin.

The Lord thy God shall bless thee in all thy works, and in all that thou puttest thine hand unto.—Bible.

For men must work and women must weep,
And the sooner it's over the sooner to sleep,
And good-bye to the bar and its moaning. —Chas. Kingsley.

It is the primal curse, but softened into mercy, made the pledge of cheerful days and nights without a groan.—Cowper.

Work is its own best earthly meed, Else have we none more than the sea-born through
Who wrought those marvellous isles that bloom afar. —Jean Ingelow.

Mind, it is our best work that He wants, not the dregs of our exhaustion. I think He must prefer quality to quantity.—George MacDonald.

Lie not down wearied 'neath Woe's weeping willow; work with a stout heart and resolute will.—Mrs. Osgood.

Yet hence the poor are clothed, the hungry fed; health to himself, and to his infants bread, the laborer bears.—Pope.

No work is worse than overwork; the mind preys on itself,—the most unwholesome of food.—Charles Lamb.

Ease and speed in doing a thing do not give the work lasting solidity or exactness of beauty.—Plutarch.

For hearts where wakened love doth lurk,
How fine, how blest a thing is work!
For work does good when reasons fail. —Jean Ingelow.

All service is the same with God—
With God, whose puppets, best and worst,
Are we: there is no last nor first. —Robert Browning.

Work was made for man, and not man for work. Work is man's servant, both in its results to the worker and the world. Man is not work's servant, save as an almost universal perversion has made him such.—J. G. Holland.

What work's, my countrymen, in hand?
where go you
With bats and clubs? The matter? speak,
I pray you. —Shakespeare.

Thine to work as well as pray,
Clearing thorny wrongs away;
Plucking up the weeds of sin,
Letting heaven's warm sunshine in. —Whittier.

It is not work that kills men; it is worry. Work is healthy; you could hardly put more upon a man than he can bear. Worry is rust upon the blade. It is not the revolution that destroys the machinery, but the friction.—Beecher.

Man hath his daily work of body or mind appointed, which declares his dignity; while other animals unactive range, and of their doings God takes no account.—Milton.

No man is born into the world whose work is not born with him.
There is always work, and tools to work withal, for those who will; and blessed are the horny hands of toil.—
Lowell.

Joy to the toiler!—him that tills
The fields with plenty crowned;
Him with the woodman's axe that thrills
The wilderness profound.
—Benjamin Hathaway.

Beloved, let us love so well,
Our work shall still be better for our love,
And still our love be sweeter for our work,
And both, commended, for the sake of each,
By all true workers and true lovers born.
—Mrs. Browning.

Work is my recreation,
The play of faculty; a delight like that
Which a bird feels in flying, or a fish
In darting through the water,—
Nothing more. —Longfellow.

God is a worker. He has thickly strewn infinity with grandeur. God is love; He yet shall wipe away Creation's tears, and all the worlds shall summer in His smile. Why work I not? the veriest mote that sports its one-day life within the sunny beam has its stern duties.—Alexander Smith.

By the way,
The works of women are symbolical.
We sew, sew, prick our fingers, dull our
sight,
Producing what? A pair of slippers, sir,
To put on when you're weary—or a stool
To tumble over and vex you * * * curse that stool!
Or else at best, a cushion where you lean
And sleep, and dream of something we are not,
But would be for your sake. Alas, alas!
This hurts most, this * * * that, after all, we are paid
The worth of our work, perhaps.
—E. B. Browning.

World

This world is God's world, after all.
—Charles Kingsley.

There is another and a better world.
—Kotzebue.

Keep thyself unspotted from the world.—Cecil.

What is this world? thy school, O Misery!—Young.

But it does move.—Galileo.

Its pomp, its pleasures, and its nonsense all.—Thomson.

The world itself makes us sick of the world.—Bossuet.

The world is ashamed of being vir-tuous.—Sterne.

A mad world, my masters.—Middleton.

Creation's heir, the world, the world, is mine.—Goldsmith.

Allured to brighter worlds, and led the way.—Goldsmith.

O, how full of briars is this working-day world!—Shakespeare.

This world is God's workshop for making men in.—Henry Ward Beecher.

The world is all title-page without contents.—Young.

For the fashion of this world passeth away.—Bible.

There was all the world and his wife.—Swift.

They most the world enjoy who least admire.—Young.

The world is the same everywhere.
—Auerbach.

ogenes Laertius.

Such stuff the world is made of.—
Cowper.

In this bad, twisted, topsy-turvy world,
Where all the heaviest wrongs get upper most. —E. B. Browning.

The wide world is all before us—
But a world without a friend.
—Burns.

Hanging in a golden chain
This pendent world. —Milton.

Come, follow me, and leave the world to its babblings.—Dante.

I pray not for the world, but for them which Thou hast given me.—
Bible.

To know the world, not love her, is thy point;
She gives but little, nor that little long.
—Young.

We may despise the world, but we cannot do without it.—Baron Wessen-berg.

How surely a knowledge of the world hardens the heart!—Calderon.

He who best knows the world will love it least.—Balzac.

The world is his who can see through its pretension.—Emerson.

The world is a great ocean, upon which we encounter more tempestuous storms than calms.—Edgar A. Poe.

I am sick of this bad world! The daylight and the sun grow painful to me.—Addison.

The world is a comedy to those who think, a tragedy to those who feel.—
Horace Walpole.

Contact with the world either breaks or hardens the heart.—Chamfort.

Happy is she that from the world retires, and carries with her what the world admires.—Waller.

All this world's noise appears to me a dull, ill-acted comedy!—Cowley.

Let the great world spin forever down the ringing grooves of change.—
Tennyson.

Everybody in this world wants watching, but nobody more than ourselves.—H. W. Shaw.

And the whole world would henceforth be a wider prison unto me.—
Byron.

O world, what pictures and what harmonies are thine!—Emerson.

Everything is for the best in this best of possible worlds.—Voltaire.

Why, then the world's mine oyster, which I with sword will open.—
Shakespeare.

For some must watch, while some must sleep; so runs the world away.
—Shakespeare.

Let not the cooings of the world allure
thee;
Which of her lovers ever found her true?
—Young.

Trust not the world, for it never payeth that it promiseth.—St. Augustine.

The only fence against the world is a thorough knowledge of it.—Locke.

The world is a great poem, and the world's
The words it is writ in, and we souls the thoughts.
—Bailey.

The world is a beautiful book, but of little use to him who cannot read it.—Goldoni.

The world is not made for the prosperous alone, nor for the strong.—
George William Curtis.

O, what a world is this, when what is comely,
Envenoms him that bears it!—Shakespeare.

You have too much respect upon the world:
They lose it that do buy it with much care.
—Shakespeare.

Wise men sometimes avoid the world, that they may not be surfeited with it.—La Bruyère.

Manners carry the world for the moment, character for all time.—A.
Bronson Alcott.

The world is an excellent judge in general, but a very bad one in particular.—Lord Greville.

The judgment of the world stands upon matter of fortune.—Sir P. Sidney.

Anchorite, who didst dwell
With all the world for cell!
—Francis Thompson.

This world surely is wide enough to hold both thee and me.—Sterne.

The world is a wheel, and it will all come round right.—Benj. Disraeli.

One day with life and heart,
Is more than time enough to find a world.
—Lowell.

All the world's a stage,
And all the men and women merely players.
—Shakespeare.

Feast, and your halls are crowded;
Fast, and the world goes by.
—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

This world, where much is to be done and little to be known.—Samuel Johnson.

I hold the world but as the world, Gratiano:
A stage where every man must play a part.
—Shakespeare.

The tree of the world hath its poisons, but beareth two fruits of exquisite flavor, the nectar of poetry and the society of noble men.—Hitopadesa.

This restless world
Is full of chances, which by habit's power
To learn to bear is easier than to shun.
—John Armstrong.

The highest philosophers, in explaining the mystery of this world, are obliged to call in the aid of another.—
H. W. Shaw.

The world is grown so bad,
That wrens make prey where eagles dare not perch.
—Shakespeare.

When the fretful stir
Unprofitable, and the fever of the world
Have hung upon the beatings of my heart.
—Wordsworth.

Even the linked fantasies, in whose blos-somy twist
I swung the earth a trinket at my wrist.
—Francis Thompson.

The world is deceitful; her end is doubtful, her conclusion is horrible, her judge is terrible, and her judgment is intolerable.—Quarles.

The world in all doth but two nations bear,
The good, the bad, and these mixed everywhere.
—Marvell.

The world is a thing that a man must learn to despise, and even to neglect, before he can learn to reverence it, and work in it and for it.—

Carlyle.

Brightest seraph, tell
In which of all these shining orbs hath man
His fixed seat, or fixed seat hath none,
But all these shining orbs his choice to dwell.
—Milton.

I have my beauty,—you your art—
Nay, do not start:
One world was not enough for two
Like me and you.
—Oscar Wilde.

If all the world must see the world
As the world the world hath seen,
Then it were better for the world
That the world had never been.
—Leland.

The world's great age begins anew,
The golden years return,
The earth doth like a snake renew
Her winter weeds outworn.—Shelley.

Thou seest, we are not all alone unhappy:
This wide and universal theatre Presents more woeful pageants than the scene
Wherein we play in.
—Shakespeare.

Laugh and the world laughs with you,
Weep and you weep alone;
For the sad old earth must borrow its
mirth,
But has trouble enough of its own.
—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

O Earth! all bathed with blood and tears, yet never Hast thou ceased putting forth thy fruit and flowers.
—Madame de Staël.

The world is too much with us; late and soon,
Getting and spending we lay waste our
powers;
Little we see in Nature that is ours.
—Wordsworth.

It is a very good world to live in,
To lend, or to spend, or to give in;
But to beg, or to borrow, or to get a man's own,
It's the very worst world that ever was known.
—Earl of Rochester.

He who imagines he can do without the world deceives himself much; but he who fancies the world cannot do without him is still more mistaken.—
Rochefoucauld.

Once kick the world, and the world and you live together at a reasonable good understanding.—Swift.

How weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable
Seem to me all the uses of this world!
Fye on't! oh, fye! 'tis an unweeded garden.

That grows to seed; things rank, and gross
In nature,
Possess it merely. —Shakespeare.

The world was all before them, where to choose Their place of rest, and Providence their guide. —Milton.

Well, well, the world must turn upon its axis,
And all mankind turn with it, heads or tails,
And live and die, make love and pay our
taxes,
And as the veering winds shift, shift our sails. —Byron.

What is this world?—A term which men have got,
To signify not one in ten knows what;
A term, which with no more precision passes
To point out herds of men than herds of asses;
In common use no more it means, we find,
Than many fools in same opinions joined.
—Churchill.

How beautiful is all this visible world!
How glorious in its action and itself!
But we, who name ourselves its sovereigns,
we,
Half dust, half deity, alike unfit
To sink or soar, with our mix'd essence make
A conflict of its elements, and breathe
The breath of degradation and of pride, Contending with low wants and lofty will,
Till our mortality predominates,
And men are—what they name not to themselves,
And trust not to each other. —Byron.

Worldliness

Set not your heart upon the world, since God hath not made it your portion.—Rutherford.

They best pass over the world who trip over it quickly; for it is but a bog. If we stop, we sink.—Queen Elizabeth.

A Christian making money fast is just a man in a cloud of dust, it will fill his eyes if he be not careful.—C.
H. Spurgeon.

As the love of the heavens makes us heavenly, the love of virtue virtuous, so doth the love of the world make one become worldly.—Sir P. Sidney.

The only true method of action in this world is to be in it, but not of it.
—Madame Swetchine.

O my God! close my eyes, that I may see Thee; separate me from the world, that I may enjoy Thy company.
—Christian Scriver.

Lift thyself up, look around, and see something higher and brighter than earth, earthworms, and earthly darkness.—Jean Paul Richter.

Christians should live in the world, but not be filled with it. A ship lives in the water; but if the water gets into the ship, she goes to the bottom.
So Christians may live in the world;
but if the world gets into them, they sink.—D. L. Moody.

Buying, possessing, accumulating—this is not worldliness. But doing this in the love of it, with no love of God paramount—doing it so that thoughts of eternity and God are an intrusion—doing it so that one's spirit is secularized in the process; this is worldliness.—Herrick Johnson.

It has been well said that there is a sin of other-worldliness no less than a sin of worldliness, and Christendom has had a large measure of the former sin as well as of the latter. People have been taught so much about preparing for heaven that they have sometimes become very indifferent workers on earth, and in anticipating the joys of the future world have overlooked the infinite possibilities for good in the world that now is.—W. J. Potter.

Worry

It is not work that kills men; it is worry. Work is healthy: you can hardly put more upon a man than he can bear. Worry is rust upon the blade.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Worship

And what greater calamity can fall upon a nation than the loss of worship.—Emerson.

Pompey bade Sylla recollect that more worshipped the rising than the setting sun.—Plutarch.

Words without thoughts never to heaven go.—Shakespeare.

This hour they worship, and the next blaspheme.—Dr. Garth.

Resort to sermons, but to prayers most: Praying's the end of preaching.

—Herbert.

A little bread and wine in a dungeon sufficed for the liturgy of the martyrs.—Hamerton.

The best way of worshipping God is in allaying the distress of the times and improving the condition of mankind.—Abulfazzi.

Every one's true worship was that which he found in use in the place where he chanced to be.—Montaigne.

Ev'n them who kept thy truth so pure of old,
When all our fathers worshipp'd stocks and stones.

—Milton.

First worship God; he that forgets to pray
Bids not himself good morrow, nor good day.

—Randolph.

He wales a portion with judicious care;
And "Let us worship God!" he says, with solemn air.

—Burns.

Worship as though the Deity were present. If my mind is not engaged in my worship, it is as though I worshipped not.—Confucius.

Man always worships something; always he sees the infinite shadowed forth in something finite.—Carlyle.

'Tis certain that worship stands in some commanding relation to the health of man, and to his highest powers, so as to be, in some manner, the source of intellect.—Emerson.

Praise Him, each savage furious beast
That on His stores do daily feast;
And you tame slaves, of the laborious plough,
Your weary knees to your Creator bow.

—Wentworth Dillon.

The act of divine worship is the inestimable privilege of man, the only created being who bows in humility and adoration.—Hosea Ballou.

Remember that God will not be mocked; that it is the heart of the worshiper which He regards. We are never safe till we love Him with our whole heart whom we pretend to worship.—Bishop Henshawe.

Ay, call it holy ground,
The soil where first they trod.
They have left unstained, what there they found—Freedom to worship God.—Mrs. Hemans.

The heart ran o'er
With silent worship of the great of old!—
The dead, but sceptred sovereigns, who still rule
Our spirits from their urns. —Byron.

How often from the steep
Of echoing hill or thicket have we heard
Celestial voices to the midnight air,
So'e, or responsive each to other's note,
Singing their great Creator? —Milton.

Lord, let us to Thy gates repair
To hear the gladdening sound,
That we may find salvation there,
While yet it may be found.
There let us joy and comfort reap;
There teach us how to pray,
For grace to choose, and strength to keep
The straight, the narrow way.
And so increase our love for Thee,
That all our future days
May one continued Sabbath be
Of gratitude and praise. —Oke.

Worth

Worth makes the man, and want of it the fellow.—Pope.

What is aught but as 'tis valued?—Shakespeare.

Oh that simplicity and innocence its own unvalued work so seldom knows!—Shelley.

Beauties that from worth arise are like the grace of deities.—Sir J. Suckling.

I know transplanted human worth will bloom to profit elsewhere.—Tennyson.

We are valued either too highly or not high enough; we are never taken at our real worth.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

Worth begets in base minds envy; in great souls, emulation.—Fielding.

The game is not worth the candle.—
French Proverb.

For what is worth in anything,
But so much money as 'twill bring?
—Butler.

Real worth requires no interpreter;
Its everyday deeds form its blazonry.
—Chamfort.

It is easier to appear worthy of a position one does not hold, than of the office which one fills.—La Rochefou-
cauld.

We see, though ordered for the best,
permitted laurels grace the lawless brow, the unworthy raised, the worthy cast below.—Dryden.

Give me but these,—a spirit tempest-tried, a brow unshrinking, and a soul of flame; the joy of conscious worth, its courage and its pride.—R.
T. Conrad.

To hide true worth from public view,
Is burying diamonds in their mine,
All is not gold that shines, 'tis true;
But all that is gold ought to shine.
—Bishop.

True worth is as inevitably discovered by the facial expression, as its opposite is sure to be clearly represented there. The human face is nature's tablet, the truth is certainly written thereon.—Lavater.

Wounds

He in peace is wounded, not in war.
—Shakespeare.

The wound of peace is surety,
Surety secure. —Shakespeare.

H' had got a hurt
O' th' inside of a deadlier sort.
—Butler.

Show you sweet Cæsar's wounds, poor, poor dumb mouths,
And bid them speak for me.—Shakespeare.

The private wound is deepest: O time most accurs'd
'Mongst all foes that a friend should be the worst. —Shakespeare.

No, 'tis not so deep as a well, nor so wide as a church door; but 'tis enough, 'twill serve.—Shakespeare.

Thou hast wounded the spirit that loved
thee
And cherish'd thine image for years;
Thou hast taught me at last to forget thee,
In secret, in silence, and tears.
—Mrs. David Porter.

What deep wounds ever closed without a scar?
The heart's bleed longest, and but heal to wear
That which disfigures it. —Byron.

Wrinkles

Wrinkles are beauty's death-lines.—
J. L. Basford.

Time's irreparable footprints.—Eugene Sue.

Wrinkles on the brow are the imprints of exploits.—Racine.

The wrinkles on his forehead are the marks which his mighty deeds have engraved there, and still indicate what he was in former days.—Corneille.

Wrinkles of the face may be successfully hidden by art; not so with the wrinkles of the heart.—Mme. Dufresnoy.

Writing

Look, then, into thine heart and write!—Longfellow.

Nature's chief masterpiece is writing well.—Buckingham.

The best style of writing, as well as the most forcible, is the plainest.—
Horace Greeley.

To be a well-favored man is the gift of fortune; but to read and write comes by nature.—Shakespeare.

We must write as Homer wrote, not what he wrote.—Théophile Vian.

Ye who write, choose a subject suited to your abilities.—Horace.

Whatever may be our natural talents, the art of writing is not acquired all at once.—Rousseau.

Knowledge is the foundation and source of good writing.—Horace.

The mind conceives with pain, but it brings forth with delight.—Joubert.

Writings may be compared to wine. Sense is the strength, but wit the flavor.—Sterne.

You write with ease to show your breeding
But easy writing's curst hard reading.
—Sheridan.

Setting down in writing, is a lasting memory.—Fielding.

'Tis hard to say, if greater want of skill
Appear in writing or in judging ill.—Pope.

To write for a living, according to Mr. Whipple, is coquetting with starvation.—F. A. Durivage.

The world agrees
That he writes well who writes with ease.
—Prior.

If you wish to write well, study the life about you,—life in the public streets.—Horace Mann.

Often turn the stile [correct with care], if you expect to write anything worthy of being read twice.—Horace.

An incurable itch for scribbling takes possession of many, and grows inveterate in their insane breasts.—Juvenal.

Too indolent to bear the toil of writing; I mean of writing well; I say nothing about quantity.—Horace.

A man who writes well writes not as others write, but as he himself writes; it is often in speaking badly that he speaks well.—Montesquieu.

To write well is at once to think well, to feel rightly, and to render properly; it is to have, at the same time, mind, soul, taste.—Buffon.

Fine writing, according to Mr. Addison, consists of sentiments which are natural without being obvious. Hume.

True ease in writing comes from art, not chance, as those move easiest who have learned to dance.—Pope.

We have some writers so abstruse and deep that they drown themselves in their fathomless sentences.—H. W. Shaw.

To be accurate, write; to remember, write; to know thine own mind, write.
And a written prayer is a prayer of faith, special, sure, and to be answered.
—Tupper.

If you would learn to write, it is in the street you must learn it. Both for the vehicle and for the aims of fine arts, you must frequent the public square. The people, and not the college, is the writer's home. A scholar is a candle which the love and desire of all men will light.—Emerson.

A good author, and one who writes carefully, often discovers that the expression of which he has been in search without being able to discover it, and which he has at last found, is that which was the most simple, the most natural, and which seems as if it ought to have presented itself at once, without effort, to the mind.—Bruyère.

The habit of committing our thoughts to writing is a powerful means of expanding the mind, and producing a logical and systematic arrangement of our views and opinions. It is this which gives the writer a vast superiority, as to the accuracy and extent of his conceptions, over the mere talker. No one can ever hope to know the principles of any art or science thoroughly who does not write as well as read upon the subject.—Blakey.

Wrong

Wrong is but falsehood put in practice.—Landor.

There is no God dare wrong a worm.
—Emerson.

Brother, brother, we are both in the wrong.—Gay.

Wrong cannot have a legal descendant.—Thomas Paine.

Wrongs unredressed, or insults unavenged.—Wordsworth.

The multitude is always in the wrong.—Wentworth Dillon.

It often falls, in course of common life, that right long time is overborne of wrong.—Spenser.

I see the right, and I approve it too; condemn the wrong, and yet the wrong pursue.—Ovid.

Truth forever on the scaffold, wrong forever on the throne.—Lowell.

My soul is sick with every day's report of wrong and outrage with which earth is filled.—Cowper.

The history of all the world tells us that immoral means will ever intercept good ends.—Coleridge.

Contempt for private wrongs was one of the features of ancient morals.—Joubert.

It is better to suffer wrong than to do it, and happier to be sometimes cheated than not to trust.—Johnson.

He who commits a wrong will himself inevitably see the writing on the wall, though the world may not count him guilty.—Tupper.

Wrongs do not leave off there where they begin, but still beget new mischiefs in their course.—Daniel.

Wrong is wrong; no fallacy can hide it, no subterfuge cover it so shrewdly but that the All-Seeing One will discover and punish it.—Rivarol.

It is vain to trust in wrong; it is like erecting a building upon a frail foundation, and which will directly be sure to topple over.—Hosea Ballou.

We may neglect the wrongs which we receive, but be careful to rectify those which we are the cause of to others.—Dewey.

Most wretched men are cradled into poetry by wrong; they learn in suffering what they teach in song.—Shelley.

It is vain to trust in wrong; as much of evil, so much of loss, is the formula of human history.—Theodore Parker.

There are few people who are more often in the wrong than those who cannot endure to be so.—Rochefoucauld.

Higher than the perfect song
For which love longeth,
Is the tender fear of wrong,
That never wrongeth.

—Bayard Taylor.

To revenge a wrong is easy, usual, and natural, and, as the world thinks, savors of nobleness of mind; but religion teaches the contrary, and tells us it is better to neglect than to requite it.—J. Beaumont.

Y

Yearning

Ere yet we yearn for what is out of our reach, we are still in the cradle. When wearied out with our yearnings, desire again falls asleep,—we are on the death-bed.—
Bulwer-Lytton.

Years

I am declined
Into the vale of years. —Shakespeare.

Years following years, steal something every day;
At last they steal us from ourselves away.

Years have not seen, Time shall not see,
The hour that tears my soul from thee.
—Pope.
—Byron.

Winged time glides on insensibly, and deceives us; and there is nothing more fleeting than years.—Ovid.

Years steal Fire from the mind, as vigour from the limb;
And life's enchanted cup but sparkles near the brim. —Byron.

Jumping o'er times,
Turning the accomplishment of many years
Into an hourglass. —Shakespeare.

Yes

"Yes!"—Oh! it is a kind reply,
When flowing from the lips of dear
Young beauty—in whose ear we sigh
The one fond wish. —Anonymous.

By your truth she shall be true—
Ever true as wives of yore—
And her Yes, once said to you,
Shall be yes for evermore.
—Miss Barrett.

"Yes!" I answered you last night;
"No!" this morning, Sir, I say!
Colours seen by candle-light
Will not look the same by day.
—Miss Barrett.

Yesterday

What shall I bring to lay upon thy bier,
O Yesterday! thou day forever dead!
With what strange garlands shall I crown thy head,
Thou silent One? —Julia C. R. Dorr.

Yew tree

Cheerless, unsocial plant! that loves to dwell
'Midst skulls and coffins, epitaphs and worms:
Where light-heel'd ghosts, and visionary shades, Beneath the wan cold moon (as fame reports)
Embodied, thick, perform their mystic rounds.
No other merriment, dull tree! is thine.
—Blair.

Youth

Youth comes but once in a lifetime.
—Longfellow.

Keep true to the dreams of thy youth.—Schiller.

We must be young to do great things.—Goethe.

Everything is pretty that is young.
—Richardson.

Reckless youth makes rueful age.—
Franklin.

Wine and youth are fire upon fire.
—Fielding.

From thoughtless youth to ruminating age.—Cowper.

Youth holds no society with grief.—
Euripides.

In youth we learn; in age we understand.—Marie Ebner-Eschenbach.

Alas! the slippery nature of tender youth.—Claudianus.

Home-keeping youth have ever homely wits.—Shakespeare.

Towering in confidence of twenty-one.—Sam'l Johnson.

The atrocious crime of being a young man.—William Pitt.

Youth is a continual intoxication; it is the fever of reason.—La Rochefoucauld.

Young fellows will be young fellows.—Bickerstaff.

Youth should be a savings-bank.—Madame Swetchine.

To be young was very heaven!—Wordsworth.

Ah, youth! forever dear, forever kind.—Homer.

And both were young, and one was beautiful.—Byron.

We have some salt of our youth in us.—Shakespeare.

No young man believes he shall ever die.—John Hazlitt.

He wears the rose of youth upon him.—Shakespeare.

Too young for woe, though not for tears.—Washington Irving.

The youthful freshness of a blameless heart.—Washington Irving.

It is so beautiful to die young!—André Chénier.

Youth is everywhere in place.—Emerson.

A youth of frolic, an old age of cards.—Pope.

Youth is life's beautiful moment.—Lacordaire.

The youth of the soul is everlasting and eternity is youth.—Richter.

Like virgin parchment, capable of any inscription.—Massinger.

Young men soon give and soon forget affronts;
Old age is slow in both. —Addison.

Ah! happy years! once more who would not be a boy!—Byron.

That exuberant age when all fresh fancies are fevers.—Miss Braddon.

The fresh and buoyant sense of being that bounds in youth's yet careless breast.—Moore.

A youth to whom was given
So much of earth, so much of heaven.
—Wordsworth.

The spirit of a youth
That means to be of note, begins betimes.
—Shakespeare.

Our youth we can have but to-day;
We may always find time to grow old.
—Bishop Berkeley.

My salad days;
When I was green in judgment.
—Shakespeare.

Young men think old men fools, and old men know young men to be so.—Camden.

And made youth younger, and taught life to live.—Young.

The humor of youth, which ever thinks that good whose goodness it sees not.—Sir P. Sidney.

Youth should watch joys and shoot them as they fly.—Dryden.

Youth is not the era of wisdom; let us therefore have due consideration.—Rivarol.

Girls we love for what they are; young men for what they promise to be.—Goethe.

Let nothing foul to either eye or ear reach those doors within which dwells a boy.—Juvenal.

Live as long as you may, the first twenty years are the longest half of your life.—Southey.

Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth.—Bible.

When we are out of sympathy with the young, then I think our work in this world is over.—George MacDonald.

In the lexicon of youth which fate reserves for a bright manhood, there is no such word as fail.—Lytton.

No boy is well prepared for rough climbing, unless he is well shod with Christian principles.

The greatest part of mankind employ their first years to make their last miserable.—Bruyère.

It is a truth but too well known, that rashness attends youth, as prudence does old age.—Cicero.

We think our fathers fools, so wise we grow;
Our wiser sons, no doubt, will think us so.
—Pope.

To be young is surely the best, if the most precarious, gift of life.—Lowell.

If youth be a defect, it is one that we outgrow only too soon.—Lowell.

Youth! youth! how buoyant are thy hopes!
they turn,
Like marigolds, toward the sunny side.
—Jean Ingelow.

O youth! thou often tearest thy wings against the thorns of voluptuousness.—Victor Hugo.

Wise men, like wine, are best when old; pretty women, like bread, are best when young.—Haliburton.

I am young, it is true; but in noble souls valor does not wait for years.—Corneille.

Grieve not that I die young. Is it not well to pass away ere life has lost its brightness?—Lady Flora Hastings.

Agreeable surprises are the perquisites of youth.—Bulwer-Lytton.

So live, that thy young and glowing breast can think of death without a sigh.—Eliza Cook.

Youth might be wise; we suffer less from pains than pleasures.—Bailey.

While memory watches o'er the sad review of joys that faded like the morning dew.—Campbell.

Secure their religion; season their younger years with prudent and pious principles.—Jeremy Taylor.

I love the soul that dares tread the temptations of his years beneath his youthful feet.—Dr. Watts.

Shall not a man have his spring as well as the plants?—Thoreau.

To be famous when you are young is the fortune of the gods.—Beaconsfield.

Youth is eminently the fittest season for establishing habits of industry.—Dr. Farr.

Whom the gods love die young, was said of yore.—Byron.

I resemble the poplar,—that tree which, even when old, still looks young.—Joubert.

Deal mildly with his youth; for young hot colts, being raged, do rage the more.—Shakespeare.

Young men are apt to think themselves wise enough, as drunken men are to think themselves sober enough.—Chesterfield.

The insect-youth are on the wing,
Eager to taste the honied spring,
And float amid the liquid noon!
—Gray.

All of us who are worth anything spend our manhood in unlearning the follies or expiating the mistakes of our youth.—Shelley.

Standing with reluctant feet,
Where the brook and river meet,
Womanhood and childhood fleet!
—Longfellow.

There is a feeling of Eternity in youth which makes us amends for everything. To be young is to be as one of the immortals.—Hazlitt.

The heart of youth is reached through the senses; the senses of age are reached through the heart.—Rétif de la Bretonne.

Youth is not like a new garment which we can keep fresh and fair by wearing sparingly. Youth, while we have it, we must wear daily; and it will fast wear away.—John Foster.

The destiny of any nation at any given time depends on the opinions of its young men under five-and-twenty.—Goethe.

Who can blame me if I cherish the belief that the world is still young,—that there are great possibilities in store for it?—Tyndall.

Rash, inexperienced youth holds itself a chosen instrument, and allows itself unbounded license.—Goethe.

Beautiful as sweet! and young as beautiful! and soft as young! and gay as soft! and innocent as gay!—Young.

A man that is young in years may be old in hours, if he have lost no time; but that happeneth rarely.—Bacon.

How beautiful is youth! how bright it gleams
With its illusions, aspirations, dreams!
Book of Beginnings, Story without End,
Each maid a heroine, and each man a friend!
—Longfellow.

What is that to him that reaps not harvest of his youthful joys,
Though the deep heart of existence beat forever like a boy's? —Tennyson.

For youth no less becomes
The light and careless livery that it wears,
Than settled age his sables, and his weeds
Importing health and graveness.
—Shakespeare.

Be it a weakness, it deserves some praise,
We love the play-place of our early days.
The scene is touching, and the heart is stone,
That feels not at that sight, and feels at none.
—Cowper.

If the world does improve on the whole, yet youth must always begin anew, and go through the stages of culture from the beginning.—Goethe.

Women are only told that they resemble angels when they are young and beautiful; consequently, it is their persons, not their virtues, that procure them homage.—Phœbe Cary.

I remember, I remember
How my childhood fled by,—
The mirth of its December,
And the warmth of its July.
—Pæd.

And now he shook away the snow of time from the winter-green of memory, and beheld the fair years of his childhood uncovered, fresh, green, and balmy, standing afar off before him.—Richter.

Every street has two sides, the shady side and the sunny. When two men shake hands and part, mark which of the two takes the sunny side; he will be the younger man of the two.—Bulwer-Lytton.

For the short-lived bloom and contracted span of brief and wretched life is fast fleeting away! While we are drinking and calling for garlands, ointments, and women, old age steals swiftly on with noiseless step.—Juvenal.

Fair laughs the morn, and soft the zephyr blows,
While proudly rising o'er the azure realm
In gallant trim the gilded vessel goes,
Youth on the prow, and Pleasure at the helm.
—Gray.

Her years
Were ripe, they might make six-and-twenty springs;
But there are forms which Time to touch forbears,
And turns aside his scythe to vulgar things.
—Byron.

Hail, blooming Youth!
May all your virtues with your years improve,
Till in consummate worth you shine the pride
Of these our days, and succeeding times
A bright example. —Wm. Somerville.

I love the acquaintance of young people; because, in the first place, I do not like to think myself growing old. In the next place, young acquaintances must last longest, if they do last; and then, the girl, young men have more virtue than old men; they have more generous sentiments in every respect.—Dr. Johnson.

It is not easy to surround life with any circumstances in which youth will not be delightful; and I am afraid that, whether married or unmarried, we shall find the vesture of terrestrial existence more heavy and cumbrous the longer it is worn.—Steele.

A man that is young in years may be old in hours, if he have lost no time; but that happeneth rarely. Generally, youth is like the first cogitations, not so wise as the second; for there is a youth in thoughts as well as in ages; and yet the invention of young men is more lively than that of old, and imaginations stream into their minds better, and, as it were, more divinely.—Bacon.

O happy unown'd youths! your limbs can bear
The scorching dog-star and the winter's air,
While the rich infant, nurs'd with care and pain,
Thirsts with each heat and coughs with every rain! —Gay.

There is nothing can equal the tender hours
When life is first in bloom,
When the heart like a bee, in a wild of flowers,
Finds everywhere perfume;
When the present is all and it questions not
If those flowers shall pass away,
But pleased with its own delightful lot,
Dreams never of decay. —Bohn.

At almost every step in life we meet with young men from whom we anticipate wonderful things, but of whom, after careful inquiry, we never hear another word. Like certain chintzes, calicoes, and gingham, they show finely on their first newness, but cannot stand the sun and rain, and assume a very sober aspect after washing day.—Hawthorne.

Among all the accomplishments of youth there is none preferable to a decent and agreeable behavior among men, a modest freedom of speech, a soft and elegant manner of address, a graceful and lovely deportment, a cheerful gravity and good-humor, with a mind appearing ever serene under the ruffling accidents of human life.—Watts.

Crabbed age and youth cannot live together;
Youth is full of pleasance, age is full of care;
Youth like summer morn, age like winter weather;
Youth like summer brave, age like winter bare.
Youth is full of sport, age's breath is short;
Youth is nimble, age is lame;
Youth is hot and bold, age is weak and cold;
Youth is wild, and age is tame.
Age, I do abhor thee; youth I do adore thee. —Shakespeare.

I can remember, with unsteady feet,
Tottering from room to room, and finding pleasure
In flowers, and toys, and sweetmeats,
Things which long Have lost their power to please; which when I see them,
Raise only now a melancholy wish
I were the little trifter once again,
Who could be pleas'd so lightly. —Southey.

Youth, that pursuest with such eager pace
Thy even way,
Thou pantest on to win a mournful race:
Then stay! oh, stay!
Pause and luxuriate in thy sunny plain;
Loiter,—enjoy:
Once past, Thou never wilt come back again,
A second Boy.
—Richard Monckton Milnes.

Youth dreams a bliss on this side death.
It dreams a rest, if not more deep,
More grateful than this marble sleep;
It hears a voice within it tell:
Calm's not life's crown, though calm is well.
'Tis all perhaps which man acquires,
But 'tis not what our youth desires.
—Matthew Arnold.

Z

Z^{ea}_l The fool rageth and is confident.—Bible.

Not too much zeal.—Talleyrand.

Blind zeal can only do harm.—Lichtwer.

Zealous, yet modest.—Beattie.

The worst of madmen is a saint run mad.—Pope.

I have more zeal than wit.—Pope.

Inwardly drunk with a certain belief.—Emerson.

Zeal, then, not charity, became the guide.—Pope.

Zeal, the blind conductor of the will.—Dryden.

Nothing to build, and all things to destroy.—Dryden.

Tell zeal it lacks devotion.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

The hopes of zeal are not wholly groundless.—Johnson.

Never let your zeal outrun your charity. The former is but human; the latter is divine.—Hosea Ballou.

Zeal and duty are not slow;
But on Occasion's forelock watchful wait.—Milton.

In the ardor of pursuit men soon forget the goal from which they start.—Schiller.

We do that in our zeal our calmer moment would be afraid to answer.—Scott.

Zeal is very blind, or badly regulated, when it encroaches upon the rights of others.—Pasquier Quesnel.

But zeal moved thee;
To please thy gods thou didst it! —Milton.

For zeal's a dreadful termagant,
That teaches saints to tear and cant. —Butler.

It is a coal from God's altar must kindle our fire; and without fire, true fire, no acceptable sacrifice.—William Penn.

The zeal of friends it is that razes me,
And not the hate of enemies.—Schiller.

Zeal is fit for wise men, but flourishes chiefly among fools.—Tillotson.

To be furious in religion is to be irreligiously religious.—William Penn.

The good which bloodshed could not gain your peaceful zeal shall find.—Whittier.

Zeal without humility is like a ship without a rudder, liable to be stranded at any moment.—Feltham.

True zeal is an ignis lambeus, a soft and gentle flame, that will not scorch one's hand.—Cudworth.

The frenzy of nations is the statesmanship of fate.—Bulwer-Lytton.

Nothing great was ever achieved without enthusiasm.—Emerson.

There is no zeal blinder than that which is inspired with a love of justice against offenders.—Fielding.

Zeal without knowledge is like expedition to a man in the dark.—Newton.

A father or a brother may be hated zealously, and loved civilly or naturally.—Milton.

There is nothing in which men more deceive themselves than in what they call zeal.—Addison.

If our zeal were true and genuine we should be much more angry with a sinner than a heretic.—Addison.

I do not love a man who is zealous for nothing.—Goldsmith.

Nothing can be fairer, or more noble, than the holy fervor of true zeal.—Molière.

There are zealots for slavery as well as zealots for freedom.—Burleigh.

Violent zeal for truth has a hundred to one odds to be either petulancy, ambition, or pride.—Swift.

They have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge.—Bible.

True zeal is merciful and mild, can pity and forbear.—John Newton.

God approves the depth, but not the tumult, of the soul.—Wordsworth.

It were better to be of no church than to be bitter for any.—William Penn.

Nothing has wrought more prejudice to religion, or brought more disparagement upon truth, than boisterous and unseasonable zeal.—Barrow.

There is no greater sign of a general decay of virtue in a nation than a want of zeal in its inhabitants for the good of their country.—Addison.

A just cause and a zealous defender make an imperious resolution cut off the tediousness of cautious discussions.—Sir P. Sidney.

The eloquent man is he who is no eloquent speaker, but who is inwardly drunk with a certain belief.—Emerson.

On such a theme it were impious to be calm; passion is reason, transport, temper, here!—Young.

Whether zeal or moderation be the point we aim at, let us keep fire out of the one and frost out of the other.—Addison.

The zeal which begins with hypocrisy must conclude in treachery; at first it deceives, at last it betrays.—Bacon.

It is a zealot's faith that blasts the shrines of the false god, but builds no temple to the true.—Sydney Dobell.

I have never known a trader in philanthropy who was not wrong in his head or heart somewhere or other.—Coleridge.

Motives by excess reverse their very nature, and instead of exciting, stun and stupefy the mind.—Coleridge.

Experience shows that success is due less to ability than to zeal. The winner is he who gives himself to his work, body and soul.—Charles Buxton.

Not the zeal alone of those who seek Him proves God, but the blindness of those who seek Him not.—Pascal.

I would have every zealous man examine his heart thoroughly, and I believe he will often find that what he calls a zeal for his religion is either pride, interest, or ill-repute.—Addison.

A Spirit, zealous, as he seemed, to know More of the Almighty's works, and chiefly Man, God's latest image. —Milton.

Awake, my soul! stretch every nerve,
And press with vigour on;
A heavenly race demands thy zeal,
And an immortal crown.
—Philip Doddridge.

I remember a passage in Goldsmith's "Vicar of Wakefield," which he was afterwards fool enough to expunge:

 "I do not love a man who is zealous for nothing."—Sam'l Johnson.

Through zeal knowledge is gotten,
 through lack of zeal knowledge is lost;
 let a man who knows this double path of gain and loss thus place himself that knowledge may grow.—Buddha.

Some things will not bear much zeal; and the more earnest we are about them, the less we recommend ourselves to the approbation of sober and considerate men.—Tillotson.

It is admirably remarked, by a most excellent writer, that zeal can no more hurry a man to act in direct opposition to itself than a rapid stream can carry a boat against its own current.—
 Fielding.

Do not too many believe no zeal to be spiritual but what is censorious or vindictive? Whereas no zeal is spiritual that is not also charitable.—
 Thomas Sprat.

What I object to Scotch philosophers in general is, that they reason upon man as they would upon a divinity; they pursue truth without caring if it be useful truth.—Sydney Smith.

Zephyrs

Soft is the strain when zephyr gently blows.—Pope.

Lull'd by soft zephyrs thro' the broken pane.—Pope.

The balmy zephyrs, silent since her death,
 Lament the ceasing of a sweeter breath.
 —Pope.

Soft o'er the shrouds aerial whispers
 breathe,
 That seemed but zephyrs to the train beneath.
 —Pope.

Fair laughs the morn, and soft the zephyr blows.—Gray.

Let Zephyr only breathe
 And with her tresses play.
 —Drummond.

And on the balmy zephyrs tranquil rest
 The silver clouds.
 —Keats.

And soften'd sounds along the waters die:
 Smooth flow the waves, the zephyrs gently play.
 —Pope.

And soon
 Their hushing dances languished to a stand,
 Like midnight leaves when, as the Zephyrs
 swoon,
 All on their drooping stems they sink un-fanned.
 —Hood.
